

The diaphragm separates the chest and abdominal contents. In surgery of the thoraco-lumbar spine it is usual to detach the diaphragm. This involves dividing it at approximately 2cm from its attachment to the chest wall. This division allows for subsequent repair, but also allows for minimal denervation, as the intercostal nerves supply the periphery.