

The third occipital nerve is a branch of the third cervical dorsal ramus. It arises deep to the trapezius, which it then pierces to reach the skin of the lower occipital region, medial to the greater occipital nerve with which it is connected.

Supply

The third occipital nerve supplies the skin of the lower occipital region.