

The condylar fossae are depressions located posterior to the occipital condyles in the lateral part of the occipital bone. In full extension of the head, the fossae receive the posterior margin of the superior articular facets of C1 (atlas). The floors of the fossae may be perforated by condylar canals, in which case they transmit emissary veins.