

Contact force

When two surfaces are held in contact - for example, by the force of gravity or by a person pushing one surface against another - there is a contact or reaction force between the surfaces. This force stops the surfaces passing right through each other.

The contact force always acts at right angles to the surfaces involved.