

Types of Notebooks

You can create Notebooks for a variety of purposes. For example, phone books, reference materials, lists of actions to perform for particular tasks and so on.

Up until now, anyone wishing to create stand-alone reference applications have relied on using one of the many stand-alone document generators. This is fine for many types of files and data, but in some cases it is more useful to have the information stored in a list form - as this information is.

One area we see Notebooks being useful is where you wish to distribute some form of list-based information to a large number of people. For example, if you're the administrator of a Macintosh Laboratory, you may wish to create a small Notebook which covers the rules of use of the lab to all your users, or perhaps a list of hints and tips for all the major software applications available for use within the lab.
