First let me thank you for supporting the shareware system. Your contribution enables people all over the world to receive high quality software at very low prices, and to try out programs before they are purchased.

If you are reading this form you have the first version of The Internet Navigator to hit the information highway. Their has no doubt been many changes and improvements sense this version was introduced.

This program is intended to be an address book; if you will, for Internet addresses, telnet sites, ftp sites, etc. that normaly have long confusing addresses. To simplify the process of using the Internet The Internet Navigator with a push of a button will copy these addresses onto the clipboard; they then can be pasted to the terminal with great ease.   This process works with virtually all programs, not only terminal programs.   One oftem wants to add an E-Mail address to a letter or so forth. In addition, the fact that when the "FLOAT" option is in the on position this program will "float" on top of all other programs minimized or maximized allowing it to be a quick reference to E-Mail addresses you use every day, or commands you seldom use and may have to look up.

The features implemented in the retail version are many. First off the retail version automatically checks for SHARE.EXE and VSHARE.EXE and makes the proper adjustments. The retail version allows you to tailor the entire program to your needs right down to renaming the categories like "E-Mail" to something of your choosing. The retail version offers many print options including a print preview, an advanced help system, and an entire separate database program that allows you to look at information on a much larger scale and to add and delete fields. This larger program also has Microsoft Word 6.0 and Microsoft Excel 5.0 capabilities in case you want to copy information from the terminal to The Internet Navigator and run queries on it, put it in a letter, and so forth.

The Retail Version also has an advanced "FIND" feature that allows you to locate information in any field, as opposed to flipping through The Navigator in alphabetical order. The new retail version will include some suggestions from mail we receive on this product. We are always happy to recieve mail.
