

This is a highly variable system of veins that drains blood from the thoraco-abdominal walls. Its importance is not in its function, as it can be divided without significant sequelae throughout its length. Rather, it is the fact that it has a large diameter and is a soft-walled vessel, which can be immediately adjacent to the operative field. Surgical division is much preferred to accidental avulsion as substantial hemorrhage can result.