

Displacement

To describe accurately how the position of an object has changed, we need two pieces of information; the distance it has moved and the direction in which it has moved. Together, these two pieces of information are called the displacement. A good way of illustrating displacement is to draw an arrow. The length of the arrow represents the distance travelled, while the arrowhead indicates the direction in which the object has moved.