

At the costal angles, the posterior intercostal arteries send off a small bifurcation, known as the collateral branch, which descends to the upper border of the inferior rib, which it passes along before anastomosing with the anterior intercostal arteries.