

In the cervical region, the vertebral arteries give off small spinal branches that supply parts of the spinal cord and its associated membranes. The branches, enter the vertebral canal through the intervertebral foramina, anastomose extensively with other arteries in the region and form small lateral arterial plexuses on the posterior surfaces of the vertebral bodies; two laterally and one medially.