d Brick Bash! 1.3

Time to revisit the classic game of Break-Out, where you use a paddle to hit a ball against a wall of bricks, destroying the bricks. However, this game has a 3D playing area. You get bonus points for finishing levels quickly and from hitting the occasional targets that appear on the back wall. Nice implementation of an oldie.

Card games always go down well and this one is no exception. Cards arranged in a pyramid, the object is to remove all of the cards from the pyramid by placing uncovered cards on top of the turned-over card (or "play" card) at the top of the board. Cards are only playable if they are one up or one down, in sequence, from the play card. Sounds easy -

Asshole may sound rude but it isn't. It's an excellent card game for the Macintosh where your goal is to be the first one to get rid of all your cards. The last one to go out will become the Asshole; the penultimate one, the Vice Asshole. Similarly, first out is President (getting Asshole's two best cards on the next deal) and second out is Vice President (who gets Asshole's best card next deal). The real game of Asshole has many variations in game play, and so does this one! The sampled voices are a nice touch.

Everyone knows how to play Dominoes. There are many variations, from the simple "play until you're out" up to the game of "42", which involves bidding, and lots of other weird silliness. This version derives from a game called "Muggins". The idea is to score as many points as possible by making smart plays, which take some learning, and/or running out of your tiles before your opponent. Very addictive - and the computer opponent is good!

Rain Net 1.1

Definitely a weird one, this. Valentine is a gourmand frog who likes strawberries, but has a problem: when she walks, she can't stop to help her by putting obstacles in her path. Her friend Cornelius cannot eat strawberries but can stop Valentine. When Valentine has eaten all the strawberries you can go to the next level. As I said, weird...
