

These ballistae were the stone cannonballs of Roman warfare. As one can see, many of them were found grouped together. They are to be found everywhere on the site and are living testimony to the severity of the Roman siege, which depended for its success partially on sending a hail of missiles and projectiles of various kinds into the besieged city.