Word Counter 2.0

What duzzit do?

Word Counter will count the number of words and characters in the current document. It performs that mundane chore by simply asking WinWord what's in the Edit Summary Info box. And it pops up a dialog box giving you the score.

But wait! There's more!

Word Counter is smart enough to know if you're in a macro, and it will count the number of words in the macro, (yeah, y'all don't need that, but we do!), and......

If you select more than 100 characters before cranking up Word Counter, it will count only the words and characters in the selection.

Nifty, eh? Well, don't get too excited. The counting is pretty slow, and it'll destroy your clipboard. But at least you're warned in advance about the clipboard, and it really isn't all that slow, unless you're the impatient type.

What? Got nuthin' better to do than count words while you're having a little writer's block, eh? Heh heh. We know the type......

Installation

Double-click on the box up above. You'll have a chance to put Word Counter on your Utilities drop-down menu. And you'll also be asked if you want to assign it to the Alt+C key combination. The installer creates a macro called WordCounter, and assigns it however you choose.

Technical Details and Oddities

The Alt+C word count on a selection can be slow: your selection is copied to a new document, and the words in that document are counted. We haven't figured out any faster way to do it.

We decided to use Alt+C as a key combination because if you forget and use Alt+W, you'll just drop down the Windows menu — no harm done, and you'll see your mistake right away. Ctrl+W is not nearly so benevolent! So Alt+C it is. You can change it, of course, any old time, by using Tools / Options / Keyboard and hitching a key combination to WordCounter.
