

The lateral supraclavicular nerves arise from the common trunk of the supraclavicular nerve deep to platysma and the deep cervical fascia. They descend superficially over the trapezius muscle and acromion to terminate in superior and posterior skin of the shoulder.

Supply

The lateral branch supplies skin over the upper and posterior aspects of the shoulder, as well as the acromioclavicular joint.