

One of two methods of saving a movie.

A self-contained movie file stores all the movie's contents exactly as they are played, rather than storing only references to the locations where the movie data is stored.

When saving this way, any parts that were copied from other movies are stored in the new file.