

BIG MOMMA'S HOUSE 2

In 2000's "Big Momma's House," Martin Lawrence had his "largest" role ever, as an FBI agent who is a master of disguise. To trap a brutal bank robber, Lawrence went deep undercover – impersonating a fun-loving granny known as Big Momma. Now, Lawrence is back as the boldest, biggest, and baddest Momma ever, in the mother of all comedies: BIG MOMMA'S HOUSE 2. This time, Lawrence transforms himself into Big Momma to avert a national security disaster. But saving the country is the least of Big Momma's problems, as he takes on his ultimate challenge – being nanny/housekeeper to the suspect's dysfunctional family.

Everyone's favorite bundle of double-barreled excitement is back for another crime-busting adventure, when funnyman Martin Lawrence returns as undercover FBI Agent Malcolm Turner in Big Momma's House 2, the sequel to the 2000 worldwide box office hit Big Momma's House.

This time around, Malcolm is out to expose the suspected designer of a deadly computer "worm" that would allow outside forces access to sophisticated and critical government intelligence files. Unfortunately, the only way the crafty agent can get next to the worm's creator, Tom Fuller (MARK MOSES), is to access the programmer's Orange County home as the new "nanny" to Fuller and his wife Leah's (EMILY PROCTER) children: toddler Andrew and his two older sisters, Carrie and Molly. This means that Malcolm must once again rely on his sure-fire alter ego, the take-no-prisoners

Hattie Mae Pierce, a.k.a. “Big Momma,” to bring down the bad guys and prove that a woman’s work is never done!

But once undercover, the job proves another tough juggling act for Big Momma as “she” must manage the hectic lives of the three Fuller kids, keep up with their myriad of daily activities, and handle the many household chores, all while secretly trying to dig up information on Tom’s computer virus. Of course, Malcolm’s hardest and most comical task is staying in Big Momma character throughout, which requires the trickiest of physical and vocal transformations, not to mention the ability to think really fast on his pumps.

Hilarious situations ensue for “Big Momma” while trying to trap her prey, including, infiltrating a ritzy women’s day spa, leading a bawdy teen cheerleading competition, and surviving a crazy jet ski chase, all while trying to keep “her” wig straight and skirts smooth.

Along the way, “Big Momma” also helps bring the fractured Fuller clan back together and, in turn, Malcolm develops a newfound appreciation for his own family, which includes stepson Trent (JASCHA WASHINGTON) and expectant wife Sherrie (NIA LONG). Malcolm also learns he can strike a successful balance between his work and home responsibilities, without shortchanging either side in the process. So what if it took wearing fake breasts and a floral tent dress to get there?

Big Momma’s House 2 was directed by John Whitesell (Malibu’s Most Wanted), from a screenplay by Don Rhymer, based on characters created by Darryl Quarles. The film was produced by David T. Friendly and Michael Green and co-produced by Jeremiah Samuels. Martin Lawrence, Jeffrey Kwatinetz and Arnon Milchan served as executive producers.

Joining Whitesell behind the camera are director of photography Mark Irwin, ASC/CSC, editor Priscilla Nedd Friendly, A.C.E. production designer Craig Stearns, costume designer Debrae Little, and composer George S. Clinton.

The decision to produce a sequel to Big Momma’s House was an easy one for the filmmakers. Not only did the original movie bring in over $200 million in its worldwide theatrical release, audiences embraced star Martin Lawrence’s lovable, clever, and outrageous title character and would surely be eager to see what the buxom septuagenarian would be up to next.

According to Lawrence, the key to the success of the character of Big Momma is simple. “Everybody knows a Big Momma. She’s that kind of woman who’s honest to a fault but, at the same time, can warm your heart and make you laugh.” Concur director John Whitesell, “What’s really special about Big Momma is that she so relatable, and she crosses all racial, ethnic, and even religious boundaries. Everyone, everywhere has had some version of Big Momma in their lives.”

Of course, in terms of creating Big Momma, it doesn’t hurt that Martin Lawrence has a unique talent for channeling the female psyche. Notes Whitesell: “Martin does a lot of female stuff in his stand-up routines, and when you watch him, you realize just how completely he’s able to tap into that persona, in very different degrees, with very different kinds of characters. He just innately seems to understand how a woman thinks.”

Explains Lawrence: “I’ve had lots of influences to draw upon for the character of Big Momma, especially the household I grew up in. It was filled with strong women--my mom, my grandmother, my sisters--and they’ve all helped shape the female characters I’ve created, particularly Big Momma.”

But Lawrence didn’t just jump back into recreating this iconic character. “First and foremost,” the actor states, “the ingredients for a sequel had to be right. The script had to be funny. Very funny. And, fortunately, it was.”

“Coordinating Martin Lawrence’s schedule and understanding that the sequel had to be as good--if not even better--than the original, factored into the five-year gap between the first Big Momma’s House and its follow-up,” says producer David T. Friendly. “We knew all along that we wanted to make it. The challenge was in getting it all right.”

For Lawrence, the toughest part of making the Big Momma’s House movies was undergoing the grueling and complicated makeup process that turns a lean, 40-year-old man into a plus-size woman of 70. Comments the actor, “You know, it’s just not normal to walk around with that big face and big neck attached to you every day. Believe me, it was hard. But, every day, once I’d finally come out of that makeup trailer, getting into the character was surprisingly easy.”

To transform Lawrence into Big Momma involved many steps utilizing a host of different artists with their own, unique skills. Wesley Wofford, the film's key prosthetics makeup artist, described the process of this startling conversion: "Martin Lawrence first had a life-casting session, where a mold was made of his face and body. From this process we ended up with a cement replica upon which the character of Big Momma could be fabricated.

"The body cast was then sent to a specialty costume department where the 'fat suits' were created from various types of foam, hollow rubber, webbing and spandex. It was built specifically to Lawrence's body to fit and move with him perfectly."

"After molding individual body parts, muscle groups, and fatty deposits, which were each built in sections of different density to shift and move like real flesh, a foam latex skin was produced," Wofford continues. "This skin was then painted with balloon inks to match Lawrence's skin tones. His 'fat suit' went on in sections every day, with the final touch being the 'skin layer.'"

But the process didn't stop there. The makeup artists then had to deal with Lawrence above the neck. "Martin's head cast went to the sculpture/makeup design department, where a sculpture was made on top of the stone cast," relates Wofford. "Technical issues, such as thickness in relation to facial movement and blending edges, were combined with artistic character choices to arrive at the final design. This sculpture was then cut into nine separate pieces, removed from the full head, and placed on cores, which were partial copies of Lawrence's face."

The sculptures were then blended and detailed down to each individual wrinkle and pore. "Afterwards, molds were made of the finished sculptures, the clay was removed, and the molds and cores were cleaned," describes Wofford. "The nine molds then went to the silicone department, where the appliances were fabricated. Silicone was injected into the closed molds and cores, filling the spaces between, and the end result were pieces that made up the shape of Martin's face on the inside, and 'Big Momma's' face on the outside." Ultimately, the assemblage of the nine separate pieces formed a mask that fit perfectly and moved with Lawrence's face.

Each day, Lawrence underwent an hour and forty-five minute make-up session, where two makeup artists meticulously glued the overlapping mask pieces onto his face, blended them seamlessly together, then painted the skin tones, and finished it all off with beauty makeup. The makeup was worn all day, and after a 30-minute removal at the end of the day, these mask pieces were thrown away. A new set was then prepped to be applied to the actor the next morning.

In addition, Lawrence had three different “fat suits” with five separate sets of arms and legs. Between Lawrence and his Big Momma photo double and stuntmen, over 925 individual appliances were fabricated for the production.

Working with Martin Lawrence and his on-screen alter-egos was a treat for John Whitesell. “When you have somebody so innately funny, who understands comedy the way Martin does, he’s able to bring an immediate vibrancy and energy to his character,” says Whitesell. “And then, when you really get into the scenes, you discover all these hidden, unexpected things coming from him that are amazingly funny.”

David T. Friendly also has high praise for his star. “Martin is not only a very good, solid actor, he’s also an incredible improviser,” says the producer. “Very often, at the end of a scene, he’d add something unscripted--maybe a little flourish or a look – just some tiny bit of genius that ended up making all the difference.”

Everyone on set enjoyed the character of Big Momma herself, especially Lawrence. “What I love about her is that she’s completely guileless,” says Lawrence. “She has the confidence to put on a bikini, wear Bo Derek braids, and just be like a sexy woman out there on the beach. On the other hand, if she decides to jet-ski or be a cheerleading coach, she’ll just go do that too. Wherever Big Momma is and whatever she does, she’s unflappable--and unstoppable.”

Lawrence also appreciates the way Big Momma is able to help and change the people around her. He explains, “When Big Momma sees how dysfunctional the Fuller family is, Malcolm realizes he doesn’t want his own family to become like them. So, as the Fullers get closer, thanks to Big Momma, it makes Malcolm that much more confident about his ability to bond with his own wife and children.”

Adds John Whitesell: “I think part of the lesson that both Malcolm and the Fullers learn is that you have to work at things to make them better. It requires communication and patience and love.” The director continues, “When Malcolm puts on the Big Momma costume, many of the emotional elements that were trapped inside of Malcolm are forced out, and he learns just how organic all those deeper feelings are to his personal makeup. His character not only goes through a physical transformation, but a spiritual one as well.”

In the first Big Momma's House, Malcolm was a sharp undercover detective who was continuously poised to take chances and risks. But now, in the sequel, Malcolm finds himself caught between being a hotshot at work and a good father and husband at home. Says Whitesell: “It’s not until he goes undercover as a nanny, and gets to observe his new ‘family,’ that Malcolm comes to understand he can be true to both his own family and his work, and that neither has to suffer. But, of course, it’s Martin Lawrence’s performance that really sells the whole thing.”

Director Whitesell gives kudos to the rest of his Big Momma's House 2 cast as well. He was appreciative to have been blessed with such a versatile and inventive comic ensemble, starting with Nia Long, who plays Sherrie Turner, Malcolm’s wife. “Aside from being so beautiful and sexy, Nia is a strong, focused, and incredibly likeable actress,” praises Whitesell. “She and Martin have fantastic chemistry and there’s just this special something that happens when they share a scene together.”

Then there’s Zachary Levi, best known for his witty comedic turn on the hit television series Less Than Perfect. Levi portrays Malcolm’s co-worker and friend, Kevin. “Zack is a burgeoning comic genius who I think is going to be a very big star,” says Whitesell. “He comes up with so many wonderful different ways to do every scene and attacks each moment with boundless enthusiasm and energy.”

As for Emily Procter, who portrays harried wife and mother Leah Fuller, the director notes that she does a complete “180” here from her lead role on CSI: Miami. “Emily was so adept with comedy, particularly having to play straight-gal to Big Momma. The joke is in how seriously she actually takes her outrageous new nanny, and Emily knew just how to wring every laugh out of that set-up.”

Mark Moses, a former regular on the top-rated series Desperate Housewives, also had to play against type, as Big Momma’s adversary, the suspicious computer software designer Tom Fuller. “Tom is kind of a mysterious, shadowy character,” remarks Whitesell, “and Mark knew how to play him with just the right amount of menace, while also keeping up a believable family man front at home. He definitely struck a perfect balance.”

In the end, producer David T. Friendly hopes that audiences will leave Big Momma's House 2 feeling not only enormously entertained but also emotionally fulfilled. “Of course, the jokes, gags, and fun of the movie are what you look for in a comedy,” says Friendly, “but the dividend here may be also learning about the value of family and relationships, and the importance of balancing your work schedule with your home life.”

Adds Whitesell, “The movie also shows that if we can just learn to relax a little bit and enjoy what we have around us, we’ll be much happier people. I couldn’t agree more.”
