of common culture and an age-old history. A great effort is needed to rebuild morally and economically the countries which have abandoned Communism. For a long time the most elementary economic relationships were distorted, and basic virtues of economic life, such as truthfulness, trustworthiness and hard work were denigrated. A patient material and moral reconstruction is needed, even as people, exhausted by longstanding privation, are asking their governments for tangible and immediate results in the form of material benefits and an adequate fulfillment of their legitimate aspirations.

27.3 The fall of Marxism has naturally had a great impact on the division of the planet into worlds which are closed to one another and in jealous competition. It has further highlighted the reality of interdependence among peoples, as well as the fact that human work, by its nature, is meant to unite peoples, not divide them. Peace and prosperity, in fact, are goods which belong to the whole human race: it is not possible to enjoy them in a proper and lasting way if they are achieved and maintained at the cost of other peoples and nations, by violating their rights or excluding them from the sources of well-being.

28.1 In a sense, for some countries of Europe the real post-war period is just beginning. The radical reordering of economic systems, hitherto collectivized, entails problems and sacrifices comparable to those which the countries of Western Europe had to face in order to rebuild after the Second World War. It is right that in the present difficulties the formerly Communist countries should be aided by the united effort of other nations. Obviously they themselves must be the primary agents of their own development, but they must also be given a reasonable opportunity to accomplish this goal, something that cannot happen without the help of other countries. Moreover, their present condition, marked by difficulties and shortages, is the result of an historical process in which the formerly Communist countries were often objects and not subjects. Thus they find themselves in the present situation not as a result of free choice or mistakes which were made, but as a consequence of tragic historical events which were violently imposed on them, and which prevented them from following the path of economic and social development.

28.2 Assistance from other countries, especially the countries of Europe which were part of that history and which bear responsibility for it, represents a debt in justice. But it also corresponds to the interest and welfare of Europe as a whole, since Europe cannot live in peace if the various conflicts which have arisen as a result of the past are to become more acute because of a situation of economic disorder, spiritual dissatisfaction and desperation.

28.3 This need, however, must not lead to a slackening of efforts to sustain and assist the countries of the Third World, which often suffer even more serious conditions of poverty and want. 59 What is called for is a special effort to mobilize resources, which are not lacking in the world as a whole, for the purpose of economic growth and common development, redefining the priorities and hierarchies of values on the basis of which economic and political choices are made. Enormous resources can be made available by disarming the huge military machines which were constructed for the conflict between East and West. These resources could become even more abundant if, in place of war, reliable procedures for the resolution of conflicts could be set up, with the resulting spread of the principle of arms control and arms reduction, also in the countries of the Third World, through the adoption of appropriate measures against the arms trade.60 But it will be necessary above all to abandon a mentality in which the poor – as individuals and as peoples – are considered a burden, as irksome intruders trying to consume what others have produced. The poor ask for the right to share in enjoying material goods and to make good use of their capacity for work, thus creating a world that is more just and prosperous for all. The advancement of the poor constitutes a great opportunity for the moral, cultural and even economic growth of all humanity.

29.1 Finally, development must not be understood solely in economic terms, but in a way that is fully human.61 It is not only a question of raising all peoples to the level currently enjoyed by the richest countries, but rather of building up a more decent life through united labor, of concretely enhancing every individual's dignity and creativity, as well as his capacity to respond to his personal vocation, and thus to God's call. The apex of development is the exercise of the right and duty to seek God, to know him and to live in accordance with that knowledge.62 In the totalitarian and authoritarian regimes, the principle that force predominates over reason was carried to the extreme. Man was compelled to submit to a conception of reality imposed on him by coercion, and not reached by virtue of his own reason and the exercise of his own freedom. This principle must be overturned and total recognition must be given to the rights of the human conscience, which is bound only to the truth, both natural and revealed. The recognition of these rights represents the primary foundation of every authentically free political order.63 It is important to reaffirm this latter principle for several reasons:

29.2 a) because the old forms of totalitarianism and authoritarianism are not yet completely vanquished; indeed there is a risk that they will regain their strength. This demands renewed efforts of cooperation and solidarity between all countries;

29.3 b) because in the developed countries there is sometimes an excessive promotion of purely utilitarian values, with an appeal to the appetites and inclinations toward immediate gratification, making it difficult to recognize and respect the hierarchy of the true values of human existence;

29.4 c) because in some countries new forms of religious fundamentalism are emerging which covertly, or even openly, deny to citizens of faiths other than that of the majority the full exercise of their civil and religious rights, preventing them from taking part in the cultural process, and restricting both the Church's right to preach the Gospel and the rights of those who hear this preaching to accept it and to be converted to Christ. No authentic progress is possible without respect for the natural and fundamental right to know the truth and live according to that truth. The exercise and development of this right includes the right to discover and freely to accept Jesus Christ, who is man's true good.<sup>64</sup>

Private Property and the Universal Destination of Material Goods

30.1 In Rerum Novarum, Leo XIII strongly affirmed the natural character of the right to private property, using various arguments against the socialism of his time.<sup>65</sup> This right, which is fundamental for the autonomy and development of the person, has always been defended by the Church up to our own day. At the same time, the Church teaches that the possession of material goods is not an absolute right, and that its limits are inscribed in its very nature as a human right.

30.2 While the Pope proclaimed the right to private ownership, he affirmed with equal clarity that the “use” of goods, while marked by freedom, is subordinated to their original common destination as created goods, as well as to the will of Jesus Christ as expressed in the Gospel. Pope Leo wrote: “those whom fortune favors are admonished . . . that they should tremble at the warnings of Jesus Christ . . . and that a most strict account must be given to the Supreme Judge for the use of all they possess”; and quoting Saint Thomas Aquinas, he added: “But if the question be asked, how must one’s possessions be used? the Church replies without hesitation that man should not consider his material possessions as his own, but as common to all. . . ,” because “above the laws and judgments of men stands the law, the judgment of Christ.”<sup>66</sup>

30.3 The Successors of Leo XIII have repeated this twofold affirmation: the necessity and therefore the legitimacy of private ownership, as well as the limits which are imposed on it. <sup>67</sup> The Second Vatican Council likewise clearly restated the traditional doctrine in words which bear repeating: “In making use of the exterior things we lawfully possess, we ought to regard them not just as our own but also as common, in the sense that they can profit not only the owners but others too”; and a little later we read: “Private property or some ownership of external goods affords each person the scope needed for personal and family autonomy, and should be regarded as an extension of human freedom. . . . Of its nature private property also has a social function which is based on the law of the common purpose of goods.”<sup>68</sup> I have returned to this same doctrine, first in my address to the Third Conference of the Latin American Bishops at Puebla, and later in the Encyclicals Laborem Exercens and Sollicitudo Rei Socialis.<sup>69</sup>

31.1 Rereading this teaching on the right to property and the common destination of material wealth as it applies to the present time, the question can be raised concerning the origin of the material goods which sustain human life, satisfy people’s needs and are an object of their rights.

31.2 The original source of all that is good is the very act of God, who created both the earth and man, and who gave the earth to man, so that he might have dominion over it by his work and enjoy its fruits (Gen 1:28). God gave the earth to the whole human race for the sustenance of all its members, without excluding or favoring anyone. This is the foundation of the universal destination of the earth's goods. The earth, by reason of its fruitfulness and its capacity to satisfy human needs, is God's first gift for the sustenance of human life. But the earth does not yield its fruits without a particular human response to God's gift, that is to say, without work. It is through work that man, using his intelligence and exercising his freedom, succeeds in dominating the earth and making it a fitting home. In this way, he makes part of the earth his own, precisely the part which he has acquired through work; this is the origin of individual property. Obviously, he also has the responsibility not to hinder others from having their own part of God's gift; indeed, one must cooperate with others so that together all can dominate the earth.

31.3 In history, these two factors – work and the land – are to be found at the beginning of every human society. However, they do not always stand in the same relationship to each other. At one time the natural fruitfulness of the earth appeared to be, and was in fact, the primary factor of wealth, while work was, as it were, the help and support for this fruitfulness. In our time, the role of human work is becoming increasingly important as the productive factor both of nonmaterial and of material wealth. Moreover, it is becoming clearer how a person's work is naturally interrelated with the work of others. More than ever, work is work with others and work for others: it is a matter of doing something for someone else. Work becomes ever more fruitful and productive to the extent that people become more knowledgeable of the productive potentialities of the earth and more profoundly cognizant of the needs of those for whom their work is done.

32.1 In our time, in particular, there exists another form of ownership which is becoming no less important than land: the possession of know-how, technology and skill. The wealth of the industrialized nations is based much more on this kind of ownership than on natural resources.

32.2 Mention has just been made of the fact that people work with each other, sharing in a “community of work” which embraces ever widening circles. A person who produces something other than for his own use generally does so in order that others may use it after they have paid a just price, mutually agreed upon through free bargaining. It is precisely the ability to foresee both the needs of others and the combinations of productive factors most adapted to satisfying those needs that constitutes another important source of wealth in modern society.

Besides, many goods cannot be adequately produced through the work of an isolated individual; they require the cooperation of many people in working toward a common goal. Organizing such a productive effort, planning its duration in time, making sure that it corresponds in a positive way to the demands which it must satisfy, and taking the necessary risks – all this too is a source of wealth in today's society. In this way, the role of disciplined and creative human work and, as an essential part of that work, initiative and entrepreneurial ability becomes increasingly evident and decisive.<sup>70</sup>

32.3 This process, which throws practical light on a truth about the person which Christianity has constantly affirmed, should be viewed carefully and favorably. Indeed, besides the earth, man's principal resource is man himself. His intelligence enables him to discover the earth's productive potential and the many different ways in which human needs can be satisfied. It is his disciplined work in close collaboration with others that makes possible the creation of ever more extensive working communities which can be relied upon to transform man's natural and human environments. Important virtues are involved in this process, such as diligence, industriousness, prudence in undertaking reasonable risks, reliability and fidelity in interpersonal relationships, as well as courage in carrying out decisions which are difficult and painful but necessary, both for the overall working of a business and in meeting possible setbacks.

32.4 The modern business economy has positive aspects. Its basis is human freedom exercised in the economic field, just as it is exercised in many other fields. Economic activity is indeed but one sector in a great variety of human activities, and like every other sector, it includes the right to freedom, as well as the duty of making responsible use of freedom. But it is important to note that there are specific differences between the trends of modern society and those of the past, even the recent past. Whereas at one time the decisive factor of production was the land, and later capital – understood as a total complex of the instruments of production – today the decisive factor is increasingly man himself, that is, his knowledge, especially his scientific knowledge, his capacity for interrelated and compact organization, as well as his ability to perceive the needs of others and to satisfy them.

33.1 However, the risks and problems connected with this kind of process should be pointed out. The fact is that many people, perhaps the majority today, do not have the means which would enable them to take their place in an effective and humanly dignified way within a productive system in which work is truly central. They have no possibility of acquiring the basic knowledge which would enable them to express their creativity and develop their potential. They have no way of entering the network of knowledge and intercommunication which would enable them to see their qualities appreciated and utilized. Thus, if not actually exploited, they are to a great extent marginalized; economic development takes place over their heads, so to speak, when it does not actually reduce the already narrow scope of their old subsistence economies. They are unable to compete against the goods which are produced in ways which are new and which properly respond to needs, needs which they had previously been accustomed to meeting through traditional forms of organization. Allured by the dazzle of an opulence which is beyond their reach, and at the same time driven by necessity, these people crowd the cities of the Third World where they are often without cultural roots, and where they are exposed to situations of violent uncertainty, without the possibility of becoming integrated. Their dignity is not acknowledged in any real way, and sometimes there are even attempts to eliminate them from history through coercive forms of demographic control which are contrary to human dignity.

33.2 Many other people, while not completely marginalized, live in situations in which the struggle for a bare minimum is uppermost. These are situations in which the rules of the earliest period of capitalism still flourish in conditions of “ruthlessness” in no way inferior to the darkest moments of the first phase of industrialization. In other cases the land is still the central element in the economic process, but those who cultivate it are excluded from ownership and are reduced to a state of quasi-servitude.<sup>71</sup> In these cases, it is still possible today, as in the days of Rerum Novarum, to speak of inhuman exploitation. In spite of the great changes which have taken place in the more advanced societies, the human inadequacies of capitalism and the resulting domination of things over people are far from disappearing. In fact, for the poor, to the lack of material goods has been added a lack of knowledge and training which prevents them from escaping their state of humiliating subjection.

33.3 Unfortunately, the great majority of people in the Third World still live in such conditions. It would be a mistake, however, to understand this “world” in purely geographic terms. In some regions and in some social sectors of that world, development programs have been set up which are centered on the use not so much of the material resources available but of the “human resources.”

33.4 Even in recent years it was thought that the poorest countries would develop by isolating themselves from the world market and by depending only on their own resources. Recent experience has shown that countries which did this have suffered stagnation and recession, while the countries which experienced development were those which succeeded in taking part in the general interrelated economic activities at the international level. It seems therefore that the chief problem is that of gaining fair access to the international market, based not on the unilateral principle of the exploitation of the natural resources of these countries but on the proper use of human resources.<sup>72</sup>

33.5 However, aspects typical of the Third World also appear in developed countries, where the constant transformation of the methods of production and consumption devalues certain acquired skills and professional expertise, and thus requires a continual effort of retraining and updating. Those who fail to keep up with the times can easily be marginalized, as can the elderly, the young people who are incapable of finding their place in the life of society and, in general, those who are weakest or part of the so-called Fourth World. The situation of women too is far from easy in these conditions.

34.1 It would appear that, on the level of individual nations and of international relations, the free market is the most efficient instrument for utilizing resources and effectively responding to needs. But this is true only for those needs which are “solvent,” insofar as they are endowed with purchasing power, and for those resources which are “marketable” insofar as they are capable of obtaining a satisfactory price. But there are many human needs which find no place on the market. It is a strict duty of justice and truth not to allow fundamental human needs to remain unsatisfied, and not to allow those burdened by such needs to perish. It is also necessary to help these needy people to acquire expertise, to enter the circle of exchange, and to develop their skills in order to make the best use of their capacities and resources. Even prior to the logic of a fair exchange of goods and the forms of justice appropriate to it, there exists something which is due to man because he is man, by reason of his lofty dignity. Inseparable from that required “something” is the possibility to survive and, at the same time, to make an active contribution to the common good of humanity.

34.2 In Third World contexts, certain objectives stated by Rerum Novarum remain valid, and, in some cases, still constitute a goal yet to be reached, if a man’s work and his very being are not to be reduced to the level of a mere commodity. These objectives include a sufficient wage for the support of the family, social insurance for old age and unemployment, and adequate protection for the conditions of employment.

35.1 Here we find a wide range of opportunities for commitment and effort in the name of justice on the part of trade unions and other workers’ organizations. These defend workers’ rights and protect their interests as persons, while fulfilling a vital cultural role, so as to enable workers to participate more fully and honorably in the life of their nation and to assist them along the path of development.

35.2 In this sense, it is right to speak of a struggle against an economic system, if the latter is understood as a method of upholding the absolute predominance of capital, the possession of the means of production and of the land, in contrast to the free and personal nature of human work.<sup>73</sup> In the struggle against such a system, what is being proposed as an alternative is not the socialist system, which in fact turns out to be State capitalism, but rather a society of free work, of enterprise and of participation. Such a society is not directed against the market, but demands that the market be appropriately controlled by the forces of society and by the State, so as to guarantee that the basic needs of the whole of society are satisfied.

35.3 The Church acknowledges the legitimate role of profit as an indication that a business is functioning well. When a firm makes a profit, this means that productive factors have been properly employed and corresponding human needs have been duly satisfied. But profitability is not the only indicator of a firm's condition. It is possible for the financial accounts to be in order, and yet for the people – who make up the firm's most valuable asset – to be humiliated and their dignity offended. Besides being morally inadmissible, this will eventually have negative repercussions on the firm's economic efficiency. In fact, the purpose of a business firm is not simply to make a profit, but is to be found in its very existence as a community of persons who in various ways are endeavoring to satisfy their basic needs, and who form a particular group at the service of the whole of society. Profit is a regulator of the life of a business, but it is not the only one; other human and moral factors must also be considered which, in the long term, are at least equally important for the life of a business.

35.4 We have seen that it is unacceptable to say that the defeat of so-called “Real Socialism” leaves capitalism as the only model of economic organization. It is necessary to break down the barriers and monopolies which leave so many countries on the margins of development, and to provide all individuals and nations with the basic conditions which will enable them to share in development. This goal calls for programmed and responsible efforts on the part of the entire international community. Stronger nations must offer weaker ones opportunities for taking their place in international life, and the latter must learn how to use these opportunities by making the necessary efforts and sacrifices and by ensuring political and economic stability, the certainty of better prospects for the future, the improvement of workers' skills, and the training of competent business leaders who are conscious of their responsibilities.<sup>74</sup>

35.5 At present, the positive efforts which have been made along these lines are being affected by the still largely unsolved problem of the foreign debt of the poorer countries. The principle that debts must be paid is certainly just. However, it is not right to demand or expect payment when the effect would be the imposition of political choices leading to hunger and despair for entire peoples. It cannot be expected that the debts which have been contracted should be paid at the price of unbearable sacrifices. In such cases it is necessary to find – as in fact is partly happening – ways to lighten, defer or even cancel the debt, compatible with the fundamental right of peoples to subsistence and progress.

36.1 It would now be helpful to direct our attention to the specific problems and threats emerging within the more advanced economies and which are related to their particular characteristics. In earlier stages of development, man always lived under the weight of necessity. His needs were few and were determined, to a degree, by the objective structures of his physical make-up. Economic activity was directed toward satisfying these needs. It is clear that today the problem is not only one of supplying people with a sufficient quantity of goods, but also of responding to a demand for quality: the quality of the goods to be produced and consumed, the quality of the services to be enjoyed, the quality of the environment and of life in general.

36.2 To call for an existence which is qualitatively more satisfying is of itself legitimate, but one cannot fail to draw attention to the new responsibilities and dangers connected with this phase of history. The manner in which new needs arise and are defined is always marked by a more or less appropriate concept of man and of his true good. A given culture reveals its overall understanding of life through the choices it makes in production and consumption. It is here that the phenomenon of consumerism arises. In singling out new needs and new means to meet them, one must be guided by a comprehensive picture of man which respects all the dimensions of his being and which subordinates his material and instinctive dimensions to his interior and spiritual ones. If, on the contrary, a direct appeal is made to human instincts – while ignoring in various ways the reality of the person as intelligent and free – then consumer attitudes and lifestyles can be created which are objectively improper and often damaging to the person's physical and spiritual health. Of itself, an economic system does not possess criteria for correctly distinguishing new and higher forms of satisfying human needs from artificial new needs which hinder the formation of a mature personality. Thus a great deal of educational and cultural work is urgently needed, including the education of consumers in the responsible use of their power of choice, the formation of a strong sense of responsibility among producers and among people in the mass media in particular, as well as the necessary intervention by public authorities.

36.3 A striking example of artificial consumption contrary to the health and dignity of the human person, and certainly not easy to control, is the use of drugs. Widespread drug use is a sign of a serious malfunction in the social system; it also implies a materialistic and, in a certain sense, destructive “reading” of human needs. In this way the innovative capacity of a free economy is brought to a one-sided and inadequate conclusion. Drugs, as well as pornography and other forms of consumerism which exploit the frailty of the weak, tend to fill the resulting spiritual void.

36.4 It is not wrong to want to live better; what is wrong is a style of life which is presumed to be better when it is directed toward “having” rather than “being,” and which wants to have more, not in order to be more but in order to spend life in enjoyment as an end in itself.<sup>75</sup> It is therefore necessary to create lifestyles in which the quest for truth, beauty, goodness and communion with others for the sake of common growth are the factors which determine consumer choices, savings and investments. In this regard, it is not a matter of the duty of charity alone, that is, the duty to give from one’s “abundance,” and sometimes even out of one’s needs, in order to provide what is essential for the life of a poor person. I am referring to the fact that even the decision to invest in one place rather than another, in one productive sector rather than another, is always a moral and cultural choice. Given the utter necessity of certain economic conditions and of political stability, the decision to invest, that is, to offer people an opportunity to make good use of their own labor, is also determined by an attitude of human sympathy and trust in Providence, which reveal the human quality of the person making such decisions.

37.1 Equally worrying is the ecological question which accompanies the problem of consumerism and which is closely connected to it. In his desire to have and to enjoy rather than to be and to grow, man consumes the resources of the earth and his own life in an excessive and disordered way. At the root of the senseless destruction of the natural environment lies an anthropological error, which unfortunately is widespread in our day. Man, who discovers his capacity to transform and in a certain sense create the world through his own work, forgets that this is always based on God’s prior and original gift of the things that are. Man thinks that he can make arbitrary use of the earth, subjecting it without restraint to his will, as though the earth did not have its own requisites and a prior God-given purpose, which man can indeed develop but must not betray. Instead of carrying out his role as a cooperator with God in the work of creation, man sets himself up in place of God and thus ends up provoking a rebellion on the part of nature, which is more tyrannized than governed by him.<sup>76</sup>

37.2 In all this, one notes first the poverty or narrowness of man’s outlook, motivated as he is by a desire to possess things rather than to relate them to the truth, and lacking that disinterested, unselfish and aesthetic attitude that is born of wonder in the presence of being and of the beauty which enables one to see in visible things the message of the invisible God who created them. In this regard, humanity today must be conscious of its duties and obligations toward future generations.

38.1 In addition to the irrational destruction of the natural environment, we must also mention the more serious destruction of the human environment, something which is by no means receiving the attention it deserves. Although people are rightly worried – though much less than they should be – about preserving the natural habitats of the various animal species threatened with extinction, because they realize that each of these species makes its particular contribution to the balance of nature in general, too little effort is made to safeguard the moral conditions for an authentic “human ecology.” Not only has God given the earth to man, who must use it with respect for the original good purpose for which it was given, but man too is God’s gift to man. He must therefore respect the natural and moral structure with which he has been endowed. In this context, mention should be made of the serious problems of modern urbanization, of the need for urban planning which is concerned with how people are to live, and of the attention which should be given to a “social ecology” of work.

38.2 Man receives from God his essential dignity and with it the capacity to transcend every social order so as to move toward truth and goodness. But he is also conditioned by the social structure in which he lives, by the education he has received and by his environment. These elements can either help or hinder his living in accordance with the truth. The decisions which create a human environment can give rise to specific structures of sin which impede the full realization of those who are in any way oppressed by them. To destroy such structures and replace them with more authentic forms of living in community is a task which demands courage and patience.<sup>77</sup>

39.1 The first and fundamental structure for “human ecology” is the family, in which man receives his first formative ideas about truth and goodness, and learns what it means to love and to be loved, and thus what it actually means to be a person. Here we mean the family founded on marriage, in which the mutual gift of self by husband and wife creates an environment in which children can be born and develop their potentialities, become aware of their dignity and prepare to face their unique and individual destiny. But it often happens that people are discouraged from creating the proper conditions for human reproduction and are led to consider themselves and their lives as a series of sensations to be experienced rather than as a work to be accomplished. The result is a lack of freedom, which causes a person to reject a commitment to enter into a stable relationship with another person and to bring children into the world, or which leads people to consider children as one of the many “things” which an individual can have or not have, according to taste, and which compete with other possibilities.

39.2 It is necessary to go back to seeing the family as the sanctuary of life. The family is indeed sacred: it is the place in which life – the gift of God – can be properly welcomed and protected against the many attacks to which it is exposed, and can develop in accordance with what constitutes authentic human growth. In the face of the so-called culture of death, the family is the heart of the culture of life.

39.3 Human ingenuity seems to be directed more toward limiting, suppressing or destroying the sources of life – including recourse to abortion, which unfortunately is so widespread in the world – than toward defending and opening up the possibilities of life. The Encyclical Sollicitudo Rei Socialis denounced systematic anti-childbearing campaigns which, on the basis of a distorted view of the demographic problem and in a climate of “absolute lack of respect for the freedom of choice of the parties involved,” often subject them “to intolerable pressures . . . in order to force them to submit to this new form of oppression.”<sup>78</sup> These policies are extending their field of action by the use of new techniques, to the point of poisoning the lives of millions of defenseless human beings, as if in a form of “chemical warfare.”

39.4 These criticisms are directed not so much against an economic system as against an ethical and cultural system. The economy in fact is only one aspect and one dimension of the whole of human activity. If economic life is absolutized, if the production and consumption of goods become the center of social life and society’s only value, not subject to any other value, the reason is to be found not so much in the economic system itself as in the fact that the entire sociocultural system, by ignoring the ethical and religious dimension, has been weakened, and ends by limiting itself to the production of goods and services alone.<sup>79</sup>

39.5 All of this can be summed up by repeating once more that economic freedom is only one element of human freedom. When it becomes autonomous, when man is seen more as a producer or consumer of goods than as a subject who produces and consumes in order to live, then economic freedom loses its necessary relationship to the human person and ends up by alienating and oppressing him.<sup>80</sup>

40.1 It is the task of the State to provide for the defense and preservation of common goods such as the natural and human environments, which cannot be safeguarded simply by market forces. Just as in the time of primitive capitalism the State had the duty of defending the basic rights of workers, so now, with the new capitalism, the State and all of society have the duty of defending those collective goods which, among others, constitute the essential framework for the legitimate pursuit of personal goals on the part of each individual.

40.2 Here we find a new limit on the market: there are collective and qualitative needs which cannot be satisfied by market mechanisms. There are important human needs which escape its logic. There are goods which by their very nature cannot and must not be bought or sold. Certainly the mechanisms of the market offer secure advantages: they help to utilize resources better; they promote the exchange of products; above all they give central place to the person's desires and preferences, which, in a contract, meet the desires and preferences of another person. Nevertheless, these mechanisms carry the risk of an "idolatry" of the market, an idolatry which ignores the existence of goods which by their nature are not and cannot be mere commodities.

41.1 Marxism criticized capitalist bourgeois societies, blaming them for the commercialization and alienation of human existence. This rebuke is of course based on a mistaken and inadequate idea of alienation, derived solely from the sphere of relationships of production and ownership, that is, giving them a materialistic foundation and moreover denying the legitimacy and positive value of market relationships even in their own sphere. Marxism thus ends up by affirming that only in a collective society can alienation be eliminated. However, the historical experience of socialist countries has sadly demonstrated that collectivism does not do away with alienation but rather increases it, adding to it a lack of basic necessities and economic inefficiency.

41.2 The historical experience of the West, for its part, shows that even if the Marxist analysis and its foundation of alienation are false, nevertheless alienation – and the loss of the authentic meaning of life – is a reality in Western societies too. This happens in consumerism, when people are ensnared in a web of false and superficial gratifications rather than being helped to experience their personhood in an authentic and concrete way. Alienation is found also in work, when it is organized so as to ensure maximum returns and profits with no concern whether the worker, through his own labor, grows or diminishes as a person, either through increased sharing in a genuinely supportive community or through increased isolation in a maze of relationships marked by destructive competitiveness and estrangement, in which he is considered only a means and not an end.

41.3 The concept of alienation needs to be led back to the Christian vision of reality, by recognizing in alienation a reversal of means and ends. When man does not recognize in himself and in others the value and grandeur of the human person, he effectively deprives himself of the possibility of benefitting from his humanity and of entering into that relationship of solidarity and communion with others for which God created him. Indeed, it is through the free gift of self that one truly finds oneself.<sup>81</sup> This gift is made possible by the human person's essential "capacity for transcendence." Man cannot give himself to a purely human plan for reality, to an abstract ideal or to a false utopia. As a person, he can give himself to another person or to other persons, and ultimately to God, who is the author of our being and who alone can fully accept our gift.<sup>82</sup> Man is alienated if he refuses to transcend himself and to live the experience of self-giving and of the formation of an authentic human community oriented toward his final destiny, which is God. A society is alienated if its forms of social organization, production and consumption make it more difficult to offer this gift of self and to establish this solidarity between people.

41.4 Exploitation, at least in the forms analyzed and described by Karl Marx, has been overcome in Western society. Alienation, however, has not been overcome as it exists in various forms of exploitation, when people use one another, and when they seek an ever more refined satisfaction of their individual and secondary needs, while ignoring the principal and authentic needs which ought to regulate the manner of satisfying the other ones too.<sup>83</sup> A person who is concerned solely or primarily with possessing and enjoying, who is no longer able to control his instincts and passions, or to subordinate them by obedience to the truth, cannot be free: obedience to the truth about God and man is the first condition of freedom, making it possible for a person to order his needs and desires and to choose the means of satisfying them according to a correct scale of values, so that the ownership of things may become an occasion of personal growth. This growth can be hindered as a result of manipulation by the means of mass communication, which impose fashions and trends of opinion through carefully orchestrated repetition, without its being possible to subject to critical scrutiny the premises on which these fashions and trends are based.

42.1 Returning now to the initial question: can it perhaps be said that, after the failure of Communism, capitalism is the victorious social system, and that capitalism should be the goal of the countries now making efforts to rebuild their economy and society? Is this the model which ought to be proposed to the countries of the Third World which are searching for the path to true economic and civil progress?

42.2 The answer is obviously complex. If by "capitalism" is meant an economic system which recognizes the fundamental and positive role of business, the market, private property and the resulting responsibility for the means of production, as well as free human creativity in the economic sector, then the answer is certainly in the affirmative, even though it would perhaps be more appropriate to speak of a "business economy," "market economy" or simply "free economy." But if by "capitalism" is meant a system in which freedom in the economic sector is not circumscribed within a strong juridical framework which places it at the service of human freedom in its totality and sees it as a particular aspect of that freedom, the core of which is ethical and religious, then the reply is certainly negative.

42.3 The Marxist solution has failed, but the realities of marginalization and exploitation remain in the world, especially the Third World, as does the reality of human alienation, especially in the more advanced countries. Against these phenomena the Church strongly raises her voice. Vast multitudes are still living in conditions of great material and moral poverty. The collapse of the Communist system in so many countries certainly removes an obstacle to facing these problems in an appropriate and realistic way, but it is not enough to bring about their solution. Indeed, there is a risk that a radical capitalistic ideology could spread which refuses even to consider these problems, in the a priori belief that any attempt to solve them is doomed to failure, and which blindly entrusts their solution to the free development of market forces.

43.1 The Church has no models to present; models that are real and truly effective can only arise within the framework of different historical situations, through the efforts of all those who responsibly confront concrete problems in all their social, economic, political and cultural aspects, as these interact with one another.<sup>84</sup> For such a task the Church offers her social teaching as an indispensable and ideal orientation, a teaching which, as already mentioned, recognizes the positive value of the market and of enterprise, but which at the same time points out that these need to be oriented toward the common good. This teaching also recognizes the legitimacy of workers' efforts to obtain full respect for their dignity and to gain broader areas of participation in the life of industrial enterprises so that, while cooperating with others and under the direction of others, they can in a certain sense "work for themselves"<sup>85</sup> through the exercise of their intelligence and freedom.

43.2 The integral development of the human person through work does not impede but rather promotes the greater productivity and efficiency of work itself, even though it may weaken consolidated power structures. A business cannot be considered only as a "society of capital goods"; it is also a "society of persons" in which people participate in different ways and with specific responsibilities, whether they supply the necessary capital for the company's activities or take part in such activities through their labor. To achieve these goals there is still need for a broad associated workers' movement, directed toward the liberation and promotion of the whole person.

43.3 In the light of today's "new things," we have reread the relationship between individual or private property and the universal destination of material wealth. Man fulfills himself by using his intelligence and freedom. In so doing he utilizes the things of this world as objects and instruments and makes them his own. The foundation of the right to private initiative and ownership is to be found in this activity. By means of his work man commits himself, not only for his own sake but also for others and with others. Each person collaborates in the work of others and for their good. Man works in order to provide for the needs of his family, his community, his nation, and ultimately all humanity.<sup>86</sup> Moreover, a person collaborates in the work of his fellow employees, as well as in the work of suppliers and in the customers' use of goods, in a progressively expanding chain of solidarity. Ownership of the means of production, whether in industry or agriculture, is just and legitimate if it serves useful work. It becomes illegitimate, however, when it is not utilized or when it serves to impede the work of others, in an effort to gain a profit which is not the result of the overall expansion of work and the wealth of society, but rather is the result of curbing them or of illicit exploitation, speculation or the breaking of solidarity among working people.<sup>87</sup> Ownership of this kind has no justification, and represents an abuse in the sight of God and man.

43.4 The obligation to earn one's bread by the sweat of one's brow also presumes the right to do so. A society in which this right is systematically denied, in which economic policies do not allow workers to reach satisfactory levels of employment, cannot be justified from an ethical point of view, nor can that society attain social peace.<sup>88</sup> Just as the person fully realizes himself in the free gift of self, so too ownership morally justifies itself in the creation, at the proper time and in the proper way, of opportunities for work and human growth for all.

State and Culture

44.1 Pope Leo XIII was aware of the need for a sound theory of the State in order to ensure the normal development of man's spiritual and temporal activities, both of which are indispensable.<sup>89</sup> For this reason, in one passage of Rerum Novarum he presents the organization of society according to the three powers – legislative, executive and judicial – something which at the time represented a novelty in Church teaching.<sup>90</sup> Such an ordering reflects a realistic vision of man's social nature, which calls for legislation capable of protecting the freedom of all. To that end, it is preferable that each power be balanced by other powers and by other spheres of responsibility which keep it within proper bounds. This is the principle of the “rule of law,” in which the law is sovereign, and not the arbitrary will of individuals.

44.2 In modern times, this concept has been opposed by totalitarianism, which, in its Marxist-Leninist form, maintains that some people, by virtue of a deeper knowledge of the laws of the development of society, or through membership of a particular class or through contact with the deeper sources of the collective consciousness, are exempt from error and can therefore arrogate to themselves the exercise of absolute power. It must be added that totalitarianism arises out of a denial of truth in the objective sense. If there is no transcendent truth, in obedience to which man achieves his full identity, then there is no sure principle for guaranteeing just relations between people. Their self-interest as a class, group or nation would inevitably set them in opposition to one another. If one does not acknowledge transcendent truth, then the force of power takes over, and each person tends to make full use of the means at his disposal in order to impose his own interests or his own opinion, with no regard for the rights of others. People are then respected only to the extent that they can be exploited for selfish ends. Thus, the root of modern totalitarianism is to be found in the denial of the transcendent dignity of the human person who, as the visible image of the invisible God, is therefore by his very nature the subject of rights which no one may violate – no individual, group, class, nation or State. Not even the majority of a social body may violate these rights, by going against the minority, by isolating, oppressing, or exploiting it, or by attempting to annihilate it.<sup>91</sup>

45.1 The culture and praxis of totalitarianism also involve a rejection of the Church. The State or the party which claims to be able to lead history toward perfect goodness, and which sets itself above all values, cannot tolerate the affirmation of an objective criterion of good and evil beyond the will of those in power, since such a criterion, in given circumstances, could be used to judge their actions. This explains why totalitarianism attempts to destroy the Church, or at least to reduce her to submission, making her an instrument of its own ideological apparatus.<sup>92</sup>

45.2 Furthermore, the totalitarian State tends to absorb within itself the nation, society, the family, religious groups and individuals themselves. In defending her own freedom, the Church is also defending the human person, who must obey God rather than men (cf. Acts 5:29), as well as defending the family, the various social organizations and nations – all of which enjoy their own spheres of autonomy and sovereignty.

46.1 The Church values the democratic system inasmuch as it ensures the participation of citizens in making political choices, guarantees to the governed the possibility both of electing and holding accountable those who govern them, and of replacing them through peaceful means when appropriate.<sup>93</sup> Thus she cannot encourage the formation of narrow ruling groups which usurp the power of the State for individual interests or for ideological ends.

46.2 Authentic democracy is possible only in a State ruled by law, and on the basis of a correct conception of the human person. It requires that the necessary conditions be present for the advancement both of the individual through education and formation in true ideals, and of the “subjectivity” of society through the creation of structures of participation and shared responsibility. Nowadays there is a tendency to claim that agnosticism and skeptical relativism are the philosophy and the basic attitude which correspond to democratic forms of political life. Those who are convinced that they know the truth and firmly adhere to it are considered unreliable from a democratic point of view, since they do not accept that truth is determined by the majority, or that it is subject to variation according to different political trends. It must be observed in this regard that if there is no ultimate truth to guide and direct political activity, then ideas and convictions can easily be manipulated for reasons of power. As history demonstrates, a democracy without values easily turns into open or thinly disguised totalitarianism.

46.3 Nor does the Church close her eyes to the danger of fanaticism or fundamentalism among those who, in the name of an ideology which purports to be scientific or religious, claim the right to impose on others their own concept of what is true and good. Christian truth is not of this kind. Since it is not an ideology, the Christian faith does not presume to imprison changing sociopolitical realities in a rigid schema, and it recognizes that human life is realized in history in conditions that are diverse and imperfect. Furthermore, in constantly reaffirming the transcendent dignity of the person, the Church's method is always that of respect for freedom.<sup>94</sup>

46.4 But freedom attains its full development only by accepting the truth. In a world without truth, freedom loses its foundation and man is exposed to the violence of passion and to manipulation, both open and hidden. The Christian upholds freedom and serves it, constantly offering to others the truth which he has known (cf. Jn 8:31-32), in accordance with the missionary nature of his vocation. While paying heed to every fragment of truth which he encounters in the life experience and in the culture of individuals and of nations, he will not fail to affirm in dialogue with others all that his faith and the correct use of reason have enabled him to understand.<sup>95</sup>

47.1 Following the collapse of Communist totalitarianism and of many other totalitarian and "national security" regimes, today we are witnessing a predominance, not without signs of opposition, of the democratic ideal, together with lively attention to and concern for human rights. But for this very reason it is necessary for peoples in the process of reforming their systems to give democracy an authentic and solid foundation through the explicit recognition of those rights.<sup>96</sup> Among the most important of these rights, mention must be made of the right to life, an integral part of which is the right of the child to develop in the mother's womb from the moment of conception; the right to live in a united family and in a moral environment conducive to the growth of the child's personality; the right to develop one's intelligence and freedom in seeking and knowing the truth; the right to share in the work which makes wise use of the earth's material resources, and to derive from that work the means to support oneself and one's dependents; and the right freely to establish a family, to have and to rear children through the responsible exercise of one's sexuality. In a certain sense, the source and synthesis of these rights is religious freedom, understood as the right to live in the truth of one's faith and in conformity with one's transcendent dignity as a person.<sup>97</sup>

47.2 Even in countries with democratic forms of government, these rights are not always fully respected. Here we are referring not only to the scandal of abortion, but also to different aspects of a crisis within democracies themselves, which seem at times to have lost the ability to make decisions aimed at the common good. Certain demands which arise within society are sometimes not examined in accordance with criteria of justice and morality, but rather on the basis of the electoral or financial power of the groups promoting them. With time, such distortions of political conduct create distrust and apathy, with a subsequent decline in the political participation and civic spirit of the general population, which feels abused and disillusioned. As a result, there is a growing inability to situate particular interests within the framework of a coherent vision of the common good. The latter is not simply the sum total of particular interests; rather it involves an assessment and integration of those interests on the basis of a balanced hierarchy of values; ultimately, it demands a correct understanding of the dignity and the rights of the person.<sup>98</sup>

47.3 The Church respects the legitimate autonomy of the democratic order and is not entitled to express preferences for this or that institutional or constitutional solution. Her contribution to the political order is precisely her vision of the dignity of the person revealed in all its fullness in the mystery of the Incarnate Word.<sup>99</sup>

48.1 These general observations also apply to the role of the State in the economic sector. Economic activity, especially the activity of a market economy, cannot be conducted in an institutional, juridical or political vacuum. On the contrary, it presupposes sure guarantees of individual freedom and private property, as well as a stable currency and efficient public services. Hence the principal task of the State is to guarantee this security, so that those who work and produce can enjoy the fruits of their labors and thus feel encouraged to work efficiently and honestly. The absence of stability, together with the corruption of public officials and the spread of improper sources of growing rich and of easy profits deriving from illegal or purely speculative activities, constitutes one of the chief obstacles to development and to the economic order.

48.2 Another task of the State is that of overseeing and directing the exercise of human rights in the economic sector. However, primary responsibility in this area belongs not to the State but to individuals and to the various groups and associations which make up society. The State could not directly ensure the right to work for all its citizens unless it controlled every aspect of economic life and restricted the free initiative of individuals. This does not mean, however, that the State has no competence in this domain, as was claimed by those who argued against any rules in the economic sphere. Rather, the State has a duty to sustain business activities by creating conditions which will ensure job opportunities, by stimulating those activities where they are lacking or by supporting them in moments of crisis.

48.3 The State has the further right to intervene when particular monopolies create delays or obstacles to development. In addition to the tasks of harmonizing and guiding development, in exceptional circumstances the State can also exercise a substitute function, when social sectors or business systems are too weak or are just getting under way, and are not equal to the task at hand. Such supplementary interventions, which are justified by urgent reasons touching the common good, must be as brief as possible, so as to avoid removing permanently from society and business systems the functions which are properly theirs, and so as to avoid enlarging excessively the sphere of State intervention to the detriment of both economic and civil freedom.

48.4 In recent years the range of such intervention has vastly expanded, to the point of creating a new type of State, the so-called “Welfare State.” This has happened in some countries in order to respond better to many needs and demands, by remedying forms of poverty and deprivation unworthy of the human person. However, excesses and abuses, especially in recent years, have provoked very harsh criticisms of the Welfare State, dubbed the “Social Assistance State.” Malfunctions and defects in the Social Assistance State are the result of an inadequate understanding of the tasks proper to the State. Here again the principle of subsidiarity must be respected: a community of a higher order should not interfere in the internal life of a community of a lower order, depriving the latter of its functions, but rather should support it in case of need and help to coordinate its activity with the activities of the rest of society, always with a view to the common good.<sup>100</sup>

48.5 By intervening directly and depriving society of its responsibility, the Social Assistance State leads to a loss of human energies and an inordinate increase of public agencies, which are dominated more by bureaucratic ways of thinking than by concern for serving their clients, and which are accompanied by an enormous increase in spending. In fact, it would appear that needs are best understood and satisfied by people who are closest to them and who act as neighbors to those in need. It should be added that certain kinds of demands often call for a response which is not simply material but which is capable of perceiving the deeper human need. One thinks of the condition of refugees, immigrants, the elderly, the sick, and all those in circumstances which call for assistance, such as drug abusers: all these people can be helped effectively only by those who offer them genuine fraternal support, in addition to the necessary care.

49.1 Faithful to the mission received from Christ her Founder, the Church has always been present and active among the needy, offering them material assistance in ways that neither humiliate nor reduce them to mere objects of assistance, but which help them to escape their precarious situation by promoting their dignity as persons. With heartfelt gratitude to God it must be pointed out that active charity has never ceased to be practiced in the Church; indeed, today it is showing a manifold and gratifying increase. In this regard, special mention must be made of volunteer work, which the Church favors and promotes by urging everyone to cooperate in supporting and encouraging its undertakings.

49.2 In order to overcome today’s widespread individualistic mentality, what is required is a concrete commitment to solidarity and charity, beginning in the family with the mutual support of husband and wife and the care which the different generations give to one another. In this sense the family too can be called a community of work and solidarity. It can happen, however, that when a family does decide to live up fully to its vocation, it finds itself without the necessary support from the State and without sufficient resources. It is urgent therefore to promote not only family policies, but also those social policies which have the family as their principal object, policies which assist the family by providing adequate resources and efficient means of support, both for bringing up children and for looking after the elderly, so as to avoid distancing the latter from the family unit and in order to strengthen relations between generations.<sup>101</sup>

49.3 Apart from the family, other intermediate communities exercise primary functions and give life to specific networks of solidarity. These develop as real communities of persons and strengthen the social fabric, preventing society from becoming an anonymous and impersonal mass, as unfortunately often happens today. It is in interrelationships on many levels that a person lives, and that society becomes more “personalized.” The individual today is often suffocated between two poles represented by the State and the marketplace. At times it seems as though he exists only as a producer and consumer of goods, or as an object of State administration. People lose sight of the fact that life in society has neither the market nor the State as its final purpose, since life itself has a unique value which the State and the market must serve. Man remains above all a being who seeks the truth and strives to live in that truth, deepening his understanding of it through a dialogue which involves past and future generations.<sup>102</sup>

50.1 From this open search for truth, which is renewed in every generation, the culture of a nation derives its character. Indeed, the heritage of values which has been received and handed down is always challenged by the young. To challenge does not necessarily mean to destroy or reject a priori, but above all to put these values to test in one’s own life, and through this existential verification to make them more real, relevant and personal, distinguishing the valid elements in the tradition from false and erroneous ones, or from obsolete forms which can be usefully replaced by others more suited to the times.

50.2 In this context, it is appropriate to recall that evangelization too plays a role in the culture of the various nations, sustaining culture in its progress toward the truth, and assisting in the work of its purification and enrichment.<sup>103</sup> However, when a culture becomes inward-looking, and tries to perpetuate obsolete ways of living by rejecting any exchange or debate with regard to the truth about man, then it becomes sterile and is heading for decadence.

51.1 All human activity takes place within a culture and interacts with culture. For an adequate formation of a culture, the involvement of the whole man is required, whereby he exercises his creativity, intelligence, and knowledge of the world and of people. Furthermore, he displays his capacity for self-control, personal sacrifice, solidarity and readiness to promote the common good. Thus the first and most important task is accomplished within man's heart. The way in which he is involved in building his own future depends on the understanding he has of himself and of his own destiny. It is on this level that the Church's specific and decisive contribution to true culture is to be found. The Church promotes those aspects of human behavior which favor a true culture of peace, as opposed to models in which the individual is lost in the crowd, in which the role of his initiative and freedom is neglected, and in which his greatness is posited in the arts of conflict and war. The Church renders this service to human society by preaching the truth about the creation of the world, which God has placed in human hands so that people may make it fruitful and more perfect through their work; and by preaching the truth about the Redemption, whereby the Son of God has saved mankind and at the same time has united all people, making them responsible for one another. Sacred Scripture continually speaks to us of an active commitment to our neighbor and demands of us a shared responsibility for all of humanity.

51.2 This duty is not limited to one's own family, nation or State, but extends progressively to all mankind, since no one can consider himself extraneous or indifferent to the lot of another member of the human family. No one can say that he is not responsible for the well-being of his brother or sister (cf. Gen 4:9; Lk 10:29-37; Mt 25:31-46). Attentive and pressing concern for one's neighbor in a moment of need – made easier today because of the new means of communication which have brought people closer together – is especially important with regard to the search for ways of resolving international conflicts other than by war. It is not hard to see that the terrifying power of the means of destruction – to which even medium and small-sized countries have access – and the ever closer links between the peoples of the whole world make it very difficult or practically impossible to limit the consequences of a conflict.

52.1 Pope Benedict XV and his successors clearly understood this danger. 104 I myself, on the occasion of the recent tragic war in the Persian Gulf, repeated the cry: "War – never again!" No, never again war, which destroys the lives of innocent people, teaches how to kill, throws into upheaval even the lives of those who do the killing and leaves behind a trail of resentment and hatred, thus making it all the more difficult to find a just solution of the very problems which provoked the war. Just as the time has finally come when in individual States a system of private vendetta and reprisal has given way to the rule of law, so too a similar step forward is now urgently needed in the international community. Furthermore, it must not be forgotten that at the root of war there are usually real and serious grievances: injustices suffered, legitimate aspirations frustrated, poverty, and the exploitation of multitudes of desperate people who see no real possibility of improving their lot by peaceful means.

52.2 For this reason, another name for peace is development.<sup>105</sup> Just as there is a collective responsibility for avoiding war, so too there is a collective responsibility for promoting development. Just as within individual societies it is possible and right to organize a solid economy which will direct the functioning of the market to the common good, so too there is a similar need for adequate interventions on the international level. For this to happen, a great effort must be made to enhance mutual understanding and knowledge, and to increase the sensitivity of consciences. This is the culture which is hoped for, one which fosters trust in the human potential of the poor, and consequently in their ability to improve their condition through work or to make a positive contribution to economic prosperity. But to accomplish this, the poor – be they individuals or nations – need to be provided with realistic opportunities. Creating such conditions calls for a concerted worldwide effort to promote development, an effort which also involves sacrificing the positions of income and of power enjoyed by the more developed economies.<sup>106</sup>

52.3 This may mean making important changes in established lifestyles, in order to limit the waste of environmental and human resources, thus enabling every individual and all the peoples of the earth to have a sufficient share of those resources. In addition, the new material and spiritual resources must be utilized which are the result of the work and culture of peoples who today are on the margins of the international community, so as to obtain an overall human enrichment of the family of nations.

Man Is the Way of the Church

53.1 Faced with the poverty of the working class, Pope Leo XIII wrote: “We approach this subject with confidence, and in the exercise of the rights which manifestly pertain to us. . . . By keeping silence we would seem to neglect the duty incumbent on us.”<sup>107</sup> During the last hundred years the Church has repeatedly expressed her thinking, while closely following the continuing development of the social question. She has certainly not done this in order to recover former privileges or to impose her own vision. Her sole purpose has been care and responsibility for man, who has been entrusted to her by Christ himself: for this man, whom, as the Second Vatican Council recalls, is the only creature on earth which God willed for its own sake, and for which God has his plan, that is, a share in eternal salvation. We are not dealing here with man in the “abstract,” but with the real, “concrete,” “historical” man. We are dealing with each individual, since each one is included in the mystery of Redemption, and through this mystery Christ has united himself with each one forever.<sup>108</sup> It follows that the Church cannot abandon man, and that “this man is the primary route that the Church must travel in fulfilling her mission . . . the way traced out by Christ himself, the way that leads invariably through the mystery of the Incarnation and the Redemption.”<sup>109</sup>

53.2 This, and this alone, is the principle which inspires the Church’s social doctrine. The Church has gradually developed that doctrine in a systematic way, above all in the century that has followed the date we are commemorating, precisely because the horizon of the Church’s whole wealth of doctrine is man in his concrete reality as sinful and righteous.

54.1 Today, the Church’s social doctrine focuses especially on man as he is involved in a complex network of relationships within modern societies. The human sciences and philosophy are helpful for interpreting man’s central place within society and for enabling him to understand himself better as a “social being.” However, a man’s true identity is only fully revealed to him through faith, and it is precisely from faith that the Church’s social teaching begins. While drawing upon all the contributions made by the sciences and philosophy, her social teaching is aimed at helping everyone on the path of salvation.

54.2 The Encyclical Rerum Novarum can be read as a valid contribution to socioeconomic analysis at the end of the nineteenth century, but its specific value derives from the fact that it is a document of the Magisterium and is fully a part of the Church's evangelizing mission, together with many other documents of this nature. Thus the Church's social teaching is itself a valid instrument of evangelization. As such, it proclaims God and his mystery of salvation in Christ to every human being, and for that very reason reveals man to himself. In this light, and only in this light, does it concern itself with everything else: the human rights of the individual, and in particular of the "working class," the family and education, the duties of the State, the ordering of national and international society, economic life, culture, war and peace, and respect for life from the moment of conception until death.

55.1 The Church receives "the meaning of man" from divine revelation. "In order to know man, authentic man, man in his fullness, one must know God," said Pope Paul VI, and he went on to quote Saint Catherine of Siena, who, in prayer, expressed the same idea: "In your nature, O eternal Godhead, I shall know my own nature."<sup>110</sup>

55.2 Christian anthropology therefore is really a chapter of theology, and for this reason, the Church's social doctrine, by its concern for man and by its interest in him and in the way he conducts himself in the world, "belongs to the field . . . of theology and particularly of moral theology."<sup>111</sup> The theological dimension is needed both for interpreting and solving present-day problems in human society. It is worth noting that this is true in contrast both to the "atheistic" solution, which deprives man of one of his basic dimensions, namely the spiritual one, and to permissive and consumerist solutions, which under various pretexts seek to convince man that he is free from every law and from God himself, thus imprisoning him within a selfishness which ultimately harms both him and others.

55.3 When the Church proclaims God's salvation to man, when she offers and communicates the life of God through the sacraments, when she gives direction to human life through the commandments of love of God and neighbor, she contributes to the enrichment of human dignity. But just as the Church can never abandon her religious and transcendent mission on behalf of man, so too she is aware that today her activity meets with particular difficulties and obstacles. That is why she devotes herself with ever new energies and methods to an evangelization which promotes the whole human being. Even on the eve of the third millennium she continues to be "a sign and safeguard of the transcendence of the human person,"<sup>112</sup> as indeed she has always sought to be from the beginning of her existence, walking together with man through history. The Encyclical Rerum Novarum itself is a significant sign of this.

56.1 On the hundredth anniversary of that Encyclical I wish to thank all those who have devoted themselves to studying, expounding and making better known

Christian social teaching. To this end, the cooperation of the local Churches is indispensable, and I would hope that the present anniversary will be a source of fresh enthusiasm for studying, spreading and applying that teaching in various contexts.

56.2 In particular, I wish this teaching to be made known and applied in the countries which, following the collapse of “Real Socialism,” are experiencing a serious lack of direction in the work of rebuilding. The Western countries, in turn, run the risk of seeing this collapse as a one-sided victory of their own economic system, and thereby failing to make necessary corrections in that system. Meanwhile, the countries of the Third World are experiencing more than ever the tragedy of underdevelopment, which is becoming more serious with each passing day.

56.3 After formulating principles and guidelines for the solution of the worker question, Pope Leo XIII made this incisive statement: “Everyone should put his hand to the work which falls to his share, and that at once and straightway, lest the evil which is already so great become through delay absolutely beyond remedy,” and he added, “in regard to the Church, her cooperation will never be found lacking.”113

57.1 As far as the Church is concerned, the social message of the Gospel must not be considered a theory, but above all else a basis and a motivation for action. Inspired by this message, some of the first Christians distributed their goods to the poor, bearing witness to the fact that, despite different social origins, it was possible for people to live together in peace and harmony. Through the power of the Gospel, down the centuries monks tilled the land, men and women Religious founded hospitals and shelters for the poor, Confraternities as well as individual men and women of all states of life devoted themselves to the needy and to those on the margins of society, convinced as they were that Christ’s words “as you did it to one of the least of these my brethren, you did it to me” (Mt 25:40) were not intended to remain a pious wish, but were meant to become a concrete life commitment.

57.2 Today more than ever, the Church is aware that her social message will gain credibility more immediately from the witness of actions than as a result of its internal logic and consistency. This awareness is also a source of her preferential option for the poor, which is never exclusive or discriminatory toward other groups. This option is not limited to material poverty, since it is well known that there are many other forms of poverty, especially in modern society – not only economic but cultural and spiritual poverty as well. The Church’s love for the poor, which is essential for her and a part of her constant tradition, impels her to give attention to a world in which poverty is threatening to assume massive proportions in spite of technological and economic progress. In the countries of the West, different forms of poverty are being experienced by groups which live on the margins of society, by the elderly and the sick, by the victims of consumerism, and even more immediately by so many refugees and migrants. In the developing countries, tragic crises loom on the horizon unless internationally coordinated measures are taken before it is too late.

58 Love for others, and in the first place love for the poor, in whom the Church sees Christ himself, is made concrete in the promotion of justice. Justice will never be fully attained unless people see in the poor person, who is asking for help in order to survive, not an annoyance or a burden, but an opportunity for showing kindness and a chance for greater enrichment. Only such an awareness can give the courage needed to face the risk and the change involved in every authentic attempt to come to the aid of another. It is not merely a matter of “giving from one’s surplus,” but of helping entire peoples which are presently excluded or marginalized to enter into the sphere of economic and human development. For this to happen, it is not enough to draw on the surplus goods which in fact our world abundantly produces; it requires above all a change of lifestyles, of models of production and consumption, and of the established structures of power which today govern societies. Nor is it a matter of eliminating instruments of social organization which have proved useful, but rather of orienting them according to an adequate notion of the common good in relation to the whole human family. Today we are facing the so-called “globalization” of the economy, a phenomenon which is not to be dismissed, since it can create unusual opportunities for greater prosperity. There is a growing feeling, however, that this increasing internationalization of the economy ought to be accompanied by effective international agencies which will oversee and direct the economy to the common good, something that an individual State, even if it were the most powerful on earth, would not be in a position to do. In order to achieve this result, it is necessary that there be increased coordination among the more powerful countries, and that in international agencies the interests of the whole human family be equally represented. It is also necessary that in evaluating the consequences of their decisions, these agencies always give sufficient consideration to peoples and countries which have little weight in the international market, but which are burdened by the most acute and desperate needs, and are thus more dependent on support for their development. Much remains to be done in this area.

59.1 Therefore, in order that the demands of justice may be met, and attempts to achieve this goal may succeed, what is needed is the gift of grace, a gift which comes from God. Grace, in cooperation with human freedom, constitutes that mysterious presence of God in history which is Providence.

59.2 The newness which is experienced in following Christ demands to be communicated to other people in their concrete difficulties, struggles, problems and challenges, so that these can then be illuminated and made more human in the light of faith. Faith not only helps people to find solutions; it makes even situations of suffering humanly bearable, so that in these situations people will not become lost or forget their dignity and vocation.

59.3 In addition, the Church's social teaching has an important interdisciplinary dimension. In order better to incarnate the one truth about man in different and constantly changing social, economic and political contexts, this teaching enters into dialogue with the various disciplines concerned with man. It assimilates what these disciplines have to contribute, and helps them to open themselves to a broader horizon, aimed at serving the individual person who is acknowledged and loved in the fullness of his or her vocation.

59.4 Parallel with the interdisciplinary aspect, mention should also be made of the practical and as it were experiential dimension of this teaching, which is to be found at the crossroads where Christian life and conscience come into contact with the real world. This teaching is seen in the efforts of individuals, families, people involved in cultural and social life, as well as politicians and statesmen, to give it a concrete form and application in history.

60.1 In proclaiming the principles for a solution of the worker question, Pope Leo XIII wrote: "This most serious question demands the attention and the efforts of others."<sup>114</sup> He was convinced that the grave problems caused by industrial society could be solved only by cooperation between all forces. This affirmation has become a permanent element of the Church's social teaching, and also explains why Pope John XXIII addressed his Encyclical on peace to "all people of good will."

60.2 Pope Leo, however, acknowledged with sorrow that the ideologies of his time, especially Liberalism and Marxism, rejected such cooperation. Since then, many things have changed, especially in recent years. The world today is ever more aware that solving serious national and international problems is not just a matter of economic production or of juridical or social organization, but also calls for specific ethical and religious values, as well as changes of mentality, behavior and structures. The Church feels a particular responsibility to offer this contribution and, as I have written in the Encyclical Sollicitudo Rei Socialis, there is a reasonable hope that the many people who profess no religion will also contribute to providing the social question with the necessary ethical foundation.<sup>115</sup>

60.3 In that same Encyclical I also addressed an appeal to the Christian Churches and to all the great world religions, inviting them to offer the unanimous witness of our common convictions regarding the dignity of man, created by God.<sup>116</sup> In fact I am convinced that the various religions, now and in the future, will have a preeminent role in preserving peace and in building a society worthy of man.

60.4 Indeed, openness to dialogue and to cooperation is required of all people of good will, and in particular of individuals and groups with specific responsibilities in the areas of politics, economics and social life, at both the national and international levels.

61.1 At the beginning of industrialized society, it was “a yoke little better than that of slavery itself” which led my Predecessor to speak out in defense of man. Over the past hundred years the Church has remained faithful to this duty. Indeed, she intervened in the turbulent period of class struggle after the First World War in order to defend people from economic exploitation and from the tyranny of the totalitarian systems. After the Second World War, she put the dignity of the person at the center of her social messages, insisting that material goods were meant for all, and that the social order ought to be free of oppression and based on a spirit of cooperation and solidarity. The Church has constantly repeated that the person and society need not only material goods but spiritual and religious values as well. Furthermore, as she has become more aware of the fact that too many people live, not in the prosperity of the Western world, but in the poverty of the developing countries amid conditions which are still “a yoke little better than that of slavery itself,” she has felt and continues to feel obliged to denounce this fact with absolute clarity and frankness, although she knows that her call will not always win favor with everyone.

61.2 One hundred years after the publication of Rerum Novarum, the Church finds herself still facing “new things” and new challenges. The centenary celebration should therefore confirm the commitment of all people of good will and of believers in particular.

62.1 The present Encyclical has looked at the past, but above all it is directed to the future. Like Rerum Novarum, it comes almost at the threshold of a new century, and its intention, with God’s help, is to prepare for that moment.

62.2 In every age the true and perennial “newness of things” comes from the infinite power of God, who says: “Behold, I make all things new” (Rev 21:5). These words refer to the fulfillment of history, when Christ “delivers the Kingdom to God the Father . . . that God may be everything to everyone” (1 Cor 15:24, 28). But the Christian well knows that the newness which we await in its fullness at the Lord's second coming has been present since the creation of the world, and in a special way since the time when God became man in Jesus Christ and brought about a "new creation" with him and through him (2 Cor 5:17; Gal 6:15).

62.3 In concluding this Encyclical I again give thanks to Almighty God, who has granted his Church the light and strength to accompany humanity on its earthly journey toward its eternal destiny. In the third millennium too, the Church will be faithful in making man's way her own, knowing that she does not walk alone, but with Christ her Lord. It is Christ who made man's way his own, and who guides him, even when he is unaware of it.

62.4 Mary, the Mother of the Redeemer, constantly remained beside Christ in his journey toward the human family and in its midst, and she goes before the Church on the pilgrimage of faith. May her maternal intercession accompany humanity toward the next millennium, in fidelity to him who "is the same yesterday and today and for ever" (cf. Heb 13:8), Jesus Christ our Lord, in whose name I cordially impart my blessing to all.

Given in Rome, at Saint Peter's, on May 1, the Memorial of Saint Joseph the Worker, in the year 1991, the thirteenth of my Pontificate.

Veritatis Splendor

Veritatis Splendor

Editor's Introduction

On August 6, 1993, John Paul II signed his tenth encyclical, Veritatis Splendor, regarding certain fundamental truths of the Church's moral teaching.<sup>1</sup> Undoubtedly it is the Pope's most complex and most discussed document. Since its publication, the encyclical has generated a great deal of comment in the media and among theologians. This is not surprising, since Veritatis Splendor is the first-ever papal document on the theological and philosophical foundations of Catholic moral teaching. In this encyclical the Pope affirms that divine revelation contains "a specific and determined moral content, universally valid and permanent" (§37.1), which the Magisterium has the competence to interpret and teach.

Six years before, in the apostolic letter Spiritus Domini (1987), John Paul had publicly announced his intention to publish a document which would treat "more fully and more deeply the issues regarding the very foundations of moral theology" (§5.1). For several reasons the encyclical's preparation took longer than was first anticipated. First, the Pope widely consulted bishops and theologians throughout the world, and various drafts were drawn up. Second, he thought that it was fitting for the encyclical "to be preceded by the Catechism of the Catholic Church, which contains a complete and systematic exposition of Christian moral teaching" (§5.3). The Catechism, published in 1992, gives a full presentation of the Church's moral doctrine, including that on particular questions, and expounds it in a positive way. Veritatis Splendor, on the other hand, limits itself to dealing with the fundamental principles underlying all moral teaching.

But why does John Paul think that an encyclical on moral issues will serve the Church and the world on the threshold of the third millennium? According to him, reflection on the ethical implications of Christian faith, lived from the beginning as the "way" (Acts 22:4), belongs to the full proclamation of the Gospel. Moreover, he is convinced that society is in the throes of a "crisis of truth" (§32.2). This crisis has the "most serious implications for the moral life of the faithful and for communion in the Church, as well as for a just and fraternal social life" (§5.2).

The dechristianization of many cultures involves not only a loss of faith but also "a decline or obscuring of the moral sense" (§106.2). This new moral situation brings with it "the confusion between good and evil, which makes it impossible to build up and to preserve the moral order" (§93.1). The ethical bewilderment of some Catholics has led to "the spread of numerous doubts and objections of a human and psychological, social and cultural, religious and even properly theological nature, with regard to the Church's moral teachings" (§4.2). In an increasingly secular world, believers are "making judgments and decisions [that] often appear extraneous or even contrary to those of the Gospel" (§88.2). Moreover, dissent from Catholic moral teaching often entails "an overall and systematic calling into question of traditional moral doctrine" (§4.2). Thus, as a service to the ethical and spiritual welfare of individuals and cultures, John Paul addresses the basic moral principles handed down by the Christian Tradition.

In order to meet his goal, the Pope responds in a constructive way to the contemporary moral crisis by proclaiming "the splendor of the truth." When he announced the forthcoming publication of Veritatis Splendor, he described the encyclical's purpose: "It reaffirms the dignity of the human person, created in God's image, and proposes anew the genuine concept of human freedom, showing its essential and constitutive relationship with the truth in accordance with Christ's words: 'The truth will make you free!' (Jn 8:32)." <sup>2</sup> On another occasion, John Paul said that he intended the encyclical to be "a proclamation of truth and a hymn to freedom: values felt strongly by contemporary man and deeply respected by the Church." <sup>3</sup> His primary aim, then, is not to censure specific dissident moral opinions but to proclaim that Christ is "the true and final answer to the problem of morality" (§85).

John Paul sets several specific objectives for the encyclical. First, he wishes "to reflect on the whole of the Church's moral teaching, with the precise goal of recalling certain fundamental truths of Catholic doctrine which, in the present circumstances, risk being distorted or denied" (§4.2, cf. §30.1). Second, he aims to show the faithful "the inviting splendor of that truth which is Jesus Christ himself" (§83.2). Christ alone is the answer to humanity's questions, "the only response fully capable of satisfying the desire of the human heart" (§7.1). Third, if the present crisis is to be successfully resolved, the Magisterium must authoritatively discern "interpretations of Christian morality which are not consistent with 'sound teaching'" (2 Tim 4:3)" (§29.4, cf. §27.4). This pastoral discernment of the Pope and bishops is necessary as a way of assuring "the right of the faithful to receive Catholic doctrine in its purity and integrity" (§113.2).

The Pope addresses Veritatis Splendor specifically to his brother bishops. He intends them to be the first, but not exclusive, recipients of the encyclical. John Paul reminds them of their responsibility to safeguard and find "ever new ways of speaking with love and mercy" about "the path of the moral life" (§3.1,2).

John Paul II's training in ethics and moral theology is clearly evident in Veritatis Splendor. The encyclical's exposition is sometimes highly technical, especially in its analyses and responses to opinions contrary to Church teaching. While some commentators have voiced disagreement about the accuracy of the Pope's descriptions of the ethical positions with which he disagrees, they respect his desire to be fair-minded. As we shall see, whenever John Paul deals with an opinion he disagrees with, he first takes great pains to point out what is positive in the view. Only after doing this does he then examine its weaknesses. When unmasking theological and philosophical ideas incompatible with revealed truth, he scrupulously avoids imposing "any particular theological system, still less a philosophical one" (§29.4).

Throughout the encyclical the Pope repeatedly draws inspiration from the Bible. Chapter one, structured around the encounter of Jesus with the rich young man (Mt 19:16-21), establishes a biblical foundation for fundamental moral principles. In this chapter the Pope wishes to apply the theological method proposed by the Second Vatican Council: "Sacred Scripture remains the living and fruitful source of the Church's moral doctrine" (§28.2, cf. §5.3). Chapter two, on the other hand, uses Scripture chiefly to corroborate positions advanced on the basis of the natural moral law. The beginning of chapter three returns to a more biblical approach; it discusses discipleship in terms of the Paschal Mystery and of martyrdom as the supreme expression of following Christ.

More so than in his other encyclicals, in Veritatis Splendor John Paul relies considerably on the teaching of Saint Thomas Aquinas, referring to him directly at least twenty times, and on the teaching of Saint Augustine, citing him sixteen times. The Pope also mines extensively the documents of Vatican II, especially Gaudium et Spes, which he cites more than twenty-five times. Except for one reference to Saint Alphonsus Liguori and a single direct citation of John Henry Newman, the Pope mentions no moral philosopher or theologian after the Middle Ages.

Summary

Besides the introduction and conclusion, the encyclical contains three main chapters. Each begins with a scriptural text and is followed by a heading giving its principal theme. Many of the subheadings are also biblical citations or references. Chapter one, “Christ and the Answer to the Question about Morality” (§§6-27), is a biblical meditation on the essential elements of Christian morality. Chapter two, “The Church and the Discernment of Certain Tendencies in Present-Day Moral Theology” (§§28-83), is longer, more doctrinal, and considerably more technical. In the light of the Church’s living Tradition, especially the Second Vatican Council, it discerns faulty trends in contemporary moral theology. Because of its length, chapter two is subdivided into four major sections: freedom and law, conscience and truth, fundamental choice and specific kinds of behavior, and the moral act. Chapter three, “Moral Good for the Life of the Church and of the World” (§§84-117), is more pastoral. It highlights the need for moral renewal in personal and communal life if the Church and society are to flourish. By presenting all men and women with the beauty of living in the truth, this chapter confirms that Veritatis Splendor is not primarily directed to quelling moral controversy.

Christ and the moral life

Chapter one is a prolonged commentary on the question that the rich young man asked Jesus: “Teacher, what good must I do to have eternal life?” (Mt 19:16). This religious query, which echoes in the heart of everyone, is “not so much about rules to be followed, but about the full meaning of life,” about the search for happiness (§7.1).

In his reply to the young man, Jesus expresses the nucleus and spirit of Christian morality. Through this dialogue Christ reveals “the essential elements of revelation in the Old and New Testament with regard to moral action” (§28.1). The answer to the question about moral goodness and its connection to eternal life can be found only in God. One cannot know what is good without knowing goodness itself. For the believer, God is “the One who ‘alone is good’; the One who despite man’s sin remains the ‘model’ for moral action” (§10.2). To become good is to become like God. People need to turn to Christ; they receive from him “the answer to their question about what is good and what is evil” (§8.2). Essential to all morality is the recognition of God’s sovereignty over the moral order: “acknowledging the Lord as God is the very core, the heart of the Law” (§11.1). The first truth of the moral life is that human beings are God’s creatures.

John Paul also calls attention to Christ’s teaching on the close connection “between eternal life and obedience to God’s commandments” (§12.2). Jesus corroborates the young man’s assumption that attaining “‘eternal life,’ which is a participation in the very life of God” (§12.2), requires right action: “If you wish to enter life, keep the commandments” (Mt 19:17). God’s first revelation about what is good for human beings comes from creation, when he inscribes a law in their hearts (cf. Rom 2:15). Later, when God gives the Decalogue on Sinai, he reaffirms that creation teaches people about what is good, clarifies truths obscured by sin, and points to the future perfection of the Law in his Son. With the Incarnation, Jesus “brings God’s commandments to fulfillment, particularly the commandment of love of neighbor, by interiorizing their demands and by bringing out their fullest meaning” (§15.2). He confirms the commandments, assimilating them to his new law of love and revealing them as the path of life.

Lastly, the Pope’s biblical meditation affirms that the moral life consists in discipleship, in an interpersonal relationship with Jesus. The following of Christ “touches man at the very depths of his being. . . . [It] means becoming conformed to him who became a servant even to giving himself on the Cross” (§21.1). More than accepting him merely as the teacher of commandments, disciples hold fast “to the very person of Jesus, partaking of his life and his destiny” (§19.3). They imitate Jesus’ love, loving others as he has loved them (cf. Jn 15:12). Doing this entails more than observing the golden rule. It means following Jesus, who made “the sacrificial gift of his life on the Cross, as the witness to a love ‘to the end’ (Jn 13:1)” (§20.2).

Lest anyone should think, mistakenly, that discipleship rests only on human efforts, John Paul affirms that communion with Christ is “the effect of grace, of the active presence of the Holy Spirit in us” (§21.1). Disciples can imitate Christ’s love “only by virtue of a gift received” (§22.3). Through this gift of the Spirit, they are “enabled to interiorize the law, to receive it and live it as the motivating force of true personal freedom” (§83.2). The Gospel’s new law, which is the grace of the Holy Spirit, enlightens the mind, instills love for the truth, and makes possible the living of the truth.

With God’s constant help, disciples can imitate Jesus “along the path of love, a love which gives itself completely to the brethren out of love for God” (§20.1). The Pope assures his readers that, even if the keeping of God’s law is sometimes extremely difficult, obedience to it is always possible. “It is in the saving Cross of Christ, in the gift of the Holy Spirit, in the Sacraments which flow forth from the pierced side of the Redeemer (cf. Jn 19:34),” he writes, “that believers find the grace and the strength always to keep God’s holy law, even amid the gravest of hardships” (§103.2).

Freedom and law

In chapter two, John Paul offers incisive critiques of some contemporary trends in moral theology. He does not provide thorough summaries of these opinions but instead calls attention to specific ways in which they fail to respect the intimate link between freedom and truth. Where possible, the Pope draws from these trends insights which are helpful to the renewal of moral theology, despite the fact they he finds many of the views deficient. When dealing with opinions contrary to Catholic teaching, John Paul follows the same pattern as that of Saint Thomas Aquinas: he first presents contemporary objections to the position he wishes to defend, and then answers them. Because the Pope bases his criticism on his understanding of the relationship between freedom and truth, it is important to grasp his teaching on this point.

While praising today's "strong sense of freedom" (§31.2), which has often been accompanied by an increased appreciation of human dignity, John Paul also deplores how freedom is frequently misunderstood. On the one hand, some exalt freedom to such an extent "that it becomes an absolute, which would then be the source of values" (§32.1). On the other hand, others so emphasize the psychological and social factors which condition human freedom that they question the very existence of that freedom. These opinions, like all mistaken views about freedom, "are at one in lessening or even denying the dependence of freedom on truth" (§34.2).

The Pope's teaching on the connection between freedom and law is simple. No contradiction exists between exercising human freedom and accepting the truth expressed by the moral law. Each has the same purpose: the fostering of human dignity. Citing a previous address of his, the Pope writes: "According to Christian faith and the Church's teaching, 'only the freedom which submits to the Truth leads the human person to his true good. The good of the person is to be in the Truth and to do the Truth'" (§84.2). Human beings are free precisely when they submit to the truth.

Freedom to choose is an essential characteristic of the moral life. What matters more, however, is choosing rightly. In order to make the right choices, people must know what is true about the human condition and, consequently, what is good for it. They discover this truth in the moral law. This law is neither arbitrary, aimed at something contrary to human nature, nor imposed on people. Rather, "God, who alone is good, knows perfectly well what is good for man, and by virtue of his very love proposes this good to man in the commandments" (§35.2). The moral law is "an expression of divine wisdom: by submitting to the law, freedom submits to the truth of creation" (§41.2). The perfection of freedom, then, does not consist in the right to determine what is good and evil, but in the choice of living in the truth. Obedience to objective truth is the foundation of right action.

According to John Paul, the role of human reason is to discover and apply the moral law which has its source in God. It does not itself create moral norms. Human beings do not make things to be good. They discover them to be good.

Natural moral law

In the section on freedom and law, the Pope also explains Catholic teaching on the natural law, especially as it was formulated by Saint Thomas Aquinas. For John Paul, the foundation of an “objective” morality is the natural law. According to his teaching, natural law is “the participation of the practical reason in the wisdom of the divine Creator and Lawgiver” (§40, cf. §12.1). It is the light of reason inscribed by the Creator in the heart of everyone (cf. Rom 2:15). By means of the natural moral law, human beings can know what they must do and what they must avoid.

John Paul considers three contemporary objections to the Church’s teaching on the natural law. First, he mentions ethicists who attempt to establish norms based on “the results of a statistical study of concrete human behavior patterns and the opinions about morality encountered in the majority of people” (§46.1). But statistics, he reminds us, tell only what people do, not what they should do. Second, the Pope takes up the “objections of physicalism and naturalism” (§47) leveled against the traditional Catholic view of the natural law. Those who hold such positions think that people are free to manipulate nature in whatever way they choose, and that they can disregard the moral relevance of any natural inclinations of the body. John Paul points out that these criticisms often depend on a moral theory which reduces “the human person to a ‘spiritual’ and purely formal freedom” (§49). Such a theory contradicts Church teaching on “the ‘nature of the human person,’ which is the person himself in the unity of body and soul” (§50.1). Third, against those who maintain that all norms are totally conditioned by history and culture, the Pope defends the universality and immutability of the natural law. Its authority “extends to all mankind” (§51.3), and its negative precepts “are universally valid,” obliging “always and under all circumstances” (§52.1, 2). Not the prisoner of any culture, the human person’s transcendent nature is the measure of all culture.

The natural law, therefore, entails universality: “Inasmuch as it is inscribed in the rational nature of the person, it makes itself felt to all beings endowed with reason and living in history” (§51.2). For this reason, the Pope affirms that “it is precisely on the path of the moral life that the way of salvation is open to all” (§3.2). The natural law is, he believes, fully compatible with, though not identical to, the moral principles taught by the Church. Her fruitful dialogue with modern culture is rooted in “the rational – and thus universally understandable and communicable – character of moral norms belonging to the sphere of the natural moral law” (§36.2). If such a law did not exist, rational discourse, without an explicit appeal to faith, would be impossible.

Conscience and truth

In eleven paragraphs (§§54-64), the encyclical treats the moral conscience in light of the relationship between freedom and truth. It closely follows the teaching of the Second Vatican Council which describes the conscience as man's "sanctuary" (Gaudium et Spes, §16). In the moral conscience echoes the voice of God, calling individuals to do good and avoid evil.

The Pope first affirms that the "heightened sense . . . of the respect due to the journey of conscience [toward truth] certainly represents one of the positive achievements of modern culture" (§31.3). But he also warns against cultural trends which set freedom of conscience against the Church's moral teaching. At the basis of these errors is a mistaken notion of conscience, one that understands it as an infallible tribunal which excludes appeal to any other authority. An individual's conscience, it is held, is itself the source of truth and values.

According to John Paul, these cultural trends betray "a 'creative' understanding of moral conscience, which diverges from the teaching of the Church's tradition and her Magisterium" (54.2). Those who hold such a view maintain that the actions of conscience are autonomous "decisions" and that, when made maturely, they can dispense from obedience to law and the truth. Indeed, freedom and law are set in opposition to each other. Ultimately, then, it is the individual conscience "which would in fact make the final decision about what is good and what is evil" (§56.1). Thus, the moral conscience could "permit one to do in practice and in good conscience what is qualified as intrinsically evil by the moral law" (§56.1).

In replying to these contemporary moral theorists, the Pope asserts that conscience is an act of practical judgment; it "makes known what man must do or not do," according to objective norms (§59.2). Conscience, then, is not a tribunal that creates the good by a "creative" individual decision, but is "the witness of God himself, whose voice and judgment penetrate the depths of man's soul," calling him to obedience (§58). The judgment of conscience does not establish the moral law, but applies it to a particular case. It formulates obligation in light of "the 'divine law,' the universal and objective norm of morality" (§60). The Pope also points out that knowledge of God's law, while necessary, is not sufficient for making true judgments of conscience. True judgments depend on "the 'heart' converted to the Lord and to the love of what is good . . . what is essential is a sort of 'connaturality' between man and the true good" (§64.1).

Like all people, Christians must follow their consciences; however, they are also obliged to form them in the light of the truth to which Church teaching bears witness. "The Church seeks, with great love, to help all the faithful to form a moral conscience which will make judgments and lead to decisions in accordance with the truth” (§85).

The true good of human beings requires that they recognize their constant need for divine mercy. Rather than adapt moral norms to their own capacities, they should acknowledge the “disproportion” between the law and their ability to fulfill it. This recognition opens the gate to forgiveness. “What is unacceptable,” the Pope writes, “is the attitude of one who makes his own weakness the criterion of the truth about the good, so that he can feel self-justified, without even the need to have recourse to God and his mercy” (§104.1). Self-justification is not only spiritually perilous for the individual but also corrupts society by confusing good and evil.

Fundamental option

The third section of chapter two deals with the relationship of individual moral acts to what some contemporary moralists call the “fundamental option,” or basic moral direction of a person’s life. In this section the encyclical also confirms the Church’s teaching on mortal sin.

According to some moralists, the fundamental option is “brought about by that fundamental freedom whereby the person makes an overall self-determination, not through a specific and conscious decision on the level of reflection, but in a ‘transcendental’ and ‘athematic’ way” (§65.2). It is the choice by which an individual directs his whole self either toward God or against God. Particular moral acts which flow from this option only partially express a person’s basic stance. The fundamental option itself, some argue, thus remains untouched by specific moral choices.

John Paul recognizes that “Christian moral teaching, even in its biblical roots, acknowledges the specific importance of a fundamental choice which qualifies the moral life and engages freedom on a radical level before God” (§66.1). He rejects, however, that the fundamental option can be separated from specific acts. Morality is not restricted to a consideration of the individual’s fundamental option, “prescinding in whole or in part from his choice of particular actions” (§65.3). The Pope fears serious pastoral consequences when concrete actions are viewed in this way. For those who hold this theory, an individual could still be in the state of grace, “even if certain of his specific kinds of behavior were deliberately and gravely contrary to God’s commandments as set forth by the Church” (§68.1). The proponents of the theory measure the gravity of sin by the degree of engagement of an individual’s freedom rather than by the act freely chosen.

On the other hand, John Paul states that “to separate the fundamental option from concrete kinds of behavior means to contradict the substantial integrity or personal unity of the moral agent in his body and in his soul” (§67.2). In fact, it is always through particular choices that individuals make or change their fundamental option. If even a single free choice entails morally grave matter, he teaches, then one’s fundamental option for God is revoked.

Veritatis Splendor also reaffirms Catholic teaching on “the importance and permanent validity of the distinction between mortal and venial sins, in accordance with the Church’s Tradition” (§70.1). It restates this doctrine because some moralists have suggested that mortal sin should be restricted to the reversal of an individual’s fundamental option, a reversal which involves the explicit rejection of God. But, according to the encyclical, mortal sin is committed whenever a person freely chooses something gravely disordered. Particular acts can indeed radically change one's fundamental option.

The moral act

In this complex and decisive section, John Paul II deals with the criteria to be used in the moral evaluation of human acts. His treatment is a response to the contemporary ethical theories of consequentialism and proportionalism, “which call for careful discernment on the part of the Church’s Magisterium” (§74.2). The Pope summarizes these trends of thought with broad strokes; he makes no claim to be addressing the views of any particular ethicist or moral theologian.

According to Veritatis Splendor, both consequentialism and proportionalism deny that there are some moral norms which apply always and without exception. Consequentialists argue that a particular act can be described as immoral only after its foreseeable consequences have been weighed. In evaluating the morality of an act, proportionalists consider a wider set of factors. They focus “on the proportion acknowledged between the good and bad effects of that choice, with a view to the ‘greater good’ or ‘lesser evil’ actually possible in a particular situation” (§75.1). Despite their differences, both consequentialists and proportionalists hold that the morality of an act is determined by weighing the good and evil consequences of an action, and then choosing the one whose foreseeable results are the most positive. For the Pope, both positions lead to justifying, on occasion, the doing of evil so that good may come of it.

John Paul acknowledges that an ethically responsible person, when evaluating the morality of an act, must consider its intentions and consequences. But these considerations are “not sufficient for judging the moral quality of a concrete choice” (§77.1). Following the analysis of Saint Thomas, the Pope holds that “the morality of the human act depends primarily and fundamentally on the ‘object’ rationally chosen by the deliberate will” (§78.1). The object of a moral act is, therefore, not the physical happening alone, but what one freely chooses. The “object” of an act of adultery, for example, is not sexual relations but the free choice to have intercourse with someone other than one’s spouse.

Contrary to both consequentialists and proportionalists, the Pope maintains that the object of the human act is “the primary and decisive element for moral judgment” (§79.2). This object, what one freely and willingly chooses to do, determines whether an act “is capable of being ordered to the good and to the ultimate end, which is God” (§79.2). “Acting is morally good,” John Paul writes, “when the choices of freedom are in conformity with man’s true good and thus express the voluntary ordering of the person toward his ultimate end: God himself” (§72.1).

Some acts are incapable of being ordered to God, “because they radically contradict the good of the person made in his image” (§80.1). These acts, which of their nature directly contradict a person's orientation to God, can never be justified. Neither a calculation of foreseeable positive consequences nor a good intention can morally justify acts which are intrinsically evil. Such acts are such always evil "on account of their very object, and quite apart from the ulterior intentions of the one acting and the circumstances" (§80.1, cf. §81.2). Here the Pope confirms the Catholic moral tradition that it is never morally permissible, even for the best of reasons, to do evil that good may come of it (cf. Rom 3:8).

Morality and social renewal

Chapter three integrates the insights of the first two chapters in order to describe the contribution that Catholic moral teaching can make to the renewal of the Church and society. “A comparison between the Church’s teaching and today’s social and cultural situation,” the encyclical states, “immediately makes clear the urgent need for the Church herself to develop an intense pastoral effort” (§84.3). She has the responsibility to proclaim moral truth in the face of the relativism and individualism that threaten the foundations of human dignity and social life.

Because of her “love for the person, for his true good, for his authentic freedom” (§95.2), the Church is bound to propose moral truth clearly to all people of good will. A primary way in which she carries out this mission is by defending “the universal and permanent validity of the precepts prohibiting intrinsically evil acts” (§95.1, cf. §96.1). This defense of moral absolutes fosters the good of both individuals and the community.

First, the Church reminds everyone, believer and non-believer alike, that “only by obedience to universal moral norms does man find full confirmation of his personal uniqueness and the possibility of authentic moral growth” (§96.2). Absolute moral norms are necessary to protect the inviolable personal dignity of every human being. Regardless of one’s good intentions or the seemingly extenuating circumstances, no one is ever free to violate basic and inalienable human rights.

Second, the Church’s insistence on universal moral norms serves society as a whole. These norms are “the unshakable foundation and solid guarantee of a just and peaceful human coexistence” (§96.2). The negative moral precepts, those contained in the second tablet of the Decalogue, “constitute the indispensable rules of all social life” (§97.1). John Paul is also convinced that a renewed society must be built upon the truth about God, Creator and Redeemer, and the truth about the human person, created and redeemed by him. Thus, a morality founded upon truth and open to authentic freedom “renders a primordial, indispensable and immensely valuable service . . . for society and its genuine development” (§101.2). Whenever moral acts are divorced from truth, the way is open to political, economic, and cultural totalitarianism. A stable and just society, if it is to survive and flourish, must be based on objective moral norms concerning what is right and wrong.

Veritatis Splendor

Prophetic mission of moral theologians and bishops

Chapter three concludes with a reminder to moral theologians and bishops of their specific responsibilities to the Church and to social life when questions of moral doctrine are at stake.

Moral theology is “a scientific reflection on the Gospel as the gift and commandment of new life” (§110.1). It should be carried out in and for the Church as a community of faith. Moral theologians have the task of developing a deeper understanding of the reasons underlying the Church’s moral teaching, and of expounding “the validity and obligatory nature of the precepts it proposes” (§110.2). They should clarify “ever more fully the biblical foundations, the ethical significance and the anthropological concerns which underlie the moral doctrine and the vision of man set forth by the Church” (§110.2). The behavioral sciences can help moral theologians in their task, but the encyclical also mentions that these sciences are limited: their empirical methodology cannot lead to the affirmation of moral principles. Moral theology, for its part, must consider “first and foremost the spiritual dimension of the human heart and its vocation to divine love” (§112.1).

The Pope warns moral theologians to be alert to the dangers of relativism, pragmatism, and positivism. He also emphasizes that they have the grave duty of helping the faithful “to be committed to the true good and to have confident recourse to God’s grace” (§113.1). Public dissent, especially when vented in the media, is “opposed to ecclesial communion and to a correct understanding of the hierarchical constitution of the People of God” (§113.2). John Paul encourages moral theologians to cooperate with the bishops in teaching the faithful the fullness of the Catholic moral doctrine to which they have a right.

Like the Apostles, bishops must be “vigilant over the right conduct of Christians,” just as they are “vigilant for the purity of the faith” (§26.1, cf. §§27.1, 110.1). It falls to the bishops, “by the assistance of the Holy Spirit and in communion cum Petro et sub Petro” (§116.1), to protect their flocks from unsound moral teaching (cf. 2 Tim 4:3).

The teaching of the bishops should not, however, be merely negative. The Pope reminds his fellow pastors that in proclaiming morality they “must first of all show the inviting splendor of that truth which is Jesus Christ himself” (§83.2). In replying to people’s moral questions, bishops are to answer with “the Church’s reply [which] contains the voice of Jesus Christ, the voice of the truth about good and evil” (§117.2).

Key Themes

Among the many decisive themes in Veritatis Splendor, three are especially significant: the relationship between freedom and truth, the inseparable link between faith and morality, and the Church's teaching on moral absolutes. Throughout the encyclical John Paul repeatedly returns to these fundamental ideas.

Obedience of freedom to truth

The intrinsic connection between freedom and truth is a theme not only in Veritatis Splendor but also in many of the Pope's writings. Freedom, he insists, is bound to the truth. Everyone has the strict moral obligation "to seek the truth and to adhere to it once it is known" (§34.1).

Today, unfortunately, the relationship between freedom and truth is widely misconstrued. At the root of ethical theories which challenge the Church's moral doctrine are "currents of thought which end by detaching human freedom from its essential and constitutive relationship to the truth" (§4.2, cf. §§34.2, 99.2). These opinions are reflected in slogans such as "I decide what is true for me," or "everyone must create his own values to live by."

Obedience to the truth, which involves the making of choices that direct a person to God, enhances human freedom. "Patterned on God's freedom," writes John Paul, "man's freedom is not negated by his obedience to the divine law; indeed, only through this obedience does it abide in the truth and conform to human dignity" (§42.1). Genuine freedom is far more than freedom from physical or psychological constraint. It reaches its fulfillment when it attains what is truly good for the human person, ultimately the infinite good: God, who alone can fully satisfy the heart. Obedience to the truth of the moral law enables people to be truly free by acting out of love for goodness. As the Pope says: "Human freedom and God's law meet and are called to intersect . . . human reason and human will participate in God's wisdom and providence" (§41.1, 2). On the other hand, to act against the truth erodes human freedom and enslaves the person.

For John Paul, the authentic meaning of freedom is disclosed by the crucified Christ, the personification of perfect freedom: "he lives it fully in the total gift of himself and calls his disciples to share in his freedom" (§85). Through his preaching, Jesus proclaims that "the frank and open acceptance of truth is the condition for authentic freedom" (§87.1): "You will know the truth, and the truth will set you free" (Jn 8:32). Through his actions, Christ also reveals that "freedom is acquired in love, that is, in the gift of self . . . in service to God and one's brethren" (§87.2): "Greater love has no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends" (Jn 15:13).

Morality and faith

The separation of faith from morality confronts the Church's mission of evangelization with a great challenge. This "serious and destructive dichotomy" (§88.1) is characteristic of a secularism which puts religion into a compartment isolated from other areas of life. Secularism creates an autonomous morality, which separates morality from faith.

John Paul, however, insists on the "intrinsic and unbreakable bond between faith and morality" (§4.3). Faith, he maintains, "possesses a moral content . . . and calls for a consistent life commitment" (§89.1). It is a decision involving a person's whole existence. More than the acceptance of propositions, faith "is a lived knowledge of Christ, a living remembrance of his commandments, and a truth to be lived out" (§88.4). The connection between faith and morality is so inseparable that "the unity of the Church is damaged not only by Christians who reject or distort the truths of faith but also by those who disregard the moral obligations to which they are called by the Gospel" (§26.2). The new evangelization of secular societies must be founded on the proclamation of Saint Paul: "Do not be conformed to this world" (Rom 12:2).

From the beginning of Christianity, the following of Jesus has entailed a distinct way of living. The first disciples differed from others "not only in their faith and their liturgy but also in the witness of their moral conduct, which was inspired by the New Law" (§26.1). By their actions Christians are to live out their fidelity to the gift of new life received from God. The Church therefore carries out her mission of evangelization "through the gift not only of the word proclaimed but also of the word lived" (§107.2).

By means of the moral life, faith becomes witness before the world as well as confession of the truth. People bear testimony to moral truth by making the gift of self to God and others. The supreme witness to moral truth is martyrdom. According to John Paul, martyrdom, "accepted as an affirmation of the inviolability of the moral order, bears splendid witness both to the holiness of God's law and to the inviolability of the personal dignity of man" (§92.1). Susanna in the Old Testament, John the Baptist at the dawn of the New Testament, and the countless Christian martyrs down the ages confirm that "the love of God entails the obligation to respect his commandments, even in the most dire of circumstances, and the refusal to betray those commandments, even for the sake of saving one's life" (§91.4). By freely laying down their lives, martyrs testify to the splendor of divine truth and to the perfection of human freedom.

Moral absolutes

At numerous points Veritatis Splendor reaffirms the teaching that some acts are always morally evil because of the object freely chosen. According to John Paul, “the negative precepts of the natural law are universally valid. They oblige each and every individual, always and in every circumstance” (§52.1, cf. §80.1). Negative moral precepts, which forbid certain acts, apply to everyone without exception.

The moral norms forbidding intrinsically evil acts are rooted in reason and revelation. Despite the circumstances or the good end one hopes to achieve, such acts may never be done. In fact, the Pope’s chief criticism of consequentialist and proportionalist ethics is directed against their denial of Catholic teaching on intrinsically evil acts (cf. §§75.2, 82.2). These theories, he says, “are not faithful to the Church’s teaching, when they believe they can justify, as morally good, deliberate choices of kinds of behavior contrary to the commandments of the divine and natural law” (§76.2). While a good intention or particular circumstances can diminish the evil of disordered acts, a consideration of noteworthy pastoral significance, “they remain ‘irremediably’ evil acts; per se and in themselves they are not capable of being ordered to God and to the good of the person” (§81.2). Intrinsically evil acts are not wrong because they are prohibited; they are prohibited because they are wrong.

The Pope relies on Gaudium et Spes, §27, for examples of moral absolutes. It cites acts such as homicide, genocide, abortion, euthanasia, and suicide, which are “hostile to life itself”; acts such as mutilation and torture, which violate “the integrity of the human person”; and acts such as slavery, prostitution, and the treatment of workers as mere instruments of profit, which are “offensive to human dignity” (§80.1).

Negative moral absolutes are both universal and immutable. They are universal in the sense that they are specific actions which are always and everywhere gravely wrong because of their object. They allow for no exceptions. John Paul asserts: “The Church has always taught that one may never choose kinds of behavior prohibited by the moral commandments expressed in negative form in the Old and New Testaments” (§52.3, cf. §§67.2, 115.3). When pointing out that universal and unchanging moral norms are at the service of the person and society, he notes that “there are no privileges or exceptions for anyone. . . . Before the demands of morality we are all absolutely equal” (§96.2).

Because of the contemporary view that culture is historically conditioned, some ethicists deny the existence of objective moral norms which are valid for the past, present, and future. The Pope, however, maintains that human nature transcends all cultures; it is “the condition ensuring that man does not become the prisoner of any of his cultures” (§53.2). Moral absolutes are immutable through time, since they express the nature which all human beings have shared from “the beginning” (cf. Mt 19:1-9). Citing Gaudium et Spes, §10, John Paul affirms that this immutability is “ultimately founded upon Christ, who is the same yesterday and today and forever” (§53.2). At the same time, in the light of different historical and cultural contexts, universal and permanent moral norms need to be constantly reformulated. In every age the norms expressing the truth of the moral law require a formulation “capable of ceaselessly expressing their historical relevance, of making them understood and of authentically interpreting their truth” (§53.3).

In the conclusion of Veritatis Splendor the Pope turns to Mary, Mother of Mercy, “the radiant sign and inviting model of the moral life” (§120.2). Her intercession, which obtains mercy, enables people to live a morally good life. John Paul recalls the profound simplicity of Christian morality; it consists “in following Jesus Christ, in abandoning oneself to him, in letting oneself be transformed by his grace and renewed by his mercy, gifts which come to us in the communion of his Church” (§119). The splendor of truth is the splendor of freedom in Christ.

ENCYCLICAL LETTER

VERITATIS SPLENDOR

ADDRESSED BY THE SUPREME PONTIFF
JOHN PAUL II

TO ALL THE BISHOPS OF THE CATHOLIC CHURCH
REGARDING CERTAIN FUNDAMENTAL QUESTIONS OF THE CHURCH'S MORAL TEACHING

Veritatis Splendor

Venerable Brothers
in the Episcopate,
Health and the Apostolic Blessing!

The splendor of truth shines forth in the works of the Creator and, in a special way, in man, created in the image and likeness of God (cf. Gen 1:26). Truth enlightens man's intelligence and shapes his freedom, leading him to know and love the Lord. Hence the Psalmist prays: "Let the light of your face shine on us, O Lord" (Ps 4:6).

Veritatis Splendor

Introduction

Veritatis Splendor

Jesus Christ, the true light that enlightens everyone

1.1 Called to salvation through faith in Jesus Christ, “the true light that enlightens everyone” (Jn 1:9), people become “light in the Lord” and “children of light” (Eph 5:8), and are made holy by “obedience to the truth” (1 Pet 1:22).

1.2 This obedience is not always easy. As a result of that mysterious original sin, committed at the prompting of Satan, the one who is “a liar and the father of lies” (Jn 8:44), man is constantly tempted to turn his gaze away from the living and true God in order to direct it toward idols (cf. 1 Thess 1:9), exchanging “the truth about God for a lie” (Rom 1:25). Man’s capacity to know the truth is also darkened, and his will to submit to it is weakened. Thus, giving himself over to relativism and skepticism (cf. Jn 18:38), he goes off in search of an illusory freedom apart from truth itself.

1.3 But no darkness of error or of sin can totally take away from man the light of God the Creator. In the depths of his heart there always remains a yearning for absolute truth and a thirst to attain full knowledge of it. This is eloquently proved by man’s tireless search for knowledge in all fields. It is proved even more by his search for the meaning of life. The development of science and technology, this splendid testimony of the human capacity for understanding and for perseverance, does not free humanity from the obligation to ask the ultimate religious questions. Rather, it spurs us on to face the most painful and decisive of struggles, those of the heart and of the moral conscience.

2.1 No one can escape from the fundamental questions: What must I do? How do I distinguish good from evil? The answer is only possible thanks to the splendor of the truth which shines forth deep within the human spirit, as the Psalmist bears witness: “There are many who say: ‘O that we might see some good! Let the light of your face shine on us, O Lord’ ” (Ps 4:6).

2.2 The light of God’s face shines in all its beauty on the countenance of Jesus Christ, “the image of the invisible God” (Col 1:15), the “reflection of God’s glory” (Heb 1:3), “full of grace and truth” (Jn 1:14). Christ is “the way, and the truth, and the life” (Jn 14:6). Consequently the decisive answer to every one of man’s questions, his religious and moral questions in particular, is given by Jesus Christ, or rather is Jesus Christ himself, as the Second Vatican Council recalls: “In fact, it is only in the mystery of the Word Incarnate that light is shed on the mystery of man. For Adam, the first man, was a figure of the future man, namely, of Christ the Lord. It is Christ, the last Adam, who fully discloses man to himself and unfolds his noble calling by revealing the mystery of the Father and the Father’s love.”<sup>1</sup> which he sends forth to the whole world to proclaim the Gospel to every creature (cf. Mk 16:15).<sup>2</sup> Hence the Church, as the People of God among the nations,<sup>3</sup> while attentive to the new challenges of history and to mankind's efforts to discover the meaning of life, offers to everyone the answer which comes from the truth about Jesus Christ and his Gospel. The Church remains deeply conscious of her "duty in every age of examining the signs of the times and interpreting them in the light of the Gospel, so that she can offer in a manner appropriate to each generation replies to the continual human questionings on the meaning of this life and the life to come and on how they are related."<sup>4</sup>

3.1 The Church's Pastors, in communion with the Successor of Peter, are close to the faithful in this effort; they guide and accompany them by their authoritative teaching, finding ever new ways of speaking with love and mercy not only to believers but to all people of good will. The Second Vatican Council remains an extraordinary witness of this attitude on the part of the Church which, as an "expert in humanity,"<sup>5</sup> places herself at the service of every individual and of the whole world.<sup>6</sup>

3.2 The Church knows that the issue of morality is one which deeply touches every person; it involves all people, even those who do not know Christ and his Gospel or God himself. She knows that it is precisely on the path of the moral life that the way of salvation is open to all. The Second Vatican Council clearly recalled this when it stated that "those who without any fault do not know anything about Christ or his Church, yet who search for God with a sincere heart and under the influence of grace, try to put into effect the will of God as known to them through the dictate of conscience . . . can obtain eternal salvation." The Council added: "Nor does divine Providence deny the helps that are necessary for salvation to those who, through no fault of their own, have not yet attained to the express recognition of God, yet who strive, not without divine grace, to lead an upright life. For whatever goodness and truth is found in them is considered by the Church as a preparation for the Gospel and bestowed by him who enlightens everyone that they may in the end have life."<sup>7</sup>

The purpose of the present Encyclical

4.1 At all times, but particularly in the last two centuries, the Popes, whether individually or together with the College of Bishops, have developed and proposed a moral teaching regarding the many different spheres of human life. In Christ's name and with his authority they have exhorted, passed judgment and explained. In their efforts on behalf of humanity, in fidelity to their mission, they have confirmed, supported and consoled. With the guarantee of assistance from the Spirit of truth they have contributed to a better understanding of moral demands in the areas of human sexuality, the family, and social, economic and political life. In the tradition of the Church and in the history of humanity, their teaching represents a constant deepening of knowledge with regard to morality.<sup>8</sup>

4.2 Today, however, it seems necessary to reflect on the whole of the Church's moral teaching, with the precise goal of recalling certain fundamental truths of Catholic doctrine which, in the present circumstances, risk being distorted or denied. In fact, a new situation has come about within the Christian community itself, which has experienced the spread of numerous doubts and objections of a human and psychological, social and cultural, religious and even properly theological nature, with regard to the Church's moral teachings. It is no longer a matter of limited and occasional dissent, but of an overall and systematic calling into question of traditional moral doctrine, on the basis of certain anthropological and ethical presuppositions. At the root of these presuppositions is the more or less obvious influence of currents of thought which end by detaching human freedom from its essential and constitutive relationship to truth. Thus the traditional doctrine regarding the natural law, and the universality and the permanent validity of its precepts, is rejected; certain of the Church's moral teachings are found simply unacceptable; and the Magisterium itself is considered capable of intervening in matters of morality only in order to "exhort consciences" and to "propose values," in the light of which each individual will independently make his or her decisions and life choices.

4.3 In particular, note should be taken of the lack of harmony between the traditional response of the Church and certain theological positions, encountered even in seminaries and in faculties of theology, with regard to questions of the greatest importance for the Church and for the life of faith of Christians, as well as for the life of society itself. In particular, the question is asked: do the commandments of God, which are written on the human heart and are part of the Covenant, really have the capacity to clarify the daily decisions of individuals and entire societies? Is it possible to obey God and thus love God and neighbor, without respecting these commandments in all circumstances? Also, an opinion is frequently heard which questions the intrinsic and unbreakable bond between faith and morality, as if membership in the Church and her internal unity were to be decided on the basis of faith alone, while in the sphere of morality a pluralism of opinions and of kinds of behavior could be tolerated, these being left to the judgment of the individual subjective conscience or to the diversity of social and cultural contexts.

5.1 Given these circumstances, which still exist, I came to the decision – as I announced in my Apostolic Letter Spiritus Domini, issued on August 1, 1987, on the second centenary of the death of Saint Alphonsus Maria de Liguori – to write an Encyclical with the aim of treating “more fully and more deeply the issues regarding the very foundations of moral theology,”<sup>9</sup> foundations which are being undermined by certain present-day tendencies.

5.2 I address myself to you, Venerable Brothers in the Episcopate, who share with me the responsibility of safeguarding “sound teaching” (2 Tim 4:3), with the intention of clearly setting forth certain aspects of doctrine which are of crucial importance in facing what is certainly a genuine crisis, since the difficulties which it engenders have most serious implications for the moral life of the faithful and for communion in the Church, as well as for a just and fraternal social life.

5.3 If this Encyclical, so long awaited, is being published only now, one of the reasons is that it seemed fitting for it to be preceded by the Catechism of the Catholic Church, which contains a complete and systematic exposition of Christian moral teaching. The Catechism presents the moral life of believers in its fundamental elements and in its many aspects as the life of the “children of God”: “Recognizing in the faith their new dignity, Christians are called to lead henceforth a life ‘worthy of the Gospel of Christ’ (Phil 1:27). Through the sacraments and prayer they receive the grace of Christ and the gifts of his Spirit which make them capable of such a life.”<sup>10</sup> Consequently, while referring to the Catechism “as a sure and authentic reference text for teaching Catholic doctrine,”<sup>11</sup> the Encyclical will limit itself to dealing with certain fundamental questions regarding the Church’s moral teaching, taking the form of a necessary discernment about issues being debated by ethicists and moral theologians. The specific purpose of the present Encyclical is this: to set forth, with regard to the problems being discussed, the principles of a moral teaching based upon Sacred Scripture and the living Apostolic Tradition,<sup>12</sup> and at the same time to shed light on the presuppositions and consequences of the dissent which that teaching has met.

I

“Teacher, What Good Must I Do. . . ?” (Mt 19:16)

Christ and the Answer to the Question about Morality

Veritatis Splendor

“Someone came to him. . . .” (Mt 19:16)

6 The dialogue of Jesus with the rich young man, related in the nineteenth chapter of Saint Matthew’s Gospel, can serve as a useful guide for listening once more in a lively and direct way to his moral teaching: “Then someone came to him and said, ‘Teacher, what good must I do to have eternal life?’ And he said to him, ‘Why do you ask me about what is good? There is only one who is good. If you wish to enter into life, keep the commandments.’ He said to him, ‘Which ones?’ And Jesus said, ‘You shall not murder; You shall not commit adultery; You shall not steal; You shall not bear false witness; Honor your father and mother; also, You shall love your neighbor as yourself.’ The young man said to him, ‘I have kept all these; what do I still lack?’ Jesus said to him, ‘If you wish to be perfect, go, sell your possessions and give the money to the poor, and you will have treasure in heaven; then come, follow me’ ” (Mt 19:16-21).<sup>13</sup>

7.1 “Then someone came to him . . .” In the young man, whom Matthew’s Gospel does not name, we can recognize every person who, consciously or not, approaches Christ the Redeemer of man and questions him about morality. For the young man, the question is not so much about rules to be followed, but about the full meaning of life. This is in fact the aspiration at the heart of every human decision and action, the quiet searching and interior prompting which sets freedom in motion. This question is ultimately an appeal to the absolute Good which attracts us and beckons us; it is the echo of a call from God who is the origin and goal of man’s life. Precisely in this perspective the Second Vatican Council called for a renewal of moral theology, so that its teaching would display the lofty vocation which the faithful have received in Christ,<sup>14</sup> the only response fully capable of satisfying the desire of the human heart.

7.2 In order to make this “encounter” with Christ possible, God willed his Church. Indeed, the Church “wishes to serve this single end: that each person may be able to find Christ, in order that Christ may walk with each person the path of life.”<sup>15</sup>

Veritatis Splendor

“Teacher, what good must I do to have eternal life?” (Mt 19:16)

8.1 The question which the rich young man puts to Jesus of Nazareth is one which rises from the depths of his heart. It is an essential and unavoidable question for the life of every man, for it is about the moral good which must be done, and about eternal life. The young man senses that there is a connection between moral good and the fulfillment of his own destiny. He is a devout Israelite, raised as it were in the shadow of the Law of the Lord. If he asks Jesus this question, we can presume that it is not because he is ignorant of the answer contained in the Law. It is more likely that the attractiveness of the person of Jesus had prompted within him new questions about moral good. He feels the need to draw near to the One who had begun his preaching with this new and decisive proclamation: “The time is fulfilled and the Kingdom of God is at hand; repent, and believe in the Gospel” (Mk 1:15).

8.2 People today need to turn to Christ once again in order to receive from him the answer to their questions about what is good and what is evil. Christ is the Teacher, the Risen One who has life in himself and who is always present in his Church and in the world. It is he who opens up to the faithful the book of the Scriptures and, by fully revealing the Father’s will, teaches the truth about moral action. At the source and summit of the economy of salvation, as the Alpha and the Omega of human history (cf. Rev 1:8, 21:6, 22:13), Christ sheds light on man’s condition and his integral vocation. Consequently, “the man who wishes to understand himself thoroughly – and not just in accordance with immediate, partial, often superficial, and even illusory standards and measures of his being – must, with his unrest, uncertainty and even his weakness and sinfulness, with his life and death, draw near to Christ. He must, so to speak, enter into him with all his own self, he must ‘appropriate’ and assimilate the whole of the reality of the Incarnation and Redemption in order to find himself. If this profound process takes place within him, he then bears fruit not only of adoration of God but also of deeper wonder at himself.”<sup>16</sup>

8.3 If we therefore wish to go to the heart of the Gospel’s moral teaching and grasp its profound and unchanging content, we must carefully inquire into the meaning of the question asked by the rich young man in the Gospel and, even more, the meaning of Jesus’ reply, allowing ourselves to be guided by him. Jesus, as a patient and sensitive teacher, answers the young man by taking him, as it were, by the hand, and leading him step by step to the full truth.

“There is only one who is good” (Mt 19:17)

9.1 Jesus says: “Why do you ask me about what is good? There is only one who is good. If you wish to enter into life, keep the commandments” (Mt 19:17). In the versions of the Evangelists Mark and Luke the question is phrased in this way: “Why do you call me good? No one is good but God alone” (Mk 10:18; cf. Lk 18:19).

9.2 Before answering the question, Jesus wishes the young man to have a clear idea of why he asked his question. The “Good Teacher” points out to him – and to all of us – that the answer to the question, “What good must I do to have eternal life?” can only be found by turning one’s mind and heart to the “One” who is good: “No one is good but God alone” (Mk 10:18; cf. Lk 18:19). Only God can answer the question about what is good, because he is the Good itself.

9.3 To ask about the good, in fact, ultimately means to turn toward God, the fullness of goodness. Jesus shows that the young man’s question is really a religious question, and that the goodness that attracts and at the same time obliges man has its source in God, and indeed is God himself. God alone is worthy of being loved “with all one’s heart, and with all one’s soul, and with all one’s mind” (Mt 22:37). He is the source of man’s happiness. Jesus brings the question about morally good action back to its religious foundations, to the acknowledgment of God, who alone is goodness, fullness of life, the final end of human activity, and perfect happiness.

10.1 The Church, instructed by the Teacher’s words, believes that man, made in the image of the Creator, redeemed by the blood of Christ and made holy by the presence of the Holy Spirit, has as the ultimate purpose of his life to live “for the praise of God’s glory” (cf. Eph 1:12), striving to make each of his actions reflect the splendor of that glory. “Know, then, O beautiful soul, that you are the image of God,” writes Saint Ambrose. “Know that you are the glory of God (1 Cor 11:7). Hear how you are his glory. The Prophet says: Your knowledge has become too wonderful for me (cf. Ps 138:6, Vulgate). That is to say, in my work your majesty has become more wonderful; in the counsels of men your wisdom is exalted. When I consider myself, such as I am known to you in my secret thoughts and deepest emotions, the mysteries of your knowledge are disclosed to me. Know then, O man, your greatness, and be vigilant.”<sup>17</sup>

10.2 What man is and what he must do becomes clear as soon as God reveals himself. The Decalogue is based on these words: “I am the Lord your God, who brought you out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of bondage” (Ex 20:2-3). In the “ten words” of the Covenant with Israel, and in the whole Law, God makes himself known and acknowledged as the One who “alone is good”; the One who, despite man’s sin, remains the “model” for moral action in accordance with his command, “You shall be holy; for I the Lord your God am holy” (Lev 19:2); as the One who, faithful to his love for man, gives him his Law (cf. Ex 19:9-24 and 20:18-21) in order to restore man’s original and peaceful harmony with the Creator and with all creation, and, what is more, to draw him into his divine love: “I will walk among you, and will be your God, and you shall be my people” (Lev 26:12).

10.3 The moral life presents itself as the response due to the many gratuitous initiatives taken by God out of love for man. It is a response of love, according to the statement made in Deuteronomy about the fundamental commandment: “Hear, O Israel: The Lord our God is one Lord; and you shall love the Lord your God with all your heart, and with all your soul, and with all your might. And these words which I command you this day shall be upon your heart; and you shall teach them diligently to your children” (Dt 6:4-7). Thus the moral life, caught up in the gratuitousness of God’s love, is called to reflect his glory: “For the one who loves God it is enough to be pleasing to the One whom he loves: for no greater reward should be sought than that love itself; charity in fact is of God in such a way that God himself is charity.”<sup>18</sup>

11.1 The statement that “There is only one who is good” thus brings us back to the “first tablet” of the commandments, which calls us to acknowledge God as the one Lord of all and to worship him alone for his infinite holiness (cf. Ex 20:2-11). The good is belonging to God, obeying him, walking humbly with him in doing justice and in loving kindness (cf. Mic 6:8). Acknowledging the Lord as God is the very core, the heart of the Law, from which the particular precepts flow and toward which they are ordered. In the morality of the commandments the fact that the people of Israel belong to the Lord is made evident, because God alone is the One who is good. Such is the witness of Sacred Scripture, imbued in every one of its pages with a lively perception of God’s absolute holiness: “Holy, holy, holy is the Lord of hosts” (Is 6:3).

11.2 But if God alone is the Good, no human effort, not even the most rigorous observance of the commandments, succeeds in “fulfilling” the Law, that is, acknowledging the Lord as God and rendering him the worship due to him alone (cf. Mt 4:10). This “fulfillment” can come only from a gift of God: the offer of a share in the divine Goodness revealed and communicated in Jesus, the one whom the rich young man addresses with the words “Good Teacher” (Mk 10:17; Lk 18:18). What the young man now perhaps only dimly perceives will, in the end, be fully revealed by Jesus himself in the invitation: “Come, follow me” (Mt 19:21).

Veritatis Splendor

“If you wish to enter into life, keep the commandments” (Mt 19:17)

12.1 Only God can answer the question about the good, because he is the Good. But God has already given an answer to this question: he did so by creating man and ordering him with wisdom and love to his final end, through the law which is inscribed in his heart (cf. Rom 2:15), the “natural law.” The latter “is nothing other than the light of understanding infused in us by God, whereby we understand what must be done and what must be avoided. God gave this light and this law to man at creation.”<sup>19</sup> He also did so in the history of Israel, particularly in the “ten words,” the commandments of Sinai, whereby he brought into existence the people of the Covenant (cf. Ex 24) and called them to be his “own possession among all peoples,” “a holy nation” (Ex 19:5-6), which would radiate his holiness to all peoples (cf. Wis 18:4; Ezek 20:41). The gift of the Decalogue was a promise and sign of the New Covenant, in which the law would be written in a new and definitive way upon the human heart (cf. Jer 31:31-34), replacing the law of sin which had disfigured that heart (cf. Jer 17:1). In those days, “a new heart” would be given, for in it would dwell “a new spirit,” the Spirit of God (cf. Ezek 36:24-28).<sup>20</sup>

12.2 Consequently, after making the important clarification, “There is only one who is good,” Jesus tells the young man: “If you wish to enter into life, keep the commandments” (Mt 19:17). In this way, a close connection is made between eternal life and obedience to God’s commandments: God’s commandments show man the path of life and they lead to it. From the very lips of Jesus, the new Moses, man is once again given the commandments of the Decalogue. Jesus himself definitively confirms them and proposes them to us as the way and condition of salvation. The commandments are linked to a promise. In the Old Covenant the object of the promise was the possession of a land where the people would be able to live in freedom and in accordance with righteousness (cf. Dt 6:20-25). In the New Covenant the object of the promise is the “Kingdom of heaven,” as Jesus declares at the beginning of the “Sermon on the Mount” – a sermon which contains the fullest and most complete formulation of the New Law (cf. Mt 5-7), clearly linked to the Decalogue entrusted by God to Moses on Mount Sinai. This same reality of the Kingdom is referred to in the expression “eternal life,” which is a participation in the very life of God. It is attained in its perfection only after death, but in faith it is even now a light of truth, a source of meaning for life, an inchoate share in the full following of Christ. Indeed, Jesus says to his disciples after speaking to the rich young man: “Every one who has left houses or brothers or sisters or father or mother or children or lands, for my name’s sake, will receive a hundredfold and inherit eternal life” (Mt 19:29).

13.1 Jesus' answer is not enough for the young man, who continues by asking the Teacher about the commandments which must be kept: "He said to him, 'Which ones?' " (Mt 19:18). He asks what he must do in life in order to show that he acknowledges God's holiness. After directing the young man's gaze toward God, Jesus reminds him of the commandments of the Decalogue regarding one's neighbor: "Jesus said: 'You shall not murder; You shall not commit adultery; You shall not bear false witness; Honor your father and mother; also, You shall love your neighbor as yourself' " (Mt 19:18-19).

13.2 From the context of the conversation, and especially from a comparison of Matthew's text with the parallel passages in Mark and Luke, it is clear that Jesus does not intend to list each and every one of the commandments required in order to "enter into life," but rather wishes to draw the young man's attention to the "centrality" of the Decalogue with regard to every other precept, inasmuch as it is the interpretation of what the words "I am the Lord your God" mean for man. Nevertheless we cannot fail to notice which commandments of the Law the Lord recalls to the young man. They are some of the commandments belonging to the so-called "second tablet" of the Decalogue, the summary (cf. Rom 13:8-10) and foundation of which is the commandment of love of neighbor: "You shall love your neighbor as yourself" (Mt 19:19; cf. Mk 12:31). In this commandment we find a precise expression of the singular dignity of the human person, "the only creature that God has wanted for its own sake."<sup>21</sup> The different commandments of the Decalogue are really only so many reflections of the one commandment about the good of the person, at the level of the many different goods which characterize his identity as a spiritual and bodily being in relationship with God, with his neighbor and with the material world. As we read in the Catechism of the Catholic Church, "the ten commandments are part of God's revelation. At the same time, they teach us man's true humanity. They shed light on the essential duties, and so indirectly on the fundamental rights, inherent in the nature of the human person."<sup>22</sup>

13.3 The commandments of which Jesus reminds the young man are meant to safeguard the good of the person, the image of God, by protecting his goods. "You shall not murder; You shall not commit adultery; You shall not steal; You shall not bear false witness" are moral rules formulated in terms of prohibitions. These negative precepts express with particular force the ever urgent need to protect human life, the communion of persons in marriage, private property, truthfulness and people's good name.

13.4 The commandments thus represent the basic condition for love of neighbor; at the same time they are the proof of that love. They are the first necessary step on the journey toward freedom, its starting-point. "The beginning of freedom,” Saint Augustine writes, “is to be free from crimes . . . such as murder, adultery, fornication, theft, fraud, sacrilege and so forth. Once one is without these crimes (and every Christian should be without them), one begins to lift up one’s head toward freedom. But this is only the beginning of freedom, not perfect freedom . . .”23

14.1 This certainly does not mean that Christ wishes to put the love of neighbor higher than, or even to set it apart from, the love of God. This is evident from his conversation with the teacher of the Law, who asked him a question very much like the one asked by the young man. Jesus refers him to the two commandments of love of God and love of neighbor (cf. Lk 10:25-27), and reminds him that only by observing them will he have eternal life: “Do this, and you will live” (Lk 10:28). Nonetheless it is significant that it is precisely the second of these commandments which arouses the curiosity of the teacher of the Law, who asks him: “And who is my neighbor?” (Lk 10:29). The Teacher replies with the parable of the Good Samaritan, which is critical for fully understanding the commandment of love of neighbor (cf. Lk 10:30-37).

14.2 These two commandments, on which “depend all the Law and the Prophets” (Mt 22:40), are profoundly connected and mutually related. Their inseparable unity is attested to by Christ in his words and by his very life: his mission culminates in the Cross of our Redemption (cf. Jn 3:14-15), the sign of his indivisible love for the Father and for humanity (cf. Jn 13:1).

14.3 Both the Old and the New Testaments explicitly affirm that without love of neighbor, made concrete in keeping the commandments, genuine love for God is not possible. Saint John makes the point with extraordinary forcefulness: “If anyone says, ‘I love God,’ and hates his brother, he is a liar; for he who does not love his brother whom he has seen, cannot love God whom he has not seen” (1 Jn 4:20). The Evangelist echoes the moral preaching of Christ, expressed in a wonderful and unambiguous way in the parable of the Good Samaritan (cf. Lk 10:30-37) and in his words about the final judgment (cf. Mt 25:31-46).

15.1 In the “Sermon on the Mount,” the magna charta of Gospel morality,24 Jesus says: “Do not think that I have come to abolish the Law and the Prophets; I have come not to abolish them but to fulfill them” (Mt 5:17). Christ is the key to the Scriptures: “You search the Scriptures. . . ; and it is they that bear witness to me” (Jn 5:39). Christ is the center of the economy of salvation, the recapitulation of the Old and New Testaments, of the promises of the Law and of their fulfillment in the Gospel; he is the living and eternal link between the Old and the New Covenants. Commenting on Paul’s statement that “Christ is the end of the law” (Rom 10:4), Saint Ambrose writes: “end not in the sense of a deficiency, but in the sense of the fullness of the Law: a fullness which is achieved in Christ (plenitudo legis in Christo est), since he came not to abolish the Law but to bring it to fulfillment. In the same way that there is an Old Testament, but all truth is in the New Testament, so it is for the Law: what was given through Moses is a figure of the true law. Therefore, the Mosaic Law is an image of the truth.”<sup>25</sup> 15.2 Jesus brings God’s commandments to fulfillment, particularly the commandment of love of neighbor, by interiorizing their demands and by bringing out their fullest meaning. Love of neighbor springs from a loving heart which, precisely because it loves, is ready to live out the loftiest challenges. Jesus shows that the commandments must not be understood as a minimum limit not to be gone beyond, but rather as a path involving a moral and spiritual journey toward perfection, at the heart of which is love (cf. Col 3:14). Thus the commandment “You shall not murder” becomes a call to an attentive love which protects and promotes the life of one’s neighbor. The precept prohibiting adultery becomes an invitation to a pure way of looking at others, capable of respecting the spousal meaning of the body: “You have heard that it was said to the men of old, ‘You shall not kill; and whoever kills shall be liable to judgment.’ But I say to you that every one who is angry with his brother shall be liable to judgment. . . . You have heard that it was said, ‘You shall not commit adultery.’ But I say to you that every one who looks at a woman lustfully has already committed adultery with her in his heart” (Mt 5:21-22, 27-28). Jesus himself is the living “fulfillment” of the Law inasmuch as he fulfills its authentic meaning by the total gift of himself: he himself becomes a living and personal Law, who invites people to follow him; through the Spirit, he gives the grace to share his own life and love and provides the strength to bear witness to that love in personal choices and actions (cf. Jn 13:34-35).

“If you wish to be perfect” (Mt 19:21)

16.1 The answer he receives about the commandments does not satisfy the young man, who asks Jesus a further question. “I have kept all these; what do I still lack?” (Mt 19:20). It is not easy to say with a clear conscience “I have kept all these,” if one has any understanding of the real meaning of the demands contained in God’s Law. And yet, even though he is able to make this reply, even though he has followed the moral ideal seriously and generously from childhood, the rich young man knows that he is still far from the goal: before the person of Jesus he realizes that he is still lacking something. It is his awareness of this insufficiency that Jesus addresses in his final answer. Conscious of the young man’s yearning for something greater, which would transcend a legalistic interpretation of the commandments, the Good Teacher invites him to enter upon the path of perfection: “If you wish to be perfect, go, sell your possessions and give the money to the poor, and you will have treasure in heaven; then come, follow me” (Mt 19:21).

16.2 Like the earlier part of Jesus’ answer, this part too must be read and interpreted in the context of the whole moral message of the Gospel, and in particular in the context of the Sermon on the Mount, the Beatitudes (cf. Mt 5:3-12), the first of which is precisely the Beatitude of the poor, the “poor in spirit” as Saint Matthew makes clear (Mt 5:3), the humble. In this sense it can be said that the Beatitudes are also relevant to the answer given by Jesus to the young man’s question: “What good must I do to have eternal life?” Indeed, each of the Beatitudes promises, from a particular viewpoint, that very “good” which opens man up to eternal life, and indeed is eternal life.

16.3 The Beatitudes are not specifically concerned with certain particular rules of behavior. Rather, they speak of basic attitudes and dispositions in life and therefore they do not coincide exactly with the commandments. On the other hand, there is no separation or opposition between the Beatitudes and the commandments: both refer to the good, to eternal life. The Sermon on the Mount begins with the proclamation of the Beatitudes, but also refers to the commandments (cf. Mt 5:20-48). At the same time, the Sermon on the Mount demonstrates the openness of the commandments and their orientation toward the horizon of the perfection proper to the Beatitudes. These latter are above all promises, from which there also indirectly flow normative indications for the moral life. In their originality and profundity they are a sort of self-portrait of Christ, and for this very reason are invitations to discipleship and communion of life with Christ.<sup>26</sup>

17.1 We do not know how clearly the young man in the Gospel understood the profound and challenging import of Jesus' first reply: "If you wish to enter into life, keep the commandments." But it is certain that the young man's commitment to respect all the moral demands of the commandments represents the absolutely essential ground in which the desire for perfection can take root and mature, the desire, that is, for the meaning of the commandments to be completely fulfilled in following Christ. Jesus' conversation with the young man helps us to grasp the conditions for the moral growth of man, who has been called to perfection: the young man, having observed all the commandments, shows that he is incapable of taking the next step by himself alone. To do so requires mature human freedom ("If you wish to be perfect") and God's gift of grace ("Come, follow me").

17.2 Perfection demands that maturity in self-giving to which human freedom is called. Jesus points out to the young man that the commandments are the first and indispensable condition for having eternal life; on the other hand, for the young man to give up all he possesses and to follow the Lord is presented as an invitation: "If you wish. . . ." These words of Jesus reveal the particular dynamic of freedom's growth toward maturity, and at the same time they bear witness to the fundamental relationship between freedom and divine law. Human freedom and God's Law are not in opposition; on the contrary, they appeal one to the other. The follower of Christ knows that his vocation is to freedom. "You were called to freedom, brethren" (Gal 5:13), proclaims the Apostle Paul with joy and pride. But he immediately adds: "only do not use your freedom as an opportunity for the flesh, but through love be servants of one another" (ibid.). The firmness with which the Apostle opposes those who believe that they are justified by the Law has nothing to do with man's "liberation" from precepts. On the contrary, the latter are at the service of the practice of love: "For he who loves his neighbor has fulfilled the Law. The commandments, 'You shall not commit adultery; You shall not murder; You shall not steal; You shall not covet,' and any other commandment, are summed up in this sentence, 'You shall love your neighbor as yourself' " (Rom 13:8-9). Saint Augustine, after speaking of the observance of the commandments as being a kind of incipient, imperfect freedom, goes on to say: "Why, someone will ask, is it not yet perfect? Because 'I see in my members another law at war with the law of my reason.' . . . In part freedom, in part slavery: not yet complete freedom, not yet pure, not yet whole, because we are not yet in eternity. In part we retain our weakness and in part we have attained freedom. All our sins were destroyed in Baptism, but does it follow that no weakness remained after iniquity was destroyed? Had none remained, we would live without sin in this life. But who would dare to say this except someone who is proud, someone unworthy of the mercy of our deliverer? . . . Therefore, since some weakness has remained in us, I dare to say that to the extent to which we serve God we are free, while to the extent that we follow the law of sin, we are still slaves.”<sup>27</sup>

18.1 Those who live “by the flesh” experience God’s law as a burden, and indeed as a denial or at least a restriction of their own freedom. On the other hand, those who are impelled by love and “walk by the Spirit” (Gal 5:16), and who desire to serve others, find in God’s Law the fundamental and necessary way in which to practice love as something freely chosen and freely lived out. Indeed, they feel an interior urge – a genuine “necessity” and no longer a form of coercion – not to stop at the minimum demands of the Law, but to live them in their “fullness.” This is a still uncertain and fragile journey as long as we are on earth, but it is one made possible by grace, which enables us to possess the full freedom of the children of God (cf. Rom 8:21) and thus to live our moral life in a way worthy of our sublime vocation as “sons in the Son.”

18.2 This vocation to perfect love is not restricted to a small group of individuals. The invitation “go, sell your possessions and give the money to the poor,” and the promise “you will have treasure in heaven,” are meant for everyone, because they bring out the full meaning of the commandment of love for neighbor, just as the invitation which follows, “Come, follow me,” is the new, specific form of the commandment of love of God. Both the commandments and Jesus’ invitation to the rich young man stand at the service of a single and indivisible charity, which spontaneously tends toward that perfection whose measure is God alone: “You, therefore, must be perfect, as your heavenly Father is perfect” (Mt 5:48). In the Gospel of Luke, Jesus makes even clearer the meaning of this perfection: “Be merciful, even as your Father is merciful” (Lk 6:36).

Veritatis Splendor

“Come, follow me” (Mt 19:21)

19.1 The way and at the same time the content of this perfection consists in the following of Jesus, sequela Christi, once one has given up one’s own wealth and very self. This is precisely the conclusion of Jesus’ conversation with the young man: “Come, follow me” (Mt 19:21). It is an invitation the marvelous grandeur of which will be fully perceived by the disciples after Christ’s Resurrection, when the Holy Spirit leads them to all truth (cf. Jn 16:13).

19.2 It is Jesus himself who takes the initiative and calls people to follow him. His call is addressed first to those to whom he entrusts a particular mission, beginning with the Twelve; but it is also clear that every believer is called to be a follower of Christ (cf. Acts 6:1). Following Christ is thus the essential and primordial foundation of Christian morality: just as the people of Israel followed God, who led them through the desert toward the Promised Land (cf. Ex 13:21), so every disciple must follow Jesus, toward whom he is drawn by the Father himself (cf. Jn 6:44).

19.3 This is not a matter only of disposing oneself to hear a teaching and obediently accepting a commandment. More radically, it involves holding fast to the very person of Jesus, partaking of his life and his destiny, sharing in his free and loving obedience to the will of the Father. By responding in faith and following the one who is Incarnate Wisdom, the disciple of Jesus truly becomes a disciple of God (cf. Jn 6:45). Jesus is indeed the light of the world, the light of life (cf. Jn 8:12). He is the shepherd who leads his sheep and feeds them (cf. Jn 10:11-16); he is the way, and the truth, and the life (cf. Jn 14:6). It is Jesus who leads to the Father, so much so that to see him, the Son, is to see the Father (cf. Jn 14:6-10). And thus to imitate the Son, “the image of the invisible God” (Col 1:15), means to imitate the Father.

20.1 Jesus asks us to follow him and to imitate him along the path of love, a love which gives itself completely to the brethren out of love for God: “This is my commandment, that you love one another as I have loved you” (Jn 15:12). The word “as” requires imitation of Jesus and of his love, of which the washing of feet is a sign: “If I then, your Lord and Teacher, have washed your feet, you also ought to wash one another’s feet. For I have given you an example, that you should do as I have done to you” (Jn 13:14-15). Jesus’ way of acting and his words, his deeds and his precepts constitute the moral rule of Christian life. Indeed, his actions, and in particular his Passion and death on the Cross, are the living revelation of his love for the Father and for others. This is exactly the love that Jesus wishes to be imitated by all who follow him. It is the “new” commandment:

“A new commandment I give to you, that you love one another; even as I have loved you, that you also love one another. By this all men will know that you are my disciples, if you have love for one another” (Jn 13:34-35).

20.2 The word “as” also indicates the degree of Jesus’ love, and of the love with which his disciples are called to love one another. After saying, “This is my commandment, that you love one another as I have loved you” (Jn 15:12), Jesus continues with words which indicate the sacrificial gift of his life on the Cross, as the witness to a love “to the end” (Jn 13:1): “Greater love has no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends” (Jn 15:13).

20.3 As he calls the young man to follow him along the way of perfection, Jesus asks him to be perfect in the command of love, in “his” commandment: to become part of the unfolding of his complete giving, to imitate and rekindle the very love of the “Good” Teacher, the one who loved “to the end.” This is what Jesus asks of everyone who wishes to follow him: “If any man would come after me, let him deny himself and take up his cross and follow me” (Mt 16:24).

21.1 Following Christ is not an outward imitation, since it touches man at the very depths of his being. Being a follower of Christ means becoming conformed to him who became a servant even to giving himself on the Cross (cf. Phil 2:5-8). Christ dwells by faith in the heart of the believer (cf. Eph 3:17), and thus the disciple is conformed to the Lord. This is the effect of grace, of the active presence of the Holy Spirit in us.

21.2 Having become one with Christ, the Christian becomes a member of his Body, which is the Church (cf. 1 Cor 12:13, 27). By the work of the Spirit, Baptism radically configures the faithful to Christ in the Paschal Mystery of death and resurrection; it “clothes him” in Christ (cf. Gal 3:27): “Let us rejoice and give thanks,” exclaims Saint Augustine speaking to the baptized, “for we have become not only Christians, but Christ. . . . Marvel and rejoice: we have become Christ!”<sup>28</sup> Having died to sin, those who are baptized receive new life (cf. Rom 6:3-11): alive for God in Christ Jesus, they are called to walk by the Spirit and to manifest the Spirit’s fruits in their lives (cf. Gal 5:16-25). Sharing in the Eucharist, the Sacrament of the New Covenant (cf. 1 Cor 11:23-29), is the culmination of our assimilation to Christ, the source of “eternal life” (cf. Jn 6:51-58), the source and power of that complete gift of self, which Jesus – according to the testimony handed on by Paul – commands us to commemorate in liturgy and in life: “As often as you eat this bread and drink the cup, you proclaim the Lord’s death until he comes” (1 Cor 11:26).

Veritatis Splendor

“With God all things are possible” (Mt 19:26)

22.1 The conclusion of Jesus’ conversation with the rich young man is very poignant: “When the young man heard this, he went away sorrowful, for he had many possessions” (Mt 19:22). Not only the rich man but the disciples themselves are taken aback by Jesus’ call to discipleship, the demands of which transcend human aspirations and abilities: “When the disciples heard this, they were greatly astounded and said, ‘Then who can be saved?’ ” (Mt 19:25). But the Master refers them to God’s power: “With men this is impossible, but with God all things are possible” (Mt 19:26).

22.2 In the same chapter of Matthew’s Gospel (19:3-10), Jesus, interpreting the Mosaic Law on marriage, rejects the right to divorce, appealing to a “beginning” more fundamental and more authoritative than the Law of Moses: God’s original plan for mankind, a plan which man after sin has no longer been able to live up to: “For your hardness of heart Moses allowed you to divorce your wives, but from the beginning it was not so” (Mt 19:8). Jesus’ appeal to the “beginning” dismays the disciples, who remark: “If such is the case of a man with his wife, it is not expedient to marry” (Mt 19:10). And Jesus, referring specifically to the charism of celibacy “for the Kingdom of heaven” (Mt 19:12), but stating a general rule, indicates the new and surprising possibility opened up to man by God’s grace. “He said to them: ‘Not everyone can accept this saying, but only those to whom it is given’ ” (Mt 19:11).

22.3 To imitate and live out the love of Christ is not possible for man by his own strength alone. He becomes capable of this love only by virtue of a gift received. As the Lord Jesus receives the love of his Father, so he in turn freely communicates that love to his disciples: “As the Father has loved me, so have I loved you; abide in my love” (Jn 15:9). Christ’s gift is his Spirit, whose first “fruit” (cf. Gal 5:22) is charity: “God’s love has been poured into our hearts through the Holy Spirit which has been given to us” (Rom 5:5). Saint Augustine asks: “Does love bring about the keeping of the commandments, or does the keeping of the commandments bring about love?” And he answers: “But who can doubt that love comes first? For the one who does not love has no reason for keeping the commandments.”<sup>29</sup>

23.1 “The law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus has set me free from the law of sin and death” (Rom 8:2). With these words the Apostle Paul invites us to consider in the perspective of the history of salvation, which reaches its fulfillment in Christ, the relationship between the (Old) Law and grace (the New Law). He recognizes the pedagogic function of the Law, which, by enabling sinful man to take stock of his own powerlessness and by stripping him of the presumption of his self-sufficiency, leads him to ask for and to receive “life in the Spirit.” Only in this new life is it possible to carry out God’s commandments. Indeed, it is through faith in Christ that we have been made righteous (cf. Rom 3:28): the “righteousness” which the Law demands, but is unable to give, is found by every believer to be revealed and granted by the Lord Jesus. Once again it is Saint Augustine who admirably sums up this Pauline dialectic of law and grace: “The law was given that grace might be sought; and grace was given, that the law might be fulfilled.”<sup>30</sup>

23.2 Love and life according to the Gospel cannot be thought of first and foremost as a kind of precept, because what they demand is beyond man’s abilities. They are possible only as a result of a gift of God who heals, restores and transforms the human heart by his grace: “For the law was given through Moses; grace and truth came through Jesus Christ” (Jn 1:17). The promise of eternal life is thus linked to the gift of grace, and the gift of the Spirit which we have received is even now the “guarantee of our inheritance” (Eph 1:14).

24.1 And so we find revealed the authentic and original aspect of the commandment of love and of the perfection to which it is ordered: we are speaking of a possibility opened up to man exclusively by grace, by the gift of God, by his love. On the other hand, precisely the awareness of having received the gift, of possessing in Jesus Christ the love of God, generates and sustains the free response of a full love for God and the brethren, as the Apostle John insistently reminds us in his First Letter: “Beloved, let us love one another; for love is of God and knows God. He who does not love does not know God; for God is love. . . . Beloved, if God so loved us, we ought also to love one another. . . . We love, because he first loved us” (1 Jn 4:7-8, 11, 19).

24.2 This inseparable connection between the Lord’s grace and human freedom, between gift and task, has been expressed in simple yet profound words by Saint Augustine in his prayer: “Da quod iubes et iube quod vis” (grant what you command and command what you will).<sup>31</sup>

24.3 The gift does not lessen but reinforces the moral demands of love: “This is his commandment, that we should believe in the name of his Son Jesus Christ and love one another, just as he has commanded us” (1 Jn 3:23). One can “abide” in love only by keeping the commandments, as Jesus states: “If you keep my commandments, you will abide in my love, just as I have kept my Father’s commandments and abide in his love” (Jn 15:10).

24.4 Going to the heart of the moral message of Jesus and the preaching of the Apostles, and summing up in a remarkable way the great tradition of the Fathers of the East and West, and of Saint Augustine in particular,<sup>32</sup> Saint Thomas was able to write that the New Law is the grace of the Holy Spirit given through faith in Christ.<sup>33</sup> The external precepts also mentioned in the Gospel dispose one for this grace or produce its effects in one's life. Indeed, the New Law is not content to say what must be done, but also gives the power to "do what is true" (cf. Jn 3:21). Saint John Chrysostom likewise observed that the New Law was promulgated at the descent of the Holy Spirit from heaven on the day of Pentecost, and that the Apostles "did not come down from the mountain carrying, like Moses, tablets of stone in their hands; but they came down carrying the Holy Spirit in their hearts . . . having become by his grace a living law, a living book."<sup>34</sup>

Veritatis Splendor

“Lo, I am with you always, to the close of the age” (Mt 28:20)

25.1 Jesus’ conversation with the rich young man continues, in a sense, in every period of history, including our own. The question “Teacher, what good must I do to have eternal life?” arises in the heart of every individual, and it is Christ alone who is capable of giving the full and definitive answer. The Teacher who expounds God’s commandments, who invites others to follow him and gives the grace for a new life, is always present and at work in our midst, as he himself promised: “Lo, I am with you always, to the close of the age” (Mt 28:20). Christ’s relevance for people of all times is shown forth in his Body, which is the Church. For this reason the Lord promised his disciples the Holy Spirit, who would “bring to their remembrance” and teach them to understand his commandments (cf. Jn 14:26), and who would be the principal and constant source of a new life in the world (cf. Jn 3:5-8; Rom 8:1-13).

25.2 The moral prescriptions which God imparted in the Old Covenant, and which attained their perfection in the New and Eternal Covenant in the very person of the Son of God made man, must be faithfully kept and continually put into practice in the various different cultures throughout the course of history. The task of interpreting these prescriptions was entrusted by Jesus to the Apostles and their successors, with the special assistance of the Spirit of truth: “He who hears you hears me” (Lk 10:16). By the light and the strength of this Spirit the Apostles carried out their mission of preaching the Gospel and of pointing out the “way” of the Lord (cf. Acts 18:25), teaching above all how to follow and imitate Christ: “For to me to live is Christ” (Phil 1:21).

26.1 In the moral catechesis of the Apostles, besides exhortations and directions connected to specific historical and cultural situations, we find an ethical teaching with precise rules of behavior. This is seen in their Letters, which contain the interpretation, made under the guidance of the Holy Spirit, of the Lord’s precepts as they are to be lived in different cultural circumstances (cf. Rom 12-15; 1 Cor 11-14; Gal 5-6; Eph 4-6; Col 3-4; 1 Pet and Jas). From the Church’s beginnings, the Apostles, by virtue of their pastoral responsibility to preach the Gospel, were vigilant over the right conduct of Christians,<sup>35</sup> just as they were vigilant for the purity of the faith and the handing down of the divine gifts in the sacraments.<sup>36</sup> The first Christians, coming both from the Jewish people and from the Gentiles, differed from the pagans not only in their faith and their liturgy but also in the witness of their moral conduct, which was inspired by the New Law.<sup>37</sup> The Church is in fact a communion both of faith and of life; her rule of life is “faith working through love” (Gal 5:6).

26.2 No damage must be done to the harmony between faith and life: the unity of the Church is damaged not only by Christians who reject or distort the truths of faith but also by those who disregard the moral obligations to which they are called by the Gospel (cf. 1 Cor 5:9-13). The Apostles decisively rejected any separation between the commitment of the heart and the actions which express or prove it (cf. 1 Jn 2:3-6). And ever since Apostolic times the Church's Pastors have unambiguously condemned the behavior of those who fostered division by their teaching or by their actions.<sup>38</sup>

27.1 Within the unity of the Church, promoting and preserving the faith and the moral life is the task entrusted by Jesus to the Apostles (cf. Mt 28:19-20), a task which continues in the ministry of their successors. This is apparent from the living Tradition, whereby – as the Second Vatican Council teaches – “the Church, in her teaching, life and worship, perpetuates and hands on to every generation all that she is and all that she believes. This Tradition which comes from the Apostles, progresses in the Church under the assistance of the Holy Spirit.”<sup>39</sup> In the Holy Spirit, the Church receives and hands down the Scripture as the witness to the “great things” which God has done in history (cf. Lk 1:49); she professes by the lips of her Fathers and Doctors the truth of the Word made flesh, puts his precepts and love into practice in the lives of her saints and in the sacrifice of her martyrs, and celebrates her hope in him in the liturgy. By this same Tradition Christians receive “the living voice of the Gospel,”<sup>40</sup> as the faithful expression of God's wisdom and will.

27.2 Within Tradition, the authentic interpretation of the Lord's law develops, with the help of the Holy Spirit. The same Spirit who is at the origin of the revelation of Jesus' commandments and teachings, guarantees that they will be reverently preserved, faithfully expounded and correctly applied in different times and places. This constant “putting into practice” of the commandments is the sign and fruit of a deeper insight into revelation and of an understanding in the light of faith of new historical and cultural situations. Nevertheless, it can only confirm the permanent validity of revelation and follow in the line of the interpretation given to it by the great Tradition of the Church's teaching and life, as witnessed by the teaching of the Fathers, the lives of the saints, the Church's liturgy and the teaching of the Magisterium.

27.3 In particular, as the Council affirms, “the task of authentically interpreting the word of God, whether in its written form or in that of Tradition, has been entrusted only to those charged with the Church's living Magisterium, whose authority is exercised in the name of Jesus Christ.”<sup>41</sup> The Church, in her life and teaching, is thus revealed as “the pillar and bulwark of the truth” (1 Tim 3:15), including the truth regarding moral action. Indeed, “the Church has the right always and everywhere to proclaim moral principles, even in respect of the social order, and to make judgments about any human matter insofar as this is required by fundamental human rights or the salvation of souls.”<sup>42</sup>

27.4 Precisely on the questions frequently debated in moral theology today and with regard to which new tendencies and theories have developed, the Magisterium, in fidelity to Jesus Christ and in continuity with the Church’s Tradition, senses more urgently the duty to offer its own discernment and teaching, in order to help man in his journey toward truth and freedom.

Veritatis Splendor

Teaching what befits sound doctrine (cf. Tit 2:1)

28.1 Our meditation on the dialogue between Jesus and the rich young man has enabled us to bring together the essential elements of revelation in the Old and New Testament with regard to moral action. These are: the subordination of man and his activity to God, the One who “alone is good”; the relationship between the moral good, clearly indicated in the divine commandments, of human acts and eternal life; Christian discipleship, which opens up before man the perspective of perfect love; and finally the gift of the Holy Spirit, source and means of the moral life of the “new creation” (cf. 2 Cor 5:17).

28.2 In her reflection on morality, the Church has always kept in mind the words of Jesus to the rich young man. Indeed, Sacred Scripture remains the living and fruitful source of the Church’s moral doctrine; as the Second Vatican Council recalled, the Gospel is “the source of all saving truth and moral teaching.”<sup>43</sup> The Church has faithfully preserved what the word of God teaches not only about truths which must be believed but also about moral action, action pleasing to God (cf. 1 Thess 4:1); she has achieved a doctrinal development analogous to that which has taken place in the realm of the truths of faith. Assisted by the Holy Spirit who leads her into all the truth (cf. Jn 16:13), the Church has not ceased, nor can she ever cease, to contemplate the “mystery of the Word Incarnate,” in whom “light is shed on the mystery of man.”<sup>44</sup>

29.1 The Church’s moral reflection, always conducted in the light of Christ, the “Good Teacher,” has also developed in the specific form of the theological science called “moral theology,” a science which accepts and examines divine revelation while at the same time responding to the demands of human reason. Moral theology is a reflection concerned with “morality,” with the good and the evil of human acts and of the person who performs them; in this sense it is accessible to all people. But it is also “theology,” inasmuch as it acknowledges that the origin and end of moral action are found in the One who “alone is good” and who, by giving himself to man in Christ, offers him the happiness of divine life.

29.2 The Second Vatican Council invited scholars to take “special care for the renewal of moral theology” in such a way that “its scientific presentation, increasingly based on the teaching of Scripture, will cast light on the exalted vocation of the faithful in Christ and on their obligation to bear fruit in charity for the life of the world.”<sup>45</sup> The Council also encouraged theologians, “while respecting the methods and requirements of theological science, to look for a more appropriate way of communicating doctrine to the people of their time; since there is a difference between the deposit or the truths of faith and the manner in which they are expressed, keeping the same meaning and the same judgment.”<sup>46</sup> This led to a further invitation, one extended to all the faithful, but addressed to theologians in particular: “The faithful should live in the closest contact with others of their time, and should work for a perfect understanding of their modes of thought and feelings as expressed in their culture.”<sup>47</sup>

29.3 The work of many theologians who found support in the Council’s encouragement has already borne fruit in interesting and helpful reflections about the truths of faith to be believed and applied in life, reflections offered in a form better suited to the sensitivities and questions of our contemporaries. The Church, and particularly the Bishops, to whom Jesus Christ primarily entrusted the ministry of teaching, are deeply appreciative of this work, and encourage theologians to continue their efforts, inspired by that profound and authentic “fear of the Lord, which is the beginning of wisdom” (cf. Prov 1:7).

29.4 At the same time, however, within the context of the theological debates which followed the Council, there have developed certain interpretations of Christian morality which are not consistent with “sound teaching” (2 Tim 4:3). Certainly the Church’s Magisterium does not intend to impose upon the faithful any particular theological system, still less a philosophical one. Nevertheless, in order to “reverently preserve and faithfully expound” the word of God, <sup>48</sup> the Magisterium has the duty to state that some trends of theological thinking and certain philosophical affirmations are incompatible with revealed truth.<sup>49</sup>

30.1 In addressing this Encyclical to you, my Brother Bishops, it is my intention to state the principles necessary for discerning what is contrary to “sound doctrine,” drawing attention to those elements of the Church’s moral teaching which today appear particularly exposed to error, ambiguity or neglect. Yet these are the very elements on which there depends “the answer to the obscure riddles of the human condition which today also, as in the past, profoundly disturb the human heart. What is man? What is the meaning and purpose of our life? What is good and what is sin? What origin and purpose do sufferings have? What is the way to attain true happiness? What are death, judgment and retribution after death? Lastly, what is that final, unutterable mystery which embraces our lives and from which we take our origin and toward which we tend?”<sup>50</sup> These and other questions, such as: what is freedom and what is its relationship to the truth contained in God’s law? what is the role of conscience in man’s moral development? how do we determine, in accordance with the truth about the good, the specific rights and duties of the human person? – can all be summed up in the fundamental question which the young man in the Gospel put to Jesus: “Teacher, what good must I do to have eternal life?” Because the Church has been sent by Jesus to preach the Gospel and to “make disciples of all nations. . . , teaching them to observe all” that he has commanded (cf. Mt 28:19-20), she today once more puts forward the Master’s reply, a reply that possesses a light and a power capable of answering even the most controversial and complex questions. This light and power also impel the Church constantly to carry out not only her dogmatic but also her moral reflection within an interdisciplinary context, which is especially necessary in facing new issues.<sup>51</sup>

30.2 It is in the same light and power that the Church’s Magisterium continues to carry out its task of discernment, accepting and living out the admonition addressed by the Apostle Paul to Timothy: “I charge you in the presence of God and of Christ Jesus who is to judge the living and the dead, and by his appearing and his Kingdom: preach the word, be urgent in season and out of season, convince, rebuke, and exhort, be unfailing in patience and in teaching. For the time will come when people will not endure sound teaching, but having itching ears they will accumulate for themselves teachers to suit their own likings, and will turn away from listening to the truth and wander into myths. As for you, always be steady, endure suffering, do the work of an evangelist, fulfill your ministry” (2 Tim 4:1-5; cf. Tit 1:10,13-14).

Veritatis Splendor

“You will know the truth, and the truth will make you free” (Jn 8:32)

31.1 The human issues most frequently debated and differently resolved in contemporary moral reflection are all closely related, albeit in various ways, to a crucial issue: human freedom.

31.2 Certainly people today have a particularly strong sense of freedom. As the Council’s Declaration on Religious Freedom Dignitatis Humanae had already observed, “the dignity of the human person is a concern of which people of our time are becoming increasingly more aware.”<sup>52</sup> Hence the insistent demand that people be permitted to “enjoy the use of their own responsible judgment and freedom, and decide on their actions on grounds of duty and conscience, without external pressure or coercion.”<sup>53</sup> In particular, the right to religious freedom and to respect for conscience on its journey toward the truth is increasingly perceived as the foundation of the cumulative rights of the person.<sup>54</sup>

31.3 This heightened sense of the dignity of the human person and of his or her uniqueness, and of the respect due to the journey of conscience, certainly represents one of the positive achievements of modern culture. This perception, authentic as it is, has been expressed in a number of more or less adequate ways, some of which however diverge from the truth about man as a creature and the image of God, and thus need to be corrected and purified in the light of faith.<sup>55</sup>

32.1 Certain currents of modern thought have gone so far as to exalt freedom to such an extent that it becomes an absolute, which would then be the source of values. This is the direction taken by doctrines which have lost the sense of the transcendent or which are explicitly atheistic. The individual conscience is accorded the status of a supreme tribunal of moral judgment which hands down categorical and infallible decisions about good and evil. To the affirmation that one has a duty to follow one’s conscience is unduly added the affirmation that one’s moral judgment is true merely by the fact that it has its origin in conscience. But in this way the inescapable claims of truth disappear, yielding their place to a criterion of sincerity, authenticity and “being at peace with oneself,” so much so that some have come to adopt a radically subjectivistic conception of moral judgment.

32.2 As is immediately evident, the crisis of truth is not unconnected with this development. Once the idea of a universal truth about the good, knowable by human reason, is lost, inevitably the notion of conscience also changes. Conscience is no longer considered in its primordial reality as an act of a person’s intelligence, the function of which is to apply the universal knowledge of the good in a specific situation and thus to express a judgment about the right conduct to be chosen here and now. Instead, there is a tendency to grant to the individual conscience the prerogative of independently determining the criteria of good and evil and then acting accordingly. Such an outlook is quite congenial to an individualistic ethic, wherein each individual is faced with his own truth, different from the truth of others. Taken to its extreme consequences, this individualism leads to a denial of the very idea of human nature.

32.3 These different notions are at the origin of currents of thought which posit a radical opposition between moral law and conscience, and between nature and freedom.

33.1 Side by side with its exaltation of freedom, yet oddly in contrast with it, modern culture radically questions the very existence of this freedom. A number of disciplines, grouped under the name of the “behavioral sciences,” have rightly drawn attention to the many kinds of psychological and social conditioning which influence the exercise of human freedom. Knowledge of these conditionings and the study they have received represent important achievements which have found application in various areas, for example in pedagogy or the administration of justice. But some people, going beyond the conclusions which can be legitimately drawn from these observations, have come to question or even deny the very reality of human freedom.

33.2 Mention should also be made here of theories which misuse scientific research about the human person. Arguing from the great variety of customs, behavior patterns and institutions present in humanity, these theories end up, if not with an outright denial of universal human values, at least with a relativistic conception of morality.

34.1 “Teacher, what good must I do to have eternal life?” The question of morality, to which Christ provides the answer, cannot prescind from the issue of freedom. Indeed, it considers that issue central, for there can be no morality without freedom: “It is only in freedom that man can turn to what is good.”<sup>56</sup> But what sort of freedom? The Council, considering our contemporaries who “highly regard” freedom and “assiduously pursue” it, but who “often cultivate it in wrong ways as a license to do anything they please, even evil,” speaks of “genuine” freedom: “Genuine freedom is an outstanding manifestation of the divine image in man. For God willed to leave man ‘in the power of his own counsel’ (cf. Sir 15:14), so that he would seek his Creator of his own accord and would freely arrive at full and blessed perfection by cleaving to God.”<sup>57</sup> Although each individual has a right to be respected in his own journey in search of the truth, there exists a prior moral obligation, and a grave one at that, to seek the truth and to adhere to it once it is known.<sup>58</sup> As Cardinal John Henry Newman, that outstanding defender of the rights of conscience, forcefully put it: “Conscience has rights because it has duties.”<sup>59</sup>

34.2 Certain tendencies in contemporary moral theology, under the influence of the currents of subjectivism and individualism just mentioned, involve novel interpretations of the relationship of freedom to the moral law, human nature and conscience, and propose novel criteria for the moral evaluation of acts. Despite their variety, these tendencies are at one in lessening or even denying the dependence of freedom on truth.

34.3 If we wish to undertake a critical discernment of these tendencies – a discernment capable of acknowledging what is legitimate, useful and of value in them, while at the same time pointing out their ambiguities, dangers and errors – we must examine them in the light of the fundamental dependence of freedom upon truth, a dependence which has found its clearest and most authoritative expression in the words of Christ: “You will know the truth, and the truth will set you free” (Jn 8:32).

I. FREEDOM AND LAW

Veritatis Splendor

“Of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil you shall not eat” (Gen 2:17)

35.1 In the Book of Genesis we read: “The Lord God commanded the man, saying, ‘You may eat freely of every tree of the garden; but of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil you shall not eat, for in the day that you eat of it you shall die’ ” (Gen 2:16-17).

35.2 With this imagery, revelation teaches that the power to decide what is good and what is evil does not belong to man, but to God alone. The man is certainly free, inasmuch as he can understand and accept God’s commands. And he possesses an extremely far-reaching freedom, since he can eat “of every tree of the garden.” But his freedom is not unlimited: it must halt before the “tree of the knowledge of good and evil,” for it is called to accept the moral law given by God. In fact, human freedom finds its authentic and complete fulfillment precisely in the acceptance of that law. God, who alone is good, knows perfectly what is good for man, and by virtue of his very love proposes this good to man in the commandments.

35.3 God’s law does not reduce, much less do away with human freedom; rather, it protects and promotes that freedom. In contrast, however, some present-day cultural tendencies have given rise to several currents of thought in ethics which center upon an alleged conflict between freedom and law. These doctrines would grant to individuals or social groups the right to determine what is good or evil. Human freedom would thus be able to “create values” and would enjoy a primacy over truth, to the point that truth itself would be considered a creation of freedom. Freedom would thus lay claim to a moral autonomy which would actually amount to an absolute sovereignty.

36.1 The modern concern for the claims of autonomy has not failed to exercise an influence also in the sphere of Catholic moral theology. While the latter has certainly never attempted to set human freedom against the divine law or to question the existence of an ultimate religious foundation for moral norms, it has, nonetheless, been led to undertake a profound rethinking about the role of reason and of faith in identifying moral norms with reference to specific “inner-worldly” kinds of behavior involving oneself, others and the material world.

36.2 It must be acknowledged that underlying this work of rethinking there are certain positive concerns which to a great extent belong to the best tradition of Catholic thought. In response to the encouragement of the Second Vatican Council,<sup>60</sup> there has been a desire to foster dialogue with modern culture, emphasizing the rational – and thus universally understandable and communicable – character of moral norms belonging to the sphere of the natural moral law.<sup>61</sup> There has also been an attempt to reaffirm the interior character of the ethical requirements deriving from that law, requirements which create an obligation for the will only because such an obligation was previously acknowledged by human reason and, concretely, by personal conscience.

36.3 Some people, however, disregarding the dependence of human reason on divine wisdom and the need, given the present state of fallen nature, for divine revelation as an effective means for knowing moral truths, even those of the natural order,<sup>62</sup> have actually posited a complete sovereignty of reason in the domain of moral norms regarding the right ordering of life in this world. Such norms would constitute the boundaries for a merely “human” morality; they would be the expression of a law which man in an autonomous manner lays down for himself and which has its source exclusively in human reason. In no way could God be considered the Author of this law, except in the sense that human reason exercises its autonomy in setting down laws by virtue of a primordial and total mandate given to man by God. These trends of thought have led to a denial, in opposition to Sacred Scripture (cf. Mt 15:3-6) and the Church’s constant teaching, of the fact that the natural moral law has God as its Author, and that man, by the use of reason, participates in the eternal law, which it is not for him to establish.

37.1 In their desire, however, to keep the moral life in a Christian context, certain moral theologians have introduced a sharp distinction, contrary to Catholic doctrine,<sup>63</sup> between an ethical order, which would be human in origin and of value for this world alone, and an order of salvation, for which only certain intentions and interior attitudes regarding God and neighbor would be significant. This has then led to an actual denial that there exists, in divine revelation, a specific and determined moral content, universally valid and permanent. The word of God would be limited to proposing an exhortation, a generic paraenesis, which the autonomous reason alone would then have the task of completing with normative directives which are truly “objective,” that is, adapted to the concrete historical situation. Naturally, an autonomy conceived in this way also involves the denial of a specific doctrinal competence on the part of the Church and her Magisterium with regard to particular moral norms which deal with the so-called “human good.” Such norms would not be part of the proper content of revelation, and would not in themselves be relevant for salvation.

37.2 No one can fail to see that such an interpretation of the autonomy of human reason involves positions incompatible with Catholic teaching.

37.3 In such a context it is absolutely necessary to clarify, in the light of the word of God and the living Tradition of the Church, the fundamental notions of human freedom and of the moral law, as well as their profound and intimate relationship. Only thus will it be possible to respond to the rightful claims of human reason in a way which accepts the valid elements present in certain currents of contemporary moral theology without compromising the Church's heritage of moral teaching with ideas derived from an erroneous concept of autonomy.

“God left man in the power of his own counsel” (Sir 15:14)

38.1 Taking up the words of Sirach, the Second Vatican Council explains the meaning of that “genuine freedom” which is “an outstanding manifestation of the divine image” in man: “God willed to leave man in the power of his own counsel, so that he would seek his Creator of his own accord and would freely arrive at full and blessed perfection by cleaving to God.”<sup>64</sup> These words indicate the wonderful depth of the sharing in God’s dominion to which man has been called: they indicate that man’s dominion extends in a certain sense over man himself. This has been a constantly recurring theme in theological reflection on human freedom, which is described as a form of kingship. For example, Saint Gregory of Nyssa writes: “The soul shows its royal and exalted character . . . in that it is free and self-governed, swayed autonomously by its own will. Of whom else can this be said, save a king? . . . Thus human nature, created to rule other creatures, was by its likeness to the King of the universe made as it were a living image, partaking with the Archetype both in dignity and in name.”<sup>65</sup>

38.2 The exercise of dominion over the world represents a great and responsible task for man, one which involves his freedom in obedience to the Creator’s command: “Fill the earth and subdue it” (Gen 1:28). In view of this, a rightful autonomy is due to every man, as well as to the human community, a fact to which the Council’s Constitution Gaudium et Spes calls special attention. This is the autonomy of earthly realities, which means that “created things have their own laws and values which are to be gradually discovered, utilized and ordered by man.”<sup>66</sup>

39.1 Not only the world, however, but also man himself has been entrusted to his own care and responsibility. God left man “in the power of his own counsel” (Sir 15:14), that he might seek his Creator and freely attain perfection. Attaining such perfection means personally building up that perfection in himself. Indeed, just as man in exercising his dominion over the world shapes it in accordance with his own intelligence and will, so too in performing morally good acts, man strengthens, develops and consolidates within himself his likeness to God.

39.2 Even so, the Council warns against a false concept of the autonomy of earthly realities, one which would maintain that “created things are not dependent on God and that man can use them without reference to their Creator.”<sup>67</sup> With regard to man himself, such a concept of autonomy produces particularly baneful effects, and eventually leads to atheism: “Without its Creator the creature simply disappears. . . . If God is ignored the creature itself is impoverished.”<sup>68</sup>

40 The teaching of the Council emphasizes, on the one hand, the role of human reason in discovering and applying the moral law: the moral life calls for that creativity and originality typical of the person, the source and cause of his own deliberate acts. On the other hand, reason draws its own truth and authority from the eternal law, which is none other than divine wisdom itself.<sup>69</sup> At the heart of the moral life we thus find the principle of a “rightful autonomy”<sup>70</sup> of man, the personal subject of his actions. The moral law has its origin in God and always finds its source in him: at the same time, by virtue of natural reason, which derives from divine wisdom, it is a properly human law. Indeed, as we have seen, the natural law “is nothing other than the light of understanding infused in us by God, whereby we understand what must be done and what must be avoided. God gave this light and this law to man at creation.”<sup>71</sup> The rightful autonomy of the practical reason means that man possesses in himself his own law, received from the Creator. Nevertheless, the autonomy of reason cannot mean that reason itself creates values and moral norms.<sup>72</sup> Were this autonomy to imply a denial of the participation of the practical reason in the wisdom of the divine Creator and Lawgiver, or were it to suggest a freedom which creates moral norms, on the basis of historical contingencies or the diversity of societies and cultures, this sort of alleged autonomy would contradict the Church’s teaching on the truth about man.<sup>73</sup> It would be the death of true freedom: “But of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil you shall not eat, for in the day that you eat of it you shall die” (Gen 2:17).

41.1 Man’s genuine moral autonomy in no way means the rejection but rather the acceptance of the moral law, of God’s command: “The Lord God gave this command to the man. . .” (Gen 2:16). Human freedom and God’s law meet and are called to intersect, in the sense of man’s free obedience to God and of God’s completely gratuitous benevolence toward man. Hence obedience to God is not, as some would believe, a heteronomy, as if the moral life were subject to the will of something all-powerful, absolute, extraneous to man and intolerant of his freedom. If in fact a heteronomy of morality were to mean a denial of man’s self-determination or the imposition of norms unrelated to his good, this would be in contradiction to the revelation of the Covenant and of the redemptive Incarnation. Such a heteronomy would be nothing but a form of alienation, contrary to divine wisdom and to the dignity of the human person.

41.2 Others speak, and rightly so, of theonomy, or participated theonomy, since man’s free obedience to God’s law effectively implies that human reason and human will participate in God’s wisdom and providence. By forbidding man to “eat of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil,” God makes it clear that man does not originally possess such “knowledge” as something properly his own, but only participates in it by the light of natural reason and of divine revelation, which manifest to him the requirements and the promptings of eternal wisdom. Law must therefore be considered an expression of divine wisdom: by submitting to the law, freedom submits to the truth of creation. Consequently one must acknowledge in the freedom of the human person the image and the nearness of God, who is present in all (cf. Eph 4:6). But one must likewise acknowledge the majesty of the God of the universe and revere the holiness of the law of God, who is infinitely transcendent: Deus semper maior.<sup>74</sup>

Blessed is the man who takes delight in the law of the Lord (cf. Ps 1:1-2)

42.1 Patterned on God's freedom, man's freedom is not negated by his obedience to the divine law; indeed, only through this obedience does it abide in the truth and conform to human dignity. This is clearly stated by the Council: "Human dignity requires man to act through conscious and free choice, as motivated and prompted personally from within, and not through blind internal impulse or merely external pressure. Man achieves such dignity when he frees himself from all subservience to his feelings, and in a free choice of the good, pursues his own end by effectively and assiduously marshaling the appropriate means."<sup>75</sup>

42.2 In his journey toward God, the One who "alone is good," man must freely do good and avoid evil. But in order to accomplish this he must be able to distinguish good from evil. And this takes place above all thanks to the light of natural reason, the reflection in man of the splendor of God's countenance. Thus Saint Thomas, commenting on a verse of Psalm 4, writes: "After saying: Offer right sacrifices (Ps 4:5), as if some had then asked him what right works were, the Psalmist adds: There are many who say: Who will make us see good? And in reply to the question he says: The light of your face, Lord, is signed upon us, thereby implying that the light of natural reason whereby we discern good from evil, which is the function of the natural law, is nothing else but an imprint on us of the divine light."<sup>76</sup> It also becomes clear why this law is called the natural law: it receives this name not because it refers to the nature of irrational beings but because the reason which promulgates it is proper to human nature.<sup>77</sup>

43.1 The Second Vatican Council points out that the "supreme rule of life is the divine law itself, the eternal, objective and universal law by which God out of his wisdom and love arranges, directs and governs the whole world and the paths of the human community. God has enabled man to share in this divine law, and hence man is able under the gentle guidance of God's providence increasingly to recognize the unchanging truth."<sup>78</sup>

43.2 The Council refers to the classic teaching on God's eternal law. Saint Augustine defines this as "the reason or the will of God, who commands us to respect the natural order and forbids us to disturb it."<sup>79</sup> Saint Thomas identifies it with "the type of the divine wisdom as moving all things to their due end."<sup>80</sup> And God's wisdom is providence, a love which cares. God himself loves and cares, in the most literal and basic sense, for all creation (cf. Wis 7:22, 8:11). But God provides for man differently from the way in which he provides for beings which are not persons. He cares for man not "from without," through the laws of physical nature, but “from within,” through reason, which, by its natural knowledge of God’s eternal law, is consequently able to show man the right direction to take in his free actions.<sup>81</sup> In this way God calls man to participate in his own providence, since he desires to guide the world – not only the world of nature but also the world of human persons – through man himself, through man’s reasonable and responsible care. The natural law enters here as the human expression of God’s eternal law. Saint Thomas writes: “Among all others, the rational creature is subject to divine Providence in the most excellent way, insofar as it partakes of a share of providence, being provident both for itself and for others. Thus it has a share of the eternal Reason, whereby it has a natural inclination to its proper act and end. This participation of the eternal law in the rational creature is called natural law.”<sup>82</sup>

44.1 The Church has often made reference to the Thomistic doctrine of natural law, including it in her own teaching on morality. Thus my Venerable Predecessor Leo XIII emphasized the essential subordination of reason and human law to the Wisdom of God and to his law. After stating that “the natural law is written and engraved in the heart of each and every man, since it is none other than human reason itself which commands us to do good and counsels us not to sin,” Leo XIII appealed to the “higher reason” of the divine Lawgiver: “But this prescription of human reason could not have the force of law unless it were the voice and the interpreter of some higher reason to which our spirit and our freedom must be subject.” Indeed, the force of law consists in its authority to impose duties, to confer rights and to sanction certain behavior: “Now all of this, clearly, could not exist in man if, as his own supreme legislator, he gave himself the rule of his own actions.” And he concluded: “It follows that the natural law is itself the eternal law, implanted in beings endowed with reason, and inclining them toward their right action and end; it is none other than the eternal reason of the Creator and Ruler of the universe.”<sup>83</sup>

44.2 Man is able to recognize good and evil thanks to that discernment of good from evil which he himself carries out by his reason, in particular by his reason enlightened by divine revelation and by faith, through the law which God gave to the Chosen People, beginning with the commandments on Sinai. Israel was called to accept and to live out God’s law as a particular gift and sign of its election and of the divine Covenant, and also as a pledge of God’s blessing. Thus Moses could address the children of Israel and ask them: “What great nation is there that has a god so near to it as the Lord our God is to us, whenever we call upon him? And what great nation is there that has statutes and ordinances so righteous as all this law which I set before you this day?” (Dt 4:7-8). In the Psalms we encounter the sentiments of praise, gratitude and veneration which the

Chosen People is called to show toward God's law, together with an exhortation to know it, ponder it and translate it into life. "Blessed is the man who walks not in the counsel of the wicked, nor stands in the way of sinners, nor sits in the seat of scoffers, but his delight is in the law of the Lord and on his law he meditates day and night" (Ps 1:1-2). "The law of the Lord is perfect, reviving the soul; the testimony of the Lord is sure, making wise the simple; the precepts of the Lord are right, rejoicing the heart; the commandment of the Lord is pure, enlightening the eyes" (Ps 18:8-9).

45.1 The Church gratefully accepts and lovingly preserves the entire deposit of revelation, treating it with religious respect and fulfilling her mission of authentically interpreting God's law in the light of the Gospel. In addition, the Church receives the gift of the New Law, which is the "fulfillment" of God's law in Jesus Christ and in his Spirit. This is an "interior" law (cf. Jer 31:31-33), "written not with ink but with the Spirit of the living God, not on tablets of stone but on tablets of human hearts" (2 Cor 3:3); a law of perfection and of freedom (cf. 2 Cor 3:17); "the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus" (Rom 8:2). Saint Thomas writes that this law "can be called law in two ways. First, the law of the spirit is the Holy Spirit . . . who, dwelling in the soul, not only teaches what it is necessary to do by enlightening the intellect on the things to be done, but also inclines the affections to act with uprightness. . . . Second, the law of the spirit can be called the proper effect of the Holy Spirit, and thus faith working through love (cf. Gal 5:6), which teaches inwardly about the things to be done . . . and inclines the affections to act."<sup>84</sup>

45.2 Even if moral-theological reflection usually distinguishes between the positive or revealed law of God and the natural law, and, within the economy of salvation, between the "Old" and the "New" Law, it must not be forgotten that these and other useful distinctions always refer to that law whose author is the one and the same God and which is always meant for man. The different ways in which God, acting in history, cares for the world and for mankind are not mutually exclusive; on the contrary, they support each other and intersect. They have their origin and goal in the eternal, wise and loving counsel whereby God predestines men and women "to be conformed to the image of his Son" (Rom 8:29). God's plan poses no threat to man's genuine freedom; on the contrary, the acceptance of God's plan is the only way to affirm that freedom.

Veritatis Splendor

“What the law requires is written on their hearts” (Rom 2:15)

46.1 The alleged conflict between freedom and law is forcefully brought up once again today with regard to the natural law, and particularly with regard to nature. Debates about nature and freedom have always marked the history of moral reflection; they grew especially heated at the time of the Renaissance and the Reformation, as can be seen from the teaching of the Council of Trent.<sup>85</sup> Our own age is marked, though in a different sense, by a similar tension. The penchant for empirical observation, the procedures of scientific objectification, technological progress and certain forms of liberalism have led to these two terms being set in opposition, as if a dialectic, if not an absolute conflict, between freedom and nature were characteristic of the structure of human history. At other periods, it seemed that “nature” subjected man totally to its own dynamics and even its own unbreakable laws. Today too, the situation of the world of the senses within space and time, physio-chemical constants, bodily processes, psychological impulses and forms of social conditioning seem to many people the only really decisive factors of human reality. In this context even moral facts, despite their specificity, are frequently treated as if they were statistically verifiable data, patterns of behavior which can be subject to observation or explained exclusively in categories of psychosocial processes. As a result, some ethicists, professionally engaged in the study of human realities and behavior, can be tempted to take as the standard for their discipline and even for its operative norms the results of a statistical study of concrete human behavior patterns and the opinions about morality encountered in the majority of people.

46.2 Other moralists, however, in their concern to stress the importance of values, remain sensitive to the dignity of freedom, but they frequently conceive of freedom as somehow in opposition to or in conflict with material and biological nature, over which it must progressively assert itself. Here various approaches are at one in overlooking the created dimension of nature and in misunderstanding its integrity. For some, “nature” becomes reduced to raw material for human activity and for its power: thus nature needs to be profoundly transformed, and indeed overcome by freedom, inasmuch as it represents a limitation and denial of freedom. For others, it is in the untrammelled advancement of man’s power, or of his freedom, that economic, cultural, social and even moral values are established: nature would thus come to mean everything found in man and the world apart from freedom. In such an understanding, nature would include in the first place the human body, its make-up and its processes: against this physical datum would be opposed whatever is “constructed,” in other words “culture,” seen as the product and result of freedom. Human nature, understood in this way, could be reduced to and treated as a readily available biological or social material. This ultimately means making freedom self-defining and a phenomenon creative of itself and its values. Indeed, when all is said and done man would not even have a nature; he would be his own personal life-project. Man would be nothing more than his own freedom!

47 In this context, objections of physicalism and naturalism have been leveled against the traditional conception of the natural law, which is accused of presenting as moral laws what are in themselves mere biological laws. Consequently, in too superficial a way, a permanent and unchanging character would be attributed to certain kinds of human behavior, and, on the basis of this, an attempt would be made to formulate universally valid moral norms. According to certain theologians, this kind of “biologistic or naturalistic argumentation” would even be present in certain documents of the Church’s Magisterium, particularly those dealing with the area of sexual and conjugal ethics. It was, they maintain, on the basis of a naturalistic understanding of the sexual act that contraception, direct sterilization, autoeroticism, premarital sexual relations, homosexual relations and artificial insemination were condemned as morally unacceptable. In the opinion of these same theologians, a morally negative evaluation of such acts fails to take into adequate consideration both man’s character as a rational and free being and the cultural conditioning of all moral norms. In their view, man, as a rational being, not only can but actually must freely determine the meaning of his behavior. This process of “determining the meaning” would obviously have to take into account the many limitations of the human being, as existing in a body and in history. Furthermore, it would have to take into consideration the behavioral models and the meanings which the latter acquire in any given culture. Above all, it would have to respect the fundamental commandment of love of God and neighbor. Still, they continue, God made man as a rationally free being; he left him “in the power of his own counsel” and he expects him to shape his life in a personal and rational way. Love of neighbor would mean above all and even exclusively respect for his freedom to make his own decisions. The workings of typically human behavior, as well as the so-called “natural inclinations,” would establish at the most – so they say – a general orientation toward correct behavior, but they cannot determine the moral assessment of individual human acts, so complex from the viewpoint of situations.

48.1 Faced with this theory, one has to consider carefully the correct relationship existing between freedom and human nature, and in particular the place of the human body in questions of natural law.

48.2 A freedom which claims to be absolute ends up treating the human body as a raw datum, devoid of any meaning and moral values until freedom has shaped it in accordance with its design. Consequently, human nature and the body appear as presuppositions or preambles, materially necessary, for freedom to make its choice, yet extrinsic to the person, the subject and the human act. Their functions would not be able to constitute reference points for moral decisions, because the finalities of these inclinations would be merely “physical” goods, called by some “pre-moral.” To refer to them, in order to find in them rational indications with regard to the order of morality, would be to expose oneself to the accusation of physicalism or biologism. In this way of thinking, the tension between freedom and a nature conceived of in a reductive way is resolved by a division within man himself.

48.3 This moral theory does not correspond to the truth about man and his freedom. It contradicts the Church’s teachings on the unity of the human person, whose rational soul is per se et essentialiter the form of his body.<sup>86</sup> The spiritual and immortal soul is the principle of unity of the human being, whereby it exists as a whole – corpore et anima unus<sup>87</sup> – as a person. These definitions not only point out that the body, which has been promised the resurrection, will also share in glory. They also remind us that reason and free will are linked with all the bodily and sense faculties. The person, including the body, is completely entrusted to himself, and it is in the unity of body and soul that the person is the subject of his own moral acts. The person, by the light of reason and the support of virtue, discovers in the body the anticipatory signs, the expression and the promise of the gift of self, in conformity with the wise plan of the Creator. It is in the light of the dignity of the human person – dignity which must be affirmed for its own sake – that reason grasps the specific moral value of certain goods toward which the person is naturally inclined. And since the human person cannot be reduced to a freedom which is self-designing, but entails a particular spiritual and bodily structure, the primordial moral requirement of loving and respecting the person as an end and never as a mere means also implies, by its very nature, respect for certain fundamental goods, without which one would fall into relativism and arbitrariness.

49 A doctrine which dissociates the moral act from the bodily dimensions of its exercise is contrary to the teaching of Scripture and Tradition. Such a doctrine revives, in new forms, certain ancient errors which have always been opposed by the Church, inasmuch as they reduce the human person to a “spiritual” and purely formal freedom. This reduction misunderstands the moral meaning of the body and of kinds of behavior involving it (cf. 1 Cor 6:19). Saint Paul declares that “the immoral, idolaters, adulterers, sexual perverts, thieves, the greedy, drunkards, revilers, robbers” are excluded from the Kingdom of God (cf. 1 Cor 6:9-10). This condemnation – repeated by the Council of Trent<sup>88</sup> – lists as “mortal sins” or “immoral practices” certain specific kinds of behavior the willful acceptance of which prevents believers from sharing in the inheritance promised to them. In fact, body and soul are inseparable: in the person, in the willing agent and in the deliberate act, they stand or fall together.

50.1 At this point the true meaning of the natural law can be understood: it refers to man’s proper and primordial nature, the “nature of the human person,”<sup>89</sup> which is the person himself in the unity of soul and body, in the unity of his spiritual and biological inclinations and of all the other specific characteristics necessary for the pursuit of his end. “The natural moral law expresses and lays down the purposes, rights and duties which are based upon the bodily and spiritual nature of the human person. Therefore this law cannot be thought of as simply a set of norms on the biological level; rather it must be defined as the rational order whereby man is called by the Creator to direct and regulate his life and actions and in particular to make use of his own body.”<sup>90</sup> To give an example, the origin and the foundation of the duty of absolute respect for human life are to be found in the dignity proper to the person and not simply in the natural inclination to preserve one’s own physical life. Human life, even though it is a fundamental good of man, thus acquires a moral significance in reference to the good of the person, who must always be affirmed for his own sake. While it is always morally illicit to kill an innocent human being, it can be licit, praiseworthy or even imperative to give up one’s own life (cf. Jn 15:13) out of love of neighbor or as a witness to the truth. Only in reference to the human person in his “unified totality” that is, as “a soul which expresses itself in a body and a body informed by an immortal spirit,”<sup>91</sup> can the specifically human meaning of the body be grasped. Indeed, natural inclinations take on moral relevance only insofar as they refer to the human person and his authentic fulfillment, a fulfillment which for that matter can take place always and only in human nature. By rejecting all manipulations of corporeity which alter its human meaning, the Church serves man and shows him the path of true love, the only path on which he can find the true God.

50.2 The natural law thus understood does not allow for any division between freedom and nature. Indeed, these two realities are harmoniously bound together, and each is intimately linked to the other.

Veritatis Splendor

“From the beginning it was not so” (Mt 19:8)

51.1 The alleged conflict between freedom and nature also has repercussions on the interpretation of certain specific aspects of the natural law, especially its universality and immutability. “Where then are these rules written,” Saint Augustine wondered, “except in the book of that light which is called truth? From thence every just law is transcribed and transferred to the heart of the man who works justice, not by wandering but by being, as it were, impressed upon it, just as the image from the ring passes over to the wax, and yet does not leave the ring.”<sup>92</sup>

51.2 Precisely because of this “truth” the natural law involves universality. Inasmuch as it is inscribed in the rational nature of the person, it makes itself felt to all beings endowed with reason and living in history. In order to perfect himself in his specific order, the person must do good and avoid evil, be concerned for the transmission and preservation of life, refine and develop the riches of the material world, cultivate social life, seek truth, practice good and contemplate beauty.<sup>93</sup>

51.3 The separation which some have posited between the freedom of individuals and the nature which all have in common – as it emerges from certain philosophical theories which are highly influential in present-day culture – obscures the perception of the universality of the moral law on the part of reason. But inasmuch as the natural law expresses the dignity of the human person and lays the foundation for his fundamental rights and duties, it is universal in its precepts and its authority extends to all mankind. This universality does not ignore the individuality of human beings, nor is it opposed to the absolute uniqueness of each person. On the contrary, it embraces at its root each of the person’s free acts, which are meant to bear witness to the universality of the true good. By submitting to the common law, our acts build up the true communion of persons and by God’s grace, practice charity, “which binds everything together in perfect harmony” (Col 3:14). When on the contrary they disregard the law, or even are merely ignorant of it, whether culpably or not, our acts damage the communion of persons, to the detriment of each.

52.1 It is right and just, always and for everyone, to serve God, to render him the worship which is his due and to honor one’s parents as they deserve. Positive precepts such as these, which order us to perform certain actions and to cultivate certain dispositions, are universally binding; they are “unchanging.”<sup>94</sup> They unite in the same common good all people of every period of history, created for “the same divine calling and destiny.”<sup>95</sup> These universal and permanent laws correspond to things known by the practical reason and are applied to particular acts through the judgment of conscience. The acting subject personally assimilates the truth contained in the law. He appropriates this truth of his being and makes it his own by his acts and the corresponding virtues. The negative precepts of the natural law are universally valid. They oblige each and every individual, always and in every circumstance. It is a matter of prohibitions which forbid a given action semper et pro semper, without exception, because the choice of this kind of behavior is in no case compatible with the goodness of the will of the acting person, with his vocation to life with God and to communion with his neighbor. It is prohibited – to everyone and in every case – to violate these precepts. They oblige everyone, regardless of the cost, never to offend in anyone, beginning with oneself, the personal dignity common to all.

52.2 On the other hand, the fact that only the negative commandments oblige always and under all circumstances does not mean that in the moral life prohibitions are more important than the obligation to do good indicated by the positive commandments. The reason is this: the commandment of love of God and neighbor does not have in its dynamic any higher limit, but it does have a lower limit, beneath which the commandment is broken. Furthermore, what must be done in any given situation depends on the circumstances, not all of which can be foreseen; on the other hand there are kinds of behavior which can never, in any situation, be a proper response – a response which is in conformity with the dignity of the person. Finally, it is always possible that man, as the result of coercion or other circumstances, can be hindered from doing certain good actions; but he can never be hindered from not doing certain actions, especially if he is prepared to die rather than to do evil.

52.3 The Church has always taught that one may never choose kinds of behavior prohibited by the moral commandments expressed in negative form in the Old and New Testaments. As we have seen, Jesus himself reaffirms that these prohibitions allow no exceptions: “If you wish to enter into life, keep the commandments. . . . You shall not murder, You shall not commit adultery, You shall not steal, You shall not bear false witness” (Mt 19:17-18).

53.1 The great concern of our contemporaries for historicity and for culture has led some to call into question the immutability of the natural law itself, and thus the existence of “objective norms of morality”<sup>96</sup> valid for all people of the present and the future, as for those of the past. Is it ever possible, they ask, to consider as universally valid and always binding certain rational determinations established in the past, when no one knew the progress humanity would make in the future?

53.2 It must certainly be admitted that man always exists in a particular culture, but it must also be admitted that man is not exhaustively defined by that same culture. Moreover, the very progress of cultures demonstrates that there is something in man which transcends those cultures. This “something” is precisely human nature: this nature is itself the measure of culture and the condition ensuring that man does not become the prisoner of any of his cultures, but asserts his personal dignity by living in accordance with the profound truth of his being. To call into question the permanent structural elements of man which are connected with his own bodily dimension would not only conflict with common experience, but would render meaningless Jesus’ reference to the “beginning,” precisely where the social and cultural context of the time had distorted the primordial meaning and the role of certain moral norms (cf. Mt 19:1-9). This is the reason why “the Church affirms that underlying so many changes there are some things which do not change and are ultimately founded upon Christ, who is the same yesterday and today and forever.” <sup>97</sup> Christ is the “Beginning” who, having taken on human nature, definitively illumines it in its constitutive elements and in its dynamism of charity toward God and neighbor.<sup>98</sup>

53.3 Certainly there is a need to seek out and to discover the most adequate formulation for universal and permanent moral norms in the light of different cultural contexts, a formulation most capable of ceaselessly expressing their historical relevance, of making them understood and of authentically interpreting their truth. This truth of the moral law – like that of the “deposit of faith” – unfolds down the centuries: the norms expressing that truth remain valid in their substance, but must be specified and determined “eodem sensu eademque sententia”<sup>99</sup> in the light of historical circumstances by the Church’s Magisterium, whose decision is preceded and accompanied by the work of interpretation and formulation characteristic of the reason of individual believers and of theological reflection.<sup>100</sup>

<sup>100</sup> The development of the Church's moral doctrine is similar to that of the doctrine of the faith (cf. The words spoken by John XXIII at the opening of the Second Vatican Ecumenical Council can also be applied to moral doctrine: "This certain and unchanging teaching [that is, Christian doctrine in its completeness], to which the faithful owe obedience, needs to be more deeply understood and set forth in a way adapted to the needs of our time. Indeed, this deposit of the faith, the truths contained in our time-honored teaching, is one thing; the manner in which these truths are set forth (with their meaning preserved intact) is something else": AAS 54 (1962), 792; cf. L'Osservatore Romano, October 12, 1962, 2.

II. CONSCIENCE AND TRUTH

Veritatis Splendor

Man's sanctuary

54.1 The relationship between man's freedom and God's law is most deeply lived out in the "heart" of the person, in his moral conscience. As the Second Vatican Council observed: "In the depths of his conscience man detects a law which he does not impose on himself, but which holds him to obedience. Always summoning him to love good and avoid evil, the voice of this law can when necessary speak to his heart more specifically: 'do this, shun that.' For man has in his heart a law written by God. To obey it is the very dignity of man; according to it he will be judged (cf. Rom 2:14-16)." 101

54.2 The way in which one conceives the relationship between freedom and law is thus intimately bound up with one's understanding of the moral conscience. Here the cultural tendencies referred to above – in which freedom and law are set in opposition to each another and kept apart, and freedom is exalted almost to the point of idolatry – lead to a "creative" understanding of moral conscience, which diverges from the teaching of the Church's Tradition and her Magisterium.

55.1 According to the opinion of some theologians, the function of conscience had been reduced, at least at a certain period in the past, to a simple application of general moral norms to individual cases in the life of the person. But those norms, they continue, cannot be expected to foresee and to respect all the individual concrete acts of the person in all their uniqueness and particularity. While such norms might somehow be useful for a correct assessment of the situation, they cannot replace the individual personal decision on how to act in particular cases. The critique already mentioned of the traditional understanding of human nature and of its importance for the moral life has even led certain authors to state that these norms are not so much a binding objective criterion for judgments of conscience, but a general perspective which helps man tentatively to put order into his personal and social life. These authors also stress the complexity typical of the phenomenon of conscience, a complexity profoundly related to the whole sphere of psychology and the emotions, and to the numerous influences exerted by the individual's social and cultural environment. On the other hand, they give maximum attention to the value of conscience, which the Council itself defined as "the sanctuary of man, where he is alone with God whose voice echoes within him." 102 This voice, it is said, leads man not so much to a meticulous observance of universal norms as to a creative and responsible acceptance of the personal tasks entrusted to him by God.

55.2 In their desire to emphasize the "creative" character of conscience, certain authors no longer call its actions "judgments" but "decisions": only by making these decisions “autonomously” would man be able to attain moral maturity. Some even hold that this process of maturing is inhibited by the excessively categorical position adopted by the Church’s Magisterium in many moral questions; for them, the Church’s interventions are the cause of unnecessary conflicts of conscience.

56.1 In order to justify these positions, some authors have proposed a kind of double status of moral truth. Beyond the doctrinal and abstract level, one would have to acknowledge the priority of a certain more concrete existential consideration. The latter, by taking account of circumstances and the situation, could legitimately be the basis of certain exceptions to the general rule and thus permit one to do in practice and in good conscience what is qualified as intrinsically evil by the moral law. A separation, or even an opposition, is thus established in some cases between the teaching of the precept, which is valid in general, and the norm of the individual conscience, which would in fact make the final decision about what is good and what is evil. On this basis, an attempt is made to legitimize so-called “pastoral” solutions contrary to the teaching of the Magisterium, and to justify a “creative” hermeneutic according to which the moral conscience is in no way obliged, in every case, by a particular negative precept.

56.2 No one can fail to realize that these approaches pose a challenge to the very identity of the moral conscience in relation to human freedom and God’s law. Only the clarification made earlier with regard to the relationship, based on truth, between freedom and law makes possible a discernment concerning this “creative” understanding of conscience.

The judgment of conscience

57.1 The text of the Letter to the Romans which has helped us to grasp the essence of the natural law also indicates the biblical understanding of conscience, especially in its specific connection with the law: “When Gentiles who have not the law do by nature what the law requires, they are a law unto themselves, even though they do not have the law. They show that what the law requires is written on their hearts, while their conscience also bears witness and their conflicting thoughts accuse or perhaps excuse them” (Rom 2:14-15).

57.2 According to Saint Paul, conscience in a certain sense confronts man with the law, and thus becomes a “witness” for man: a witness of his own faithfulness or unfaithfulness with regard to the law, of his essential moral rectitude or iniquity. Conscience is the only witness, since what takes place in the heart of the person is hidden from the eyes of everyone outside. Conscience makes its witness known only to the person himself. And, in turn, only the person himself knows what his own response is to the voice of conscience.

58 The importance of this interior dialogue of man with himself can never be adequately appreciated. But it is also a dialogue of man with God, the author of the law, the primordial image and final end of man. Saint Bonaventure teaches that “conscience is like God’s herald and messenger; it does not command things on its own authority, but commands them as coming from God’s authority, like a herald when he proclaims the edict of the king. This is why conscience has binding force.”<sup>103</sup> Thus it can be said that conscience bears witness to man’s own rectitude or iniquity to man himself but, together with this and indeed even beforehand, conscience is the witness of God himself, whose voice and judgment penetrate the depths of man’s soul, calling him fortiter et suaviter to obedience. “Moral conscience does not close man within an insurmountable and impenetrable solitude, but opens him to the call, to the voice of God. In this, and not in anything else, lies the entire mystery and the dignity of the moral conscience: in being the place, the sacred place where God speaks to man.”<sup>104</sup>

59.1 Saint Paul does not merely acknowledge that conscience acts as a “witness”; he also reveals the way in which conscience performs that function. He speaks of “conflicting thoughts” which accuse or excuse the Gentiles with regard to their behavior (cf. Rom 2:15). The term “conflicting thoughts” clarifies the precise nature of conscience: it is a moral judgment about man and his actions, a judgment either of acquittal or of condemnation, according as human acts are in conformity or not with the law of God written on the heart. In the same text the Apostle clearly speaks of the judgment of actions, the judgment of their author and the moment when that judgment will be definitively rendered: “(This will take place) on that day when, according to my Gospel, God judges the secrets of men by Christ Jesus” (Rom 2:16).

59.2 The judgment of conscience is a practical judgment, a judgment which makes known what man must do or not do, or which assesses an act already performed by him. It is a judgment which applies to a concrete situation the rational conviction that one must love and do good and avoid evil. This first principle of practical reason is part of the natural law, indeed it constitutes the very foundation of the natural law, inasmuch as it expresses that primordial insight about good and evil, that reflection of God’s creative wisdom which, like an imperishable spark (scintilla animae), shines in the heart of every man. But whereas the natural law discloses the objective and universal demands of the moral good, conscience is the application of the law to a particular case; this application of the law thus becomes an inner dictate for the individual, a summons to do what is good in this particular situation. Conscience thus formulates moral obligation in the light of the natural law: it is the obligation to do what the individual, through the workings of his conscience, knows to be a good he is called to do here and now. The universality of the law and its obligation are acknowledged, not suppressed, once reason has established the law’s application in concrete present circumstances. The judgment of conscience states “in an ultimate way” whether a certain particular kind of behavior is in conformity with the law; it formulates the proximate norm of the morality of a voluntary act, “applying the objective law to a particular case.”105

60 Like the natural law itself and all practical knowledge, the judgment of conscience also has an imperative character: man must act in accordance with it. If man acts against this judgment or, in a case where he lacks certainty about the rightness and goodness of a determined act, still performs that act, he stands condemned by his own conscience, the proximate norm of personal morality. The dignity of this rational forum and the authority of its voice and judgments derive from the truth about moral good and evil, which it is called to listen to and to express. This truth is indicated by the “divine law,” the universal and objective norm of morality. The judgment of conscience does not establish the law; rather it bears witness to the authority of the natural law and of the practical reason with reference to the supreme good, whose attractiveness the human person perceives and whose commandments he accepts. “Conscience is not an independent and exclusive capacity to decide what is good and what is evil. Rather there is profoundly imprinted upon it a principle of obedience vis-à-vis the objective norm which establishes and conditions the correspondence of its decisions with the commands and prohibitions which are at the basis of human behavior.”<sup>106</sup>

61.1 The truth about moral good, as that truth is declared in the law of reason, is practically and concretely recognized by the judgment of conscience, which leads one to take responsibility for the good or the evil one has done. If man does evil, the just judgment of his conscience remains within him as a witness to the universal truth of the good, as well as to the malice of his particular choice. But the verdict of conscience remains in him also as a pledge of hope and mercy: while bearing witness to the evil he has done, it also reminds him of his need, with the help of God’s grace, to ask forgiveness, to do good and to cultivate virtue constantly.

61.2 Consequently in the practical judgment of conscience, which imposes on the person the obligation to perform a given act, the link between freedom and truth is made manifest. Precisely for this reason conscience expresses itself in acts of “judgment” which reflect the truth about the good, and not in arbitrary “decisions.” The maturity and responsibility of these judgments – and, when all is said and done, of the individual who is their subject – are not measured by the liberation of the conscience from objective truth, in favor of an alleged autonomy in personal decisions, but, on the contrary, by an insistent search for truth and by allowing oneself to be guided by that truth in one’s actions.

Seeking what is true and good

62.1 Conscience, as the judgment of an act, is not exempt from the possibility of error. As the Council puts it, “not infrequently conscience can be mistaken as a result of invincible ignorance, although it does not on that account forfeit its dignity; but this cannot be said when a man shows little concern for seeking what is true and good, and conscience gradually becomes almost blind from being accustomed to sin.”<sup>107</sup> In these brief words the Council sums up the doctrine which the Church down the centuries has developed with regard to the erroneous conscience.

62.2 Certainly, in order to have a “good conscience” (1 Tim 1:5), man must seek the truth and must make judgments in accordance with that same truth. As the Apostle Paul says, the conscience must be “confirmed by the Holy Spirit” (cf. Rom 9:1); it must be “clear” (2 Tim 1:3); it must not “practice cunning and tamper with God’s word,” but “openly state the truth” (cf. 2 Cor 4:2). On the other hand, the Apostle also warns Christians: “Do not be conformed to this world but be transformed by the renewal of your mind, that you may prove what is the will of God, what is good and acceptable and perfect” (Rom 12:2).

62.3 Paul’s admonition urges us to be watchful, warning us that in the judgments of our conscience the possibility of error is always present. Conscience is not an infallible judge; it can make mistakes. However, error of conscience can be the result of an invincible ignorance, an ignorance of which the subject is not aware and which he is unable to overcome by himself.

62.4 The Council reminds us that in cases where such invincible ignorance is not culpable, conscience does not lose its dignity, because even when it directs us to act in a way not in conformity with the objective moral order, it continues to speak in the name of that truth about the good which the subject is called to seek sincerely.

63.1 In any event, it is always from the truth that the dignity of conscience derives. In the case of the correct conscience, it is a question of the objective truth received by man; in the case of the erroneous conscience, it is a question of what man, mistakenly, subjectively considers to be true. It is never acceptable to confuse a “subjective” error about moral good with the “objective” truth rationally proposed to man in virtue of his end, or to make the moral value of an act performed with a true and correct conscience equivalent to the moral value of an act performed by following the judgment of an erroneous conscience.<sup>108</sup> It is possible that the evil done as the result of invincible ignorance or a non-culpable error of judgment may not be imputable to the agent; but even in this case it does not cease to be an evil, a disorder in relation to the truth about the good. Furthermore, a good act which is not recognized as such does not contribute to the moral growth of the person who performs it; it does not perfect him and it does not help to dispose him for the supreme good. Thus, before feeling easily justified in the name of our conscience, we should reflect on the words of the Psalm: “Who can discern his errors? Clear me from hidden faults” (Ps 19:12). There are faults which we fail to see but which nevertheless remain faults, because we have refused to walk toward the light (cf. Jn 9:39-41).

63.2 Conscience, as the ultimate concrete judgment, compromises its dignity when it is culpably erroneous, that is to say, “when man shows little concern for seeking what is true and good, and conscience gradually becomes almost blind from being accustomed to sin.”<sup>109</sup> Jesus alludes to the danger of the conscience being deformed when he warns: “The eye is the lamp of the body. So if your eye is sound, your whole body will be full of light; but if your eye is not sound, your whole body will be full of darkness. If then the light in you is darkness, how great is the darkness!” (Mt 6:22-23).

64.1 The words of Jesus just quoted also represent a call to form our conscience, to make it the object of a continuous conversion to what is true and to what is good. In the same vein, Saint Paul exhorts us not to be conformed to the mentality of this world, but to be transformed by the renewal of our mind (cf. Rom 12:2). It is the “heart” converted to the Lord and to the love of what is good which is really the source of true judgments of conscience. Indeed, in order to “prove what is the will of God, what is good and acceptable and perfect” (Rom 12:2), knowledge of God’s law in general is certainly necessary, but it is not sufficient: what is essential is a sort of “connaturality” between man and the true good.<sup>110</sup> Such a connaturality is rooted in and develops through the virtuous attitudes of the individual himself: prudence and the other cardinal virtues, and even before these the theological virtues of faith, hope and charity. This is the meaning of Jesus’ saying: “He who does what is true comes to the light” (Jn 3:21).

64.2 Christians have a great help for the formation of conscience in the Church and her Magisterium. As the Council affirms: “In forming their consciences the Christian faithful must give careful attention to the sacred and certain teaching of the Church. For the Catholic Church is by the will of Christ the teacher of truth. Her charge is to announce and teach authentically that truth which is Christ, and at the same time with her authority to declare and confirm the principles of the moral order which derive from human nature itself.”<sup>111</sup> It follows that the authority of the Church, when she pronounces on moral questions, in no way undermines the freedom of conscience of Christians. This is so not only because freedom of conscience is never freedom “from” the truth but always and only freedom “in” the truth, but also because the Magisterium does not bring to the Christian conscience truths which are extraneous to it; rather it brings to light the truths which it ought already to possess, developing them from the starting point of the primordial act of faith. The Church puts herself always and only at the service of conscience, helping it to avoid being tossed to and fro by every wind of doctrine proposed by human deceit (cf. Eph 4:14), and helping it not to swerve from the truth about the good of man, but rather, especially in more difficult questions, to attain the truth with certainty and to abide in it.

Veritatis Splendor

III. Fundamental choice and specific kinds of behavior

Veritatis Splendor

“Only do not use your freedom as an opportunity for the flesh” (Gal 5:13)

65.1 The heightened concern for freedom in our own day has led many students of the behavioral and the theological sciences to develop a more penetrating analysis of its nature and of its dynamics. It has been rightly pointed out that freedom is not only the choice for one or another particular action; it is also, within that choice, a decision about oneself and a setting of one’s own life for or against the Good, for or against the Truth, and ultimately for or against God. Emphasis has rightly been placed on the importance of certain choices which “shape” a person’s entire moral life, and which serve as bounds within which other particular everyday choices can be situated and allowed to develop.

65.2 Some authors, however, have proposed an even more radical revision of the relationship between person and acts. They speak of a “fundamental freedom,” deeper than and different from freedom of choice, which needs to be considered if human actions are to be correctly understood and evaluated. According to these authors, the key role in the moral life is to be attributed to a “fundamental option,” brought about by that fundamental freedom whereby the person makes an overall self-determination, not through a specific and conscious decision on the level of reflection, but in a “transcendental” and “athematic” way. Particular acts which flow from this option would constitute only partial and never definitive attempts to give it expression; they would only be its “signs” or symptoms. The immediate object of such acts would not be absolute Good (before which the freedom of the person would be expressed on a transcendental level), but particular (also termed “categorical”) goods. In the opinion of some theologians, none of these goods, which by their nature are partial, could determine the freedom of man as a person in his totality, even though it is only by bringing them about or refusing to do so that man is able to express his own fundamental option.

65.3 A distinction thus comes to be introduced between the fundamental option and deliberate choices of a concrete kind of behavior. In some authors this division tends to become a separation, when they expressly limit moral “good” and “evil” to the transcendental dimension proper to the fundamental option, and describe as “right” or “wrong” the choices of particular “inner-worldly” kinds of behavior: those, in other words, concerning man’s relationship with himself, with others and with the material world. There thus appears to be established within human acting a clear disjunction between two levels of morality: on the one hand the order of good and evil, which is dependent on the will, and on the other hand specific kinds of behavior, which are judged to be morally right or wrong only on the basis of a technical calculation of the proportion between the “pre-moral” or “physical” goods and evils which actually result from the action. This is pushed to the point where a concrete kind of behavior, even one freely chosen, comes to be considered as a merely physical process, and not according to the criteria proper to a human act. The conclusion to which this eventually leads is that the properly moral assessment of the person is reserved to his fundamental option, prescindin in whole or in part from his choice of particular actions, of concrete kinds of behavior.

66.1 There is no doubt that Christian moral teaching, even in its biblical roots, acknowledges the specific importance of a fundamental choice which qualifies the moral life and engages freedom on a radical level before God. It is a question of the decision of faith, of the obedience of faith (cf. Rom 16:26) “by which man makes a total and free self-commitment to God, offering ‘the full submission of intellect and will to God as he reveals.’ ”<sup>112</sup> This faith, which works through love (cf. Gal 5:6), comes from the core of man, from his “heart” (cf. Rom 10:10), whence it is called to bear fruit in works (cf. Mt 12:33-35; Lk 6:43-45; Rom 8:5-10; Gal 5:22). In the Decalogue, one finds, as an introduction to the various commandments, the basic clause: “I am the Lord your God. . .” (Ex 20:2), which, by impressing upon the numerous and varied particular prescriptions their primordial meaning, gives the morality of the Covenant its aspect of completeness, unity and profundity. Israel’s fundamental decision, then, is about the fundamental commandment (cf. Jos 24:14-25; Ex 19:3-8; Mic 6:8). The morality of the New Covenant is similarly dominated by the fundamental call of Jesus to follow him – thus he also says to the young man: “If you wish to be perfect . . . then come, follow me” (Mt 19:21); to this call the disciple must respond with a radical decision and choice. The Gospel parables of the treasure and the pearl of great price, for which one sells all one’s possessions, are eloquent and effective images of the radical and unconditional nature of the decision demanded by the Kingdom of God. The radical nature of the decision to follow Jesus is admirably expressed in his own words: “Whoever would save his life will lose it; and whoever loses his life for my sake and the Gospel’s will save it” (Mk 8:35).

66.2 Jesus’ call to “come, follow me” marks the greatest possible exaltation of human freedom, yet at the same time it witnesses to the truth and to the obligation of acts of faith and of decisions which can be described as involving a fundamental option. We find a similar exaltation of human freedom in the words of Saint Paul: “You were called to freedom, brethren” (Gal 5:13). But the Apostle immediately adds a grave warning: “Only do not use your freedom as an opportunity for the flesh.” This warning echoes his earlier words: “For freedom Christ has set us free; stand fast therefore, and do not submit again to a yoke of slavery” (Gal 5:1). Paul encourages us to be watchful, because freedom is always threatened by slavery. And this is precisely the case when an act of faith – in the sense of a fundamental option – becomes separated from the choice of particular acts, as in the tendencies mentioned above.

67.1 These tendencies are therefore contrary to the teaching of Scripture itself, which sees the fundamental option as a genuine choice of freedom and links that choice profoundly to particular acts. By his fundamental choice, man is capable of giving his life direction and of progressing, with the help of grace, toward his end, following God’s call. But this capacity is actually exercised in the particular choices of specific actions, through which man deliberately conforms himself to God’s will, wisdom and law. It thus needs to be stated that the so-called fundamental option, to the extent that it is distinct from a generic intention and hence one not yet determined in such a way that freedom is obligated, is always brought into play through conscious and free decisions. Precisely for this reason, it is revoked when man engages his freedom in conscious decisions to the contrary, with regard to morally grave matter.

67.2 To separate the fundamental option from concrete kinds of behavior means to contradict the substantial integrity or personal unity of the moral agent in his body and in his soul. A fundamental option understood without explicit consideration of the potentialities which it puts into effect and the determinations which express it does not do justice to the rational finality immanent in man’s acting and in each of his deliberate decisions. In point of fact, the morality of human acts is not deduced only from one’s intention, orientation or fundamental option, understood as an intention devoid of a clearly determined binding content or as an intention with no corresponding positive effort to fulfill the different obligations of the moral life. Judgments about morality cannot be made without taking into consideration whether or not the deliberate choice of a specific kind of behavior is in conformity with the dignity and integral vocation of the human person. Every choice always implies a reference by the deliberate will to the goods and evils indicated by the natural law as goods to be pursued and evils to be avoided. In the case of the positive moral precepts, prudence always has the task of verifying that they apply in a specific situation, for example, in view of other duties which may be more important or urgent. But the negative moral precepts, those prohibiting certain concrete actions or kinds of behavior as intrinsically evil, do not allow for any legitimate exception. They do not leave room, in any morally acceptable way, for the “creativity” of any contrary determination whatsoever. Once the moral species of an action prohibited by a universal rule is concretely recognized, the only morally good act is that of obeying the moral law and of refraining from the action which it forbids.

68.1 Here an important pastoral consideration must be added. According to the logic of the positions mentioned above, an individual could, by virtue of a fundamental option, remain faithful to God independently of whether or not certain of his choices and his acts are in conformity with specific moral norms or rules. By virtue of a primordial option for charity, that individual could continue to be morally good, persevere in God's grace and attain salvation, even if certain of his specific kinds of behavior were deliberately and gravely contrary to God's commandments as set forth by the Church.

68.2 In point of fact, man does not suffer perdition only by being unfaithful to that fundamental option whereby he has made "a free self-commitment to God."<sup>113</sup> With every freely committed mortal sin, he offends God as the giver of the law and as a result becomes guilty with regard to the entire law (cf. Jas 2:8-11); even if he perseveres in faith, he loses "sanctifying grace," "charity" and "eternal happiness."<sup>114</sup> As the Council of Trent teaches, "the grace of justification once received is lost not only by apostasy, by which faith itself is lost, but also by any other mortal sin."<sup>115</sup>

Mortal and venial sin

69 As we have just seen, reflection on the fundamental option has also led some theologians to undertake a basic revision of the traditional distinction between mortal sins and venial sins. They insist that the opposition to God's law which causes the loss of sanctifying grace – and eternal damnation, when one dies in such a state of sin – could only be the result of an act which engages the person in his totality: in other words, an act of fundamental option. According to these theologians, mortal sin, which separates man from God, only exists in the rejection of God, carried out at a level of freedom which is neither to be identified with an act of choice nor capable of becoming the object of conscious awareness. Consequently, they go on to say, it is difficult, at least psychologically, to accept the fact that a Christian, who wishes to remain united to Jesus Christ and to his Church, could so easily and repeatedly commit mortal sins, as the “matter” itself of his actions would sometimes indicate. Likewise, it would be hard to accept that man is able, in a brief lapse of time, to sever radically the bond of communion with God and afterwards be converted to him by sincere repentance. The gravity of sin, they maintain, ought to be measured by the degree of engagement of the freedom of the person performing an act, rather than by the matter of that act.

70.1 The Post-Synodal Apostolic Exhortation Reconciliatio et Paenitentia reaffirmed the importance and permanent validity of the distinction between mortal and venial sins, in accordance with the Church's Tradition. And the 1983 Synod of Bishops, from which that Exhortation emerged, “not only reaffirmed the teaching of the Council of Trent concerning the existence and nature of mortal and venial sins, but it also recalled that mortal sin is sin whose object is grave matter and which is also committed with full knowledge and deliberate consent.”<sup>116</sup>

70.2 The statement of the Council of Trent does not only consider the “grave matter” of mortal sin; it also recalls that its necessary condition is “full awareness and deliberate consent.” In any event, both in moral theology and in pastoral practice one is familiar with cases in which an act which is grave by reason of its matter does not constitute a mortal sin because of a lack of full awareness or deliberate consent on the part of the person performing it. Even so, “care will have to be taken not to reduce mortal sin to an act of ‘fundamental option’ – as is commonly said today – against God,” seen either as an explicit and formal rejection of God and neighbor or as an implicit and unconscious rejection of love. “For mortal sin exists also when a person knowingly and willingly, for whatever reason, chooses something gravely disordered. In fact, such a choice already includes contempt for the divine law, a rejection of God's love for humanity and the whole of creation: the person turns away from God and loses charity. Consequently, the fundamental orientation can be radically changed by particular acts. Clearly situations can occur which are very complex and obscure from a psychological viewpoint, and which influence the sinner's subjective imputability. But from a consideration of the psychological sphere one cannot proceed to create a theological category, which is precisely what the 'fundamental option' is, understanding it in such a way that it objectively changes or casts doubt upon the traditional concept of mortal sin."<sup>117</sup>

70.3 The separation of fundamental option from deliberate choices of particular kinds of behavior, disordered in themselves or in their circumstances, which would not engage that option, thus involves a denial of Catholic doctrine on mortal sin: "With the whole Tradition of the Church, we call mortal sin the act by which man freely and consciously rejects God, his law, the covenant of love that God offers, preferring to turn in on himself or to some created and finite reality, something contrary to the divine will (conversio ad creaturam). This can occur in a direct and formal way, in the sins of idolatry, apostasy and atheism; or in an equivalent way, as in every act of disobedience to God's commandments in a grave matter."<sup>118</sup>

IV. THE MORAL ACT

Veritatis Splendor

Teleology and teleologism

71.1 The relationship between man's freedom and God's law, which has its intimate and living center in the moral conscience, is manifested and realized in human acts. It is precisely through his acts that man attains perfection as man, as one who is called to seek his Creator of his own accord and freely to arrive at full and blessed perfection by cleaving to him.<sup>119</sup>

71.2 Human acts are moral acts because they express and determine the goodness or evil of the individual who performs them.<sup>120</sup> They do not produce a change merely in the state of affairs outside of man but, to the extent that they are deliberate choices, they give moral definition to the very person who performs them, determining his profound spiritual traits. This was perceptively noted by Saint Gregory of Nyssa: "All things subject to change and to becoming never remain constant, but continually pass from one state to another, for better or worse. . . . Now, human life is always subject to change; it needs to be born ever anew . . . but here birth does not come about by a foreign intervention, as is the case with bodily beings. . . ; it is the result of a free choice. Thus we are in a certain way our own parents, creating ourselves as we will, by our decisions."<sup>121</sup>

72.1 The morality of acts is defined by the relationship of man's freedom with the authentic good. This good is established, as the eternal law, by divine wisdom which orders every being toward its end: this eternal law is known both by man's natural reason (hence it is "natural law"), and – in an integral and perfect way – by God's supernatural revelation (hence it is called divine law). Acting is morally good when the choices of freedom are in conformity with man's true good and thus express the voluntary ordering of the person toward his ultimate end: God himself, the supreme good in whom man finds his full and perfect happiness. The first question in the young man's conversation with Jesus: "What good must I do to have eternal life?" (Mt 19:6) immediately brings out the essential connection between the moral value of an act and man's final end. Jesus, in his reply, confirms the young man's conviction: the performance of good acts, commanded by the One who "alone is good," constitutes the indispensable condition of and path to eternal blessedness: "If you wish to enter into life, keep the commandments" (Mt 19:17). Jesus' answer and his reference to the commandments also make it clear that the path to that end is marked by respect for the divine laws which safeguard human good. Only the act in conformity with the good can be a path that leads to life.

72.2 The rational ordering of the human act to the good in its truth and the voluntary pursuit of that good, known by reason, constitute morality. Hence human activity cannot be judged as morally good merely because it is a means for attaining one or another of its goals, or simply because the subject's intention is good.<sup>122</sup> Activity is morally good when it attests to and expresses the voluntary ordering of the person to his ultimate end and the conformity of a concrete action with the human good as it is acknowledged in its truth by reason. If the object of the concrete action is not in harmony with the true good of the person, the choice of that action makes our will and ourselves morally evil, thus putting us in conflict with our ultimate end, the supreme good, God himself.

73.1 The Christian, thanks to God's revelation and to faith, is aware of the "newness" which characterizes the morality of his actions: these actions are called to show either consistency or inconsistency with that dignity and vocation which have been bestowed on him by grace. In Jesus Christ and in his Spirit, the Christian is a "new creation," a child of God; by his actions he shows his likeness or unlikeness to the image of the Son who is the first-born among many brethren (cf. Rom 8:29), he lives out his fidelity or infidelity to the gift of the Spirit, and he opens or closes himself to eternal life, to the communion of vision, love and happiness with God the Father, Son and Holy Spirit.<sup>123</sup> As Saint Cyril of Alexandria writes, Christ "forms us according to his image, in such a way that the traits of his divine nature shine forth in us through sanctification and justice and the life which is good and in conformity with virtue. . . . The beauty of this image shines forth in us who are in Christ, when we show ourselves to be good in our works."<sup>124</sup>

73.2 Consequently the moral life has an essential "teleological" character, since it consists in the deliberate ordering of human acts to God, the supreme good and ultimate end (telos) of man. This is attested to once more by the question posed by the young man to Jesus: "What good must I do to have eternal life?" But this ordering to one's ultimate end is not something subjective, dependent solely upon one's intention. It presupposes that such acts are in themselves capable of being ordered to this end, insofar as they are in conformity with the authentic moral good of man, safeguarded by the commandments. This is what Jesus himself points out in his reply to the young man: "If you wish to enter into life, keep the commandments" (Mt 19:17).

73.3 Clearly such an ordering must be rational and free, conscious and deliberate, by virtue of which man is "responsible" for his actions and subject to the judgment of God, the just and good judge who, as the Apostle Paul reminds us, rewards good and punishes evil: "We must all appear before the judgment seat of Christ, so that each one may receive good or evil, according to what he has done in the body" (2 Cor 5:10).

74.1 But on what does the moral assessment of man's free acts depend? What is it that ensures this ordering of human acts to God? Is it the intention of the acting subject, the circumstances – and in particular the consequences – of his action, or the object itself of his act?

74.2 This is what is traditionally called the problem of the “sources of morality.” Precisely with regard to this problem there have emerged in the last few decades new or newly-revived theological and cultural trends which call for careful discernment on the part of the Church’s Magisterium.

74.3 Certain ethical theories, called “teleological,” claim to be concerned for the conformity of human acts with the ends pursued by the agent and with the values intended by him. The criteria for evaluating the moral rightness of an action are drawn from the weighing of the non-moral or pre-moral goods to be gained and the corresponding non-moral or pre-moral values to be respected. For some, concrete behavior would be right or wrong according as whether or not it is capable of producing a better state of affairs for all concerned. Right conduct would be the one capable of “maximizing” goods and “minimizing” evils.

74.4 Many of the Catholic moralists who follow in this direction seek to distance themselves from utilitarianism and pragmatism, where the morality of human acts would be judged without any reference to the man’s true ultimate end. They rightly recognize the need to find ever more consistent rational arguments in order to justify the requirements and to provide a foundation for the norms of the moral life. This kind of investigation is legitimate and necessary, since the moral order, as established by the natural law, is in principle accessible to human reason. Furthermore, such investigation is well-suited to meeting the demands of dialogue and cooperation with non-Catholics and non-believers, especially in pluralistic societies.

75.1 But as part of the effort to work out such a rational morality (for this reason it is sometimes called an “autonomous morality”) there exist false solutions, linked in particular to an inadequate understanding of the object of moral action. Some authors do not take into sufficient consideration the fact that the will is involved in the concrete choices which it makes: these choices are a condition of its moral goodness and its being ordered to the ultimate end of the person. Others are inspired by a notion of freedom which prescind from the actual conditions of its exercise, from its objective reference to the truth about the good, and from its determination through choices of concrete kinds of behavior. According to these theories, free will would neither be morally subjected to specific obligations nor shaped by its choices, while nonetheless still remaining responsible for its own acts and for their consequences. This “teleologism,” as a method for discovering the moral norm, can thus be called – according to terminology and approaches imported from different currents of thought –

“consequentialism” or “proportionatism.” The former claims to draw the criteria of the rightness of a given way of acting solely from a calculation of foreseeable consequences deriving from a given choice. The latter, by weighing the various values and goods being sought, focuses rather on the proportion acknowledged between the good and bad effects of that choice, with a view to the “greater good” or “lesser evil” actually possible in a particular situation.

75.2 The teleological ethical theories (proportionatism, consequentialism), while acknowledging that moral values are indicated by reason and by revelation, maintain that it is never possible to formulate an absolute prohibition of particular kinds of behavior which would be in conflict, in every circumstance and in every culture, with those values. The acting subject would indeed be responsible for attaining the values pursued, but in two ways: the values or goods involved in a human act would be, from one viewpoint, of the moral order (in relation to properly moral values, such as love of God and neighbor, justice, etc.) and, from another viewpoint, of the pre-moral order, which some term non-moral, physical or ontic (in relation to the advantages and disadvantages accruing both to the agent and to all other persons possibly involved, such as, for example, health or its endangerment, physical integrity, life, death, loss of material goods, etc.). In a world where goodness is always mixed with evil, and every good effect linked to other evil effects, the morality of an act would be judged in two different ways: its moral “goodness” would be judged on the basis of the subject’s intention in reference to moral goods, and its “rightness” on the basis of a consideration of its foreseeable effects or consequences and of their proportion. Consequently, concrete kinds of behavior could be described as “right” or “wrong,” without it being thereby possible to judge as morally “good” or “bad” the will of the person choosing them. In this way, an act which, by contradicting a universal negative norm, directly violates goods considered as “pre-moral” could be qualified as morally acceptable if the intention of the subject is focused, in accordance with a “responsible” assessment of the goods involved in the concrete action, on the moral value judged to be decisive in the situation.

75.3 The evaluation of the consequences of the action, based on the proportion between the act and its effects and between the effects themselves, would regard only the pre-moral order. The moral specificity of acts, that is their goodness or evil, would be determined exclusively by the faithfulness of the person to the highest values of charity and prudence, without this faithfulness necessarily being incompatible with choices contrary to certain particular moral precepts. Even when grave matter is concerned, these precepts should be considered as operative norms which are always relative and open to exceptions.

75.4 In this view, deliberate consent to certain kinds of behavior declared illicit by traditional moral theology would not imply an objective moral evil.

Veritatis Splendor

The object of the deliberate act

76.1 These theories can gain a certain persuasive force from their affinity to the scientific mentality, which is rightly concerned with ordering technical and economic activities on the basis of a calculation of resources and profits, procedures and their effects. They seek to provide liberation from the constraints of a voluntaristic and arbitrary morality of obligation which would ultimately be dehumanizing.

76.2 Such theories however are not faithful to the Church's teaching, when they believe they can justify, as morally good, deliberate choices of kinds of behavior contrary to the commandments of the divine and natural law. These theories cannot claim to be grounded in the Catholic moral tradition. Although the latter did witness the development of a casuistry which tried to assess the best ways to achieve the good in certain concrete situations, it is nonetheless true that this casuistry concerned only cases in which the law was uncertain, and thus the absolute validity of negative moral precepts, which oblige without exception, was not called into question. The faithful are obliged to acknowledge and respect the specific moral precepts declared and taught by the Church in the name of God, the Creator and Lord.<sup>125</sup> When the Apostle Paul sums up the fulfillment of the law in the precept of love of neighbor as oneself (cf. Rom 13:8-10), he is not weakening the commandments but reinforcing them, since he is revealing their requirements and their gravity. Love of God and of one's neighbor cannot be separated from the observance of the commandments of the Covenant renewed in the blood of Jesus Christ and in the gift of the Spirit. It is an honor characteristic of Christians to obey God rather than men (cf. Acts 4:19, 5:29) and to accept even martyrdom as a consequence, like the holy men and women of the Old and New Testaments, who are considered such because they gave their lives rather than perform this or that particular act contrary to faith or virtue.

77.1 In order to offer rational criteria for a right moral decision, the theories mentioned above take account of the intention and consequences of human action. Certainly there is need to take into account both the intention – as Jesus forcefully insisted in clear disagreement with the scribes and Pharisees, who prescribed in great detail certain outward practices without paying attention to the heart (cf. Mk 7:20-21; Mt 15:19) – and the goods obtained and the evils avoided as a result of a particular act. Responsibility demands as much. But the consideration of these consequences, and also of intentions, is not sufficient for judging the moral quality of a concrete choice. The weighing of the goods and evils foreseeable as the consequence of an action is not an adequate method for determining whether the choice of that concrete kind of behavior is “according to its species,” or “in itself,” morally good or bad, licit or illicit. The foreseeable consequences are part of those circumstances of the act, which, while capable of lessening the gravity of an evil act, nonetheless cannot alter its moral species.

77.2 Moreover, everyone recognizes the difficulty, or rather the impossibility, of evaluating all the good and evil consequences and effects – defined as pre-moral – of one’s own acts: an exhaustive rational calculation is not possible. How then can one go about establishing proportions which depend on a measuring, the criteria of which remain obscure? How could an absolute obligation be justified on the basis of such debatable calculations?

78.1 The morality of the human act depends primarily and fundamentally on the “object” rationally chosen by the deliberate will, as is borne out by the insightful analysis, still valid today, made by Saint Thomas.<sup>126</sup> In order to be able to grasp the object of an act which specifies that act morally, it is therefore necessary to place oneself in the perspective of the acting person. The object of the act of willing is in fact a freely chosen kind of behavior. To the extent that it is in conformity with the order of reason, it is the cause of the goodness of the will; it perfects us morally, and disposes us to recognize our ultimate end in the perfect good, primordial love. By the object of a given moral act, then, one cannot mean a process or an event of the merely physical order, to be assessed on the basis of its ability to bring about a given state of affairs in the outside world. Rather, that object is the proximate end of a deliberate decision which determines the act of willing on the part of the acting person. Consequently, as the Catechism of the Catholic Church teaches, “there are certain specific kinds of behavior that are always wrong to choose, because choosing them involves a disorder of the will, that is, a moral evil.”<sup>127</sup> And Saint Thomas observes that “it often happens that man acts with a good intention, but without spiritual gain, because he lacks a good will. Let us say that someone robs in order to feed the poor: in this case, even though the intention is good, the uprightness of the will is lacking. Consequently, no evil done with a good intention can be excused. ‘There are those who say: And why not do evil that good may come? Their condemnation is just’ (Rom 3:8).”<sup>128</sup>

78.2 The reason why a good intention is not itself sufficient, but a correct choice of actions is also needed, is that the human act depends on its object, whether that object is capable or not of being ordered to God, to the One who “alone is good,” and thus brings about the perfection of the person. An act is therefore good if its object is in conformity with the good of the person with respect for the goods morally relevant for him. Christian ethics, which pays particular attention to the moral object, does not refuse to consider the inner “teleology” of acting, inasmuch as it is directed to promoting the true good of the person; but it recognizes that it is really pursued only when the essential elements of human nature are respected. The human act, good according to its object, is also capable of being ordered to its ultimate end. That same act then attains its ultimate and decisive perfection when the will actually does order it to God through charity. As the Patron of moral theologians and confessors teaches: “It is not enough to do good works; they need to be done well. For our works to be good and perfect, they must be done for the sole purpose of pleasing God.”<sup>129</sup>

Veritatis Splendor

“Intrinsic evil”: it is not licit to do evil that good may come of it (cf. Rom 3:8)

79.1 One must therefore reject the thesis, characteristic of teleological and proportionalist theories, which holds that it is impossible to qualify as morally evil according to its species – its “object” – the deliberate choice of certain kinds of behavior or specific acts, apart from a consideration of the intention for which the choice is made or the totality of the foreseeable consequences of that act for all persons concerned.

79.2 The primary and decisive element for moral judgment is the object of the human act, which establishes whether it is capable of being ordered to the good and to the ultimate end, which is God. This capability is grasped by reason in the very being of man, considered in his integral truth, and therefore in his natural inclinations, his motivations and his finalities, which always have a spiritual dimension as well. It is precisely these which are the contents of the natural law and hence that ordered complex of “personal goods” which serve the “good of the person”: the good which is the person himself and his perfection. These are the goods safeguarded by the commandments, which, according to Saint Thomas, contain the whole natural law.130

80.1 Reason attests that there are objects of the human act which are by their nature “incapable of being ordered” to God, because they radically contradict the good of the person made in his image. These are the acts which, in the Church’s moral tradition, have been termed “intrinsically evil” (intrinsece malum): they are such always and per se, in other words, on account of their very object, and quite apart from the ulterior intentions of the one acting and the circumstances. Consequently, without in the least denying the influence on morality exercised by circumstances and especially by intentions, the Church teaches that “there exist acts which per se and in themselves, independently of circumstances, are always seriously wrong by reason of their object.”131 The Second Vatican Council itself, in discussing the respect due to the human person, gives a number of examples of such acts: “Whatever is hostile to life itself, such as any kind of homicide, genocide, abortion, euthanasia and voluntary suicide; whatever violates the integrity of the human person, such as mutilation, physical and mental torture and attempts to coerce the spirit; whatever is offensive to human dignity, such as subhuman living conditions, arbitrary imprisonment, deportation, slavery, prostitution and trafficking in women and children; degrading conditions of work which treat laborers as mere instruments of profit, and not as free responsible persons: all these and the like are a disgrace, and so long as they infect human civilization they contaminate those who inflict them more than those who suffer injustice, and they are a negation of the honor due to the Creator.” 132

80.2 With regard to intrinsically evil acts, and in reference to contraceptive practices whereby the conjugal act is intentionally rendered infertile, Pope Paul VI teaches: “Though it is true that sometimes it is lawful to tolerate a lesser moral evil in order to avoid a greater evil or in order to promote a greater good, it is never lawful, even for the gravest reasons, to do evil that good may come of it (cf. Rom 3:8) – in other words, to intend directly something which of its very nature contradicts the moral order, and which must therefore be judged unworthy of man, even though the intention is to protect or promote the welfare of an individual, of a family or of society in general.” 133

81.1 In teaching the existence of intrinsically evil acts, the Church accepts the teaching of Sacred Scripture. The Apostle Paul emphatically states: “Do not be deceived: neither the immoral, nor idolaters, nor adulterers, nor sexual perverts, nor thieves, nor the greedy, nor drunkards, nor revilers, nor robbers will inherit the Kingdom of God” (1 Cor 6:9-10).

81.2 If acts are intrinsically evil, a good intention or particular circumstances can diminish their evil, but they cannot remove it. They remain “irremediably” evil acts; per se and in themselves they are not capable of being ordered to God and to the good of the person. “As for acts which are themselves sins (cum iam opera ipsa peccata sunt),” Saint Augustine writes, “like theft, fornication, blasphemy, who would dare affirm that, by doing them for good motives (causis bonis), they would no longer be sins, or, what is even more absurd, that they would be sins that are justified?” 134

81.3 Consequently, circumstances or intentions can never transform an act intrinsically evil by virtue of its object into an act “subjectively” good or defensible as a choice.

82.1 Furthermore, an intention is good when it has as its aim the true good of the person in view of his ultimate end. But acts whose object is “not capable of being ordered” to God and “unworthy of the human person” are always and in every case in conflict with that good. Consequently, respect for norms which prohibit such acts and oblige semper et pro semper, that is, without any exception, not only does not inhibit a good intention, but actually represents its basic expression.

82.2 The doctrine of the object as a source of morality represents an authentic explication of the biblical morality of the Covenant and of the commandments, of charity and of the virtues. The moral quality of human acting is dependent on this fidelity to the commandments, as an expression of obedience and of love. For this reason – we repeat – the opinion must be rejected as erroneous which maintains that it is impossible to qualify as morally evil according to its species the deliberate choice of certain kinds of behavior or specific acts, without taking into account the intention for which the choice was made or the totality of the foreseeable consequences of that act for all persons concerned. Without the rational determination of the morality of human acting as stated above, it would be impossible to affirm the existence of an “objective moral order”<sup>135</sup> and to establish any particular norm the content of which would be binding without exception. This would be to the detriment of human fraternity and the truth about the good, and would be injurious to ecclesial communion as well.

83.1 As is evident, in the question of the morality of human acts, and in particular the question of whether there exist intrinsically evil acts, we find ourselves faced with the question of man himself, of his truth and of the moral consequences flowing from that truth. By acknowledging and teaching the existence of intrinsic evil in given human acts, the Church remains faithful to the integral truth about man; she thus respects and promotes man in his dignity and vocation. Consequently, she must reject the theories set forth above, which contradict this truth.

83.2 Dear Brothers in the Episcopate, we must not be content merely to warn the faithful about the errors and dangers of certain ethical theories. We must first of all show the inviting splendor of that truth which is Jesus Christ himself. In him, who is the Truth (cf. Jn 14:6), man can understand fully and live perfectly, through his good actions, his vocation to freedom in obedience to the divine law summarized in the commandment of love of God and neighbor. And this is what takes place through the gift of the Holy Spirit, the Spirit of truth, of freedom and of love: in him we are enabled to interiorize the law, to receive it and to live it as the motivating force of true personal freedom: “the perfect law, the law of liberty” (Jas 1:25).

Veritatis Splendor

“For freedom Christ has set us free” (Gal 5:1)

84.1 The fundamental question which the moral theories mentioned above pose in a particularly forceful way is that of the relationship of man’s freedom to God’s law; it is ultimately the question of the relationship between freedom and truth.

84.2 According to Christian faith and the Church’s teaching, “only the freedom which submits to the truth leads the human person to his true good. The good of the person is to be in the truth and to do the truth.”<sup>136</sup>

84.3 A comparison between the Church’s teaching and today’s social and cultural situation immediately makes clear the urgent need for the Church herself to develop an intense pastoral effort precisely with regard to this fundamental question. “This essential bond between truth, the good and freedom has been largely lost sight of by present-day culture. As a result, helping man to rediscover it represents nowadays one of the specific requirements of the Church’s mission, for the salvation of the world. Pilate’s question: ‘What is truth?’ reflects the distressing perplexity of a man who often no longer knows who he is, whence he comes and where he is going. Hence we not infrequently witness the fearful plunging of the human person into situations of gradual self-destruction. According to some, it appears that one no longer need acknowledge the enduring absoluteness of any moral value. All around us we encounter contempt for human life after conception and before birth; the ongoing violation of basic rights of the person; the unjust destruction of goods minimally necessary for a human life. Indeed, something more serious has happened: man is no longer convinced that only in the truth can he find salvation. The saving power of the truth is contested, and freedom alone, uprooted from any objectivity, is left to decide by itself what is good and what is evil. This relativism becomes, in the field of theology, a lack of trust in the wisdom of God, who guides man with the moral law. Concrete situations are unfavorably contrasted with the precepts of the moral law, nor is it any longer maintained that, when all is said and done, the law of God is always the one true good of man.”<sup>137</sup>

85 The discernment which the Church carries out with regard to these ethical theories is not simply limited to denouncing and refuting them. In a positive way, the Church seeks, with great love, to help all the faithful to form a moral conscience which will make judgments and lead to decisions in accordance with the truth, following the exhortation of the Apostle Paul: “Do not be conformed to this world but be transformed by the renewal of your mind, that you may prove what is the will of God, what is good and acceptable and perfect” (Rom 12:2).

This effort by the Church finds its support – the “secret” of its educative power – not so much in doctrinal statements and pastoral appeals to vigilance, as in constantly looking to the Lord Jesus. Each day the Church looks to Christ with unfailing love, fully aware that the true and final answer to the problem of morality lies in him alone. In a particular way, it is in the crucified Christ that the Church finds the answer to the question troubling so many people today: how can obedience to universal and unchanging moral norms respect the uniqueness and individuality of the person, and not represent a threat to his freedom and dignity? The Church makes her own the Apostle Paul’s awareness of the mission he had received: “Christ . . . sent me . . . to preach the Gospel, and not with eloquent wisdom, lest the cross of Christ be emptied of its power. . . . We preach Christ crucified, a stumbling block to Jews and folly to Gentiles, but to those who are called, both Jews and Greeks, Christ the power of God and the wisdom of God” (1 Cor 1:17, 23-24). The crucified Christ reveals the authentic meaning of freedom; he lives it fully in the total gift of himself and calls his disciples to share in his freedom.

86.1 Rational reflection and daily experience demonstrate the weakness which marks man’s freedom. That freedom is real but limited: its absolute and unconditional origin is not in itself, but in the life within which it is situated and which represents for it, at one and the same time, both a limitation and a possibility. Human freedom belongs to us as creatures; it is a freedom which is given as a gift, one to be received like a seed and to be cultivated responsibly. It is an essential part of that creaturely image which is the basis of the dignity of the person. Within that freedom there is an echo of the primordial vocation whereby the Creator calls man to the true Good, and even more, through Christ’s revelation, to become his friend and to share his own divine life. It is at once inalienable self-possession and openness to all that exists, in passing beyond self to knowledge and love of the other.<sup>138</sup> Freedom then is rooted in the truth about man, and it is ultimately directed toward communion.

86.2 Reason and experience not only confirm the weakness of human freedom; they also confirm its tragic aspects. Man comes to realize that his freedom is in some mysterious way inclined to betray this openness to the True and the Good, and that all too often he actually prefers to choose finite, limited and ephemeral goods. What is more, within his errors and negative decisions, man glimpses the source of a deep rebellion, which leads him to reject the Truth and the Good in order to set himself up as an absolute principle unto himself: “You will be like God” (Gen 3:5). Consequently, freedom itself needs to be set free. It is Christ who sets it free: he “has set us free for freedom” (cf. Gal 5:1).

87.1 Christ reveals, first and foremost, that the frank and open acceptance of truth is the condition for authentic freedom: “You will know the truth, and the truth will set you free” (Jn 8:32).<sup>139</sup> This is truth which sets one free in the face of worldly power and which gives the strength to endure martyrdom. So it was with Jesus before Pilate: “For this I was born, and for this I have come into the world, to bear witness to the truth” (Jn 18:37). The true worshipers of God must thus worship him “in spirit and truth” (Jn 4:23): in this worship they become free. Worship of God and a relationship with truth are revealed in Jesus Christ as the deepest foundation of freedom.

87.2 Furthermore, Jesus reveals by his whole life, and not only by his words, that freedom is acquired in love, that is, in the gift of self. The one who says, “Greater love has no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends” (Jn 15:13), freely goes out to meet his Passion (cf. Mt 26:46), and in obedience to the Father gives his life on the Cross for all men (cf. Phil 2:6-11). Contemplation of Jesus crucified is thus the high road which the Church must tread every day if she wishes to understand the full meaning of freedom: the gift of self in service to God and one’s brethren. Communion with the crucified and risen Lord is the never-ending source from which the Church draws unceasingly in order to live in freedom, to give of herself and to serve. Commenting on the verse in Psalm 100, “Serve the Lord with gladness,” Saint Augustine says: “In the house of the Lord, slavery is free. It is free because it serves not out of necessity, but out of charity. . . . Charity should make you a servant, just as truth has made you free . . . you are at once both a servant and free: a servant, because you have become such; free, because you are loved by God your Creator; indeed, you have also been enabled to love your Creator. . . . You are a servant of the Lord and you are a freedman of the Lord. Do not go looking for a liberation which will lead you far from the house of your liberator!”<sup>140</sup>

87.3 The Church, and each of her members, is thus called to share in the munus regale of the crucified Christ (cf. Jn 12:32), to share in the grace and in the responsibility of the Son of man who came “not to be served but to serve, and to give his life as a ransom for many” (Mt 20:28).<sup>141</sup>

87.4 Jesus, then, is the living, personal summation of perfect freedom in total obedience to the will of God. His crucified flesh fully reveals the unbreakable bond between freedom and truth, just as his Resurrection from the dead is the supreme exaltation of the fruitfulness and saving power of a freedom lived out in truth.

Veritatis Splendor

Walking in the light (cf. 1 Jn 1:7)

88.1 The attempt to set freedom in opposition to truth, and indeed to separate them radically, is the consequence, manifestation and consummation of another more serious and destructive dichotomy, that which separates faith from morality.

88.2 This separation represents one of the most acute pastoral concerns of the Church amid today's growing secularism, wherein many, indeed too many, people think and live "as if God did not exist." We are speaking of a mentality which affects, often in a profound, extensive and all-embracing way, even the attitudes and behavior of Christians, whose faith is weakened and loses its character as a new and original criterion for thinking and acting in personal, family and social life. In a widely dechristianized culture, the criteria employed by believers themselves in making judgments and decisions often appear extraneous or even contrary to those of the Gospel.

88.3 It is urgent then that Christians should rediscover the newness of the faith and its power to judge a prevalent and all-intrusive culture. As the Apostle Paul admonishes us: "Once you were darkness, but now you are light in the Lord; walk as children of the light (for the fruit of the light is found in all that is good and right and true), and try to learn what is pleasing to the Lord. Take no part in the unfruitful works of darkness, but instead expose them. . . . Look carefully then how you walk, not as unwise men but as wise, making the most of the time, because the days are evil" (Eph 5:8-11, 15-16; cf. 1 Thess 5:4-8).

88.4 It is urgent to rediscover and to set forth once more the authentic reality of the Christian faith, which is not simply a set of propositions to be accepted with intellectual assent. Rather, faith is a lived knowledge of Christ, a living remembrance of his commandments, and a truth to be lived out. A word, in any event, is not truly received until it passes into action, until it is put into practice. Faith is a decision involving one's whole existence. It is an encounter, a dialogue, a communion of love and of life between the believer and Jesus Christ, the way, and the truth, and the life (cf. Jn 14:6). It entails an act of trusting abandonment to Christ, which enables us to live as he lived (cf. Gal 2:20), in profound love of God and of our brothers and sisters.

89.1 Faith also possesses a moral content. It gives rise to and calls for a consistent life commitment; it entails and brings to perfection the acceptance and observance of God's commandments. As Saint John writes, "God is light and in him is no darkness at all. If we say we have fellowship with him while we walk in darkness, we lie and do not live according to the truth. . . . And by this we may be sure that we know him, if we keep his commandments. He who says 'I know him' but disobeys his commandments is a liar, and the truth is not in him; but whoever keeps his word, in him truly love for God is perfected. By this we may be sure that we are in him: he who says he abides in him ought to walk in the same way in which he walked” (1 Jn 1:5-6, 2:3-6).

89.2 Through the moral life, faith becomes “confession,” not only before God but also before men: it becomes witness. “You are the light of the world,” said Jesus; “a city set on a hill cannot be hid. Nor do men light a lamp and put it under a bushel, but on a stand, and it gives light to all in the house. Let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good works and give glory to your Father who is in heaven” (Mt 5:14-16). These works are above all those of charity (cf. Mt 25:31-46) and of the authentic freedom which is manifested and lived in the gift of self, even to the total gift of self, like that of Jesus, who on the Cross “loved the Church and gave himself up for her” (Eph 5:25). Christ’s witness is the source, model and means for the witness of his disciples, who are called to walk on the same road: “If any man would come after me, let him deny himself and take up his cross daily and follow me” (Lk 9:23). Charity, in conformity with the radical demands of the Gospel, can lead the believer to the supreme witness of martyrdom. Once again this means imitating Jesus who died on the Cross: “Be imitators of God, as beloved children,” Paul writes to the Christians of Ephesus, “and walk in love, as Christ loved us and gave himself up for us, a fragrant offering and sacrifice to God” (Eph 5:1-2).

Veritatis Splendor

Martyrdom, the exaltation of the inviolable holiness of God's law

90.1 The relationship between faith and morality shines forth with all its brilliance in the unconditional respect due to the insistent demands of the personal dignity of every man, demands protected by those moral norms which prohibit without exception actions which are intrinsically evil. The universality and the immutability of the moral norm make manifest and at the same time serve to protect the personal dignity and inviolability of man, on whose face is reflected the splendor of God (cf. Gen 9:5-6).

90.2 The unacceptability of “teleological,” “consequentialist” and “proportionalist” ethical theories, which deny the existence of negative moral norms regarding specific kinds of behavior, norms which are valid without exception, is confirmed in a particularly eloquent way by Christian martyrdom, which has always accompanied and continues to accompany the life of the Church even today.

91.1 In the Old Testament we already find admirable witnesses of fidelity to the holy law of God even to the point of a voluntary acceptance of death. A prime example is the story of Susanna: in reply to the two unjust judges who threatened to have her condemned to death if she refused to yield to their sinful passion, she says: “I am hemmed in on every side. For if I do this thing, it is death for me; and if I do not, I shall not escape your hands. I choose not to do it and to fall into your hands, rather than to sin in the sight of the Lord!” (Dan 13:22-23). Susanna, preferring to “fall innocent” into the hands of the judges, bears witness not only to her faith and trust in God but also to her obedience to the truth and to the absoluteness of the moral order. By her readiness to die a martyr, she proclaims that it is not right to do what God's law qualifies as evil in order to draw some good from it. Susanna chose for herself the “better part”: hers was a perfectly clear witness, without any compromise, to the truth about the good and to the God of Israel. By her acts, she revealed the holiness of God.

91.2 At the dawn of the New Testament, John the Baptist, unable to refrain from speaking of the law of the Lord and rejecting any compromise with evil, “gave his life in witness to truth and justice,”<sup>142</sup> and thus also became the forerunner of the Messiah in the way he died (cf. Mk 6:17-29). “The one who came to bear witness to the light and who deserved to be called by that same light, which is Christ, a burning and shining lamp, was cast into the darkness of prison. . . . The one to whom it was granted to baptize the Redeemer of the world was thus baptized in his own blood.”<sup>143</sup> beginning with the deacon Stephen (cf. Acts 6:8-7:60) and the Apostle James (cf. Acts 12:1-2), who died as martyrs in order to profess their faith and their love for Christ, unwilling to deny him. In this they followed the Lord Jesus who “made the good confession” (1 Tim 6:13) before Caiaphas and Pilate, confirming the truth of his message at the cost of his life. Countless other martyrs accepted persecution and death rather than perform the idolatrous act of burning incense before the statue of the Emperor (cf. Rev 13:7-10). They even refused to feign such worship, thereby giving an example of the duty to refrain from performing even a single concrete act contrary to God’s love and the witness of faith. Like Christ himself, they obediently trusted and handed over their lives to the Father, the one who could free them from death (cf. Heb 5:7).

91.4 The Church proposes the example of numerous saints who bore witness to and defended moral truth even to the point of enduring martyrdom, or who preferred death to a single mortal sin. In raising them to the honor of the altars, the Church has canonized their witness and declared the truth of their judgment, according to which the love of God entails the obligation to respect his commandments, even in the most dire of circumstances, and the refusal to betray those commandments, even for the sake of saving one’s own life.

92.1 Martyrdom, accepted as an affirmation of the inviolability of the moral order, bears splendid witness both to the holiness of God’s law and to the inviolability of the personal dignity of man, created in God’s image and likeness. This dignity may never be disparaged or called into question, even with good intentions, whatever the difficulties involved. Jesus warns us most sternly: “What does it profit a man, to gain the whole world and forfeit his life?” (Mk 8:36).

92.2 Martyrdom rejects as false and illusory whatever “human meaning” one might claim to attribute, even in “exceptional” conditions, to an act morally evil in itself. Indeed, it even more clearly unmasks the true face of such an act: it is a violation of man’s “humanity,” in the one perpetrating it even before the one enduring it.<sup>144</sup> Hence martyrdom is also the exaltation of a person’s perfect “humanity” and of true “life,” as is attested by Saint Ignatius of Antioch, addressing the Christians of Rome, the place of his own martyrdom: “Have mercy on me, brethren: do not hold me back from living; do not wish that I die. . . . Let me arrive at the pure light; once there I will be truly a man. Let me imitate the passion of my God.”<sup>145</sup>

93.1 Finally, martyrdom is an outstanding sign of the holiness of the Church. Fidelity to God’s holy law, witnessed to by death, is a solemn proclamation and missionary commitment usque ad sanguinem, so that the splendor of moral truth may be undimmed in the behavior and thinking of individuals and society. This witness makes an extraordinarily valuable contribution to warding off, in civil society and within the ecclesial communities themselves, a headlong plunge into the most dangerous crisis which can afflict man: the confusion between good and evil, which makes it impossible to build up and to preserve the moral order of individuals and communities. By their eloquent and attractive example of a life completely transfigured by the splendor of moral truth, the martyrs and, in general, all the Church's saints, light up every period of history by reawakening its moral sense. By witnessing fully to the good, they are a living reproof to those who transgress the law (cf. Wis 2:12), and they make the words of the Prophet echo ever afresh: "Woe to those who call evil good and good evil, who put darkness for light and light for darkness, who put bitter for sweet and sweet for bitter!" (Is 5:20).

93.2 Although martyrdom represents the high point of the witness to moral truth, and one to which relatively few people are called, there is nonetheless a consistent witness which all Christians must daily be ready to make, even at the cost of suffering and grave sacrifice. Indeed, faced with the many difficulties which fidelity to the moral order can demand, even in the most ordinary circumstances, the Christian is called, with the grace of God invoked in prayer, to a sometimes heroic commitment. In this he or she is sustained by the virtue of fortitude, whereby – as Gregory the Great teaches – one can actually "love the difficulties of this world for the sake of eternal rewards."<sup>146</sup>

94 In this witness to the absoluteness of the moral good Christians are not alone: they are supported by the moral sense present in peoples and by the great religious and sapiential traditions of East and West, from which the interior and mysterious workings of God's Spirit are not absent. The words of the Latin poet Juvenal apply to all: "Consider it the greatest of crimes to prefer survival to honor and, out of love of physical life, to lose the very reason for living."<sup>147</sup> The voice of conscience has always clearly recalled that there are truths and moral values for which one must be prepared to give up one's life. In an individual's words and above all in the sacrifice of his life for a moral value, the Church sees a single testimony to that truth which, already present in creation, shines forth in its fullness on the face of Christ. As Saint Justin put it, "the Stoics, at least in their teachings on ethics, demonstrated wisdom, thanks to the seed of the Word present in all peoples, and we know that those who followed their doctrines met with hatred and were killed."<sup>148</sup>

Universal and unchanging moral norms at the service of the person and of society

95.1 The Church's teaching, and in particular her firmness in defending the universal and permanent validity of the precepts prohibiting intrinsically evil acts, is not infrequently seen as the sign of an intolerable intransigence, particularly with regard to the enormously complex and conflict-filled situations present in the moral life of individuals and of society today; this intransigence is said to be in contrast with the Church's motherhood. The Church, one hears, is lacking in understanding and compassion. But the Church's motherhood can never in fact be separated from her teaching mission, which she must always carry out as the faithful Bride of Christ, who is the Truth in person. "As Teacher, she never tires of proclaiming the moral norm. . . . The Church is in no way the author or the arbiter of this norm. In obedience to the truth which is Christ, whose image is reflected in the nature and dignity of the human person, the Church interprets the moral norm and proposes it to all people of good will, without concealing its demands of radicalness and perfection." 149

95.2 In fact, genuine understanding and compassion must mean love for the person, for his true good, for his authentic freedom. And this does not result, certainly, from concealing or weakening moral truth, but rather from proposing it in its most profound meaning as an outpouring of God's eternal Wisdom, which we have received in Christ, and as a service to man, to the growth of his freedom and to the attainment of his happiness. 150

95.3 Still, a clear and forceful presentation of moral truth can never be separated from a profound and heartfelt respect, born of that patient and trusting love which man always needs along his moral journey, a journey frequently wearisome on account of difficulties, weakness and painful situations. The Church can never renounce "the principle of truth and consistency, whereby she does not agree to call good evil and evil good"; 151 she must always be careful not to break the bruised reed or to quench the dimly burning wick (cf. Is 42:3). As Paul VI wrote: "While it is an outstanding manifestation of charity toward souls to omit nothing from the saving doctrine of Christ, this must always be joined with tolerance and charity, as Christ himself showed by his conversations and dealings with men. Having come not to judge the world but to save it, he was uncompromisingly stern toward sin, but patient and rich in mercy toward sinners." 152

96.1 The Church's firmness in defending the universal and unchanging moral norms is not demeaning at all. Its only purpose is to serve man's true freedom.

Because there can be no freedom apart from or in opposition to the truth, the categorical – unyielding and uncompromising – defense of the absolutely essential demands of man’s personal dignity must be considered the way and the condition for the very existence of freedom.

96.2 This service is directed to every man, considered in the uniqueness and singularity of his being and existence: only by obedience to universal moral norms does man find full confirmation of his personal uniqueness and the possibility of authentic moral growth. For this very reason, this service is also directed to all mankind: it is not only for individuals but also for the community, for society as such. These norms in fact represent the unshakable foundation and solid guarantee of a just and peaceful human coexistence, and hence of genuine democracy, which can come into being and develop only on the basis of the equality of all its members, who possess common rights and duties. When it is a matter of the moral norms prohibiting intrinsic evil, there are no privileges or exceptions for anyone. It makes no difference whether one is the master of the world or the “poorest of the poor” on the face of the earth. Before the demands of morality we are all absolutely equal.

97.1 In this way, moral norms, and primarily the negative ones, those prohibiting evil, manifest their meaning and force, both personal and social. By protecting the inviolable personal dignity of every human being they help to preserve the human social fabric and its proper and fruitful development. The commandments of the second tablet of the Decalogue in particular – those which Jesus quoted to the young man of the Gospel (cf. Mt 19:19) – constitute the indispensable rules of all social life.

97.2 These commandments are formulated in general terms. But the very fact that “the origin, the subject and the purpose of all social institutions is and should be the human person”<sup>153</sup> allows for them to be specified and made more explicit in a detailed code of behavior. The fundamental moral rules of social life thus entail specific demands to which both public authorities and citizens are required to pay heed. Even though intentions may sometimes be good, and circumstances frequently difficult, civil authorities and particular individuals never have authority to violate the fundamental and inalienable rights of the human person. In the end, only a morality which acknowledges certain norms as valid always and for everyone, with no exception, can guarantee the ethical foundation of social coexistence, both on the national and international levels.

Morality and the renewal of social and political life

98.1 In the face of serious forms of social and economic injustice and political corruption affecting entire peoples and nations, there is a growing reaction of indignation on the part of very many people whose fundamental human rights have been trampled upon and held in contempt, as well as an ever more widespread and acute sense of the need for a radical personal and social renewal capable of ensuring justice, solidarity, honesty and openness.

98.2 Certainly there is a long and difficult road ahead; bringing about such a renewal will require enormous effort, especially on account of the number and the gravity of the causes giving rise to and aggravating the situations of injustice present in the world today. But, as history and personal experience show, it is not difficult to discover at the bottom of these situations causes which are properly “cultural,” linked to particular ways of looking at man, society and the world. Indeed, at the heart of the issue of culture we find the moral sense, which is in turn rooted and fulfilled in the religious sense. 154

99.1 Only God, the Supreme Good, constitutes the unshakable foundation and essential condition of morality, and thus of the commandments, particularly those negative commandments which always and in every case prohibit behavior and actions incompatible with the personal dignity of every man. The Supreme Good and the moral good meet in truth: the truth of God, the Creator and Redeemer, and the truth of man created and redeemed by him. Only upon this truth is it possible to construct a renewed society and to solve the complex and weighty problems affecting it, above all the problem of overcoming the various forms of totalitarianism, so as to make way for the authentic freedom of the person. “Totalitarianism arises out of a denial of truth in the objective sense. If there is no transcendent truth, in obedience to which man achieves his full identity, then there is no sure principle for guaranteeing just relations between people. Their self-interest as a class, group or nation would inevitably set them in opposition to one another. If one does not acknowledge transcendent truth, then the force of power takes over, and each person tends to make full use of the means at his disposal in order to impose his own interests or his own opinion, with no regard for the rights of others. . . . Thus, the root of modern totalitarianism is to be found in the denial of the transcendent dignity of the human person who, as the visible image of the invisible God, is therefore by his very nature the subject of rights which no one may violate – no individual, group, class, nation or State. Not even the majority of a social body may violate these rights, by going against the minority, by isolating, oppressing, or exploiting it, or by attempting to annihilate it.”<sup>155</sup>

99.2 Consequently, the inseparable connection between truth and freedom – which expresses the essential bond between God’s wisdom and will – is extremely significant for the life of persons in the socioeconomic and sociopolitical sphere. This is clearly seen in the Church’s social teaching – which “belongs to the field . . . of theology and particularly of moral theology”<sup>156</sup> – and from her presentation of commandments governing social, economic and political life, not only with regard to general attitudes but also to precise and specific kinds of behavior and concrete acts.

100 The Catechism of the Catholic Church affirms that “in economic matters, respect for human dignity requires the practice of the virtue of temperance, to moderate our attachment to the goods of this world; of the virtue of justice, to preserve our neighbor’s rights and to render what is his or her due; and of solidarity, following the Golden Rule and in keeping with the generosity of the Lord, who ‘though he was rich, yet for your sake . . . became poor, so that by his poverty you might become rich’ (2 Cor 8:9).”<sup>157</sup> The Catechism goes on to present a series of kinds of behavior and actions contrary to human dignity: theft, deliberate retention of goods lent or objects lost, business fraud (cf. Dt 25:13-16), unjust wages (cf. Dt 24:14-15), forcing up prices by trading on the ignorance or hardship of another (cf. Amos 8:4-6), the misappropriation and private use of the corporate property of an enterprise, work badly done, tax fraud, forgery of checks and invoices, excessive expenses, waste, etc.<sup>158</sup> It continues: “The seventh commandment prohibits actions or enterprises which for any reason – selfish or ideological, commercial or totalitarian – lead to the enslavement of human beings, disregard for their personal dignity, buying or selling or exchanging them like merchandise. Reducing persons by violence to use-value or a source of profit is a sin against their dignity as persons and their fundamental rights. Saint Paul set a Christian master right about treating his Christian slave ‘no longer as a slave but . . . as a brother . . . in the Lord’ (Philem 16).”<sup>159</sup>

101.1 In the political sphere, it must be noted that truthfulness in the relations between those governing and those governed, openness in public administration, impartiality in the service of the body politic, respect for the rights of political adversaries, safeguarding the rights of the accused against summary trials and convictions, the just and honest use of public funds, the rejection of equivocal or illicit means in order to gain, preserve or increase power at any cost – all these are principles which are primarily rooted in, and in fact derive their singular urgency from, the transcendent value of the person and the objective moral demands of the functioning of States.<sup>160</sup> When these principles are not observed, the very basis of political coexistence is weakened and the life of society itself is gradually jeopardized, threatened and doomed to decay (cf. Ps 14:3-4; Rev 18:2-3, 9-24). Today, when many countries have seen the fall of ideologies which bound politics to a totalitarian conception of the world – Marxism being the foremost of these – there is no less grave a danger that the fundamental rights of the human person will be denied and that the religious yearnings which arise in the heart of every human being will be absorbed once again into politics. This is the risk of an alliance between democracy and ethical relativism, which would remove any sure moral reference point from political and social life, and on a deeper level make the acknowledgment of truth impossible. Indeed, “if there is no ultimate truth to guide and direct political activity, then ideas and convictions can easily be manipulated for reasons of power. As history demonstrates, a democracy without values easily turns into open or thinly disguised totalitarianism.”<sup>161</sup>

101.2 Thus, in every sphere of personal, family, social and political life, morality – founded upon truth and open in truth to authentic freedom – renders a primordial, indispensable and immensely valuable service not only for the individual person and his growth in the good, but also for society and its genuine development.

Grace and obedience to God's law

102.1 Even in the most difficult situations man must respect the norm of morality so that he can be obedient to God's holy commandment and consistent with his own dignity as a person. Certainly, maintaining a harmony between freedom and truth occasionally demands uncommon sacrifices, and must be won at a high price: it can even involve martyrdom. But, as universal and daily experience demonstrates, man is tempted to break that harmony: "I do not do what I want, but I do the very thing I hate. . . . I do not do the good I want, but the evil I do not want" (Rom 7:15, 19).

102.2 What is the ultimate source of this inner division of man? His history of sin begins when he no longer acknowledges the Lord as his Creator and himself wishes to be the one who determines, with complete independence, what is good and what is evil. "You will be like God, knowing good and evil" (Gen 3:5): this was the first temptation, and it is echoed in all the other temptations to which man is more easily inclined to yield as a result of the original Fall.

102.3 But temptations can be overcome, sins can be avoided, because together with the commandments the Lord gives us the possibility of keeping them: "His eyes are on those who fear him, and he knows every deed of man. He has not commanded any one to be ungodly, and he has not given anyone permission to sin" (Sir 15:19-20). Keeping God's law in particular situations can be difficult, extremely difficult, but it is never impossible. This is the constant teaching of the Church's Tradition, and was expressed by the Council of Trent: "But no one, however much justified, ought to consider himself exempt from the observance of the commandments, nor should he employ that rash statement, forbidden by the Fathers under anathema, that the commandments of God are impossible of observance by one who is justified. For God does not command the impossible, but in commanding he admonishes you to do what you can and to pray for what you cannot, and he gives his aid to enable you. His commandments are not burdensome (cf. 1 Jn 5:3); his yoke is easy and his burden light (cf. Mt 11:30)." 162

103.1 Man always has before him the spiritual horizon of hope, thanks to the help of divine grace and with the cooperation of human freedom.

103.2 It is in the saving Cross of Jesus, in the gift of the Holy Spirit, in the sacraments which flow forth from the pierced side of the Redeemer (cf. 1 Jn 19:34), that believers find the grace and the strength always to keep God's holy law, even amid the gravest of hardships. As Saint Andrew of Crete observes, the law itself "was enlivened by grace and made to serve it in a harmonious and fruitful combination. Each element preserved its characteristics without change or confusion. In a divine manner, he turned what could be burdensome and tyrannical into what is easy to bear and a source of freedom.”163

103.3 Only in the mystery of Christ's Redemption do we discover the “concrete” possibilities of man. “It would be a very serious error to conclude . . . that the Church's teaching is essentially only an ‘ideal’ which must then be adapted, proportioned, graduated to the so-called concrete possibilities of man, according to a ‘balancing of the goods in question.’ But what are the ‘concrete possibilities of man’? And of which man are we speaking? Of man dominated by lust or of man redeemed by Christ? This is what is at stake: the reality of Christ's Redemption. Christ has redeemed us! This means that he has given us the possibility of realizing the entire truth of our being; he has set our freedom free from the domination of concupiscence. And if redeemed man still sins, this is not due to an imperfection of Christ's redemptive act, but to man's will not to avail himself of the grace which flows from that act. God's command is of course proportioned to man's capabilities; but to the capabilities of the man to whom the Holy Spirit has been given; of the man who, though he has fallen into sin, can always obtain pardon and enjoy the presence of the Holy Spirit.”164

104.1 In this context, appropriate allowance is made both for God's mercy toward the sinner who converts and for the understanding of human weakness. Such understanding never means compromising and falsifying the standard of good and evil in order to adapt it to particular circumstances. It is quite human for the sinner to acknowledge his weakness and to ask mercy for his failings; what is unacceptable is the attitude of one who makes his own weakness the criterion of the truth about the good, so that he can feel self-justified, without even the need to have recourse to God and his mercy. An attitude of this sort corrupts the morality of society as a whole, since it encourages doubt about the objectivity of the moral law in general and a rejection of the absoluteness of moral prohibitions regarding specific human acts, and it ends up by confusing all judgments about values.

104.2 Instead, we should take to heart the message of the Gospel parable of the Pharisee and the tax collector (cf. Lk 18:9-14). The tax collector might possibly have had some justification for the sins he committed, such as to diminish his responsibility. But his prayer does not dwell on such justifications, but rather on his own unworthiness before God's infinite holiness: “God, be merciful to me a sinner!” (Lk 18:13). The Pharisee, on the other hand, is self-justified, finding some excuse for each of his failings. Here we encounter two different attitudes of the moral conscience of man in every age. The tax collector represents a “repentant” conscience, fully aware of the frailty of its own nature and seeing in its own failings, whatever their subjective justifications, a confirmation of its need for redemption. The Pharisee represents a “self-satisfied” conscience, under the illusion that it is able to observe the law without the help of grace and convinced that it does not need mercy.

105.1 All people must take great care not to allow themselves to be tainted by the attitude of the Pharisee, which would seek to eliminate awareness of one’s own limits and of one’s own sin. In our own day this attitude is expressed particularly in the attempt to adapt the moral norm to one’s own capacities and personal interests, and even in the rejection of the very idea of a norm. Accepting, on the other hand, the “disproportion” between the law and human ability (that is, the capacity of the moral forces of man left to himself) kindles the desire for grace and prepares one to receive it. “Who will deliver me from this body of death?” asks the Apostle Paul. And in an outburst of joy and gratitude he replies: “Thanks be to God through Jesus Christ our Lord!” (Rom 7:24-25).

105.2 We find the same awareness in the following prayer of Saint Ambrose of Milan: “What then is man, if you do not visit him? Remember, Lord, that you have made me as one who is weak, that you formed me from dust. How can I stand, if you do not constantly look upon me, to strengthen this clay, so that my strength may proceed from your face? When you hide your face, all grows weak (Ps 104:29); if you turn to look at me, woe is me! You have nothing to see in me but the stain of my crimes; there is no gain either in being abandoned or in being seen, because when we are seen, we offend you. Still, we can imagine that God does not reject those he sees, because he purifies those upon whom he gazes. Before him burns a fire capable of consuming our guilt (cf. Joel 2:3).” 165

Morality and new evangelization

106.1 Evangelization is the most powerful and stirring challenge which the Church has been called to face from her very beginning. Indeed, this challenge is posed not so much by the social and cultural milieux which she encounters in the course of history, as by the mandate of the risen Christ, who defines the very reason for the Church's existence: "Go into all the world and preach the Gospel to the whole creation" (Mk 16:15).

106.2 At least for many peoples, however, the present time is instead marked by a formidable challenge to undertake a "new evangelization," a proclamation of the Gospel which is always new and always the bearer of new things, an evangelization which must be "new in its ardor, methods and expression."<sup>166</sup> Dechristianization, which weighs heavily upon entire peoples and communities once rich in faith and Christian life, involves not only the loss of faith or in any event its becoming irrelevant for everyday life, but also, and of necessity, a decline or obscuring of the moral sense. This comes about both as a result of a loss of awareness of the originality of Gospel morality and as a result of an eclipse of fundamental principles and ethical values themselves. Today's widespread tendencies toward subjectivism, utilitarianism and relativism appear not merely as pragmatic attitudes or patterns of behavior, but rather as approaches having a basis in theory and claiming full cultural and social legitimacy.

107.1 Evangelization – and therefore the "new evangelization" – also involves the proclamation and presentation of morality. Jesus himself, even as he preached the Kingdom of God and its saving love, called people to faith and conversion (cf. Mk 1:15). And when Peter, with the other Apostles, proclaimed the Resurrection of Jesus of Nazareth from the dead, he held out a new life to be lived, a "way" to be followed, for those who would be disciples of the Risen One (cf. Acts 2:37-41, 3:17-20).

107.2 Just as it does in proclaiming the truths of faith, and even more so in presenting the foundations and content of Christian morality, the new evangelization will show its authenticity and unleash all its missionary force when it is carried out through the gift not only of the word proclaimed but also of the word lived. In particular, the life of holiness which is resplendent in so many members of the People of God, humble and often unseen, constitutes the simplest and most attractive way to perceive at once the beauty of truth, the liberating force of God's love, and the value of unconditional fidelity to all the demands of the Lord's law, even in the most difficult situations. For this reason, the Church, as a wise teacher of morality, has always invited believers to seek and to find in the saints, and above all in the Virgin Mother of God “full of grace” and “all-holy,” the model, the strength and the joy needed to live a life in accordance with God’s commandments and the Beatitudes of the Gospel.

107.3 The lives of the saints, as a reflection of the goodness of God – the One who “alone is good” – constitute not only a genuine profession of faith and an incentive for sharing it with others, but also a glorification of God and his infinite holiness. The life of holiness thus brings to full expression and effectiveness the threefold and unitary munus propheticum, sacerdotale et regale which every Christian receives as a gift by being born again “of water and the Spirit” (Jn 3:5) in Baptism. His moral life has the value of a “spiritual worship” (Rom 12:1; cf. Phil 3:3), flowing from and nourished by that inexhaustible source of holiness and glorification of God which is found in the sacraments, especially in the Eucharist: by sharing in the sacrifice of the Cross, the Christian partakes of Christ’s self-giving love and is equipped and committed to live this same charity in all his thoughts and deeds. In the moral life the Christian’s royal service is also made evident and effective: with the help of grace, the more one obeys the new law of the Holy Spirit, the more one grows in the freedom to which he or she is called by the service of truth, charity and justice.

108.1 At the heart of the new evangelization and of the new moral life which it proposes and awakens by its fruits of holiness and missionary zeal, there is the Spirit of Christ, the principle and strength of the fruitfulness of Holy Mother Church. As Pope Paul VI reminded us: “Evangelization will never be possible without the action of the Holy Spirit.”<sup>167</sup> The Spirit of Jesus, received by the humble and docile heart of the believer, brings about the flourishing of Christian moral life and the witness of holiness amid the great variety of vocations, gifts, responsibilities, conditions and life situations. As Novatian once pointed out – here expressing the authentic faith of the Church – it is the Holy Spirit “who confirmed the hearts and minds of the disciples, who revealed the mysteries of the Gospel, who shed upon them the light of things divine. Strengthened by his gift, they did not fear either prisons or chains for the name of the Lord; indeed they even trampled upon the powers and torments of the world, armed and strengthened by him, having in themselves the gifts which this same Spirit bestows and directs like jewels to the Church, the Bride of Christ. It is in fact he who raises up prophets in the Church, instructs teachers, guides tongues, works wonders and healings, accomplishes miracles, grants the discernment of spirits, assigns governance, inspires counsels, distributes and harmonizes every other charismatic gift. In this way he completes and perfects the Lord’s Church everywhere and in all things.”<sup>168</sup> nourishing “the faith which works through love” (cf. Gal 5:6), and in relation to the work of the Holy Spirit, we can now understand the proper place which continuing theological reflection about the moral life holds in the Church, the community of believers. We can likewise speak of the mission and the responsibility proper to moral theologians.

The service of moral theologians

109.1 The whole Church is called to evangelization and to the witness of a life of faith, by the fact that she has been made a sharer in the munus propheticum of the Lord Jesus through the gift of his Spirit. Thanks to the permanent presence of the Spirit of truth in the Church (cf. Jn 14:16-17), “the universal body of the faithful who have received the anointing of the holy one (cf. 1 Jn 2:20, 27) cannot be mistaken in belief. It displays this particular quality through a supernatural sense of the faith in the whole people when, ‘from the Bishops to the last of the lay faithful,’ it expresses the consensus of all in matters of faith and morals.”<sup>169</sup>

109.2 In order to carry out her prophetic mission, the Church must constantly reawaken or “rekindle” her own life of faith (cf. 2 Tim 1:6), particularly through an ever deeper reflection, under the guidance of the Holy Spirit, upon the content of faith itself. The “vocation” of the theologian in the Church is specifically at the service of this “believing effort to understand the faith.” As the Instruction Donum Veritatis teaches: “Among the vocations awakened by the Spirit in the Church is that of the theologian. His role is to pursue in a particular way an ever deeper understanding of the word of God found in the inspired Scriptures and handed on by the living Tradition of the Church. He does this in communion with the Magisterium, which has been charged with the responsibility of preserving the deposit of faith. By its nature, faith appeals to reason because it reveals to man the truth of his destiny and the way to attain it. Revealed truth, to be sure, surpasses our telling. All our concepts fall short of its ultimately unfathomable grandeur (cf. Eph 3:19). Nonetheless, revealed truth beckons reason – God’s gift fashioned for the assimilation of truth – to enter into its light and thereby come to understand in a certain measure what it has believed. Theological science responds to the invitation of truth as it seeks to understand the faith. It thereby aids the People of God in fulfilling the Apostle’s command (cf. 1 Pet 3:15) to give an accounting for their hope to those who ask it.”<sup>170</sup>

109.3 It is fundamental for defining the very identity of theology, and consequently for theology to carry out its proper mission, to recognize its profound and vital connection with the Church, her mystery, her life and her mission: “Theology is an ecclesial science because it grows in the Church and works on the Church. . . . It is a service to the Church and therefore ought to feel itself actively involved in the mission of the Church, particularly in its prophetic mission.”<sup>171</sup> By its very nature and procedures, authentic theology can flourish and develop only through a committed and responsible participation in and “belonging” to the Church as a “community of faith.” In turn, the fruits of theological research and deeper insight become a source of enrichment for the Church and her life of faith.

110.1 All that has been said about theology in general can and must also be said for moral theology, seen in its specific nature as a scientific reflection on the Gospel as the gift and commandment of new life, a reflection on the life which “professes the truth in love” (cf. Eph 4:15) and on the Church’s life of holiness, in which there shines forth the truth about the good brought to its perfection. The Church’s Magisterium intervenes not only in the sphere of faith, but also, and inseparably so, in the sphere of morals. It has the task of “discerning, by means of judgments normative for the consciences of believers, those acts which in themselves conform to the demands of faith and foster their expression in life and those which, on the contrary, because intrinsically evil, are incompatible with such demands.”<sup>172</sup> In proclaiming the commandments of God and the charity of Christ, the Church’s Magisterium also teaches the faithful specific particular precepts and requires that they consider them in conscience as morally binding. In addition, the Magisterium carries out an important work of vigilance, warning the faithful of the presence of possible errors, even merely implicit ones, when their consciences fail to acknowledge the correctness and the truth of the moral norms, which the Magisterium teaches.

110.2 This is the point at which to consider the specific task of all those who by mandate of their legitimate Pastors teach moral theology in seminaries and faculties of theology. They have the grave duty to instruct the faithful – especially future Pastors – about all those commandments and practical norms authoritatively declared by the Church.<sup>173</sup> While recognizing the possible limitations of the human arguments employed by the Magisterium, moral theologians are called to develop a deeper understanding of the reasons underlying its teachings and to expound the validity and obligatory nature of the precepts it proposes, demonstrating their connection with one another and their relation with man’s ultimate end.<sup>174</sup> Moral theologians are to set forth the Church’s teaching and to give, in the exercise of their ministry, the example of a loyal assent, both internal and external, to the Magisterium’s teaching in the areas of both dogma and morality.<sup>175</sup> Working together in cooperation with the hierarchical Magisterium, theologians will be deeply concerned to clarify ever more fully the biblical foundations, the ethical significance and the anthropological concerns which underlie the moral doctrine and the vision of man set forth by the Church.

111.1 The service which moral theologians are called to provide at the present time is of the utmost importance, not only for the Church’s life and mission, but also for human society and culture. Moral theologians have the task, in close and vital connection with biblical and dogmatic theology, to highlight through their scientific reflection “that dynamic aspect which will elicit the response that man must give to the divine call which comes in the process of his growth in love, within a community of salvation. In this way, moral theology will acquire an inner spiritual dimension in response to the need to develop fully the imago Dei present in man, and in response to the laws of spiritual development described by Christian ascetical and mystical theology.”<sup>176</sup>

111.2 Certainly moral theology and its teaching are meeting with particular difficulty today. Because the Church’s morality necessarily involves a normative dimension, moral theology cannot be reduced to a body of knowledge worked out purely in the context of the so-called behavioral sciences. The latter are concerned with the phenomenon of morality as a historical and social fact; moral theology, however, while needing to make use of the behavioral and natural sciences, does not rely on the results of formal empirical observation or phenomenological understanding alone. Indeed, the relevance of the behavioral sciences for moral theology must always be measured against the primordial question: What is good or evil? What must be done to have eternal life?

112.1 The moral theologian must therefore exercise careful discernment in the context of today’s prevalently scientific and technical culture, exposed as it is to the dangers of relativism, pragmatism and positivism. From the theological viewpoint, moral principles are not dependent upon the historical moment in which they are discovered. Moreover, the fact that some believers act without following the teachings of the Magisterium, or erroneously consider as morally correct a kind of behavior declared by their Pastors as contrary to the law of God, cannot be a valid argument for rejecting the truth of the moral norms taught by the Church. The affirmation of moral principles is not within the competence of formal empirical methods. While not denying the validity of such methods, but at the same time not restricting its viewpoint to them, moral theology, faithful to the supernatural sense of the faith, takes into account first and foremost the spiritual dimension of the human heart and its vocation to divine love.

112.2 In fact, while the behavioral sciences, like all experimental sciences, develop an empirical and statistical concept of “normality,” faith teaches that this normality itself bears the traces of a fall from man’s original situation – in other words, it is affected by sin. Only Christian faith points out to man the way to return to “the beginning” (cf. Mt 19:8), a way which is often quite different from that of empirical normality. Hence the behavioral sciences, despite the great value of the information which they provide, cannot be considered decisive indications of moral norms. It is the Gospel which reveals the full truth about man and his moral journey, and thus enlightens and admonishes sinners; it proclaims to them

God's mercy, which is constantly at work to preserve them both from despair at their inability fully to know and keep God's law and from the presumption that they can be saved without merit. God also reminds sinners of the joy of forgiveness, which alone grants the strength to see in the moral law a liberating truth, a grace-filled source of hope, a path of life.

113.1 Teaching moral doctrine involves the conscious acceptance of these intellectual, spiritual and pastoral responsibilities. Moral theologians, who have accepted the charge of teaching the Church's doctrine, thus have a grave duty to train the faithful to make this moral discernment, to be committed to the true good and to have confident recourse to God's grace.

113.2 While exchanges and conflicts of opinion may constitute normal expressions of public life in a representative democracy, moral teaching certainly cannot depend simply upon respect for a process: indeed, it is in no way established by following the rules and deliberative procedures typical of a democracy. Dissent, in the form of carefully orchestrated protests and polemics carried on in the media, is opposed to ecclesial communion and to a correct understanding of the hierarchical constitution of the People of God. Opposition to the teaching of the Church's Pastors cannot be seen as a legitimate expression either of Christian freedom or of the diversity of the Spirit's gifts. When this happens, the Church's Pastors have the duty to act in conformity with their apostolic mission, insisting that the right of the faithful to receive Catholic doctrine in its purity and integrity must always be respected. "Never forgetting that he too is a member of the People of God, the theologian must be respectful of them, and be committed to offering them a teaching which in no way does harm to the doctrine of the faith."<sup>177</sup>

Our own responsibilities as Pastors

114.1 As the Second Vatican Council reminds us, responsibility for the faith and the life of faith of the People of God is particularly incumbent upon the Church's Pastors: "Among the principal tasks of Bishops the preaching of the Gospel is preeminent. For the Bishops are the heralds of the faith who bring new disciples to Christ. They are authentic teachers, that is, teachers endowed with the authority of Christ, who preach to the people entrusted to them the faith to be believed and put into practice; they illustrate this faith in the light of the Holy Spirit, drawing out of the treasury of revelation things old and new (cf. Mt 13:52); they make it bear fruit and they vigilantly ward off errors that are threatening their flock (cf. 2 Tim 4:1-4)." 178

114.2 It is our common duty, and even before that our common grace, as Pastors and Bishops of the Church, to teach the faithful the things which lead them to God, just as the Lord Jesus did with the young man in the Gospel. Replying to the question: "What good must I do to have eternal life?" Jesus referred the young man to God, the Lord of creation and of the Covenant. He reminded him of the moral commandments already revealed in the Old Testament and he indicated their spirit and deepest meaning by inviting the young man to follow him in poverty, humility and love: "Come, follow me!" The truth of this teaching was sealed on the Cross in the blood of Christ: in the Holy Spirit, it has become the new law of the Church and of every Christian.

114.3 This "answer" to the question about morality has been entrusted by Jesus Christ in a particular way to us, the Pastors of the Church; we have been called to make it the object of our preaching, in the fulfillment of our munus propheticum. At the same time, our responsibility as Pastors with regard to Christian moral teaching must also be exercised as part of the munus sacerdotale: this happens when we dispense to the faithful the gifts of grace and sanctification as an effective means for obeying God's holy law, and when with our constant and confident prayers we support believers in their efforts to be faithful to the demands of the faith and to live in accordance with the Gospel (cf. Col 1:9-12). Especially today, Christian moral teaching must be one of the chief areas in which we exercise our pastoral vigilance, in carrying out our munus regale.

115.1 This is the first time, in fact, that the Magisterium of the Church has set forth in detail the fundamental elements of this teaching, and presented the principles for the pastoral discernment necessary in practical and cultural situations which are complex and even crucial.

115.2 In the light of revelation and of the Church's constant teaching, especially that of the Second Vatican Council, I have briefly recalled the essential characteristics of freedom, as well as the fundamental values connected with the dignity of the person and the truth of his acts, so as to be able to discern in obedience to the moral law a grace and a sign of our adoption in the one Son (cf. Eph 1:4-6). Specifically, this Encyclical has evaluated certain trends in moral theology today. I now pass this evaluation on to you, in obedience to the word of the Lord who entrusted to Peter the task of strengthening his brethren (cf. Lk 22:32), in order to clarify and aid our common discernment.

115.3 Each of us knows how important is the teaching which represents the central theme of this Encyclical and which is today being restated with the authority of the Successor of Peter. Each of us can see the seriousness of what is involved, not only for individuals but also for the whole of society, with the reaffirmation of the universality and immutability of the moral commandments, particularly those which prohibit always and without exception intrinsically evil acts.

115.4 In acknowledging these commandments, Christian hearts and our pastoral charity listen to the call of the One who “first loved us” (1 Jn 4:19). God asks us to be holy as he is holy (cf. Lev 19:2), to be – in Christ – perfect as he is perfect (cf. Mt 5:48). The unwavering demands of that commandment are based upon God’s infinitely merciful love (cf. Lk 6:36), and the purpose of that commandment is to lead us, by the grace of Christ, on the path of that fullness of life proper to the children of God.

116.1 We have the duty, as Bishops, to be vigilant that the word of God is faithfully taught. My Brothers in the Episcopate, it is part of our pastoral ministry to see to it that this moral teaching is faithfully handed down and to have recourse to appropriate measures to ensure that the faithful are guarded from every doctrine and theory contrary to it. In carrying out this task we are all assisted by theologians; even so, theological opinions constitute neither the rule nor the norm of our teaching. Its authority is derived, by the assistance of the Holy Spirit and in communion cum Petro et sub Petro, from our fidelity to the Catholic faith which comes from the Apostles. As Bishops, we have the “grave obligation” to be personally vigilant that the “sound doctrine” (1 Tim 1:10) of faith and morals is taught in our Dioceses.

116.2 A particular responsibility is incumbent upon Bishops with regard to Catholic institutions. Whether these are agencies for the pastoral care of the family or for social work, or institutions dedicated to teaching or health care, Bishops can canonically erect and recognize these structures and delegate certain responsibilities to them. Nevertheless, Bishops are never relieved of their own personal obligations. It falls to them, in communion with the Holy See, both to grant the title “Catholic” to Church-related schools,<sup>179</sup> universities,<sup>180</sup> health-care facilities and counseling services, and, in cases of a serious failure to live up to that title, to take it away.

117.1 In the heart of every Christian, in the inmost depths of each person, there is always an echo of the question which the young man in the Gospel once asked Jesus: “Teacher, what good must I do to have eternal life?” (Mt 19:16). Everyone, however, needs to address this question to the “Good Teacher,” since he is the only one who can answer in the fullness of truth, in all situations, in the most varied of circumstances. And when Christians ask him the question which rises from their conscience, the Lord replies in the words of the New Covenant which have been entrusted to his Church. As the Apostle Paul said of himself, we have been sent “to preach the Gospel, and not with eloquent wisdom, lest the Cross of Christ be emptied of its power” (1 Cor 1.17). The Church’s answer to man’s question contains the wisdom and power of Christ crucified, the Truth which gives of itself.

117.2 When people ask the Church the questions raised by their consciences, when the faithful in the Church turn to their Bishops and Pastors, the Church’s reply contains the voice of Jesus Christ, the voice of the truth about good and evil. In the words spoken by the Church there resounds, in people’s inmost being, the voice of God who “alone is good” (cf. Mt 19:17), who alone “is love” (1 Jn 4:8, 16).

117.3 Through the anointing of the Spirit this gentle but challenging word becomes light and life for man. Again the Apostle Paul invites us to have confidence, because “our competence is from God, who has made us competent to be ministers of a new covenant, not in a written code but in the Spirit. . . . The Lord is the Spirit, and where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is freedom. And all of us, with unveiled faces, reflecting the glory of the Lord, are being changed into his likeness from one degree of glory to another; for this comes from the Lord, the Spirit” (2 Cor 3:5-6, 17-18).

Conclusion

Veritatis Splendor

Mary, Mother of Mercy

118.1 At the end of these considerations, let us entrust ourselves, the sufferings and the joys of our life, the moral life of believers and people of good will, and the research of moralists, to Mary, Mother of God and Mother of Mercy.

118.2 Mary is Mother of Mercy because her Son, Jesus Christ, was sent by the Father as the revelation of God's mercy (cf. Jn 3:16-18). Christ came not to condemn but to forgive, to show mercy (cf. Mt 9:13). And the greatest mercy of all is found in his being in our midst and calling us to meet him and to confess with Peter, that he is "the Son of the living God" (Mt 16:16). No human sin can erase the mercy of God, or prevent him from unleashing all his triumphant power, if we only call upon him. Indeed, sin itself makes even more radiant the love of the Father who, in order to ransom a slave, sacrificed his Son: <sup>181</sup> his mercy toward us is Redemption. This mercy reaches its fullness in the gift of the Spirit who bestows new life and demands that it be lived. No matter how many and great the obstacles put in his way by human frailty and sin, the Spirit, who renews the face of the earth (cf. Ps 104:30), makes possible the miracle of the perfect accomplishment of the good. This renewal, which gives the ability to do what is good, noble, beautiful, pleasing to God and in conformity with his will, is in some way the flowering of the gift of mercy, which offers liberation from the slavery of evil and gives the strength to sin no more. Through the gift of new life, Jesus makes us sharers in his love and leads us to the Father in the Spirit.

119 Such is the consoling certainty of Christian faith, the source of its profound humanity and extraordinary simplicity. At times, in the discussions about new and complex moral problems, it can seem that Christian morality is in itself too demanding, difficult to understand and almost impossible to practice. This is untrue, since Christian morality consists, in the simplicity of the Gospel, in following Jesus Christ, in abandoning oneself to him, in letting oneself be transformed by his grace and renewed by his mercy, gifts which come to us in the living communion of his Church. Saint Augustine reminds us that "he who would live has a place to live, and has everything needed to live. Let him draw near, let him believe, let him become part of the body, that he may have life. Let him not shrink from the unity of the members." <sup>182</sup> By the light of the Holy Spirit, the living essence of Christian morality can be understood by everyone, even the least learned, but particularly those who are able to preserve an "undivided heart" (Ps 86:11). On the other hand, this evangelical simplicity does not exempt one from facing reality in its complexity; rather it can lead to a more genuine understanding of reality, inasmuch as following Christ will gradually bring out the distinctive character of authentic Christian morality, while providing the vital energy needed to carry it out. It is the task of the Church's Magisterium to see that the dynamic process of following Christ develops in an organic manner, without the falsification or obscuring of its moral demands, with all their consequences. The one who loves Christ keeps his commandments (cf. Jn 14:15).

120.1 Mary is also Mother of Mercy because it is to her that Jesus entrusts his Church and all humanity. At the foot of the Cross, when she accepts John as her son, when she asks, together with Christ, forgiveness from the Father for those who do not know what they do (cf. Lk 23:34), Mary experiences, in perfect docility to the Spirit, the richness and the universality of God's love, which opens her heart and enables it to embrace the entire human race. Thus Mary becomes Mother of each and every one of us, the Mother who obtains for us divine mercy.

120.2 Mary is the radiant sign and inviting model of the moral life. As Saint Ambrose put it, "The life of this one person can serve as a model for everyone"<sup>183</sup> and while speaking specifically to virgins but within a context open to all, he affirmed: "The first stimulus to learning is the nobility of the teacher. Who can be more noble than the Mother of God? Who can be more glorious than the one chosen by Glory itself?"<sup>184</sup> Mary lived and exercised her freedom precisely by giving herself to God and accepting God's gift within herself. Until the time of his birth, she sheltered in her womb the Son of God who became man; she raised him and enabled him to grow, and she accompanied him in that supreme act of freedom which is the complete sacrifice of his own life. By the gift of herself, Mary entered fully into the plan of God who gives himself to the world. By accepting and pondering in her heart events which she did not always understand (cf. Lk 2:19), she became the model of all those who hear the word of God and keep it (cf. Lk 11:28), and merited the title of "Seat of Wisdom." This Wisdom is Jesus Christ himself, the Eternal Word of God, who perfectly reveals and accomplishes the will of the Father (cf. Heb 10:5-10). Mary invites everyone to accept this Wisdom. To us too she addresses the command she gave to the servants at Cana in Galilee during the marriage feast: "Do whatever he tells you" (Jn 2:5).

120.3 Mary shares our human condition, but in complete openness to the grace of God. Not having known sin, she is able to have compassion on every kind of weakness. She understands sinful man and loves him with a Mother's love. Precisely for this reason she is on the side of truth and shares the Church's burden in recalling always and to everyone the demands of morality. Nor does she permit sinful man to be deceived by those who claim to love him by justifying his sin, for she knows that the sacrifice of Christ her Son would thus be emptied of its power. No absolution offered by beguiling doctrines, even in the areas of philosophy and theology, can make man truly happy: only the Cross and the glory of the risen Christ can grant peace to his conscience and salvation to his life.

120.4 O Mary,
Mother of Mercy,
watch over all people,
that the Cross of Christ
may not be emptied of its power, that man may not stray from the path of the good or become blind to sin, but may put his hope ever more fully in God who is “rich in mercy” (Eph 2:4).
May he carry out the good works prepared by God beforehand (cf. Eph 2:10) and so live completely
“for the praise of his glory” (Eph 1:12).

Given in Rome, at Saint Peter’s, on August 6, Feast of the Transfiguration of the Lord, in the year 1993, the fifteenth of my Pontificate.

Evangelium Vitae

Editor's Introduction

“The Gospel of life is at the heart of Jesus’ message” (§1.1). With these words Pope John Paul II begins his eleventh encyclical, Evangelium Vitae, published on March 25, 1995.<sup>1</sup> He aptly chose the feast of the Annunciation, which celebrates Mary’s welcoming of the Son of God who took flesh in her womb, to issue a document dedicated to the value and inviolability of human life. By taking up the cause of the “great multitude of weak and defenseless human beings” (§5.4), especially unborn children and those at the end of life, the Pope continues the defense of human dignity dealt with in his three social encyclicals. Evangelium Vitae is an anguished and vigorous response to “scientifically and systematically programmed threats” against life (§17.2), assaults which have repercussions on Church teaching, touching upon “the core of her faith in the redemptive Incarnation of the Son of God” (§3.1).

For John Paul, the cause of life is the cause of the Gospel entrusted to the Church, which is duty-bound to raise her voice in the defense of life. His encyclical is a “pressing appeal addressed to each and every person, in the name of God: respect, protect, love and serve life, every human life!” (§5.5).

Preparations for the encyclical began in April 1991, when the Pope called a special meeting in Rome of the College of Cardinals to discuss current threats to human life. After their deliberations, the cardinals asked him “to reaffirm with the authority of the Successor of Peter the value of human life and its inviolability” (§5.1). As a first response to their request, the Pope wrote a personal letter to every bishop, seeking contributions to the planned document. They replied with valuable suggestions, and he incorporated many of their proposals into the encyclical. Evangelium Vitae, then, is the fruit of genuine episcopal collegiality. By taking an active part in its preparation, the bishops “bore witness to their unanimous desire to share in the doctrinal and pastoral mission of the Church with regard to the Gospel of life” (§5.2).

Unlike Veritatis Splendor, which was directed primarily to bishops, John Paul intends Evangelium Vitae to be read also by the lay faithful, indeed by all people of good will. Concern for the sacredness of human life is not just a matter for Catholics. “The value at stake,” writes the Pope, “is one which every human being can grasp by the light of reason” (§101.2). The essential truths of the Gospel of life “are written in the heart of every man and woman,” echoing in every human conscience “from the time of creation itself” (§29.3). He insists that anyone who is sincerely open to truth and goodness can discover “the sacred value of human life from its very beginning until its end, and can affirm the right of every human being to have this primary good respected to the highest degree” (§2.2).

The encyclical’s style is typically Wojtylan. It intersperses rigorous analysis with prayers and exhortations. As can be seen from the more than three hundred biblical quotations and references, Scripture accompanies the Pope’s presentation from start to finish, giving Evangelium Vitae an inspirational tone and familiar style. He also relies heavily on the Church Fathers. The eighteen patristic quotations that appear in the encyclical reinforce the truths that God is the origin of life, that human beings share in divine life, and that Jesus gave his life so that others might live. As is customary, John Paul frequently cites the documents of the Second Vatican Council – here, more than twenty-five times. He also makes use of the Catechism of the Catholic Church, citing it on ten occasions.

Of particular significance in Evangelium Vitae are the Pope’s three authoritative doctrinal pronouncements: on the direct and voluntary killing of innocent human life (cf. §57.4), on abortion (cf. §62.3), and on euthanasia (cf. §65.3). In each of these formal statements John Paul recalls, through his ordinary magisterium, that a specific proposition is taught infallibly by the ordinary and universal Magisterium of the College of Bishops in communion with the Successor of Peter. He does not, therefore, call upon the charism which belongs to the Petrine ministry to teach infallibly, as this was defined at the First Vatican Council (1870). Rather, the Pope “confirms” or “declares” (as in the case of abortion) a doctrine already taught by the bishops as belonging to the Catholic faith. Thus, there is nothing “new” in the Pope’s affirmations, but merely the reiteration of teaching about which a consensus exists in the Episcopal College.

Summary

After its introduction (§§1-6), the 48,000 word encyclical unfolds in four chapters. In chapter one, “Present-Day Threats to Human Life” (§§7-28), the Pope analyzes the lights and the shadows of the contemporary situation, concentrating on the threats which are signs of a “culture of death.” In chapter two, “The Christian Message concerning Life” (§§29-51), he reflects meditatively on the biblical message of life as a divine gift. Chapter three, “God’s Holy Law” (§§52-77), discusses the commandment, “You shall not kill,” and applies it to the unprecedented ways in which life is being imperiled today. Besides authoritatively confirming the Church’s teaching on innocent human life, abortion, and euthanasia, this chapter also examines the relation between moral and civil law. Chapter four, “For a New Culture of Human Life” (§§78-101), launches the challenge of building a civilization at the service of life, an enormous effort involving all sectors of the Church and society. In the conclusion (§§102-105), the Pope invokes Mary as the model of how life should be welcomed and cared for.

The culture of death

Chapter one of Evangelium Vitae soberly describes the dark shadows cast over today's world by threats to life. These attacks, both more serious and more numerous than in the past, entail a “war of the powerful against the weak . . . [a] ‘conspiracy against life’” (§12, cf. §17.2). According to John Paul, “we are facing an enormous and dramatic clash between good and evil, death and life, the ‘culture of death’ and the ‘culture of life’” (§28.1, cf. §§50.2, 104.3). At times, it even appears as if the forces of death have the upper hand. Tragically, the biblical story of Cain’s murder of Abel (cf. Gen 4:2-16) is “a page rewritten daily, with inexorable and degrading frequency, in the book of human history” (§7.3). This book contains pages which recount the unjust distribution of resources among peoples and social classes, the misery of untold millions, fratricidal wars, trading in arms, drug trafficking, reckless tampering with the world’s ecological balance, and sexual risk-taking.

In addition to these perils, John Paul notes grave threats to human life at its very beginning. First, enormous sums of money are now being spent to fund research and promote drugs that make it possible to kill unborn children. Second, babies born with serious handicaps or diseases are sometimes denied the most basic care in order to hasten their death, a situation which marks the return to “a state of barbarism which one hoped had been left behind forever” (§14.3). Third, techniques of artificial procreation have a high rate of failure, thus exposing many embryos to the risk of death. Moreover, these methods produce “spare embryos” that are frequently either destroyed or used for research. Under the cover of scientific or medical progress, life is treated as if it were “simple ‘biological material’ to be freely disposed of” (§14.1).

Today the incurably sick and the dying are also exposed to serious risks. More and more people are succumbing to the temptation “to resolve the problem of suffering by eliminating it at the root, by hastening death so that it occurs at the moment considered most suitable” (§15.1). In some nations, causing the death of the severely handicapped or terminally ill is, if not legalized, at least benignly tolerated.

Biblical teaching on life

Chapter two of Evangelium Vitae describes the scriptural message concerning the goodness of human life which comes from God as his gift and is destined for fulfillment in communion with him. “The Gospel of life is something concrete and personal,” writes the Pope, “for it consists in the proclamation of the very person of Jesus” (§29.2). Divine revelation makes known “the complete truth concerning the value of human life” (§29.3). This disclosure begins in the Old Testament and is brought to perfection in the New Testament.

Through its experience of God’s gentle and intense love, Israel gradually came to appreciate that “life is always a good” (§34.1). In the Decalogue, God expressly reveals the truth about the sacred value of life. At the center of the Covenant is the commandment “You shall not kill” (Ex 20:13). This negative precept is “the beginning and the first necessary stage of the journey toward freedom” (§75.2). As well as prohibiting murder, the fifth commandment forbids, as Israel’s later legislation makes clear, any personal injury inflicted on another person. The Law’s high regard for the physical life of each individual reaches its summit in the Old Testament precept “You shall love your neighbor as yourself” (Lev 19:18).

For the Pope, the incomparable value of every person’s life is forcefully confirmed by the very fact of the Incarnation. In becoming man, the Son receives life from the Father and shares this life with his followers, giving their existence an unsurpassable value. Now his disciples know for sure that their lives are “a gift carefully guarded in the hands of the Father” (§32.2). Through his teaching, Christ vigorously confirms the commandment “You shall not kill.” But he also expands its scope. In the Sermon on the Mount, Jesus demands from his disciples a respect for life more exacting than what was previously known (cf. Mt 5:21-22). The profound meaning of the fifth commandment emerges in its full clarity as the “requirement to show reverence and love for every person and the life of every person” (§41.4).

In addition to preaching about life, Christ proclaims its value by making a total gift of his own life for the sake of others. Through his death, “Jesus reveals all the splendor and value of life” (§33.2); the Cross is “the fulfillment and the complete revelation of the whole Gospel of life” (§50.1). By offering himself at Calvary, Jesus becomes the source of new life for everyone. The Redemption therefore confirms “how precious man is in God’s eyes and how priceless the value of his life” (§25.3).

Innocent human life

Chapter three presents the doctrinal core of Evangelium Vitae. Here John Paul confronts the challenge posed by the “progressive weakening in individual consciences and in society of the sense of the absolute and grave moral illicitness of the direct taking of all innocent human life, especially at its beginning and at its end” (§57.3).

The Pope begins by reaffirming a traditional moral principle: “The commandment ‘You shall not kill’ has absolute value when it refers to the innocent person” (§57.1). While the right to life is always precious, he mentions two instances when it is not absolute. First, he repeats the Church’s common teaching on the right to legitimate self-defense, a right based on “the intrinsic value of life and the duty to love oneself no less than others” (§55.1). Second, he allows for the possibility of morally legitimate capital punishment. But John Paul foresees extremely few instances when capital punishment can in fact be justified: “Today . . . as a result of steady improvements in the organization of the penal system, such cases are very rare, if not practically non-existent” (§56.2).

Because of the gravity of the present-day attacks on life, the Pope authoritatively reasserts Catholic doctrine on the inviolability of innocent human life: “I confirm that the direct and voluntary killing of an innocent human being is always gravely immoral” (§57.4). This teaching, he continues, is “based upon that unwritten law which man, in the light of reason, finds in his own heart (cf. Rom 2:14-15), is reaffirmed by Sacred Scripture, transmitted by the Tradition of the Church and taught by the ordinary and universal Magisterium” (§57.4). Even if done with the intention of helping another, the killing of an innocent human being is always “an absolutely unacceptable act” (§63.2).

Abortion

Procured abortion is the deliberate and direct killing of a human being, by whatever means it is carried out, at any time between conception and birth. It includes the killing of human embryos “produced” for medical experiments or for tissue used to treat certain diseases. Abortion is a “particularly serious and deplorable” crime (§58.1).

All those who directly or indirectly influence a woman to have an abortion bear moral responsibility for the deed. The child’s father is to blame if he exerts pressure on the mother to have an abortion or leaves her to face the pregnancy alone. Similarly, guilt for the sin can extend to other family members and friends: to all those who subject the mother “to such strong pressure that she feels psychologically forced to have an abortion” (§59.1). Doctors and medical personnel are likewise guilty, if “they place at the service of death skills which were acquired for promoting life” (§59.1). Complicity in the evil of abortion also involves legislators, international organizations, and those who in any way encourage sexual permissiveness, a lack of esteem for motherhood, or systematic campaigns for the legalization and spread of abortion.

Evangelium Vitae recognizes that Sacred Scripture contains “no direct and explicit calls to protect human life at its very beginning, specifically life not yet born” (§44.1). But the encyclical also points out that the mere possibility of threatening unborn life is “completely foreign to the religious and cultural way of thinking of the People of God” (§44.1). Moreover, many scriptural passages refer with awe and love to the conception, growth, and birth of a child. The Bible affirms that “the life of every individual, from its very beginning, is part of God’s plan” (§44.3): “Before I formed you in the womb I knew you, and before you were born I consecrated you” (Jer 1:15).

Given the contemporary moral climate, the Pope believes that the Church’s teaching on abortion must be authoritatively restated. Once again invoking “the authority which Christ conferred upon Peter and his Successors, in communion with the Bishops,” John Paul writes: “I declare that direct abortion, that is, abortion willed as an end or as a means, always constitutes a grave moral disorder, since it is the deliberate killing of an innocent human being” (§62.3). Procured abortion is invariably an intrinsically evil act which can never be justified.

Since the Pope also wants to persuade men and women of good will who do not accept Church authority that abortion is evil, he answers two arguments which they routinely put forward to justify it. First, some argue that in cases such as rape and incest the fetus can be considered as an “unjust aggressor.” Because the unborn child is conceived by an act of violence, they maintain that it is not “innocent.” Abortion could then be allowed as a form of legitimate self-defense on the mother’s part. John Paul writes, however, that “no one more absolutely innocent could be imagined” (§58.3). Despite the tragic circumstances, an unborn child is never an aggressor, but always an innocent human being with the inviolable right to life.

Second, others defend abortion on the grounds that the embryo, at least for the first few weeks, does not yet enjoy the rights of a human person. To justify this position they sometimes invoke medieval theories on “ensoulment,” which was commonly held to occur a few weeks after conception, depending on the child’s sex. Consequently, in their view, it is morally permissible to terminate the pregnancy prior to ensoulment. The Pope, however, insists that the fetus must be treated as a human person from the moment of conception. To defend his position, he draws on an established tenet of modern biology: from the time that the ovum is fertilized, a distinct human life exists which is separate from that of the mother. For this reason, “the Church has always taught and continues to teach that the result of human procreation, from the first moment of its existence, must be guaranteed that unconditional respect which is morally due to the human being” (§60.2). An “individual” conceived by his or her mother is always a “person” with the absolute right to life.

Euthanasia

After treating abortion, John Paul turns his attention to the deliberate taking of life in its final stages. He defines euthanasia as “an action or omission which of itself and by intention causes death, with the purpose of eliminating all suffering” (§65.1). Like abortion, euthanasia can have accomplices. Anyone who shares the intention of a person who chooses to end his life or aids him in bringing it about is guilty of euthanasia.

The Pope carefully points out, however, that a sick person’s decision to forgo extraordinary medical treatment is different from euthanasia. When death is clearly imminent and inevitable, there is no moral obligation to resort to “aggressive medical treatment.” Procedures “which no longer correspond to the real situation of the patient, either because they are by now disproportionate to any expected results or because they impose an excessive burden on the patient and his family,” need not be undergone (§65.2). “To forgo extraordinary or disproportionate means is not,” John Paul writes, “the equivalent of suicide or euthanasia; it rather expresses acceptance of the human condition in the face of death” (§65.2).

Depending on the circumstances, euthanasia involves the moral evil of either suicide or murder. When individuals will to cause their own death, this choice entails the malice of suicide. Taking one’s own life is a gravely immoral act: “It involves the rejection of love of self and the renunciation of the obligation of justice and charity toward one’s neighbor, toward the communities to which one belongs, and toward society as a whole” (§66.1). Assisted suicide may be motivated by a concern to alleviate another’s suffering, but John Paul refers to this complicity in causing death as a “false mercy, and indeed a disturbing ‘perversion’ of mercy” (§66.2). True compassion leads to sharing pain, not killing someone whose suffering seems to be unbearable.

Euthanasia is even more evil when it takes the form of murder. This occurs when family members, medical personnel, or State authorities cause the death of a person who has neither requested it nor consented to it. A particularly nefarious form of euthanasia is that practiced “in order to increase the availability of organs for transplants . . . without respecting objective and adequate criteria which verify the death of the donor” (§15.3). When euthanasia entails murder, the Pope sees the temptation of Eden reenacted in modern dress: individuals or institutions claim the right to decide who should live and who should die. This arrogance, says John Paul, is “the height of arbitrariness and injustice” (§66.3).

In chapter two, the Pope considers the biblical foundations for the Church’s teaching on euthanasia. The Old Testament does not explicitly condemn attempts to end the life of the sick or the aged. There is no need for it to do so, since “the cultural and religious context of the Bible is in no way touched by such temptations” (§46.1). While the New Testament fails to mention euthanasia by name, it teaches that no one “can arbitrarily choose whether to live or die; the absolute master of such a decision is the Creator alone” (§47.3).

Unfortunately, large segments of contemporary society fail to show the reverence for life that emerges from the biblical tradition. Evangelium Vitae gives three reasons why the cultural climate in many parts of the world increasingly favors euthanasia. First, society rejects suffering as an evil “always and in every way to be avoided” (§23.2). When its avoidance is impossible, “then life appears to have lost all meaning and the temptation grows in man to claim the right to suppress it” (§23.2). Insofar as people value life only to the extent that it can bring pleasure, the door is open to “mercy killing.” Second, when efficient production and consumption are society’s guiding principles, then it seems that “a hopelessly impaired life no longer has any value” (§64.3). Especially in prosperous countries, the elderly, the incurably ill, and mentally and physically handicapped persons are all too often viewed, and are made to feel, as if they are an onus on themselves or others. Third, the encyclical mentions the “utilitarian motive of avoiding costs which bring no return and weigh heavily on society” as an attitude which fosters euthanasia (§15.3).

In order to remove any possible doubt concerning what the Church believes about euthanasia, John Paul authoritatively reaffirms her teaching: “In harmony with the Magisterium of my Predecessors and in communion with the Bishops of the Catholic Church, I confirm that euthanasia is a grave violation of the law of God, since it is the deliberate and morally unacceptable killing of a human person. This doctrine is based upon the natural law and upon the written word of God, is transmitted by the Church’s Tradition and taught by the ordinary and universal Magisterium” (§65.4). The Church’s rejection of euthanasia is, therefore, unequivocal. Catholics are to accept this teaching as a truth taught definitively by the bishops in union with the Pope.

Moral foundation of civil law

In the closing sections of chapter three, John Paul examines the relationship between civil and moral law in matters that touch upon human life. According to Catholic teaching, civil law should acknowledge, defend, and promote the authentic moral values which can be known from reason; that is, civil law should mirror the natural moral law. “The doctrine on the necessary conformity of civil law with the moral law,” observes the Pope, “is in continuity with the whole tradition of the Church” (§72.1). Legislation must therefore assure “respect for certain fundamental rights which innately belong to the person, rights which every positive law must recognize and guarantee” (§71.3). Foremost among these rights is the right to life of every innocent human being.

The Pope also recalls that the moral value of democracy depends on its “conformity to the moral law to which it, like every other form of human behavior, must be subject” (§70.4). When democracy is misunderstood as the purely formal rule of the majority, it has no objective moral anchor and readily “moves toward a form of totalitarianism” (§20.2).

John Paul recognizes that civil law cannot take the place of conscience or dictate moral norms; rather, it has the specific role of “ensuring the common good of people through the recognition and defense of their fundamental rights, and the promotion of peace and of public morality” (§71.3). Thus, civil law may never legitimize the actions of individuals who disregard the right to life. Laws which permit abortion and euthanasia – practices which are radically opposed to justice, the common good, and the fundamental rights of human beings – lack juridical validity and are not binding. The Pope insists that “in the case of an intrinsically unjust law, such as a law permitting abortion or euthanasia, it is therefore never licit to obey it, or to ‘take part in a propaganda campaign in favor of such a law, or vote for it’ ” (§73.2). In order to fulfill their duty to protect innocent human life, Catholics are to oppose unjust laws by conscientious objection.

People of life and for life

In chapter four of Evangelium Vitae, the Pope points out that the Gospel of life is at the heart of the evangelizing mission of the Church, which must proclaim Jesus, the “word of life” (1 Jn 1:1). He invites all her members to testify before the world that they are a “people of life and for life” (§78.3). They are people of life because God has saved them through the Cross, the source of all life. Through their new birth, they are empowered to become a people for life. Both as individuals and as a Church community, God entrusts people with the threefold responsibility of proclaiming, celebrating, and serving the Gospel of life; they are “to make unconditional respect for human life the foundation of a renewed society” (§77.3).

Everyone in the Church is to announce by word and deed the good news that human life is sacred and inviolable. This proclamation demands “the renewal of a culture of life within Christian communities themselves” (§95.3). All Catholics, including bishops, priests, parents, theologians, catechists, and teachers, have a role to play in carrying out this prophetic mission. With gratitude for the beauty and grandeur of “the God of life, the God who gives life” (§84.1), the people for life fulfill their priestly mission above all by adopting “a contemplative outlook.” “It is the outlook,” the Pope says, “of those who do not presume to take possession of reality but instead accept it as a gift, discovering in all things the reflection of the Creator and seeing in every person his living image” (§83.2). As sharers in Christ’s royal mission, people foster life through works of charity. Individual acts of mercy, volunteer work, social activity, and political commitment are ways of showing care for “all life and for the life of everyone” (§87.3). The Pope appeals to individuals, families, movements, and associations to share the task of building “a society in which the dignity of each person is recognized and protected and the lives of all are defended and enhanced” (§90.2).

John Paul II makes a pressing appeal for “a general mobilization of consciences and a united ethical effort to activate a great campaign in support of life. All together, we must build a new culture of life” (§95.2). Every family, parish, and Church institution must incorporate the Gospel of life into its mission. The Pope singles out six groups as the principal artisans of the hoped-for civilization of love: the family, women, educators, health-care professionals, intellectuals, and media personnel.

Evangelium Vitae closes with a trusting invocation of Mary, “who accepted ‘Life’ in the name of all and for the sake of all” (§102.2). Portrayed in Revelation as the “woman” engaged in combat with the “great red dragon” (12:1-3), she “helps the Church to realize that life is always at the center of a great struggle” between good and evil, between light and darkness” (§104.3). In Mary’s motherhood of all men and women, the Church finds “a sign of sure hope and solace” (§105.3).

Key Themes

As well as clearly setting out the Church's teaching on innocent human life, abortion, and euthanasia, Evangelium Vitae reflects other major concerns of John Paul II. Two can be mentioned here: the roots of the culture of death and the relationship between civil and moral law in matters concerned with human life.

Evangelium Vitae

Roots of the culture of death

John Paul singles out four main factors which foster the culture of death: a misunderstanding of the person as a “subject,” a false idea of freedom, loss of the sense of God, and the obscuring of the moral conscience.

The Pope places a high premium on the individual as a being who enjoys freedom and responsibility. Whether unborn, handicapped, weak, defenseless, or terminally ill, all people, whatever their condition, enjoy dignity and rights as human subjects. This affirmation leads him to warn against the distorted and limited idea which “recognizes as a subject of rights only the person who enjoys full or at least incipient autonomy and who emerges from a state of total dependence on others” (§19.2). He then adds: “It is clear that on the basis of these presuppositions there is no place in the world for anyone who, like the unborn or the dying, is a weak element in the social structure, or for anyone who appears completely at the mercy of others” (§19.2). According to the Pope, basic rights are not acquired or merited: all people enjoy inalienable rights because they are created in God’s image and redeemed by his Son.

Second, in Evangelium Vitae John Paul reaffirms what he discussed at length in Veritatis Splendor (1993): “Freedom negates and destroys itself, and becomes a factor leading to the destruction of others, when it no longer recognizes and respects its essential link with the truth” (§19.5, cf. §96.1). Those with an individualistic idea of freedom determine their moral choices by “subjective and changeable opinion or . . . selfish interest and whim” (§19.5). This so-called freedom is untethered from the objective truth about what is truly good and evil.

When this view of freedom takes hold, which understands it as the right to make arbitrary decisions, “to do your own thing,” social life is governed by “the shifting sands of complete relativism” (§20.1). In this case, convention, not truth, determines what moral decisions and civil laws are made. “Everything is negotiable, everything is open to bargaining,” the Pope laments, “even the first of the fundamental rights, the right to life” (§20.1).

If freedom is interpreted as absolute personal autonomy, the right to do as you please, conflict inevitably results. This sinister caricature of true freedom “leads to the breakdown of a genuinely human coexistence” (§20.2). According to the Pope, “to claim the right to abortion, infanticide and euthanasia, and to recognize that right in law means to attribute to human freedom a perverse and evil significance: that of an absolute power over others and against others” (§20.3, cf. §18.2). Society becomes an agglomeration of individuals without mutual bonds. Solidarity and concern for others are neglected, and people are put “at the mercy of the unrestrained will of individuals or the oppressive totalitarianism of public authority” (§96.2).

To the extent that solidarity with other people is spurned, the meaning of authentic freedom is undermined. Genuine freedom accepts that God has entrusted men and women to one another. They are free in order to serve and love others: to be their “brother’s keeper” (Gen 4:10). John Paul affirms that “there is no true freedom where life is not welcomed and loved; and there is no fullness of life except in freedom” (§96.1).

Third, the roots of the culture of death also lie in “the eclipse of the sense of God and of man, typical of a social and cultural climate dominated by secularism” (§21.1). This eclipse of the transcendent, according to John Paul, leads to practical materialism, which breeds individualism, utilitarianism, hedonism, the censoring of suffering, the denigration of the body, and the depersonalization of sexuality (cf. §23). It leaves the door open to the forces of evil to sabotage reverence for life in novel and ingenious ways. Because of their “Promethean attitude” (§15.3), people are willing to ratify Cain’s sin. Claiming to be the total masters of their own fate and accountable to no one higher than themselves, human beings set themselves against God or ignore his existence. Men and women dare to assume that they “can control life and death by taking the decisions about them into their own hands” (§15.3). But the Pope believes that human life is something which does not belong to them, “because it is the property and gift of God the Creator and Father” (§40.1).

John Paul could not be more forthright: “Where God is denied and people live as though he did not exist, or his commandments are not taken into account, the dignity of the human person and the inviolability of human life also end up being rejected or compromised” (§96.3). The decline in religious faith that accompanies secularism influences how human life is regarded. “When God is not acknowledged as God,” says the Pope, “the profound meaning of man is betrayed and communion between people is compromised” (§36.1). Indifference to religion leads people to regard individuals as “things” instead of “persons.” Life is no longer recognized as God’s gift: a sacred reality entrusted to human veneration and responsibility. Rather, life becomes man’s “exclusive property, completely subject to his control and manipulation” (§22.1). Without God, contempt for life inevitably results.

Lastly, the darkening of the moral conscience also contributes to an anti-life culture. Contemporary women and men are finding it “increasingly difficult to distinguish between good and evil in what concerns the basic value of human life” (§4.3). When people are confused about whether life is truly good, they often make choices which desecrate its dignity. In turn, this violation of the moral law “produces a kind of progressive darkening of the capacity to discern God’s living and saving presence” (§21.1). Moral conscience, whether of an individual or of society as a whole, becomes more and more obscure. This darkened conscience tolerates, and even promotes, anti-life attitudes and behavior, thus “creating and consolidating actual ‘structures of sin’ which go against life” (§24.1). In the Pope’s mind, confusion between good and evil brought on by the eclipse of conscience presents an “extremely serious and mortal danger” to personal and social life (§24.1).

Evangelium Vitae

Human life and the law

John Paul II is disconcerted because legislation in many countries no longer punishes attacks on innocent life but has made them legal. This is “a disturbing symptom and a significant cause of grave moral decline” (§4.2). Instead of condemning such assaults as “crimes,” people claim them as “rights.” This situation, the Pope points out, contains a “surprising contradiction” (§18.3). On the one hand, no previous generation has spoken so insistently about inalienable human rights. On the other hand, the right to life is often trampled upon in practice as a consequence of anti-life laws.

Tragically, the very right to life has become the object of legislative debate. Instead of being accepted as given by creation, this right is now often viewed as granted by the State. The Pope insists, however, that the State is the guardian of inalienable human rights; it has no power to modify or abolish them. Attempts to do so are, he says, a “tragic caricature of legality” (§20.2). Indeed, “the value of democracy stands or falls with the values which it embodies and promotes” (§70.4). If a government’s laws fail to defend life, it is “transformed into a tyrant State, which arrogates to itself the right to dispose of the life of the weakest and most defenseless members” (§20.2).

John Paul describes the two different views concerning the relation of civil law to moral law which are proposed by those who favor abortion, euthanasia, and other anti-life practices. On the one hand, some argue that, with regard to life questions, every individual has the right to make whatever “private” choices he or she wants. Thus, their argument runs, “people should be allowed complete freedom to dispose of their own lives as well as of the lives of the unborn” (§68.4). The only limitation which they admit is that of not infringing on the freedom or rights of others. According to them, therefore, the State should not legislate in this sphere; it should neither adopt nor approve any specific ethical position on life issues.

On the other hand, other advocates of anti-life practices recognize the need for legislation in these areas and lobby for permissive laws. In fact, they are often successful in securing a legal justification for attacks on human life, “as if they were rights which the State, at least under certain conditions, must acknowledge as belonging to citizens” (§68.1). Laws concerning life should express what “the majority itself considers moral and actually practices” (§69.1). Only this practical relativism, they claim, can guarantee freedom and social harmony in a pluralistic society. To insist on objective moral norms as the foundation of law would lead to the authoritarianism of one group imposing its will on another.

The Pope, however, rejects both of these positions. First, the protection of life cannot be left to the whim of personal choice. The State, which exists to serve the common good and the good of each individual, has the duty of defending and promoting human life, dignity, and rights. Thus, it must recognize and defend the principle of “unconditional respect for the right to life of every innocent person – from conception to natural death” (§101.3). Second, authentic moral norms cannot be founded on changeable majority opinion. Public authority, writes the Pope, “can never presume to legitimize as a right of individuals – even if they are the majority of the members of society – an offense against other persons caused by the disregard of so fundamental a right as the right to life” (§71.3). Majorities have no right to deny the natural law written in the human heart. If they do, they are guilty of “making a ‘tyrannical’ decision with regard to the weakest and most defenseless human beings” (§70.3). True democracy is built on the acknowledgment of every person’s dignity and rights.

In the face of laws which allow the direct killing of innocent human beings, the encyclical restates a firm principle of Catholic teaching: “A civil law authorizing abortion or euthanasia ceases by that very fact to be a true, morally binding civil law” (§72.2). Laws which embody an injustice are inherently unjust and therefore lack all moral authority. With this principle in mind, John Paul takes up the practical question about how Catholics in the areas of politics and health care should deal with anti-life legislation.

Many political leaders, including some who are Catholics, maintain that they must “clearly separate the realm of private conscience from that of public conduct” (§69.1). When legislating, they are willing to lay aside their personal convictions about the inviolability of human life in deference to other people’s freedom of choice. In this case, as the Pope observes, “individual responsibility is thus turned over to the civil law, with a renouncing of personal conscience, at least in the public sphere” (§69.2). He affirms, on the contrary, that a politician cannot renounce personal responsibility for public decisions, “especially when he or she has a legislative or decision-making mandate, which calls that person to answer to God, to his or her own conscience and to the whole of society for choices which may be contrary to the common good” (§90.3). If an individual is personally opposed to a proposed unjust law, he or she must not vote for it and, if passed, must work to change it. Furthermore, Catholics may never campaign or vote to introduce anti-life legislation. “This cooperation,” writes John Paul, “can never be justified” (§74.2).

While Catholics can never support the legalization of intrinsically evil acts such as abortion and euthanasia, the delicate question arises whether they can ever vote for a law which aims to restrict, but not eliminate, abortion. Today some countries are beginning to rethink their permissive abortion laws. The Pope addresses the situation when there is no real possibility of passing legislation which outlaws all direct abortion. Does voting for a restrictive proposal involve the approval of evil?

In carefully chosen words, John Paul answers: “When it is not possible to overturn or completely abrogate a pro-abortion law, an elected official, whose absolute personal opposition to procured abortion was well known, could licitly support proposals aimed at limiting the harm done by such a law and at lessening its negative consequences at the level of general opinion and public morality” (§73.3). In these circumstances, the Pope recognizes the legitimacy of political compromise. Voting for a more restrictive law “does not in fact represent an illicit cooperation with an unjust law, but rather a legitimate and proper attempt to limit its evil aspects” (§73.3).

Besides politicians and voters, those in the health and allied professions who have to work in situations where unjust laws are in force also face acute moral dilemmas. To what extent can they cooperate in a practice such as abortion which, though legal, is contrary to the natural and revealed law?

Evangelium Vitae leaves no room for ambiguity. “There is no obligation in conscience to obey such laws; instead there is a grave and clear obligation to oppose them by conscientious objection” (§73.1). The encyclical gives two reasons for this position. First, no one has a “right” to kill innocent human life. Second, the morality of an act is not determined by what civil law permits but by the dictates of the moral law: “We must obey God rather than men” (Acts 5:29). “Christians, like all people of good will,” says John Paul, “are called upon under grave obligation of conscience not to cooperate formally in practices which, even if permitted by civil legislation, are contrary to God’s law” (§74.2). The refusal to take part in attacks on innocent human life is, therefore, an absolute moral imperative.

The Pope also makes a plea expressly aimed at legislators in countries which have legalized anti-life practices. When abortion laws are on the books, civil law should guarantee the right of conscientious objection to those in positions where unjust laws impinge upon the practice of their profession. According to him, everyone has a basic human right to refuse to take part in any consultation, preparation, or carrying out of an act against life. The reason is clear. No State which respects true human dignity and freedom can force a person “to perform an action intrinsically incompatible with human dignity” (§74.3). Furthermore, in such cases legislation should protect conscientious objectors from punitive disciplinary, professional, and financial measures.

To build a new culture of life, John Paul is convinced that “a great prayer for life is urgently needed, a prayer which will rise up throughout the world” (§100.2). Every believer, association, and Church community should commit itself to prayer and fasting “so that power from on high will break down the walls of lies and deceit: the walls which conceal from the sight of so many of our brothers and sisters the evil of practices and laws which are hostile to life” (§100.2). Despite his dire warnings about the ravages of the culture of death, the Pope’s chief concern in Evangelium Vitae is to ignite a new passion for the cause of life, and he enlists Mary in this noble cause. “As a living word of comfort for the Church in her struggle against death” (§105.1), the Virgin Mother assures us that her Son has already defeated the forces of death. And so, with confidence, the Pope prays:

“O Mary,
bright dawn of the new world,
Mother of the living,
to you do we entrust the cause of life” (§105.4).

Introduction

1.1 The Gospel of life is at the heart of Jesus' message. Lovingly received day after day by the Church, it is to be preached with dauntless fidelity as "good news" to the people of every age and culture.

1.2 At the dawn of salvation, it is the birth of a child which is proclaimed as joyful news: "I bring you good news of a great joy which will come to all the people; for to you is born this day in the city of David a Savior, who is Christ the Lord" (Lk 2:10-11). The source of this "great joy" is the birth of the Savior; but Christmas also reveals the full meaning of every human birth, and the joy which accompanies the birth of the Messiah is thus seen to be the foundation and fulfillment of joy at every child born into the world (cf. Jn 16:21).

1.3 When he presents the heart of his redemptive mission, Jesus says: "I came that they may have life, and have it abundantly" (Jn 10:10). In truth, he is referring to that "new" and "eternal" life which consists in communion with the Father, to which every person is freely called in the Son by the power of the Sanctifying Spirit. It is precisely in this "life" that all the aspects and stages of human life achieve their full significance.

The incomparable worth of the human person

2.1 Man is called to a fullness of life which far exceeds the dimensions of his earthly existence because it consists in sharing the very life of God. The loftiness of this supernatural vocation reveals the greatness and the inestimable value of human life even in its temporal phase. Life in time, in fact, is the fundamental condition, the initial stage and an integral part of the entire unified process of human existence. It is a process which, unexpectedly and undeservedly, is enlightened by the promise and renewed by the gift of divine life, which will reach its full realization in eternity (cf. 1 Jn 3:1-2). At the same time, it is precisely this supernatural calling which highlights the relative character of each individual's earthly life. After all, life on earth is not an "ultimate" but a "penultimate" reality; even so, it remains a sacred reality entrusted to us, to be preserved with a sense of responsibility and brought to perfection in love and in the gift of ourselves to God and to our brothers and sisters.

2.2 The Church knows that this Gospel of life, which she has received from her Lord,<sup>1</sup> has a profound and persuasive echo in the heart of every person – believer and nonbeliever alike – because it marvelously fulfills all the heart's expectations while infinitely surpassing them. Even in the midst of difficulties and uncertainties, every person sincerely open to truth and goodness can, by the light of reason and the hidden action of grace, come to recognize in the natural law written in the heart (cf. Rom 2:14-15) the sacred value of human life from its very beginning until its end, and can affirm the right of every human being to have this primary good respected to the highest degree. Upon the recognition of this right, every human community and the political community itself are founded.

2.3 In a special way, believers in Christ must defend and promote this right, aware as they are of the wonderful truth recalled by the Second Vatican Council: "By his Incarnation the Son of God has united himself in some fashion with every human being."<sup>2</sup> This saving event reveals to humanity not only the boundless love of God, who "so loved the world that he gave his only Son" (Jn 3:16), but also the incomparable value of every human person.

2.4 The Church, faithfully contemplating the mystery of the Redemption, acknowledges this value with ever new wonder.<sup>3</sup> She feels called to proclaim to the people of all times this "Gospel," the source of invincible hope and true joy for every period of history. The Gospel of God's love for man, the Gospel of the dignity of the person and the Gospel of life are a single and indivisible Gospel.

2.5 For this reason, man – living man – represents the primary and fundamental way for the Church.<sup>4</sup>

New threats to human life

3.1 Every individual, precisely by reason of the mystery of the Word of God who was made flesh (cf. Jn 1:14), is entrusted to the maternal care of the Church. Therefore every threat to human dignity and life must necessarily be felt in the Church's very heart; it cannot but affect her at the core of her faith in the redemptive Incarnation of the Son of God, and engage her in her mission of proclaiming the Gospel of life in all the world and to every creature (cf. Mk 16:15).

3.2 Today this proclamation is especially pressing because of the extraordinary increase and gravity of threats to the life of individuals and peoples, especially where life is weak and defenseless. In addition to the ancient scourges of poverty, hunger, endemic diseases, violence and war, new threats are emerging on an alarmingly vast scale.

3.3 The Second Vatican Council, in a passage which retains all its relevance today, forcefully condemned a number of crimes and attacks against human life. Thirty years later, taking up the words of the Council and with the same forcefulness, I repeat that condemnation in the name of the whole Church, certain that I am interpreting the genuine sentiment of every upright conscience: "Whatever is opposed to life itself such as any type of murder, genocide, abortion, euthanasia or willful self-destruction; whatever violates the integrity of the human person such as mutilation, torments inflicted on body or mind, attempts to coerce the will itself; whatever insults human dignity such as subhuman living conditions, arbitrary imprisonment, deportation, slavery, prostitution, the selling of women and children; as well as disgraceful working conditions, where people are treated as mere instruments of gain rather than as free and responsible persons; all these things and others like them are infamies indeed. They poison human society, and they do more harm to those who practice them than to those who suffer from the injury. Moreover, they are a supreme dishonor to the Creator."<sup>5</sup>

4.1 Unfortunately, this disturbing state of affairs, far from decreasing, is expanding: with the new prospects opened up by scientific and technological progress there arise new forms of attacks on the dignity of the human being. At the same time a new cultural climate is developing and taking hold which gives crimes against life a new and – if possible – even more sinister character, giving rise to further grave concern: broad sectors of public opinion justify certain crimes against life in the name of the rights of individual freedom, and on this basis they claim not only exemption from punishment but even authorization by the State, so that these things can be done with total freedom and indeed with the free assistance of health-care systems.

4.2 All this is causing a profound change in the way in which life and relationships between people are considered. The fact that legislation in many countries, perhaps even departing from basic principles of their constitutions, has determined not to punish these practices against life, and even to make them altogether legal, is both a disturbing symptom and a significant cause of grave moral decline. Choices once unanimously considered criminal and rejected by the common moral sense are gradually becoming socially acceptable. Even certain sectors of the medical profession, which by its calling is directed to the defense and care of human life, are increasingly willing to carry out these acts against the person. In this way the very nature of the medical profession is distorted and contradicted, and the dignity of those who practice it is degraded. In such a cultural and legislative situation, the serious demographic, social and family problems which weigh upon many of the world's peoples and which require responsible and effective attention from national and international bodies are left open to false and deceptive solutions, opposed to the truth and the good of persons and nations.

4.3 The end result of this is tragic: not only is the fact of the destruction of so many human lives still to be born or in their final stage extremely grave and disturbing, but no less grave and disturbing is the fact that conscience itself, darkened as it were by such widespread conditioning, is finding it increasingly difficult to distinguish between good and evil in what concerns the basic value of human life.

In communion with all the Bishops of the world

5.1 The Extraordinary Consistory of Cardinals held in Rome on April 4-7, 1991, was devoted to the problem of the threats to human life in our day. After a thorough and detailed discussion of the problem and of the challenges it poses to the entire human family and in particular to the Christian community, the Cardinals unanimously asked me to reaffirm with the authority of the Successor of Peter the value of human life and its inviolability, in the light of present circumstances and attacks threatening it today.

5.2 In response to this request, at Pentecost in 1991 I wrote a personal letter to each of my Brother Bishops asking them, in the spirit of episcopal collegiality, to offer me their cooperation in drawing up a specific document.<sup>6</sup> I am deeply grateful to all the Bishops who replied and provided me with valuable facts, suggestions and proposals. In so doing they bore witness to their unanimous desire to share in the doctrinal and pastoral mission of the Church with regard to the Gospel of life.

5.3 In that same letter, written shortly after the celebration of the centenary of the Encyclical Rerum Novarum, I drew everyone's attention to this striking analogy: "Just as a century ago it was the working classes which were oppressed in their fundamental rights, and the Church very courageously came to their defense by proclaiming the sacrosanct rights of the worker as a person, so now, when another category of persons is being oppressed in the fundamental right to life, the Church feels in duty bound to speak out with the same courage on behalf of those who have no voice. Hers is always the evangelical cry in defense of the world's poor, those who are threatened and despised and whose human rights are violated."<sup>7</sup>

5.4 Today there exists a great multitude of weak and defenseless human beings, unborn children in particular, whose fundamental right to life is being trampled upon. If, at the end of the last century, the Church could not be silent about the injustices of those times, still less can she be silent today when the social injustices of the past, unfortunately not yet overcome, are being compounded in many regions of the world by still more grievous forms of injustice and oppression, even if these are being presented as elements of progress in view of a new world order.

5.5 The present Encyclical, the fruit of the cooperation of the Episcopate of every country of the world, is therefore meant to be a precise and vigorous reaffirmation of the value of human life and its inviolability, and at the same time a pressing appeal addressed to each and every person in the name of God: respect, protect, love and serve life, every human life! Only in this direction will you find justice, development, true freedom, peace and happiness!

5.6 May these words reach all the sons and daughters of the Church! May they reach all people of good will who are concerned for the good of every man and woman and for the destiny of the whole of society!

6.1 In profound communion with all my brothers and sisters in the faith and inspired by genuine friendship toward all, I wish to meditate once more upon and proclaim the Gospel of life, the splendor of truth which enlightens consciences, the clear light which corrects the darkened gaze, and the unfailing source of faithfulness and steadfastness in facing the ever new challenges which we meet along our path.

6.2 As I recall the powerful experience of the Year of the Family, as if to complete the Letter which I wrote “to every particular family in every part of the world,”<sup>8</sup> I look with renewed confidence to every household and I pray that at every level a general commitment to support the family will reappear and be strengthened, so that today too – even amid so many difficulties and serious threats – the family will always remain, in accordance with God’s plan, the “sanctuary of life.”<sup>9</sup>

6.3 To all the members of the Church, the people of life and for life, I make this most urgent appeal, that together we may offer this world of ours new signs of hope and work to ensure that justice and solidarity will increase and that a new culture of human life will be affirmed, for the building of an authentic civilization of truth and love.

The Voice of Your Brother's Blood Cries to Me from the Ground

Present-Day Threats to Human Life

Evangelium Vitae

“Cain rose up against his brother Abel and killed him” (Gen 4:8): the roots of violence against life

7.1 “God did not make death, and he does not delight in the death of the living. For he has created all things that they might exist. . . . God created man for incorruption and made him in the image of his own eternity, but through the devil’s envy death entered the world, and those who belong to his party experience it” (Wis 1:13-14, 2:23-24).

7.2 The Gospel of life, proclaimed in the beginning when man was created in the image of God for a destiny of full and perfect life (cf. Gen 2:7; Wis 9:2-3), is contradicted by the painful experience of death which enters the world and casts its shadow of meaninglessness over man’s entire existence. Death came into the world as a result of the devil’s envy (cf. Gen 3:1, 4-5) and the sin of our first parents (cf. Gen 2:17, 3:17-19). And death entered it in a violent way, through the killing of Abel by his brother Cain: “And when they were in the field, Cain rose up against his brother Abel, and killed him” (Gen 4:8).

7.3 This first murder is presented with singular eloquence in a page of the Book of Genesis which has universal significance: it is a page rewritten daily, with inexorable and degrading frequency, in the book of human history.

7.4 Let us reread together this biblical account which, despite its archaic structure and its extreme simplicity, has much to teach us.

“Now Abel was a keeper of sheep, and Cain a tiller of the ground. In the course of time Cain brought to the Lord an offering of the fruit of the ground, and Abel brought of the firstlings of his flock and of their fat portions. And the Lord had regard for Abel and his offering, but for Cain and his offering he had not regard. So Cain was very angry, and his countenance fell. The Lord said to Cain, ‘Why are you angry and why has your countenance fallen? If you do well, will you not be accepted? And if you do not do well, sin is crouching at the door; its desire is for you, but you must master it.’

“Cain said to Abel his brother, ‘Let us go out to the field.’ And when they were in the field, Cain rose up against his brother Abel, and killed him. Then the Lord said to Cain, ‘Where is Abel your brother?’ He said, ‘I do not know; am I my brother’s keeper?’ And the Lord said, ‘What have you done? The voice of your brother’s blood is crying to me from the ground. And now you are cursed from the ground, which has opened its mouth to receive your brother’s blood from your hand. When you till the ground, it shall no longer yield to you its strength; you shall be a fugitive and a wanderer on the earth.’ Cain said to the Lord, ‘My punishment is greater than I can bear. Behold, you have driven me this day away from the ground; and from your face I shall be hidden; and I shall be a fugitive and a wanderer on the earth, and whoever finds me will slay me.’ Then the Lord said to him, ‘Not so! If anyone slays Cain, vengeance shall be taken on him sevenfold.’ And the Lord put a mark on Cain, lest any who came upon him should kill him. Then Cain went away from the presence of the Lord, and dwelt in the land of Nod, east of Eden” (Gen 4:2-16).

8.1 Cain was “very angry” and his countenance “fell” because “the Lord had regard for Abel and his offering” (Gen 4:4-5). The biblical text does not reveal the reason why God prefers Abel’s sacrifice to Cain’s. It clearly shows, however, that God, although preferring Abel’s gift, does not interrupt his dialogue with Cain. He admonishes him, reminding him of his freedom in the face of evil: man is in no way predestined to evil. Certainly, like Adam, he is tempted by the malevolent force of sin which, like a wild beast, lies in wait at the door of his heart, ready to leap on its prey. But Cain remains free in the face of sin. He can and must overcome it: “Its desire is for you, but you must master it” (Gen 4:7).

8.2 Envy and anger have the upper hand over the Lord’s warning, and so Cain attacks his own brother and kills him. As we read in the Catechism of the Catholic Church: “In the account of Abel’s murder by his brother Cain, Scripture reveals the presence of anger and envy in man, consequences of original sin, from the beginning of human history. Man has become the enemy of his fellow man.”<sup>10</sup>

8.3 Brother kills brother. Like the first fratricide, every murder is a violation of the “spiritual” kinship uniting mankind in one great family,<sup>11</sup> in which all share the same fundamental good: equal personal dignity. Not infrequently the kinship “of flesh and blood” is also violated; for example when threats to life arise within the relationship between parents and children such as happens in abortion or when, in the wider context of family or kinship, euthanasia is encouraged or practiced.

8.4 At the root of every act of violence against one’s neighbor there is a concession to the “thinking” of the evil one, the one who “was a murderer from the beginning” (Jn 8:44). As the Apostle John reminds us: “For this is the message which you have heard from the beginning, that we should love one another, and not be like Cain who was of the evil one and murdered his brother” (1 Jn 3:11-12). Cain’s killing of his brother at the very dawn of history is thus a sad witness of how evil spreads with amazing speed: man’s revolt against God in the earthly paradise is followed by the deadly combat of man against man.

8.5 After the crime, God intervenes to avenge the one killed. Before God, who asks him about the fate of Abel, Cain, instead of showing remorse and apologizing, arrogantly eludes the question: “I do not know; am I my brother’s keeper?” (Gen 4:9). “I do not know”: Cain tries to cover up his crime with a lie. This was and still is the case, when all kinds of ideologies try to justify and disguise the most atrocious crimes against human beings. “Am I my brother’s keeper?”: Cain does not wish to think about his brother and refuses to accept the responsibility which every person has toward others. We cannot but think of today’s tendency for people to refuse to accept responsibility for their brothers and sisters. Symptoms of this trend include the lack of solidarity toward society’s weakest members – such as the elderly, the infirm, immigrants, children – and the indifference frequently found in relations between the world’s peoples even when basic values such as survival, freedom and peace are involved.

9.1 But God cannot leave the crime unpunished: from the ground on which it has been spilt, the blood of the one murdered demands that God should render justice (cf. Gen 37:26; Is 26:21; Ezek 24:7-8). From this text the Church has taken the name of the “sins which cry to God for justice,” and first among them she has included willful murder.<sup>12</sup> For the Jewish people, as for many peoples of antiquity, blood is the source of life. Indeed “the blood is the life” (Dt 12:23), and life, especially human life, belongs only to God: for this reason whoever attacks human life, in some way attacks God himself.

9.2 Cain is cursed by God and also by the earth, which will deny him its fruit (cf. Gen 4:11-12). He is punished: he will live in the wilderness and the desert. Murderous violence profoundly changes man’s environment. From being the “garden of Eden” (Gen 2:15), a place of plenty, of harmonious interpersonal relationships and of friendship with God, the earth becomes “the land of Nod” (Gen 4:16), a place of scarcity, loneliness and separation from God. Cain will be “a fugitive and a wanderer on the earth” (Gen 4:14): uncertainty and restlessness will follow him forever.

9.3 And yet God, who is always merciful even when he punishes, “put a mark on Cain, lest any who came upon him should kill him” (Gen 4:15). He thus gave him a distinctive sign, not to condemn him to the hatred of others, but to protect and defend him from those wishing to kill him, even out of a desire to avenge Abel’s death. Not even a murderer loses his personal dignity, and God himself pledges to guarantee this. And it is precisely here that the paradoxical mystery of the merciful justice of God is shown forth. As Saint Ambrose writes: “Once the crime is admitted at the very inception of this sinful act of parricide, then the divine law of God’s mercy should be immediately extended. If punishment is forthwith inflicted on the accused, then men in the exercise of justice would in no way observe patience and moderation, but would straightaway condemn the defendant to punishment. . . . God drove Cain out of his presence and sent him into exile far away from his native land, so that he passed from a life of human kindness to one which was more akin to the rude existence of a wild beast. God, who preferred the correction rather than the death of a sinner, did not desire that a homicide be punished by the exaction of another act of homicide.”<sup>13</sup>

Evangelium Vitae

“What have you done?” (Gen 4:10): the eclipse of the value of life

10.1 The Lord said to Cain: “What have you done? The voice of your brother’s blood is crying to me from the ground” (Gen 4:10). The voice of the blood shed by men continues to cry out from generation to generation in ever new and different ways.

10.2 The Lord’s question, “What have you done?” which Cain cannot escape, is addressed also to the people of today, to make them realize the extent and gravity of the attacks against life which continue to mark human history; to make them discover what causes these attacks and feeds them; and to make them ponder seriously the consequences which derive from these attacks for the existence of individuals and peoples.

10.3 Some threats come from nature itself, but they are made worse by the culpable indifference and negligence of those who could in some cases remedy them. Others are the result of situations of violence, hatred and conflicting interests, which lead people to attack others through murder, war, slaughter and genocide.

10.4 And how can we fail to consider the violence against life done to millions of human beings, especially children, who are forced into poverty, malnutrition and hunger because of an unjust distribution of resources between peoples and between social classes? And what of the violence inherent not only in wars as such, but in the scandalous arms trade, which spawns the many armed conflicts which stain our world with blood? What of the spreading of death caused by reckless tampering with the world’s ecological balance, by the criminal spread of drugs or by the promotion of certain kinds of sexual activity which, besides being morally unacceptable, also involve grave risks to life? It is impossible to catalog completely the vast array of threats to human life, so many are the forms, whether explicit or hidden, in which they appear today!

11.1 Here though we shall concentrate particular attention on another category of attacks affecting life in its earliest and in its final stages, attacks which present new characteristics with respect to the past and which raise questions of extraordinary seriousness. It is not only that in generalized opinion these attacks tend no longer to be considered as “crimes”; paradoxically they assume the nature of “rights,” to the point that the State is called upon to give them legal recognition and to make them available through the free services of health-care personnel. Such attacks strike human life at the time of its greatest frailty, when it lacks any means of self-defense. Even more serious is the fact that, most often, those attacks are carried out in the very heart of and with the complicity of the family – the family, which by its nature is called to be the “sanctuary of life.”

11.2 How did such a situation come about? Many different factors have to be taken into account. In the background there is the profound crisis of culture, which generates skepticism in relation to the very foundations of knowledge and ethics, and which makes it increasingly difficult to grasp clearly the meaning of what man is, the meaning of his rights and his duties. Then there are all kinds of existential and interpersonal difficulties, made worse by the complexity of a society in which individuals, couples and families are often left alone with their problems. There are situations of acute poverty, anxiety or frustration in which the struggle to make ends meet, the presence of unbearable pain or instances of violence, especially against women, make the choice to defend and promote life so demanding as sometimes to reach the point of heroism.

11.3 All this explains, at least in part, how the value of life can today undergo a kind of “eclipse,” even though conscience does not cease to point to it as a sacred and inviolable value, as is evident in the tendency to disguise certain crimes against life in its early or final stages by using innocuous medical terms which distract attention from the fact that what is involved is the right to life of an actual human person.

12 In fact, while the climate of widespread moral uncertainty can in some way be explained by the multiplicity and gravity of today’s social problems, and these can sometimes mitigate the subjective responsibility of individuals, it is no less true that we are confronted by an even larger reality, which can be described as a veritable structure of sin. This reality is characterized by the emergence of a culture which denies solidarity and in many cases takes the form of a veritable “culture of death.” This culture is actively fostered by powerful cultural, economic and political currents which encourage an idea of society excessively concerned with efficiency. Looking at the situation from this point of view, it is possible to speak in a certain sense of a war of the powerful against the weak: a life which would require greater acceptance, love and care is considered useless or held to be an intolerable burden, and is therefore rejected in one way or another. A person who, because of illness, handicap or, more simply, just by existing, compromises the well-being or life-style of those who are more favored tends to be looked upon as an enemy to be resisted or eliminated. In this way a kind of “conspiracy against life” is unleashed. This conspiracy involves not only individuals in their personal, family or group relationships, but goes far beyond, to the point of damaging and distorting at the international level relations between peoples and States.

13.1 In order to facilitate the spread of abortion, enormous sums of money have been invested and continue to be invested in the production of pharmaceutical products which make it possible to kill the fetus in the mother's womb without recourse to medical assistance. On this point, scientific research itself seems to be almost exclusively preoccupied with developing products which are ever more simple and effective in suppressing life and which at the same time are capable of removing abortion from any kind of control or social responsibility.

13.2 It is frequently asserted that contraception, if made safe and available to all, is the most effective remedy against abortion. The Catholic Church is then accused of actually promoting abortion because she obstinately continues to teach the moral unlawfulness of contraception. When looked at carefully, this objection is clearly unfounded. It may be that many people use contraception with a view to excluding the subsequent temptation of abortion. But the negative values inherent in the "contraceptive mentality" – which is very different from responsible parenthood lived in respect for the full truth of the conjugal act – are such that they in fact strengthen this temptation when an unwanted life is conceived. Indeed, the pro-abortion culture is especially strong precisely where the Church's teaching on contraception is rejected. Certainly, from the moral point of view contraception and abortion are specifically different evils: the former contradicts the full truth of the sexual act as the proper expression of conjugal love, while the latter destroys the life of a human being; the former is opposed to the virtue of chastity in marriage, the latter is opposed to the virtue of justice and directly violates the divine commandment "You shall not kill."

13.3 But despite their differences of nature and moral gravity, contraception and abortion are often closely connected, as fruits of the same tree. It is true that in many cases contraception and even abortion are practiced under the pressure of real-life difficulties, which nonetheless can never exonerate from striving to observe God's law fully. Still, in very many other instances such practices are rooted in a hedonistic mentality unwilling to accept responsibility in matters of sexuality, and they imply a self-centered concept of freedom, which regards procreation as an obstacle to personal fulfillment. The life which could result from a sexual encounter thus becomes an enemy to be avoided at all costs, and abortion becomes the only possible decisive response to failed contraception.

13.4 The close connection which exists in mentality between the practice of contraception and that of abortion is becoming increasingly obvious. It is being demonstrated in an alarming way by the development of chemical products, intrauterine devices and vaccines which, distributed with the same ease as contraceptives, really act as abortifacients in the very early stages of the development of the life of the new human being.

14.1 The various techniques of artificial reproduction, which would seem to be at the service of life and which are frequently used with this intention, actually open the door to new threats against life. Apart from the fact that they are morally unacceptable since they separate procreation from the fully human context of the conjugal act,<sup>14</sup> these techniques have a high rate of failure: not just failure in relation to fertilization, but with regard to the subsequent development of the embryo, which is exposed to the risk of death, generally within a very short space of time. Furthermore, the number of embryos produced is often greater than that needed for implantation in the woman's womb, and these so-called "spare embryos" are then destroyed or used for research which, under the pretext of scientific or medical progress, in fact reduces human life to the level of simple "biological material" to be freely disposed of.

14.2 Prenatal diagnosis, which presents no moral objections if carried out in order to identify the medical treatment which may be needed by the child in the womb, all too often becomes an opportunity for proposing and procuring an abortion. This is eugenic abortion, justified in public opinion on the basis of a mentality – mistakenly held to be consistent with the demands of "therapeutic interventions" – which accepts life only under certain conditions and rejects it when it is affected by any limitation, handicap or illness.

14.3 Following this same logic, the point has been reached where the most basic care, even nourishment, is denied to babies born with serious handicaps or illnesses. The contemporary scene, moreover, is becoming even more alarming by reason of the proposals advanced here and there to justify even infanticide, following the same arguments used to justify the right to abortion. In this way we revert to a state of barbarism which one hoped had been left behind forever.

15.1 Threats which are no less serious hang over the incurably ill and the dying. In a social and cultural context which makes it more difficult to face and accept suffering, the temptation becomes all the greater to resolve the problem of suffering by eliminating it at the root, by hastening death so that it occurs at the moment considered most suitable.

15.2 Various considerations usually contribute to such a decision, all of which converge in the same terrible outcome. In the sick person the sense of anguish, of severe discomfort and even of desperation brought on by intense and prolonged suffering can be a decisive factor. Such a situation can threaten the already fragile equilibrium of an individual's personal and family life, with the result that, on the one hand, the sick person, despite the help of increasingly effective medical and social assistance, risks feeling overwhelmed by his or her own frailty; and on the other hand, those close to the sick person can be moved by an understandable, even if misplaced, compassion. All this is aggravated by a cultural climate which fails to perceive any meaning or value in suffering, but rather considers suffering the epitome of evil, to be eliminated at all costs. This is especially the case in the absence of a religious outlook which could help to provide a positive understanding of the mystery of suffering.

15.3 On a more general level, there exists in contemporary culture a certain Promethean attitude which leads people to think that they can control life and death by taking the decisions about them into their own hands. What really happens in this case is that the individual is overcome and crushed by a death deprived of any prospect of meaning or hope. We see a tragic expression of all this in the spread of euthanasia – disguised and surreptitious or practiced openly and even legally. As well as for reasons of a misguided pity at the sight of the patient's suffering, euthanasia is sometimes justified by the utilitarian motive of avoiding costs which bring no return and which weigh heavily on society. Thus it is proposed to eliminate malformed babies, the severely handicapped, the disabled, the elderly, especially when they are not self-sufficient, and the terminally ill. Nor can we remain silent in the face of other more furtive, but no less serious and real forms of euthanasia. These could occur for example when, in order to increase the availability of organs for transplants, organs are removed without respecting objective and adequate criteria which verify the death of the donor.

16.1 Another present-day phenomenon, frequently used to justify threats and attacks against life, is the demographic question. This question arises in different ways in different parts of the world. In the rich and developed countries there is a disturbing decline or collapse of the birthrate. The poorer countries, on the other hand, generally have a high rate of population growth, difficult to sustain in the context of low economic and social development, and especially where there is extreme underdevelopment. In the face of overpopulation in the poorer countries, instead of forms of global intervention at the international level – serious family and social policies, programs of cultural development and of fair production and distribution of resources – anti-birth policies continue to be enacted.

16.2 Contraception, sterilization and abortion are certainly part of the reason why in some cases there is a sharp decline in the birthrate. It is not difficult to be tempted to use the same methods and attacks against life also where there is a situation of “demographic explosion.”

16.3 The Pharaoh of old, haunted by the presence and increase of the children of Israel, submitted them to every kind of oppression and ordered that every male child born of the Hebrew women was to be killed (cf. Ex 1:7-22). Today not a few of the powerful of the earth act in the same way. They too are haunted by the current demographic growth and fear that the most prolific and poorest peoples represent a threat for the well-being and peace of their own countries.

Consequently, rather than wishing to face and solve these serious problems with respect for the dignity of individuals and families and for every person's inviolable right to life, they prefer to promote and impose by whatever means a massive program of birth control. Even the economic help which they would be ready to give is unjustly made conditional on the acceptance of an anti-birth policy.

17.1 Humanity today offers us a truly alarming spectacle if we consider not only how extensively attacks on life are spreading, but also their unheard-of numerical proportion and the fact that they receive widespread and powerful support from a broad consensus on the part of society, from widespread legal approval and the involvement of certain sectors of health-care personnel.

17.2 As I emphatically stated at Denver, on the occasion of the Eighth World Youth Day, "with time the threats against life have not grown weaker. They are taking on vast proportions. They are not only threats coming from the outside, from the forces of nature or the 'Cains' who kill the 'Abels'; no, they are scientifically and systematically programmed threats. The twentieth century will have been an era of massive attacks on life, an endless series of wars and a continual taking of innocent human life. False prophets and false teachers have had the greatest success."<sup>15</sup> Aside from intentions, which can be varied and perhaps can seem convincing at times, especially if presented in the name of solidarity, we are in fact faced by an objective "conspiracy against life," involving even international institutions engaged in encouraging and carrying out actual campaigns to make contraception, sterilization and abortion widely available. Nor can it be denied that the mass media are often implicated in this conspiracy, by lending credit to that culture which presents recourse to contraception, sterilization, abortion and even euthanasia as a mark of progress and a victory of freedom, while depicting as enemies of freedom and progress those positions which are unreservedly pro-life.

Evangelium Vitae

“Am I my brother’s keeper?” (Gen 4:9): a perverse idea of freedom

18.1 The panorama described needs to be understood not only in terms of the phenomena of death which characterize it, but also in the variety of causes which determine it. The Lord’s question, “What have you done?” (Gen 4:10), seems almost like an invitation addressed to Cain to go beyond the material dimension of his murderous gesture in order to recognize in it all the gravity of the motives which occasioned it and the consequences which result from it.

18.2 Decisions that go against life sometimes arise from difficult or even tragic situations of profound suffering, loneliness, a total lack of economic prospects, depression and anxiety about the future. Such circumstances can mitigate even to a notable degree subjective responsibility and the consequent culpability of those who make these choices, which in themselves are evil. But today the problem goes far beyond the necessary recognition of these personal situations. It is a problem which exists at the cultural, social and political level, where it reveals its more sinister and disturbing aspect in the tendency, ever more widely shared, to interpret the above crimes against life as legitimate expressions of individual freedom, to be acknowledged and protected as actual rights.

18.3 In this way, and with tragic consequences, a long historical process is reaching a turning point. The process which once led to discovering the idea of “human rights” – rights inherent in every person and prior to any constitution and State legislation – is today marked by a surprising contradiction. Precisely in an age when the inviolable rights of the person are solemnly proclaimed and the value of life is publicly affirmed, the very right to life is being denied or trampled upon, especially at the more significant moments of existence: the moment of birth and the moment of death.

18.4 On the one hand, the various declarations of human rights and the many initiatives inspired by these declarations show that at the global level there is a growing moral sensitivity more alert to acknowledging the value and dignity of every individual as a human being, without any distinction of race, nationality, religion, political opinion or social class.

18.5 On the other hand, these noble proclamations are unfortunately contradicted by a tragic repudiation of them in practice. This denial is still more distressing, indeed more scandalous, precisely because it is occurring in a society which makes the affirmation and protection of human rights its primary objective and its boast. How can these repeated affirmations of principle be reconciled with the continual increase and widespread justification of attacks on human life? How can we reconcile these declarations with the refusal to accept those who are weak and needy, or elderly, or those who have just been conceived? These attacks go directly against respect for life, and they represent a direct threat to the entire culture of human rights. It is a threat capable in the end of jeopardizing the very meaning of democratic coexistence: rather than societies of "people living together," our cities risk becoming societies of people who are rejected, marginalized, uprooted and oppressed. If we then look at the wider worldwide perspective, how can we fail to think that the very affirmation of the rights of individuals and peoples made in distinguished international assemblies is a merely futile exercise of rhetoric, if we fail to unmask the selfishness of the rich countries, which exclude poorer countries from access to development or make such access dependent on arbitrary prohibitions against procreation, setting up an opposition between development and man himself? Should we not question the very economic models often adopted by States which, also as a result of international pressures and forms of conditioning, cause and aggravate situations of injustice and violence in which the life of whole peoples is degraded and trampled upon?

19.1 What are the roots of this remarkable contradiction?

19.2 We can find them in an overall assessment of a cultural and moral nature, beginning with the mentality which carries the concept of subjectivity to an extreme and even distorts it, and recognizes as a subject of rights only the person who enjoys full or at least incipient autonomy and who emerges from a state of total dependence on others. But how can we reconcile this approach with the exaltation of man as a being who is "not to be used"? The theory of human rights is based precisely on the affirmation that the human person, unlike animals and things, cannot be subjected to domination by others. We must also mention the mentality which tends to equate personal dignity with the capacity for verbal and explicit, or at least perceptible, communication. It is clear that on the basis of these presuppositions there is no place in the world for anyone who, like the unborn or the dying, is a weak element in the social structure, or for anyone who appears completely at the mercy of others and radically dependent on them, and can only communicate through the silent language of a profound sharing of affection. In this case it is force which becomes the criterion for choice and action in interpersonal relations and in social life. But this is the exact opposite of what a State ruled by law, as a community in which the "reasons of force" are replaced by the "force of reason," historically intended to affirm.

19.3 At another level, the roots of the contradiction between the solemn affirmation of human rights and their tragic denial in practice lie in a notion of freedom which exalts the isolated individual in an absolute way and gives no place to solidarity, to openness to others and service of them. While it is true that the taking of life not yet born or in its final stages is sometimes marked by a mistaken sense of altruism and human compassion, it cannot be denied that such a culture of death, taken as a whole, betrays a completely individualistic concept of freedom, which ends up by becoming the freedom of “the strong” against the weak who have no choice but to submit.

19.4 It is precisely in this sense that Cain’s answer to the Lord’s question “Where is Abel your brother?” can be interpreted: “I do not know; am I my brother’s keeper?” (Gen 4:9). Yes, every man is his “brother’s keeper,” because God entrusts us to one another. And it is also in view of this entrusting that God gives everyone freedom, a freedom which possesses an inherently relational dimension. This is a great gift of the Creator, placed as it is at the service of the person and of his fulfillment through the gift of self and openness to others; but when freedom is made absolute in an individualistic way, it is emptied of its original content, and its very meaning and dignity are contradicted.

19.5 There is an even more profound aspect which needs to be emphasized: freedom negates and destroys itself and becomes a factor leading to the destruction of others, when it no longer recognizes and respects its essential link with the truth. When freedom, out of a desire to emancipate itself from all forms of tradition and authority, shuts out even the most obvious evidence of an objective and universal truth, which is the foundation of personal and social life, then the person ends up by no longer taking as the sole and indisputable point of reference for his own choices the truth about good and evil, but only his subjective and changeable opinion or, indeed, his selfish interest and whim.

20.1 This view of freedom leads to a serious distortion of life in society. If the promotion of the self is understood in terms of absolute autonomy, people inevitably reach the point of rejecting one another. Everyone else is considered an enemy from whom one has to defend oneself. Thus society becomes a mass of individuals placed side by side, but without any mutual bonds. Each one wishes to assert himself independently of the other and in fact intends to make his own interests prevail. Still, in the face of other people’s analogous interests, some kind of compromise must be found if one wants a society in which the maximum possible freedom is guaranteed to each individual. In this way, any reference to common values and to a truth absolutely binding on everyone is lost, and social life ventures on to the shifting sands of complete relativism. At that point, everything is negotiable, everything is open to bargaining: even the first of the fundamental rights, the right to life.

20.2 This is what is happening also at the level of politics and government: the original and inalienable right to life is questioned or denied on the basis of a parliamentary vote or the will of one part of the people – even if it is the majority. This is the sinister result of a relativism which reigns unopposed: the “right”

ceases to be such, because it is no longer firmly founded on the inviolable dignity of the person, but is made subject to the will of the stronger part. In this way democracy, contradicting its own principles, effectively moves toward a form of totalitarianism. The State is no longer the “common home” where all can live together on the basis of principles of fundamental equality, but is transformed into a tyrant State which arrogates to itself the right to dispose of the life of the weakest and most defenseless members, from the unborn child to the elderly, in the name of a public interest which is really nothing but the interest of one part. The appearance of the strictest respect for legality is maintained, at least when the laws permitting abortion and euthanasia are the result of a ballot in accordance with what are generally seen as the rules of democracy. Really, what we have here is only the tragic caricature of legality; the democratic ideal, which is only truly such when it acknowledges and safeguards the dignity of every human person, is betrayed in its very foundations: “How is it still possible to speak of the dignity of every human person when the killing of the weakest and most innocent is permitted? In the name of what justice is the most unjust of discriminations practiced: some individuals are held to be deserving of defense and others are denied that dignity?”<sup>16</sup> When this happens, the process leading to the breakdown of a genuinely human coexistence and the disintegration of the State itself has already begun.

20.3 To claim the right to abortion, infanticide and euthanasia, and to recognize that right in law, means to attribute to human freedom a perverse and evil significance: that of an absolute power over others and against others. This is the death of true freedom: “Truly, truly, I say to you, everyone who commits sin is a slave to sin” (Jn 8:34).

Evangelium Vitae

“And from your face I shall be hidden” (Gen 4:14): the eclipse of the sense of God and of man

21.1 In seeking the deepest roots of the struggle between the “culture of life” and the “culture of death,” we cannot restrict ourselves to the perverse idea of freedom mentioned above. We have to go to the heart of the tragedy being experienced by modern man: the eclipse of the sense of God and of man, typical of a social and cultural climate dominated by secularism, which, with its ubiquitous tentacles, succeeds at times in putting Christian communities themselves to the test. Those who allow themselves to be influenced by this climate easily fall into a sad, vicious circle: when the sense of God is lost, there is also a tendency to lose the sense of man, of his dignity and his life; in turn, the systematic violation of the moral law, especially in the serious matter of respect for human life and its dignity, produces a kind of progressive darkening of the capacity to discern God’s living and saving presence.

21.2 Once again we can gain insight from the story of Abel’s murder by his brother. After the curse imposed on him by God, Cain thus addresses the Lord: “My punishment is greater than I can bear. Behold, you have driven me this day away from the ground; and from your face I shall be hidden, and I shall be a fugitive and wanderer on the earth, and whoever finds me will slay me” (Gen 4:13-14). Cain is convinced that his sin will not obtain pardon from the Lord and that his inescapable destiny will be to have to “hide his face” from him. If Cain is capable of confessing that his fault is “greater than he can bear,” it is because he is conscious of being in the presence of God and before God’s just judgment. It is really only before the Lord that man can admit his sin and recognize its full seriousness. Such was the experience of David who, after “having committed evil in the sight of the Lord,” and being rebuked by the Prophet Nathan, exclaimed: “My offenses truly I know them; my sin is always before me. Against you, you alone, have I sinned; what is evil in your sight I have done” (Ps 51:5-6).

22.1 Consequently, when the sense of God is lost, the sense of man is also threatened and poisoned, as the Second Vatican Council concisely states: “Without the Creator, the creature would disappear. . . . But when God is forgotten, the creature itself grows unintelligible.”<sup>17</sup> Man is no longer able to see himself as “mysteriously different” from other earthly creatures; he regards himself merely as one more living being, as an organism which, at most, has reached a very high stage of perfection. Enclosed in the narrow horizon of his physical nature, he is somehow reduced to being “a thing,” and no longer grasps the “transcendent” character of his “existence as man.” He no longer considers life as a splendid gift of God, something “sacred” entrusted to his responsibility and thus also to his loving care and “veneration.” Life itself becomes a mere “thing,” which man claims as his exclusive property, completely subject to his control and manipulation.

22.2 Thus, in relation to life at birth or at death, man is no longer capable of posing the question of the truest meaning of his own existence, nor can he assimilate with genuine freedom these crucial moments of his own history. He is concerned only with “doing,” and, using all kinds of technology, he busies himself with programming, controlling and dominating birth and death. Birth and death, instead of being primary experiences demanding to be “lived,” become things to be merely “possessed” or “rejected.”

22.3 Moreover, once all reference to God has been removed, it is not surprising that the meaning of everything else becomes profoundly distorted. Nature itself, from being “mater” (mother), is now reduced to being “matter,” and is subjected to every kind of manipulation. This is the direction in which a certain technical and scientific way of thinking, prevalent in present-day culture, appears to be leading when it rejects the very idea that there is a truth of creation which must be acknowledged, or a plan of God for life which must be respected. Something similar happens when concern about the consequences of such a “freedom without law” leads some people to the opposite position of a “law without freedom,” as for example in ideologies which consider it unlawful to interfere in any way with nature, practically “divinizing” it. Again, this is a misunderstanding of nature’s dependence on the plan of the Creator. Thus it is clear that the loss of contact with God’s wise design is the deepest root of modern man’s confusion, both when this loss leads to a freedom without rules and when it leaves man in “fear” of his freedom.

22.4 By living “as if God did not exist,” man not only loses sight of the mystery of God, but also of the mystery of the world and the mystery of his own being.

23.1 The eclipse of the sense of God and of man inevitably leads to a practical materialism, which breeds individualism, utilitarianism and hedonism. Here too we see the permanent validity of the words of the Apostle: “And since they did not see fit to acknowledge God, God gave them up to a base mind and to improper conduct” (Rom 1:28). The values of being are replaced by those of having. The only goal which counts is the pursuit of one’s own material well-being. The so-called “quality of life” is interpreted primarily or exclusively as economic efficiency, inordinate consumerism, physical beauty and pleasure, to the neglect of the more profound dimensions – interpersonal, spiritual and religious – of existence.

23.2 In such a context suffering, an inescapable burden of human existence but also a factor of possible personal growth, is “censored,” rejected as useless, indeed opposed as an evil always and in every way to be avoided. When it cannot be avoided and the prospect of even some future well-being vanishes, then life appears to have lost all meaning and the temptation grows in man to claim the right to suppress it.

23.3 Within this same cultural climate, the body is no longer perceived as a properly personal reality, a sign and place of relations with others, with God and with the world. It is reduced to pure materiality: it is simply a complex of organs, functions and energies to be used according to the sole criteria of pleasure and efficiency. Consequently, sexuality too is depersonalized and exploited: from being the sign, place and language of love, that is, of the gift of self and acceptance of another in all the other’s richness as a person, it increasingly becomes the occasion and instrument for self-assertion and the selfish satisfaction of personal desires and instincts. Thus the original import of human sexuality is distorted and falsified, and the two meanings, unitive and procreative, inherent in the very nature of the conjugal act, are artificially separated: in this way the marriage union is betrayed and its fruitfulness is subjected to the caprice of the couple. Procreation then becomes the “enemy” to be avoided in sexual activity: if it is welcomed, this is only because it expresses a desire, or indeed the intention, to have a child “at all costs,” and not because it signifies the complete acceptance of the other and therefore an openness to the richness of life which the child represents.

23.4 In the materialistic perspective described so far, interpersonal relations are seriously impoverished. The first to be harmed are women, children, the sick or suffering, and the elderly. The criterion of personal dignity – which demands respect, generosity and service – is replaced by the criterion of efficiency, functionality and usefulness: others are considered not for what they “are,” but for what they “have, do and produce.” This is the supremacy of the strong over the weak.

24.1 It is at the heart of the moral conscience that the eclipse of the sense of God and of man, with all its various and deadly consequences for life, is taking place. It is a question, above all, of the individual conscience as it stands before God in its singleness and uniqueness.<sup>18</sup> But it is also a question, in a certain sense, of the “moral conscience” of society: in a way it too is responsible, not only because it tolerates or fosters behavior contrary to life, but also because it encourages the “culture of death,” creating and consolidating actual “structures of sin” which go against life. The moral conscience, both individual and social, is today subjected, also as a result of the penetrating influence of the media, to an extremely serious and mortal danger: that of confusion between good and evil, precisely in relation to the fundamental right to life. A large part of contemporary society looks sadly like that humanity which Paul describes in his Letter to the Romans. It is composed “of men who by their wickedness suppress the truth” (1:18): having denied God and believing that they can build the earthly city without him, “they became futile in their thinking” so that “their senseless minds were darkened” (1:21); “claiming to be wise, they became fools” (1:22), carrying out works deserving of death, and “they not only do them but approve those who practice them” (1:32). When conscience, this bright lamp of the soul (cf. Mt 6:22-23), calls “evil good and good evil” (Is 5:20), it is already on the path to the most alarming corruption and the darkest moral blindness.

24.2 And yet all the conditioning and efforts to enforce silence fail to stifle the voice of the Lord echoing in the conscience of every individual: it is always from this intimate sanctuary of the conscience that a new journey of love, openness and service to human life can begin.

Evangelium Vitae

“You have come to the sprinkled blood” (cf. Heb 12:22, 24): signs of hope and invitation to commitment

25.1 “The voice of your brother’s blood is crying to me from the ground” (Gen 4:10). It is not only the voice of the blood of Abel, the first innocent man to be murdered, which cries to God, the source and defender of life. The blood of every other human being who has been killed since Abel is also a voice raised to the Lord. In an absolutely singular way, as the author of the Letter to the Hebrews reminds us, the voice of the blood of Christ, of whom Abel in his innocence is a prophetic figure, cries out to God: “You have come to Mount Zion and to the city of the living God . . . to the mediator of a new covenant, and to the sprinkled blood that speaks more graciously than the blood of Abel” (12:22, 24).

25.2 It is the sprinkled blood. A symbol and prophetic sign of it had been the blood of the sacrifices of the Old Covenant, whereby God expressed his will to communicate his own life to men, purifying and consecrating them (cf. Ex 24:8; Lev 17:11). Now all of this is fulfilled and comes true in Christ: his is the sprinkled blood which redeems, purifies and saves; it is the blood of the Mediator of the New Covenant “poured out for many for the forgiveness of sins” (Mt 26:28). This blood, which flows from the pierced side of Christ on the Cross (cf. Jn 19:34), “speaks more graciously” than the blood of Abel; indeed it expresses and requires a more radical “justice,” and above all it implores mercy,<sup>19</sup> it makes intercession for the brethren before the Father (cf. Heb 7:25), and it is the source of perfect redemption and the gift of new life.

25.3 The blood of Christ, while it reveals the grandeur of the Father’s love, shows how precious man is in God’s eyes and how priceless the value of his life. The Apostle Peter reminds us of this: “You know that you were ransomed from the futile ways inherited from your fathers, not with perishable things such as silver or gold, but with the precious blood of Christ, like that of a lamb without blemish or spot” (1 Pet 1:18-19). Precisely by contemplating the precious blood of Christ, the sign of his self-giving love (cf. Jn 13:1), the believer learns to recognize and appreciate the almost divine dignity of every human being and can exclaim with ever renewed and grateful wonder: “How precious must man be in the eyes of the Creator, if he ‘gained so great a Redeemer’ (Exsultet of the Easter Vigil), and if God ‘gave his only Son’ in order that man ‘should not perish but have eternal life’ (cf. Jn 3:16)!”<sup>20</sup>

25.4 Furthermore, Christ’s blood reveals to man that his greatness, and therefore his vocation, consists in the sincere gift of self. Precisely because it is poured out as the gift of life, the blood of Christ is no longer a sign of death, of definitive separation from the brethren, but the instrument of a communion which is richness of life for all. Whoever in the Sacrament of the Eucharist drinks this blood and abides in Jesus (cf. Jn 6:56) is drawn into the dynamism of his love and gift of life, in order to bring to its fullness the original vocation to love which belongs to everyone (cf. Gen 1:27, 2:18-24).

25.5 It is from the blood of Christ that all draw the strength to commit themselves to promoting life. It is precisely this blood that is the most powerful source of hope, indeed it is the foundation of the absolute certitude that in God's plan life will be victorious. "And death shall be no more," exclaims the powerful voice which comes from the throne of God in the heavenly Jerusalem (Rev 21:4). And Saint Paul assures us that the present victory over sin is a sign and anticipation of the definitive victory over death, when there "shall come to pass the saying that is written: 'Death is swallowed up in victory.' 'O death, where is your victory? O death, where is your sting?'" (1 Cor 15:54-55).

26.1 In effect, signs which point to this victory are not lacking in our societies and cultures, strongly marked though they are by the "culture of death." It would therefore be to give a one-sided picture, which could lead to sterile discouragement, if the condemnation of the threats to life were not accompanied by the presentation of the positive signs at work in humanity's present situation.

26.2 Unfortunately, it is often hard to see and recognize these positive signs, perhaps also because they do not receive sufficient attention in the communications media. Yet how many initiatives of help and support for people who are weak and defenseless have sprung up and continue to spring up in the Christian community and in civil society at the local, national and international level through the efforts of individuals, groups, movements and organizations of various kinds!

26.3 There are still many married couples who, with a generous sense of responsibility, are ready to accept children as "the supreme gift of marriage."<sup>21</sup> Nor is there a lack of families which, over and above their everyday service to life, are willing to accept abandoned children, boys and girls and teenagers in difficulty, handicapped persons, elderly men and women who have been left alone. Many centers in support of life, or similar institutions, are sponsored by individuals and groups which, with admirable dedication and sacrifice, offer moral and material support to mothers who are in difficulty and are tempted to have recourse to abortion. Increasingly, there are appearing in many places groups of volunteers prepared to offer hospitality to persons without a family, who find themselves in conditions of particular distress or who need a supportive environment to help them to overcome destructive habits and discover anew the meaning of life.

26.4 Medical science, thanks to the committed efforts of researchers and practitioners, continues in its efforts to discover ever more effective remedies: treatments which were once inconceivable but which now offer much promise for the future are today being developed for the unborn, the suffering and those in an acute or terminal stage of sickness. Various agencies and organizations are mobilizing their efforts to bring the benefits of the most advanced medicine to countries most afflicted by poverty and endemic diseases. In a similar way national and international associations of physicians are being organized to bring quick relief to peoples affected by natural disasters, epidemics or wars. Even if a just international distribution of medical resources is still far from being a reality, how can we not recognize in the steps taken so far the sign of a growing solidarity among peoples, a praiseworthy human and moral sensitivity and a greater respect for life?

27.1 In view of laws which permit abortion and in view of efforts, which here and there have been successful, to legalize euthanasia, movements and initiatives to raise social awareness in defense of life have sprung up in many parts of the world. When, in accordance with their principles, such movements act resolutely but without resorting to violence, they promote a wider and more profound consciousness of the value of life, and evoke and bring about a more determined commitment to its defense.

27.2 Furthermore, how can we fail to mention all those daily gestures of openness, sacrifice and unselfish care which countless people lovingly make in families, hospitals, orphanages, homes for the elderly and other centers or communities which defend life? Allowing herself to be guided by the example of Jesus the “Good Samaritan” (cf. Lk 10:29-37) and upheld by his strength, the Church has always been in the front line in providing charitable help: so many of her sons and daughters, especially men and women Religious, in traditional and ever new forms, have consecrated and continue to consecrate their lives to God, freely giving of themselves out of love for their neighbor, especially for the weak and needy. These deeds strengthen the bases of the “civilization of love and life,” without which the life of individuals and of society itself loses its most genuinely human quality. Even if they go unnoticed and remain hidden to most people, faith assures us that the Father “who sees in secret” (Mt 6:6) not only will reward these actions but already here and now makes them produce lasting fruit for the good of all.

27.3 Among the signs of hope we should also count the spread at many levels of public opinion of a new sensitivity ever more opposed to war as an instrument for the resolution of conflicts between peoples and increasingly oriented to finding effective but “non-violent” means to counter the armed aggressor. In the same perspective there is evidence of a growing public opposition to the death penalty, even when such a penalty is seen as a kind of “legitimate defense” on the part of society. Modern society in fact has the means of effectively suppressing crime by rendering criminals harmless without definitively denying them the chance to reform.

27.4 Another welcome sign is the growing attention being paid to the quality of life and to ecology, especially in more developed societies, where people’s expectations are no longer concentrated so much on problems of survival as on the search for an overall improvement of living conditions. Especially significant is the reawakening of an ethical reflection on issues affecting life. The emergence and ever more widespread development of bioethics is promoting more reflection and dialogue – between believers and non-believers, as well as between followers of different religions – on ethical problems, including fundamental issues pertaining to human life.

28.1 This situation, with its lights and shadows, ought to make us all fully aware that we are facing an enormous and dramatic clash between good and evil, death and life, the “culture of death” and the “culture of life.” We find ourselves not only “faced with” but necessarily “in the midst of” this conflict: we are all involved and we all share in it, with the inescapable responsibility of choosing to be unconditionally pro-life.

28.2 For us too Moses’ invitation rings out loud and clear: “See, I have set before you this day life and good, death and evil. . . . I have set before you life and death, blessing and curse; therefore choose life, that you and your descendants may live” (Dt 30:15,19). This invitation is very appropriate for us who are called day by day to the duty of choosing between the “culture of life” and the “culture of death.” But the call of Deuteronomy goes even deeper, for it urges us to make a choice which is properly religious and moral. It is a question of giving our own existence a basic orientation and living the law of the Lord faithfully and consistently: “If you obey the commandments of the Lord your God which I command you this day, by loving the Lord your God, by walking in his ways, and by keeping his commandments and his statutes and his ordinances, then you shall live. . . . Therefore choose life, that you and your descendants may live, loving the Lord your God, obeying his voice, and cleaving to him; for that means life to you and length of days” (30:16,19-20).

28.3 The unconditional choice for life reaches its full religious and moral meaning when it flows from, is formed by and nourished by faith in Christ. Nothing helps us so much to face positively the conflict between death and life in which we are engaged as faith in the Son of God who became man and dwelt among men so “that they may have life, and have it abundantly” (Jn 10:10). It is a matter of faith in the risen Lord, who has conquered death; faith in the blood of Christ “that speaks more graciously than the blood of Abel” (Heb 12:24).

28.4 With the light and strength of this faith, therefore, in facing the challenges of the present situation, the Church is becoming more aware of the grace and responsibility which come to her from her Lord of proclaiming, celebrating and serving the Gospel of life.

Evangelium Vitae

“The life was made manifest, and we saw it” (1 Jn 1:2): with our gaze fixed on Christ, “the Word of life”

29.1 Faced with the countless grave threats to life present in the modern world, one could feel overwhelmed by sheer powerlessness: good can never be powerful enough to triumph over evil!

29.2 At such times the People of God, and this includes every believer, is called to profess with humility and courage its faith in Jesus Christ, “the Word of life” (1 Jn 1:1). The Gospel of life is not simply a reflection, however new and profound, on human life. Nor is it merely a commandment aimed at raising awareness and bringing about significant changes in society. Still less is it an illusory promise of a better future. The Gospel of life is something concrete and personal, for it consists in the proclamation of the very person of Jesus. Jesus made himself known to the Apostle Thomas, and in him to every person, with the words: “I am the way, and the truth, and the life” (Jn 14:6). This is also how he spoke of himself to Martha, the sister of Lazarus: “I am the resurrection and the life; he who believes in me, though he die, yet shall he live, and whoever lives and believes in me shall never die” (Jn 11:25-26). Jesus is the Son who from all eternity receives life from the Father (cf. Jn 5:26), and who has come among men to make them sharers in this gift: “I came that they may have life, and have it abundantly” (Jn 10:10).

29.3 Through the words, the actions and the very person of Jesus, man is given the possibility of “knowing” the complete truth concerning the value of human life. From this “source” he receives, in particular, the capacity to “accomplish” this truth perfectly (cf. Jn 3:21), that is, to accept and fulfill completely the responsibility of loving and serving, of defending and promoting human life. In Christ, the Gospel of life is definitively proclaimed and fully given. This is the Gospel which, already present in the revelation of the Old Testament and indeed written in the heart of every man and woman, has echoed in every conscience “from the beginning,” from the time of creation itself, in such a way that, despite the negative consequences of sin, it can also be known in its essential traits by human reason. As the Second Vatican Council teaches, Christ “perfected revelation by fulfilling it through his whole work of making himself present and manifesting himself; through his words and deeds, his signs and wonders, but especially through his death and glorious Resurrection from the dead and final sending of the Spirit of truth. Moreover, he confirmed with divine testimony what revelation proclaimed: that God is with us to free us from the darkness of sin and death, and to raise us up to life eternal.”<sup>22</sup>

30.1 Hence, with our attention fixed on the Lord Jesus, we wish to hear from him once again “the words of God” (Jn 3:34) and meditate anew on the Gospel of life. The deepest and most original meaning of this meditation on what revelation tells us about human life was taken up by the Apostle John in the opening words of his First Letter: “That which was from the beginning, which we have heard, which we have seen with our eyes, which we have looked upon and touched with our hands, concerning the Word of life – the life was made manifest, and we saw it, and testify to it, and proclaim to you the eternal life which was with the Father and was made manifest to us – that which we have seen and heard we proclaim also to you, so that you may have fellowship with us” (1:1-3).

30.2 In Jesus, the “Word of life,” God’s eternal life is thus proclaimed and given. Thanks to this proclamation and gift, our physical and spiritual life, also in its earthly phase, acquires its full value and meaning, for God’s eternal life is in fact the end to which our living in this world is directed and called. In this way the Gospel of life includes everything that human experience and reason tell us about the value of human life, accepting it, purifying it, exalting it and bringing it to fulfillment.

Evangelium Vitae

“The Lord is my strength and my song, and he has become my salvation”
(Ex 15:2): life is always a good

31.1 The fullness of the Gospel message about life was prepared for in the Old Testament. Especially in the events of the Exodus, the center of the Old Testament faith experience, Israel discovered the preciousness of its life in the eyes of God. When it seemed doomed to extermination because of the threat of death hanging over all its newborn males (cf. Ex 1:15-22), the Lord revealed himself to Israel as its Savior, with the power to ensure a future to those without hope. Israel thus comes to know clearly that its existence is not at the mercy of a Pharaoh who can exploit it at his despotic whim. On the contrary, Israel’s life is the object of God’s gentle and intense love.

31.2 Freedom from slavery meant the gift of an identity, the recognition of an indestructible dignity and the beginning of a new history, in which the discovery of God and discovery of self go hand in hand. The Exodus was a foundational experience and a model for the future. Through it, Israel comes to learn that whenever its existence is threatened it need only turn to God with renewed trust in order to find in him effective help: “I formed you, you are my servant; O Israel, you will not be forgotten by me” (Is 44:21).

31.3 Thus, in coming to know the value of its own existence as a people, Israel also grows in its perception of the meaning and value of life itself. This reflection is developed more specifically in the Wisdom Literature, on the basis of daily experience of the precariousness of life and awareness of the threats which assail it. Faced with the contradictions of life, faith is challenged to respond.

31.4 More than anything else, it is the problem of suffering which challenges faith and puts it to the test. How can we fail to appreciate the universal anguish of man when we meditate on the Book of Job? The innocent man overwhelmed by suffering is understandably led to wonder: “Why is light given to him that is in misery, and life to the bitter in soul, who long for death, but it comes not, and dig for it more than for hid treasures?” (3:20-21). But even when the darkness is deepest, faith points to a trusting and adoring acknowledgment of the “mystery”: “I know that you can do all things, and that no purpose of yours can be thwarted” (Job 42:2).

31.5 Revelation progressively allows the first notion of immortal life planted by the Creator in the human heart to be grasped with ever greater clarity: “He has made everything beautiful in its time; also he has put eternity into man’s mind” (Eccles 3:11). This first notion of totality and fullness is waiting to be manifested in love and brought to perfection, by God’s free gift, through sharing in his eternal life.

Evangelium Vitae

“The name of Jesus . . . has made this man strong” (Acts 3:16): in the uncertainties of human life, Jesus brings life’s meaning to fulfillment

32.1 The experience of the people of the Covenant is renewed in the experience of all the “poor” who meet Jesus of Nazareth. Just as God who “loves the living” (cf. Wis 11:26) had reassured Israel in the midst of danger, so now the Son of God proclaims to all who feel threatened and hindered that their lives too are a good to which the Father’s love gives meaning and value.

32.2 “The blind receive their sight, the lame walk, lepers are cleansed, and the deaf hear, the dead are raised up, the poor have good news preached to them” (Lk 7:22). With these words of the Prophet Isaiah (35:5-6, 61:1), Jesus sets forth the meaning of his own mission: all who suffer because their lives are in some way “diminished” thus hear from him the “good news” of God’s concern for them, and they know for certain that their lives too are a gift carefully guarded in the hands of the Father (cf. Mt 6:25-34).

32.3 It is above all the “poor” to whom Jesus speaks in his preaching and actions. The crowds of the sick and the outcasts who follow him and seek him out (cf. Mt 4:23-25) find in his words and actions a revelation of the great value of their lives and of how their hope of salvation is well-founded.

32.4 The same thing has taken place in the Church’s mission from the beginning. When the Church proclaims Christ as the one who “went about doing good and healing all that were oppressed by the devil, for God was with him” (Acts 10:38), she is conscious of being the bearer of a message of salvation which resounds in all its newness precisely amid the hardships and poverty of human life. Peter cured the cripple who daily sought alms at the “Beautiful Gate” of the Temple in Jerusalem, saying: “I have no silver and gold, but I give you what I have; in the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth, walk” (Acts 3:6). By faith in Jesus, “the Author of life” (Acts 3:15), life which lies abandoned and cries out for help regains self-esteem and full dignity.

32.5 The words and deeds of Jesus and those of his Church are not meant only for those who are sick or suffering or in some way neglected by society. On a deeper level they affect the very meaning of every person’s life in its moral and spiritual dimensions. Only those who recognize that their life is marked by the evil of sin can discover in an encounter with Jesus the Savior the truth and the authenticity of their own existence. Jesus himself says as much: “Those who are well have no need of a physician, but those who are sick; I have not come to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance” (Lk 5:31-32).

32.6 But the person who, like the rich landowner in the Gospel parable, thinks that he can make his life secure by the possession of material goods alone, is deluding himself. Life is slipping away from him, and very soon he will find himself bereft of it without ever having appreciated its real meaning: “Fool! This night your soul is required of you; and the things you have prepared, whose will they be?” (Lk 12:20).

33.1 In Jesus’ own life, from beginning to end, we find a singular “dialectic” between the experience of the uncertainty of human life and the affirmation of its value. Jesus’ life is marked by uncertainty from the very moment of his birth. He is certainly accepted by the righteous, who echo Mary’s immediate and joyful “yes” (cf. Lk 1:38). But there is also, from the start, rejection on the part of a world which grows hostile and looks for the child in order “to destroy him” (Mt 2:13); a world which remains indifferent and unconcerned about the fulfillment of the mystery of this life entering the world: “there was no place for them in the inn” (Lk 2:7). In this contrast between threats and insecurity on the one hand and the power of God’s gift on the other, there shines forth all the more clearly the glory which radiates from the house at Nazareth and from the manger at Bethlehem: this life which is born is salvation for all humanity (cf. Lk 2:11).

33.2 Life’s contradictions and risks were fully accepted by Jesus: “though he was rich, yet for your sake he became poor, so that by his poverty you might become rich” (2 Cor 8:9). The poverty of which Paul speaks is not only a stripping of divine privileges, but also a sharing in the lowliest and most vulnerable conditions of human life (cf. Phil 2:6-7). Jesus lived this poverty throughout his life until the culminating moment of the Cross: “He humbled himself and became obedient unto death, even death on a cross. Therefore God has highly exalted him and bestowed on him the name which is above every name” (Phil 2:8-9). It is precisely by his death that Jesus reveals all the splendor and value of life, inasmuch as his self-oblation on the Cross becomes the source of new life for all people (cf. Jn 12:32). In his journeying amid contradictions and in the very loss of his life, Jesus is guided by the certainty that his life is in the hands of the Father. Consequently, on the Cross he can say to him: “Father, into your hands I commend my spirit!” (Lk 23:46), that is, my life. Truly great must be the value of human life if the Son of God has taken it up and made it the instrument of the salvation of all humanity!

Evangelium Vitae

“Called . . . to be conformed to the image of his Son” (Rom 8:28-29): God’s glory shines on the face of man 34.1 Life is always a good. This is an instinctive perception and a fact of experience, and man is called to grasp the profound reason why this is so.

34.2 Why is life a good? This question is found everywhere in the Bible, and from the very first pages it receives a powerful and amazing answer. The life which God gives man is quite different from the life of all other living creatures, inasmuch as man, although formed from the dust of the earth (cf. Gen 2:7, 3:19; Job 34:15; Ps 103:14, 104:29), is a manifestation of God in the world, a sign of his presence, a trace of his glory (cf. Gen 1:26-27; Ps 8:6). This is what Saint Irenaeus of Lyons wanted to emphasize in his celebrated definition: “Man, living man, is the glory of God.”<sup>23</sup> Man has been given a sublime dignity based on the intimate bond which unites him to his Creator: in man there shines forth a reflection of God himself.

34.3 The Book of Genesis affirms this when, in the first account of creation, it places man at the summit of God’s creative activity, as its crown, at the culmination of a process which leads from indistinct chaos to the most perfect of creatures. Everything in creation is ordered to man, and everything is made subject to him: “Fill the earth and subdue it; and have dominion over . . . every living thing” (1:28); this is God’s command to the man and the woman. A similar message is found also in the other account of creation: “The Lord God took the man and put him in the garden of Eden to till it and keep it” (Gen 2:15). We see here a clear affirmation of the primacy of man over things; these are made subject to him and entrusted to his responsible care, whereas for no reason can he be made subject to other men and almost reduced to the level of a thing.

34.4 In the biblical narrative, the difference between man and other creatures is shown above all by the fact that only the creation of man is presented as the result of a special decision on the part of God, a deliberation to establish a particular and specific bond with the Creator: “Let us make man in our image, after our likeness” (Gen 1:26). The life which God offers to man is a gift by which God shares something of himself with his creature.

34.5 Israel would ponder at length the meaning of this particular bond between man and God. The Book of Sirach too recognizes that God, in creating human beings, “endowed them with strength like his own, and made them in his own image” (17:3). The biblical author sees as part of this image not only man’s dominion over the world but also those spiritual faculties which are distinctively human, such as reason, discernment between good and evil, and free will: “He filled them with knowledge and understanding, and showed them good and evil”

(Sir 17:7). The ability to attain truth and freedom are human prerogatives inasmuch as man is created in the image of his Creator, God who is true and just (cf. Dt 32:4). Man alone, among all visible creatures, is “capable of knowing and loving his Creator.”<sup>24</sup> The life which God bestows upon man is much more than mere existence in time. It is a drive toward fullness of life; it is the seed of an existence which transcends the very limits of time: “For God created man for incorruption, and made him in the image of his own eternity” (Wis 2:23).

35.1 The Yahwist account of creation expresses the same conviction. This ancient narrative speaks of a divine breath which is breathed into man so that he may come to life: “The Lord God formed man of dust from the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life; and man became a living being” (Gen 2:7).

35.2 The divine origin of this spirit of life explains the perennial dissatisfaction which man feels throughout his days on earth. Because he is made by God and bears within himself an indelible imprint of God, man is naturally drawn to God. When he heeds the deepest yearnings of the heart, every man must make his own the words of truth expressed by Saint Augustine: “You have made us for yourself, O Lord, and our hearts are restless until they rest in you.”<sup>25</sup>

35.3 How very significant is the dissatisfaction which marks man’s life in Eden as long as his sole point of reference is the world of plants and animals (cf. Gen 2:20). Only the appearance of the woman, a being who is flesh of his flesh and bone of his bones (cf. Gen 2:23), and in whom the spirit of God the Creator is also alive, can satisfy the need for interpersonal dialogue, so vital for human existence. In the other, whether man or woman, there is a reflection of God himself, the definitive goal and fulfillment of every person.

35.4 “What is man that you are mindful of him, and the son of man that you care for him?” the Psalmist wonders (Ps 8:4). Compared to the immensity of the universe, man is very small, and yet this very contrast reveals his greatness: “You have made him little less than a god, and crown him with glory and honor” (Ps 8:5). The glory of God shines on the face of man. In man the Creator finds his rest, as Saint Ambrose comments with a sense of awe: “The sixth day is finished and the creation of the world ends with the formation of that masterpiece which is man, who exercises dominion over all living creatures and is as it were the crown of the universe and the supreme beauty of every created being. Truly we should maintain a reverential silence, since the Lord rested from every work he had undertaken in the world. He rested then in the depths of man, he rested in man’s mind and in his thought; after all, he had created man endowed with reason, capable of imitating him, of emulating his virtue, of hungering for heavenly graces. In these his gifts God reposes, who has said: ‘Upon whom shall I rest, if not upon the one who is humble, contrite in spirit and trembles at my word?’ (Is 66:1-2). I thank the Lord our God who has created so wonderful a work in which to take his rest.”<sup>26</sup>

36.1 Unfortunately, God’s marvelous plan was marred by the appearance of sin in history. Through sin, man rebels against his Creator and ends up by worshipping creatures: “They exchanged the truth about God for a lie and worshiped and served the creature rather than the Creator” (Rom 1:25). As a result man not only deforms the image of God in his own person, but is tempted to offenses against it in others as well, replacing relationships of communion by attitudes of distrust, indifference, hostility and even murderous hatred. When God is not acknowledged as God, the profound meaning of man is betrayed and communion between people is compromised.

36.2 In the life of man, God’s image shines forth anew and is again revealed in all its fullness at the coming of the Son of God in human flesh. “Christ is the image of the invisible God” (Col 1:15); he “reflects the glory of God and bears the very stamp of his nature” (Heb 1:3). He is the perfect image of the Father.

36.3 The plan of life given to the first Adam finds at last its fulfillment in Christ. Whereas the disobedience of Adam had ruined and marred God’s plan for human life and introduced death into the world, the redemptive obedience of Christ is the source of grace poured out upon the human race, opening wide to everyone the gates of the Kingdom of life (cf. Rom 5:12-21). As the Apostle Paul states: “The first man Adam became a living being; the last Adam became a life-giving spirit” (1 Cor 15:45).

36.4 All who commit themselves to following Christ are given the fullness of life: the divine image is restored, renewed and brought to perfection in them. God’s plan for human beings is this, that they should “be conformed to the image of his Son” (Rom 8:29). Only thus, in the splendor of this image, can man be freed from the slavery of idolatry, rebuild lost fellowship and rediscover his true identity.

Evangelium Vitae

“Whoever lives and believes in me shall never die” (Jn 11:26): the gift of eternal life

37.1 The life which the Son of God came to give to human beings cannot be reduced to mere existence in time. The life which was always “in him” and which is the “light of men” (Jn 1:4) consists in being begotten of God and sharing in the fullness of his love: “To all who received him, who believed in his name, he gave power to become children of God; who were born, not of blood nor of the will of the flesh nor of the will of man, but of God” (Jn 1:12-13 ).

37.2 Sometimes Jesus refers to this life which he came to give simply as “life,” and he presents being born of God as a necessary condition if man is to attain the end for which God has created him: “Unless one is born anew, he cannot see the kingdom of God” (Jn 3:3). To give this life is the real object of Jesus’ mission: he is the one who “comes down from heaven, and gives life to the world” (Jn 6:33). Thus can he truly say: “He who follows me . . . will have the light of life” (Jn 8:12).

37.3 At other times, Jesus speaks of “eternal life.” Here the adjective does more than merely evoke a perspective which is beyond time. The life which Jesus promises and gives is “eternal” because it is a full participation in the life of the “Eternal One.” Whoever believes in Jesus and enters into communion with him has eternal life (cf. Jn 3:15, 6:40) because he hears from Jesus the only words which reveal and communicate to his existence the fullness of life. These are the “words of eternal life” which Peter acknowledges in his confession of faith: “Lord, to whom shall we go? You have the words of eternal life; and we have believed, and have come to know, that you are the Holy One of God” (Jn 6:68-69). Jesus himself, addressing the Father in the great priestly prayer, declares what eternal life consists in: “This is eternal life, that they may know you, the only true God, and Jesus Christ, whom you have sent” (Jn 17:3). To know God and his Son is to accept the mystery of the loving communion of the Father, the Son and the Holy Spirit into one’s own life, which even now is open to eternal life because it shares in the life of God.

38.1 Eternal life is therefore the life of God himself and at the same time the life of the children of God. As they ponder this unexpected and inexpressible truth which comes to us from God in Christ, believers cannot fail to be filled with ever new wonder and unbounded gratitude. They can say in the words of the Apostle John: “See what love the Father has given us, that we should be called children of God; and so we are. . . . Beloved, we are God’s children now; it does not yet appear what we shall be, but we know that when he appears we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is” (1 Jn 3:1-2).

38.2 Here the Christian truth about life becomes most sublime. The dignity of this life is linked not only to its beginning, to the fact that it comes from God, but also to its final end, to its destiny of fellowship with God in knowledge and love of him. In the light of this truth Saint Irenaeus qualifies and completes his praise of man: “The glory of God” is indeed, “man, living man,” but “the life of man consists in the vision of God.”<sup>27</sup>

38.3 Immediate consequences arise from this for human life in its earthly state, in which, for that matter, eternal life already springs forth and begins to grow. Although man instinctively loves life because it is a good, this love will find further inspiration and strength, and new breadth and depth, in the divine dimensions of this good. Similarly, the love which every human being has for life cannot be reduced simply to a desire to have sufficient space for self-expression and for entering into relationships with others; rather, it develops in a joyous awareness that life can become the “place” where God manifests himself, where we meet him and enter into communion with him. The life which Jesus gives in no way lessens the value of our existence in time; it takes it and directs it to its final destiny: “I am the resurrection and the life . . . whoever lives and believes in me shall never die” (Jn 11:25-26).

“From man in regard to his fellow man I will demand an accounting” (Gen 9:5): reverence and love for every human life

39.1 Man’s life comes from God; it is his gift, his image and imprint, a sharing in his breath of life. God therefore is the sole Lord of this life: man cannot do with it as he wills. God himself makes this clear to Noah after the flood: “For your own lifeblood, too, I will demand an accounting . . . and from man in regard to his fellow man I will demand an accounting for human life” (Gen 9:5). The biblical text is concerned to emphasize how the sacredness of life has its foundation in God and in his creative activity: “For God made man in his own image” (Gen 9:6).

39.2 Human life and death are thus in the hands of God, in his power: “In his hand is the life of every living thing and the breath of all mankind,” exclaims Job (12:10). “The Lord brings to death and brings to life; he brings down to Sheol and raises up” (1 Sam 2:6). He alone can say: “It is I who bring both death and life” (Dt 32:39).

39.3 But God does not exercise this power in an arbitrary and threatening way, but rather as part of his care and loving concern for his creatures. If it is true that human life is in the hands of God, it is no less true that these are loving hands, like those of a mother who accepts, nurtures and takes care of her child: “I have calmed and quieted my soul like a child quieted at its mother’s breast; like a child that is quieted is my soul” (Ps 131:2; cf. Is 49:15, 66:12-13; Hos 11:4). Thus Israel does not see in the history of peoples and in the destiny of individuals the outcome of mere chance or of blind fate, but rather the results of a loving plan by which God brings together all the possibilities of life and opposes the powers of death arising from sin: “God did not make death, and he does not delight in the death of the living. For he created all things that they might exist” (Wis 1:13-14).

40.1 The sacredness of life gives rise to its inviolability, written from the beginning in man’s heart, in his conscience. The question “What have you done?” (Gen 4:10), which God addresses to Cain after he has killed his brother Abel, interprets the experience of every person: in the depths of his conscience, man is always reminded of the inviolability of life – his own life and that of others – as something which does not belong to him, because it is the property and gift of God the Creator and Father.

40.2 The commandment regarding the inviolability of human life reverberates at the heart of the “ten words” in the Covenant of Sinai (cf. Ex 34:28). In the first place that commandment prohibits murder: “You shall not kill” (Ex 20:13); “do not slay the innocent and righteous” (Ex 23:7). But, as is brought out in Israel’s later legislation, it also prohibits all personal injury inflicted on another (cf. Ex 21:12-27). Of course we must recognize that in the Old Testament this sense of the value of life, though already quite marked, does not yet reach the refinement found in the Sermon on the Mount. This is apparent in some aspects of the current penal legislation, which provided for severe forms of corporal punishment and even the death penalty. But the overall message, which the New Testament will bring to perfection, is a forceful appeal for respect for the inviolability of physical life and the integrity of the person. It culminates in the positive commandment which obliges us to be responsible for our neighbor as for ourselves: "You shall love your neighbor as yourself" (Lev 19:18).

41.1 The commandment "You shall not kill," included and more fully expressed in the positive command of love for one's neighbor, is reaffirmed in all its force by the Lord Jesus. To the rich young man who asks him, "Teacher, what good deed must I do to have eternal life?" Jesus replies, "If you would enter life, keep the commandments" (Mt 19:16, 17). And he quotes, as the first of these, "You shall not kill" (Mt 19:18). In the Sermon on the Mount, Jesus demands from his disciples a righteousness which surpasses that of the scribes and Pharisees, also with regard to respect for life: "You have heard that it was said to the men of old, 'You shall not kill; and whoever kills shall be liable to judgment.' But I say to you that every one who is angry with his brother shall be liable to judgment" (Mt 5:21-22).

41.2 By his words and actions Jesus further unveils the positive requirements of the commandment regarding the inviolability of life. These requirements were already present in the Old Testament, where legislation dealt with protecting and defending life when it was weak and threatened: in the case of foreigners, widows, orphans, the sick and the poor in general, including children in the womb (cf. Ex 21:22, 22:20-26). With Jesus these positive requirements assume new force and urgency, and are revealed in all their breadth and depth: they range from caring for the life of one's brother (whether a blood brother, someone belonging to the same people, or a foreigner living in the land of Israel) to showing concern for the stranger, even to the point of loving one's enemy.

41.3 A stranger is no longer a stranger for the person who must become a neighbor to someone in need, to the point of accepting responsibility for his life, as the parable of the Good Samaritan shows so clearly (cf. Lk 10:25-37). Even an enemy ceases to be an enemy for the person who is obliged to love him (cf. Mt 5:38-48; Lk 6:27-35), to "do good" to him (cf. Lk 6:27, 33, 35) and to respond to his immediate needs promptly and with no expectation of repayment (cf. Lk 6:34-35). The height of this love is to pray for one's enemy. By so doing we achieve harmony with the providential love of God: "But I say to you, love your enemies and pray for those who persecute you, so that you may be children of your Father who is in heaven; for he makes his sun rise on the evil and on the good and sends rain on the just and on the unjust” (Mt 5:44-45; cf. Lk 6:28, 35).

41.4 Thus the deepest element of God’s commandment to protect human life is the requirement to show reverence and love for every person and the life of every person. This is the teaching which the Apostle Paul, echoing the words of Jesus, addresses to the Christians in Rome: “The commandments, ‘You shall not commit adultery, You shall not kill, You shall not steal, You shall not covet,’ and any other commandment, are summed up in this sentence, ‘You shall love your neighbor as yourself.’ Love does no wrong to a neighbor; therefore love is the fulfilling of the law” (Rom 13:9-10).

Evangelium Vitae

“Be fruitful and multiply, and fill the earth and subdue it” (Gen 1:28): man’s responsibility for life

42.1 To defend and promote life, to show reverence and love for it, is a task which God entrusts to every man, calling him as his living image to share in his own lordship over the world: “God blessed them, and God said to them, ‘Be fruitful and multiply, and fill the earth and subdue it; and have dominion over the fish of the sea and over the birds of the air and over every living thing that moves upon the earth’ ” (Gen 1:28).

42.2 The biblical text clearly shows the breadth and depth of the lordship which God bestows on man. It is a matter first of all of dominion over the earth and over every living creature, as the Book of Wisdom makes clear: “O God of my fathers and Lord of mercy. . . . By your wisdom you have formed man, to have dominion over the creatures you have made, and rule the world in holiness and righteousness” (Wis 9:1-3). The Psalmist too extols the dominion given to man as a sign of glory and honor from his Creator: “You have given him dominion over the works of your hands; you have put all things under his feet, all sheep and oxen, and also the beasts of the field, the birds of the air, and the fish of the sea, whatever passes along the paths of the sea” (Ps 8:6-8).

42.3 As one called to till and look after the garden of the world (cf. Gen 2:15), man has a specific responsibility toward the environment in which he lives, toward the creation which God has put at the service of his personal dignity, of his life, not only for the present but also for future generations. It is the ecological question – ranging from the preservation of the natural habitats of the different species of animals and of other forms of life to “human ecology” properly speaking<sup>28</sup> – which finds in the Bible clear and strong ethical direction leading to a solution which respects the great good of life, of every life. In fact, “the dominion granted to man by the Creator is not an absolute power, nor can one speak of a freedom to ‘use and misuse,’ or to dispose of things as one pleases. The limitation imposed from the beginning by the Creator himself and expressed symbolically by the prohibition not to ‘eat of the fruit of the tree’ (cf. Gen 2:16-17) shows clearly enough that, when it comes to the natural world, we are subject not only to biological laws but also to moral ones, which cannot be violated with impunity.”<sup>29</sup>

43.1 A certain sharing by man in God’s lordship is also evident in the specific responsibility which he is given for human life as such. It is a responsibility which reaches its highest point in the giving of life through procreation by man and woman in marriage. As the Second Vatican Council teaches: “God himself who said, 'It is not good for man to be alone' (Gen 2:18) and 'who made man from the beginning male and female' (Mt 19:4), wished to share with man a certain special participation in his own creative work. Thus he blessed male and female, saying: 'Increase and multiply' (Gen 1:28)."<sup>30</sup>

43.2 By speaking of "a certain special participation" of man and woman in the "creative work" of God, the Council wishes to point out that having a child is an event which is deeply human and full of religious meaning, insofar as it involves both the spouses, who form "one flesh" (Gen 2:24), and God who makes himself present. As I wrote in my Letter to Families: "When a new person is born of the conjugal union of the two, he brings with him into the world a particular image and likeness of God himself: the genealogy of the person is inscribed in the very biology of generation. In affirming that the spouses, as parents, cooperate with God the Creator in conceiving and giving birth to a new human being, we are not speaking merely with reference to the laws of biology. Instead, we wish to emphasize that God himself is present in human fatherhood and motherhood quite differently than he is present in all other instances of begetting 'on earth.' Indeed, God alone is the source of that 'image and likeness' which is proper to the human being, as it was received at creation. Begetting is the continuation of creation."<sup>31</sup>

43.3 This is what the Bible teaches in direct and eloquent language when it reports the joyful cry of the first woman, "the mother of all the living" (Gen 3:20). Aware that God has intervened, Eve exclaims: "I have begotten a man with the help of the Lord" (Gen 4:1). In procreation therefore, through the communication of life from parents to child, God's own image and likeness is transmitted, thanks to the creation of the immortal soul.<sup>32</sup> The beginning of the "book of the genealogy of Adam" expresses it in this way: "When God created man, he made him in the likeness of God. Male and female he created them, and he blessed them and called them man when they were created. When Adam had lived a hundred and thirty years, he became the father of a son in his own likeness, after his image, and named him Seth" (Gen 5:1-3). It is precisely in their role as co-workers with God who transmits his image to the new creature that we see the greatness of couples who are ready "to cooperate with the love of the Creator and the Savior, who through them will enlarge and enrich his own family day by day."<sup>33</sup> This is why the Bishop Amphilochius extolled "holy matrimony, chosen and elevated above all other earthly gifts" as "the begetter of humanity, the creator of images of God."<sup>34</sup>

43.4 Thus, a man and woman joined in matrimony become partners in a divine undertaking: through the act of procreation, God's gift is accepted and a new life opens to the future.

43.5 But over and above the specific mission of parents, the task of accepting and serving life involves everyone; and this task must be fulfilled above all toward life when it is at its weakest. It is Christ himself who reminds us of this when he asks to be loved and served in his brothers and sisters who are suffering in any way: the hungry, the thirsty, the foreigner, the naked, the sick, the imprisoned. . . . Whatever is done to each of them is done to Christ himself (cf. Mt 25:31-46).

Evangelium Vitae

“For you formed my inmost being” (Ps 139:13): the dignity of the unborn child

44.1 Human life finds itself most vulnerable when it enters the world and when it leaves the realm of time to embark upon eternity. The word of God frequently repeats the call to show care and respect, above all where life is undermined by sickness and old age. Although there are no direct and explicit calls to protect human life at its very beginning, specifically life not yet born and life nearing its end, this can easily be explained by the fact that the mere possibility of harming, attacking or actually denying life in these circumstances is completely foreign to the religious and cultural way of thinking of the People of God.

44.2 In the Old Testament, sterility is dreaded as a curse, while numerous offspring are viewed as a blessing: “Sons are a heritage from the Lord, the fruit of the womb a reward” (Ps 127:3; cf. Ps 128:3-4). This belief is also based on Israel’s awareness of being the people of the Covenant, called to increase in accordance with the promise made to Abraham: “Look toward heaven, and number the stars, if you are able to number them . . . so shall your descendants be” (Gen 15:5). But more than anything else, at work here is the certainty that the life which parents transmit has its origins in God. We see this attested in the many biblical passages which respectfully and lovingly speak of conception, of the forming of life in the mother’s womb, of giving birth and of the intimate connection between the initial moment of life and the action of God the Creator.

44.3 “Before I formed you in the womb I knew you, and before you were born I consecrated you” (Jer 1:5): the life of every individual, from its very beginning, is part of God’s plan. Job, from the depth of his pain, stops to contemplate the work of God, who miraculously formed his body in his mother’s womb. Here he finds reason for trust, and he expresses his belief that there is a divine plan for his life: “You have fashioned and made me; will you then turn and destroy me? Remember that you have made me of clay; and will you turn me to dust again? Did you not pour me out like milk and curdle me like cheese? You clothed me with skin and flesh, and knit me together with bones and sinews. You have granted me life and steadfast love; and your care has preserved my spirit” (Job 10:8-12). Expressions of awe and wonder at God’s intervention in the life of a child in its mother’s womb occur again and again in the Psalms.35

44.4 How can anyone think that even a single moment of this marvelous process of the unfolding of life could be separated from the wise and loving work of the Creator, and left prey to human caprice? Certainly the mother of the seven brothers did not think so; she professes her faith in God, both the source and guarantee of life from its very conception, and the foundation of the hope of new life beyond death: “I do not know how you came into being in my womb. It was not I who gave you life and breath, nor I who set in order the elements within each of you. Therefore the Creator of the world, who shaped the beginning of man and devised the origin of all things, will in his mercy give life and breath back to you again, since you now forget yourselves for the sake of his laws” (2 Mac 7:22-23).

45 The New Testament revelation confirms the indisputable recognition of the value of life from its very beginning. The exaltation of fruitfulness and the eager expectation of life resound in the words with which Elizabeth rejoices in her pregnancy: “The Lord has looked on me . . . to take away my reproach among men” (Lk 1:25). And even more so, the value of the person from the moment of conception is celebrated in the meeting between the Virgin Mary and Elizabeth, and between the two children whom they are carrying in the womb. It is precisely the children who reveal the advent of the messianic age: in their meeting, the redemptive power of the presence of the Son of God among men first becomes operative. As Saint Ambrose writes: “The arrival of Mary and the blessings of the Lord’s presence are also speedily declared. . . . Elizabeth was the first to hear the voice; but John was the first to experience grace. She heard according to the order of nature; he leaped because of the mystery. She recognized the arrival of Mary; he the arrival of the Lord. The woman recognized the woman’s arrival; the child, that of the child. The women speak of grace; the babies make it effective from within to the advantage of their mothers who, by a double miracle, prophesy under the inspiration of their children. The infant leaped, the mother was filled with the Spirit. The mother was not filled before the son, but after the son was filled with the Holy Spirit, he filled his mother too.”<sup>36</sup>

Evangelium Vitae

“I kept my faith even when I said, ‘I am greatly afflicted’ ” (Ps 116:10): life in old age and at times of suffering

46.1 With regard to the last moments of life too, it would be anachronistic to expect biblical revelation to make express reference to present-day issues concerning respect for elderly and sick persons, or to condemn explicitly attempts to hasten their end by force. The cultural and religious context of the Bible is in no way touched by such temptations; indeed, in that context the wisdom and experience of the elderly are recognized as a unique source of enrichment for the family and for society.

46.2 Old age is characterized by dignity and surrounded with reverence (cf. 2 Mac 6:23). The just man does not seek to be delivered from old age and its burden; on the contrary his prayer is this: “You, O Lord, are my hope, my trust, O Lord, from my youth . . . so even to old age and gray hairs, O God, do not forsake me, till I proclaim your might to all the generations to come” (Ps 71:5, 18). The ideal of the messianic age is presented as a time when “no more shall there be . . . an old man who does not fill out his days” (Is 65:20).

46.3 In old age, how should one face the inevitable decline of life? How should one act in the face of death? The believer knows that his life is in the hands of God: “You, O Lord, hold my lot” (cf. Ps 16:5), and he accepts from God the need to die: “This is the decree from the Lord for all flesh, and how can you reject the good pleasure of the Most High?” (Sir 41:3-4). Man is not the master of life nor is he the master of death. In life and in death, he has to entrust himself completely to the “good pleasure of the Most High,” to his loving plan.

46.4 In moments of sickness too, man is called to have the same trust in the Lord and to renew his fundamental faith in the One who “heals all your diseases” (cf. Ps 103:3). When every hope of good health seems to fade before a person’s eyes – so as to make him cry out, “My days are like an evening shadow; I wither away like grass” (Ps 102:11) – even then the believer is sustained by an unshakable faith in God’s life-giving power. Illness does not drive such a person to despair and to seek death, but makes him cry out in hope: “I kept my faith, even when I said, ‘I am greatly afflicted’ ” (Ps 116:10); “O Lord my God, I cried to you for help, and you have healed me. O Lord, you have brought up my soul from Sheol, restored me to life from among those gone down to the pit” (Ps 30:2-3).

47.1 The mission of Jesus, with the many healings he performed, shows God’s great concern even for man’s bodily life. Jesus, as “the physician of the body and of the spirit,”<sup>37</sup> was sent by the Father to proclaim the good news to the poor and to heal the brokenhearted (cf. Lk 4:18; Is 61:1). Later, when he sends his disciples into the world, he gives them a mission, a mission in which healing the sick goes hand in hand with the proclamation of the Gospel: “And preach as you go, saying, ‘The kingdom of heaven is at hand.’ Heal the sick, raise the dead, cleanse lepers, cast out demons” (Mt 10:7-8; cf. Mk 6:13, 16:18).

47.2 Certainly the life of the body in its earthly state is not an absolute good for the believer, especially as he may be asked to give up his life for a greater good. As Jesus says: “Whoever would save his life will lose it; and whoever loses his life for my sake and the gospel’s will save it” (Mk 8:35). The New Testament gives many different examples of this. Jesus does not hesitate to sacrifice himself, and he freely makes of his life an offering to the Father (cf. Jn 10:17) and to those who belong to him (cf. Jn 10:15). The death of John the Baptist, precursor of the Savior, also testifies that earthly existence is not an absolute good; what is more important is remaining faithful to the word of the Lord even at the risk of one’s life (cf. Mk 6:17-29). Stephen, losing his earthly life because of his faithful witness to the Lord’s Resurrection, follows in the Master’s footsteps and meets those who are stoning him with words of forgiveness (cf. Acts 7:59-60), thus becoming the first of a countless host of martyrs whom the Church has venerated since the very beginning.

47.3 No one, however, can arbitrarily choose whether to live or die; the absolute master of such a decision is the Creator alone, in whom “we live and move and have our being” (Acts 17:28).

Evangelium Vitae

“All who hold her fast will live” (Bar 4:1): from the Law of Sinai to the gift of the Spirit

48.1 Life is indelibly marked by a truth of its own. By accepting God’s gift, man is obliged to maintain life in this truth, which is essential to it. To detach oneself from this truth is to condemn oneself to meaninglessness and unhappiness, and possibly to become a threat to the existence of others, since the barriers guaranteeing respect for life and the defense of life in every circumstance have been broken down.

48.2 The truth of life is revealed by God’s commandment. The word of the Lord shows concretely the course which life must follow if it is to respect its own truth and to preserve its own dignity. The protection of life is not only ensured by the specific commandment “You shall not kill” (Ex 20:13; Dt 5:17); the entire Law of the Lord serves to protect life, because it reveals that truth in which life finds its full meaning.

48.3 It is not surprising, therefore, that God’s Covenant with his people is so closely linked to the perspective of life, also in its bodily dimension. In that Covenant, God’s commandment is offered as the path of life: “I have set before you this day life and good, death and evil. If you obey the commandments of the Lord your God which I command you this day, by loving the Lord your God, by walking in his ways, and by keeping his commandments and his statutes and his ordinances, then you shall live and multiply, and the Lord your God will bless you in the land which you are entering to take possession of” (Dt 30:15-16). What is at stake is not only the land of Canaan and the existence of the people of Israel, but also the world of today and of the future, and the existence of all humanity. In fact, it is altogether impossible for life to remain authentic and complete once it is detached from the good; and the good, in its turn, is essentially bound to the commandments of the Lord, that is, to the “law of life” (Sir 17:11). The good to be done is not added to life as a burden which weighs on it, since the very purpose of life is that good and only by doing it can life be built up.

48.4 It is thus the Law as a whole which fully protects human life. This explains why it is so hard to remain faithful to the commandment “You shall not kill” when the other “words of life” (cf. Acts 7:38) with which this commandment is bound up are not observed. Detached from this wider framework, the commandment is destined to become nothing more than an obligation imposed from without, and very soon we begin to look for its limits and try to find mitigating factors and exceptions. Only when people are open to the fullness of the truth about God, man and history will the words “You shall not kill” shine forth once more as a good for man in himself and in his relations with others. In such a perspective we can grasp the full truth of the passage of the Book of Deuteronomy which Jesus repeats in reply to the first temptation: “Man does not live by bread alone, but . . . by everything that proceeds out of the mouth of the Lord” (Dt 8:3; cf. Mt 4:4).

48.5 It is by listening to the word of the Lord that we are able to live in dignity and justice. It is by observing the Law of God that we are able to bring forth fruits of life and happiness: “All who hold her fast will live, and those who forsake her will die” (Bar 4:1).

49.1 The history of Israel shows how difficult it is to remain faithful to the law of life which God has inscribed in human hearts and which he gave on Sinai to the people of the Covenant. When the people look for ways of living which ignore God’s plan, it is the Prophets in particular who forcefully remind them that the Lord alone is the authentic source of life. Thus Jeremiah writes: “My people have committed two evils: they have forsaken me, the fountain of living waters, and hewed out cisterns for themselves, broken cisterns, that can hold no water” (2:13). The Prophets point an accusing finger at those who show contempt for life and violate people’s rights: “They trample the head of the poor into the dust of the earth” (Amos 2:7); “they have filled this place with the blood of innocents” (Jer 19:4). Among them, the Prophet Ezekiel frequently condemns the city of Jerusalem, calling it “the bloody city” (22:2; 24:6, 9), the “city that sheds blood in her own midst” (22:3).

49.2 But while the Prophets condemn offenses against life, they are concerned above all to awaken hope for a new principle of life, capable of bringing about a renewed relationship with God and with others, and of opening up new and extraordinary possibilities for understanding and carrying out all the demands inherent in the Gospel of life. This will only be possible thanks to the gift of God who purifies and renews: “I will sprinkle clean water upon you, and you shall be clean from all your uncleannesses, and from all your idols I will cleanse you. A new heart I will give you, and a new spirit I will put within you” (Ezek 36:25-26; cf. Jer 31:34). This “new heart” will make it possible to appreciate and achieve the deepest and most authentic meaning of life: namely, that of being a gift which is fully realized in the giving of self. This is the splendid message about the value of life which comes to us from the figure of the Servant of the Lord: “When he makes himself an offering for sin, he shall see his offspring, he shall prolong his life . . . he shall see the fruit of the travail of his soul and be satisfied” (Is 53:10,11).

49.3 It is in the coming of Jesus of Nazareth that the Law is fulfilled and that a new heart is given through his Spirit. Jesus does not deny the Law but brings it to fulfillment (cf. Mt 5:17): the Law and the Prophets are summed up in the golden rule of mutual love (cf. Mt 7:12). In Jesus the Law becomes once and for all the “Gospel,” the good news of God’s lordship over the world, which brings all life back to its roots and its original purpose. This is the New Law, “the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus” (Rom 8:2), and its fundamental expression, following the example of the Lord who gave his life for his friends (cf. Jn 15:13), is the gift of self in love for one’s brothers and sisters: “We know that we have passed out of death into life, because we love the brethren” (1 Jn 3:14). This is the law of freedom, joy and blessedness.

“They shall look on him whom they have pierced” (Jn 19:37): the Gospel of life is brought to fulfillment on the tree of the Cross

50.1 At the end of this chapter, in which we have reflected on the Christian message about life, I would like to pause with each one of you to contemplate the One who was pierced and who draws all people to himself (cf. Jn 19:37, 12:32). Looking at “the spectacle” of the Cross (cf. Lk 23:48) we shall discover in this glorious tree the fulfillment and the complete revelation of the whole Gospel of life.

50.2 In the early afternoon of Good Friday, “there was darkness over the whole land . . . while the sun’s light failed; and the curtain of the temple was torn in two” (Lk 23:44, 45). This is the symbol of a great cosmic disturbance and a massive conflict between the forces of good and the forces of evil, between life and death. Today we too find ourselves in the midst of a dramatic conflict between the “culture of death” and the “culture of life.” But the glory of the Cross is not overcome by this darkness; rather, it shines forth ever more radiantly and brightly, and is revealed as the center, meaning and goal of all history and of every human life.

50.3 Jesus is nailed to the Cross and is lifted up from the earth. He experiences the moment of his greatest “powerlessness,” and his life seems completely delivered to the derision of his adversaries and into the hands of his executioners: he is mocked, jeered at, insulted (cf. Mk 15:24-36). And yet, precisely amid all this, having seen him breathe his last, the Roman centurion exclaims: “Truly this man was the Son of God!” (Mk 15:39). It is thus, at the moment of his greatest weakness, that the Son of God is revealed for who he is: on the Cross his glory is made manifest.

50.4 By his death, Jesus sheds light on the meaning of the life and death of every human being. Before he dies, Jesus prays to the Father, asking forgiveness for his persecutors (cf. Lk 23:34), and to the criminal who asks him to remember him in his Kingdom he replies: “Truly, I say to you, today you will be with me in paradise” (Lk 23:43). After his death, “the tombs also were opened, and many bodies of the saints who had fallen asleep were raised” (Mt 27:52). The salvation wrought by Jesus is the bestowal of life and resurrection. Throughout his earthly life, Jesus had indeed bestowed salvation by healing and doing good to all (cf. Acts 10:38). But his miracles, healings and even his raising of the dead were signs of another salvation, a salvation which consists in the forgiveness of sins, that is, in setting man free from his greatest sickness and in raising him to the very life of God.

50.5 On the Cross, the miracle of the serpent lifted up by Moses in the desert

(Jn 3:14-15; cf. Num 21:8-9) is renewed and brought to full and definitive perfection. Today too, by looking upon the one who was pierced, every person whose life is threatened encounters the sure hope of finding freedom and redemption.

51.1 But there is yet another particular event which moves me deeply when I consider it. “When Jesus had received the vinegar, he said, ‘It is finished’; and he bowed his head and gave up his spirit” (Jn 19:30). Afterward, the Roman soldier “pierced his side with a spear, and at once there came out blood and water” (Jn 19:34).

51.2 Everything has now reached its complete fulfillment. The “giving up” of the spirit describes Jesus’ death, a death like that of every other human being, but it also seems to allude to the “gift of the Spirit,” by which Jesus ransoms us from death and opens before us a new life.

51.3 It is the very life of God which is now shared with man. It is the life which through the sacraments of the Church – symbolized by the blood and water flowing from Christ’s side – is continually given to God’s children, making them the people of the New Covenant. From the Cross, the source of life, the “people of life” is born and increases.

51.4 The contemplation of the Cross thus brings us to the very heart of all that has taken place. Jesus, who upon entering into the world said, “I have come, O God, to do your will” (cf. Heb 10:9), made himself obedient to the Father in everything and, “having loved his own who were in the world, he loved them to the end” (Jn 13:1), giving himself completely for them.

51.5 He who had come “not to be served but to serve, and to give his life as a ransom for many” (Mk 10:45), attains on the Cross the heights of love: “Greater love has no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends” (Jn 15:13). And he died for us while we were yet sinners (cf. Rom 5:8).

51.6 In this way Jesus proclaims that life finds its center, its meaning and its fulfillment when it is given up.

51.7 At this point our meditation becomes praise and thanksgiving, and at the same time urges us to imitate Christ and follow in his footsteps (cf. 1 Pet 2:21).

51.8 We too are called to give our lives for our brothers and sisters, and thus to realize in the fullness of truth the meaning and destiny of our existence.

51.9 We shall be able to do this because you, O Lord, have given us the example and have bestowed on us the power of your Spirit. We shall be able to do this if every day, with you and like you, we are obedient to the Father and do his will.

51.10 Grant, therefore, that we may listen with open and generous hearts to every word which proceeds from the mouth of God. Thus we shall learn not only to obey the commandment not to kill human life, but also to revere life, to love it and to foster it.

Evangelium Vitae

“If you would enter life, keep the commandments” (Mt 19:17): Gospel and commandment

52.1 “And behold, one came up to him, saying, ‘Teacher, what good deed must I do, to have eternal life?’ ” (Mt 19:6). Jesus replied, “If you would enter life, keep the commandments” (Mt 19:17). The Teacher is speaking about eternal life, that is, a sharing in the life of God himself. This life is attained through the observance of the Lord’s commandments, including the commandment “You shall not kill.” This is the first precept from the Decalogue which Jesus quotes to the young man who asks him what commandments he should observe: “Jesus said, ‘You shall not kill, you shall not commit adultery, you shall not steal’ ” (Mt 19:18).

52.2 God’s commandment is never detached from his love: it is always a gift meant for man’s growth and joy. As such, it represents an essential and indispensable aspect of the Gospel, actually becoming “gospel” itself: joyful good news. The Gospel of life is both a great gift of God and an exacting task for humanity. It gives rise to amazement and gratitude in the person graced with freedom, and it asks to be welcomed, preserved and esteemed, with a deep sense of responsibility. In giving life to man, God *demand*s that he love, respect and promote life. The gift thus becomes a commandment, and the commandment is itself a gift.

52.3 Man, as the living image of God, is willed by his Creator to be ruler and lord. Saint Gregory of Nyssa writes that “God made man capable of carrying out his role as king of the earth. . . . Man was created in the image of the One who governs the universe. Everything demonstrates that from the beginning man’s nature was marked by royalty. . . . Man is a king. Created to exercise dominion over the world, he was given a likeness to the king of the universe; he is the living image who participates by his dignity in the perfection of the divine archetype.”<sup>38</sup> Called to be fruitful and multiply, to subdue the earth and to exercise dominion over other lesser creatures (cf. Gen 1:28), man is ruler and lord not only over things but especially over himself,<sup>39</sup> and in a certain sense, over the life which he has received and which he is able to transmit through procreation, carried out with love and respect for God’s plan. Man’s lordship however is not absolute, but ministerial: it is a real reflection of the unique and infinite lordship of God. Hence man must exercise it with wisdom and love, sharing in the boundless wisdom and love of God. And this comes about through obedience to God’s holy Law: a free and joyful obedience (cf. Ps 119) born of and fostered by an awareness that the precepts of the Lord are a gift of grace entrusted to man always and solely for his good, for the preservation of his personal dignity and the pursuit of his happiness.

52.4 With regard to things, but even more with regard to life, man is not the absolute master and final judge, but rather – and this is where his incomparable greatness lies – he is the “minister of God’s plan.”<sup>40</sup>

52.5 Life is entrusted to man as a treasure which must not be squandered, as a talent which must be used well. Man must render an account of it to his Master (cf. Mt 25:14-30; Lk 19:12-27).

Evangelium Vitae

“From man in regard to his fellow man I will demand an accounting for human life” (Gen 9:5): human life is sacred and inviolable

53.1 “Human life is sacred because from its beginning it involves ‘the creative action of God,’ and it remains forever in a special relationship with the Creator, who is its sole end. God alone is the Lord of life from its beginning until its end: no one can, in any circumstance, claim for himself the right to destroy directly an innocent human being.”<sup>41</sup> With these words the Instruction Donum Vitae sets forth the central content of God’s revelation on the sacredness and inviolability of human life.

53.2 Sacred Scripture in fact presents the precept “You shall not kill” as a divine commandment (Ex 20:13; Dt 5:17). As I have already emphasized, this commandment is found in the Decalogue, at the heart of the Covenant which the Lord makes with his chosen people; but it was already contained in the original covenant between God and humanity after the purifying punishment of the flood, caused by the spread of sin and violence (cf. Gen 9:5-6).

53.3 God proclaims that he is absolute Lord of the life of man, who is formed in his image and likeness (cf. Gen 1:26-28). Human life is thus given a sacred and inviolable character, which reflects the inviolability of the Creator himself. Precisely for this reason God will severely judge every violation of the commandment “You shall not kill,” the commandment which is at the basis of all life together in society. He is the “goel,” the defender of the innocent (cf. Gen 4:9-15; Is 41:14; Jer 50:34; Ps 19:14). God thus shows that he does not delight in the death of the living (cf. Wis 1:13). Only Satan can delight therein: for through his envy death entered the world (cf. Wis 2:24). He who is “a murderer from the beginning,” is also “a liar and the father of lies” (Jn 8:44). By deceiving man he leads him to projects of sin and death, making them appear as goals and fruits of life.

54.1 As explicitly formulated, the precept “You shall not kill” is strongly negative: it indicates the extreme limit which can never be exceeded. Implicitly, however, it encourages a positive attitude of absolute respect for life; it leads to the promotion of life and to progress along the way of a love which gives, receives and serves. The people of the Covenant, although slowly and with some contradictions, progressively matured in this way of thinking and thus prepared for the great proclamation of Jesus that the commandment to love one’s neighbor is like the commandment to love God: “On these two commandments depend all the Law and the Prophets” (cf. Mt 22:36-40). Saint Paul emphasizes that “the commandment . . . you shall not kill . . . and any other commandment, are summed up in this phrase: ‘You shall love your neighbor as yourself’ ” (Rom 13:9; cf. Gal 5:14). Taken up and brought to fulfillment in the New Law, the commandment “You shall not kill” stands as an indispensable condition for being able “to enter life” (cf. Mt 19:16-19). In this same perspective, the words of the Apostle John have a categorical ring: “Anyone who hates his brother is a murderer, and you know that no murderer has eternal life abiding in him” (1 Jn 3:15).

54.2 From the beginning, the living Tradition of the Church – as shown by the Didache, the most ancient non-biblical Christian writing – categorically repeated the commandment “You shall not kill”: “There are two ways, a way of life and a way of death; there is a great difference between them. . . . In accordance with the precept of the teaching: You shall not kill . . . you shall not put a child to death by abortion nor kill it once it is born. . . . The way of death is this: . . . they show no compassion for the poor, they do not suffer with the suffering, they do not acknowledge their Creator, they kill their children and by abortion cause God’s creatures to perish; they drive away the needy, oppress the suffering, they are advocates of the rich and unjust judges of the poor; they are filled with every sin. May you be able to stay ever apart, O children, from all these sins!”<sup>42</sup>

54.3 As time passed, the Church’s Tradition has always consistently taught the absolute and unchanging value of the commandment “You shall not kill.” It is a known fact that in the first centuries murder was put among the three most serious sins – along with apostasy and adultery – and required a particularly heavy and lengthy public penance before the repentant murderer could be granted forgiveness and readmission to the ecclesial community.

55.1 This should not cause surprise: to kill a human being, in whom the image of God is present, is a particularly serious sin. Only God is the master of life! Yet from the beginning, faced with the many and often tragic cases which occur in the life of individuals and society, Christian reflection has sought a fuller and deeper understanding of what God’s commandment prohibits and prescribes.<sup>43</sup> There are in fact situations in which values proposed by God’s Law seem to involve a genuine paradox. This happens for example in the case of legitimate defense, in which the right to protect one’s own life and the duty not to harm someone else’s life are difficult to reconcile in practice. Certainly, the intrinsic value of life and the duty to love oneself no less than others are the basis of a true right to self-defense. The demanding commandment of love of neighbor, set forth in the Old Testament and confirmed by Jesus, itself presupposes love of oneself as the basis of comparison: “You shall love your neighbor as yourself” (Mk 12:31). Consequently, no one can renounce the right to self-defense out of lack of love for life or for self. This can only be done in virtue of a heroic love which deepens and transfigures the love of self into a radical self-offering, according to the spirit of the Gospel Beatitudes (cf. Mt 5:38-40). The sublime example of this self-offering is the Lord Jesus himself.

55.2 Moreover, “legitimate defense can be not only a right but a grave duty for someone responsible for another’s life, the common good of the family or of the State.”<sup>44</sup> Unfortunately, it happens that the need to render the aggressor incapable of causing harm sometimes involves taking his life. In this case, the fatal outcome is attributable to the aggressor whose action brought it about, even though he may not be morally responsible because of a lack of the use of reason.<sup>45</sup>

56.1 This is the context in which to place the problem of the death penalty. On this matter there is a growing tendency, both in the Church and in civil society, to demand that it be applied in a very limited way or even that it be abolished completely. The problem must be viewed in the context of a system of penal justice ever more in line with human dignity and thus, in the end, with God’s plan for man and society. The primary purpose of the punishment which society inflicts is “to redress the disorder caused by the offense.”<sup>46</sup> Public authority must redress the violation of personal and social rights by imposing on the offender an adequate punishment for the crime, as a condition for the offender to regain the exercise of his or her freedom. In this way authority also fulfills the purpose of defending public order and ensuring people’s safety, while at the same time offering the offender an incentive and help to change his or her behavior and be rehabilitated.<sup>47</sup>

56.2 It is clear that for these purposes to be achieved, the nature and extent of the punishment must be carefully evaluated and decided upon, and ought not go to the extreme of executing the offender except in cases of absolute necessity: in other words, when it would not be possible otherwise to defend society. Today, however, as a result of steady improvements in the organization of the penal system, such cases are very rare, if not practically nonexistent.

56.3 In any event, the principle set forth in the new Catechism of the Catholic Church remains valid: “If bloodless means are sufficient to defend human lives against an aggressor and to protect public order and the safety of persons, public authority must limit itself to such means, because they better correspond to the concrete conditions of the common good and are more in conformity to the dignity of the human person.”<sup>48</sup>

57.1 If such great care must be taken to respect every life, even that of criminals and unjust aggressors, the commandment “You shall not kill” has absolute value when it refers to the innocent person. And all the more so in the case of weak and defenseless human beings, who find their ultimate defense against the arrogance and caprice of others only in the absolute binding force of God's commandment.

57.2 In effect, the absolute inviolability of innocent human life is a moral truth clearly taught by Sacred Scripture, constantly upheld in the Church's Tradition and consistently proposed by her Magisterium. This consistent teaching is the evident result of that "supernatural sense of the faith" which, inspired and sustained by the Holy Spirit, safeguards the People of God from error when "it shows universal agreement in matters of faith and morals."49

57.3 Faced with the progressive weakening in individual consciences and in society of the sense of the absolute and grave moral illicitness of the direct taking of all innocent human life, especially at its beginning and at its end, the Church's Magisterium has spoken out with increasing frequency in defense of the sacredness and inviolability of human life. The papal Magisterium, particularly insistent in this regard, has always been seconded by that of the Bishops, with numerous and comprehensive doctrinal and pastoral documents issued either by Episcopal Conferences or by individual Bishops. The Second Vatican Council also addressed the matter forcefully in a brief but incisive passage.50

57.4 Therefore, by the authority which Christ conferred upon Peter and his Successors, and in communion with the Bishops of the Catholic Church, I confirm that the direct and voluntary killing of an innocent human being is always gravely immoral. This doctrine, based upon that unwritten law which man, in the light of reason, finds in his own heart (cf. Rom 2:14-15), is reaffirmed by Sacred Scripture, transmitted by the Tradition of the Church and taught by the ordinary and universal Magisterium.51

57.5 The deliberate decision to deprive an innocent human being of his life is always morally evil and can never be licit either as an end in itself or as a means to a good end. It is in fact a grave act of disobedience to the moral law, and indeed to God himself, the author and guarantor of that law; it contradicts the fundamental virtues of justice and charity. "Nothing and no one can in any way permit the killing of an innocent human being, whether a fetus or an embryo, an infant or an adult, an old person, or one suffering from an incurable disease or a person who is dying. Furthermore, no one is permitted to ask for this act of killing, either for himself or herself or for another person entrusted to his or her care, nor can he or she consent to it, either explicitly or implicitly. Nor can any authority legitimately recommend or permit such an action."52

57.6 As far as the right to life is concerned, every innocent human being is absolutely equal to all others. This equality is the basis of all authentic social relationships which, to be truly such, can only be founded on truth and justice, recognizing and protecting every man and woman as a person and not as an object to be used. Before the moral norm which prohibits the direct taking of the life of an innocent human being “there are no privileges or exceptions for anyone. It makes no difference whether one is the master of the world or the ‘poorest of the poor’ on the face of the earth. Before the demands of morality we are all absolutely equal.”<sup>53</sup>

Evangelium Vitae

“Your eyes beheld my unformed substance” (Ps 139:16): the unspeakable crime of abortion

58.1 Among all the crimes which can be committed against life, procured abortion has characteristics making it particularly serious and deplorable. The Second Vatican Council defines abortion, together with infanticide, as an “unspeakable crime.”<sup>54</sup>

58.2 But today in many people’s consciences the perception of its gravity has become progressively obscured. The acceptance of abortion in the popular mind, in behavior and even in law itself, is a telling sign of an extremely dangerous crisis of the moral sense, which is becoming more and more incapable of distinguishing between good and evil, even when the fundamental right to life is at stake. Given such a grave situation, we need now more than ever to have the courage to look the truth in the eye and to call things by their proper name, without yielding to convenient compromises or to the temptation of self-deception. In this regard the reproach of the Prophet is extremely straightforward: “Woe to those who call evil good and good evil, who put darkness for light and light for darkness” (Is 5:20). Especially in the case of abortion there is a widespread use of ambiguous terminology, such as “interruption of pregnancy,” which tends to hide abortion’s true nature and to attenuate its seriousness in public opinion. Perhaps this linguistic phenomenon is itself a symptom of an uneasiness of conscience. But no word has the power to change the reality of things: procured abortion is the deliberate and direct killing, by whatever means it is carried out, of a human being in the initial phase of his or her existence, extending from conception to birth.

58.3 The moral gravity of procured abortion is apparent in all its truth if we recognize that we are dealing with murder and, in particular, when we consider the specific elements involved. The one eliminated is a human being at the very beginning of life. No one more absolutely innocent could be imagined. In no way could this human being ever be considered an aggressor, much less an unjust aggressor! He or she is weak, defenseless, even to the point of lacking that minimal form of defense consisting in the poignant power of a newborn baby’s cries and tears. The unborn child is totally entrusted to the protection and care of the woman carrying him or her in the womb. And yet sometimes it is precisely the mother herself who makes the decision and asks for the child to be eliminated, and who then goes about having it done.

58.4 It is true that the decision to have an abortion is often tragic and painful for the mother, insofar as the decision to rid herself of the fruit of conception is not made for purely selfish reasons or out of convenience, but out of a desire to protect certain important values such as her own health or a decent standard of living for the other members of the family. Sometimes it is feared that the child to be born would live in such conditions that it would be better if the birth did not take place. Nevertheless, these reasons and others like them, however serious and tragic, can never justify the deliberate killing of an innocent human being.

59.1 As well as the mother, there are often other people too who decide upon the death of the child in the womb. In the first place, the father of the child may be to blame, not only when he directly pressures the woman to have an abortion, but also when he indirectly encourages such a decision on her part by leaving her alone to face the problems of pregnancy:<sup>55</sup> in this way the family is thus mortally wounded and profaned in its nature as a community of love and in its vocation to be the “sanctuary of life.” Nor can one overlook the pressures which sometimes come from the wider family circle and from friends. Sometimes the woman is subjected to such strong pressure that she feels psychologically forced to have an abortion: certainly in this case moral responsibility lies particularly with those who have directly or indirectly obliged her to have an abortion. Doctors and nurses are also responsible, when they place at the service of death skills which were acquired for promoting life.

59.2 But responsibility likewise falls on the legislators who have promoted and approved abortion laws, and, to the extent that they have a say in the matter, on the administrators of the health-care centers where abortions are performed. A general and no less serious responsibility lies with those who have encouraged the spread of an attitude of sexual permissiveness and a lack of esteem for motherhood, and with those who should have ensured – but did not – effective family and social policies in support of families, especially larger families and those with particular financial and educational needs. Finally, one cannot overlook the network of complicity which reaches out to include international institutions, foundations and associations which systematically campaign for the legalization and spread of abortion in the world. In this sense abortion goes beyond the responsibility of individuals and beyond the harm done to them, and takes on a distinctly social dimension. It is a most serious wound inflicted on society and its culture by the very people who ought to be society’s promoters and defenders. As I wrote in my Letter to Families, “we are facing an immense threat to life: not only to the life of individuals but also to that of civilization itself.”<sup>56</sup> We are facing what can be called a “structure of sin” which opposes human life not yet born.

60.1 Some people try to justify abortion by claiming that the result of conception, at least up to a certain number of days, cannot yet be considered a personal human life. But in fact, “from the time that the ovum is fertilized, a life is begun which is neither that of the father nor the mother; it is rather the life of a new human being with his own growth. It would never be made human if it were not human already. This has always been clear, and . . . modern genetic science offers clear confirmation. It has demonstrated that from the first instant there is established the program of what this living being will be: a person, this individual person with his characteristic aspects already well determined. Right from fertilization the adventure of a human life begins, and each of its capacities requires time – a rather lengthy time – to find its place and to be in a position to act.”<sup>57</sup> Even if the presence of a spiritual soul cannot be ascertained by empirical data, the results themselves of scientific research on the human embryo provide “a valuable indication for discerning by the use of reason a personal presence at the moment of the first appearance of a human life: how could a human individual not be a human person?”<sup>58</sup>

60.2 Furthermore, what is at stake is so important that, from the standpoint of moral obligation, the mere probability that a human person is involved would suffice to justify an absolutely clear prohibition of any intervention aimed at killing a human embryo. Precisely for this reason, over and above all scientific debates and those philosophical affirmations to which the Magisterium has not expressly committed itself, the Church has always taught and continues to teach that the result of human procreation, from the first moment of its existence, must be guaranteed that unconditional respect which is morally due to the human being in his or her totality and unity as body and spirit: “The human being is to be respected and treated as a person from the moment of conception; and therefore from that same moment his rights as a person must be recognized, among which in the first place is the inviolable right of every innocent human being to life.”<sup>59</sup>

61.1 The texts of Sacred Scripture never address the question of deliberate abortion and so do not directly and specifically condemn it. But they show such great respect for the human being in the mother’s womb that they require as a logical consequence that God’s commandment “You shall not kill” be extended to the unborn child as well.

61.2 Human life is sacred and inviolable at every moment of existence, including the initial phase which precedes birth. All human beings, from their mothers’ womb, belong to God who searches them and knows them, who forms them and knits them together with his own hands, who gazes on them when they are tiny shapeless embryos and already sees in them the adults of tomorrow whose days are numbered and whose vocation is even now written in the “book of life” (cf. Ps 139:1, 13-16). There too, when they are still in their mothers’ womb – as many passages of the Bible bear witness<sup>60</sup> – they are the personal objects of God's loving and fatherly providence.

61.3 Christian Tradition – as the Declaration issued by the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith points out so well<sup>61</sup> – is clear and unanimous, from the beginning up to our own day, in describing abortion as a particularly grave moral disorder. From its first contacts with the Greco-Roman world, where abortion and infanticide were widely practiced, the first Christian community, by its teaching and practice, radically opposed the customs rampant in that society, as is clearly shown by the Didache mentioned earlier.<sup>62</sup> Among the Greek ecclesiastical writers, Athenagoras records that Christians consider as murderers women who have recourse to abortifacient medicines, because children, even if they are still in their mother's womb, "are already under the protection of divine Providence."<sup>63</sup> Among the Latin authors, Tertullian affirms: "It is anticipated murder to prevent someone from being born; it makes little difference whether one kills a soul already born or puts it to death at birth. He who will one day be a man is a man already."<sup>64</sup>

61.4 Throughout Christianity's two-thousand-year history, this same doctrine has been constantly taught by the Fathers of the Church and by her Pastors and Doctors. Even scientific and philosophical discussions about the precise moment of the infusion of the spiritual soul have never given rise to any hesitation about the moral condemnation of abortion.

62.1 The more recent papal Magisterium has vigorously reaffirmed this common doctrine. Pius XI in particular, in his Encyclical Casti Connubii, rejected the specious justifications of abortion.<sup>65</sup> Pius XII excluded all direct abortion, that is, every act tending directly to destroy human life in the womb, "whether such destruction is intended as an end or only as a means to an end."<sup>66</sup> John XXIII reaffirmed that human life is sacred because "from its very beginning it directly involves God's creative activity."<sup>67</sup> The Second Vatican Council, as mentioned earlier, sternly condemned abortion: "From the moment of its conception life must be guarded with the greatest care, while abortion and infanticide are unspeakable crimes."<sup>68</sup>

62.2 The Church's canonical discipline, from the earliest centuries, has inflicted penal sanctions on those guilty of abortion. This practice, with more or less severe penalties, has been confirmed in various periods of history. The 1917 Code of Canon Law punished abortion with excommunication.<sup>69</sup> The revised canonical legislation continues this tradition when it decrees that "a person who actually procures an abortion incurs automatic (latae sententiae) excommunication."<sup>70</sup> The excommunication affects all those who commit this crime with knowledge of the penalty attached, and thus includes those accomplices without whose help the crime would not have been committed.<sup>71</sup> By this reiterated sanction, the Church makes clear that abortion is a most serious and dangerous crime, thereby encouraging those who commit it to seek without delay the path of conversion. In the Church the purpose of the penalty of excommunication is to make an individual fully aware of the gravity of a certain sin and then to foster genuine conversion and repentance.

62.3 Given such unanimity in the doctrinal and disciplinary tradition of the Church, Paul VI was able to declare that this tradition is unchanged and unchangeable.<sup>72</sup> Therefore, by the authority which Christ conferred upon Peter and his Successors, in communion with the Bishops – who on various occasions have condemned abortion and who in the aforementioned consultation, albeit dispersed throughout the world, have shown unanimous agreement concerning this doctrine – I declare that direct abortion, that is, abortion willed as an end or as a means, always constitutes a grave moral disorder, since it is the deliberate killing of an innocent human being. This doctrine is based upon the natural law and upon the written word of God, is transmitted by the Church's Tradition and taught by the ordinary and universal Magisterium.<sup>73</sup>

62.4 No circumstance, no purpose, no law whatsoever can ever make licit an act which is intrinsically illicit, since it is contrary to the law of God which is written in every human heart, knowable by reason itself and proclaimed by the Church.

63.1 This evaluation of the morality of abortion is to be applied also to the recent forms of intervention on human embryos which, although carried out for purposes legitimate in themselves, inevitably involve the killing of those embryos. This is the case with experimentation on embryos, which is becoming increasingly widespread in the field of biomedical research and is legally permitted in some countries. Although “one must uphold as licit procedures carried out on the human embryo which respect the life and integrity of the embryo and do not involve disproportionate risks for it, but rather are directed to its healing, the improvement of its condition of health or its individual survival,”<sup>74</sup> it must nonetheless be stated that the use of human embryos or fetuses as an object of experimentation constitutes a crime against their dignity as human beings who have a right to the same respect owed to a child once born, just as to every person.<sup>75</sup>

63.2 This moral condemnation also regards procedures that exploit living human embryos and fetuses – sometimes specifically “produced” for this purpose by in vitro fertilization – either to be used as “biological material” or as providers of organs or tissue for transplants in the treatment of certain diseases. The killing of innocent human creatures, even if carried out to help others, constitutes an absolutely unacceptable act.

63.3 Special attention must be given to evaluating the morality of prenatal diagnostic techniques which enable the early detection of possible anomalies in the unborn child. In view of the complexity of these techniques, an accurate and systematic moral judgment is necessary. When they do not involve disproportionate risks for the child and the mother, and are meant to make possible early therapy or even to favor a serene and informed acceptance of the child not yet born, these techniques are morally licit. But since the possibilities of prenatal therapy are today still limited, it not infrequently happens that these techniques are used with a eugenic intention which accepts selective abortion in order to prevent the birth of children affected by various types of anomalies. Such an attitude is shameful and utterly reprehensible, since it presumes to measure the value of a human life only within the parameters of “normality” and physical well-being, thus opening the way to legitimizing infanticide and euthanasia as well.

63.4 And yet the courage and the serenity with which so many of our brothers and sisters suffering from serious disabilities lead their lives when they are shown acceptance and love bears eloquent witness to what gives authentic value to life, and makes it, even in difficult conditions, something precious for them and for others. The Church is close to those married couples who, with great anguish and suffering, willingly accept gravely handicapped children. She is also grateful to all those families which, through adoption, welcome children abandoned by their parents because of disabilities or illnesses.

Evangelium Vitae

“It is I who bring both death and life” (Dt 32:39): the tragedy of euthanasia

64.1 At the other end of life’s spectrum, men and women find themselves facing the mystery of death. Today, as a result of advances in medicine and in a cultural context frequently closed to the transcendent, the experience of dying is marked by new features. When the prevailing tendency is to value life only to the extent that it brings pleasure and well-being, suffering seems like an unbearable setback, something from which one must be freed at all costs. Death is considered “senseless” if it suddenly interrupts a life still open to a future of new and interesting experiences. But it becomes a “rightful liberation” once life is held to be no longer meaningful because it is filled with pain and inexorably doomed to even greater suffering.

64.2 Furthermore, when he denies or neglects his fundamental relationship to God, man thinks he is his own rule and measure, with the right to demand that society should guarantee him the ways and means of deciding what to do with his life in full and complete autonomy. It is especially people in the developed countries who act in this way: they feel encouraged to do so also by the constant progress of medicine and its ever more advanced techniques. By using highly sophisticated systems and equipment, science and medical practice today are able not only to attend to cases formerly considered untreatable and to reduce or eliminate pain, but also to sustain and prolong life even in situations of extreme frailty, to resuscitate artificially patients whose basic biological functions have undergone sudden collapse, and to use special procedures to make organs available for transplanting.

64.3 In this context the temptation grows to have recourse to euthanasia, that is, to take control of death and bring it about before its time, “gently” ending one’s own life or the life of others. In reality what might seem logical and humane, when looked at more closely, is seen to be senseless and inhumane. Here we are faced with one of the more alarming symptoms of the “culture of death,” which is advancing above all in prosperous societies, marked by an attitude of excessive preoccupation with efficiency, and which sees the growing number of elderly and disabled people as intolerable and too burdensome. These people are very often isolated by their families and by society, which are organized almost exclusively on the basis of criteria of productive efficiency, according to which a hopelessly impaired life no longer has any value.

65.1 For a correct moral judgment on euthanasia, in the first place a clear definition is required. Euthanasia in the strict sense is understood to be an action or omission which of itself and by intention causes death, with the purpose of eliminating all suffering. “Euthanasia’s terms of reference, therefore, are to be found in the intention of the will and in the methods used.”<sup>76</sup>

65.2 Euthanasia must be distinguished from the decision to forgo so-called “aggressive medical treatment,” in other words, medical procedures which no longer correspond to the real situation of the patient either because they are by now disproportionate to any expected results or because they impose an excessive burden on the patient and his family. In such situations, when death is clearly imminent and inevitable, one can in conscience “refuse forms of treatment that would only secure a precarious and burdensome prolongation of life, so long as the normal care due to the sick person in similar cases is not interrupted.”<sup>77</sup> Certainly there is a moral obligation to care for oneself and to allow oneself to be cared for, but this duty must take account of concrete circumstances. It needs to be determined whether the means of treatment available are objectively proportionate to the prospects for improvement. To forgo extraordinary or disproportionate means is not the equivalent of suicide or euthanasia; it rather expresses acceptance of the human condition in the face of death.<sup>78</sup>

65.3 In modern medicine, increased attention is being given to what are called “methods of palliative care,” which seek to make suffering more bearable in the final stages of illness and to ensure that the patient is supported and accompanied in his or her ordeal. Among the questions which arise in this context is that of the licitness of using various types of painkillers and sedatives for relieving the patient’s pain when this involves the risk of shortening life. While praise may be due to the person who voluntarily accepts suffering by forgoing treatment with painkillers in order to remain fully lucid and, if a believer, to share consciously in the Lord’s Passion, such “heroic” behavior cannot be considered the duty of everyone. Pius XII affirmed that it is licit to relieve pain by narcotics, even when the result is decreased consciousness and a shortening of life, “if no other means exist, and if, in the given circumstances, this does not prevent the carrying out of other religious and moral duties.”<sup>79</sup> In such a case, death is not willed or sought, even though for reasonable motives one runs the risk of it: there is simply a desire to ease pain effectively by using the analgesics which medicine provides. All the same, “it is not right to deprive the dying person of consciousness without a serious reason”:<sup>80</sup> as they approach death people ought to be able to satisfy their moral and family duties, and above all they ought to be able to prepare in a fully conscious way for their definitive meeting with God.

65.4 Taking into account these distinctions, in harmony with the Magisterium of my Predecessors<sup>81</sup> and in communion with the Bishops of the Catholic Church, I confirm that euthanasia is a grave violation of the law of God, since it is the deliberate and morally unacceptable killing of a human person. This doctrine is based upon the natural law and upon the written word of God, is transmitted by the Church's Tradition and taught by the ordinary and universal Magisterium.<sup>82</sup>

65.5 Depending on the circumstances, this practice involves the malice proper to suicide or murder.

66.1 Suicide is always as morally objectionable as murder. The Church's tradition has always rejected it as a gravely evil choice.<sup>83</sup> Even though a certain psychological, cultural and social conditioning may induce a person to carry out an action which so radically contradicts the innate inclination to life, thus lessening or removing subjective responsibility, suicide, when viewed objectively, is a gravely immoral act. In fact, it involves the rejection of love of self and the renunciation of the obligation of justice and charity toward one's neighbor, toward the communities to which one belongs and toward society as a whole.<sup>84</sup> In its deepest reality, suicide represents a rejection of God's absolute sovereignty over life and death as proclaimed in the prayer of the ancient sage of Israel: "You have power over life and death; you lead men down to the gates of Hades and back again" (Wis 16:13; cf. Tob 13:2).

66.2 To concur with the intention of another person to commit suicide and to help in carrying it out through so-called "assisted suicide" means to cooperate in, and at times to be the actual perpetrator of, an injustice which can never be excused even if it is requested. In a remarkably relevant passage, Saint Augustine writes that "it is never licit to kill another: even if he should wish it, indeed if he request it because, hanging between life and death, he begs for help in freeing the soul struggling against the bonds of the body and longing to be released; nor is it licit even when a sick person is no longer able to live."<sup>85</sup> Even when not motivated by a selfish refusal to be burdened with the life of someone who is suffering, euthanasia must be called a false mercy, and indeed a disturbing "perversion" of mercy. True "compassion" leads to sharing another's pain; it does not kill the person whose suffering we cannot bear. Moreover, the act of euthanasia appears all the more perverse if it is carried out by those, like relatives, who are supposed to treat a family member with patience and love, or by those, such as doctors, who by virtue of their specific profession are supposed to care for the sick person even in the most painful terminal stages.

66.3 The choice of euthanasia becomes more serious when it takes the form of a murder committed by others on a person who has in no way requested it and who has never consented to it. The height of arbitrariness and injustice is reached when certain people, such as physicians or legislators, arrogate to themselves the power to decide who ought to live and who ought to die. Once again we find ourselves before the temptation of Eden: to become like God, who "knows good and evil" (cf. Gen 3:5). God alone has the power over life and death: "It is I who bring both death and life” (Dt 32:39; cf. 2 Kings 5:7; 1 Sam 2:6). But he only exercises this power in accordance with a plan of wisdom and love. When man usurps this power, being enslaved by a foolish and selfish way of thinking, he inevitably uses it for injustice and death. Thus the life of the person who is weak is put into the hands of the one who is strong; in society the sense of justice is lost, and mutual trust, the basis of every authentic interpersonal relationship, is undermined at its root.

67.1 Quite different from this is the way of love and true mercy, which our common humanity calls for, and upon which faith in Christ the Redeemer, who died and rose again, sheds ever new light. The request which arises from the human heart in the supreme confrontation with suffering and death, especially when faced with the temptation to give up in utter desperation, is above all a request for companionship, sympathy and support in the time of trial. It is a plea for help to keep on hoping when all human hopes fail. As the Second Vatican Council reminds us: “It is in the face of death that the riddle of human existence becomes most acute” and yet “man rightly follows the intuition of his heart when he abhors and repudiates the absolute ruin and total disappearance of his own person. Man rebels against death because he bears in himself an eternal seed which cannot be reduced to mere matter.”<sup>86</sup>

67.2 This natural aversion to death and this incipient hope of immortality are illumined and brought to fulfillment by Christian faith, which both promises and offers a share in the victory of the risen Christ: it is the victory of the one who by his redemptive death has set man free from death, “the wages of sin” (Rom 6:23), and has given him the Spirit, the pledge of resurrection and of life (cf. Rom 8:11). The certainty of future immortality and hope in the promised resurrection cast new light on the mystery of suffering and death, and fill the believer with an extraordinary capacity to trust fully in the plan of God.

67.3 The Apostle Paul expressed this newness in terms of belonging completely to the Lord who embraces every human condition: “None of us lives to himself, and none of us dies to himself. If we live, we live to the Lord, and if we die, we die to the Lord; so then, whether we live or whether we die, we are the Lord’s” (Rom 14:7-8). Dying to the Lord means experiencing one’s death as the supreme act of obedience to the Father (cf. Phil 2:8), being ready to meet death at the “hour” willed and chosen by him (cf. Jn 13:1), which can only mean when one’s earthly pilgrimage is completed. Living to the Lord also means recognizing that suffering, while still an evil and a trial in itself, can always become a source of good. It becomes such if it is experienced for love and with love through sharing, by God’s gracious gift and one’s own personal and free choice, in the suffering of Christ crucified. In this way the person who lives his suffering in the Lord grows more fully conformed to him (cf. Phil 3:10; 1 Pet 2:21) and more closely associated with his redemptive work on behalf of the Church and humanity.<sup>87</sup> This was the experience of Saint Paul, which every person who suffers is called to relive: “I rejoice in my sufferings for your sake, and in my flesh I complete what is lacking in Christ’s afflictions for the sake of his Body, that is, the Church” (Col 1:24).

Evangelium Vitae

“We must obey God rather than men” (Acts 5:29): civil law and the moral law

68.1 One of the specific characteristics of present-day attacks on human life – as has already been said several times – consists in the trend to demand a legal justification for them, as if they were rights which the State, at least under certain conditions, must acknowledge as belonging to citizens. Consequently, there is a tendency to claim that it should be possible to exercise these rights with the safe and free assistance of doctors and medical personnel.

68.2 It is often claimed that the life of an unborn child or a seriously disabled person is only a relative good: according to a proportionalist approach or one of sheer calculation, this good should be compared with and balanced against other goods. It is even maintained that only someone present and personally involved in a concrete situation can correctly judge the goods at stake: consequently, only that person would be able to decide on the morality of his choice. The State, therefore, in the interest of civil coexistence and social harmony, should respect this choice, even to the point of permitting abortion and euthanasia.

68.3 At other times, it is claimed that civil law cannot demand that all citizens should live according to moral standards higher than what all citizens themselves acknowledge and share. Hence the law should always express the opinion and will of the majority of citizens and recognize that they have, at least in certain extreme cases, the right even to abortion and euthanasia. Moreover the prohibition and the punishment of abortion and euthanasia in these cases would inevitably lead – so it is said – to an increase of illegal practices: and these would not be subject to necessary control by society and would be carried out in a medically unsafe way. The question is also raised whether supporting a law which in practice cannot be enforced would not ultimately undermine the authority of all laws.

68.4 Finally, the more radical views go so far as to maintain that in a modern and pluralistic society people should be allowed complete freedom to dispose of their own lives as well as of the lives of the unborn: it is asserted that it is not the task of the law to choose between different moral opinions, and still less can the law claim to impose one particular opinion to the detriment of others.

69.1 In any case, in the democratic culture of our time it is commonly held that the legal system of any society should limit itself to taking account of and accepting the convictions of the majority. It should therefore be based solely upon what the majority itself considers moral and actually practices. Furthermore, if it is believed that an objective truth shared by all is de facto unattainable, then respect for the freedom of the citizens – who in a democratic system are considered the true rulers – would require that on the legislative level the autonomy of individual consciences be acknowledged. Consequently, when establishing those norms which are absolutely necessary for social coexistence, the only determining factor should be the will of the majority, whatever this may be. Hence every politician, in his or her activity, should clearly separate the realm of private conscience from that of public conduct.

69.2 As a result we have what appear to be two diametrically opposed tendencies. On the one hand, individuals claim for themselves in the moral sphere the most complete freedom of choice and demand that the State should not adopt or impose any ethical position but limit itself to guaranteeing maximum space for the freedom of each individual, with the sole limitation of not infringing on the freedom and rights of any other citizen. On the other hand, it is held that, in the exercise of public and professional duties, respect for other people's freedom of choice requires that each one should set aside his or her own convictions in order to satisfy every demand of the citizens which is recognized and guaranteed by law; in carrying out one's duties, the only moral criterion should be what is laid down by the law itself. Individual responsibility is thus turned over to the civil law, with a renouncing of personal conscience, at least in the public sphere.

70.1 At the basis of all these tendencies lies the ethical relativism which characterizes much of present-day culture. There are those who consider such relativism an essential condition of democracy, inasmuch as it alone is held to guarantee tolerance, mutual respect between people and acceptance of the decisions of the majority, whereas moral norms considered to be objective and binding are held to lead to authoritarianism and intolerance.

70.2 But it is precisely the issue of respect for life which shows what misunderstandings and contradictions, accompanied by terrible practical consequences, are concealed in this position.

70.3 It is true that history has known cases where crimes have been committed in the name of "truth." But equally grave crimes and radical denials of freedom have also been committed and are still being committed in the name of "ethical relativism." When a parliamentary or social majority decrees that it is legal, at least under certain conditions, to kill unborn human life, is it not really making a "tyrannical" decision with regard to the weakest and most defenseless of human beings? Everyone's conscience rightly rejects those crimes against humanity of which our century has had such sad experience. But would these crimes cease to be crimes if, instead of being committed by unscrupulous tyrants, they were legitimated by popular consensus?

70.4 Democracy cannot be idolized to the point of making it a substitute for morality or a panacea for immorality. Fundamentally, democracy is a “system” and as such is a means and not an end. Its “moral” value is not automatic, but depends on conformity to the moral law to which it, like every other form of human behavior, must be subject: in other words, its morality depends on the morality of the ends which it pursues and of the means which it employs. If today we see an almost universal consensus with regard to the value of democracy, this is to be considered a positive “sign of the times,” as the Church’s Magisterium has frequently noted.<sup>88</sup> But the value of democracy stands or falls with the values which it embodies and promotes. Of course, values such as the dignity of every human person, respect for inviolable and inalienable human rights, and the adoption of the “common good” as the end and criterion regulating political life are certainly fundamental and not to be ignored.

70.5 The basis of these values cannot be provisional and changeable “majority” opinions, but only the acknowledgment of an objective moral law which, as the “natural law” written in the human heart, is the obligatory point of reference for civil law itself. If, as a result of a tragic obscuring of the collective conscience, an attitude of skepticism were to succeed in bringing into question even the fundamental principles of the moral law, the democratic system itself would be shaken in its foundations and would be reduced to a mere mechanism for regulating different and opposing interests on a purely empirical basis.<sup>89</sup>

70.6 Some might think that even this function, in the absence of anything better, should be valued for the sake of peace in society. While one acknowledges some element of truth in this point of view, it is easy to see that without an objective moral grounding not even democracy is capable of ensuring a stable peace, especially since peace which is not built upon the values of the dignity of every individual and of solidarity between all people frequently proves to be illusory. Even in participatory systems of government, the regulation of interests often occurs to the advantage of the most powerful, since they are the ones most capable of maneuvering not only the levers of power but also of shaping the formation of consensus. In such a situation, democracy easily becomes an empty word.

71.1 It is therefore urgently necessary, for the future of society and the development of a sound democracy, to rediscover those essential and innate human and moral values which flow from the very truth of the human being and express and safeguard the dignity of the person: values which no individual, no majority and no State can ever create, modify or destroy, but must only acknowledge, respect and promote.

71.2 Consequently, there is a need to recover the basic elements of a vision of the relationship between civil law and moral law, which are put forward by the Church, but which are also part of the patrimony of the great juridical traditions of humanity.

71.3 Certainly the purpose of civil law is different and more limited in scope than that of the moral law. But “in no sphere of life can the civil law take the place of conscience or dictate norms concerning things which are outside its competence,”<sup>90</sup> which is that of ensuring the common good of people through the recognition and defense of their fundamental rights, and the promotion of peace and of public morality.<sup>91</sup> The real purpose of civil law is to guarantee an ordered social coexistence in true justice, so that all may “lead a quiet and peaceable life, godly and respectful in every way” (1 Tim 2:2). Precisely for this reason, civil law must ensure that all members of society enjoy respect for certain fundamental rights which innately belong to the person, rights which every positive law must recognize and guarantee. First and fundamental among these is the inviolable right to life of every innocent human being. While public authority can sometimes choose not to put a stop to something which – were it prohibited – would cause more serious harm,<sup>92</sup> it can never presume to legitimize as a right of individuals – even if they are the majority of the members of society – an offense against other persons caused by the disregard of so fundamental a right as the right to life. The legal toleration of abortion or of euthanasia can in no way claim to be based on respect for the conscience of others, precisely because society has the right and the duty to protect itself against the abuses which can occur in the name of conscience and under the pretext of freedom.<sup>93</sup>

71.4 In the Encyclical Pacem in Terris, John XXIII pointed out that “it is generally accepted today that the common good is best safeguarded when personal rights and duties are guaranteed. The chief concern of civil authorities must therefore be to ensure that these rights are recognized, respected, coordinated, defended and promoted, and that each individual is enabled to perform his duties more easily. For ‘to safeguard the inviolable rights of the human person and to facilitate the performance of his duties is the principal duty of every public authority.’ Thus any government which refused to recognize human rights or acted in violation of them would not only fail in its duty; its decrees would be wholly lacking in binding force.”<sup>94</sup>

72.1 The doctrine on the necessary conformity of civil law with the moral law is in continuity with the whole tradition of the Church. This is clear once more from John XXIII’s Encyclical: “Authority is a postulate of the moral order and derives from God. Consequently, laws and decrees enacted in contravention of the moral order, and hence of the divine will, can have no binding force in conscience. . . ; indeed, the passing of such laws undermines the very nature of authority and results in shameful abuse.”<sup>95</sup> This is the clear teaching of Saint

Thomas Aquinas, who writes that “human law is law inasmuch as it is in conformity with right reason and thus derives from the eternal law. But when a law is contrary to reason, it is called an unjust law; but in this case it ceases to be a law and becomes instead an act of violence.”<sup>96</sup> And again: “Every law made by man can be called a law insofar as it derives from the natural law. But if it is somehow opposed to the natural law, then it is not really a law but rather a corruption of the law.”<sup>97</sup>

72.2 Now the first and most immediate application of this teaching concerns a human law which disregards the fundamental right and source of all other rights which is the right to life, a right belonging to every individual. Consequently, laws which legitimize the direct killing of innocent human beings through abortion or euthanasia are in complete opposition to the inviolable right to life proper to every individual; they thus deny the equality of everyone before the law. It might be objected that such is not the case in euthanasia, when it is requested with full awareness by the person involved. But any State which made such a request legitimate and authorized it to be carried out would be legalizing a case of suicide-murder, contrary to the fundamental principles of absolute respect for life and of the protection of every innocent life. In this way the State contributes to lessening respect for life and opens the door to ways of acting which are destructive of trust in relations between people. Laws which authorize and promote abortion and euthanasia are therefore radically opposed not only to the good of the individual but also to the common good; as such they are completely lacking in authentic juridical validity. Disregard for the right to life, precisely because it leads to the killing of the person whom society exists to serve, is what most directly conflicts with the possibility of achieving the common good. Consequently, a civil law authorizing abortion or euthanasia ceases by that very fact to be a true, morally binding civil law.

73.1 Abortion and euthanasia are thus crimes which no human law can claim to legitimize. There is no obligation in conscience to obey such laws; instead there is a grave and clear obligation to oppose them by conscientious objection. From the very beginnings of the Church, the apostolic preaching reminded Christians of their duty to obey legitimately constituted public authorities (cf. Rom 13:1-7; 1 Pet 2:13-14), but at the same time it firmly warned that “we must obey God rather than men” (Acts 5:29). In the Old Testament, precisely in regard to threats against life, we find a significant example of resistance to the unjust command of those in authority. After Pharaoh ordered the killing of all newborn males, the Hebrew midwives refused. “They did not do as the king of Egypt commanded them, but let the male children live” (Ex 1:17). But the ultimate reason for their action should be noted: “the midwives feared God” (ibid.). It is precisely from obedience to God – to whom alone is due that fear which is acknowledgment of his absolute sovereignty – that the strength and the courage to resist unjust human laws are born. It is the strength and the courage of those prepared even to be imprisoned or put to the sword, in the certainty that this is what makes for “the endurance and faith of the saints” (Rev 13:10).

73.2 In the case of an intrinsically unjust law, such as a law permitting abortion or euthanasia, it is therefore never licit to obey it, or to “take part in a propaganda campaign in favor of such a law or vote for it.”<sup>98</sup>

73.3 A particular problem of conscience can arise in cases where a legislative vote would be decisive for the passage of a more restrictive law, aimed at limiting the number of authorized abortions, in place of a more permissive law already passed or ready to be voted on. Such cases are not infrequent. It is a fact that while in some parts of the world there continue to be campaigns to introduce laws favoring abortion, often supported by powerful international organizations, in other nations – particularly those which have already experienced the bitter fruits of such permissive legislation – there are growing signs of a rethinking in this matter. In a case like the one just mentioned, when it is not possible to overturn or completely abrogate a pro-abortion law, an elected official, whose absolute personal opposition to procured abortion was well known, could licitly support proposals aimed at limiting the harm done by such a law and at lessening its negative consequences at the level of general opinion and public morality. This does not in fact represent an illicit cooperation with an unjust law, but rather a legitimate and proper attempt to limit its evil aspects.

74.1 The passing of unjust laws often raises difficult problems of conscience for morally upright people with regard to the issue of cooperation, since they have a right to demand not to be forced to take part in morally evil actions. Sometimes the choices which have to be made are difficult; they may require the sacrifice of prestigious professional positions or the relinquishing of reasonable hopes of career advancement. In other cases, it can happen that carrying out certain actions, which are provided for by legislation that overall is unjust but which in themselves are indifferent or even positive, can serve to protect human lives under threat. There may be reason to fear, however, that willingness to carry out such actions will not only cause scandal and weaken the necessary opposition to attacks on life, but will gradually lead to further capitulation to a mentality of permissiveness.

74.2 In order to shed light on this difficult question, it is necessary to recall the general principles concerning cooperation in evil actions. Christians, like all people of good will, are called upon under grave obligation of conscience not to cooperate formally in practices which, even if permitted by civil legislation, are contrary to God’s law. Indeed, from the moral standpoint, it is never licit to cooperate formally in evil. Such cooperation occurs when an action, either by its very nature or by the form it takes in a concrete situation, can be defined as a direct participation in an act against innocent human life or a sharing in the immoral intention of the person committing it. This cooperation can never be justified either by invoking respect for the freedom of others or by appealing to the fact that civil law permits it or requires it. Each individual in fact has moral responsibility for the acts which he personally performs; no one can be exempted from this responsibility, and on the basis of it everyone will be judged by God himself (cf. Rom 2:6, 14:12).

74.3 To refuse to take part in committing an injustice is not only a moral duty; it is also a basic human right. Were this not so, the human person would be forced to perform an action intrinsically incompatible with human dignity, and in this way human freedom itself, the authentic meaning and purpose of which are found in its orientation to the true and the good, would be radically compromised. What is at stake therefore is an essential right which, precisely as such, should be acknowledged and protected by civil law. In this sense, the opportunity to refuse to take part in the phases of consultation, preparation and execution of these acts against life should be guaranteed to physicians, health-care personnel and directors of hospitals, clinics and convalescent facilities. Those who have recourse to conscientious objection must be protected not only from legal penalties, but also from any negative effects on the legal, disciplinary, financial and professional plane.

Evangelium Vitae

“You shall love your neighbor as yourself” (Lk 10:27): “promote” life

75.1 God’s commandments teach us the way of life. The negative moral precepts, which declare that the choice of certain actions is morally unacceptable, have an absolute value for human freedom: they are valid always and everywhere, without exception. They make it clear that the choice of certain ways of acting is radically incompatible with the love of God and with the dignity of the person created in his image. Such choices cannot be redeemed by the goodness of any intention or of any consequence; they are irrevocably opposed to the bond between persons; they contradict the fundamental decision to direct one’s life to God.<sup>99</sup>

75.2 In this sense, the negative moral precepts have an extremely important positive function. The “no” which they unconditionally require makes clear the absolute limit beneath which free individuals cannot lower themselves. At the same time they indicate the minimum which they must respect and from which they must start out in order to say “yes” over and over again, a “yes” which will gradually embrace the entire horizon of the good (cf. Mt 5:48). The commandments, in particular the negative moral precepts, are the beginning and the first necessary stage of the journey toward freedom. As Saint Augustine writes, “The beginning of freedom is to be free from crimes . . . like murder, adultery, fornication, theft, fraud, sacrilege and so forth. Only when one stops committing these crimes (and no Christian should commit them), one begins to lift up one’s head toward freedom. But this is only the beginning of freedom, not perfect freedom.”<sup>100</sup>

76.1 The commandment “You shall not kill” thus establishes the point of departure for the start of true freedom. It leads us to promote life actively, and to develop particular ways of thinking and acting which serve life. In this way we exercise our responsibility toward the persons entrusted to us and we show, in deeds and in truth, our gratitude to God for the great gift of life (cf. Ps 139:13-14).

76.2 The Creator has entrusted man’s life to his responsible concern, not to make arbitrary use of it, but to preserve it with wisdom and to care for it with loving fidelity. The God of the Covenant has entrusted the life of every individual to his or her fellow human beings, brothers and sisters, according to the law of reciprocity in giving and receiving, of self-giving and of the acceptance of others. In the fullness of time, by taking flesh and giving his life for us, the Son of God showed what heights and depths this law of reciprocity can reach. With the gift of his Spirit, Christ gives new content and meaning to the law of reciprocity, to our being entrusted to one another. The Spirit who builds up communion in love creates between us a new fraternity and solidarity, a true reflection of the mystery of mutual self-giving and receiving proper to the Most Holy Trinity. The Spirit becomes the new law which gives strength to believers and awakens in them a responsibility for sharing the gift of self and for accepting others, as a sharing in the boundless love of Jesus Christ himself.

77.1 This new law also gives spirit and shape to the commandment “You shall not kill.” For the Christian it involves an absolute imperative to respect, love and promote the life of every brother and sister, in accordance with the requirements of God’s bountiful love in Jesus Christ. “He laid down his life for us; and we ought to lay down our lives for the brethren” (1 Jn 3:16).

77.2 The commandment “You shall not kill,” even in its more positive aspects of respecting, loving and promoting human life, is binding on every individual human being. It resounds in the moral conscience of everyone as an irrepressible echo of the original covenant of God the Creator with mankind. It can be recognized by everyone through the light of reason, and it can be observed thanks to the mysterious working of the Spirit who, blowing where he wills (cf. Jn 3:8), comes to and involves every person living in this world.

77.3 It is therefore a service of love which we are all committed to ensure to our neighbor, that his or her life may be always defended and promoted, especially when it is weak or threatened. It is not only a personal but a social concern which we must all foster: a concern to make unconditional respect for human life the foundation of a renewed society.

77.4 We are asked to love and honor the life of every man and woman and to work with perseverance and courage so that our time, marked by all too many signs of death, may at last witness the establishment of a new culture of life, the fruit of the culture of truth and of love.

Evangelium Vitae

“You are God’s own people, that you may declare the wonderful deeds of him who called you out of darkness into his marvelous light” (1 Pet 2:9): a people of life and for life

78.1 The Church has received the Gospel as a proclamation and a source of joy and salvation. She has received it as a gift from Jesus, sent by the Father “to preach good news to the poor” (Lk 4:18). She has received it through the Apostles, sent by Christ to the whole world (cf. Mk 16:15; Mt 28:19-20). Born from this evangelizing activity, the Church hears every day the echo of Saint Paul’s words of warning: “Woe to me if I do not preach the Gospel!” (1 Cor 9:16). As Paul VI wrote, “evangelization is the grace and vocation proper to the Church, her deepest identity. She exists in order to evangelize.”<sup>101</sup>

78.2 Evangelization is an all-embracing progressive activity through which the Church participates in the prophetic, priestly and royal mission of the Lord Jesus. It is therefore inextricably linked to preaching, celebration and the service of charity. Evangelization is a profoundly ecclesial act, which calls all the various workers of the Gospel to action, according to their individual charisms and ministry.

78.3 This is also the case with regard to the proclamation of the Gospel of life, an integral part of that Gospel which is Jesus Christ himself. We are at the service of this Gospel, sustained by the awareness that we have received it as a gift and are sent to preach it to all humanity, “to the end of the earth” (Acts 1:8). With humility and gratitude we know that we are the people of life and for life, and this is how we present ourselves to everyone.

79.1 We are the people of life because God, in his unconditional love, has given us the Gospel of life and by this same Gospel we have been transformed and saved. We have been ransomed by the “Author of life” (Acts 3:15) at the price of his precious blood (cf. 1 Cor 6:20, 7:23; 1 Pet 1:19). Through the waters of Baptism we have been made a part of him (cf. Rom 6:4-5; Col 2:12), as branches which draw nourishment and fruitfulness from the one tree (cf. Jn 15:5). Interiorly renewed by the grace of the Spirit, “who is the Lord and giver of life,” we have become a people for life and we are called to act accordingly.

79.2 We have been sent. For us, being at the service of life is not a boast but rather a duty born of our awareness of being “God’s own people, that we may declare the wonderful deeds of him who called us out of darkness into his marvelous light” (cf. 1 Pet 2:9). On our journey we are guided and sustained by the law of love: a love which has as its source and model the Son of God made man, who “by dying gave life to the world.”<sup>102</sup>

79.3 We have been sent as a people. Everyone has an obligation to be at the service of life. This is a properly “ecclesial” responsibility, which requires concerted and generous action by all the members and by all sectors of the Christian community. This community commitment does not however eliminate or lessen the responsibility of each individual, called by the Lord to “become the neighbor” of everyone: “Go and do likewise” (Lk 10:37).

79.4 Together we all sense our duty to preach the Gospel of life, to celebrate it in the liturgy and in our whole existence, and to serve it with the various programs and structures which support and promote life.

Evangelium Vitae

“That which we have seen and heard we proclaim also to you” (1 Jn 1:3): proclaiming the Gospel of life

80.1 “That which was from the beginning, which we have heard, which we have seen with our eyes, which we have looked upon and touched with our hands, concerning the Word of life. . . . We proclaim also to you, so that you may have fellowship with us” (1 Jn 1:1, 3). Jesus is the only Gospel: we have nothing further to say or any other witness to bear.

80.2 To proclaim Jesus is itself to proclaim life. For Jesus is “the Word of life” (1 Jn 1:1). In him “life was made manifest” (1 Jn 1:2); he himself is “the eternal life which was with the Father and was made manifest to us” (1 Jn 1:2). By the gift of the Spirit, this same life has been bestowed on us. It is in being destined to life in its fullness, to “eternal life,” that every person’s earthly life acquires its full meaning.

80.3 Enlightened by this Gospel of life, we feel a need to proclaim it and to bear witness to it in all its marvelous newness. Since it is one with Jesus himself, who makes all things new<sup>103</sup> and conquers the “oldness” which comes from sin and leads to death,<sup>104</sup> this Gospel exceeds every human expectation and reveals the sublime heights to which the dignity of the human person is raised through grace. This is how Saint Gregory of Nyssa understands it: “Man, as a being, is of no account; he is dust, grass, vanity. But once he is adopted by the God of the universe as a son, he becomes part of the family of that Being, whose excellence and greatness no one can see, hear or understand. What words, thoughts or flight of the spirit can praise the superabundance of this grace? Man surpasses his nature: mortal, he becomes immortal; perishable, he becomes imperishable; fleeting, he becomes eternal; human, he becomes divine.”<sup>105</sup>

80.4 Gratitude and joy at the incomparable dignity of man impel us to share this message with everyone: “That which we have seen and heard we proclaim also to you, so that you may have fellowship with us” (1 Jn 1:3). We need to bring the Gospel of life to the heart of every man and woman and to make it penetrate every part of society.

81.1 This involves above all proclaiming the core of this Gospel. It is the proclamation of a living God who is close to us, who calls us to profound communion with himself and awakens in us the certain hope of eternal life. It is the affirmation of the inseparable connection between the person, his life and his bodiliness. It is the presentation of human life as a life of relationship, a gift of God, the fruit and sign of his love. It is the proclamation that Jesus has a unique relationship with every person, which enables us to see in every human face the face of Christ. It is the call for a “sincere gift of self” as the fullest way to realize our personal freedom.

81.2 It also involves making clear all the consequences of this Gospel. These can be summed up as follows: human life, as a gift of God, is sacred and inviolable. For this reason procured abortion and euthanasia are absolutely unacceptable. Not only must human life not be taken, but it must be protected with loving concern. The meaning of life is found in giving and receiving love, and in this light human sexuality and procreation reach their true and full significance. Love also gives meaning to suffering and death; despite the mystery which surrounds them, they can become saving events. Respect for life requires that science and technology should always be at the service of man and his integral development. Society as a whole must respect, defend and promote the dignity of every human person, at every moment and in every condition of that person’s life.

82.1 To be truly a people at the service of life we must propose these truths constantly and courageously from the very first proclamation of the Gospel, and thereafter in catechesis, in the various forms of preaching, in personal dialogue and in all educational activity. Teachers, catechists and theologians have the task of emphasizing the anthropological reasons upon which respect for every human life is based. In this way, by making the newness of the Gospel of life shine forth, we can also help everyone discover in the light of reason and of personal experience how the Christian message fully reveals what man is and the meaning of his being and existence. We shall find important points of contact and dialogue also with non-believers, in our common commitment to the establishment of a new culture of life.

82.2 Faced with so many opposing points of view and a widespread rejection of sound doctrine concerning human life, we can feel that Paul’s entreaty to Timothy is also addressed to us: “Preach the word, be urgent in season and out of season, convince, rebuke and exhort, be unfailing in patience and in teaching” (2 Tim 4:2). This exhortation should resound with special force in the hearts of those members of the Church who directly share in different ways in her mission as “teacher” of the truth. May it resound above all for us who are Bishops: we are the first ones called to be untiring preachers of the Gospel of life. We are also entrusted with the task of ensuring that the doctrine which is once again being set forth in this Encyclical is faithfully handed on in its integrity. We must use appropriate means to defend the faithful from all teaching which is contrary to it. We need to make sure that in theological faculties, seminaries and Catholic institutions sound doctrine is taught, explained and more fully investigated. 106 May Paul’s exhortation strike a chord in all theologians, pastors, teachers and in all those responsible for catechesis and the formation of consciences. Aware of their specific role, may they never be so grievously irresponsible as to betray the truth and their own mission by proposing personal ideas contrary to the Gospel of life as faithfully presented and interpreted by the Magisterium.

82.3 In the proclamation of this Gospel we must not fear hostility or unpopularity, and we must refuse any compromise or ambiguity which might conform us to the world's way of thinking (cf. Rom 12:2). We must be in the world but not of the world (cf. Jn 15:19, 17:16), drawing our strength from Christ, who by his death and Resurrection has overcome the world (cf. Jn 16:33).

Evangelium Vitae

“I give you thanks that I am fearfully, wonderfully made” (Ps 139:14): celebrating the Gospel of life

83.1 Because we have been sent into the world as a “people for life,” our proclamation must also become a genuine celebration of the Gospel of life. This celebration, with the evocative power of its gestures, symbols and rites, should become a precious and significant setting in which the beauty and grandeur of this Gospel is handed on.

83.2 For this to happen, we need first of all to foster in ourselves and in others a contemplative outlook.<sup>107</sup> Such an outlook arises from faith in the God of life, who has created every individual as a “wonder” (cf. Ps 139:14). It is the outlook of those who see life in its deeper meaning, who grasp its utter gratuitousness, its beauty and its invitation to freedom and responsibility. It is the outlook of those who do not presume to take possession of reality, but instead accept it as a gift, discovering in all things the reflection of the Creator and seeing in every person his living image (cf. Gen 1:27; Ps 8:5). This outlook does not give in to discouragement when confronted by those who are sick, suffering, outcast or at death’s door. Instead, in all these situations it feels challenged to find meaning, and precisely in these circumstances it is open to perceiving in the face of every person a call to encounter, dialogue and solidarity.

83.3 It is time for all of us to adopt this outlook and with deep religious awe to rediscover the ability to revere and honor every person, as Paul VI invited us to do in one of his first Christmas messages.<sup>108</sup> Inspired by this contemplative outlook, the new people of the redeemed cannot but respond with songs of joy, praise and thanksgiving for the priceless gift of life, for the mystery of every individual’s call to share through Christ in the life of grace and in an existence of unending communion with God our Creator and Father.

84.1 To celebrate the Gospel of life means to celebrate the God of life, the God who gives life: “We must celebrate eternal Life, from which every other life proceeds. From this, in proportion to its capacities, every being which in any way participates in life, receives life. This divine Life, which is above every other life, gives and preserves life. Every life and every living movement proceed from this Life, which transcends all life and every principle of life. It is to this that souls owe their incorruptibility; and because of this all animals and plants live, which receive only the faintest glimmer of life. To men, beings made of spirit and matter, Life grants life. Even if we should abandon Life, because of its overflowing love for man, it converts us and calls us back to itself. Not only this: it promises to bring us, soul and body, to perfect life, to immortality. It is too little to say that this Life is alive: it is the principle of life, the cause and sole wellspring of life. Every living thing must contemplate it and give it praise: it is Life which overflows with life.”<sup>109</sup>

84.2 Like the Psalmist, we too, in our daily prayer as individuals and as a community praise and bless God our Father, who knitted us together in our mother’s womb, and saw and loved us while we were still without form (cf. Ps 139:13, 15-16). We exclaim with overwhelming joy: “I give you thanks that I am fearfully, wonderfully made; wonderful are your works. You know me through and through” (Ps 139:14). Indeed, “despite its hardships, its hidden mysteries, its suffering and its inevitable frailty, this mortal life is a most beautiful thing, a marvel ever new and moving, an event worthy of being exalted in joy and glory.”<sup>110</sup> Moreover, man and his life appear to us not only as one of the greatest marvels of creation: for God has granted to man a dignity which is near to divine (Ps 8:5-6). In every child which is born and in every person who lives or dies we see the image of God’s glory. We celebrate this glory in every human being, a sign of the living God, an icon of Jesus Christ.

84.3 We are called to express wonder and gratitude for the gift of life and to welcome, savor and share the Gospel of life not only in our personal and community prayer, but above all in the celebrations of the liturgical year. Particularly important in this regard are the sacraments, the efficacious signs of the presence and saving action of the Lord Jesus in Christian life. The sacraments make us sharers in divine life and provide the spiritual strength necessary to experience life, suffering and death in their fullest meaning. Thanks to a genuine rediscovery and a better appreciation of the significance of these rites, our liturgical celebrations, especially celebrations of the sacraments, will be ever more capable of expressing the full truth about birth, life, suffering and death, and will help us to live these moments as a participation in the Paschal Mystery of the crucified and risen Christ.

85.1 In celebrating the Gospel of life we also need to appreciate and make good use of the wealth of gestures and symbols present in the traditions and customs of different cultures and peoples. There are special times and ways in which the peoples of different nations and cultures express joy for a newborn life, respect for and protection of individual human lives, care for the suffering or needy, closeness to the elderly and the dying, participation in the sorrow of those who mourn, and hope and desire for immortality.

85.2 In view of this and following the suggestion made by the Cardinals in the Consistory of 1991, I propose that a Day for Life be celebrated each year in every country, as already established by some Episcopal Conferences. The celebration of this Day should be planned and carried out with the active participation of all sectors of the local Church. Its primary purpose should be to foster in individual consciences, in families, in the Church and in civil society a recognition of the meaning and value of human life at every stage and in every condition. Particular attention should be drawn to the seriousness of abortion and euthanasia, without neglecting other aspects of life which from time to time deserve to be given careful consideration as occasion and circumstances demand.

86.1 As part of the spiritual worship acceptable to God (cf. Rom 12:1), the Gospel of life is to be celebrated above all in daily living, which should be filled with self-giving love for others. In this way, our lives will become a genuine and responsible acceptance of the gift of life and a heartfelt song of praise and gratitude to God, who has given us this gift. This is already happening in the many different acts of selfless generosity, often humble and hidden, carried out by men and women, children and adults, the young and the old, the healthy and the sick.

86.2 It is in this context, so humanly rich and filled with love, that heroic actions too are born. These are the most solemn celebration of the Gospel of life, for they proclaim it by the total gift of self. They are the radiant manifestation of the highest degree of love, which is to give one's life for the person loved (cf. Jn 15:13). They are a sharing in the mystery of the Cross, in which Jesus reveals the value of every person and how life attains its fullness in the sincere gift of self. Over and above such outstanding moments, there is an everyday heroism made up of gestures of sharing, big or small, which build up an authentic culture of life. A particularly praiseworthy example of such gestures is the donation of organs, performed in an ethically acceptable manner, with a view to offering a chance of health and even of life itself to the sick who sometimes have no other hope.

86.3 Part of this daily heroism is also the silent but effective and eloquent witness of all those "brave mothers who devote themselves to their own family without reserve, who suffer in giving birth to their children and who are ready to make any effort, to face any sacrifice, in order to pass on to them the best of themselves."<sup>111</sup> In living out their mission "these heroic women do not always find support in the world around them. On the contrary, the cultural models frequently promoted and broadcast by the media do not encourage motherhood. In the name of progress and modernity the values of fidelity, chastity, sacrifice, to which a host of Christian wives and mothers have borne and continue to bear outstanding witness, are presented as obsolete. . . . We thank you, heroic mothers, for your invincible love! We thank you for your intrepid trust in God and in his love. We thank you for the sacrifice of your life. . . . In the Paschal Mystery, Christ restores to you the gift you gave him. Indeed, he has the power to give you back the life you gave him as an offering."<sup>112</sup>

Evangelium Vitae

“What does it profit, my brethren, if a man says he has faith but has not works?” (Jas 2:14): serving the Gospel of life

87.1 By virtue of our sharing in Christ’s royal mission, our support and promotion of human life must be accomplished through the service of charity, which finds expression in personal witness, various forms of volunteer work, social activity and political commitment. This is a particularly pressing need at the present time, when the “culture of death” so forcefully opposes the “culture of life” and often seems to have the upper hand. But even before that it is a need which springs from “faith working through love” (Gal 5:6). As the Letter of James admonishes us: “What does it profit, my brethren, if a man says he has faith but has not works? Can his faith save him? If a brother or sister is ill-clad and in lack of daily food, and one of you says to them, ‘Go in peace, be warmed and filled,’ without giving them the things needed for the body, what does it profit? So faith by itself, if it has no works, is dead” (2:14-17).

87.2 In our service of charity, we must be inspired and distinguished by a specific attitude: we must care for the other as a person for whom God has made us responsible. As disciples of Jesus, we are called to become neighbors to everyone (cf. Lk 10:29-37), and to show special favor to those who are poorest, most alone and most in need. In helping the hungry, the thirsty, the foreigner, the naked, the sick, the imprisoned – as well as the child in the womb and the old person who is suffering or near death – we have the opportunity to serve Jesus. He himself said: “As you did it to one of the least of these my brethren, you did it to me” (Mt 25:40). Hence we cannot but feel called to account and judged by the ever relevant words of Saint John Chrysostom: “Do you wish to honor the body of Christ? Do not neglect it when you find it naked. Do not do it homage here in the church with silk fabrics only to neglect it outside where it suffers cold and nakedness.”<sup>113</sup>

87.3 Where life is involved, the service of charity must be profoundly consistent. It cannot tolerate bias and discrimination, for human life is sacred and inviolable at every stage and in every situation; it is an indivisible good. We need then to “show care” for all life and for the life of everyone. Indeed, at an even deeper level, we need to go to the very roots of life and love.

87.4 It is this deep love for every man and woman which has given rise down the centuries to an outstanding history of charity, a history which has brought into being in the Church and society many forms of service to life which evoke admiration from all unbiased observers. Every Christian community, with a renewed sense of responsibility, must continue to write this history through various kinds of pastoral and social activity. To this end, appropriate and effective programs of support for new life must be implemented, with special closeness to mothers who, even without the help of the father, are not afraid to bring their child into the world and to raise it. Similar care must be shown for the life of the marginalized or suffering, especially in its final phases.

88.1 All of this involves a patient and fearless work of education aimed at encouraging one and all to bear each other's burdens (cf. Gal 6:2). It requires a continuous promotion of vocations to service, particularly among the young. It involves the implementation of long-term practical projects and initiatives inspired by the Gospel.

88.2 Many are the means toward this end which need to be developed with skill and serious commitment. At the first stage of life, centers for natural methods of regulating fertility should be promoted as a valuable help to responsible parenthood, in which all individuals, and in the first place the child, are recognized and respected in their own right, and where every decision is guided by the ideal of the sincere gift of self. Marriage and family counseling agencies by their specific work of guidance and prevention, carried out in accordance with an anthropology consistent with the Christian vision of the person, of the couple and of sexuality, also offer valuable help in rediscovering the meaning of love and life, and in supporting and accompanying every family in its mission as the "sanctuary of life." Newborn life is also served by centers of assistance and homes or centers where new life receives a welcome. Thanks to the work of such centers, many unmarried mothers and couples in difficulty discover new hope and find assistance and support in overcoming hardship and the fear of accepting a newly conceived life or life which has just come into the world.

88.3 When life is challenged by conditions of hardship, maladjustment, sickness or rejection, other programs – such as communities for treating drug addiction, residential communities for minors or the mentally ill, care and relief centers for AIDS patients, associations for solidarity especially toward the disabled – are eloquent expressions of what charity is able to devise in order to give everyone new reasons for hope and practical possibilities for life.

88.4 And when earthly existence draws to a close, it is again charity which finds the most appropriate means for enabling the elderly, especially those who can no longer look after themselves, and the terminally ill to enjoy genuinely humane assistance and to receive an adequate response to their needs, in particular their anxiety and their loneliness. In these cases the role of families is indispensable; yet families can receive much help from social welfare agencies and, if necessary, from recourse to palliative care, taking advantage of suitable medical and social services available in public institutions or in the home.

88.5 In particular, the role of hospitals, clinics and convalescent homes needs to be reconsidered. These should not merely be institutions where care is provided for the sick or the dying. Above all they should be places where suffering, pain and death are acknowledged and understood in their human and specifically Christian meaning. This must be especially evident and effective in institutes staffed by Religious or in any way connected with the Church.

89.1 Agencies and centers of service to life, and all other initiatives of support and solidarity which circumstances may from time to time suggest, need to be directed by people who are generous in their involvement and fully aware of the importance of the Gospel of life for the good of individuals and society.

89.2 A unique responsibility belongs to health-care personnel: doctors, pharmacists, nurses, chaplains, men and women Religious, administrators and volunteers. Their profession calls for them to be guardians and servants of human life. In today's cultural and social context, in which science and the practice of medicine risk losing sight of their inherent ethical dimension, health-care professionals can be strongly tempted at times to become manipulators of life or even agents of death. In the face of this temptation their responsibility today is greatly increased. Its deepest inspiration and strongest support lie in the intrinsic and undeniable ethical dimension of the health-care profession, something already recognized by the ancient and still relevant Hippocratic Oath, which requires every doctor to commit himself to absolute respect for human life and its sacredness.

89.3 Absolute respect for every innocent human life also requires the exercise of conscientious objection in relation to procured abortion and euthanasia. "Causing death" can never be considered a form of medical treatment, even when the intention is solely to comply with the patient's request. Rather, it runs completely counter to the health-care profession, which is meant to be an impassioned and unflinching affirmation of life. Biomedical research too, a field which promises great benefits for humanity, must always reject experimentation, research or applications which disregard the inviolable dignity of the human being, and thus cease to be at the service of people and become instead means which, under the guise of helping people, actually harm them.

90.1 Volunteer workers have a specific role to play: they make a valuable contribution to the service of life when they combine professional ability and generous, selfless love. The Gospel of life inspires them to lift their feelings of good will toward others to the heights of Christ's charity; to renew every day, amid hard work and weariness, their awareness of the dignity of every person; to search out people's needs and, when necessary, to set out on new paths where needs are greater but care and support weaker.

90.2 If charity is to be realistic and effective, it demands that the Gospel of life be implemented also by means of certain forms of social activity and commitment in the political field, as a way of defending and promoting the value of life in our ever more complex and pluralistic societies. Individuals, families, groups and associations, albeit for different reasons and in different ways, all have a responsibility for shaping society and developing cultural, economic, political and legislative projects which, with respect for all and in keeping with democratic principles, will contribute to the building of a society in which the dignity of each person is recognized and protected and the lives of all are defended and enhanced.

90.3 This task is the particular responsibility of civil leaders. Called to serve the people and the common good, they have a duty to make courageous choices in support of life, especially through legislative measures. In a democratic system, where laws and decisions are made on the basis of the consensus of many, the sense of personal responsibility in the consciences of individuals invested with authority may be weakened. But no one can ever renounce this responsibility, especially when he or she has a legislative or decision-making mandate, which calls that person to answer to God, to his or her own conscience and to the whole of society for choices which may be contrary to the common good. Although laws are not the only means of protecting human life, nevertheless they do play a very important and sometimes decisive role in influencing patterns of thought and behavior. I repeat once more that a law which violates an innocent person's natural right to life is unjust and, as such, is not valid as a law. For this reason I urgently appeal once more to all political leaders not to pass laws which, by disregarding the dignity of the person, undermine the very fabric of society.

90.4 The Church well knows that it is difficult to mount an effective legal defense of life in pluralistic democracies, because of the presence of strong cultural currents with differing outlooks. At the same time, certain that moral truth cannot fail to make its presence deeply felt in every conscience, the Church encourages political leaders, starting with those who are Christians, not to give in, but to make those choices which, taking into account what is realistically attainable, will lead to the reestablishment of a just order in the defense and promotion of the value of life. Here it must be noted that it is not enough to remove unjust laws. The underlying causes of attacks on life have to be eliminated, especially by ensuring proper support for families and motherhood. A family policy must be the basis and driving force of all social policies. For this reason there need to be set in place social and political initiatives capable of guaranteeing conditions of true freedom of choice in matters of parenthood. It is also necessary to rethink labor, urban, residential and social service policies so as to harmonize working schedules with time available for the family, so that it becomes effectively possible to take care of children and the elderly.

91.1 Today an important part of policies which favor life is the issue of population growth. Certainly public authorities have a responsibility to “intervene to orient the demography of the population.”<sup>114</sup> But such interventions must always take into account and respect the primary and inalienable responsibility of married couples and families, and cannot employ methods which fail to respect the person and fundamental human rights, beginning with the right to life of every innocent human being. It is therefore morally unacceptable to encourage, let alone impose, the use of methods such as contraception, sterilization and abortion in order to regulate births. The ways of solving the population problem are quite different. Governments and the various international agencies must above all strive to create economic, social, public health and cultural conditions which will enable married couples to make their choices about procreation in full freedom and with genuine responsibility. They must then make efforts to ensure “greater opportunities and a fairer distribution of wealth so that everyone can share equitably in the goods of creation. Solutions must be sought on the global level by establishing a true economy of communion and sharing of goods, in both the national and international order.”<sup>115</sup> This is the only way to respect the dignity of persons and families as well as the authentic cultural patrimony of peoples.

91.2 Service of the Gospel of life is thus an immense and complex task. This service increasingly appears as a valuable and fruitful area for positive cooperation with our brothers and sisters of other Churches and Ecclesial Communities, in accordance with the practical ecumenism which the Second Vatican Council authoritatively encouraged.<sup>116</sup> It also appears as a providential area for dialogue and joint efforts with the followers of other religions and with all people of good will. No single person or group has a monopoly on the defense and promotion of life. These are everyone’s task and responsibility. On the eve of the third millennium, the challenge facing us is an arduous one: only the concerted efforts of all those who believe in the value of life can prevent a setback of unforeseeable consequences for civilization.

Evangelium Vitae

“Your children will be like olive shoots around your table” (Ps 128:3): the family as the “sanctuary of life”

92.1 Within the “people of life and the people for life,” the family has a decisive responsibility. This responsibility flows from its very nature as a community of life and love, founded upon marriage, and from its mission to “guard, reveal and communicate love.”<sup>117</sup> Here it is a matter of God’s own love, of which parents are co-workers and as it were interpreters when they transmit life and raise it according to his fatherly plan.<sup>118</sup> This is the love that becomes selflessness, receptiveness and gift. Within the family each member is accepted, respected and honored precisely because he or she is a person; and if any family member is in greater need, the care which he or she receives is all the more intense and attentive.

92.2 The family has a special role to play throughout the life of its members, from birth to death. It is truly “the sanctuary of life: the place in which life – the gift of God – can be properly welcomed and protected against the many attacks to which it is exposed, and can develop in accordance with what constitutes authentic human growth.”<sup>119</sup> Consequently the role of the family in building a culture of life is decisive and irreplaceable.

92.3 As the domestic church, the family is summoned to proclaim, celebrate and serve the Gospel of life. This is a responsibility which first concerns married couples, called to be givers of life, on the basis of an ever greater awareness of the meaning of procreation as a unique event which clearly reveals that human life is a gift received in order then to be given as a gift. In giving origin to a new life, parents recognize that the child, “as the fruit of their mutual gift of love, is, in turn, a gift for both of them, a gift which flows from them.”<sup>120</sup>

92.4 It is above all in raising children that the family fulfills its mission to proclaim the Gospel of life. By word and example, in the daily round of relations and choices, and through concrete actions and signs, parents lead their children to authentic freedom, actualized in the sincere gift of self, and they cultivate in them respect for others, a sense of justice, cordial openness, dialogue, generous service, solidarity and all the other values which help people to live life as a gift. In raising children, Christian parents must be concerned about their children’s faith and help them to fulfill the vocation God has given them. The parents’ mission as educators also includes teaching and giving their children an example of the true meaning of suffering and death. They will be able to do this if they are sensitive to all kinds of suffering around them and, even more, if they succeed in fostering attitudes of closeness, assistance and sharing toward sick or elderly members of the family.

93.1 The family celebrates the Gospel of life through daily prayer; both individual prayer and family prayer. The family prays in order to glorify and give thanks to God for the gift of life, and implores his light and strength in order to face times of difficulty and suffering without losing hope. But the celebration which gives meaning to every other form of prayer and worship is found in the family's actual daily life together, if it is a life of love and self-giving.

93.2 This celebration thus becomes a service to the Gospel of life, expressed through solidarity as experienced within and around the family in the form of concerned, attentive and loving care shown in the humble, ordinary events of each day. A particularly significant expression of solidarity between families is a willingness to adopt or take in children abandoned by their parents or in situations of serious hardship. True parental love is ready to go beyond the bonds of flesh and blood in order to accept children from other families, offering them whatever is necessary for their well-being and full development. Among the various forms of adoption, consideration should be given to adoption-at-a-distance, preferable in cases where the only reason for giving up the child is the extreme poverty of the child's family. Through this type of adoption, parents are given the help needed to support and raise their children, without their being uprooted from their natural environment.

93.3 As "a firm and persevering determination to commit oneself to the common good," 121 solidarity also needs to be practiced through participation in social and political life. Serving the Gospel of life thus means that the family, particularly through its membership in family associations, works to ensure that the laws and institutions of the State in no way violate the right to life, from conception to natural death, but rather protect and promote it.

94.1 Special attention must be given to the elderly. While in some cultures older people remain a part of the family with an important and active role, in others the elderly are regarded as a useless burden and are left to themselves. Here the temptation to resort to euthanasia can more easily arise.

94.2 Neglect of the elderly or their outright rejection is intolerable. Their presence in the family, or at least their closeness to the family in cases where limited living space or other reasons make this impossible, is of fundamental importance in creating a climate of mutual interaction and enriching communication between the different age groups. It is therefore important to preserve, or to reestablish where it has been lost, a sort of "covenant" between generations. In this way parents, in their later years, can receive from their children the acceptance and solidarity which they themselves gave to their children when they brought them into the world. This is required by obedience to the divine commandment to honor one's father and mother (cf. Ex 20:12; Lev 19:3). But there is more. The elderly are not only to be considered the object of our concern, closeness and service. They themselves have a valuable contribution to make to the Gospel of life. Thanks to the rich treasury of experiences they have acquired through the years, the elderly can and must be sources of wisdom and witnesses of hope and love.

94.3 Although it is true that “the future of humanity passes by way of the family,”<sup>122</sup> it must be admitted that modern social, economic and cultural conditions make the family's task of serving life more difficult and demanding. In order to fulfill its vocation as the “sanctuary of life,” as the cell of a society which loves and welcomes life, the family urgently needs to be helped and supported. Communities and States must guarantee all the support, including economic support, which families need in order to meet their problems in a truly human way. For her part, the Church must untiringly promote a plan of pastoral care for families, capable of making every family rediscover and live with joy and courage its mission to further the Gospel of life.

Evangelium Vitae

“Walk as children of light” (Eph 5:8): bringing about a transformation of culture

95.1 “Walk as children of light . . . and try to learn what is pleasing to the Lord. Take no part in the unfruitful works of darkness” (Eph 5:8, 10-11). In our present social context, marked by a dramatic struggle between the “culture of life” and the “culture of death,” there is need to develop a deep critical sense, capable of discerning true values and authentic needs.

95.2 What is urgently called for is a general mobilization of consciences and a united ethical effort to activate a great campaign in support of life. All together, we must build a new culture of life: new, because it will be able to confront and solve today’s unprecedented problems affecting human life; new, because it will be adopted with deeper and more dynamic conviction by all Christians; new, because it will be capable of bringing about a serious and courageous cultural dialogue among all parties. While the urgent need for such a cultural transformation is linked to the present historical situation, it is also rooted in the Church’s mission of evangelization. The purpose of the Gospel, in fact, is “to transform humanity from within and to make it new.”<sup>123</sup> Like the yeast which leavens the whole measure of dough (cf. Mt 13:33), the Gospel is meant to permeate all cultures and give them life from within,<sup>124</sup> so that they may express the full truth about the human person and about human life.

95.3 We need to begin with the renewal of a culture of life within Christian communities themselves. Too often it happens that believers, even those who take an active part in the life of the Church, end up by separating their Christian faith from its ethical requirements concerning life, and thus fall into moral subjectivism and certain objectionable ways of acting. With great openness and courage, we need to question how widespread is the culture of life today among individual Christians, families, groups and communities in our Dioceses. With equal clarity and determination, we must identify the steps we are called to take in order to serve life in all its truth. At the same time, we need to promote a serious and in-depth exchange about basic issues of human life with everyone, including non-believers, in intellectual circles, in the various professional spheres and at the level of people’s everyday life.

96.1 The first and fundamental step toward this cultural transformation consists in forming consciences with regard to the incomparable and inviolable worth of every human life. It is of the greatest importance to reestablish the essential connection between life and freedom. These are inseparable goods: where one is violated, the other also ends up being violated. There is no true freedom where life is not welcomed and loved; and there is no fullness of life except in freedom. Both realities have something inherent and specific which links them inextricably: the vocation to love. Love, as a sincere gift of self,<sup>125</sup> is what gives the life and freedom of the person their truest meaning.

96.2 No less critical in the formation of conscience is the recovery of the necessary link between freedom and truth. As I have frequently stated, when freedom is detached from objective truth it becomes impossible to establish personal rights on a firm rational basis; and the ground is laid for society to be at the mercy of the unrestrained will of individuals or the oppressive totalitarianism of public authority.<sup>126</sup>

96.3 It is therefore essential that man should acknowledge his inherent condition as a creature to whom God has granted being and life as a gift and a duty. Only by admitting his innate dependence can man live and use his freedom to the full, and at the same time respect the life and freedom of every other person. Here especially one sees that “at the heart of every culture lies the attitude man takes to the greatest mystery: the mystery of God.”<sup>127</sup> Where God is denied and people live as though he did not exist, or his commandments are not taken into account, the dignity of the human person and the inviolability of human life also end up being rejected or compromised.

97.1 Closely connected with the formation of conscience is the work of education, which helps individuals to be ever more human, leads them ever more fully to the truth, instills in them growing respect for life, and trains them in right interpersonal relationships.

97.2 In particular, there is a need for education about the value of life from its very origins. It is an illusion to think that we can build a true culture of human life if we do not help the young to accept and experience sexuality and love and the whole of life according to their true meaning and in their close interconnection. Sexuality, which enriches the whole person, “manifests its inmost meaning in leading the person to the gift of self in love.”<sup>128</sup> The trivialization of sexuality is among the principal factors which have led to contempt for new life. Only a true love is able to protect life. There can be no avoiding the duty to offer, especially to adolescents and young adults, an authentic education in sexuality and in love, an education which involves training in chastity as a virtue which fosters personal maturity and makes one capable of respecting the “spousal” meaning of the body.

97.3 The work of educating in the service of life involves the training of married couples in responsible procreation. In its true meaning, responsible procreation requires couples to be obedient to the Lord’s call and to act as faithful interpreters of his plan. This happens when the family is generously open to new lives, and when couples maintain an attitude of openness and service to life, even if, for serious reasons and in respect for the moral law, they choose to avoid a new birth for the time being or indefinitely. The moral law obliges them in every case to control the impulse of instinct and passion, and to respect the biological laws inscribed in their person. It is precisely this respect which makes legitimate, at the service of responsible procreation, the use of natural methods of regulating fertility. From the scientific point of view, these methods are becoming more and more accurate and make it possible in practice to make choices in harmony with moral values. An honest appraisal of their effectiveness should dispel certain prejudices which are still widely held, and should convince married couples, as well as health-care and social workers, of the importance of proper training in this area. The Church is grateful to those who, with personal sacrifice and often unacknowledged dedication, devote themselves to the study and spread of these methods, as well to the promotion of education in the moral values which they presuppose.

97.4 The work of education cannot avoid a consideration of suffering and death. These are a part of human existence, and it is futile, not to say misleading, to try to hide them or ignore them. On the contrary, people must be helped to understand their profound mystery in all its harsh reality. Even pain and suffering have meaning and value when they are experienced in close connection with love received and given. In this regard, I have called for the yearly celebration of the World Day of the Sick, emphasizing “the salvific nature of the offering up of suffering which, experienced in communion with Christ, belongs to the very essence of the Redemption.”<sup>129</sup> Death itself is anything but an event without hope. It is the door which opens wide on eternity and, for those who live in Christ, an experience of participation in the mystery of his death and Resurrection.

98.1 In a word, we can say that the cultural change which we are calling for demands from everyone the courage to adopt a new lifestyle, consisting in making practical choices – at the personal, family, social and international level – on the basis of a correct scale of values: the primacy of being over having,<sup>130</sup> of the person over things.<sup>131</sup> This renewed lifestyle involves a passing from indifference to concern for others, from rejection to acceptance of them. Other people are not rivals from whom we must defend ourselves, but brothers and sisters to be supported. They are to be loved for their own sakes, and they enrich us by their very presence.

98.2 In this mobilization for a new culture of life no one must feel excluded: everyone has an important role to play. Together with the family, teachers and educators have a particularly valuable contribution to make. Much will depend on them if young people, trained in true freedom, are to be able to preserve for themselves and make known to others new, authentic ideals of life, and if they are to grow in respect for and service to every other person, in the family and in society.

98.3 Intellectuals can also do much to build a new culture of human life. A special task falls to Catholic intellectuals, who are called to be present and active in the leading centers where culture is formed in schools and universities, in places of scientific and technological research, of artistic creativity and of the study of man. Allowing their talents and activity to be nourished by the living force of the Gospel, they ought to place themselves at the service of a new culture of life by offering serious and well-documented contributions, capable of commanding general respect and interest by reason of their merit. It was precisely for this purpose that I established the Pontifical Academy for Life, assigning it the task of “studying and providing information and training about the principal problems of law and biomedicine pertaining to the promotion of life, especially in the direct relationship they have with Christian morality and the directives of the Church’s Magisterium.”<sup>132</sup> A specific contribution will also have to come from universities, particularly from Catholic universities, and from centers, institutes and committees of bioethics.

98.4 An important and serious responsibility belongs to those involved in the mass media, who are called to ensure that the messages which they so effectively transmit will support the culture of life. They need to present noble models of life and make room for instances of people’s positive and sometimes heroic love for others. With great respect they should also present the positive values of sexuality and human love, and not insist on what defiles and cheapens human dignity. In their interpretation of things, they should refrain from emphasizing anything that suggests or fosters feelings or attitudes of indifference, contempt or rejection in relation to life. With scrupulous concern for factual truth, they are called to combine freedom of information with respect for every person and a profound sense of humanity.

99.1 In transforming culture so that it supports life, women occupy a place in thought and action which is unique and decisive. It depends on them to promote a “new feminism” which rejects the temptation of imitating models of “male domination,” in order to acknowledge and affirm the true genius of women in every aspect of the life of society, and overcome all discrimination, violence and exploitation.

99.2 Making my own the words of the concluding message of the Second Vatican Council, I address to women this urgent appeal: “Reconcile people with life.”<sup>133</sup> You are called to bear witness to the meaning of genuine love, of that gift of self and of that acceptance of others which are present in a special way in the relationship of husband and wife, but which ought also to be at the heart of every other interpersonal relationship. The experience of motherhood makes you acutely aware of the other person and, at the same time, confers on you a particular task: “Motherhood involves a special communion with the mystery of life, as it develops in the woman’s womb. . . . This unique contact with the new human being developing within her gives rise to an attitude toward human beings – not only toward her own child, but every human being – which profoundly marks the woman’s personality.”<sup>134</sup> A mother welcomes and carries in herself another human being, enabling it to grow inside her, giving it room, respecting it in its otherness. Women first learn and then teach others that human relations are authentic if they are open to accepting the other person: a person who is recognized and loved because of the dignity which comes from being a person and not from other considerations, such as usefulness, strength, intelligence, beauty or health. This is the fundamental contribution which the Church and humanity expect from women. And it is the indispensable prerequisite for an authentic cultural change.

99.3 I would now like to say a special word to women who have had an abortion. The Church is aware of the many factors which may have influenced your decision, and she does not doubt that in many cases it was a painful and even shattering decision. The wound in your heart may not yet have healed. Certainly what happened was and remains terribly wrong. But do not give in to discouragement and do not lose hope. Try rather to understand what happened and face it honestly. If you have not already done so, give yourselves over with humility and trust to repentance. The Father of mercies is ready to give you his forgiveness and his peace in the Sacrament of Reconciliation. To the same Father and to his mercy you can with sure hope entrust your child. With the friendly and expert help and advice of other people, and as a result of your own painful experience, you can be among the most eloquent defenders of everyone’s right to life. Through your commitment to life, whether by accepting the birth of other children or by welcoming and caring for those most in need of someone to be close to them, you will become promoters of a new way of looking at human life.

100.1 In this great endeavor to create a new culture of life we are inspired and sustained by the confidence that comes from knowing that the Gospel of life, like the Kingdom of God itself, is growing and producing abundant fruit (cf. Mk 4:26-29). There is certainly an enormous disparity between the powerful resources available to the forces promoting the “culture of death” and the means at the disposal of those working for a “culture of life and love.” But we know that we can rely on the help of God, for whom nothing is impossible (cf. Mt 19:26).

100.2 Filled with this certainty, and moved by profound concern for the destiny of every man and woman, I repeat what I said to those families who carry out their challenging mission amid so many difficulties: 135 a great prayer for life is urgently needed, a prayer which will rise up throughout the world. Through special initiatives and in daily prayer, may an impassioned plea rise to God, the Creator and lover of life, from every Christian community, from every group and association, from every family and from the heart of every believer. Jesus himself has shown us by his own example that prayer and fasting are the first and most effective weapons against the forces of evil (cf. Mt 4:1-11). As he taught his disciples, some demons cannot be driven out except in this way (cf. Mk 9:29). Let us therefore discover anew the humility and the courage to pray and fast so that power from on high will break down the walls of lies and deceit: the walls which conceal from the sight of so many of our brothers and sisters the evil of practices and laws which are hostile to life. May this same power turn their hearts to resolutions and goals inspired by the civilization of life and love.

Evangelium Vitae

“We are writing this that our joy may be complete” (1 Jn 1:4): the Gospel of life is for the whole of human society

101.1 “We are writing you this that our joy may be complete” (1 Jn 1:4). The revelation of the Gospel of life is given to us as a good to be shared with all people: so that all men and women may have fellowship with us and with the Trinity (cf. 1 Jn 1:3). Our own joy would not be complete if we failed to share this Gospel with others but kept it only for ourselves.

101.2 The Gospel of life is not for believers alone: it is for everyone. The issue of life and its defense and promotion is not a concern of Christians alone. Although faith provides special light and strength, this question arises in every human conscience which seeks the truth and which cares about the future of humanity. Life certainly has a sacred and religious value, but in no way is that value a concern only of believers. The value at stake is one which every human being can grasp by the light of reason; thus it necessarily concerns everyone.

101.3 Consequently, all that we do as the “people of life and for life” should be interpreted correctly and welcomed with favor. When the Church declares that unconditional respect for the right to life of every innocent person – from conception to natural death – is one of the pillars on which every civil society stands, she “wants simply to promote a human State. A State which recognizes the defense of the fundamental rights of the human person, especially of the weakest, as its primary duty.”<sup>136</sup>

101.4 The Gospel of life is for the whole of human society. To be actively pro-life is to contribute to the renewal of society through the promotion of the common good. It is impossible to further the common good without acknowledging and defending the right to life, upon which all the other inalienable rights of individuals are founded and from which they develop. A society lacks solid foundations when, on the one hand, it asserts values such as the dignity of the person, justice and peace, but then, on the other hand, radically acts to the contrary by allowing or tolerating a variety of ways in which human life is devalued and violated, especially where it is weak or marginalized. Only respect for life can be the foundation and guarantee of the most precious and essential goods of society, such as democracy and peace.

101.5 There can be no true democracy without a recognition of every person’s dignity and without respect for his or her rights.

101.6 Nor can there be true peace unless life is defended and promoted. As Paul VI pointed out: “Every crime against life is an attack on peace, especially if it strikes at the moral conduct of people. . . . But where human rights are truly professed and publicly recognized and defended, peace becomes the joyful and operative climate of life in society.”<sup>137</sup>

101.7 The “people of life” rejoice in being able to share their commitment with so many others. Thus may the “people for life” constantly grow in number and may a new culture of love and solidarity develop for the true good of the whole of human society.

Conclusion

102.1 At the end of this Encyclical, we naturally look again to the Lord Jesus, “the child born for us” (cf. Is 9:6), that in him we may contemplate “the Life” which “was made manifest” (1 Jn 1:2). In the mystery of Christ’s birth, the encounter of God with man takes place, and the earthly journey of the Son of God begins, a journey which will culminate in the gift of his life on the Cross. By his death, Christ will conquer death and become for all humanity the source of new life.

102.2 The one who accepted “Life” in the name of all and for the sake of all was Mary, the Virgin Mother; she is thus most closely and personally associated with the Gospel of life. Mary’s consent at the Annunciation and her motherhood stand at the very beginning of the mystery of life which Christ came to bestow on humanity (cf. Jn 10:10). Through her acceptance and loving care for the life of the Incarnate Word, human life has been rescued from condemnation to final and eternal death.

102.3 For this reason, Mary, “like the Church of which she is the type, is a Mother of all who are reborn to life. She is in fact the Mother of the Life by which everyone lives, and when she brought it forth from herself she in some way brought to rebirth all those who were to live by that Life.”<sup>138</sup>

102.4 As the Church contemplates Mary’s motherhood, she discovers the meaning of her own motherhood and the way in which she is called to express it. At the same time, the Church’s experience of motherhood leads to a most profound understanding of Mary’s experience as the incomparable model of how life should be welcomed and cared for.

Evangelium Vitae

“A great portent appeared in heaven, a woman clothed with the sun” (Rev 12:1): the motherhood of Mary and of the Church

103.1 The mutual relationship between the mystery of the Church and Mary appears clearly in the “great portent” described in the Book of Revelation: “A great portent appeared in heaven, a woman clothed with the sun, with the moon under her feet, and on her head a crown of twelve stars” (12:1). In this sign the Church recognizes an image of her own mystery: present in history, she knows that she transcends history, inasmuch as she constitutes on earth the “seed and beginning” of the Kingdom of God.<sup>139</sup> The Church sees this mystery fulfilled in complete and exemplary fashion in Mary. She is the woman of glory in whom God’s plan could be carried out with supreme perfection.

103.2 The “woman clothed with the sun” – the Book of Revelation tells us – “was with child” (12:2). The Church is fully aware that she bears within herself the Savior of the world, Christ the Lord. She is aware that she is called to offer Christ to the world, giving men and women new birth into God’s own life. But the Church cannot forget that her mission was made possible by the motherhood of Mary, who conceived and bore the One who is “God from God,” “true God from true God.” Mary is truly the Mother of God, the Theotókos, in whose motherhood the vocation to motherhood bestowed by God on every woman is raised to its highest level. Thus Mary becomes the model of the Church, called to be the “new Eve,” the Mother of believers, the Mother of the “living” (cf. Gen 3:20).

103.3 The Church’s spiritual motherhood is only achieved – the Church knows this too – through the pangs and “the labor” of childbirth (cf. Rev 12:2), that is to say, in constant tension with the forces of evil which still roam the world and affect human hearts, offering resistance to Christ: “In him was life, and the life was the light of men. The light shines in the darkness, and the darkness has not overcome it” (Jn 1:4-5).

103.4 Like the Church, Mary too had to live her motherhood amid suffering: “This child is set . . . for a sign that is spoken against – and a sword will pierce through your own soul also – that thoughts out of many hearts may be revealed” (Lk 2:34-35). The words which Simeon addresses to Mary at the very beginning of the Savior’s earthly life sum up and prefigure the rejection of Jesus, and with him of Mary, a rejection which will reach its culmination on Calvary. “Standing by the cross of Jesus” (Jn 19:25), Mary shares in the gift which the Son makes of himself: she offers Jesus, gives him over, and begets him to the end for our sake. The “yes” spoken on the day of the Annunciation reaches full maturity on the day of the Cross, when the time comes for Mary to receive and beget as her children all those who become disciples, pouring out upon them the saving love of her Son: “When Jesus saw his Mother and the disciple whom he loved standing near, he said to his Mother, ‘Woman, behold, your son!’ ” (Jn 19:26).

Evangelium Vitae

“And the dragon stood before the woman . . . that he might devour her child when she brought it forth” (Rev 12:4): life menaced by the forces of evil

104.1 In the Book of Revelation, the “great portent” of the “woman” (12:1) is accompanied by “another portent which appeared in heaven”: “a great red dragon” (Rev 12:3), which represents Satan, the personal power of evil, as well as all the powers of evil at work in history and opposing the Church’s mission.

104.2 Here too Mary sheds light on the community of believers. The hostility of the powers of evil is, in fact, an insidious opposition which, before affecting the disciples of Jesus, is directed against his Mother. To save the life of her Son from those who fear him as a dangerous threat, Mary has to flee with Joseph and the child into Egypt (cf. Mt 2:13-15).

104.3 Mary thus helps the Church to realize that life is always at the center of a great struggle between good and evil, between light and darkness. The dragon wishes to devour “the child brought forth” (cf. Rev 12:4), a figure of Christ, whom Mary brought forth “in the fullness of time” (Gal 4:4) and whom the Church must unceasingly offer to people in every age. But in a way that child is also a figure of every person, every child, especially every helpless baby whose life is threatened, because – as the Council reminds us – “by his Incarnation the Son of God has united himself in some fashion with every person.”<sup>140</sup> It is precisely in the “flesh” of every person that Christ continues to reveal himself and to enter into fellowship with us, so that rejection of human life, in whatever form that rejection takes, is really a rejection of Christ. This is the fascinating but also demanding truth which Christ reveals to us and which his Church continues untiringly to proclaim: “Whoever receives one such child in my name receives me” (Mt 18:5); “Truly, I say to you, as you did it to one of the least of these my brethren, you did it to me” (Mt 25:40).

“Death shall be no more” (Rev 21:4): the splendor of the Resurrection

105.1 The angel’s Annunciation to Mary is framed by these reassuring words: “Do not be afraid, Mary” and “with God nothing will be impossible” (Lk 1:30, 37). The whole of the Virgin Mother’s life is in fact pervaded by the certainty that God is near to her and that he accompanies her with his providential care. The same is true of the Church, which finds “a place prepared by God” (Rev 12:6) in the desert, the place of trial but also of the manifestation of God’s love for his people (cf. Hos 2:16). Mary is a living word of comfort for the Church in her struggle against death. Showing us the Son, the Church assures us that in him the forces of death have already been defeated: “Death with life contended: combat strangely ended! Life’s own champion, slain, yet lives to reign.”<sup>141</sup>

105.2 The Lamb who was slain is alive, bearing the marks of his Passion in the splendor of the Resurrection. He alone is master of all the events of history: he opens its “seals” (cf. Rev 5:1-10) and proclaims, in time and beyond, the power of life over death. In the “new Jerusalem,” that new world toward which human history is traveling, “death shall be no more, neither shall there be mourning nor crying nor pain anymore, for the former things have passed away” (Rev 21:4).

105.3 And as we, the pilgrim people, the people of life and for life, make our way in confidence toward “a new heaven and a new earth” (Rev 21:1), we look to her who is for us “a sign of sure hope and solace.”<sup>142</sup>

105.4 O Mary,
bright dawn of the new world,
Mother of the living,
to you do we entrust the cause of life:
Look down, O Mother, upon the vast numbers of babies not allowed to be born, of the poor whose lives are made difficult, of men and women who are victims of brutal violence, of the elderly and the sick killed by indifference or out of misguided mercy.
Grant that all who believe in your Son may proclaim the Gospel of life with honesty and love to the people of our time.
Obtain for them the grace to accept that Gospel

as a gift ever new,
the joy of celebrating it with gratitude throughout their lives and the courage to bear witness to it resolutely, in order to build, together with all people of good will,
the civilization of truth and love,
to the praise and glory of God,
the Creator and lover of life.

Given in Rome, at Saint Peter's, on March 25, the Solemnity of the Annunciation of the Lord, in the year 1995, the seventeenth of my Pontificate.

<sup>60</sup> Hence the Prophet Jeremiah: “The word of the Lord came to me saying: ‘Before I formed you in the womb I knew you, and before you were born I consecrated you; I appointed you a prophet to the nations’ ” (1:4-5). The Psalmist, for his part, addresses the Lord in these words: “Upon you I have leaned from my birth; you are he who took me from my mother’s womb” (Ps 71:6; cf. Is 46:3; Job 10:8-12; Ps 22:10-11). So too the Evangelist Luke – in the magnificent episode of the meeting of the two mothers, Elizabeth and Mary, and their two sons, John the Baptist and Jesus, still hidden in their mothers’ wombs (cf. 1:39-45) – emphasizes how even before their birth the two little ones are able to communicate: the child recognizes the coming of the Child and leaps for joy.

Ut Unum Sint

Editor's Introduction

“That they may all be one!” (Jn 17:21). In the opening words of his twelfth encyclical, dedicated to the Church’s commitment to ecumenism and signed on May 25, 1995,<sup>1</sup> John Paul II repeats with impassioned intensity Christ’s prayer for the unity of his disciples. In Ut Unum Sint, the Pope praises God for the progress toward unity achieved since the Second Vatican Council and, on the threshold of the third millennium, renews the Church’s commitment to work for the full, visible communion of Christians.

Present-day concerns of the ecumenical movement are in the background. Some lament the lukewarm efforts of recent years, referring to an “ecumenical winter.” Others point to the increasing tensions between Orthodox and Catholics concerning proselytism and questions of jurisdiction in eastern Europe. To these pessimistic views John Paul vigorously replies with a positive evaluation of the efforts made by the ecumenical movement in the last thirty years. By means of this encyclical he wishes to dispel “a halfhearted commitment to unity and, even more, a prejudicial opposition or a defeatism which tends to see everything in negative terms” (§79.2).

Strains of thanksgiving, joy, and optimism run through Ut Unum Sint. The encyclical abounds with thanks for the steps already taken toward the reestablishment of Christian unity. For the Pope, these achievements are “truly an immense gift of God, one which deserves all our gratitude” (§41.1, cf. §§71.1, 102.3). He also expresses satisfaction at the deepening awareness of the unity which already exists among Christians. It is a cause of “deep joy” for him that “an imperfect but real communion is preserved and is growing at many levels of ecclesial life” (§84.1, cf. §2.2). The Pope’s unshakable confidence in God’s plan for the future of ecumenism is evident throughout the encyclical. “There is no doubt,” he writes, “that the Holy Spirit is accomplishing this endeavor and that he is leading the Church to the full realization of the Father’s plan, in conformity with the will of Christ” (§100.2).

Repeatedly John Paul insists that the Church is irreversibly committed to ecumenism; it “is not just some sort of ‘appendix’ which is added to the Church’s traditional activity. Rather, ecumenism is an organic part of her life and work, and consequently must pervade all that she is and does; it must be like the fruit borne by a healthy and flourishing tree which grows to its full stature” (§20.1). The quest for unity is, therefore, “a duty which springs from the very nature of the Christian community” (§49.2).

The Pope gives three reasons for renewing this commitment to the unity of Christians. First, the Church must be obedient to Christ’s prayer that his disciples may be one, “a living communion” (§6). Unity is essential to their community of faith and life: “God wills the Church, because he wills unity, and unity is an expression of the whole depth of his agape” (§9.1). Thus, all Christians “should be inspired by and submissive to Christ’s prayer for unity” (§33). Quite simply, as John Paul states, “to believe in Christ means to desire unity; to desire unity means to desire the Church; to desire the Church means to desire the communion of grace which corresponds to the Father’s plan from all eternity” (§9.2).

Second, the Catholic Church’s obligation to pursue Christian unity stems from an explicit mandate of the Second Vatican Council. As a result of the Council’s reading of the signs of the times, “the Catholic Church committed herself irrevocably to following the path of the ecumenical venture” (§3.1, cf. §17.2). More than merely a point of departure for this endeavor, Vatican II “remains a powerful source of incentive and orientation” for stimulating ecumenical activity (§49.1). Through the publication of Ut Unum Sint, John Paul sets his seal of approval on the Catholic Church’s participation in the ecumenical movement.

Third, the effective evangelization of the world depends on the united witness of Christians. It is an “imperative of charity” for Christians to make every effort to overcome “the grave obstacle which the lack of unity represents for the proclamation of the Gospel” (§99, cf. §§2.1, 23.1, 98.1). Division among Christian believers seriously damages the credibility of their testimony before the world: “When non-believers meet missionaries who do not agree among themselves, even though they all appeal to Christ, will they be in a position to receive the true message?” (§98.2).

Given the gravity of the Church’s duty to foster Christian unity, John Paul declares that “the ecumenical task is ‘one of the pastoral priorities’ of my Pontificate” (§99). Ut Unum Sint is proof of his concern “to encourage the efforts of all who work for the cause of unity” (§3.3).

Unlike other papal encyclicals, Ut Unum Sint has no opening salutation specifying its audience. Only in the last paragraph does the Pope indicate to whom he is writing: “to you, the faithful of the Catholic Church, and to you, my brothers and sisters of the other Churches and Ecclesial Communities” (§103.1). Furthermore, since Christian unity has as its goal “that the world may believe” (Jn 17:21), he also intends this encyclical to be read by all men and women of good will.

Because the Second Vatican Council marks a watershed in the Catholic Church’s commitment to ecumenism, in Ut Unum Sint John Paul draws very heavily upon conciliar teaching. Among the documents he cites most often are the Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, Lumen Gentium, and the Declaration on Religious Freedom, Dignitatis Humanae. Above all, however, he relies on the Council's Decree on Ecumenism, Unitatis Redintegratio, which forms the structural backbone of Ut Unum Sint; 70 of the encyclical's 162 footnotes refer to it. Indeed, in this encyclical John Paul furnishes an authoritative commentary on this Decree, showing the extent to which it has been "received" by Catholics and other Christians in the last thirty years. On several occasions he also cites the Directory for the Application of Principles and Norms on Ecumenism, published in 1993 by the Pontifical Council for Promoting Christian Unity, documents of the Faith and Order Commission of the World Council of Churches, and reports of various bilateral ecumenical dialogues.

Ut Unum Sint is highly readable, because it is written with passion and a sense of urgency. "Essentially pastoral in character" (§3.3), it is the most personal of all John Paul's encyclicals. He weaves together theological reflection and spiritual insights with detailed accounts of the key events of the post-conciliar ecumenical movement. At various points the Pope interjects prayers of thanksgiving or adds his own comments on meetings and liturgies with other Christian leaders.

Summary

Ut Unum Sint is divided into three parts, along with an introduction and closing exhortation. In the introduction (§§1-4) John Paul, with serene determination, explains his resolve to heal the deplorable divisions among Christians. Chapter one, “The Catholic Church’s Commitment to Ecumenism” (§§5-40), develops the basic principles of ecumenical activity and describes the spiritual, doctrinal, and practical ways to promote Christian unity. In chapter two, “The Fruits of Dialogue” (§§41-76), the Pope discusses the ecumenical movement since the Second Vatican Council, first in a general way, and then with specific reference to the churches of the East, and the churches and ecclesial communities of the West. Chapter three, “Quanta Est Nobis Via?” or “How Much Further Must We Travel?” (§§77-99), recommends a future agenda for ecumenism, including a reflection on the papal ministry. In the closing exhortation (§§100-103), John Paul recalls the obligation of Christians to pray for unity, give thanks for what has been accomplished, and have confidence that the Spirit will give men and women the courage to take the steps necessary to restore the full and visible communion of all who believe in Christ.

God's plan for unity

The Church's firm commitment to ecumenism stems from her obedience to the plan of God who wills "the unity of all divided humanity" (§6). The unity of Christians is a sacramental sign which manifests and brings this about. Because of their Baptism, Christians have the duty of giving visible expression to the "fullness of reconciliation and communion" won by Christ's Paschal Mystery (§6). Before describing how communion among Christians can be fostered, the Pope affirms two principles: God's gift of unity has been preserved in the Catholic Church, and authentic ecclesial values are present in other churches and ecclesial communities.

During her two-thousand-year history, the Catholic Church "has been preserved in unity, with all the means with which God wishes to endow his Church" (§11.1). John Paul recalls Vatican II's teaching on this point: "The Constitution Lumen Gentium, in a fundamental affirmation echoed by the Decree Unitatis Redintegratio, states that the one Church of Christ subsists in the Catholic Church. The Decree on Ecumenism emphasizes the presence in her of the fullness (plenitudo) of the means of salvation" (§86). Despite the often severe crises which have shaken the Church, her original unity established at Pentecost has never been substantially compromised.

The existence of divisions among Christians attests that the perfect, visible unity of Christians is yet to be achieved. "Full unity will come about," the Pope states, "when all share in the fullness of the means of salvation entrusted by Christ to his Church" (§86). But, even now, the other churches and ecclesial communities share in "a certain, though imperfect communion" with the Catholic Church because of "the elements of sanctification and truth" present in them (§11.2-3, cf. §§12.1, 13.3). Indeed, some aspects of the Christian mystery have at times been more effectively emphasized and lived outside the visible limits of the Catholic Church. These positive elements, the foremost of which is Baptism, "bear within themselves a tendency toward unity, having their fullness in that unity" (§14). They are also "by their nature a force for the reestablishment of unity" (§49.2). Ecumenism's goal, therefore, is to make "the partial communion existing between Christians grow toward full communion in truth and charity" (§14). The sign of this unity will be the common celebration of the Eucharist.

Spiritual ecumenism

Spiritual renewal is the key to ecumenism. The interior conversion and persevering prayer of all Christians are the chief instruments for fostering full unity: “The commitment to ecumenism must be based upon the conversion of hearts and upon prayer, which will also lead to the necessary purification of past memories” (§2.3).

Relying on the Council’s teaching, John Paul recalls the need for both personal and communal conversion if Christian unity is to be achieved. For individuals, a radical conversion to the Gospel is required, a renewal of mind and heart. The Pope is no exception to this rule: “The Bishop of Rome himself must fervently make his own Christ’s prayer for that conversion which is indispensable for ‘Peter’ to be able to serve his brethren” (§4.2). For every community, the desire for unity “goes hand in hand with its fidelity to the Gospel” (§15.2). The interior conversion of individuals and communities is the indispensable spiritual foundation of all true ecumenism. Ut Unum Sint confirms the teaching of Unitatis Redintegratio, §7: “There can be no ecumenism worthy of the name without a change of heart” (§15.1).

Conversion requires repentance for sins committed against the Church’s unity: “Not only personal sins must be forgiven and left behind,” writes John Paul, “but also social sins, which is to say the sinful ‘structures’ themselves which have contributed and can still contribute to division and to the reinforcing of division” (§34). On the one hand, “each individual must recognize his own faults, confess his sins, and place himself in the hands of the One who is our Intercessor before the Father, Jesus Christ” (§82.1). On the other hand, communities must repent “of certain exclusions which seriously harm fraternal charity, of certain refusals to forgive, of a certain pride, of an unevangelical insistence on condemning the ‘other side,’ of a disdain born of an unhealthy presumption” (§15.3, cf. §§3.1, 34). For ecumenism to make progress, Christians need to be purified from all that is erroneous, limited, and imperfect in their understanding of the unity of the Church.

Prayer is the preeminent means for restoring full Christian unity: “In this journey which we are undertaking with other Christians toward the new millennium, prayer must occupy the first place” (§102.2). Above all, the joint prayer of Christians is necessary, prayer specifically for unity but also for other intentions. The encyclical refers to three ecumenical benefits of this prayer in common. First, it helps believers to “grow in awareness of how little divides them in comparison to what unites them” (§22.2, cf. §26.1). Second, prayer together inspires Christians “to gain the courage to face all the painful human reality of their divisions” (§22.2). Third, “fellowship in prayer leads people to look at the Church and Christianity in a new way” (§23.1, cf. §26.2).

John Paul also mentions occasions when common prayer suitably takes place: at ecumenical gatherings, during the Week of Prayer for Christian Unity, and in the course of his meetings with Christian leaders and people both in Rome and abroad. Commenting on his pastoral visits around the world, the Pope says that they “have almost always included an ecumenical meeting and common prayer with our brothers and sisters who seek unity in Christ and in his Church” (§24).

Dialogue in truth and charity

If prayer is “the ‘soul’ of ecumenical renewal,” theological dialogue is the privileged instrument for bringing it about. In the light of “today’s personalist way of thinking,” dialogue is “an indispensable step along the path toward human self-realization” which involves “an exchange of gifts” between communities (§28.1, 2). Besides fostering this horizontal reciprocity, dialogue also has a vertical thrust directed to God. Before the Lord, Christians acknowledge their sinfulness. By doing so, they create “that interior space where Christ, the source of the Church’s unity, can effectively act, with all the power of his Spirit” (§35).

How is ecumenical dialogue to be carried out? First, the participants in any dialogue must appreciate “the degree of communion already present” among them (§49.3). Because of this solid foundation, John Paul says that “each side must presuppose in the other a desire for reconciliation, for unity in truth.” For this to happen, any display of mutual opposition must disappear” (§29). The laying to rest of former polemics requires a mutual spirit of conversion to the Gospel, a spirit nourished by an examination of conscience regarding sins that contributed to divisions among Christians. Furthermore, authentic dialogue must be marked “by a common quest for truth” (§33). Inevitably, genuine disagreements in matters of faith will emerge. When this occurs, the dialogue partners should face them “in a sincere spirit of fraternal charity, of respect for the demands of one’s own conscience and of the conscience of the other part, with profound humility and love for the truth” (§39).

Progress in ecumenism since Vatican II

Chapter two begins with a lengthy catalog of the positive results of the ecumenical movement since Vatican II. John Paul is profoundly thankful that “the ‘universal brotherhood of Christians’ has become a firm ecumenical conviction” (§42.1). He associates the growth in communion which has taken place since the Council with several factors: a shift in ecumenical vocabulary, recognition of the oneness of Baptism, a growing convergence regarding Scripture and liturgy, deeper appreciation of the common witness of holiness, and practical cooperation.

The terminology used by Catholics to refer to other Christians has changed in recent years. “Separated brethren,” the term that was common in the first stages of ecumenism, has been replaced by expressions such as “other Christians,” “others who have received Baptism,” or “Christians of other Communities.” John Paul believes that this new terminology more readily evokes “the deep communion – linked to the baptismal character – which the Spirit fosters in spite of historical and canonical divisions” (§42.1). It reflects what unites Christians rather than what divides them.

Christian brotherhood is not founded on what the Pope calls “a large-hearted philanthropy or a vague family spirit.” Instead, it is rooted “in recognition of the oneness of Baptism and the subsequent duty to glorify God in his work” (§42.3, cf. §66.6). Because Baptism establishes a sacramental bond of unity among all those reborn by water and the Spirit, it is the ultimate foundation of all ecumenical endeavors.

John Paul also notes that ecumenical translations of the Bible and liturgical practices shared by all Christians are signs of increasing communion. Modern liturgical renewal, for example, has not been restricted to the Catholic Church. Many communities in the West have begun to prize liturgical signs, to celebrate the Lord’s Supper more frequently, and to use cycles of liturgical readings common to other Christians in their worship. The encyclical also mentions the possibility, when the necessary conditions are met, of Christians not in full communion with the Catholic Church receiving the sacraments of Eucharist, Penance, and Anointing of the Sick. For their part, Catholics “can request these same sacraments from ministers of Churches in which these sacraments are valid” (§46).

More direct and frequent contact between Catholics and other Christians has also fostered a deeper awareness of the fact that the mutual witness of holiness “has an ecumenical potential extraordinarily rich in grace” (§48.2). This potential manifests itself in a joint martyrology shared by all Christians. “Despite the tragedy of our divisions,” the Pope writes, “these brothers and sisters have preserved an attachment to Christ and to the Father so radical and absolute as to lead even to the shedding of blood” (§83). The common heritage of Christians is found “first and foremost [in] this reality of holiness” (§84.3).

Lastly, the Pope describes how relations among Christians are increasingly marked by working together in the service of the world. This, too, manifests the communion which already exists among the baptized. Not merely humanitarian action, such ecumenical cooperation draws its inspiration from the Gospel and takes place at pastoral, cultural, and social levels. This practical ecumenism is especially concerned with the defense of human dignity, social justice, and peace. For the Pope, these shared practical efforts represent “a true school of ecumenism, a dynamic road to unity. Unity of action leads to the full unity of faith” (§40.3, cf. §75.4). Common Christian testimony in the service of humanity “has the clear value of a joint witness to the name of the Lord. It is also a form of proclamation, since it reveals the face of Christ” (§75.2).

Churches of the East

Throughout his pontificate John Paul has devoted considerable attention to the churches of the East. In Ut Unum Sint he repeats his conviction that “the Church must breathe with her two lungs!”: East and West (§54.2). With respect to the churches of the East, the Pope confirms Vatican II’s teaching on “their ecclesial nature and the real bonds of communion linking them with the Catholic Church” (§50.2). He also reviews significant post-conciliar developments which have deepened communion between the churches of the East and the West.

John Paul happily recalls the lifting of the mutual excommunications between Catholics and Orthodox by Pope Paul VI and Patriarch Athenagoras I in 1965. This act was, he says, “at once a healing of historical memories, a mutual forgiveness, and a firm commitment to strive for communion” (§52.1, cf. §56.1). Among the regular contacts now established between East and West, he mentions his meetings with Patriarch Dimitrios I, the mutual exchange of delegations for great feasts, and the setting up in 1979 of the Joint International Commission for the Theological Dialogue between the Catholic Church and the Orthodox Church. The Pope also takes note of the ecumenical significance of the 1984 Jubilee commemorating the evangelizing activity of Saints Cyril and Methodius, and the celebration of the millennium of the Baptism of Rus’ in 1988.

Ut Unum Sint confirms two theological ideas suggested in Unitatis Redintegratio which could prove helpful in restoring full communion: the inspiration of the first millennium as a model for the future (treated below) and the concept of “sister churches.” Local Orthodox churches, each one gathered around its Bishop, rightly deserve to be called “sister Churches” (§§56.1, 57.1). Indeed, mutual acceptance of this designation is the doctrinal foundation for fostering dialogue between Catholics and Orthodox.

Since the Council, fraternal relations have likewise been restored with many ancient churches of the East, which rejected the Christological formulations of the Councils of Ephesus (431) and Chalcedon (451). In recent years, the Pope has joined the Patriarchs of some of these churches “in declaring our common faith in Jesus Christ, true God and true man” (§62.2). Thus, ecumenical contacts have clarified long-standing controversies about Christology and opened the way to resolving other disputed theological questions.

Churches and ecclesial communities of the West

With respect to the churches and ecclesial communities which “have their origins in the Reformation” (§65.1), John Paul ratifies the teaching of the Second Vatican Council and evaluates the growth toward unity since then. While these churches and ecclesial communities are “Western,” the bonds of communion between post-Reformation Christians and Catholics are weaker than those between the Orthodox and Catholics. Even so, the Pope affirms that common Baptism has profound “theological, pastoral and ecumenical implications” (§66.6). The “communion of faith” already existing between Catholics and other Christians of the West provides “a solid foundation” for joint action in the religious and social spheres (§75.3).

To the doctrinal disagreements which emerged at the time of the Reformation regarding the Church, sacraments, and ordained ministry, ethical questions can be added today: “there is much room for dialogue concerning the moral principles of the Gospel and their implications” (§68.3). John Paul also observes that bilateral and multilateral dialogues with different churches and ecclesial communities have been “fruitful and full of promise” (§69.3).

As he does for the East, the Pope also recounts the encounters, common prayer, and practical initiatives which “attest to progress on the path to unity” in the West (§71.1). He specifically remarks that some of his pastoral visits have had “a precise ecumenical ‘priority’ ” (§71.2), especially those to the United Kingdom, the Scandinavian and Nordic countries, the United States, and Canada. The Pope also praises the many programs and endeavors undertaken by local Catholic churches which further the cause of unity.

The future agenda

In chapter three, John Paul looks to the future, asking how much farther the Church “must travel until that blessed day when full unity in faith will be attained and we can celebrate together in peace the Holy Eucharist of the Lord” (§77.1). The “affective and effective growth of communion” among Christians since the Second Vatican Council still needs to be perfected by the reestablishment of full, visible unity among all the baptized (§77.1, cf. §78.4). The Pope then recommends that Christians take four steps to advance further on their ecumenical journey together: they should continue theological dialogue, “receive” the results achieved, renew their commitment to prayer and interior conversion, and jointly reassess how the Bishop of Rome can best exercise his ministry of unity.

Because theological dialogue must take account of “all the demands of revealed truth” (§79.3), some questions require additional study before a consensus of faith can be reached. John Paul mentions the following five issues: the relationship between Scripture and Tradition; the Eucharist as the real presence of Christ and as a sacrificial memorial; Ordination as a sacrament, and the threefold ministry of the episcopate, presbyterate, and diaconate; the Magisterium of the Pope and bishops; and the role of Mary in salvation history (cf. §79.1).

With respect to the theological dialogues already concluded, the Pope indicates that “a new task lies before us: that of receiving the results already achieved” (§80.1). Churches and ecclesial communities must find ways of officially expressing their agreement, when this is the case, with the statements of bilateral dialogues. In this way their results will not remain the conclusions of commissions but will become a common heritage. Today no structures exist through which this can be done. Consequently, a procedure needs to be established which “analyzes the results and rigorously tests their consistency with the Tradition of faith received from the Apostles and lived out in the community of believers gathered around the Bishop, their legitimate Pastor” (§80.2). This process should involve the whole community, and competent persons must be designated to make the results of reception known. For Catholics, “the Church’s teaching authority is responsible for expressing a definitive judgment” in this regard (§81.2).

In his third suggestion for the future ecumenical agenda, John Paul returns to the role of spiritual ecumenism and of bearing common witness to holiness. He encourages individuals and communities to examine their consciences and thus engage in a “dialogue of conversion”: the confession of their sins against unity and the acceptance of God’s demand to deepen the bonds of communion among them. In this way God draws “the Christian Communities into this completely interior spiritual space in which Christ, by the power of the Spirit, leads them all, without exception, to examine themselves before the Father and to ask themselves whether they have been faithful to his plan for the Church” (§82.3, cf. §35). John Paul also invites his readers to look to the impressive witness of Christian holiness to inspire their ecumenical efforts. The saints and martyrs, who come from all churches and ecclesial communities, testify to the power of divine grace. As such, they are a source of hope for those seeking unity: “God will do for them [Christians] what he did for their saints” (§84.5). According to the Pope, the martyrs are “the most powerful proof that every factor of division can be transcended and overcome in the total gift of self for the sake of the Gospel” (§1.2, cf. §84.4).

Lastly, John Paul recognizes that, for most Christians, the papal ministry is an obstacle to the restoration of full communion: the papacy’s “memory is marked by certain painful recollections” (§88). To the extent that the Catholic Church is responsible for this situation, the Pope asks forgiveness. Fortunately, the ecumenical climate has changed in recent years. “After centuries of bitter controversies,” he writes, “the other Churches and Ecclesial Communities are more and more taking a fresh look at this ministry of unity” (§89, cf. §97.2). Indeed, many of their members express the need for such a ministry at the service of the universal Church, and John Paul wishes to contribute personally to an ecumenical dialogue on papal primacy.

The Pope is thus willing to join others in rethinking how his ministry of unity can be more effectively exercised for the good of all Christians. He accepts the challenge that he should try to “find a way of exercising the primacy which, while in no way renouncing what is essential to its mission, is nonetheless open to a new situation” (§95.2). Since he cannot carry out this reassessment alone, he asks leaders and theologians from other churches and ecclesial communities to propose innovative ways in which the Petrine ministry could fulfill its specific charge. John Paul hopes that together they will engage “in a patient and fraternal dialogue on this subject, a dialogue in which, leaving useless controversies behind, we could listen to one another, keeping before us only the will of Christ for his Church” (§96).

Ut Unum Sint

Key Themes

Among the themes interwoven in Ut Unum Sint, three are of particular significance in the Catholic Church's initiatives to restore Christian unity: the ecclesiology of communion, the appreciation expressed for unity in diversity, and the possibility of exercising the Petrine ministry in a different way.

Ut Unum Sint

Ecclesiology of communion

John Paul constantly depicts the relationship of the Catholic Church to other churches and ecclesial communities in terms of “communion.” The Holy Spirit animates the whole Body of Christ: “It is not that beyond the boundaries of the Catholic community there is an ecclesial vacuum” (§13.3). Unfortunately, however, all Christians are “not in full communion” (§§1.2, 21.2, 35). At present, theirs is a communion which is “real although not yet full” (§45.2); it is still “partial” (§14) and “imperfect” (§§84.1, 96). The goal of the ecumenical movement is the reestablishment of full communion: “From this basic but partial unity it is now necessary to advance toward the visible unity which is required and sufficient and which is manifested in a real and concrete way, so that the Churches may truly become a sign of that full communion in the one, holy, catholic and apostolic Church which will be expressed in the common celebration of the Eucharist” (§78.4).

Communion among the baptized entails more than the enjoyment of close ties of horizontal brotherhood. Above all, it is a vertical, spiritual reality: “the communion of Christians is none other than the manifestation in them of the grace by which God makes them sharers in his own communion, which is his eternal life” (§9.2). God wills the visible communion of Christians, “which is both praise of his glory and service of his plan of salvation” (§84.5). In the Pope’s words, “the bonds of fraternal koinonia must be forged before God and in Christ Jesus” (§82.2). These ties of perfect communion already exist as a common heritage among those living in glory. For those still on their earthly pilgrimage, however, this communion is imperfect. Even so, it “is truly and solidly grounded in the full communion of the saints . . . [who] come from all the Churches and Ecclesial Communities which gave them entrance into the communion of salvation” (§84.2).

But God’s will requires that the invisible communion of grace must also be manifested by the visible unity of Christians. This visible communion entails “a unity constituted by the bonds of the profession of faith, the sacraments and hierarchical communion” (§9.2). Each of these bonds sheds light on the conditions necessary for the restoration of full communion among Christians.

First, the unity that Christ wills for his Church “can be attained only by the adherence of all to the content of revealed faith in its entirety. In matters of faith, compromise is a contradiction with God who is Truth” (§18, cf. §70.1). While the Pope accepts the legitimacy of complementary formulations of dogma, he insists that full communion “will have to come about through the acceptance of the whole truth into which the Holy Spirit guides Christ’s disciples” (§36.4).

Christian unity must be “founded on the unity of faith, following in the footsteps and experience of the ancient Church” (§59, cf. §77.1).

Communion in the sacraments is a second bond of unity. Through the one Baptism which they share, all Christians belong to Christ (cf. §§42.1, 42.2, 66.6). The communion signified by this sacrament is oriented to its full expression, which is manifested by Eucharistic communion. While common celebration of the Eucharist is not yet possible, the Pope remarks that “we do have a burning desire to join in celebrating the one Eucharist” (§45.2). Catholics and Orthodox already share the same sacraments, even though they do not yet celebrate a common Eucharist. With the churches and ecclesial communities stemming from the Reformation, which for the most part celebrate only Baptism and the Lord’s Supper, the sacramental bonds are less strong.

Third, visible Christian unity also requires communion in ministry, both among bishops as heads of particular churches, and between them and the Pope. John Paul affirms that full unity demands that every bishop must be in communion with the Successor of Peter: “All the Churches are in full and visible communion, because all the Pastors are in communion with Peter and therefore united in Christ” (§94.1). With the churches of the East, the Catholic Church shares the episcopal ministry rooted in the apostolic succession. But, because their particular churches are not in communion with the Roman See, perfect, visible communion is impaired. With the churches and ecclesial communities of the West, not only is this hierarchical communion wanting, but there is also a lack of agreement about the validity of their ministry.

Unity in diversity

According to John Paul II, “the quest for Christian unity is not a matter of choice or expediency, but a duty which springs from the very nature of the Christian community” (§49.2). The effective pursuit of this goal requires that ecclesial unity be correctly understood. In Ut Unum Sint the Pope explains his understanding of the unity willed by Christ in such a way that it cannot be confused with uniformity. First, he proposes that the unity which existed in the first millennium can serve as a model of restored unity; second, he is convinced that unity in faith is compatible with diversity in expression. Both of his ideas are founded on a fundamental principle of ecumenism: “one must not impose any burden beyond that which is strictly necessary” (§78.5).

Primarily interested in improving ecumenical relations with the East, the Pope appeals to “the unity which, in spite of everything, was experienced in the first millennium and in a certain sense now serves as a kind of model” (§55.1). The Catholic Church, he says, finds inspiration for full communion in the “structures of unity which existed before the separation” (§56.2, cf. §61). Ecclesial structures in both East and West evolved from the same apostolic heritage and, for a millennium, they maintained the pattern established by Christ: the bishops were in communion with the Bishop of Rome. At the same time, as stated in Unitatis Redintegratio, §14, “if disagreements in belief and discipline arose among them, the Roman See acted by common consent as moderator” (§95.2). These ancient structures are “a heritage of experience that guides our common path toward the reestablishment of full communion” (§56.2, cf. §61). For John Paul, “it is to that unity, thus structured, which we must look” (§55.1).

Some ecumenists think that the restoration of visible unity among Christians might entail a stifling sameness. To allay these fears, the Pope states that “the vision of the full communion to be sought is that of unity in legitimate diversity” (§54.2, cf. §57.1). Many local churches have preserved their own manner of living the faith in ways that have aptly inculturated the Gospel. These traditions and disciplines are not divisive, but authentically express the one Church of Christ. John Paul confirms Vatican II’s teaching that “legitimate diversity is in no way opposed to the Church’s unity, but rather enhances her splendor and contributes greatly to the fulfillment of her mission” (§50.3). The Pope, then, does not just tolerate diversity but judges it fruitful for fostering communion, since it encourages “the exchange of gifts between the Churches” (§57.4).

The encyclical applies the same principle of unity in diversity to questions involving the formulation of dogma. Like John XXIII, John Paul II believes that “the distinction between the deposit of faith and the formulation in which it is expressed” is a fundamental principle of ecumenical dialogue (§81.3). Sadly, in the past, “intolerant polemics and controversies have made incompatible assertions out of what was really the result of two different ways of looking at the same reality” (§38.2). However, when Christians engage in frank dialogue today, they “help one another to look at themselves together in the light of the Apostolic Tradition” (§16.2). This joint scrutiny leads them to welcome different formulations of dogma and fosters new ones. Nonetheless, in the Pope’s mind, this common undertaking is not license for “altering the deposit of faith, changing the meaning of dogmas, eliminating essential words from them, accommodating truth to the preferences of a particular age, or suppressing certain articles of the Creed” (§18). Instead, complementary formulations of dogmatic truth prove that the content of the faith can truly speak to all cultures. “The element which determines communion in truth is the meaning of truth,” John Paul writes. “The expression of truth can take different forms” (§19.1).

Ut Unum Sint

The ministry of unity

In Ut Unum Sint, John Paul II's spiritual and theological reflection on the papal ministry is extraordinarily personal. It culminates, as we have seen, in his bold invitation to all Christians, including himself, to take a fresh look at how the Petrine ministry is exercised. This endeavor, he writes, is "an immense task which we cannot refuse and which I cannot carry out by myself" (§96). While the Pope believes that his office is a divine gift for building up the Church, he recognizes that it has also been an obstacle to the full, visible communion of Christians. To escape this dilemma, John Paul offers some suggestions for ways in which the ministry of unity could be carried out in the future.

The Pope reaffirms that, among the Apostles, Jesus entrusted Peter with a "special mission in the Church" (§4.1). The place assigned to Peter "is based on the words of Christ himself, as they are recorded in the Gospel traditions" (§90.2). Petrine primacy is, therefore, divinely instituted.

By God's design, the ministry of Peter "must continue in the Church so that under her sole Head, who is Jesus Christ, she may be visibly present in the world as the communion of all his disciples" (§97.1). God wills that there should always be a Successor of Peter; and that Successor is now the Bishop of Rome, "the heir to the mission of Peter in the Church" (§92.2). Therefore, the papal office "corresponds to the will of Christ" (§95.1); it is an "essential good" of the Church (§88). According to Ut Unum Sint, the communion of all bishops with the Bishop of Rome belongs to God's plan and is "an essential requisite of full and visible communion" (§97.1). Obedience to the divine will requires that all Christians recognize the ministry of unity discharged by the Pope.

Throughout the encyclical, John Paul constantly refers to himself as "the Bishop of Rome," a significant detail, especially considering the East's understanding that the Petrine ministry is essentially an episcopal responsibility. Moreover, he emphasizes the fittingness of Peter's Successor being "the Bishop of the Church which preserves the mark of the martyrdom of Peter and of Paul" (§90.1). The Petrine office is thus historically and spiritually linked to the Roman See, "which has been made fruitful by the blood of the Princes of the Apostles" (§92.1) – Peter and Paul. Paul is therefore intimately associated with the origin of the ministry of unity held by the Bishop of Rome (cf. §§90.1, 91.2). Furthermore, John Paul stresses that the weakness of both Peter and Paul "shows that the Church is founded upon the infinite power of grace" (§91.2). This Pauline accent points out that the ministry of the Bishop of Rome is necessarily collegial and is exercised from within a particular church.

In keeping with the ecclesiological tone of the encyclical, the Pope chooses to describe the relationship of the Bishop of Rome with other bishops in terms of “communion” rather than “collegiality.” Indeed, his ministry is to “ensure the communion of all the Churches” (§94.2, cf. §§24, 94.1). With his eye on the structures of unity in the first millennium, John Paul holds that “the mission of the Bishop of Rome [is] within the College of all the Pastors” (§94.1). Moreover, he insists that the Catholic Church “does not separate this office [of the Bishop of Rome] from the mission entrusted to the whole body of Bishops” (§95.1). To make his point even more forcefully, John Paul affirms that the ministry of unity must “always” be carried out “in communion” (§95.1).

The Pope’s specific ministry to ecclesial communion is to be “the first servant of unity” (§94.2). Peter’s Successor is “the visible sign and guarantor of unity” (§88) within the College of Bishops and thus for the whole Church, including the churches and ecclesial communities lacking full communion with the Roman See. In John Paul’s words, “whatever relates to the unity of all Christian communities clearly forms part of the concerns of the primacy” (§95.2).

While refraining from presenting the whole of Catholic teaching on the papacy as it was defined at the First Vatican Council (1870), John Paul II nonetheless offers some thoughts on papal jurisdiction and teaching authority.

As a matter of fact, the Pope never uses the term “jurisdiction” to describe the authority of his office. Instead, he stresses that his ministry as the “servant of the servants of God” is a gift of God’s mercy. The purpose of its service is not that of “exercising power over the people” (§94.1), but of ensuring the communion of all the churches. For John Paul, “the authority proper to this ministry is completely at the service of God’s merciful plan and it must always be seen in this perspective” (§92.2). Among his duties – those which Vatican I assigned to the Pope’s full, supreme, ordinary, immediate, episcopal, and universal jurisdiction – John Paul mentions “vigilance over the handing down of the Word, the celebration of the liturgy and the sacraments, the Church’s mission, discipline and the Christian life” (§94.2). Because of his responsibility to the common good of the Church, the Bishop of Rome also has the task of cautioning and admonishing other bishops and the faithful at large.

In order to explain the Pope’s teaching role, John Paul invokes Peter as a model. Peter is the “spokesman of the Apostolic College” (§90.2, cf. §55.1) and “the one who speaks in the name of the apostolic group” (§97.1). Similarly, the Successor of Peter must teach “in the name of all the Pastors in communion with him” (§94.2). The Pope has the duty of “keeping watch (episkopein), like a sentinel, so that, through the efforts of the Pastors, the true voice of Christ the Shepherd may be heard in all the particular Churches” (§94.1). The encyclical also mentions that the Pope can bear witness to truth, under the conditions laid down at Vatican I, by declaring “ex cathedra that a certain doctrine belongs to the deposit of faith” (§94.2).

Ut Unum Sint not only recounts the remarkable progress made toward Christian unity since the Second Vatican Council but also gives ecumenism a fresh impetus. At the dawn of the new millennium, Pope John Paul II invites all Christians to renew their commitment of striving for the unity for which Christ prayed. The Pope is convinced that the grace of full communion will be obtained through prayer and docility to the Holy Spirit who is guiding the ecumenical journey. “And should we ask if all this is possible, the answer will always be yes. It is the same answer which Mary of Nazareth heard: with God nothing is impossible” (§102.5).

ENCYCLICAL LETTER

OF THE HOLY FATHER
JOHN PAUL II

ON COMMITMENT TO ECUMENISM

Ut Unum Sint

Ut Unum Sint

Introduction

1.1 “Ut unum sint!” The call for Christian unity made by the Second Vatican Ecumenical Council with such impassioned commitment is finding an ever greater echo in the hearts of believers, especially as the year 2000 approaches, a year which Christians will celebrate as a sacred Jubilee, the commemoration of the Incarnation of the Son of God, who became man in order to save humanity.

1.2 The courageous witness of so many martyrs of our century, including members of Churches and Ecclesial Communities not in full communion with the Catholic Church, gives new vigor to the Council’s call and reminds us of our duty to listen to and put into practice its exhortation. These brothers and sisters of ours, united in the selfless offering of their lives for the Kingdom of God, are the most powerful proof that every factor of division can be transcended and overcome in the total gift of self for the sake of the Gospel.

1.3 Christ calls all his disciples to unity. My earnest desire is to renew this call today, to propose it once more with determination, repeating what I said at the Roman Colosseum on Good Friday 1994, at the end of the meditation on the Via Crucis prepared by my Venerable Brother Bartholomew, the Ecumenical Patriarch of Constantinople. There I stated that believers in Christ, united in following in the footsteps of the martyrs, cannot remain divided. If they wish truly and effectively to oppose the world’s tendency to reduce to powerlessness the mystery of Redemption, they must profess together the same truth about the Cross.<sup>1</sup> The Cross! An anti-Christian outlook seeks to minimize the Cross, to empty it of its meaning, and to deny that in it man has the source of his new life. It claims that the Cross is unable to provide either vision or hope. Man, it says, is nothing but an earthly being, who must live as if God did not exist.

2.1 No one is unaware of the challenge which all this poses to believers. They cannot fail to meet this challenge. Indeed, how could they refuse to do everything possible, with God’s help, to break down the walls of division and distrust, to overcome obstacles and prejudices which thwart the proclamation of the Gospel of salvation in the Cross of Jesus, the one Redeemer of man, of every individual?

2.2 I thank the Lord that he has led us to make progress along the path of unity and communion between Christians, a path difficult but so full of joy. Interconfessional dialogues at the theological level have produced positive and tangible results: this encourages us to move forward.

2.3 Nevertheless, besides the doctrinal differences needing to be resolved, Christians cannot underestimate the burden of long-standing misgivings inherited from the past, and of mutual misunderstandings and prejudices. Complacency, indifference and insufficient knowledge of one another often make this situation worse. Consequently, the commitment to ecumenism must be based upon the conversion of hearts and upon prayer, which will also lead to the necessary purification of past memories. With the grace of the Holy Spirit, the Lord's disciples, inspired by love, by the power of the truth and by a sincere desire for mutual forgiveness and reconciliation, are called to reexamine together their painful past and the hurt which that past regrettably continues to provoke even today. All together, they are invited by the ever fresh power of the Gospel to acknowledge with sincere and total objectivity the mistakes made and the contingent factors at work at the origins of their deplorable divisions. What is needed is a calm, clear-sighted and truthful vision of things, a vision enlivened by divine mercy and capable of freeing people's minds and of inspiring in everyone a renewed willingness, precisely with a view to proclaiming the Gospel to the men and women of every people and nation.

3.1 At the Second Vatican Council, the Catholic Church committed herself irrevocably to following the path of the ecumenical venture, thus heeding the Spirit of the Lord, who teaches people to interpret carefully the "signs of the times." The experiences of these years have made the Church even more profoundly aware of her identity and her mission in history. The Catholic Church acknowledges and confesses the weaknesses of her members, conscious that their sins are so many betrayals of and obstacles to the accomplishment of the Savior's plan. Because she feels herself constantly called to be renewed in the spirit of the Gospel, she does not cease to do penance. At the same time, she acknowledges and exalts still more the power of the Lord, who fills her with the gift of holiness, leads her forward, and conforms her to his Passion and Resurrection.

3.2 Taught by the events of her history, the Church is committed to freeing herself from every purely human support, in order to live in depth the Gospel law of the Beatitudes. Conscious that the truth does not impose itself except "by virtue of its own truth, as it makes its entrance into the mind at once quietly and with power,"<sup>2</sup> she seeks nothing for herself but the freedom to proclaim the Gospel. Indeed, her authority is exercised in the service of truth and charity.

3.3 I myself intend to promote every suitable initiative aimed at making the witness of the entire Catholic community understood in its full purity and consistency, especially considering the engagement which awaits the Church at the threshold of the new millennium. That will be an exceptional occasion, in view of which she asks the Lord to increase the unity of all Christians until they reach full communion.<sup>3</sup> The present Encyclical Letter is meant as a contribution to this most noble goal. Essentially pastoral in character, it seeks to encourage the efforts of all who work for the cause of unity.

4.1 This is a specific duty of the Bishop of Rome as the Successor of the Apostle Peter. I carry out this duty with the profound conviction that I am obeying the Lord, and with a clear sense of my own human frailty. Indeed, if Christ himself gave Peter this special mission in the Church and exhorted him to strengthen his brethren, he also made clear to him his human weakness and his special need of conversion: “And when you have turned again, strengthen your brethren” (Lk 22:32). It is precisely in Peter’s human weakness that it becomes fully clear that the Pope, in order to carry out this special ministry in the Church, depends totally on the Lord’s grace and prayer: “I have prayed for you that your faith may not fail” (Lk 22:32). The conversion of Peter and that of his Successors is upheld by the very prayer of the Redeemer, and the Church constantly makes this petition her own. In our ecumenical age, marked by the Second Vatican Council, the mission of the Bishop of Rome is particularly directed to recalling the need for full communion among Christ’s disciples.

4.2 The Bishop of Rome himself must fervently make his own Christ’s prayer for that conversion which is indispensable for “Peter” to be able to serve his brethren. I earnestly invite the faithful of the Catholic Church and all Christians to share in this prayer. May all join me in praying for this conversion!

4.3 We know that during her earthly pilgrimage the Church has suffered and will continue to suffer opposition and persecution. But the hope which sustains her is unshakable, just as the joy which flows from this hope is indestructible. In effect, the firm and enduring rock upon which she is founded is Jesus Christ, her Lord.

Ut Unum Sint

God's plan and communion

5.1 Together with all Christ's disciples, the Catholic Church bases upon God's plan her ecumenical commitment to gather all Christians into unity. Indeed, "the Church is not a reality closed in on herself. Rather, she is permanently open to missionary and ecumenical endeavor, for she is sent to the world to announce and witness, to make present and spread the mystery of communion which is essential to her, and to gather all people and all things into Christ, so as to be for all an 'inseparable sacrament of unity.'"<sup>4</sup>

5.2 Already in the Old Testament, the Prophet Ezekiel, referring to the situation of God's People at that time and using the simple sign of two broken sticks which are first divided and then joined together, expressed the divine will to "gather from all sides" the members of his scattered people. "I will be their God, and they shall be my people. Then the nations will know that I the Lord sanctify Israel" (cf. 37:16-28). The Gospel of John, for its part, considering the situation of the People of God at the time it was written, sees in Jesus' death the reason for the unity of God's children: "Jesus would die for the nation, and not for the nation only, but to gather into one the children of God who are scattered abroad" (11:51-52). Indeed, as the Letter to the Ephesians explains, Jesus "broke down the dividing wall of hostility . . . through the Cross, thereby bringing the hostility to an end"; in place of what was divided he brought about unity (cf. 2:14-16).

6 The unity of all divided humanity is the will of God. For this reason he sent his Son, so that by dying and rising for us he might bestow on us the Spirit of love. On the eve of his sacrifice on the Cross, Jesus himself prayed to the Father for his disciples and for all those who believe in him, that they might be one, a living communion. This is the basis not only of the duty, but also of the responsibility before God and his plan, which falls to those who through Baptism become members of the Body of Christ, a Body in which the fullness of reconciliation and communion must be made present. How is it possible to remain divided, if we have been "buried" through Baptism in the Lord's death, in the very act by which God, through the death of his Son, has broken down the walls of division? Division "openly contradicts the will of Christ, provides a stumbling block to the world, and inflicts damage on the most holy cause of proclaiming the Good News to every creature."<sup>5</sup>

The way of ecumenism: the way of the Church

7 “The Lord of the ages wisely and patiently follows out the plan of his grace on behalf of us sinners. In recent times he has begun to bestow more generously upon divided Christians remorse over their divisions and a longing for unity. Everywhere, large numbers have felt the impulse of this grace, and among our separated brethren also there increases from day to day a movement, fostered by the grace of the Holy Spirit, for the restoration of unity among all Christians. Taking part in this movement, which is called ecumenical, are those who invoke the Triune God and confess Jesus as Lord and Savior. They join in not merely as individuals but also as members of the corporate groups in which they have heard the Gospel, and which each regards as his Church and, indeed, God’s. And yet almost everyone, though in different ways, longs that there may be one visible Church of God, a Church truly universal and sent forth to the whole world that the world may be converted to the Gospel and so be saved, to the glory of God.”6

8.1 This statement of the Decree Unitatis Redintegratio is to be read in the context of the complete teaching of the Second Vatican Council. The Council expresses the Church’s decision to take up the ecumenical task of working for Christian unity and to propose it with conviction and vigor: “This sacred Synod exhorts all the Catholic faithful to recognize the signs of the times and to participate actively in the work of ecumenism.”7

8.2 In indicating the Catholic principles of ecumenism, the Decree Unitatis Redintegratio recalls above all the teaching on the Church set forth in the Dogmatic Constitution Lumen Gentium in its chapter on the People of God.8 At the same time, it takes into account everything affirmed in the Council’s Declaration on Religious Freedom Dignitatis Humanae.9

8.3 The Catholic Church embraces with hope the commitment to ecumenism as a duty of the Christian conscience enlightened by faith and guided by love. Here too we can apply the words of Saint Paul to the first Christians of Rome: “God’s love has been poured into our hearts through the Holy Spirit”; thus our “hope does not disappoint us” (Rom 5:5). This is the hope of Christian unity, which has its divine source in the Trinitarian unity of the Father, the Son and the Holy Spirit.

9.1 Jesus himself, at the hour of his Passion, prayed “that they may all be one” (Jn 17:21). This unity, which the Lord has bestowed on his Church and in which he wishes to embrace all people, is not something added on, but stands at the very heart of Christ’s mission. Nor is it some secondary attribute of the community of his disciples. Rather, it belongs to the very essence of this community. God wills the Church, because he wills unity, and unity is an expression of the whole depth of his agape.

9.2 In effect, this unity bestowed by the Holy Spirit does not merely consist in the gathering of people as a collection of individuals. It is a unity constituted by the bonds of the profession of faith, the sacraments and hierarchical communion.<sup>10</sup> The faithful are one because, in the Spirit, they are in communion with the Son and, in him, share in his communion with the Father: “Our fellowship is with the Father and with his Son Jesus Christ” (1 Jn 1:3). For the Catholic Church, then, the communion of Christians is none other than the manifestation in them of the grace by which God makes them sharers in his own communion, which is his eternal life. Christ’s words “that they may be one” are thus his prayer to the Father that the Father’s plan may be fully accomplished, in such a way that everyone may clearly see “what is the plan of the mystery hidden for ages in God who created all things” (Eph 3:9). To believe in Christ means to desire unity; to desire unity means to desire the Church; to desire the Church means to desire the communion of grace which corresponds to the Father’s plan from all eternity. Such is the meaning of Christ’s prayer: “Ut unum sint.”

10.1 In the present situation of the lack of unity among Christians and of the confident quest for full communion, the Catholic faithful are conscious of being deeply challenged by the Lord of the Church. The Second Vatican Council strengthened their commitment with a clear ecclesiological vision, open to all the ecclesial values present among other Christians. The Catholic faithful face the ecumenical question in a spirit of faith.

10.2 The Council states that the Church of Christ “subsists in the Catholic Church, which is governed by the Successor of Peter and by the Bishops in communion with him,” and at the same time acknowledges that “many elements of sanctification and of truth can be found outside her visible structure. These elements, however, as gifts properly belonging to the Church of Christ, possess an inner dynamism toward Catholic unity.”<sup>11</sup>

10.3 “It follows that these separated Churches and Communities, though we believe that they suffer from defects, have by no means been deprived of significance and value in the mystery of salvation. For the Spirit of Christ has not refrained from using them as means of salvation which derive their efficacy from the very fullness of grace and truth entrusted to the Catholic Church.”<sup>12</sup>

11.1 The Catholic Church thus affirms that during the two thousand years of her history she has been preserved in unity, with all the means with which God wishes to endow his Church, and this despite the often grave crises which have shaken her, the infidelity of some of her ministers, and the faults into which her members daily fall. The Catholic Church knows that, by virtue of the strength which comes to her from the Spirit, the weaknesses, mediocrity, sins and at times the betrayals of some of her children cannot destroy what God has bestowed on her as part of his plan of grace. Moreover, “the powers of death shall not prevail against it” (Mt 16:18). Even so, the Catholic Church does not forget that many among her members cause God’s plan to be discernible only with difficulty. Speaking of the lack of unity among Christians, the Decree on Ecumenism does not ignore the fact that “people of both sides were to blame,”<sup>13</sup> and acknowledges that responsibility cannot be attributed only to the “other side.” By God’s grace, however, neither what belongs to the structure of the Church of Christ nor that communion which still exists with the other Churches and Ecclesial Communities has been destroyed.

11.2 Indeed, the elements of sanctification and truth present in the other Christian Communities, in a degree which varies from one to the other, constitute the objective basis of the communion, albeit imperfect, which exists between them and the Catholic Church.

11.3 To the extent that these elements are found in other Christian Communities, the one Church of Christ is effectively present in them. For this reason the Second Vatican Council speaks of a certain, though imperfect communion. The Dogmatic Constitution Lumen Gentium stresses that the Catholic Church “recognizes that in many ways she is linked”<sup>14</sup> with these Communities by a true union in the Holy Spirit.

12.1 The same Dogmatic Constitution listed at length “the elements of sanctification and truth” which in various ways are present and operative beyond the visible boundaries of the Catholic Church: “For there are many who honor Sacred Scripture, taking it as a norm of belief and of action, and who show a true religious zeal. They lovingly believe in God the Father Almighty and in Christ, Son of God and Savior. They are consecrated by Baptism, through which they are united with Christ. They also recognize and receive other sacraments within their own Churches or Ecclesial Communities. Many of them rejoice in the episcopate, celebrate the Holy Eucharist, and cultivate devotion toward the Virgin Mother of God. They also share with us in prayer and other spiritual benefits. Likewise, we can say that in some real way they are joined with us in the Holy Spirit, for to them also he gives his gifts and graces, and is thereby operative among them with his sanctifying power. Some indeed he has strengthened to the extent of the shedding of their blood. In all of Christ’s disciples the Spirit arouses the desire to be peacefully united, in the manner determined by Christ, as one flock under one shepherd.”<sup>15</sup>

12.2 The Council's Decree on Ecumenism, referring to the Orthodox Churches, went so far as to declare that "through the celebration of the Eucharist of the Lord in each of these Churches, the Church of God is built up and grows in stature."<sup>16</sup> Truth demands that all this be recognized.

13.1 The same Document carefully draws out the doctrinal implications of this situation. Speaking of the members of these Communities, it declares: "All those justified by faith through Baptism are incorporated into Christ. They therefore have a right to be honored by the title of Christian, and are properly regarded as brothers and sisters in the Lord by the sons and daughters of the Catholic Church."<sup>17</sup>

13.2 With reference to the many positive elements present in the other Churches and Ecclesial Communities, the Decree adds: "All of these, which come from Christ and lead back to him, belong by right to the one Church of Christ. The separated brethren also carry out many of the sacred actions of the Christian religion. Undoubtedly, in many ways that vary according to the condition of each Church or community, these actions can truly engender a life of grace and can be rightly described as capable of providing access to the community of salvation."<sup>18</sup>

13.3 These are extremely important texts for ecumenism. It is not that beyond the boundaries of the Catholic community there is an ecclesial vacuum. Many elements of great value (eximia), which in the Catholic Church are part of the fullness of the means of salvation and of the gifts of grace which make up the Church, are also found in the other Christian Communities.

14 All these elements bear within themselves a tendency toward unity, having their fullness in that unity. It is not a matter of adding together all the riches scattered throughout the various Christian Communities in order to arrive at a Church which God has in mind for the future. In accordance with the great Tradition, attested to by the Fathers of the East and of the West, the Catholic Church believes that in the Pentecost event God has already manifested the Church in her eschatological reality, which he had prepared "from the time of Abel, the just one."<sup>19</sup> This reality is something already given. Consequently we are even now in the last times. The elements of this already-given Church exist, found in their fullness in the Catholic Church and, without this fullness, in the other Communities,<sup>20</sup> where certain features of the Christian mystery have at times been more effectively emphasized. Ecumenism is directed precisely to making the partial communion existing between Christians grow toward full communion in truth and charity.

Renewal and conversion

15.1 Passing from principles, from the obligations of the Christian conscience, to the actual practice of the ecumenical journey toward unity, the Second Vatican Council emphasizes above all the need for interior conversion. The messianic proclamation that “the time is fulfilled, and the Kingdom of God is at hand,” and the subsequent call to “repent, and believe in the Gospel” (Mk 1:15) with which Jesus begins his mission, indicate the essential element of every new beginning: the fundamental need for evangelization at every stage of the Church’s journey of salvation. This is true in a special way of the process begun by the Second Vatican Council, when it indicated as a dimension of renewal the ecumenical task of uniting divided Christians. “There can be no ecumenism worthy of the name without a change of heart.”<sup>21</sup>

15.2 The Council calls for personal conversion as well as for communal conversion. The desire of every Christian Community for unity goes hand in hand with its fidelity to the Gospel. In the case of individuals who live their Christian vocation, the Council speaks of interior conversion, of a renewal of mind.<sup>22</sup>

15.3 Each one therefore ought to be more radically converted to the Gospel and, without ever losing sight of God’s plan, change his or her way of looking at things. Thanks to ecumenism, our contemplation of “the mighty works of God” (mirabilia Dei) has been enriched by new horizons, for which the Triune God calls us to give thanks: the knowledge that the Spirit is at work in other Christian Communities, the discovery of examples of holiness, the experience of the immense riches present in the communion of saints, and contact with unexpected dimensions of Christian commitment. In a corresponding way, there is an increased sense of the need for repentance: an awareness of certain exclusions which seriously harm fraternal charity, of certain refusals to forgive, of a certain pride, of an unevangelical insistence on condemning the “other side,” of a disdain born of an unhealthy presumption. Thus, the entire life of Christians is marked by a concern for ecumenism; and they are called to let themselves be shaped, as it were, by that concern.

16.1 In the teaching of the Second Vatican Council there is a clear connection between renewal, conversion and reform. The Council states that “Christ summons the Church, as she goes her pilgrim way, to that continual reformation of which she always has need, insofar as she is an institution of human beings here on earth. Therefore, if the influence of events or of the times has led to deficiencies . . . these should be appropriately rectified at the proper moment.”<sup>23</sup> No Christian Community can exempt itself from this call.

16.2 By engaging in frank dialogue, Communities help one another to look at themselves together in the light of the Apostolic Tradition. This leads them to ask themselves whether they truly express in an adequate way all that the Holy Spirit has transmitted through the Apostles.<sup>24</sup> With regard to the Catholic Church, I have frequently recalled these obligations and perspectives, as for example on the anniversary of the Baptism of Kievan Rus'<sup>25</sup> or in commemorating the eleven hundred years since the evangelizing activity of Saints Cyril and Methodius.<sup>26</sup> More recently, the Directory for the Application of Principles and Norms on Ecumenism, issued with my approval by the Pontifical Council for Promoting Christian Unity, has applied them to the pastoral sphere.<sup>27</sup>

17.1 With regard to other Christians, the principal documents of the Commission on Faith and Order<sup>28</sup> and the statements of numerous bilateral dialogues have already provided Christian Communities with useful tools for discerning what is necessary to the ecumenical movement and to the conversion which it must inspire. These studies are important from two points of view: they demonstrate the remarkable progress already made, and they are a source of hope inasmuch as they represent a sure foundation for further study.

17.2 The increase of fellowship in a reform which is continuous and carried out in the light of the Apostolic Tradition is certainly, in the present circumstances of Christians, one of the distinctive and most important aspects of ecumenism. Moreover, it is an essential guarantee for its future. The faithful of the Catholic Church cannot forget that the ecumenical thrust of the Second Vatican Council is one consequence of all that the Church at that time committed herself to doing in order to reexamine herself in the light of the Gospel and the great Tradition. My Predecessor, Pope John XXIII, understood this clearly: in calling the Council, he refused to separate renewal from ecumenical openness.<sup>29</sup> At the conclusion of the Council, Pope Paul VI solemnly sealed the Council's commitment to ecumenism, renewing the dialogue of charity with the Churches in communion with the Patriarch of Constantinople, and joining the Patriarch in the concrete and profoundly significant gesture which "condemned to oblivion" and "removed from memory and from the midst of the Church" the excommunications of the past. It is worth recalling that the establishment of a special body for ecumenical matters coincided with the launching of preparations for the Second Vatican Council<sup>30</sup> and that through this body the opinions and judgments of the other Christian Communities played a part in the great debates about revelation, the Church, the nature of ecumenism and religious freedom.

The fundamental importance of doctrine

18 Taking up an idea expressed by Pope John XXIII at the opening of the Council,<sup>31</sup> the Decree on Ecumenism mentions the way of formulating doctrine as one of the elements of a continuing reform.<sup>32</sup> Here it is not a question of altering the deposit of faith, changing the meaning of dogmas, eliminating essential words from them, accommodating truth to the preferences of a particular age, or suppressing certain articles of the Creed under the false pretext that they are no longer understood today. The unity willed by God can be attained only by the adherence of all to the content of revealed faith in its entirety. In matters of faith, compromise is in contradiction with God, who is Truth. In the Body of Christ, “the way, and the truth, and the life” (Jn 14:6), who could consider legitimate a reconciliation brought about at the expense of the truth? The Council’s Declaration on Religious Freedom Dignitatis Humanae attributes to human dignity the quest for truth, “especially in what concerns God and his Church,”<sup>33</sup> and adherence to truth’s demands. A “being together” which betrayed the truth would thus be opposed both to the nature of God, who offers his communion, and to the need for truth found in the depths of every human heart.

19.1 Even so, doctrine needs to be presented in a way that makes it understandable to those for whom God himself intends it. In my Encyclical Epistle Slavorum Apostoli, I recalled that this was the very reason why Saints Cyril and Methodius labored to translate the ideas of the Bible and the concepts of Greek theology in the context of very different historical experiences and ways of thinking. They wanted the one word of God to be “made accessible in each civilization’s own forms of expression.”<sup>34</sup> They recognized that they could not therefore “impose on the peoples assigned to their preaching either the undeniable superiority of the Greek language and Byzantine culture, or the customs and way of life of the more advanced society in which they had grown up.”<sup>35</sup> Thus they put into practice that “perfect communion in love which preserves the Church from all forms of particularism, ethnic exclusivism or racial prejudice, and from any nationalistic arrogance.”<sup>36</sup> In the same spirit, I did not hesitate to say to the Aboriginal Peoples of Australia: “You do not have to be divided into two parts. . . . Jesus calls you to accept his words and his values into your own culture.”<sup>37</sup> Because by its nature the content of faith is meant for all humanity, it must be translated into all cultures. Indeed, the element which determines communion in truth is the meaning of truth. The expression of truth can take different forms. The renewal of these forms of expression becomes necessary for the sake of transmitting to the people of today the Gospel message in its unchanging meaning.<sup>38</sup>

19.2 “This renewal therefore has notable ecumenical significance.”<sup>39</sup> And not only renewal in which the faith is expressed, but also of the very life of faith. It might therefore be asked: who is responsible for doing this? To this question the Council replies clearly: “Concern for restoring unity pertains to the whole Church, faithful and clergy alike. It extends to everyone, according to the ability of each, whether it be exercised in daily Christian living or in theological and historical studies.”<sup>40</sup>

20.1 All this is extremely important and of fundamental significance for ecumenical activity. Thus it is absolutely clear that ecumenism, the movement promoting Christian unity, is not just some sort of “appendix” which is added to the Church’s traditional activity. Rather, ecumenism is an organic part of her life and work, and consequently must pervade all that she is and does; it must be like the fruit borne by a healthy and flourishing tree which grows to its full stature.

20.2 This is what Pope John XXIII believed about the unity of the Church and how he saw full Christian unity. With regard to other Christians, to the great Christian family, he observed: “What unites us is much greater than what divides us.” The Second Vatican Council for its part exhorts “all Christ’s faithful to remember that the more purely they strive to live according to the Gospel, the more they are fostering and even practicing Christian unity. For they can achieve depth and ease in strengthening mutual brotherhood to the degree that they enjoy profound communion with the Father, the Word, and the Holy Spirit.”<sup>41</sup>

The primacy of prayer

21.1 “This change of heart and holiness of life, along with public and private prayer for the unity of Christians, should be regarded as the soul of the whole ecumenical movement, and can rightly be called ‘spiritual ecumenism.’ ”<sup>42</sup>

21.2 We proceed along the road leading to the conversion of hearts guided by love which is directed to God and, at the same time, to all our brothers and sisters, including those not in full communion with us. Love gives rise to the desire for unity, even in those who have never been aware of the need for it. Love builds communion between individuals and between Communities. If we love one another, we strive to deepen our communion and make it perfect. Love is given to God as the perfect source of communion – the unity of Father, Son and Holy Spirit – that we may draw from that source the strength to build communion between individuals and Communities or to reestablish it between Christians still divided. Love is the great undercurrent which gives life and adds vigor to the movement toward unity.

21.3 This love finds its most complete expression in common prayer. When brothers and sisters who are not in perfect communion with one another come together to pray, the Second Vatican Council defines their prayer as the soul of the whole ecumenical movement. This prayer is “a very effective means of petitioning for the grace of unity,” “a genuine expression of the ties which even now bind Catholics to their separated brethren.”<sup>43</sup> Even when prayer is not specifically offered for Christian unity, but for other intentions such as peace, it actually becomes an expression and confirmation of unity. The common prayer of Christians is an invitation to Christ himself to visit the community of those who call upon him: “Where two or three are gathered in my name, there am I in the midst of them” (Mt 18:20).

22.1 When Christians pray together, the goal of unity seems closer. The long history of Christians marked by many divisions seems to converge once more because it tends toward that source of its unity which is Jesus Christ. He “is the same yesterday, today and forever!” (Heb 13:8). In the fellowship of prayer Christ is truly present; he prays “in us,” “with us” and “for us.” It is he who leads our prayer in the Spirit-Consoler whom he promised and then bestowed on his Church in the Upper Room in Jerusalem, when he established her in her original unity.

22.2 Along the ecumenical path to unity, pride of place certainly belongs to common prayer; the prayerful union of those who gather together around Christ himself. If Christians, despite their divisions, can grow ever more united in common prayer around Christ, they will grow in the awareness of how little divides them in comparison to what unites them. If they meet more often and more regularly before Christ in prayer, they will be able to gain the courage to face all the painful human reality of their divisions, and they will find themselves together once more in that community of the Church which Christ constantly builds up in the Holy Spirit, in spite of all weaknesses and human limitations.

23.1 Finally, fellowship in prayer leads people to look at the Church and Christianity in a new way. It must not be forgotten in fact that the Lord prayed to the Father that his disciples might be one, so that their unity might bear witness to his mission and the world would believe that the Father had sent him (cf. Jn 17:21). It can be said that the ecumenical movement in a certain sense was born out of the negative experience of each one of those who, in proclaiming the one Gospel, appealed to his own Church or Ecclesial Community. This was a contradiction which could not escape those who listened to the message of salvation and found in this fact an obstacle to acceptance of the Gospel. Regrettably, this grave obstacle has not been overcome. It is true that we are not yet in full communion. And yet, despite our divisions, we are on the way toward full unity, that unity which marked the Apostolic Church at its birth and which we sincerely seek. Our common prayer, inspired by faith, is proof of this. In that prayer, we gather together in the name of Christ who is One. He is our unity.

23.2 “Ecumenical” prayer is at the service of the Christian mission and its credibility. It must thus be especially present in the life of the Church and in every activity aimed at fostering Christian unity. It is as if we constantly need to go back and meet in the Upper Room of Holy Thursday, even though our presence together in that place will not be perfect until the obstacles to full ecclesial communion are overcome and all Christians can gather together in the common celebration of the Eucharist.44

24 It is a source of joy to see that the many ecumenical meetings almost always include and indeed culminate in prayer. The Week of Prayer for Christian Unity, celebrated in January or, in some countries, around Pentecost, has become a widespread and well established tradition. But there are also many other occasions during the year when Christians are led to pray together. In this context I wish to mention the special experience of the Pope’s pilgrimages to the various Churches in the different continents and countries of the present-day oikoumene. I am very conscious that it was the Second Vatican Council which led the Pope to exercise his apostolic ministry in this particular way. Even more can be said. The Council made these visits of the Pope a specific responsibility in carrying out the role of the Bishop of Rome at the service of communion.45 My visits have almost always included an ecumenical meeting and common prayer with our brothers and sisters who seek unity in Christ and in his Church. With profound emotion I remember praying together with the Primate of the Anglican Communion at Canterbury Cathedral (May 29, 1982); in that magnificent edifice, I saw “an eloquent witness both to our long years of common inheritance and to the sad years of division that followed.”<sup>46</sup> Nor can I forget the meetings held in the Scandinavian and Nordic countries (June 1-10, 1989), in North and South America and in Africa, and at the headquarters of the World Council of Churches (June 12, 1984), the organization committed to calling its member Churches and Ecclesial Communities “to the goal of visible unity in one faith and in one Eucharistic fellowship expressed in worship and in common life in Christ.”<sup>47</sup> And how could I ever forget taking part in the Eucharistic Liturgy in the Church of Saint George at the Ecumenical Patriarchate (November 30, 1979), and the service held in Saint Peter’s Basilica during the visit to Rome of my Venerable Brother, Patriarch Dimitrios I (December 6, 1987)? On that occasion, at the Altar of the Confession, we recited together the Nicene-Constantinopolitan Creed according to its original Greek text. It is hard to describe in a few words the unique nature of each of these occasions of prayer. Given the differing ways in which each of these meetings was conditioned by past events, each had its own special eloquence. They have all become part of the Church’s memory as she is guided by the Paraclete to seek the full unity of all believers in Christ.

25 It is not just the Pope who has become a pilgrim. In recent years, many distinguished leaders of other Churches and Ecclesial Communities have visited me in Rome, and I have been able to join them in prayer, both in public and in private. I have already mentioned the visit of the Ecumenical Patriarch Dimitrios I. I would now like to recall the prayer meeting, also held in Saint Peter’s Basilica, at which I joined the Lutheran Archbishops, the Primates of Sweden and Finland, for the celebration of Vespers on the occasion of the sixth centenary of the canonization of Saint Birgitta (October 5, 1991). This is just one example, because awareness of the duty to pray for unity has become an integral part of the Church’s life. There is no important or significant event which does not benefit from Christians coming together and praying. It is impossible for me to give a complete list of such meetings, even though each one deserves to be mentioned. Truly the Lord has taken us by the hand and is guiding us. These exchanges and these prayers have already written pages and pages of our “Book of unity,” a “Book” which we must constantly return to and reread so as to draw from it new inspiration and hope.

26.1 Prayer, the community at prayer, enables us always to discover anew the evangelical truth of the words: “You have one Father” (Mt 23:9), the Father – Abba – invoked by Christ himself, the only-begotten and consubstantial Son. And again, “You have one teacher, and you are all brethren” (Mt 23:8). “Ecumenical” prayer discloses this fundamental dimension of brotherhood in Christ, who died to gather together the children of God who were scattered, so that in becoming “sons and daughters in the Son” (cf. Eph 1:5) we might show forth more fully both the mysterious reality of God’s fatherhood and the truth about the human nature shared by each and every individual.

26.2 “Ecumenical” prayer, as the prayer of brothers and sisters, expresses all this. Precisely because they are separated from one another, they meet in Christ with all the more hope, entrusting to him the future of their unity and their communion. Here too we can appropriately apply the teaching of the Council: “The Lord Jesus, when he prayed to the Father ‘that all may be one . . . as we are one’ (Jn 17:21-22), opened up vistas closed to human reason. For he implied a certain likeness between the union of the divine persons, and the union of God’s children in truth and charity.”<sup>48</sup>

26.3 The change of heart which is the essential condition for every authentic search for unity flows from prayer and its realization is guided by prayer: “For it is from newness of attitudes, from self-denial and unstinted love, that yearnings for unity take their rise and grow toward maturity. We should therefore pray to the divine Spirit for the grace to be genuinely self-denying, humble, gentle in the service of others, and to have an attitude of brotherly generosity toward them.”<sup>49</sup>

27 Praying for unity is not a matter reserved only to those who actually experience the lack of unity among Christians. In the deep personal dialogue which each of us must carry on with the Lord in prayer, concern for unity cannot be absent. Only in this way, in fact, will that concern fully become part of the reality of our life and of the commitments we have taken on in the Church. It was in order to reaffirm this duty that I set before the faithful of the Catholic Church a model which I consider exemplary, the model of a Trappistine sister, Blessed Maria Gabriella of Unity, whom I beatified on January 25, 1983.<sup>50</sup> Sister Maria Gabriella, called by her vocation to be apart from the world, devoted her life to meditation and prayer centered on chapter 17 of Saint John’s Gospel, and offered her life for Christian unity. This is truly the cornerstone of all prayer: the total and unconditional offering of one’s life to the Father, through the Son, in the Holy Spirit. The example of Sister Maria Gabriella is instructive; it helps us to understand that there are no special times, situations or places of prayer for unity. Christ’s prayer to the Father is offered as a model for everyone, always and everywhere.

<sup>50</sup> Maria Sagheddu was born at Dorgali (Sardinia) in 1914. At twenty-one years of age she entered the Trappistine monastery in Grottaferrata. Through the apostolic labors of Abbé Paul Couturier, she came to understand the need for prayers and spiritual sacrifices for the unity of Christians. In 1936, at the time of an Octave for Unity, she chose to offer her life for the unity of the Church. Following a grave illness, Sister Maria Gabriella died on April 23, 1939.

Ecumenical dialogue

28.1 If prayer is the “soul” of ecumenical renewal and of the yearning for unity, it is the basis and support for everything the Council defines as “dialogue.” This definition is certainly not unrelated to today’s personalist way of thinking. The capacity for “dialogue” is rooted in the nature of the person and his dignity. As seen by philosophy, this approach is linked to the Christian truth concerning man as expressed by the Council: man is in fact “the only creature on earth which God willed for itself”; thus he cannot “fully find himself except through a sincere gift of himself.”<sup>51</sup> Dialogue is an indispensable step along the path toward human self-realization, the self-realization both of each individual and of every human community. Although the concept of “dialogue” might appear to give priority to the cognitive dimension (dia-logos), all dialogue implies a global, existential dimension. It involves the human subject in his or her entirety; dialogue between Communities involves in a particular way the subjectivity of each.

28.2 This truth about dialogue, so profoundly expressed by Pope Paul VI in his Encyclical Ecclesiam Suam,<sup>52</sup> was also taken up by the Council in its teaching and ecumenical activity. Dialogue is not simply an exchange of ideas. In some way it is always an “exchange of gifts.”<sup>53</sup>

29 For this reason, the Council’s Decree on Ecumenism also emphasizes the importance of “every effort to eliminate words, judgments and actions which do not respond to the condition of separated brethren with truth and fairness and so make mutual relations between them more difficult.”<sup>54</sup> The Decree approaches the question from the standpoint of the Catholic Church and refers to the criteria which she must apply in relation to other Christians. In all this, however, reciprocity is required. To follow these criteria is a commitment of each of the parties which desire to enter into dialogue, and it is a precondition for starting such dialogue. It is necessary to pass from antagonism and conflict to a situation where each party recognizes the other as a partner. When undertaking dialogue, each side must presuppose in the other a desire for reconciliation, for unity in truth. For this to happen, any display of mutual opposition must disappear. Only thus will dialogue help to overcome division and lead us closer to unity.

30 It can be said, with a sense of lively gratitude to the Spirit of truth, that the Second Vatican Council was a blessed time, during which the bases for the Catholic Church’s participation in ecumenical dialogue were laid. At the same time, the presence of many observers from various Churches and Ecclesial Communities, their deep involvement in the events of the Council, the many meetings and the common prayer which the Council made possible also helped bring about the conditions for dialogue with one another. During the Council the representatives of other Churches and Ecclesial Communities experienced the readiness of the worldwide Catholic episcopate, and in particular of the Apostolic See, to engage in dialogue.

Local structures of dialogue

31 The Church's commitment to ecumenical dialogue, as it has clearly appeared since the Council, far from being the responsibility of the Apostolic See alone, is also the duty of individual local or particular Churches. Special commissions for fostering the ecumenical spirit and ecumenical activity have been set up by the Bishops' Conferences and the Synods of the Eastern Catholic Churches. Suitable structures similar to these are operating in individual Dioceses. These initiatives are a sign of the widespread practical commitment of the Catholic Church to apply the Council's guidelines on ecumenism: this is an essential aspect of the ecumenical movement.<sup>55</sup> Dialogue has not only been undertaken; it has become an outright necessity, one of the Church's priorities. As a result, the "methods" of dialogue have been improved, which in turn has helped the spirit of dialogue to grow. In this context mention has to be made in the first place of "dialogue between competent experts from different Churches and Communities. In their meetings, which are organized in a religious spirit, each explains the teaching of his Communion in greater depth and brings out clearly its distinctive features."<sup>56</sup> Moreover, it is useful for all the faithful to be familiar with the method which makes dialogue possible.

32.1 As the Council's Declaration on Religious Freedom affirms: "Truth is to be sought after in a manner proper to the dignity of the human person and his social nature. The inquiry is to be free, carried on with the aid of teaching or instruction, communication and dialogue. In the course of these, people explain to one another the truth they have discovered, or think they have discovered, in order thus to assist one another in the quest for truth. Moreover, as the truth is discovered, it is by a personal assent that individuals are to adhere to it."<sup>57</sup>

32.2 Ecumenical dialogue is of essential importance. "Through such dialogue everyone gains a truer knowledge and more just appreciation of the teaching and religious life of both Communions. In addition, these Communions cooperate more closely in whatever projects a Christian conscience demands for the common good. They also come together for common prayer, where that is permitted. Finally, all are led to examine their own faithfulness to Christ's will for the Church and, wherever necessary, undertake with vigor the tasks of renewal and reform."<sup>58</sup>

Dialogue as an examination of conscience

33 In the Council's thinking, ecumenical dialogue is marked by a common quest for truth, particularly concerning the Church. In effect, truth forms consciences and directs efforts to promote unity. At the same time, it demands that the consciences and actions of Christians, as brethren divided from one another, should be inspired by and submissive to Christ's prayer for unity. There is a close relationship between prayer and dialogue. Deeper and more conscious prayer makes dialogue more fruitful. If, on the one hand, dialogue depends on prayer, so, in another sense, prayer also becomes the ever more mature fruit of dialogue.

34 Thanks to ecumenical dialogue we can speak of a greater maturity in our common prayer for one another. This is possible inasmuch as dialogue also serves as an examination of conscience. In this context, how can we fail to recall the words of the First Letter of John? "If we say we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us. If we confess our sins, God is faithful and just, and will forgive our sins and cleanse us from all unrighteousness" (1:8-9). John even goes so far as to state: "If we say that we have not sinned, we make him a liar, and his word is not in us" (1:10). Such a radical exhortation to acknowledge our condition as sinners ought also to mark the spirit which we bring to ecumenical dialogue. If such dialogue does not become an examination of conscience, a kind of "dialogue of consciences," can we count on the assurance which the First Letter of John gives us? "My little children, I am writing this to you so that you may not sin; but if any one does sin, we have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous; and he is the expiation for our sins, and not for ours only but also for the sins of the whole world" (2:1-2). All the sins of the world were gathered up in the saving sacrifice of Christ, including the sins committed against the Church's unity: the sins of Christians, those of the pastors no less than those of the lay faithful. Even after the many sins which have contributed to our historical divisions, Christian unity is possible, provided that we are humbly conscious of having sinned against unity and are convinced of our need for conversion. Not only personal sins must be forgiven and left behind, but also social sins, which is to say the sinful "structures" themselves which have contributed and can still contribute to division and to the reinforcing of division.

35 Here once again the Council proves helpful. It can be said that the entire Decree on Ecumenism is permeated by the spirit of conversion.<sup>59</sup> In the document, ecumenical dialogue takes on a specific characteristic; it becomes a “dialogue of conversion,” and thus, in the words of Pope Paul VI, an authentic “dialogue of salvation.”<sup>60</sup> Dialogue cannot take place merely on a horizontal level, being restricted to meetings, exchanges of points of view or even the sharing of gifts proper to each Community. It has also a primarily vertical thrust, directed toward the One who, as the Redeemer of the world and the Lord of history, is himself our Reconciliation. This vertical aspect of dialogue lies in our acknowledgment, jointly and to each other, that we are men and women who have sinned. It is precisely this acknowledgment which creates in brothers and sisters living in Communities not in full communion with one another that interior space where Christ, the source of the Church’s unity, can effectively act, with all the power of his Spirit, the Paraclete.

Dialogue as a means of resolving disagreements

36.1 Dialogue is also a natural instrument for comparing differing points of view and, above all, for examining those disagreements which hinder full communion between Christians. The Decree on Ecumenism dwells in the first place on a description of the attitudes under which doctrinal discussions should take place: “Catholic theologians engaged in ecumenical dialogue, while standing fast by the teaching of the Church and searching together with separated brothers and sisters into the divine mysteries, should act with love for truth, with charity, and with humility.”<sup>61</sup>

36.2 Love for the truth is the deepest dimension of any authentic quest for full communion between Christians. Without this love it would be impossible to face the objective theological, cultural, psychological and social difficulties which appear when disagreements are examined. This dimension, which is interior and personal, must be inseparably accompanied by a spirit of charity and humility. There must be charity toward one’s partner in dialogue, and humility with regard to the truth which comes to light and which might require a review of assertions and attitudes.

36.3 With regard to the study of areas of disagreement, the Council requires that the whole body of doctrine be clearly presented. At the same time, it asks that the manner and method of expounding the Catholic faith should not be a hindrance to dialogue with our brothers and sisters.<sup>62</sup> Certainly it is possible to profess one’s faith and to explain its teaching in a way that is correct, fair and understandable, and which at the same time takes into account both the way of thinking and the actual historical experiences of the other party.

36.4 Full communion of course will have to come about through the acceptance of the whole truth into which the Holy Spirit guides Christ’s disciples. Hence all forms of reductionism or facile “agreement” must be absolutely avoided. Serious questions must be resolved, for if not, they will reappear at another time, either in the same terms or in a different guise.

37 The Decree Unitatis Redintegratio also indicates a criterion to be followed when Catholics are presenting or comparing doctrines: “They should remember that in Catholic teaching there exists an order or ‘hierarchy’ of truths, since they vary in their relationship to the foundation of the Christian faith. Thus the way will be opened for this kind of fraternal rivalry to incite all to a deeper realization and a clearer expression of the unfathomable riches of Christ.”<sup>63</sup>

38.1 In dialogue, one inevitably comes up against the problem of the different formulations whereby doctrine is expressed in the various Churches and Ecclesial Communities. This has more than one consequence for the work of ecumenism.

38.2 In the first place, with regard to doctrinal formulations which differ from those normally in use in the community to which one belongs, it is certainly right to determine whether the words involved say the same thing. This has been ascertained in the case, for example, of the recent common declarations signed by my Predecessors or by myself with the Patriarchs of Churches with which for centuries there have been disputes about Christology. As far as the formulation of revealed truths is concerned, the Declaration Mysterium Ecclesiae states: “Even though the truths which the Church intends to teach through her dogmatic formulas are distinct from the changeable conceptions of a given epoch and can be expressed without them, nevertheless it can sometimes happen that these truths may be enunciated by the sacred Magisterium in terms that bear traces of such conceptions. In view of this, it must be stated that the dogmatic formulas of the Church’s Magisterium were from the very beginning suitable for communicating revealed truth, and that as they are they remain forever suitable for communicating this truth to those who interpret them correctly.”<sup>64</sup> In this regard, ecumenical dialogue, which prompts the parties involved to question each other, to understand each other and to explain their positions to each other, makes surprising discoveries possible. Intolerant polemics and controversies have made incompatible assertions out of what was really the result of two different ways of looking at the same reality. Nowadays we need to find the formula which, by capturing the reality in its entirety, will enable us to move beyond partial readings and eliminate false interpretations.

38.3 One of the advantages of ecumenism is that it helps Christian Communities to discover the unfathomable riches of the truth. Here too, everything that the Spirit brings about in “others” can serve for the building up of all Communities<sup>65</sup> and in a certain sense instruct them in the mystery of Christ. Authentic ecumenism is a gift at the service of truth.

39 Finally, dialogue puts before the participants real and genuine disagreements in matters of faith. Above all, these disagreements should be faced in a sincere spirit of fraternal charity, of respect for the demands of one’s own conscience and of the conscience of the other party, with profound humility and love for the truth. The examination of such disagreements has two essential points of reference: Sacred Scripture and the great Tradition of the Church. Catholics have the help of the Church’s living Magisterium.

Practical cooperation

40.1 Relations between Christians are not aimed merely at mutual knowledge, common prayer and dialogue. They presuppose and from now on call for every possible form of practical cooperation at all levels: pastoral, cultural and social, as well as that of witnessing to the Gospel message.<sup>66</sup>

40.2 “Cooperation among all Christians vividly expresses that bond which already unites them, and it sets in clearer relief the features of Christ the servant.”<sup>67</sup> This cooperation based on our common faith is not only filled with fraternal communion, but is a manifestation of Christ himself.

40.3 Moreover, ecumenical cooperation is a true school of ecumenism, a dynamic road to unity. Unity of action leads to the full unity of faith: “Through such cooperation, all believers in Christ are able to learn easily how they can understand each other better and esteem each other more, and how the road to the unity of Christians may be made smooth.”<sup>68</sup>

40.4 In the eyes of the world, cooperation among Christians becomes a form of common Christian witness and a means of evangelization which benefits all involved.

Brotherhood rediscovered

41.1 What has been said above about ecumenical dialogue since the end of the Council inspires us to give thanks to the Spirit of Truth promised by Christ the Lord to the Apostles and the Church (cf. Jn 14:26). It is the first time in history that efforts on behalf of Christian unity have taken on such great proportions and have become so extensive. This is truly an immense gift of God, one which deserves all our gratitude. From the fullness of Christ we receive “grace upon grace” (Jn 1:16). An appreciation of how much God has already given is the condition which disposes us to receive those gifts still indispensable for bringing to completion the ecumenical work of unity.

41.2 An overall view of the last thirty years enables us better to appreciate many of the fruits of this common conversion to the Gospel which the Spirit of God has brought about by means of the ecumenical movement.

42.1 It happens for example that, in the spirit of the Sermon on the Mount, Christians of one confession no longer consider other Christians as enemies or strangers but see them as brothers and sisters. Again, the very expression separated brethren tends to be replaced today by expressions which more readily evoke the deep communion – linked to the baptismal character – which the Spirit fosters in spite of historical and canonical divisions. Today we speak of “other Christians,” “others who have received Baptism,” and “Christians of other Communities.” The Directory for the Application of Principles and Norms on Ecumenism refers to the Communities to which these Christians belong as “Churches and Ecclesial Communities that are not in full communion with the Catholic Church.”<sup>69</sup> This broadening of vocabulary is indicative of a significant change in attitudes. There is an increased awareness that we all belong to Christ. I have personally been able many times to observe this during the ecumenical celebrations which are an important part of my apostolic visits to various parts of the world, and also in the meetings and ecumenical celebrations which have taken place in Rome. The “universal brotherhood” of Christians has become a firm ecumenical conviction. Consigning to oblivion the excommunications of the past, Communities which were once rivals are now in many cases helping one another: places of worship are sometimes lent out; scholarships are offered for the training of ministers in the Communities most lacking in resources; approaches are made to civil authorities on behalf of other Christians who are unjustly persecuted; and the slander to which certain groups are subjected is shown to be unfounded.

42.2 In a word, Christians have been converted to a fraternal charity which embraces all Christ’s disciples. If it happens that, as a result of violent political disturbances, a certain aggressiveness or a spirit of vengeance appears, the leaders of the parties in question generally work to make the “New Law” of the spirit of charity prevail. Unfortunately, this spirit has not been able to transform every situation where brutal conflict rages. In such circumstances those committed to ecumenism are often required to make choices which are truly heroic.

42.3 It needs to be reaffirmed in this regard that acknowledging our brotherhood is not the consequence of a large-hearted philanthropy or a vague family spirit. It is rooted in recognition of the oneness of Baptism and the subsequent duty to glorify God in his work. The Directory for the Application of Principles and Norms on Ecumenism expresses the hope that Baptisms will be mutually and officially recognized.<sup>70</sup> This is something much more than an act of ecumenical courtesy; it constitutes a basic ecclesiological statement.

42.4 It is fitting to recall that the fundamental role of Baptism in building up the Church has been clearly brought out thanks also to multilateral dialogues.<sup>71</sup>

Solidarity in the service of humanity

43.1 It happens more and more often that the leaders of Christian Communities join together in taking a stand in the name of Christ on important problems concerning man's calling and on freedom, justice, peace, and the future of the world. In this way they "communicate" in one of the tasks which constitutes the mission of Christians: that of reminding society of God's will in a realistic manner, warning the authorities and their fellow citizens against taking steps which would lead to the trampling of human rights. It is clear, as experience shows, that in some circumstances the united voice of Christians has more impact than any one isolated voice.

43.2 Nor are the leaders of Communities the only ones joined in the work for unity. Many Christians from all Communities, by reason of their faith, are jointly involved in bold projects aimed at changing the world by inculcating respect for the rights and needs of everyone, especially the poor, the lowly and the defenseless. In my Encyclical Letter Sollicitudo Rei Socialis, I was pleased to note this cooperation, stressing that the Catholic Church cannot fail to take part in these efforts.<sup>72</sup> In effect, Christians who once acted independently are now engaged together in the service of this cause, so that God's mercy may triumph.

43.3 This way of thinking and acting is already that of the Gospel. Hence, reaffirming what I wrote in my first Encyclical Letter Redemptor Hominis, I have had occasion "to insist on this point and to encourage every effort made in this direction, at all levels where we meet our other brother Christians."<sup>73</sup> I have thanked God "for what he has already accomplished in the other Churches and Ecclesial Communities and through them," as well as through the Catholic Church.<sup>74</sup> Today I see with satisfaction that the already vast network of ecumenical cooperation is constantly growing. Thanks also to the influence of the World Council of Churches, much is being accomplished in this field.

Approaching one another through the Word of God and through divine worship

44 Significant progress in ecumenical cooperation has also been made in another area, that of the Word of God. I am thinking above all of the importance for the different language groups of ecumenical translations of the Bible. Following the promulgation by the Second Vatican Council of the Constitution Dei Verbum, the Catholic Church could not fail to welcome this development.<sup>75</sup> These translations, prepared by experts, generally offer a solid basis for the prayer and pastoral activity of all Christ's followers. Anyone who recalls how heavily debates about Scripture influenced divisions, especially in the West, can appreciate the significant step forward which these common translations represent.

45.1 Corresponding to the liturgical renewal carried out by the Catholic Church, certain other Ecclesial Communities have made efforts to renew their worship. Some, on the basis of a recommendation expressed at the ecumenical level,<sup>76</sup> have abandoned the custom of celebrating their liturgy of the Lord's Supper only infrequently and have opted for a celebration each Sunday. Again, when the cycles of liturgical readings used by the various Christian Communities in the West are compared, they appear to be essentially the same. Still on the ecumenical level,<sup>77</sup> very special prominence has been given to the liturgy and liturgical signs (images, icons, vestments, light, incense, gestures). Moreover, in schools of theology where future ministers are trained, courses in the history and significance of the liturgy are beginning to be part of the curriculum in response to a newly discovered need.

45.2 These are signs of convergence which regard various aspects of the sacramental life. Certainly, due to disagreements in matters of faith, it is not yet possible to celebrate together the same Eucharistic Liturgy. And yet we do have a burning desire to join in celebrating the one Eucharist of the Lord, and this desire itself is already a common prayer of praise, a single supplication. Together we speak to the Father, and increasingly we do so "with one heart." At times it seems that we are closer to being able finally to seal this "real although not yet full" communion. A century ago who could even have imagined such a thing?

46 In this context, it is a source of joy to note that Catholic ministers are able, in certain particular cases, to administer the Sacraments of the Eucharist, Penance and Anointing of the Sick to Christians who are not in full communion with the Catholic Church but who greatly desire to receive these sacraments, freely request them and manifest the faith which the Catholic Church professes with regard to these sacraments. Conversely, in specific cases and in particular circumstances, Catholics too can request these same sacraments from ministers of Churches in which these sacraments are valid. The conditions for such reciprocal reception have been laid down in specific norms; for the sake of furthering ecumenism these norms must be respected.<sup>78</sup>

Appreciating the endowments present among other Christians

47 Dialogue does not extend exclusively to matters of doctrine but engages the whole person; it is also a dialogue of love. The Council has stated: “Catholics must joyfully acknowledge and esteem the truly Christian endowments from our common heritage which are to be found among our separated brothers and sisters. It is right and salutary to recognize the riches of Christ and virtuous works in the lives of others who are bearing witness to Christ, sometimes even to the shedding of their blood. For God is always wonderful in his works and worthy of admiration.”<sup>79</sup>

48.1 The relationships which the members of the Catholic Church have established with other Christians since the Council have enabled us to discover what God is bringing about in the members of other Churches and Ecclesial Communities. This direct contact, at a variety of levels, with pastors and with the members of these Communities has made us aware of the witness which other Christians bear to God and to Christ. A vast new field has thus opened up for the whole ecumenical experience, which at the same time is the great challenge of our time. Is not the twentieth century a time of great witness, which extends “even to the shedding of blood”? And does not this witness also involve the various Churches and Ecclesial Communities which take their name from Christ, crucified and risen?

48.2 Such a joint witness of holiness, as fidelity to the one Lord, has an ecumenical potential extraordinarily rich in grace. The Second Vatican Council made it clear that elements present among other Christians can contribute to the edification of Catholics: “Nor should we forget that whatever is wrought by the grace of the Holy Spirit in the hearts of our separated brothers and sisters can contribute to our own edification. Whatever is truly Christian never conflicts with the genuine interests of the faith; indeed, it can always result in a more ample realization of the very mystery of Christ and the Church.”<sup>80</sup> Ecumenical dialogue, as a true dialogue of salvation, will certainly encourage this process, which has already begun well, to advance toward true and full communion.

The growth of communion

49.1 A valuable result of the contacts between Christians and of the theological dialogue in which they engage is the growth of communion. Both contacts and dialogue have made Christians aware of the elements of faith which they have in common. This has served to consolidate further their commitment to full unity. In all of this, the Second Vatican Council remains a powerful source of incentive and orientation.

49.2 The Dogmatic Constitution Lumen Gentium links its teaching on the Catholic Church to an acknowledgment of the saving elements found in other Churches and Ecclesial Communities.<sup>81</sup> It is not a matter of becoming aware of static elements passively present in those Churches and Communities. Insofar as they are elements of the Church of Christ, these are by their nature a force for the reestablishment of unity. Consequently, the quest for Christian unity is not a matter of choice or expediency, but a duty which springs from the very nature of the Christian community.

49.3 In a similar way, the bilateral theological dialogues carried on with the major Christian Communities start from a recognition of the degree of communion already present, in order to go on to discuss specific areas of disagreement. The Lord has made it possible for Christians in our day to reduce the number of matters traditionally in dispute.

Dialogue with the Churches of the East

50.1 In this regard, it must first be acknowledged, with particular gratitude to divine Providence, that our bonds with the Churches of the East, weakened in the course of the centuries, were strengthened through the Second Vatican Council. The observers from these Churches present at the Council, together with representatives of the Churches and Ecclesial Communities of the West, stated publicly, at that very solemn moment for the Catholic Church, their common willingness to seek the reestablishment of communion.

50.2 The Council, for its part, considered the Churches of the East with objectivity and deep affection, stressing their ecclesial nature and the real bonds of communion linking them with the Catholic Church. The Decree on Ecumenism points out: “Through the celebration of the Eucharist of the Lord in each of these Churches, the Church of God is built up and grows in stature.” It adds, as a consequence, that “although these Churches are separated from us, they possess true sacraments, above all – by apostolic succession – the priesthood and the Eucharist, whereby they are still joined to us in a very close relationship.”<sup>82</sup>

50.3 Speaking of the Churches of the East, the Council acknowledged their great liturgical and spiritual tradition, the specific nature of their historical development, the disciplines coming from the earliest times and approved by the holy Fathers and Ecumenical Councils, and their own particular way of expressing their teaching. The Council made this acknowledgement in the conviction that legitimate diversity is in no way opposed to the Church’s unity, but rather enhances her splendor and contributes greatly to the fulfillment of her mission.

50.4 The Second Vatican Ecumenical Council wished to base dialogue on the communion which already exists, and it draws attention to the noble reality of the Churches of the East: “Therefore, this sacred Synod urges all, but especially those who plan to devote themselves to the work of restoring the full communion that is desired between the Eastern Churches and the Catholic Church, to give due consideration to these special aspects of the origin and growth of the Churches of the East, and to the character of the relations which obtained between them and the Roman See before the separation, and to form for themselves a correct evaluation of these facts.”<sup>83</sup>

51.1 The Council’s approach has proved fruitful both for the steady maturing of fraternal relations through the dialogue of charity, and for doctrinal discussion in the framework of the Joint International Commission for the Theological Dialogue between the Catholic Church and the Orthodox Church. It has likewise proved most fruitful in relations with the Ancient Churches of the East.

51.2 The process has been slow and arduous, yet a source of great joy; and it has been inspiring, for it has led to the gradual rediscovery of brotherhood.

Resuming contacts

52.1 With regard to the Church of Rome and the Ecumenical Patriarchate of Constantinople, the process which we have just mentioned began thanks to the mutual openness demonstrated by Popes John XXIII and Paul VI, on the one hand, and by the Ecumenical Patriarch Athenagoras I and his successors on the other. The resulting change found its historical expression in the ecclesial act whereby “there was removed from memory and from the midst of the Church”<sup>84</sup> the remembrance of the excommunications which 900 years before, in 1054, had become the symbol of the schism between Rome and Constantinople. That ecclesial event, so filled with ecumenical commitment, took place during the last days of the Council, on December 7, 1965. The Council thus ended with a solemn act which was at once a healing of historical memories, a mutual forgiveness, and a firm commitment to strive for communion.

52.2 This gesture had been preceded by the meeting of Pope Paul VI and Patriarch Athenagoras I in Jerusalem, in January 1964, during the Pope’s pilgrimage to the Holy Land. At that time Pope Paul was also able to meet Benedictos, the Orthodox Patriarch of Jerusalem. Later Pope Paul visited Patriarch Athenagoras at the Phanar (Istanbul), on July 25, 1967, and in October of the same year the Patriarch was solemnly received in Rome. These prayer-filled meetings mapped out the path of rapprochement between the Church of the East and the Church of the West, and of the reestablishment of the unity they shared in the first millennium.

52.3 Following the death of Pope Paul VI and the brief Pontificate of Pope John Paul I, when the ministry of Bishop of Rome was entrusted to me, I considered it one of the first duties of my Pontificate to renew personal contact with the Ecumenical Patriarch Dimitrios I, who had meanwhile succeeded Patriarch Athenagoras in the See of Constantinople. During my visit to the Phanar on November 29, 1979, the Patriarch and I were able to decide to begin theological dialogue between the Catholic Church and all the Orthodox Churches in canonical communion with the See of Constantinople. In this regard it would seem important to add that at that time preparations were already under way for the convocation of a future Council of the Orthodox Churches. The quest for harmony between them contributes to the life and vitality of these sister Churches; this is also significant in view of the role they are called to play in the path toward unity. The Ecumenical Patriarch decided to repay my visit, and in December 1987 I had the joy of welcoming him to Rome with deep affection and with the solemnity due to him. It is in this context of ecclesial fraternity that we should mention the practice, which has now been in place for a number of years, of welcoming a delegation from the Ecumenical Patriarchate to Rome for the feast of the holy Apostles Peter and Paul, as well as the custom of sending a delegation of the Holy See to the Phanar for the solemn celebration of Saint Andrew.

53.1 Among other things, these regular contacts permit a direct exchange of information and opinions with a view to fostering fraternal coordination. Furthermore, taking part together in prayer accustoms us once more to living side by side and helps us in accepting and putting into practice the Lord's will for his Church.

53.2 On the path which we have traveled since the Second Vatican Council, at least two particularly telling events of great ecumenical significance for relations between East and West should be mentioned. The first of these was the 1984 Jubilee in commemoration of the eleventh centenary of the evangelizing activity of Saints Cyril and Methodius, an occasion which enabled me to proclaim the two holy Apostles of the Slavs, those heralds of faith, co-patrons of Europe. In 1964, during the Council, Pope Paul VI had already proclaimed Saint Benedict patron of Europe. Associating the two brothers from Thessalonica with the great founder of Western monasticism serves indirectly to highlight that twofold ecclesial and cultural tradition which has proved so significant for the two thousand years of Christianity which mark the history of Europe. Consequently it is worth recalling that Saints Cyril and Methodius came from the background of the Byzantine Church of their day, at a time when the latter was in communion with Rome. In proclaiming them patrons of Europe, together with Saint Benedict, it was my intention not only to reaffirm the historical truth about Christianity in Europe, but also to provide an important topic for the dialogue between East and West which has raised such high hopes in the period since the Council. As in Saint Benedict, so in Saints Cyril and Methodius, Europe can rediscover its spiritual roots. Now, as the second millennium since the birth of Christ draws to a close, they must be venerated together, as the patrons of our past and as the saints to whom the Churches and nations of Europe entrust their future.

54.1 The other event which I am pleased to recall is the celebration of the millennium of the Baptism of Rus' (988-1988). The Catholic Church, and this Apostolic See in particular, desired to take part in the Jubilee celebrations and also sought to emphasize that the Baptism conferred on Saint Vladimir in Kiev was a key event in the evangelization of the world. The great Slav nations of Eastern Europe owe their faith to this event, as do the peoples living beyond the Ural Mountains and as far as Alaska.

54.2 In this perspective an expression which I have frequently employed finds its deepest meaning: the Church must breathe with her two lungs! In the first millennium of the history of Christianity, this expression refers primarily to the relationship between Byzantium and Rome. From the time of the Baptism of Rus' it comes to have an even wider application: evangelization spread to a much vaster area, so that it now includes the entire Church. If we then consider that the salvific event which took place on the banks of the Dnieper goes back to a time when the Church in the East and the Church in the West were not divided, we understand clearly that the vision of the full communion to be sought is that of unity in legitimate diversity. This is what I strongly asserted in my Encyclical Letter Slavorum Apostoli 85 on Saints Cyril and Methodius and in my Apostolic Letter Euntes in Mundum 86 addressed to the faithful of the Catholic Church in commemoration of the millennium of the Baptism of Kievan Rus'.

Sister Churches

55.1 In its historical survey the Council Decree Unitatis Redintegratio has in mind the unity which, in spite of everything, was experienced in the first millennium and in a certain sense now serves as a kind of model. “This most sacred Synod gladly reminds all . . . that in the East there flourish many particular or local Churches; among them the patriarchal Churches hold first place; and of these, many glory in taking their origin from the Apostles themselves.”<sup>87</sup> The Church’s journey began in Jerusalem on the day of Pentecost and its original expansion in the oikoumene of that time was centered around Peter and the Eleven (cf. Acts 2:14). The structures of the Church in the East and in the West evolved in reference to that apostolic heritage. Her unity during the first millennium was maintained within those same structures through the Bishops, Successors of the Apostles, in communion with the Bishop of Rome. If today at the end of the second millennium we are seeking to restore full communion, it is to that unity, thus structured, which we must look.

55.2 The Decree on Ecumenism highlights a further distinctive aspect, thanks to which all the particular Churches remained in unity: “an eager desire to perpetuate in a communion of faith and charity those family ties which ought to thrive between local Churches, as between sisters.”<sup>88</sup>

56.1 Following the Second Vatican Council, and in the light of earlier tradition, it has again become usual to refer to the particular or local Churches gathered around their Bishop as “sister Churches.” In addition, the lifting of the mutual excommunications, by eliminating a painful canonical and psychological obstacle, was a very significant step on the way toward full communion.

56.2 The structures of unity which existed before the separation are a heritage of experience that guides our common path toward the reestablishment of full communion. Obviously, during the second millennium the Lord has not ceased to bestow on his Church abundant fruits of grace and growth. Unfortunately, however, the gradual and mutual estrangement between the Churches of the West and the East deprived them of the benefits of mutual exchanges and cooperation. With the grace of God a great effort must be made to reestablish full communion among them, the source of such good for the Church of Christ. This effort calls for all our good will, humble prayer and a steadfast cooperation which never yields to discouragement. Saint Paul urges us: “Bear one another’s burdens” (Gal 6:2). How appropriate and relevant for us is the Apostle’s exhortation! The traditional designation of “sister Churches” should ever accompany us along this path.

57.1 In accordance with the hope expressed by Pope Paul VI, our declared purpose is to reestablish together full unity in legitimate diversity: “God has granted us to receive in faith what the Apostles saw, understood, and proclaimed to us. By Baptism ‘we are one in Christ Jesus’ (Gal 3:28). In virtue of the apostolic succession, we are united more closely by the priesthood and the Eucharist. By participating in the gifts of God to his Church we are brought into communion with the Father through the Son in the Holy Spirit. . . . In each local Church this mystery of divine love is enacted, and surely this is the ground of the traditional and very beautiful expression ‘sister Churches,’ which local Churches were fond of applying to one another (cf. Decree, Unitatis Redintegratio, 14). For centuries we lived this life of ‘sister Churches,’ and together held Ecumenical Councils which guarded the deposit of faith against all corruption. And now, after a long period of division and mutual misunderstanding, the Lord is enabling us to discover ourselves as ‘sister Churches’ once more, in spite of the obstacles which were once raised between us.”<sup>89</sup> If today, on the threshold of the third millennium, we are seeking the reestablishment of full communion, it is for the accomplishment of this reality that we must work and it is to this reality that we must refer.

57.2 Contact with this glorious tradition is most fruitful for the Church. As the Council points out: “From their very origins the Churches of the East have had a treasury from which the Church of the West has amply drawn for its liturgy, spiritual tradition and jurisprudence.”<sup>90</sup>

57.3 Part of this “treasury” are also “the riches of those spiritual traditions to which monasticism gives special expression. From the glorious days of the holy Fathers, there flourished in the East that monastic spirituality which later flowed over into the Western world.”<sup>91</sup> As I have had the occasion to emphasize in my recent Apostolic Letter Orientalis Lumen, the Churches of the East have lived with great generosity the commitment shown by monastic life, “starting with evangelization, the highest service that the Christian can offer his brother, followed by many other forms of spiritual and material service. Indeed it can be said that monasticism in antiquity – and at various times in subsequent ages too – has been the privileged means for the evangelization of peoples.”<sup>92</sup>

57.4 The Council does not limit itself to emphasizing the elements of similarity between the Churches in the East and in the West. In accord with historical truth, it does not hesitate to say: “It is hardly surprising if sometimes one tradition has come nearer than the other to an apt appreciation of certain aspects of the revealed mystery or has expressed them in a clearer manner. As a result, these various theological formulations are often to be considered as complementary rather than conflicting.”<sup>93</sup> Communion is made fruitful by the exchange of gifts between the Churches insofar as they complement each other.

58.1 From the reaffirmation of an already existing communion of faith, the Second Vatican Council drew pastoral consequences which are useful for the everyday life of the faithful and for the promotion of the spirit of unity. By reason of the very close sacramental bonds between the Catholic Church and the Orthodox Churches, the Decree on Eastern Catholic Churches Orientalium Ecclesiarum, has stated: “Pastoral experience clearly shows that with respect to our Eastern brethren there should and can be taken into consideration various circumstances affecting individuals, wherein the unity of the Church is not jeopardized nor are intolerable risks involved, but in which salvation itself and the spiritual profit of souls are urgently at issue. Hence, in view of special circumstances of time, place and personage, the Catholic Church has often adopted and now adopts a milder policy, offering to all the means of salvation and an example of charity among Christians through participation in the sacraments and in other sacred functions and objects.”<sup>94</sup>

58.2 In the light of experience gained in the years following the Council, this theological and pastoral orientation has been incorporated into the two Codes of Canon Law.<sup>95</sup> It has been explicitly treated from the pastoral standpoint in the Directory for the Application of Principles and Norms on Ecumenism.<sup>96</sup>

58.3 In so important and sensitive a matter, it is necessary for Pastors to instruct the faithful with care, making them clearly aware of the specific reasons both for this sharing in liturgical worship and for the various regulations which govern it.

58.4 There must never be a loss of appreciation for the ecclesiological implication of sharing in the sacraments, especially in the Holy Eucharist.

Progress in dialogue

59 Since its establishment in 1979, the Joint International Commission for the Theological Dialogue between the Catholic Church and the Orthodox Church has worked steadily, directing its study to areas decided upon by mutual agreement, with the purpose of reestablishing full communion between the two Churches. This communion which is founded on the unity of faith, following in the footsteps of the experience and tradition of the ancient Church, will find its fulfillment in the common celebration of the Holy Eucharist. In a positive spirit, and on the basis of what we have in common, the Joint Commission has been able to make substantial progress and, as I was able to declare in union with my Venerable Brother, His Holiness Dimitrios I, the Ecumenical Patriarch, it has concluded “that the Catholic Church and the Orthodox Church can already profess together that common faith in the mystery of the Church and the bond between faith and sacraments.”<sup>97</sup> The Commission was then able to acknowledge that “in our Churches apostolic succession is fundamental for the sanctification and the unity of the People of God.”<sup>98</sup> These are important points of reference for the continuation of the dialogue. Moreover, these joint affirmations represent the basis for Catholics and Orthodox to be able from now on to bear a faithful and united common witness in our time, that the name of the Lord may be proclaimed and glorified.

60.1 More recently, the Joint International Commission took a significant step forward with regard to the very sensitive question of the method to be followed in reestablishing full communion between the Catholic Church and the Orthodox Church, an issue which has frequently embittered relations between Catholics and Orthodox. The Commission has laid the doctrinal foundations for a positive solution to this problem on the basis of the doctrine of sister Churches. Here too it has become evident that the method to be followed toward full communion is the dialogue of truth, fostered and sustained by the dialogue of love. A recognition of the right of the Eastern Catholic Churches to have their own organizational structures and to carry out their own apostolate, as well as the actual involvement of these Churches in the dialogue of charity and in theological dialogue, will not only promote a true and fraternal mutual esteem between Orthodox and Catholics living in the same territory, but will also foster their joint commitment to work for unity.<sup>99</sup> A step forward has been taken. The commitment must continue. Already there are signs of a lessening of tensions, which is making the quest for unity more fruitful.

60.2 With regard to the Eastern Catholic Churches in communion with the Catholic Church, the Council expressed its esteem in these terms: “While thanking God that many Eastern sons of the Catholic Church . . . are already living in full communion with their brethren who follow the tradition of the West, this sacred Synod declares that this entire heritage of spirituality and liturgy, of discipline and theology, in their various traditions, belongs to the full catholic and apostolic character of the Church.”<sup>100</sup> Certainly the Eastern Catholic Churches, in the spirit of the Decree on Ecumenism, will play a constructive role in the dialogue of love and in the theological dialogue at both the local and international levels, and thus contribute to mutual understanding and the continuing pursuit of full unity.<sup>101</sup>

61 In view of all this, the Catholic Church desires nothing less than full communion between East and West. She finds inspiration for this in the experience of the first millennium. In that period, indeed, “the development of different experiences of ecclesial life did not prevent Christians, through mutual relations, from continuing to feel certain that they were at home in any Church, because praise of the one Father, through Christ in the Holy Spirit, rose from them all, in a marvelous variety of languages and melodies; all were gathered together to celebrate the Eucharist, the heart and model for the community regarding not only spirituality and the moral life, but also the Church’s very structure, in the variety of ministries and services under the leadership of the Bishop, Successor of the Apostles. The first Councils are an eloquent witness to this enduring unity in diversity.”<sup>102</sup> How can unity be restored after almost a thousand years? This is the great task which the Catholic Church must accomplish, a task equally incumbent on the Orthodox Church. Thus can be understood the continuing relevance of dialogue, guided by the light and strength of the Holy Spirit.

Relations with the Ancient Churches of the East

62.1 In the period following the Second Vatican Council, the Catholic Church has also, in different ways and with greater or lesser rapidity, restored fraternal relations with the Ancient Churches of the East which rejected the dogmatic formulations of the Councils of Ephesus and Chalcedon. All these Churches sent official observers to the Second Vatican Council; their Patriarchs have honored us by their visits, and the Bishop of Rome has been able to converse with them as with brothers who, after a long time, joyfully meet again.

62.2 The return of fraternal relations with the Ancient Churches of the East witnesses to the Christian faith in situations which are often hostile and tragic. This is a concrete sign of how we are united in Christ in spite of historical, political, social and cultural barriers. And precisely in relation to Christology, we have been able to join the Patriarchs of some of these Churches in declaring our common faith in Jesus Christ, true God and true man. Pope Paul VI of venerable memory signed declarations to this effect with His Holiness Shenouda III, the Coptic Orthodox Pope and Patriarch,103 and with His Beatitude Jacob III, the Syrian Orthodox Patriarch of Antioch.104 I myself have been able to confirm this Christological agreement and draw on it for the development of dialogue with Pope Shenouda,105 and for pastoral cooperation with the Syrian Patriarch of Antioch Mor Ignatius Zakka I Iwas.106

62.3 When the Venerable Patriarch of the Ethiopian Church, Abuna Paulos, paid me a visit in Rome on June 11, 1993, together we emphasized the deep communion existing between our two Churches: “We share the faith handed down from the Apostles, as also the same sacraments and the same ministry, rooted in the apostolic succession. . . . Today, moreover, we can affirm that we have the one faith in Christ, even though for a long time this was a source of division between us.”107

62.4 More recently, the Lord has granted me the great joy of signing a common Christological declaration with the Assyrian Patriarch of the East, His Holiness Mar Dinkha IV, who for this purpose chose to visit me in Rome in November 1994. Taking into account the different theological formulations, we were able to profess together the true faith in Christ.108 I wish to express my joy at all this in the words of the Blessed Virgin: “My soul proclaims the greatness of the Lord” (Lk 1:46).

63 Ecumenical contacts have thus made possible essential clarifications with regard to the traditional controversies concerning Christology, so much so that we have been able to profess together the faith which we have in common. Once again it must be said that this important achievement is truly a fruit of theological investigation and fraternal dialogue. And not only this. It is an encouragement for us: for it shows us that the path followed is the right one and that we can reasonably hope to discover together the solution to other disputed questions.

Dialogue with other Churches and Ecclesial Communities in the West

64.1 In its great plan for the reestablishment of unity among all Christians, the Decree on Ecumenism also speaks of relations with the Churches and Ecclesial Communities of the West. Wishing to create a climate of Christian fraternity and dialogue, the Council situates its guidelines in the context of two general considerations: one of an historical and psychological nature, and the other theological and doctrinal. On the one hand, this Decree affirms: “The Churches and Ecclesial Communities which were separated from the Apostolic See of Rome during the very serious crisis that began in the West at the end of the Middle Ages, or during later times, are bound to the Catholic Church by a special affinity and close relationship in view of the long span of earlier centuries when the Christian people lived in ecclesiastical communion.”<sup>109</sup> On the other hand, with equal realism the same Document states: “At the same time one should recognize that between these Churches and Communities on the one hand, and the Catholic Church on the other, there are very weighty differences not only of an historical, sociological, psychological and cultural nature, but especially in the interpretation of revealed truth.”<sup>110</sup>

65.1 Common roots and similar, if distinct, considerations have guided the development in the West of the Catholic Church and of the Churches and Communities which have their origins in the Reformation. Consequently these share the fact that they are “Western” in character. Their “diversities,” although significant as has been pointed out, do not therefore preclude mutual interaction and complementarity.

65.2 The ecumenical movement really began within the Churches and Ecclesial Communities of the Reform. At about the same time, in January 1920, the Ecumenical Patriarchate expressed the hope that some kind of cooperation among the Christian Communions could be organized. This fact shows that the weight of cultural background is not the decisive factor. What is essential is the question of faith. The prayer of Christ, our one Lord, Redeemer and Master, speaks to everyone in the same way, both in the East and in the West. That prayer becomes an imperative to leave behind our divisions in order to seek and reestablish unity, as a result also of the bitter experiences of division itself.

66.1 The Second Vatican Council did not attempt to give a “description” of post-Reformation Christianity, since “in origin, teaching and spiritual practice these Churches and Ecclesial Communities differ not only from us but also among themselves to a considerable degree.”<sup>111</sup> Furthermore, the Decree observes that the ecumenical movement and the desire for peace with the Catholic Church have not yet taken root everywhere.<sup>112</sup> These circumstances notwithstanding, the Council calls for dialogue.

66.2 The Council Decree then seeks to “propose . . . some considerations which can and ought to serve as a basis and motivation for such dialogue.”<sup>113</sup>

66.3 “Our thoughts are concerned . . . with those Christians who openly confess Jesus Christ as God and Lord and as the sole Mediator between God and man unto the glory of the one God, Father, Son and Holy Spirit.”<sup>114</sup>

66.4 These brothers and sisters promote love and veneration for the Sacred Scriptures: “Calling upon the Holy Spirit, they seek in these Sacred Scriptures God as he speaks to them in Christ, the one whom the Prophets foretold, God’s Word made flesh for us. In the Scriptures they contemplate the life of Christ, as well as the teachings and the actions of the divine Master on behalf of the salvation of all, in particular the mysteries of his Death and Resurrection. . . . They affirm the divine authority of the Sacred Books.”<sup>115</sup>

66.5 At the same time, however, they “think differently from us . . . about the relationship between the Scriptures and the Church. In the Church, according to Catholic belief, an authentic teaching office plays a special role in the explanation and proclamation of the written Word of God.”<sup>116</sup> Even so, “in [ecumenical] dialogue itself, the sacred utterances are precious instruments in the mighty hand of God for attaining that unity which the Savior holds out to all.”<sup>117</sup>

66.6 Furthermore, the Sacrament of Baptism, which we have in common, represents “a sacramental bond of unity linking all who have been reborn by means of it.”<sup>118</sup> The theological, pastoral and ecumenical implications of our common Baptism are many and important. Although this sacrament of itself is “only a beginning, a point of departure,” it is “oriented toward a complete profession of faith, a complete incorporation into the system of salvation such as Christ himself willed it to be and, finally, toward a complete participation in Eucharistic communion.”<sup>119</sup>

67.1 Doctrinal and historical disagreements at the time of the Reformation emerged with regard to the Church, the sacraments and the ordained ministry. The Council therefore calls for “dialogue to be undertaken concerning the true meaning of the Lord’s Supper, the other sacraments and the Church’s worship and ministry.”<sup>120</sup>

67.2 The Decree Unitatis Redintegratio, pointing out that the post-Reformation Communities lack that “fullness of unity with us which should flow from Baptism,” observes that “especially because of the lack of the Sacrament of Orders they have not preserved the genuine and total reality of the Eucharistic mystery,” even though “when they commemorate the Lord’s death and Resurrection in the Holy Supper, they profess that it signifies life in communion with Christ and they await his coming in glory.”121

68.1 The Decree does not overlook the spiritual life and its moral consequences: “The Christian way of life of these brethren is nourished by faith in Christ. It is strengthened by the grace of Baptism and the hearing of God’s Word. This way of life expresses itself in private prayer, in meditation on the Bible, in Christian family life and in services of worship offered by Communities assembled to praise God. Furthermore, their worship sometimes displays notable features of the ancient, common liturgy.”122

68.2 The Council document moreover does not limit itself to these spiritual, moral and cultural aspects but extends its appreciation to the lively sense of justice and to the sincere charity toward others which are present among these brothers and sisters. Nor does it overlook their efforts to make social conditions more humane and to promote peace. All this is the result of a sincere desire to be faithful to the Word of Christ as the source of Christian life.

68.3 The text thus raises a series of questions which, in the area of ethics and morality, is becoming ever more urgent in our time: “There are many Christians who do not always understand the Gospel in the same way as Catholics.”123 In this vast area there is much room for dialogue concerning the moral principles of the Gospel and their implications.

69.1 The hopes and invitation expressed by the Second Vatican Council have been acted upon, and bilateral theological dialogue with the various worldwide Churches and Christian Communities in the West has been progressively set in motion.

69.2 Moreover, with regard to multilateral dialogue, as early as 1964 the process of setting up a “Joint Working Group” with the World Council of Churches was begun, and since 1968 Catholic theologians have been admitted as full members of the theological department of the Council, the Commission on Faith and Order.

69.3 This dialogue has been and continues to be fruitful and full of promise. The topics suggested by the Council Decree have already been addressed, or will be in the near future. The reflections of the various bilateral dialogues, conducted with a dedication which deserves the praise of all those committed to ecumenism, have concentrated on many disputed questions such as Baptism, the Eucharist, the ordained ministry, the sacramentality and authority of the Church, and apostolic succession. As a result, unexpected possibilities for resolving these questions have come to light, while at the same time there has been a realization that certain questions need to be studied more deeply.

70.1 This difficult and delicate research, which involves questions of faith and respect for one's own conscience as well as for the consciences of others, has been accompanied and sustained by the prayer of the Catholic Church and of the other Churches and Ecclesial Communities. Prayer for unity, already so deeply rooted in and spread throughout the body of the Church, shows that Christians do indeed see the importance of ecumenism. Precisely because the search for full unity requires believers to question one another in relation to their faith in the one Lord, prayer is the source of enlightenment concerning the truth which has to be accepted in its entirety.

70.2 Moreover, through prayer the quest for unity, far from being limited to a group of specialists, comes to be shared by all the baptized. Everyone, regardless of their role in the Church or level of education, can make a valuable contribution, in a hidden and profound way.

Ecclesial relations

71.1 We must give thanks to divine Providence also for all the events which attest to progress on the path to unity. Besides theological dialogue, mention should be made of other forms of encounter, common prayer and practical cooperation. Pope Paul VI strongly encouraged this process by his visit to the headquarters of the World Council of Churches in Geneva on June 10, 1969, and by his many meetings with representatives of various Churches and Ecclesial Communities. Such contacts greatly help to improve mutual knowledge and to increase Christian fraternity.

71.2 Pope John Paul I, during his very brief Pontificate, expressed the desire to continue on this path. 124 The Lord has enabled me to carry on this work. In addition to important ecumenical meetings held in Rome, a significant part of my pastoral visits is regularly devoted to fostering Christian unity. Some of my journeys have a precise ecumenical “priority,” especially in countries where the Catholic Communities constitute a minority with respect to the post-Reformation Communities or where the latter represent a considerable portion of the believers in Christ in a given society.

72.1 This is true above all for the European countries, in which these divisions first appeared, and for North America. In this regard, without wishing to minimize the other visits, I would especially mention those within Europe which took me twice to Germany, in November 1980 and in April-May 1987; to the United Kingdom (England, Scotland and Wales) in May-June 1982; to Switzerland in June 1984; and to the Scandinavian and Nordic countries (Finland, Sweden, Norway, Denmark and Iceland) in June 1989. In an atmosphere of joy, mutual respect, Christian solidarity and prayer I met so very many brothers and sisters, all making a committed effort to be faithful to the Gospel. Seeing all this has been for me a great source of encouragement. We experienced the Lord’s presence among us.

72.2 In this respect I would like to mention one demonstration dictated by fraternal charity and marked by deep clarity of faith which made a profound impression on me. I am speaking of the Eucharistic celebrations at which I presided in Finland and Sweden during my journey to the Scandinavian and Nordic countries. At Communion time, the Lutheran Bishops approached the celebrant. They wished, by means of an agreed gesture, to demonstrate their desire for that time when we, Catholics and Lutherans, will be able to share the same Eucharist, and they wished to receive the celebrant’s blessing. With love I blessed them. The same gesture, so rich in meaning, was repeated in Rome at the Mass at which I presided in Piazza Farnese, on the sixth centenary of the canonization of Saint Birgitta of Sweden, on October 6, 1991.

72.3 I have encountered similar sentiments on the other side of the ocean also: in Canada, in September 1984; and particularly in September 1987 in the United States, where one notices a great ecumenical openness. This was the case, to give one example, of the ecumenical meeting held at Columbia, South Carolina, on September 11, 1987. The very fact that such meetings regularly take place between the Pope and these brothers and sisters whose Churches and Ecclesial Communities originate in the Reformation is important in itself. I am deeply grateful for the warm reception which I have received both from the leaders of the various Communities and from the Communities as a whole. From this standpoint, I consider significant the ecumenical celebration of the Word held in Columbia on the theme of the family.

73 It is also a source of great joy to observe how in the postconciliar period and in the local Churches many programs and activities on behalf of Christian unity are in place, programs and activities which have a stimulating effect at the level of Episcopal Conferences, individual Dioceses and parishes, and at the level of the various ecclesial organizations and movements.

Achievements of cooperation

74.1 “Not every one who says to me, ‘Lord, Lord,’ will enter the Kingdom of heaven, but he who does the will of my Father who is in heaven” (Mt 7:21). The consistency and honesty of intentions and of statements of principles are verified by their application to real life. The Council Decree on Ecumenism notes that among other Christians “the faith by which they believe in Christ bears fruit in praise and thanksgiving for the benefits received from the hands of God. Joined to it are a lively sense of justice and a true neighborly charity.”<sup>125</sup>

74.2 What has just been outlined is fertile ground not only for dialogue but also for practical cooperation: “Active faith has produced many organizations for the relief of spiritual and bodily distress, the education of youth, the advancement of humane social conditions and the promotion of peace throughout the world.”<sup>126</sup>

74.3 Social and cultural life offers ample opportunities for ecumenical cooperation. With increasing frequency Christians are working together to defend human dignity, to promote peace, to apply the Gospel to social life, to bring the Christian spirit to the world of science and of the arts. They find themselves ever more united in striving to meet the sufferings and the needs of our time: hunger, natural disasters and social injustice.

75.1 For Christians, this cooperation, which draws its inspiration from the Gospel itself, is never mere humanitarian action. It has its reason for being in the Lord’s words: “For I was hungry and you gave me food” (Mt 25:35). As I have already emphasized, the cooperation among Christians clearly manifests that degree of communion which already exists among them.<sup>127</sup>

75.2 Before the world, united action in society on the part of Christians has the clear value of a joint witness to the name of the Lord. It is also a form of proclamation, since it reveals the face of Christ.

75.3 The doctrinal disagreements which remain exercise a negative influence and even place limits on cooperation. Still, the communion of faith which already exists between Christians provides a solid foundation for their joint action not only in the social field but also in the religious sphere.

75.4 Such cooperation will facilitate the quest for unity. The Decree on Ecumenism noted that “through such cooperation all believers in Christ are able to learn easily how they can understand each other better and esteem each other more, and how the road to the unity of Christians may be made smooth.”<sup>128</sup> expressed in prayer and action by ever greater numbers of Christians and with a steadily growing theological inspiration? It could not be otherwise. Do we not believe in Jesus Christ, the Prince of Peace? Christians are becoming ever more united in their rejection of violence, every kind of violence, from wars to social injustice.

76.2 We are called to make ever greater efforts, so that it may be ever more apparent that religious considerations are not the real cause of current conflicts, even though, unfortunately, there is still a risk of religion being exploited for political and polemical purposes.

76.3 In 1986, at Assisi, during the World Day of Prayer for Peace, Christians of the various Churches and Ecclesial Communities prayed with one voice to the Lord of history for peace in the world. That same day, in a different but parallel way, Jews and representatives of non-Christian religions also prayed for peace in a harmonious expression of feelings which struck a resonant chord deep in the human spirit.

76.4 Nor do I wish to overlook the Day of Prayer for Peace in Europe, especially in the Balkans, which took me back to the town of Saint Francis as a pilgrim on January 9-10, 1993, and the Mass for Peace in the Balkans and especially in Bosnia-Herzegovina, which I celebrated on January 23, 1994, in Saint Peter's Basilica during the Week of Prayer for Unity.

76.5 When we survey the world, joy fills our hearts. For we note that Christians feel ever more challenged by the issue of peace. They see it as intimately connected with the proclamation of the Gospel and with the coming of God's Kingdom.

Continuing and deepening dialogue

77.1 We can now ask how much further we must travel until that blessed day when full unity in faith will be attained and we can celebrate together in peace the Holy Eucharist of the Lord. The greater mutual understanding and the doctrinal convergences already achieved between us, which have resulted in an affective and effective growth of communion, cannot suffice for the conscience of Christians who profess that the Church is one, holy, catholic and apostolic. The ultimate goal of the ecumenical movement is to reestablish full visible unity among all the baptized.

77.2 In view of this goal, all the results so far attained are but one stage of the journey, however promising and positive.

78.1 In the ecumenical movement, it is not only the Catholic Church and the Orthodox Churches which hold to this demanding concept of the unity willed by God. The orientation toward such unity is also expressed by others.<sup>129</sup>

78.2 Ecumenism implies that the Christian Communities should help one another so that there may be truly present in them the full content and all the requirements of “the heritage handed down by the Apostles.”<sup>130</sup> Without this, full communion will never be possible. This mutual help in the search for truth is a sublime form of evangelical charity.

78.3 The documents of the many International Mixed Commissions of dialogue have expressed this commitment to seeking unity. On the basis of a certain fundamental doctrinal unity, these texts discuss Baptism, Eucharist, ministry and authority.

78.4 From this basic but partial unity it is now necessary to advance toward the visible unity which is required and sufficient, and which is manifested in a real and concrete way, so that the Churches may truly become a sign of that full communion in the one, holy, catholic and apostolic Church which will be expressed in the common celebration of the Eucharist.

78.5 This journey toward the necessary and sufficient visible unity, in the communion of the one Church willed by Christ, continues to require patient and courageous efforts. In this process, one must not impose any burden beyond that which is strictly necessary (cf. Acts 15:28).

79.1 It is already possible to identify the areas in need of fuller study before a true consensus of faith can be achieved: 1) the relationship between Sacred Scripture, as the highest authority in matters of faith, and Sacred Tradition, as indispensable to the interpretation of the Word of God; 2) the Eucharist, as the Sacrament of the Body and Blood of Christ, an offering of praise to the Father, the sacrificial memorial and Real Presence of Christ and the sanctifying outpouring of the Holy Spirit; 3) Ordination, as a sacrament, to the threefold ministry of the episcopate, presbyterate and diaconate; 4) the Magisterium of the Church, entrusted to the Pope and the Bishops in communion with him, understood as a responsibility and an authority exercised in the name of Christ for teaching and safeguarding the faith; 5) the Virgin Mary, as Mother of God and Icon of the Church, the spiritual Mother who intercedes for Christ's disciples and for all humanity.

79.2 In this courageous journey toward unity, the transparency and the prudence of faith require us to avoid both false irenicism and indifference to the Church's ordinances.<sup>131</sup> Conversely, that same transparency and prudence urge us to reject a halfhearted commitment to unity and, even more, a prejudicial opposition or a defeatism which tends to see everything in negative terms.

79.3 To uphold a vision of unity which takes account of all the demands of revealed truth does not mean to put a brake on the ecumenical movement.<sup>132</sup> On the contrary, it means preventing it from settling for apparent solutions which would lead to no firm and solid results.<sup>133</sup> The obligation to respect the truth is absolute. Is this not the law of the Gospel?

FOOTNOTES:

<sup>129</sup> The steady work of the Commission on Faith and Order has led to a comparable vision adopted by the Seventh Assembly of the World Council of Churches in the Canberra Declaration (February 7-20, 1991); cf. Signs of the Spirit, Official Report, Seventh Assembly, WCC, Geneva, 1991, 235-258. ### Reception of the results already achieved

80.1 While dialogue continues on new subjects or develops at deeper levels, a new task lies before us: that of receiving the results already achieved. These cannot remain the statements of bilateral commissions but must become a common heritage. For this to come about and for the bonds of communion to be thus strengthened, a serious examination needs to be made, which, by different ways and means and at various levels of responsibility, must involve the whole People of God. We are in fact dealing with issues which frequently are matters of faith, and these require universal consent, extending from the Bishops to the lay faithful, all of whom have received the anointing of the Holy Spirit.<sup>134</sup> It is the same Spirit who assists the Magisterium and awakens the sensus fidei.

80.2 Consequently, for the outcome of dialogue to be received, there is needed a broad and precise critical process which analyzes the results and rigorously tests their consistency with the Tradition of faith received from the Apostles and lived out in the community of believers gathered around the Bishop, their legitimate Pastor.

81.1 This process, which must be carried forward with prudence and in a spirit of faith, will be assisted by the Holy Spirit. If it is to be successful, its results must be made known in appropriate ways by competent persons. Significant in this regard is the contribution which theologians and faculties of theology are called to make by exercising their charism in the Church. It is also clear that ecumenical commissions have very specific responsibilities and tasks in this regard.

81.2 The whole process is followed and encouraged by the Bishops and the Holy See. The Church's teaching authority is responsible for expressing a definitive judgment.

81.3 In all this, it will be of great help methodologically to keep carefully in mind the distinction between the deposit of faith and the formulation in which it is expressed, as Pope John XXIII recommended in his opening address at the Second Vatican Council.<sup>135</sup>

Continuing spiritual ecumenism and bearing witness to holiness

82.1 It is understandable how the seriousness of the commitment to ecumenism presents a deep challenge to the Catholic faithful. The Spirit calls them to make a serious examination of conscience. The Catholic Church must enter into what might be called a “dialogue of conversion,” which constitutes the spiritual foundation of ecumenical dialogue. In this dialogue, which takes place before God, each individual must recognize his own faults, confess his sins and place himself in the hands of the One who is our Intercessor before the Father, Jesus Christ.

82.2 Certainly, in this attitude of conversion to the will of the Father and, at the same time, of repentance and absolute trust in the reconciling power of the truth which is Christ, we will find the strength needed to bring to a successful conclusion the long and arduous pilgrimage of ecumenism. The “dialogue of conversion” with the Father on the part of each community, with the full acceptance of all that it demands, is the basis of fraternal relations which will be something more than a mere cordial understanding or external sociability. The bonds of fraternal koinonia must be forged before God and in Christ Jesus.

82.3 Only the act of placing ourselves before God can offer a solid basis for that conversion of individual Christians and for that constant reform of the Church, insofar as she is also a human and earthly institution,<sup>136</sup> which represent the preconditions for all ecumenical commitment. One of the first steps in ecumenical dialogue is the effort to draw the Christian Communities into this completely interior spiritual space in which Christ, by the power of the Spirit, leads them all, without exception, to examine themselves before the Father and to ask themselves whether they have been faithful to his plan for the Church.

83 I have mentioned the will of the Father and the spiritual space in which each community hears the call to overcome the obstacles to unity. All Christian Communities know that, thanks to the power given by the Spirit, obeying that will and overcoming those obstacles are not beyond their reach. All of them in fact have martyrs for the Christian faith.<sup>137</sup> Despite the tragedy of our divisions, these brothers and sisters have preserved an attachment to Christ and to the Father so radical and absolute as to lead even to the shedding of blood. But is not this same attachment at the heart of what I have called a “dialogue of conversion”? Is it not precisely this dialogue which clearly shows the need for an ever more profound experience of the truth if full communion is to be attained?

84.1 In a theocentric vision, we Christians already have a common martyrology. This also includes the martyrs of our own century, more numerous than one might think, and it shows how, at a profound level, God preserves communion among the baptized in the supreme demand of faith, manifested in the sacrifice of life itself.<sup>138</sup> The fact that one can die for the faith shows that other demands of the faith can also be met. I have already remarked, and with deep joy, how an imperfect but real communion is preserved and is growing at many levels of ecclesial life. I now add that this communion is already perfect in what we all consider the highest point of the life of grace, martyria unto death, the truest communion possible with Christ who shed his blood, and by that sacrifice brings near those who once were far off (cf. Eph 2:13).

84.2 While for all Christian communities the martyrs are the proof of the power of grace, they are not the only ones to bear witness to that power. Albeit in an invisible way, the communion between our Communities, even if still incomplete, is truly and solidly grounded in the full communion of the saints – those who, at the end of a life faithful to grace, are in communion with Christ in glory. These saints come from all the Churches and Ecclesial Communities which gave them entrance into the communion of salvation.

84.3 When we speak of a common heritage, we must acknowledge as part of it not only the institutions, rites, means of salvation and the traditions which all the Communities have preserved and by which they have been shaped, but first and foremost this reality of holiness.<sup>139</sup>

84.4 In the radiance of the “heritage of the saints” belonging to all Communities, the “dialogue of conversion” toward full and visible unity thus appears as a source of hope. This universal presence of the saints is in fact a proof of the transcendent power of the Spirit. It is the sign and proof of God’s victory over the forces of evil which divide humanity. As the liturgies sing: “You are glorified in your saints, for their glory is the crowning of your gifts.”<sup>140</sup>

84.5 Where there is a sincere desire to follow Christ, the Spirit is often able to pour out his grace in extraordinary ways. The experience of ecumenism has enabled us to understand this better. If, in the interior spiritual space described above, Communities are able truly to “be converted” to the quest for full and visible communion, God will do for them what he did for their saints. He will overcome the obstacles inherited from the past and will lead Communities along his paths to where he wills: to the visible koinonia which is both praise of his glory and service of his plan of salvation.

85 Since God in his infinite mercy can always bring good even out of situations which are an offense to his plan, we can discover that the Spirit has allowed conflicts to serve in some circumstances to make explicit certain aspects of the Christian vocation, as happens in the lives of the saints. In spite of fragmentation, which is an evil from which we need to be healed, there has resulted a kind of rich bestowal of grace which is meant to embellish the koinonia. God's grace will be with all those who, following the example of the saints, commit themselves to meeting its demands. How can we hesitate to be converted to the Father's expectations? He is with us.

Contribution of the Catholic Church to the quest for Christian unity

86 The Constitution Lumen Gentium, in a fundamental affirmation echoed by the Decree Unitatis Redintegratio,<sup>141</sup> states that the one Church of Christ subsists in the Catholic Church.<sup>142</sup> The Decree on Ecumenism emphasizes the presence in her of the fullness (plenitudo) of the means of salvation.<sup>143</sup> Full unity will come about when all share in the fullness of the means of salvation entrusted by Christ to his Church.

87 Along the way that leads to full unity, ecumenical dialogue works to awaken a reciprocal fraternal assistance, whereby Communities strive to give in mutual exchange what each one needs in order to grow toward definitive fullness in accordance with God's plan (cf. Eph 4:11-13). I have said how we are aware, as the Catholic Church, that we have received much from the witness borne by other Churches and Ecclesial Communities to certain common Christian values, from their study of those values, and even from the way in which they have emphasized and experienced them. Among the achievements of the last thirty years, this reciprocal fraternal influence has had an important place. At the stage which we have now reached,<sup>144</sup> this process of mutual enrichment must be taken seriously into account. Based on the communion which already exists as a result of the ecclesial elements present in the Christian Communities, this process will certainly be a force impelling toward full and visible communion, the desired goal of the journey we are making. Here we have the ecumenical expression of the Gospel law of sharing. This leads me to state once more: "We must take every care to meet the legitimate desires and expectations of our Christian brethren, coming to know their way of thinking and their sensibilities. . . . The talents of each must be developed for the utility and the advantage of all."<sup>145</sup>

Ministry of unity of the Bishop of Rome

88 Among all the Churches and Ecclesial Communities, the Catholic Church is conscious that she has preserved the ministry of the Successor of the Apostle Peter, the Bishop of Rome, whom God established as her “perpetual and visible principle and foundation of unity”<sup>146</sup> and whom the Spirit sustains in order that he may enable all the others to share in this essential good. In the beautiful expression of Pope Saint Gregory the Great, my ministry is that of servus servorum Dei. This designation is the best possible safeguard against the risk of separating power (and in particular the primacy) from ministry. Such a separation would contradict the very meaning of power according to the Gospel: “I am among you as one who serves” (Lk 22:27), says our Lord Jesus Christ, the Head of the Church. On the other hand, as I acknowledged on the important occasion of a visit to the World Council of Churches in Geneva on June 12, 1984, the Catholic Church’s conviction that in the ministry of the Bishop of Rome she has preserved, in fidelity to the apostolic Tradition and the faith of the Fathers, the visible sign and guarantor of unity, constitutes a difficulty for most other Christians, whose memory is marked by certain painful recollections. To the extent that we are responsible for these, I join my Predecessor Paul VI in asking forgiveness.<sup>147</sup>

89 It is nonetheless significant and encouraging that the question of the primacy of the Bishop of Rome has now become a subject of study which is already under way or will be in the near future. It is likewise significant and encouraging that this question appears as an essential theme not only in the theological dialogues in which the Catholic Church is engaging with other Churches and Ecclesial Communities, but also more generally in the ecumenical movement as a whole. Recently the delegates to the Fifth World Assembly of the Commission on Faith and Order of the World Council of Churches, held in Santiago de Compostela, recommended that the Commission “begin a new study of the question of a universal ministry of Christian unity.”<sup>148</sup> After centuries of bitter controversies, the other Churches and Ecclesial Communities are more and more taking a fresh look at this ministry of unity.<sup>149</sup>

90.1 The Bishop of Rome is the Bishop of the Church which preserves the mark of the martyrdom of Peter and of Paul: “By a mysterious design of Providence it is at Rome that [Peter] concludes his journey in following Jesus, and it is at Rome that he gives his greatest proof of love and fidelity. Likewise Paul, the Apostle of the Gentiles, gives his supreme witness at Rome. In this way the Church of Rome became the Church of Peter and of Paul.”<sup>150</sup>

90.2 In the New Testament, the person of Peter has an eminent place. In the first part of the Acts of the Apostles, he appears as the leader and spokesman of the Apostolic College described as “Peter . . . and the Eleven” (2:14, cf. 2:37, 5:29). The place assigned to Peter is based on the words of Christ himself, as they are recorded in the Gospel traditions.

91.1 The Gospel of Matthew gives a clear outline of the pastoral mission of Peter in the Church: “Blessed are you, Simon Bar-Jona! For flesh and blood has not revealed this to you, but my Father who is in heaven. And I tell you, you are Peter, and on this rock I will build my Church and the powers of death shall not prevail against it. I will give you the keys of the kingdom of heaven, and whatever you bind on earth shall be bound in heaven, and whatever you loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven” (16:17-19). Luke makes clear that Christ urged Peter to strengthen his brethren, while at the same time reminding him of his own human weakness and need of conversion (cf. 22:31-32). It is just as though, against the backdrop of Peter’s human weakness, it were made fully evident that his particular ministry in the Church derives altogether from grace. It is as though the Master especially concerned himself with Peter’s conversion as a way of preparing him for the task he was about to give him in his Church, and for this reason was very strict with him. This same role of Peter, similarly linked with a realistic affirmation of his weakness, appears again in the Fourth Gospel: “Simon, son of John, do you love me more than these? . . . Feed my sheep” (cf. Jn 21:15-19). It is also significant that according to the First Letter of Paul to the Corinthians the risen Christ appears to Cephas and then to the Twelve (cf. 15:5).

91.2 It is important to note how the weakness of Peter and of Paul clearly shows that the Church is founded upon the infinite power of grace (cf. Mt 16:17; 2 Cor 12:7-10). Peter, immediately after receiving his mission, is rebuked with unusual severity by Christ, who tells him: “You are a hindrance to me” (Mt 16:23). How can we fail to see that the mercy which Peter needs is related to the ministry of that mercy which he is the first to experience? And yet, Peter will deny Jesus three times. The Gospel of John emphasizes that Peter receives the charge of shepherding the flock on the occasion of a threefold profession of love (cf. 21:15-17), which corresponds to his threefold denial (cf. 13:38). Luke, for his part, in the words of Christ already quoted, words which the early tradition will concentrate upon in order to clarify the mission of Peter, insists on the fact that he will have to “strengthen his brethren when he has turned again” (cf. 22:32).

92.1 As for Paul, he is able to end the description of his ministry with the amazing words which he had heard from the Lord himself: “My grace is sufficient for you, for my power is made perfect in weakness”; consequently, he can exclaim: “When I am weak, then I am strong” (2 Cor 12:9-10). This is a basic characteristic of the Christian experience.

92.2 As the heir to the mission of Peter in the Church, which has been made fruitful by the blood of the Princes of the Apostles, the Bishop of Rome exercises a ministry originating in the manifold mercy of God. This mercy converts hearts and pours forth the power of grace where the disciple experiences the bitter taste of his personal weakness and helplessness. The authority proper to this ministry is completely at the service of God’s merciful plan, and it must always be seen in this perspective. Its power is explained from this perspective.

93.1 Associating himself with Peter’s threefold profession of love, which corresponds to the earlier threefold denial, his Successor knows that he must be a sign of mercy. His is a ministry of mercy, born of an act of Christ’s own mercy. This whole lesson of the Gospel must be constantly read anew, so that the exercise of the Petrine ministry may lose nothing of its authenticity and transparency.

93.2 The Church of God is called by Christ to manifest to a world ensnared by its sins and evil designs that, despite everything, God in his mercy can convert hearts to unity and enable them to enter into communion with him.

94.1 This service of unity, rooted in the action of divine mercy, is entrusted within the College of Bishops to one among those who have received from the Spirit the task, not of exercising power over the people – as the rulers of the Gentiles and their great men do (cf. Mt 20:25; Mk 10:42) – but of leading them toward peaceful pastures. This task can require the offering of one’s own life (cf. Jn 10:11-18). Saint Augustine, after showing that Christ is “the one Shepherd, in whose unity all are one,” goes on to exhort: “May all shepherds thus be one in the one Shepherd; may they let the one voice of the Shepherd be heard; may the sheep hear this voice and follow their Shepherd, not this shepherd or that, but the only one; in him may they all let one voice be heard and not a babble of voices . . . the voice free of all division, purified of all heresy, that the sheep hear.”<sup>151</sup> The mission of the Bishop of Rome within the College of all the Pastors consists precisely in “keeping watch” (episkopein), like a sentinel, so that, through the efforts of the Pastors, the true voice of Christ the Shepherd may be heard in all the particular Churches. In this way, in each of the particular Churches entrusted to those Pastors, the una, sancta, catholica et apostolica ecclesia is made present. All the Churches are in full and visible communion, because all the Pastors are in communion with Peter and therefore united in Christ.

94.2 With the power and the authority without which such an office would be illusory, the Bishop of Rome must ensure the communion of all the Churches. For this reason, he is the first servant of unity. This primacy is exercised on various levels, including vigilance over the handing down of the Word, the celebration of the liturgy and the sacraments, the Church's mission, discipline and the Christian life. It is the responsibility of the Successor of Peter to recall the requirements of the common good of the Church, should anyone be tempted to overlook it in the pursuit of personal interests. He has the duty to admonish, to caution and to declare at times that this or that opinion being circulated is irreconcilable with the unity of faith. When circumstances require it, he speaks in the name of all the Pastors in communion with him. He can also – under very specific conditions clearly laid down by the First Vatican Council – declare ex cathedra that a certain doctrine belongs to the deposit of faith.<sup>152</sup> By thus bearing witness to the truth, he serves unity.

95.1 All this, however, must always be done in communion. When the Catholic Church affirms that the office of the Bishop of Rome corresponds to the will of Christ, she does not separate this office from the mission entrusted to the whole body of Bishops, who are also “vicars and ambassadors of Christ.”<sup>153</sup> The Bishop of Rome is a member of the “College,” and the Bishops are his brothers in the ministry.

95.2 Whatever relates to the unity of all Christian Communities clearly forms part of the concerns of the primacy. As Bishop of Rome I am fully aware, as I have reaffirmed in the present Encyclical Letter, that Christ ardently desires the full and visible communion of all those Communities in which, by virtue of God's faithfulness, his Spirit dwells. I am convinced that I have a particular responsibility in this regard, above all in acknowledging the ecumenical aspirations of the majority of the Christian Communities and in heeding the request made of me to find a way of exercising the primacy which, while in no way renouncing what is essential to its mission, is nonetheless open to a new situation. For a whole millennium Christians were united in “a brotherly fraternal communion of faith and sacramental life. . . . If disagreements in belief and discipline arose among them, the Roman See acted by common consent as moderator.”<sup>154</sup>

95.3 In this way the primacy exercised its office of unity. When addressing the Ecumenical Patriarch His Holiness Dimitrios I, I acknowledged my awareness that “for a great variety of reasons, and against the will of all concerned, what should have been a service sometimes manifested itself in a very different light. But . . . it is out of a desire to obey the will of Christ truly that I recognize that as Bishop of Rome I am called to exercise that ministry. . . . I insistently pray the Holy Spirit to shine his light upon us, enlightening all the Pastors and theologians of our Churches, that we may seek – together, of course – the forms in which this ministry may accomplish a service of love recognized by all concerned.”<sup>155</sup>

96 This is an immense task, which we cannot refuse and which I cannot carry out by myself. Could not the real but imperfect communion existing between us persuade Church leaders and their theologians to engage with me in a patient and fraternal dialogue on this subject, a dialogue in which, leaving useless controversies behind, we could listen to one another, keeping before us only the will of Christ for his Church and allowing ourselves to be deeply moved by his plea “that they may all be one . . . so that the world may believe that you have sent me” (Jn 17:21)?

The communion of all particular Churches with the Church of Rome: a necessary condition for unity

97.1 The Catholic Church, both in her praxis and in her solemn documents, holds that the communion of the particular Churches with the Church of Rome, and of their Bishops with the Bishop of Rome, is – in God's plan – an essential requisite of full and visible communion. Indeed full communion, of which the Eucharist is the highest sacramental manifestation, needs to be visibly expressed in a ministry in which all the Bishops recognize that they are united in Christ and all the faithful find confirmation for their faith. The first part of the Acts of the Apostles presents Peter as the one who speaks in the name of the apostolic group and who serves the unity of the community – all the while respecting the authority of James, the head of the Church in Jerusalem. This function of Peter must continue in the Church so that under her sole Head, who is Jesus Christ, she may be visibly present in the world as the communion of all his disciples.

97.2 Do not many of those involved in ecumenism today feel a need for such a ministry? A ministry which presides in truth and love so that the ship – that beautiful symbol which the World Council of Churches has chosen as its emblem – will not be buffeted by the storms and will one day reach its haven.

Ut Unum Sint

Full unity and evangelization

98.1 The ecumenical movement in our century, more than the ecumenical undertakings of past centuries, the importance of which must not however be underestimated, has been characterized by a missionary outlook. In the verse of John's Gospel which is ecumenism's inspiration and guiding motif – “that they may all be one . . . so that the world may believe that you have sent me” (Jn 17:21) – the phrase that the world may believe has been so strongly emphasized that at times we run the risk of forgetting that, in the mind of the Evangelist, unity is above all for the glory of the Father. At the same time it is obvious that the lack of unity among Christians contradicts the Truth which Christians have the mission to spread and, consequently, it gravely damages their witness. This was clearly understood and expressed by my Predecessor Pope Paul VI, in his Apostolic Exhortation Evangelii Nuntiandi: “As evangelizers, we must offer Christ's faithful not the image of people divided and separated by unedifying quarrels, but the image of people who are mature in faith and capable of finding a meeting point beyond the real tensions, thanks to a shared, sincere and disinterested search for truth. Yes, the destiny of evangelization is certainly bound up with the witness of unity given by the Church. . . . At this point we wish to emphasize the sign of unity among all Christians as the way and instrument of evangelization. The division among Christians is a serious reality which impedes the very work of Christ.” 156

98.2 How indeed can we proclaim the Gospel of reconciliation without at the same time being committed to working for reconciliation between Christians? However true it is that the Church, by the prompting of the Holy Spirit and with the promise of indefectibility, has preached and still preaches the Gospel to all nations, it is also true that she must face the difficulties which derive from the lack of unity. When non-believers meet missionaries who do not agree among themselves, even though they all appeal to Christ, will they be in a position to receive the true message? Will they not think that the Gospel is a cause of division, despite the fact that it is presented as the fundamental law of love?

99 When I say that for me, as Bishop of Rome, the ecumenical task is “one of the pastoral priorities” of my Pontificate, 157 I think of the grave obstacle which the lack of unity represents for the proclamation of the Gospel. A Christian Community which believes in Christ and desires, with Gospel fervor, the salvation of mankind can hardly be closed to the promptings of the Holy Spirit, who leads all Christians toward full and visible unity. Here an imperative of charity is in question, an imperative which admits of no exception. Ecumenism is not only an internal question of the Christian Communities. It is a matter of the love which God has in Jesus Christ for all humanity; to stand in the way of this love is an offense against him and against his plan to gather all people in Christ. As Pope Paul VI wrote to the Ecumenical Patriarch Athenagoras I: “May the Holy Spirit guide us along the way of reconciliation, so that the unity of our Churches may become an ever more radiant sign of hope and consolation for all mankind.”<sup>158</sup>

Exhortation

100.1 In my recent letter to the Bishops, clergy and faithful of the Catholic Church indicating the path to be followed toward the celebration of the great Jubilee of the Holy Year 2000, I wrote that “the best preparation for the new millennium can only be expressed in a renewed commitment to apply, as faithfully as possible, the teachings of Vatican II to the life of every individual and of the whole Church.”<sup>159</sup> The Second Vatican Council is the great beginning – the Advent as it were – of the journey leading us to the threshold of the third millennium. Given the importance which the Council attributed to the work of rebuilding Christian unity, and in this our age of grace for ecumenism, I thought it necessary to reaffirm the fundamental convictions which the Council impressed upon the consciousness of the Catholic Church, recalling them in the light of the progress subsequently made toward the full communion of all the baptized.

100.2 There is no doubt that the Holy Spirit is active in this endeavor and that he is leading the Church to the full realization of the Father’s plan, in conformity with the will of Christ. This will was expressed with heartfelt urgency in the prayer which, according to the Fourth Gospel, he uttered at the moment when he entered upon the saving mystery of his Passover. Just as he did then, today too Christ calls everyone to renew their commitment to work for full and visible communion.

101 I therefore exhort my Brothers in the Episcopate to be especially mindful of this commitment. The two Codes of Canon Law include among the responsibilities of the Bishop that of promoting the unity of all Christians by supporting all activities or initiatives undertaken for this purpose, in the awareness that the Church has this obligation from the will of Christ himself.<sup>160</sup> This is part of the episcopal mission and it is a duty which derives directly from fidelity to Christ, the Shepherd of the Church. Indeed all the faithful are asked by the Spirit of God to do everything possible to strengthen the bonds of communion between all Christians and to increase cooperation between Christ’s followers: “Concern for restoring unity pertains to the whole Church, faithful and clergy alike. It extends to everyone according to the potential of each.”<sup>161</sup>

102.1 The power of God’s Spirit gives growth and builds up the Church down the centuries. As the Church turns her gaze to the new millennium, she asks the Spirit for the grace to strengthen her own unity and to make it grow toward full communion with other Christians.

102.2 How is the Church to obtain this grace? In the first place, through prayer. Prayer should always concern itself with the longing for unity, and as such is one of the basic forms of our love for Christ and for the Father who is rich in mercy. In this journey which we are undertaking with other Christians toward the new millennium, prayer must occupy the first place.

102.3 How is she to obtain this grace? Through giving thanks, so that we do not present ourselves empty-handed at the appointed time: “Likewise the Spirit helps us in our weakness . . . [and] intercedes for us with sighs too deep for words” (Rom 8:26), disposing us to ask God for what we need.

102.4 How is she to obtain this grace? Through hope in the Spirit, who can banish from us the painful memories of our separation. The Spirit is able to grant us clear-sightedness, strength and courage to take whatever steps are necessary, that our commitment may be ever more authentic.

102.5 And should we ask if all this is possible, the answer will always be yes. It is the same answer which Mary of Nazareth heard: with God nothing is impossible.

102.6 I am reminded of the words of Saint Cyprian’s commentary on the Lord’s Prayer, the prayer of every Christian: “God does not accept the sacrifice of a sower of disunion, but commands that he depart from the altar so that he may first be reconciled with his brother. For God can be appeased only by prayers that make peace. To God, the better offering is peace, brotherly concord and a people made one in the unity of the Father, Son and Holy Spirit.”<sup>162</sup>

102.7 At the dawn of the new millennium, how can we not implore from the Lord, with renewed enthusiasm and a deeper awareness, the grace to prepare ourselves, together, to offer this sacrifice of unity?

103 I, John Paul, servus servorum Dei, venture to make my own the words of the Apostle Paul, whose martyrdom, together with that of the Apostle Peter, has bequeathed to this See of Rome the splendor of its witness, and I say to you, the faithful of the Catholic Church, and to you, my brothers and sisters of the other Churches and Ecclesial Communities: “Mend your ways, encourage one another, live in harmony, and the God of love and peace will be with you. . . . The grace of the Lord Jesus Christ and the love of God and the fellowship of the Holy Spirit be with you all” (2 Cor 13:11, 13).

Given in Rome, at Saint Peter’s, on May 25, the Solemnity of the Ascension of the Lord, in the year 1995, the seventeenth of my Pontificate.

<sup>50</sup> Maria Sagheddu was born at Dorgali (Sardinia) in 1914. At twenty-one years of age she entered the Trappistine monastery in Grottaferrata. Through the apostolic labors of Abbé Paul Couturier, she came to understand the need for prayers and spiritual sacrifices for the unity of Christians. In 1936, at the time of an Octave for Unity, she chose to offer her life for the unity of the Church. Following a grave illness, Sister Maria Gabriella died on April 23, 1939.

Preface

Established in 1965, the Synod of Bishops has played a significant role in implementing the teachings and pastoral directives of the Second Vatican Council. Ordinary General Assemblies of the Synod now meet regularly in Rome, usually every three or four years. To date, Pope John Paul II has issued six post-synodal apostolic exhortations on the topics treated at these meetings. These exhortations, published about a year after the month-long gathering, have been instrumental in renewing the Church's life in the areas of catechesis, the family, penance and reconciliation, and with regard to the different states of life: the laity, the priesthood, and the consecrated life. Here, for the first time, these six papal documents, along with an introduction to each one, have been gathered together in a single volume. This book complements the collection of John Paul's twelve encyclicals previously published by Our Sunday Visitor, Inc. Together these two volumes make available the heart of the Pope's thought to the English-speaking world.

In post-synodal apostolic exhortations the Church's ordinary Magisterium is exercised in a unique, even novel, way. As a genre of papal document, they are theologically and pastorally innovative. Until now, these exhortations have not been given the attention they deserve. This collection aims to correct this neglect by stressing their importance to the Pope's ministry of teaching "the truth of the Gospel" (Gal 2:5). They also embody John Paul's conviction, expressed in his encyclical Ut Unum Sint (1995), of the need to find "a way of exercising the primacy which, while in no way renouncing what is essential to its mission, is nonetheless open to a new situation" (§95.2).

Post-synodal apostolic exhortations are the fruit of the collegial deliberations of the Synod of Bishops. As such they are in harmony with Vatican II's ecclesiology of communion and its teaching on the common responsibility of the whole Episcopal College for the "care of all the Churches" (2 Cor 11:28). More than encyclicals, post-synodal exhortations emphasize the Pope's role within the College of Bishops. As the Successor of Peter, he "receives" the Synod's recommendations in order to transmit them to the whole Church. In these six exhortations the Holy Father speaks in the name of his brother Bishops, uniting their witness in a single voice. For John Paul II, such a function belongs to his pastoral office as the center of the visible communion of the universal Church.

The definitive Latin version of post-synodal apostolic exhortations can be found in the Vatican's official journal of record, the Acta Apostolicae Sedis. Each translation in the present volume was approved by the Secretariat of State and officially published by the Vatican Press. I have made only minimal changes in these texts, and then only in order to adapt the translation to the conventions of American spelling, capitalization, and punctuation. In addition, as a help to the reader, I have numbered sequentially the individual paragraphs of every document. Also, for the sake of consistency, I have adopted the editorial style of the Pope's most recent exhortations. This decision entailed changing the formatting of the earlier exhortations as well as considerable editing of the footnotes.

The indexes of scriptural quotations and principal themes of John Paul's encyclicals and post-synodal apostolic exhortations at the end of this volume should be particularly helpful to the reader. Both indexes are cumulative; the entries cover the Holy Father's twelve encyclicals published in the previous volume and the six exhortations of the present work. The biblical index lists the direct and indirect references to Scripture which I judged to be significant, either because the Pope relies on them to make a point or because he uses them in a fresh or unusual way. The subject index provides references to the main places where the Holy Father develops a particular theme. While not exhaustive, the indexes are meant to encourage further study of John Paul's thought.

Every book is a collaborative venture, and this one is certainly no exception. I am deeply indebted to all those who have helped me to bring this second volume of the Pope's principal writings to its conclusion. To my former colleagues in the English-language section of the Secretariat of State of the Holy See, I am especially grateful for their unfailing support and example of filial love for the Church. Likewise, I express my thanks to my students at the Pontifical Gregorian University in Rome who, through their enthusiasm for the teaching of Pope John Paul II, encouraged me to put together this volume of his post-synodal apostolic exhortations for a wider public. It is also a pleasure to express my heartfelt gratitude to all those who read and corrected the manuscript in its various stages: Miss Sharon Bychowski, of the University of Saint Thomas in Houston; Mother Ann Marie Kerper, F.S.E., in Rome; Monsignor Alan McCormack, of the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith; Father Joseph McLaughlin, S.S.E., of Saint Michael's College in Colchester, Vermont; Father P. Wallace Platt, C.S.B., of the Cardinal Flahiff Basilian Centre in Toronto; Father Richard J. Schiefen, C.S.B., of the University of Saint Thomas in Houston; and Father William Sheehan, C.S.B., of the Vatican Apostolic Library. Finally, I wish to thank James Manney and Henry O'Brien of Our Sunday Visitor, Inc., for their endless patience in editing this second volume of papal documents. Without the critical eye and suggestions of these friends and colleagues this collection would never have seen the light of day.

Introduction to the Post-Synodal Apostolic Exhortations

As the Successor of Peter, the Pope has a unique responsibility for teaching “the truth of the Gospel” (Gal 2:5) and guiding the faithful to live it. The Bishop of Rome is the primary guardian of the apostolic Tradition, which he recalls, restates, and confirms through his Magisterium. In the words of Pope John Paul II, the mission of Peter’s Successor is “to establish and authoritatively confirm what the Church has received and believed from the beginning, what the Apostles taught, what Sacred Scripture and Christian Tradition have determined as the object of faith and the Christian norm of life.”<sup>1</sup> Fulfilling Christ’s promise that Peter’s faith would not fail, God sustains the Pope’s teaching ministry of confirming the faith of his brothers and sisters (cf. Lk 22:32).

In recent years, post-synodal apostolic exhortations have proved to be an effective instrument which the Pope has used to carry out his mission as the principal guarantor of the Church’s obedience to revelation. While theologians have paid considerable attention to the teaching of papal encyclicals,<sup>2</sup> the same is not true for apostolic exhortations. Only very recently have they been mentioned in lists of the different kinds of papal statements, and then with little or no explanation of their origin, characteristics, or authority.<sup>3</sup>

In 1939, to commemorate the consecration of twelve missionary Bishops, Pius XII (1939-1958) issued the first document labeled an “exhortation.”<sup>4</sup> The same year he addressed an “apostolic exhortation” to priests and clerics serving in the military.<sup>5</sup> While the qualifier “apostolic” suggests a higher degree of papal teaching authority, the Pope gave no explanation for adding the adjective. During his pontificate, Pius XII published two more “apostolic exhortations,”<sup>6</sup> and two other documents simply called “exhortations.”<sup>7</sup> His successor, John XXIII (1958-1963), was equally sparing in using this label; he issued only two “apostolic exhortations.”<sup>8</sup>

Only with Paul VI (1963-1978) does the apostolic exhortation become a regular document of the ordinary papal Magisterium – that which does not propose doctrines ex cathedra or infallibly.<sup>9</sup> The Pope made two significant contributions in this regard. First, he fixed the nomenclature: from then on, all exhortations have been labeled as “apostolic.” Second, he determined that this particular literary genre could be used to address the whole Church on important matters, though he attributed less doctrinal weight to apostolic exhortations than to encyclical letters. After the publication of Humanae Vitae in 1968, Paul VI did not write another encyclical, but his apostolic exhortations became more frequent. Perhaps the controversy provoked by his encyclical on human life deterred him from using the more authoritative genre. During the last ten years of his pontificate, however, Pope Paul published a number of apostolic exhortations, including several which had an influence on the Church's life equal to or greater than that of many papal encyclicals: Evangelica Testificatio (1971), on the renewal of religious life<sup>10</sup>; Marialis Cultus (1974), on devotion to the Blessed Virgin Mary<sup>11</sup>; Paterna cum Benevolentia (1974), on reconciliation within the Church<sup>12</sup>; and Gaudete in Domino (1975), on Christian joy.<sup>13</sup> His last one, Evangelii Nuntiandi (1975),<sup>14</sup> is really the first post-synodal apostolic exhortation, even though when it was issued, the term "post-synodal" was not yet used. Besides those published after the Synods, John Paul II, too, has written several apostolic exhortations: Redemptionis Donum (1984), to men and women Religious on their consecration in light of the mystery of the Redemption<sup>15</sup>; and Redemptoris Custos (1989), on the person and mission of Saint Joseph in the life of Christ and the Church.<sup>16</sup>

Apostolic exhortations generally entail a more restricted use of the Pope's ordinary Magisterium than do encyclicals. But as yet, there is no official or standard theological explanation for this specific kind of papal document. Two tentative conclusions, however, can be drawn. First, they are, as the name implies, chiefly "exhortative," even when the subject deals with issues of doctrinal significance. Second, the Pope does not write exhortations when he wants to teach on matters of faith or morals with the full force of his Petrine charism.

Exhortations Introduction

I. The Synod of Bishops

Post-synodal apostolic exhortations are papal documents which have their origin in the Synod of Bishops. The word “synod” comes from the Greek synodos, which means a “coming together.” In the early Church, assemblies patterned on the apostolic council held in Jerusalem (cf. Acts 15:5-29) frequently met to make decisions about matters of crucial interest to the Christian community. Today’s Synod of Bishops draws its inspiration from this ancient synodal activity and from the synodal government of the Eastern Churches, though it has specific characteristics. It is, then, a representative gathering of Bishops with the Pope who “make a journey together” to discuss vital pastoral questions.

In order to prolong the collegial experience which animated the Second Vatican Council, the Fathers recommended that a permanent body should be established which would express the Bishops’ coresponsibility for the universal Church. Paul VI quickly responded to their request, and in 1965 set up the Synod of Bishops.<sup>17</sup>

According to the 1983 Code of Canon Law, which follows Paul VI’s motu proprio of 1965 very closely, the Synod of Bishops has three purposes. First, it promotes closer unity between the Successor of Peter and the Successors of the Apostles by fostering the Bishops’ collegial solicitude for issues affecting the universal Church. Second, the Synod assists the Pope in carrying out his primatial ministry. Bishops from throughout the world gather to advise him on how best to proclaim and explain matters of faith and morals, and to maintain and strengthen ecclesiastical unity. Third, the Synod of Bishops takes up questions pertaining to the Church’s activity in the world, a pastoral duty which has become increasingly significant since the Second Vatican Council.<sup>18</sup>

Besides these stated canonical purposes, Synods in fact have other functions. They provide Bishops with a valuable forum in which they can discuss common pastoral problems. These Assemblies further knowledge on all sides and, if there is any misunderstanding, can help the Episcopal College to reach a common mind. The Synod of Bishops also affords the occasion for what Cardinal Joseph Ratzinger calls “mutual self-correction.” The Assemblies allow the Bishops and the Pope a unique opportunity to engage in a frank exchange of views. Some critics have observed, however, that the Bishops’ deferential attitude to the Pope curtails the freedom of synodal debate and limits their ability to offer him helpful advice.<sup>19</sup> In addition to fostering reciprocal correction, writes Ratzinger, Synods are meant to encourage and strengthen “the positive forces inside and outside the Church.”<sup>20</sup>

Since the Second Vatican Council, the Church has frequently been described as a communion. This ecclesiology provides a key for describing the mutual relations between the Bishops and the Pope in their care of the universal Church. Consequently, the Synod of Bishops can also be situated in the mystery of the Church as a communion. Episcopal Synods, in fact, are signs and instruments of the structured communion of the College of Bishops and give life to that communion. According to John Paul II, “the Synod constitutes a unique experience on a universal basis of episcopal communion, which strengthens the sense of the universal Church and the sense of responsibility of the Bishops toward the universal Church and her mission, in affective and effective communion around Peter.”<sup>21</sup>

The intimate connection between ecclesial communion and the Synod of Bishops has been pointed out by Cardinal Jan P. Schotte, Secretary General of the Synod of Bishops: “The collegiality which underlies the Synod of Bishops is not simply a juridico-disciplinary matter, rather it is a requirement of communion and actually fosters Church communion. . . . In this way, the Synod of Bishops is inserted into the life of the universal ecclesial communion as one of its moving forces and as one of its more important instruments.”<sup>22</sup> In 1990, John Paul affirmed that, in the years after Vatican II, the Synod “immediately proved to be a special expression and instrument of ecclesial communion.”<sup>23</sup> Later, in the post-synodal apostolic exhortation Ecclesia in Africa (1995), the Holy Father wrote: “The Synod of Bishops is an extremely beneficial instrument for fostering ecclesial communion. . . . the more the communion of the Bishops among themselves is strengthened, the more the communion of the Church as a whole is enriched” (§15). More than being a merely consultative body for practical matters, he added, the Synod helps the Church to move forward “by strengthening communion among her members, beginning with her Pastors” (§17.1).

As expressed by the Second Vatican Council, the Synod was to “bear testimony to the participation of all the Bishops in hierarchical communion in the care of the universal Church.”<sup>24</sup> The synodal process reveals the relationship of “mutual interiority” between the universal Church, represented by the Pope, and the particular Churches, represented by their Bishops. Each local Church, as a realization of the one Church of Christ, is therefore present in every other local Church, with which it shares its own gifts. The Bishop of Rome ensures the convergence of these gifts toward the center, the See of Peter, so that they may flow from there to the other Churches. During the synodal Assemblies, Bishops carry out their mission of serving the universal Church. In fact, they “express their apostolic solidarity in a preeminent way through the Synod of Bishops.”<sup>25</sup>

John Paul II is resolutely committed to the Synod of Bishops which, he says, was established by “a truly Providential act” of Paul VI and has matured in light of the Second Vatican Council. Speaking to the Council of the General Secretariat of the Synod of Bishops, he expressed a positive evaluation of the institution: “The experience of the post-conciliar period shows clearly in what noteworthy measure the synodal activity can set the pace for the pastoral life of the universal Church.”<sup>26</sup> In a certain way, the Synod of Bishops can now be considered a necessary institution belonging to the Church’s hierarchical structure. Addressing the Roman Curia in 1994, the Holy Father remarked: “For deciding issues of great importance there is need for a Synod, for a meeting of Pastors aided by experts who, through prayer and sharing experiences, are able to suggest useful operational techniques for that proclamation of the Gospel which is brought about by word and life.”<sup>27</sup> In still stronger terms, in off-the-cuff remarks in Manila, he commented that “it is necessary to return to this experience, the synodal experience of the Church [of the first millennium].” John Paul also added that history might judge him to have been “the Pope of the Synod” or the “Synodal Pope.”<sup>28</sup>

Instrument of collegiality

Episcopal Synods are collective gatherings that are an authentic “sign and instrument of the collegial spirit.”<sup>29</sup> They embody the principle of episcopal collegiality taught by the Second Vatican Council. Synods let Bishops have a say in the pastoral government of the universal Church, and enable the Pope to carry out his ministry in a collegial way. Although the Bishop of Rome also relies on the College of Cardinals and the Roman Curia to help him to discharge his ministry, he gives pride of place to the Synod of Bishops. The Code of Canon Law reflects this priority in its arrangement of the relevant canons: it treats the Synod of Bishops immediately after the College of Bishops, before the College of Cardinals.<sup>30</sup>

Collegiality allows for various degrees of intensity. In the fullest sense it belongs to the entire Episcopal College which, as the subject of supreme authority in the Church, is indivisible. Only when the College of Bishops acts as a corporate body can it engage in fully collegial acts. An Ecumenical Council, when all Bishops are gathered with the Pope, manifests effective collegiality in the strictest sense. Episcopal Synods enjoy less authority, since they cannot perform strictly collegial acts. A Synod is not a mini-Council but “an assembly of Bishops representing the Catholic episcopate.”<sup>31</sup> In ordinary circumstances the Episcopal College addresses major ecclesial concerns through the Synod of Bishops. This latter body manifests affective collegiality, or the “collegial spirit,” securing the fraternal bonds of solidarity between the Bishops and the Pope, and among the Bishops with one another.

John Paul II has frequently drawn attention to the connection between the Synod of Bishops and episcopal collegiality. Already in his first encyclical, the Pope referred to the Synod of Bishops as “a permanent organ of collegiality.”<sup>32</sup> According to him, “the Synod constitutes a realization and an illustration of the collegial nature of the order of Bishops, of which the Second Vatican Council has, so to speak, come to a renewed awareness.”<sup>33</sup> He is convinced that the Synod of Bishops provides a way for putting collegiality into practice. “Episcopal Synods, established after Vatican II, are meant,” the Holy Father said, “to realize concretely the participation of the Episcopal College in the universal government of the Church.”<sup>34</sup> For the Pope, the Synod “expresses collegiality in a highly intense way, even if it does not equal that achieved by the Council.”<sup>35</sup>

The Synod opens possibilities for the Bishops’ regular, disciplined, and collegial collaboration with the Successor of Peter. Repeatedly the Holy Father asserts that the Petrine ministry is meant to foster episcopal collegiality. Addressing the Council of the General Secretariat of the Synod of Bishops, he affirmed: “The Synod itself makes the intimate connection between collegiality and the primacy stand out: the task of the Successor of Peter is also service to the collegiality of the Bishops, and conversely the effective and affective collegiality of the Bishops is an important aid to the primatial Petrine service.”<sup>36</sup>

Jan P. Schotte, too, has referred to the Synod of Bishops as “an instrument of effective and affective collegiality” (Presentation of the Instrumentum Laboris for the 1990 Synod, L’Osservatore Romano, 30 [1990], 8). Many theologians, however, avoid describing the Synod of Bishops as an instance of “effective” collegiality, reserving that designation for the whole College of Bishops when it exercises supreme power as a corporate body. There are disputed questions: whether a strictly collegial act always requires the use of supreme authority, and whether collegiality can admit of varying degrees of intensity. See J. Michael Miller, The Shepherd and the Rock: Origins, Development, and Mission of the Papacy (Huntington: Our Sunday Visitor, Inc., 1995), 240-241; and Charles M. # Exhortations Introduction

The Pope's role

According to Apostolica Sollicitudo, the Synod of Bishops was to be closely associated with the papal office. This institution is, affirmed Paul VI, “directly and immediately subject to our power.”<sup>37</sup> The 1983 Code of Canon Law adopted the same position, describing it as a body at the service of the Pope: “It is the role of the Synod of Bishops to discuss the questions on their agenda and to express their desires about them but not to resolve them or to issue decrees about them, unless the Roman Pontiff in certain cases has endowed the Synod with deliberative power, and, in this event, it is his role to ratify its decisions.”<sup>38</sup> The Pope’s key role at Assemblies is expressed by his prerogatives: he convokes it when and where he sees fit; he ratifies the choice of delegates and names his own appointees; he determines the topics for discussion, sets the agenda, presides at its sessions or appoints a delegate; and he can conclude, transfer, suspend, or dissolve it.<sup>39</sup>

According to John Paul II, “the Synod of Bishops responds to the needs of the Church when the Successor of Peter, with the aid of his brother Bishops, has to carry out tasks which emerge from his apostolic mandate as universal Shepherd, amid complex circumstances which are subject to continuing change.”<sup>40</sup> The synodal Assembly meets cum Petro and sub Petro – with and under Peter’s authority. “In relationship with the Successor of Peter the Synod finds not only the guarantee of unity both in the origin and carrying out of its work, but also the basis for its authoritativeness.”<sup>41</sup> According to Ratzinger, the Synod of Bishops as an institution “derives its legal basis from the primacy,”<sup>42</sup> while at the same time it expresses the collegial nature of the Episcopal College.

It is now the custom for the Pope to attend all plenary sessions of the Synod. This practice confirms the Assembly’s truly “collegial” nature, since the head of the Episcopal College is present in the Synod Hall with his brother Bishops. His presence symbolizes and guarantees the unity of the Assembly. John Paul II wishes to carry out his primatial ministry “in a strong ‘framework’ of collegiality.”<sup>43</sup>

The Synod’s function is preeminently advisory to the Holy Father. Its members express their opinions to the Bishop of Rome on matters that he has chosen to submit for their discussion. After being given the topic, the Bishops gather information, debate it, and then identify and judge a course of action. Since the Assembly is a consultative body, the Pope is free to accept or reject its advice. In this respect the Synod of Bishops is unlike an Ecumenical Council, which acts in a fully collegial way, or the synodal bodies of the Eastern Churches, which resolve problems and issue decrees on their own authority.

Exhortations Introduction

Kinds of Synods

The 1983 Code of Canon Law lists three different kinds of Synods: ordinary, extraordinary, and special assemblies.

Exhortations Introduction

Ordinary Synods

Ordinary Synods now meet regularly in Rome, usually every three or four years, during the month of October. Nine of them took place between 1967 and 1997. Most Synod participants, who generally number just over two hundred,<sup>44</sup> are elected by Episcopal Conferences, according to a quota system based on their size. The Pope directly appoints fifteen percent of the voting membership, and the Union of Superiors General elects ten members from clerical religious Institutes. In addition, about thirty heads of the different departments of the Roman Curia are ex officio members of the Synod.<sup>45</sup> In 1971, lay experts were invited for the first time to take part in the Synod's preparatory stages and its fall meeting in Rome. Members of the laity, as well as consecrated men and women, are now routinely invited; so, too, are representatives of other Churches and Ecclesial Communities. While invited members can address the Synod Fathers and take part in discussions, they cannot vote.

The First Ordinary General Assembly met in 1967 and, in the wake of Vatican II, dealt with questions of doctrinal orthodoxy, the Code of Canon Law, seminaries, mixed marriages, and the liturgy. The Synod Fathers recommended the establishment of an International Theological Commission, approved the ten Guiding Principles which were to govern the revision of the Code of Canon Law, greater oversight of seminaries by Episcopal Conferences, and new regulations for mixed marriages. Paul VI acted on all five proposals.

The topics taken up by the Second Ordinary General Assembly were priesthood and justice. At its conclusion, the Synod issued two statements in its own name, though with Paul VI's approval: "The Ministerial Priesthood"<sup>46</sup> and "Justice in the World."<sup>47</sup> The Pope had these documents published in the Vatican's official journal, a practice not followed after the later Synods.<sup>48</sup>

In 1974, the topic for the third Synod was evangelization in the modern world. This subject came to have an enormous influence on the Church's life, no doubt due, at least in part, to the landmark apostolic exhortation, Evangelii Nuntiandi (1975), published by Pope Paul VI as the fruit of the Synod's deliberations.

The exhortations published after the Fourth to Ninth Ordinary General Assemblies are dealt with in the later chapters of this book. Each of these Synods treats either a particular pastoral question or a specific group of people in the Church, and after each the Pope issued an apostolic exhortation: catechesis (1977), Catechesi Tradendae (1979)<sup>49</sup>; the family (1980), Familiaris Consortio (1981)<sup>50</sup>; reconciliation and penance (1983), Reconciliatio et Paenitentia (1984)<sup>51</sup>; the laity (1987), Christifideles Laici (1988)<sup>52</sup>; the priesthood (1990), Pastores Dabo Vobis (1992)<sup>53</sup>; and the consecrated life (1994), Vita Consecrata

<sup>44</sup> The number of voting members at each Ordinary General Assembly of the Synod of Bishops is given in parentheses after the year it met: 1967 (197), 1971 (210), 1974 (209), 1977 (204), 1980 (216), 1983 (221), 1987 (232), 1990 (238), 1994 (244). Since 1971, participants from Africa, Asia, and Latin America have formed the majority.

Exhortations Introduction

Extraordinary Synods

Besides convoking the now regularly-scheduled Synods, the Pope can call an extraordinary Synod if an urgent matter affecting the whole Church needs to be addressed. Unlike the meetings of ordinary Synods, for which Episcopal Conferences elect the majority of the delegates, the membership of an extraordinary Synod consists principally of presidents of the Conferences. Heads of the departments of the Roman Curia and representatives of clerical Institutes of consecrated life also attend. Except for these norms concerning membership, however, “the distinction between ordinary and extraordinary Synods is not precise.”<sup>55</sup>

Between 1967 and 1997 two extraordinary Assemblies were held. In 1969, Paul VI called an extraordinary Synod to discuss the relation of the Episcopal Conferences to the Holy See and to one another, and the nature and exercise of collegiality. The Synod Fathers made three principal recommendations to the Pope: regular meetings of the Synod should be planned every two years (the practice was later changed to every three years); the Bishops should have input in determining the topic chosen for the Assembly; and a Council of the Synod, with twelve elected members (three each from Africa, the Americas, Asia and Oceania, and Europe) and three papal nominees, should be established. Paul VI immediately acted on the Fathers’ proposals.

In 1985, John Paul II convened an extraordinary Synod to commemorate the twentieth anniversary of the closing of the Second Vatican Council. He hoped that at this meeting the Bishops would relive the Council’s spirit of ecclesial communion, evaluate the implementation of the conciliar decrees, and foster the documents’ reception among the faithful. Among the significant recommendations of the 1985 Synod was the Fathers’ call for a catechism for the universal Church and a Code of Canon Law for the Oriental Churches. The former was published in 1992 as the Catechism of the Catholic Church, and the latter promulgated in 1990. At the end of this Synod and for the first time since 1971, the Bishops issued, with the Pope’s consent, an official report of its proceedings.<sup>56</sup>

Special assemblies

If a particularly critical question arises which affects a local Church or region, the Pope can call a special assembly of the Synod of Bishops for the area concerned. Membership in special assemblies “consists of those who have been especially selected from the regions for which the Synod has been convoked.”<sup>57</sup> Even though special assemblies deal with problems specific to a geographical area, they take up issues that can affect the Church throughout the world. They effectively demonstrate their bond with the universal Church by including some Bishops from other regions as voting members.

Since the promulgation of the Code of Canon Law in 1983, three special assemblies have been held.<sup>58</sup> In 1991, following the collapse of the Berlin Wall and in light of the new situation in eastern Europe, John Paul II called a Special Assembly for Europe of the Synod of Bishops. The Synod’s work culminated in the publication of a Final Declaration in which the Fathers presented a program for the new evangelization of Europe and appealed for solidarity among its citizens.<sup>59</sup>

The Special Assembly for Africa, which met in 1994, followed at every stage the procedures of an ordinary Assembly. This was also evident in its concluding documents. The Bishops issued a Message to the People of God, and the Pope published the Special Assembly’s results in a post-synodal apostolic exhortation, Ecclesia in Africa (1995).

In 1995, a Special Assembly for Lebanon met in Rome, and in 1997 the Holy Father signed, during his visit to Beirut, its follow-up apostolic exhortation, Une nouvelle espérance pour le Liban. In preparation for the third millennium, a Special Assembly for the Americas was held in 1997, and Special Assemblies were called for Asia and Oceania in 1998, and Europe in 1999.

<sup>58</sup> The Dutch Synod (1980) and the Synod for the Ukraine (1980) both took place before the promulgation of the Code of Canon Law in 1983, which legislated the three types of Synod. In 1980, John Paul II referred to both of them as “particular Synods” (Address to the Roman Curia, July 28, 1980, L’Osservatore Romano, 28 [1980], 13). Theologians and canonists, however, generally prefer to describe the two Synods of 1980 as “particular sessions” of the Synod of Bishops. For his part, the General Secretary of the Synod of Bishops lists the Dutch Synod among the special assemblies (Jan P. Schotte, Presentation of the Lineamenta for the Special Assembly for America of the Synod of Bishops, L’Osservatore Romano, 37 [1996], 8).

Exhortations Introduction

Preparation and Meeting of the Synod

Since 1974, each Synod has dealt with a specific problem in the Church's life. Before the end of a synodal Assembly, the Fathers are polled for their suggestions about the next topic to be studied. Afterward, the Council of the General Secretariat of the Synod of Bishops consults Patriarchs of the Eastern Churches, Episcopal Conferences, heads of the dicasteries of the Roman Curia, and the Union of Superiors General for their proposals about a theme. According to synodal regulations, these submissions are to be guided by four norms. The topic must be: of interest to the whole People of God; capable of fostering the Church's growth; pastorally relevant yet with doctrinal implications; and a subject which lends itself to synodal discussion. After compiling the proposals, the Council submits to the Pope a list of topics accompanied by observations. The Holy Father chooses the theme of the next Synod and, consequently, the topic of the subsequent post-synodal apostolic exhortation.

While John Paul usually takes the advice which the Council offers him, on occasion he has either selected or modified the topic. For example, he expressly added to the 1980 Synod on the family an emphasis on its role in the modern world. Likewise, in 1983 the Pope changed the theme from the suggested "reconciliation and renewal" to "reconciliation and penance."<sup>60</sup> Since the beginning of John Paul's pontificate, the subjects dealt with have reflected many of his long-standing pastoral concerns: the family and conjugal sexuality, the need for individual confession, the mission of the laity in the world, priestly formation and celibacy, and the renewal of the consecrated life.

Each Synod is a process which lasts at least four years, from the time of choosing a theme to the publication of the post-synodal apostolic exhortation. The entire synodal procedure is meant to be a "continuous process of prayer, reflection, verification, and orientation so as to deepen a sense of the Church's mission and to stimulate all the people of God to participate in this mission, each according to his or her state."<sup>61</sup> Such a demanding task involves extensive preparation. This entails gathering information and opinions in order to prepare a working document capable of guiding the Assembly's Roman phase. For the process to be successful the Bishops should come together only "after they have deeply reflected together with the people on the topic, so that what they bring to the Synod is really the input of the whole Church."<sup>62</sup> With each passing Synod, consultation has been broadened to include more and more groups.

According to established procedures, the synodal Assembly in Rome unfolds in three distinct phases, which together last for about a month. The first phase, of about a week, is devoted to the eight-minute interventions made to the whole Assembly by delegates of the Episcopal Conferences or by individual Bishops on their own. During this week the Synod Fathers hear the results of the local consultations, and a panoramic view of the pastoral and doctrinal issues in a worldwide framework. This listening and informative phase is followed by small-group discussion, which focuses on a series of questions drawn up for the participants on the basis of the individual interventions. These circuli minores meet for about a week in language groups which, with the help of experts, report their conclusions back to the full Assembly. The small groups then work on preparing a list of recommendations, which will eventually be submitted to the Pope. These “propositiones” are winnowed by a drafting committee, and then debated and voted on by all the Synod Fathers. During this last phase another drafting committee prepares the Synod’s Final Message, which the Fathers also debate and vote on.

The synodal procedure favors suggestions which reflect a wide collegial consensus, and tends to eliminate minority views. According to Thomas P. Rausch, “the Synod process resembles a funnel which filters the diversity of opinions expressed on the floor down to the acceptable common denominator.”<sup>63</sup> In a similar vein, Cardinal Edward B. Clancy said at the 1990 Synod of Bishops: “The achievement of consensus in the propositions often results in a certain blandness, the repetition of general truth, and the elimination of ideas that are new and challenging. It is to be hoped that future Synods might provide greater scope for the prophetic voices among us to reach the ears of the Pope.”<sup>64</sup>

II. Post-Synodal Apostolic Exhortations

Beginning in 1975, with the publication of Evangelii Nuntiandi, a new type of papal document came into being: the post-synodal apostolic exhortation. At a time when the formerly precise distinctions between different kinds of papal documents are now less carefully observed,<sup>65</sup> the post-synodal apostolic exhortation is an innovative genre of pontifical statement, one which contributes to finding “a way of exercising the primacy which, while in no way renouncing what is essential to its mission, is nonetheless open to a new situation.”<sup>66</sup>

The origin of post-synodal apostolic exhortations lies in the synodal experience which had been maturing since the end of the Second Vatican Council. John Paul has said that “the Synod of Bishops has contributed in a most noteworthy manner to the implementation of the teachings and the doctrinal and pastoral directives of the Second Vatican Council in the life of the universal Church.”<sup>67</sup> By implication, this contribution applies also to the final act of the Synod, the post-synodal apostolic exhortation, which sums up the whole synodal experience. It is a document whose purpose is to interpret, apply, and develop the achievements and reforms of Vatican II. The Holy Father has noted that the results of the Synod Fathers’ discussion of pastoral and doctrinal questions are “produced in agreement with the Apostolic See,” and “collected in documents which are disseminated everywhere.”<sup>68</sup>

The Fathers at the first Assemblies of the Synod of Bishops never envisioned that their discussions would be used as the basis of a later papal document. Paul VI’s Apostolica Sollicitudo made no provision for any post-synodal publication, either by the Fathers or by the Pope. The Fathers at the 1971 Synod on justice and priestly ministry, however, issued two statements. But, it was later asked, by what authority did they write such documents?

This question was settled by the 1974 Synod on evangelization, the first one prepared and organized by the Council of the General Secretariat of the Synod of Bishops. When preparing a final document, as had been done at the end of the 1971 Synod, the Fathers reached an impasse. The majority of the Assembly rejected the proposal submitted for their approval by the committee charged with drawing up such a document. At the end of the Synod, wrote Peter Hebblethwaite, the Fathers “simply dumped a series of confused propositions in the papal lap and invited the Pope to sort them out.”<sup>69</sup> Admitting their inability to compose a final document in the course of their meetings, the Fathers wrote in the closing Declaration: “We have preferred to offer the integral fruits of our exchange to the Holy Father with great confidence and simplicity, and to await a new impetus from him.”<sup>70</sup>

That new impetus was the first post-synodal apostolic exhortation. While the Fathers may not have intended it, their failure to issue a statement fixed the pattern for subsequent Synods: the Pope would publish a document after its conclusion. During the Assembly of 1977, Bishop Wladyslaw Rubin, the Secretary General of the Synod of Bishops, suggested that “the final document could be prepared in such a way that what is submitted to the Pope could, with his permission, be published for the entire people of God.”<sup>71</sup> By the end of that Synod, however, it was assumed that the Fathers would no longer even try to draw up and approve a lengthy final text. Whereas after the 1974 Synod the Fathers submitted to the Pope a narrative report on their deliberations, from 1977 onward their submission has taken the form of specific recommendations, along with the other documentation produced. Undoubtedly the practical impossibility of being able to write a suitable document during the course of month-long proceedings influenced the Holy Father to take the matter in hand.

In 1977, Philippe Delhay, then Secretary of the International Theological Commission, warned the Synod Fathers against imitating the Second Vatican Council’s practice of composing documents: “The fact that Vatican II published such a large number is no reason for the Synods to be obsessed with composing numerous and long declarations every time.” His advice was not taken. Nor was his accompanying suggestion that it would be better if the Synod were “to recall some principles, instead of wanting to write long treatises on theology and the apostolate.”<sup>72</sup>

The first document which John Paul explicitly labeled a “post-synodal” apostolic exhortation was Reconciliatio et Paenitentia (1984). But, as we have seen, the apostolic exhortations published after the Synods of 1974, 1977, and 1980 can, in retrospect, also claim that designation. The term “post-synodal” was carefully chosen: the “post” is a reminder that the Assembly itself does not issue the exhortation; and the adjective “apostolic” explicitly affirms that the exhortation belongs to the papal Magisterium. By adding “post-synodal” to the title, the Holy Father suggests that he wishes to highlight the specifically collegial nature of this kind of apostolic exhortation: “Because of their collaborative nature, the documents resulting from recent Synods are expressly called ‘post-synodal.’”<sup>73</sup>

NOTES:

<sup>65</sup> It is puzzling, for example, that a document of such doctrinal importance as Ordinatio Sacerdotalis (1994) was issued as an apostolic letter, and not as an encyclical or apostolic constitution.

Documentary Sources

Assemblies of the Synod of Bishops generate a wealth of documentation. Much of this comes from the Synod's preparatory stages, especially the initial outline for discussion, or Lineamenta, and the working document, or Instrumentum Laboris, which are produced at this time. The Lineamenta and Instrumentum Laboris were drafted for the first time for the 1974 Synod on evangelization, and today they are still the preparatory documents of every Assembly. During its meeting in Rome the Synod produces many more texts, including the moderator's opening and closing summaries, the participants' interventions in the Assembly Hall, the minutes of the small discussion groups, the Final Message to the People of God, and the propositiones, or recommendations, submitted to the Holy Father.

Exhortations Introduction

Papal contributions

John Paul readily acknowledges his debt to this vast documentation. He admits that in writing an exhortation he makes “abundant use of the documents left by the Synod.”<sup>74</sup> But he also draws on material that he has prepared for the particular Synod, both before and during its meeting in Rome. This personal documentation includes the addresses often given before, during, and after the meeting of the Synod at the Wednesday general audience or the Sunday Angelus. For example, in the fall of 1979, John Paul began a five-year cycle of reflections on the Book of Genesis. These talks, he said, had as one of their aims “the purpose of accompanying, from afar, so to speak, the work of preparation for the Synod [on the family], not touching its subject directly, however, but turning our attention to the deep roots from which this subject springs.”<sup>75</sup> The influence of these weekly reflections is evident in Familiaris Consortio (1981), even though they are never directly cited.

For the more recent Synods, John Paul has prepared mini-treatises on the theme under discussion. At the time of the 1987 Synod on the laity, instead of using the Wednesday general audience addresses, he relied on the shorter format of his Sunday Angelus reflections. Over eighteen Sundays he set the tone for the synodal Assembly and, at least indirectly, spelled out his thoughts for the subsequent post-synodal apostolic exhortation.<sup>76</sup> Again in 1990, the Pope used the Angelus format to convey his ideas on the Synod’s theme, delivering twenty-seven short talks on priestly formation.<sup>77</sup> For the 1994 Synod, the Holy Father spoke on the consecrated life during his regular Wednesday catechesis. Beginning just before the Synod’s opening, and continuing for over four months, John Paul gave a series of twenty addresses on the consecrated life.<sup>78</sup> This time he acknowledged his debt to these talks in his post-synodal document: “During the Synod, I also sought to offer the entire People of God a number of systematic talks on the consecrated life in the Church. In them I presented anew the teachings found in the texts of the Second Vatican Council, which was an enlightening point of reference for subsequent doctrinal developments and for the reflections of the Synod during the busy weeks of its work.”<sup>79</sup> Besides these non-synodal addresses, the Pope’s homilies at the Synod’s principal liturgies, as well as his opening and closing addresses to the Fathers, provide additional material that he later drew on.

“Lineamenta”

The greatest influence on the content of a post-synodal apostolic exhortation comes from the documents produced for and by the Synod of Bishops itself. Once the Pope has decided on the topic, the General Secretary calls upon various experts in the particular field to draft the Lineamenta, a document outlining the specific issues that need attention. It is reviewed by the Council of the General Secretariat, approved by the Pope, translated into various languages, and then distributed for official comments to the Episcopal Conferences, the Roman Curia, and the Union of Superiors General.<sup>80</sup> This preliminary document sets the synodal process in motion in the local Churches.

The purpose of the Lineamenta is to encourage the whole Church’s participation by stimulating discussion, observations, and suggestions. Destined to be superseded, this outline is not an exhaustive treatment of the subject or a theological treatise. Nor is it meant to anticipate the Synod’s possible conclusions or serve as the initial draft of a subsequent apostolic exhortation. Rather, the Lineamenta is intended to foster reflection and prayer, and to provide the Bishops and other interested parties with input. At the end of the preparatory document is a series of open-ended questions whose purpose is to structure the discussion at the grassroots level. They are deliberately framed in general terms, leaving local groups maximum freedom to express themselves.

Every recipient of the Lineamenta is expected to study them carefully. When a Bishop prepares his response, he is encouraged to consult others: diocesan and religious priests, women and men Religious, the laity, movements, associations, faculties of theology, and various diocesan councils. This process of consultation takes between six and nine months, after which the Bishop drafts his response, which he sends to the Episcopal Conference of which he is a member. The Conference then compiles the reactions and suggestions, and sends them to the General Secretariat in Rome.<sup>81</sup> Departments of the Roman Curia and the Union of Superiors General also submit their recommendations, as do some individual Bishops.

<sup>80</sup> See the Lineamenta for the Synod on catechetics: Origins, 5 (1976), 741, 743-751; for the Synod on the family: Origins, 9 (1979), 113, 115-128; for the Synod on reconciliation and penance: Origins, 11 (1982), 565, 567-580; for the Synod on the laity: Origins, 14 (1985), 624-634; for the Synod on priestly formation: Origins, 19 (1989), 33, 35-46; and for the Synod on the consecrated life: L’Osservatore Romano, 48 (1992), 5-16, and Origins, 22 (1992), 433, 435-454.

<sup>81</sup> The percentage of responses from the Episcopal Conferences varies considerably from one Synod to the next: 75 percent in 1974, 67 percent in 1977, 50 percent in 1980, 43 percent in 1983, 54 percent in 1987, 64 percent in 1990, and 65 percent in 1994 (Jan P. Schotte, Presentation of the Instrumentum Laboris for the 1990 Synod, L'Osservatore Romano, 30 [1990], 8; and Reese, Inside the Vatican, 52).

Exhortations Introduction

“Instrumentum Laboris”

After sifting through the responses to the Lineamenta, the General Secretariat draws up, with the help of the Pre-Synodal Council of the Secretariat, the Instrumentum Laboris. It is put together after reading all the submissions, from which a selection of principal subjects is made. All relevant material is compiled into a text which organizes the reflections, experiences, and proposals sent to the General Secretariat. The working document also provides a kind of general summary of the Church’s teaching on the Synod’s theme, giving special attention to the contribution of the Second Vatican Council.<sup>82</sup> After the Pope approves the Instrumentum Laboris, it is translated and sent to the Synod participants. For the more recent Assemblies, John Paul has allowed the Instrumentum Laboris to be published in order to encourage widespread participation in the synodal process.

Although the Instrumentum Laboris is designed to help guide the Fathers’ deliberations in Rome, during the Assembly they are free to amend, complete, or rewrite it. The document’s usefulness to the synodal process depends on the quality of the responses received. Not a summary of the submissions, the Instrumentum Laboris is intended as a point of departure for discussion both before and during the synodal Assembly.

Despite the thoroughness of the Instrumentum Laboris, “this document should not be considered an anticipation of the conclusions of the Assembly.”<sup>83</sup> However, insofar as the working document incorporates the replies to the Lineamenta, it is a good gauge of the mind of the universal Church on the matter under discussion. John Paul considers the Instrumentum Laboris to be “a sign and builder of communion,” since “it expresses the voice of the Church, and at the same time it fosters an exchange which enriches that voice in the common task.”<sup>84</sup>

Messages to the People of God

To mark the end of the 1974 Synod on evangelization, the Fathers, who had failed to approve a longer document, issued a shorter final public Declaration.<sup>85</sup> In 1977, at the close of the Synod on catechesis, the Fathers published a brief statement which they entitled “Message to the People of God.” All subsequent Synods have followed suit.<sup>86</sup> These messages, however, are not designed to settle matters or to be understood as decrees on the subject, since that is not the Synod’s competency.<sup>87</sup> Nonetheless the Pope frequently cites or incorporates material from the Fathers’ Messages to the People of God in his post-synodal apostolic exhortations.

Exhortations Introduction

“Propositiones”

Toward the end of the synodal Assembly, the Fathers vote on a series of propositiones to be sent to the Pope. These recommendations, whose number varies from Synod to Synod,<sup>88</sup> sum up the mind of the Fathers as it was expressed in their discussion.<sup>89</sup> Unlike the Lineamenta and Instrumentum Laboris, the propositiones are fully “synodal,” in that the Fathers draw them up. The propositiones are, so to speak, a primary goal of the Assembly’s synodal journey, and their importance is confirmed by being voted on. As the final result of the Fathers’ shared reflection, they manifest what Archbishop Jozef Tomko has called “synodal truth.”<sup>90</sup> This official list of recommendations usually reflects the widespread consultation previously carried out in the local Churches.<sup>91</sup> It contains elements taken from the entire synodal process: from the Lineamenta to the final conclusions. In this way the Synod Fathers’ consensus is communicated to the Pope, and they invite him to compose the final comprehensive statement of their deliberations. In Christifideles Laici (1988), for example, he writes: “The Synod Fathers made known to me their desires and requested that, at an opportune time, a conclusive papal document on the topic of the lay faithful be offered to the universal Church” (§2.11).<sup>92</sup>

The propositiones are not officially made public. Sometimes, however, they become known,<sup>93</sup> and their results compared to the later papal document.<sup>94</sup> It is hard to assess the precise extent to which the Pope uses the Fathers’ proposals and other materials in drawing up the post-synodal document. Patrick Granfield notes the difficulty in determining “how closely the apostolic exhortations accurately reflect the deliberations of the Synod – not an easy task considering the aura of secrecy that surrounds much of its proceedings.”<sup>95</sup> With the passing of time, however, John Paul has directly cited the propositiones with increasing frequency. There are only three explicit references to the propositiones in Catechesi Tradendae (1979),<sup>96</sup> two in Familiaris Consortio (1982),<sup>97</sup> and five in Reconciliatio et Paenitentia (1984).<sup>98</sup> But there are 45 in Christifideles Laici (1988), 66 in Pastores Dabo Vobis (1992), and 67 in Vita Consecrata (1995). This trend reflects the Pope’s desire to confirm how much he relies on the Fathers’ official recommendations.

In fact, the Pope often acknowledges his extensive use of the material prepared for him by the Synod Fathers, which includes the Lineamenta and Instrumentum Laboris, the reports of the plenary sessions and of the small group meetings, the propositiones, and the input of the Council of the General Secretariat of the Synod. With the help of experts, this Council examines the Synod’s conclusions and suggests how they could be implemented. It then gives the results of its consultations to the Holy Father. What does he do with them? After the Council presented him with the results of the Synod on the family, John Paul told the members: “We assure you that we will make use of them when we draw up a document on this matter.”<sup>99</sup> And after the publication of Familiaris Consortio (1981), he let it be known that he had kept his promise: “At the end of the Synod, I gathered up and developed its propositiones, taking also into account the suggestions made at the daily meetings in which I took part.”<sup>100</sup> Speaking to the Fathers at the end of the 1987 Synod, the Pope agreed to gather “the wishes and the will clearly expressed by the Fathers,” and to take into serious account “that sort of ‘author’s rights’ that belong to the Synod itself.”<sup>101</sup> Soon afterward, in an address to the Roman Curia, he again mentioned his obligation to be faithful to the Assembly’s deliberations: “As with preceding Synods, it shall be my duty to follow the indications that have emerged during those unforgettable days.”<sup>102</sup> Returning to the same point for a third time, the Holy Father expressed his thanks to the Council of the General Secretariat for the “synodal aid” which it provided. He assured them that he would study all the material “so that the whole wealth of the Synod itself will be reflected in my post-synodal document.”<sup>103</sup> At the conclusion of the 1990 Synod on priestly formation, the Pope expressed his appreciation for the Fathers’ contribution:

The extensive consultation which the Synod structure allows for during every Assembly has never failed to yield results and decisions as well. Given the way they function, Synods are never able to immediately publish a document which takes on deliberative form. That notwithstanding, the post-synodal document takes its inspiration from and, one might say, contains what was planned out in common. It therefore can be asserted that a Synod’s proposals indirectly assume the importance of decisions. For, when the Sovereign Pontiff publishes the corresponding document, he takes great care to express the full wealth of the reflections and discussion which led up to the synodal Propositiones, as well as the views of the synodal Assembly, as much as possible.<sup>104</sup>

John Paul makes a conscious effort to bring the whole synodal process to completion with a papal document which reflects the mind of the Synod.

NOTES:

<sup>88</sup> The number of propositiones submitted to the Pope varies as follows: 34 for the 1977 Synod on catechesis; 43 for the 1980 Synod on the family; 63 for the 1983 Synod on reconciliation and penance; 54 for the 1987 Synod on the laity; 41 for the 1990 Synod on priestly formation; and 55 for the 1994 Synod on the consecrated life.

<sup>89</sup> Cardinal Aloysio Lorscheider has expressed, however, some of the frustrations connected with formulating the propositiones. Many Bishops, he says, complain that “their recommendations are not faithfully recorded or followed up, especially when the recommendations refer to matters which are the subject of debate in the Church, or when they offend some people's key sensibilities" (Address at the Synod of Bishops, Eighth Ordinary General Assembly, October 1, 1990, Catholic International, 1 [1990], 223).

<sup>91</sup> On the other hand, Archbishop John R. Quinn has suggested that the Synod Fathers are intimidated by the presence of representatives of the Roman Curia in the Assembly Hall, and that "it is made clear that certain recommendations should not be made to the Pope at the conclusion of a Synod" ("Considering the Papacy," Origins, 26 [1996], 124).

<sup>92</sup> The first recommendation of the 1987 Synod stated: "Therefore the Synod Fathers ask the Holy Father to be willing to offer to the universal Church at an appropriate time a document on the vocation and mission of the laity in the Church and in the world" (Origins, 17 [1987], 500).

<sup>94</sup> See the study of Jan Grootaers and Joseph A. Selling on the 1980 Synod. They conclude that 15 percent of Familiaris Consortio is taken from the Bishops' propositiones. ## Collegial Documents

As an instrument of ecclesial communion, the Synod of Bishops is “a unique expression of the collegiality of the Bishops with the Pope.”<sup>105</sup> Moreover, when the Holy Father consigns to writing the fruit of the Synod’s deliberations and proposals in a post-synodal apostolic exhortation, his document expresses the same collegiality evident during the synodal Assembly. In the introduction to Christifideles Laici (1988), John Paul remarks that his document “is not something in contradistinction to the Synod, but is meant to be a faithful and coherent expression of it, a fruit of collegiality” (§2.12). As no other papal document, post-synodal apostolic exhortations reflect a unique exercise of the Church’s ordinary Magisterium, one which is both primatial and collegial.

The Bishop of Rome is not juridically bound to accept a Synod’s propositiones. Even though canonically the recommendations are merely consultative, they nonetheless enjoy a large measure of moral authority. For John Paul, the vote of the Synod Fathers, “if morally unanimous, has a qualitative ecclesial weight which surpasses the merely formal aspect of the consultative vote.”<sup>106</sup> In the same vein he adds: “It is therefore even more important that the documents, which appear after the Synod, reflect the common thought of the Synod Assembly and of the Pope who presides over it ex officio.”<sup>107</sup> Because the Holy Father wants his exhortations to be faithful summaries of the Synod’s deliberations,<sup>108</sup> he is firmly committed to the principle that the document “will reflect what has emerged during the course of the Assembly.”<sup>109</sup> The Pope treats the Synod Fathers’ official proposals as an authoritative witness to the life and faith of the whole Church. But, at the same time, he carefully avoids saying that the Fathers’ proposals oblige him, leaving himself free to incorporate the Synod’s views as he sees fit.

Post-synodal apostolic exhortations are therefore the outcome of two complementary factors: the vast collective input of the Bishops and the personal contribution of the Pope. In Reconciliatio et Paenitentia (1984), for example, John Paul declares his indebtedness to the Synod Fathers:

The document . . . is also – and I wish to say this clearly as a duty to truth and justice – something produced by the Synod itself. For the contents of these pages come from the Synod. . . . Here we have the result of the joint work of the Fathers (§4.13).

According to the Pope, a post-synodal apostolic exhortation is “a fruit of collegiality,”<sup>110</sup> a response to what the Synod Fathers have asked him to do.

John Paul admits that he needs the Bishops’ input in order to address doctrinal and pastoral issues in a relevant and convincing way. In Evangelium Vitae (1995), he had acknowledged that he asked the Bishops, “in the spirit of collegiality,” to offer him “their cooperation” in drawing up the encyclical (§5.2). Although this kind of consultation is unusual in the case of encyclicals, it has become normative for post-synodal apostolic exhortations. In the latter documents the Pope can recast in a more global framework the counsel offered by the particular Churches. From their recommendations he draws up guidelines suitable for the whole Church. In this way the Synod is collectively involved in reaching decisions about major questions affecting Church life. For the Holy Father, this episcopal collaboration expresses collegiality. Post-synodal apostolic exhortations can therefore be considered as the end result of a truly “collegial endeavor.”<sup>111</sup> In John Paul’s mind, Synods significantly influence the formulation of his teaching in post-synodal apostolic exhortations.<sup>112</sup>

Post-synodal apostolic exhortations, besides providing the Successor of Peter with an instrument for exercising the particular charism of teaching that belongs to his office, are also a way for him to proclaim the mind of the Synod to the whole world. After the 1980 Synod, John Paul accepted the Fathers’ request that he should be “a spokesman before humanity of the Church’s lively care for the family and to give suitable indications for renewed pastoral effort in this fundamental sector of the life of man and of the Church.”<sup>113</sup> In Reconciliatio et Paenitentia (1984), he mentions that he accepted, “as a serious and welcome duty” of his ministry, the task of drawing up a doctrinal pastoral message for the People of God based on the fruit of the Synod (cf. §4.12).

According to John Paul, the promulgation of a post-synodal apostolic exhortation is a way of “actuating in a particular matter the apostolic ministry”<sup>114</sup> with which he is entrusted. In fact, in these exhortations the Pope uses his Petrine charism in a novel way: by serving as a kind of arbiter or “clearing house” at the center of ecclesial communion. The way in which John Paul writes and issues his post-synodal apostolic exhortations reflects his understanding of the papal office as a ministry within, and at the service of (though not dependent on), the College of Bishops.

As a genre of papal document, post-synodal apostolic exhortations are theologically and pastorally innovative. They are perfectly in tune with Vatican II’s ecclesiology of communion and its teaching on the common responsibility of the whole Episcopal College for the “care of all the churches” (2 Cor 11:28). More than encyclicals, post-synodal exhortations emphasize the Pope’s role within the College of Bishops. In his exhortations he stresses that he is speaking in the name of his brother Bishops, giving them a single voice. The Successor of Peter “receives” the Synod’s deliberations in order to transmit them to the whole Church. Such a function belongs to the Pope as the center of the visible communion of the universal Church. The Bishops fulfill their mission of witnessing to the faith of their local Churches within the worldwide communion through their representatives at the Synod. During the pontificate of John Paul II, the publication of post-synodal apostolic exhortations has opened up a new way for Bishops around the world to collaborate with the Bishop of Rome. The pastoral effectiveness of the Church's ordinary Magisterium is strengthened when it is articulated by the Pope in union with the Bishops in post-synodal apostolic exhortations. Collegial texts, which combine both synodal and papal contributions, are more likely to receive a hearing. Because they are produced with widespread cooperation, the faithful, who are increasingly aware of the importance of participation in building up the Church, are often better disposed to receive the teaching contained in post-synodal apostolic exhortations rather than that proposed without evident input from the laity or College of Bishops.

Audience

John Paul II addresses his post-synodal apostolic exhortations to the Church throughout the world: to her Bishops, clergy, and faithful. In the exhortations dealing with the family, laity, priesthood, and consecrated life, special mention is made of the particular group concerned, but never to the exclusion of others.

Unlike many of John Paul's encyclicals, which address "all men and women of good will" in the opening greeting,<sup>115</sup> none of his post-synodal apostolic exhortations do so. Familiaris Consortio (1981) includes a special appeal to "the young, who are beginning their journey toward marriage and family life" (§1.3); at the end, it urges "that every person of good will should endeavor to save and foster the values and requirements of the family" (§86.3). In Reconciliatio et Paenitentia (1984) the Holy Father mentions, though not in the salutation, that he is writing "also to all those who, whether they are believers or not, look to the Church with interest and sincerity" (§4.13). And in Vita Consecrata (1996), besides including the Bishops, priests, deacons, consecrated persons, and laity among those addressed, the Pope refers to "any others who might be interested" (§4.1). Despite some attention to a wider audience, post-synodal apostolic exhortations are primarily written for the Church's faithful.

Style

Like other papal and Vatican documents, post-synodal apostolic exhortations are known by the first two or three words of their Latin title – the incipit. The closing of the exhortations is stylized. It indicates the place of publication, “in Rome, at Saint Peter’s,” 116 as well as the calendar date, the liturgical feast celebrated on the day of publication, and the year of the Pope’s pontificate.

The authoritative version of a post-synodal apostolic exhortation is published in Latin in the Vatican’s official organ, the Acta Apostolicae Sedis. The various language sections of the Secretariat of State are responsible for preparing or overseeing the approved translations, 117 usually made from an Italian draft, though the official text is the Latin. 118 These translations appear in Dutch, English, French, German, Polish, Portuguese, and Spanish.

Even though post-synodal apostolic exhortations strike a less personal note than encyclicals, due to the collegial cooperation involved in their preparation, they still bear John Paul’s stamp and reflect his style. Above all they reflect a profoundly positive attitude. While fidelity to the truth demands that deviations and errors be pointed out, the Pope constantly seeks to confirm the good fruits of the Second Vatican Council, encourage new pastoral initiatives, and exhort those addressed. Often he includes very personal observations and remarks – a practice which has become more evident in later documents.

Some critics have observed that the consensual nature of the material sent to the Pope lends itself to making the post-apostolic exhortations bland rather than prophetic, exhaustive rather than incisive, tried and true rather than innovative. The post-synodal apostolic exhortations are said to lack the vivid and passionate language found in John Paul’s major encyclicals. Others point out that the exhortations are often long and unwieldy compendia of established teaching on a given subject. 119 This approach, however, can be defended. Unlike scholarly works, whose purpose is to bring to light new insights, the exhortations express the received faith of the whole community. Each one is a kind of vademecum which aims to teach what is true in a way that enables the People of God to see why it is true.

NOTES:

<sup>116</sup> The only exceptions to this practice of promulgation in Rome are in the two post-synodal apostolic exhortations published after special assemblies of the Synod of Bishops: Ecclesia in Africa (1995): “Given at Yaoundé, in Cameroon”; and Une nouvelle espérance pour le Liban (1997): “Given at Beirut, on the occasion of my pastoral visit in Lebanon.”

<sup>117</sup> It seems, however, that on occasion certain translations betray another hand. The rather consistent use of inclusive language in the official translation of Christifideles Laici, for instance, stands out.

<sup>119</sup> As the following statistics show, the number of words in the post-synodal apostolic exhortations varies considerably. With the passing of time, there has been a tendency to increasing length: Catechesi Tradendae (20,000), Familiaris Consortio (35,000), Reconciliatio et Paenitentia (28,000), Christifideles Laici (40,000), Pastores Dabo Vobis (54,000), and Vita Consecrata (43,000).

Sacred Scripture

Following his usage in other papal documents, John Paul refers liberally to the Bible in his exhortations. Although he cites from a broad range of scriptural texts, the Pope also shows a preference for certain books: above all the Gospels, especially John; Romans, 1 Corinthians, and Ephesians in the Pauline literature; and Genesis and the Psalms in the Old Testament.<sup>120</sup>

When the Holy Father cites Sacred Scripture in his post-synodal apostolic exhortations, he draws very little on the methods of contemporary biblical scholarship, despite his acknowledgment elsewhere of their importance.<sup>121</sup> His concern is not the original historical context or the stages of a text's formation. The Pope's purpose in citing Scripture is not to distinguish different authors or traditions, as in historical-critical exegesis, but to "sustain a unitary vision of the one God who speaks equally powerfully through every biblical witness."<sup>122</sup>

According to the Pope, the Bible is primarily a testimony to divine truth and love which must come alive and animate the Church of today. It is a collection of religious writings meant to inspire believers and the community of faith. The Holy Father stresses the Scriptures' unity and coherence as a witness to the whole of revelation. By no means does he limit the meaning of the Bible to an exclusively historical one, but he opens up its meaning for today. Indeed, it is always the religious and spiritual message that catches his interest and it is that message which he seeks to convey in his writings.

John Paul's approach might be called "catechetical exegesis." He recommends this approach in Catechesi Tradendae (1979), where he says that the Bible should be read "with the intelligence and heart of the Church . . . drawing inspiration from the two thousand years of the Church's reflection and life" (§27.2). This means that he reads Scripture and uses it in his documents in order to bring the word of God into the present. Typical of this desire to "actualize" the Bible is his reading of the call of Andrew and Peter recounted in John's Gospel (cf. 1:35-42). In Pastores Dabo Vobis, the Pope says that John's narrative of the call of the two brothers "in some way is renewed constantly down the ages" (§34.4). The exhortations illustrate that John Paul's approach to Scripture is founded on lectio divina. His reading of the biblical texts is accompanied by reflection, meditation, prayer, and contemplation – the richness of which he strives to convey in his documents.

In several of his post-synodal apostolic exhortations the Holy Father often uses a particular rhetorical device. He presents a vivid biblical text from which he can draw observations and to which he frequently returns in the same document. For instance, in Familiaris Consortio (1981), John Paul relies heavily on selected passages from Genesis 1-3, Matthew 19:1-9, and Ephesians 5:21-33 to develop his understanding of conjugal love. Reconciliatio et Paenitentia (1984) draws on the parable of the prodigal son (Lk 15:11-32), with an emphasis on the older brother, to describe the meaning of sin and reconciliation. In Christifideles Laici (1988), the Pope invokes the Johannine image of the vine and the branches (15:1-7), and couples it with other similar references, in order to describe the laity's vocation and mission in the Church. Pastores Dabo Vobis (1992), as the title indicates, is structured around the scriptural image of the shepherd taken from the Old and New Testaments (cf. Jer 3:15; Jn 10:1-18), as well as Jesus' teaching in the synagogue at Nazareth (cf. Lk 4:16-22) and his call of the disciples (cf. Mk 3:13-15). In Vita Consecrata (1996), he uses the account of the Transfiguration (Mt 17:1-9) to describe the central truths of the consecrated life.

Tradition and Magisterium

Besides referring frequently to Sacred Scripture in his six post-synodal apostolic exhortations, John Paul often cites the Church Fathers and previous statements of the papal and conciliar Magisterium. He prefers to emphasize the continuity between the original revelation expressed in the deposit of faith and its unfolding in the Church's teaching, liturgy, theology, and life.

Post-synodal apostolic exhortations enable the Pope to make better known the teaching of the Second Vatican Council, "the great gift of the Spirit to the Church at the end of the second millennium."<sup>123</sup> His exhortations are an effective means for sustaining and implementing the Council's major orientations. In them the Holy Father routinely appeals to the documents of the Second Vatican Council, particularly Lumen Gentium and Gaudium et Spes.<sup>124</sup> Often the quotations are very lengthy. Referring explicitly to Christifideles Laici (1988), but equally applicable to the other exhortations as well, Cardinal Jan P. Schotte has defended the use of numerous long quotations. The Holy Father cites them, he said, to comply with the wish of the Council of the General Secretariat of the Synod: "They asked that ample excerpts of the Vatican II texts should be included not only because they fully retain their value, but because it cannot be taken for granted that the laity active and committed in the base ecclesial communities, in the parishes and in the associations have fully assimilated, or have always at hand, the conciliar teaching."<sup>125</sup> Taking their advice to heart, John Paul has written his three last post-synodal apostolic exhortations in such a way that each one furnishes a kind of updated commentary on a specific conciliar document: the Decree on the Apostolate of the Laity, Apostolicam Actuositatem, in Christifideles Laici (1988); the Decree on the Ministry and Life of Priests, Presbyterorum Ordinis, in Pastores Dabo Vobis (1990); and the Decree on the Appropriate Renewal of the Religious Life, Perfectae Caritatis, in Vita Consecrata (1996).

In the order of decreasing frequency the statistics for the other conciliar documents are given in parenthesis: Presbyterorum Ordinis (37), Apostolicam Actuositatem (30), Perfectae Caritatis (19), Optatam Totius (17), Ad Gentes (15), Sacrosanctum Concilium (12), Gravissimum Educationis (9), Dei Verbum (8), Christus Dominus (7), Unitatis Redintegratio (4), and Dignitatis Humanae (3). ## Authority

In the ordinary, or everyday, teaching of the papal Magisterium – in which the Bishop of Rome does not invoke his charism to teach infallibly or definitively – Petrine authority is expressed in varying degrees. These documents bear the authoritative weight which the Pope intends in each case. In some instances he attributes a very high degree of authority to a specific papal document. The formal authority of encyclicals, for example, is greater than that of post-synodal apostolic exhortations. Considering the particular way these exhortations are written, how authoritative does John Paul intend them to be?

Exhortations Introduction

A new document of the ordinary papal Magisterium

As a unique genre of official document, the post-synodal apostolic exhortation enjoys a specific kind of authority. Francis A. Sullivan lists five considerations that must be taken into account in evaluating the level of authority entailed in any statement of the non-definitive ordinary Magisterium: who the teacher is, the audience addressed, the kind of document selected to express the teaching, the specific nature of the intervention (whether it directly treats matters pertaining to the deposit of faith), and the forcefulness of the language used.<sup>126</sup> These criteria can also be applied to post-synodal apostolic exhortations. In this way the degree of their authoritativeness can be clarified and, therefore, also the kind of assent due to them.

Post-synodal apostolic exhortations are issued by the Pope in his own name and are sealed with his authority. Nonetheless, as we have seen, John Paul consistently points out that these texts bear a profound collegial imprint. Because each exhortation is the fruit of a Synod's collaborative input, which the Successor of Peter confirms with his unique teaching charism, its authority is enhanced. In them the Bishops, as teachers endowed with divine authority in virtue of their episcopal ordination, make a contribution which serves to strengthen the Pope's voice.

As we have seen, post-synodal apostolic exhortations are a new genre of magisterial statement. They are not "papal" in exactly the same way that encyclicals, apostolic constitutions, and apostolic letters are. But neither are they "collegial" in the traditional sense, as are the decrees of Ecumenical Councils. Rather, these exhortations combine both elements. Because they appeal specifically to the Bishops' role in their composition, they are "collegial." At the same time, post-synodal apostolic exhortations, because they are issued by the Pope, are documents of the ordinary papal Magisterium. Thus they embody Vatican II's teaching on collegiality. Post-synodal apostolic exhortations demonstrate how the Petrine ministry can be carried out from within the College of Bishops.

Post-synodal apostolic exhortations have not been used to teach infallibly or definitively on matters of faith or morals. Other genres are more suited to that purpose. Rather, the exhortations echo received teaching, and treat more pastoral and practical concerns. None of the most authoritative statements of John Paul's pontificate have been issued in a post-synodal document. For these statements he has used the encyclical form, especially in Veritatis Splendor (1993) and Evangelium Vitae (1995), and the apostolic letter Ordinatio Sacerdotalis (1994).

The level of authoritativeness must be accurately assessed in each instance where Church teaching is involved. An examination of the language used in apostolic exhortations confirms that a single document can contain different levels of authoritativeness. John Paul's repetition of the Church's teaching on contraception in Familiaris Consortio (cf. §32) or the need for individual confession in Reconciliatio et Paenitentia (cf. §31), for example, are more central to the hierarchy of truths than his reassertion of the doctrine on the superiority of virginity to marriage in Vita Consecrata (cf. §18.3). When a post-synodal apostolic exhortation invokes the Church's constant Tradition to emphasize its teaching on a certain subject, this carries more weight than when it provides pastoral directives.

Two conclusions on the level of authority of post-synodal apostolic exhortations can now be drawn. First, they are documents in which the Successor of Peter invokes his authority as the Church's chief teacher; issued in his name, these exhortations belong to the ordinary papal Magisterium.<sup>127</sup> Second, since these exhortations reflect the mind of the Synod of Bishops, this cooperation, far from diminishing their authority, actually increases their magisterial weight.<sup>128</sup>

<sup>128</sup> In a similar case, the Holy See's official summary of Evangelium Vitae suggests that the encyclical's "great doctrinal authority" derives not only from its being an expression of the ordinary Magisterium of the Pope, but also, though in a partial way, of the Episcopal College. See "The Vatican's Summary of Evangelium Vitae," Origins, 24 (1995), 728.

Exhortations Introduction

Assent

In order to evaluate precisely the degree of assent called for by a post-synodal apostolic exhortation, the five considerations mentioned above should be taken into account. As Sullivan notes, in every instance “the response which a Catholic gives to such teaching [of the ordinary papal Magisterium] should be proportionate to the degree or authority that is exercised.”<sup>129</sup> Not every exhortation nor every utterance within it is equally authoritative. Consequently, when describing the response to be given to the non-definitive teaching proposed, a post-synodal apostolic exhortation, a kind of “hierarchy of assent,”<sup>130</sup> must be attended to. An individual’s response will therefore reflect “the different levels of divine assistance”<sup>131</sup> involved in this exercise of papal authority.

The presumption is that the teaching in exhortations expresses a non-definitive exercise of the ordinary Magisterium: one which does not propose doctrine infallibly or definitively. The response called for is not the assent of divine and Catholic faith which is owed to what is taught as divinely revealed. Nor is the faithful Catholic called to give the firm acceptance due to a doctrine that is definitively proposed.

To the Pope’s ordinary Magisterium the faithful owe what is called the “religious submission of will and intellect.”<sup>132</sup> Catholics, therefore, are to give religious submission to the teaching of post-synodal apostolic exhortations. They are expected to accept what is taught in an exhortation and act in accordance with it. What the ordinary Magisterium proposes in this way has “a real, though not unconditional, claim on the assent of the faithful.”<sup>133</sup>

Influence on the Church's Life

John Paul is convinced of the need for post-synodal texts which collect the Assembly's results: "We certainly need documents of this kind, which spring from the fruitful, and at times difficult, practical life of the Church, and which, conversely, give new growth to that same life."<sup>134</sup> Undoubtedly the greatest contribution of these exhortations to the Church's life has been to foster the ongoing implementation of the decrees of the Second Vatican Council. The encyclical Dominum et Vivificantem (1986) drew attention to the role of the Synod of Bishops in keeping the Council's initiatives alive. According to John Paul II, the deliberations of these Assemblies – and, we can add, the subsequent apostolic exhortations – "are to be carefully studied and evaluated, aiming as they do to ensure that the fruits of truth and love . . . become a lasting treasure of the People of God in its earthly pilgrimage down the centuries" (§26.2). Each exhortation issued after a meeting of the Synod of Bishops makes a specific contribution to the Holy Father's pastoral strategy of implementing Vatican II's doctrine and directives ever more fully. In fact, his exhortations have promoted a more fruitful application of the Council's teaching to areas of vital significance for the Church's life.

The influence of post-synodal apostolic exhortations varies considerably from one document to another. In order to determine the impact of a specific exhortation on the Church's life, two measures can be used: how frequently it is referred to in subsequent magisterial documents and how many follow-up statements it produces; and the extent of pastoral or other changes that can be linked to it.

In his encyclicals the Pope occasionally refers to the post-synodal apostolic exhortations. Familiaris Consortio (1980) is mentioned in five different encyclicals, and Reconciliatio et Paenitentia (1984) in four.<sup>135</sup> Curiously, the Catechism of the Catholic Church refers only infrequently to the four post-synodal apostolic exhortations published at the time of its release. Not surprisingly, it cites Familiaris Consortio (1981) the most often: fifteen times directly, and eleven indirectly. For Catechesis Tradendae (1979), the number of direct references is eight and indirect nine; for Reconciliatio et Paenitentia (1984), four and two; and for Christifideles Laici, three and one.

The Synods and the post-synodal apostolic exhortations have also led to other initiatives which have influenced ecclesial life. For example, after the 1980 Synod on the family, Pope John Paul II raised the rank of the Committee on the Family to the Pontifical Council on the Family. He also established the John Paul II Institute for Studies on Marriage and Family at the Pontifical Lateran University in Rome. And in 1983, following the Synod Fathers' request, the Vatican published the Charter of the Rights of the Family.<sup>136</sup> Familiaris Consortio also provided the inspiration for the Letter to the Bishops of the Catholic Church concerning the Reception of Holy Communion by Divorced and Remarried Members of the Faith, published by the Congregation of the Doctrine of the Faith in 1994.

After the 1987 Synod on the laity, the Holy Father wrote his apostolic letter, Mulieris Dignitatem (1988), even before issuing Christifideles Laici (1988). Indeed, he wrote this letter because he wished "to respond to the desire of the Synodal Fathers."<sup>137</sup>

The 1990 Synod on priestly formation led to the publication of the Directory on the Ministry and Life of Priests by the Congregation of the Clergy in 1994. It also encouraged many Episcopal Conferences to update their programs of priestly formation. This was the case in the United States, where the Bishops issued a revised Program of Priestly Formation in 1993,<sup>138</sup> drawn up in light of the post-synodal apostolic exhortation Pastores Dabo Vobis (1992).

It must be admitted, however, that post-synodal apostolic exhortations have not received the attention they deserve. Both Synod Fathers and theologians have suggested a reason for this. They point out that there is insufficient time for the results of one Synod to be assimilated and a strategy set up for its implementation before the Lineamenta for the next one is released for discussion.<sup>139</sup> A greater interval between Synods would allow more time for study and application of the post-synodal apostolic exhortations in local Churches and parishes.

If the synodal process is a "journey made together" of the Bishops in union with the Pope, then it can also be said that its fruit, the post-synodal apostolic exhortation, is a "document written together." These exhortations express the ecclesiology of communion, which includes the principles of collegiality and primacy that have marked the Church's life since the Second Vatican Council. They furnish the People of God with authoritative teaching based on the Synod's proposals and authenticated by the Pope's judgment. As a new form of collegial document intimately linked to the Petrine ministry, post-synodal apostolic exhortations have proved to be an effective means of ensuring the pastoral vitality necessary for the Church to meet the pressing challenges of the third millennium. Their influence will surely grow in the years to come.

Editor's Introduction

On October 16, 1979, the first anniversary of his election to the See of Peter, Pope John Paul II published Catechesi Tradendae, on catechesis in our time. He issued this inaugural apostolic exhortation “in response to the request which was expressly formulated by the Bishops at the end of the Fourth General Assembly of the Synod” (§4.1), which had met in the fall of 1977. Making abundant use of the synodal documents and the drafts prepared by Paul VI and John Paul I, the Holy Father wrote his exhortation “with a lively awareness of the primary responsibility that rests on him” as the Church’s principal catechist (§16). In Catechesi Tradendae, John Paul provides a charter for a catechetical revival among the People of God.

The Pope confirms the Synod’s view that the catechetical renewal after the Second Vatican Council is “a precious gift from the Holy Spirit to the Church of today” (§3.2). There are numerous indications that post-conciliar catechesis is a source of vitality for the Church, and he encourages a more widespread “catechetical awakening” (§72.9). A fresh impulse has been given to catechesis by the biblical movement, the increased involvement of the laity, developments in pedagogy, and new ways of thinking about the places and recipients of catechesis. At the same time, John Paul affirms that all changes in catechesis must be carefully evaluated in light of “the directives of the Magisterium” (§3.2).

The kerygmatic and anthropological movements were the two most significant theological trends that influenced the renewal of catechesis in the twentieth century. Dissatisfied with a doctrinal catechesis which concentrated almost exclusively on the knowledge of Christian truths and duties, the kerygmatic movement, which began before the Second World War, paid more attention to the heart. It focused on the proclamation of the Good News, which is Jesus Christ himself. More than a system of truths, Christianity is a message announced by heralds. On the positive side, the movement led to a renewal in the content of catechesis. It concentrated on the essential truths of revelation, a return to the Scriptures, an emphasis on the centrality of Christ, and the links between catechesis and liturgy. But, on the negative side, kerygmatic catechesis paid insufficient attention to the life-situation of those to whom the message was directed.

Beginning at the time of the Second Vatican Council, pastoral theologians interested in catechetics sought to correct the shortcomings of a kerygmatic catechesis. Their efforts led to the adoption of an anthropological approach to catechesis, one which took more into account the daily life and problems of those addressed. Consequently, the starting point of religious education is the human person, with his questions and concerns. Catechesis is a process by which individuals and groups interpret, live, and express their own situation in light of the Gospel. On the one hand, anthropological catechesis has made a lasting contribution to catechesis. Its emphasis on the need to embody the Christian message in the culture of the listener and on the intrinsic connection between faith and life has been widely accepted. On the other hand, the drawbacks of the approach, especially with regard to its content, have also become evident: the risk of substituting subjective experience for revealed truth, the omission of certain “difficult” doctrines, and the overemphasis on temporal activity at the expense of the spiritual life. Although Catechesis Tradendae alludes only indirectly to the kerygmatic and anthropological movements (cf. §§22, 25.1), their influence on the views of the Synod and the Pope is significant.

The tone of the exhortation is balanced. John Paul avoids extremes. For example, he accompanies his praise for creativity in catechesis with an appeal for “the required vigilance” (§4.2). As befits a document which reflects the Synod’s pastoral orientation, the tone is serene, sometimes conversational, and often exhortative. The Pope steers clear of polemics and controversial questions. While he warns against doctrinal deviations, he never names those who criticize him. Convinced that the Petrine ministry should foster ecclesial unity, the Holy Father mediates between the conflicting, and sometimes contradictory, positions that emerged during the Synod debates. Rather than tackle still disputed questions, he confines his attention largely to concerns expressing a broad consensus.

The style of Catechesi Tradendae is not so personal as that of John Paul’s first encyclical, Redemptor Hominis, published several months earlier. Even so, the apostolic exhortation still bears his characteristic stamp. In the introduction he mentions his long-standing personal interest in catechesis which, he says, “has always been a central care in my ministry as a priest and as a Bishop” (§4.1). As Archbishop of Cracow, Karol Wojtyla was a member of the Council of the Synod’s General Secretariat which proposed the theme of the 1977 Synod to Paul VI. Later he worked on preparing the Lineamenta and Instrumentum Laboris. Wojtyla also took an active part in the synodal Assembly held in Rome, in October 1977. Building on this wealth of experience, John Paul was well equipped to shape the documentation and drafts that the Fathers submitted to him. He took up his “apostolic charge” (§4.1) regarding catechetics with enthusiasm and succeeded in leaving his own mark on the document. The exhortation reflects the Christological focus of John Paul’s teaching, his concern for joining orthodoxy with orthopraxy, and his solicitude for religious freedom.

For a Pope devoted to implementing the teaching and directives of the Second Vatican Council, it is not surprising that he cites conciliar documents more frequently than any other non-biblical source – more than twenty times. Evangelii Nuntiandi (1975), the fruit of the 1974 Synod of Bishops, is referred to nine times. Another of the Pope's sources is the General Catechetical Directory. Published by the Holy See in 1971, in response to an explicit mandate of Vatican II, the Directory systematically addresses the nature, content, and goals of catechesis. John Paul relies a great deal on the Directory, citing it eight times. Despite the importance of these magisterial documents, the New Testament far outstrips them as the major influence inspiring the whole apostolic exhortation. More than two-thirds of the 138 footnotes refer to biblical texts.

Summary

Besides its introduction and conclusion, Catechesi Tradendae contains nine chapters. For the most part, the exhortation moves logically and progressively, from the presentation of basic principles to pastoral applications. The introduction (§§1-4) states that catechesis is part of the Church's mission, outlines the contributions to catechetical renewal made by Paul VI and the 1977 Synod, and describes the exhortation's purpose. In chapter one, "We Have but One Teacher, Jesus Christ" (§§5-9), the Holy Father recalls that all catechetical efforts must focus on Christ. Chapter two, "An Experience as Old as the Church" (§§10-17), outlines a few salient points in the history of catechesis and draws from them lessons for the present. The third chapter, "Catechesis in the Church's Pastoral and Missionary Activity" (§§18-25), deals with the nature of catechesis, while the fourth chapter, "The Whole of the Good News Drawn from Its Source" (§§26-34), discusses the content of catechesis. Beginning in chapter five, "Everybody Needs To Be Catechized" (§§35-45), the exhortation describes the different groups to which catechesis is directed. Chapter six, "Some Ways and Means of Catechesis" (§§46-50), and chapter seven, "How To Impart Catechesis" (§§51-55), examine catechetical methodology and pedagogy. In chapter eight, "The Joy of Faith in a Troubled World" (§§56-61), the Holy Father considers today's difficulties in teaching the faith and treats further theological and methodological questions. The ninth chapter, "The Task Concerns Us All" (§§62-71), is a pressing appeal to the whole Church to assume responsibility for fostering catechetical renewal. In the conclusion (§§72-73), the Pope recalls the Holy Spirit's role as the interior Teacher and points to Mary as the mother and model of all catechists.

Christ and catechesis

According to Catechesi Tradendae, the principal aim of catechesis is “to put people not only in touch but in communion, in intimacy, with Jesus Christ” (§5.3). He is the one who brings them to the Father in the Spirit, enabling individuals to share in the life of the Trinity. At the heart of catechesis is Jesus of Nazareth, and “Christian living consists in following Christ, the sequela Christi” (§5.2).

A further proof of the Pope’s Christocentric focus is his affirmation that “the primary and essential object of catechesis” (§5.3) is the fullness of the mystery of Christ: his person, his words of teaching, and his saving deeds – from the beginning of the Incarnation to the fulfillment of the Paschal Mystery. A close link exists between who Christ is, what he teaches, and what he does: “The whole of Christ’s life was a continual teaching: his silences, his miracles, his gestures, his prayer, his love for people, his special affection for the little and the poor, his acceptance of the total sacrifice on the Cross for the Redemption of the world, and his Resurrection are the actualization of his word and the fulfillment of revelation” (§9.1). Christ does not teach a body of abstract truths to his disciples but communicates himself to them. Consequently, catechesis should pass on to others “the Truth that he communicates or, to put it more precisely, the Truth that he is” (§6).

John Paul also emphasizes that Christ, besides being the object of what is taught, is also the one who really teaches his followers. Christ himself is the Teacher who inspires catechists. During his public ministry, he taught with an authority which so astonished the crowds that they rightly called him “Teacher.” Moreover, Jesus claimed to be a singular and unique Teacher, or Rabbi (cf. Mt 23:8; Jn 13:13-14). Today he continues to teach in the Christian community through the power of his Spirit.

It follows, then, that the catechist is “Christ’s spokesman, enabling Christ to teach with his lips” (§6). Following the Master, every catechist should apply Jesus’ words to himself or herself: “My teaching is not mine, but his who sent me” (Jn 7:16). Careful to avoid creating any confusion between personal opinion and the deposit of faith, catechists hand on to others the teaching which they themselves have received (cf. 1 Cor 11:23). Not only do they speak for Christ but they also “must be very much aware of acting as a living, pliant instrument of the Holy Spirit” (§72.8).

Catechesis in the Church's history

Chapter two unfolds in two parts. The Holy Father begins with a series of reflections, inspired by different historical periods, on the various ways in which Christians have been introduced into the Church's life. After this overview, he draws three lessons which he applies to the contemporary situation.

Christ is certainly the Teacher, but he entrusted his Apostles with the mission of making disciples of all nations (cf. Mt 28:19). They were faithful to their assigned task, and the first communities were "devoted to the Apostles' teaching" (Acts 2:42). Almost from the beginning the Apostles invited others to share in the task of proclaiming the Gospel: deacons, "many others" (cf. Acts 15:35), including simple Christians who "went about preaching the Word" (Acts 8:4) and, finally, successors. This early teaching, or catechizing, of the Christian community was primarily oral, but soon some of it also came to be written down.

After treating the Church's catechetical mission in the apostolic age, the exhortation deals with two significant moments in the history of catechesis: the age of the Fathers in the fourth and fifth centuries and the period following the Council of Trent (1545-1563). The Fathers of the Church, most of whom were Bishops, catechized successfully by means of their oral teaching and written treatises. In response to the challenge of the Reformation, the Council of Trent gave an impetus to catechetical renewal by means of its decrees and constitutions. In the wake of the Council, religious instruction was organized, and the clergy were admonished to carry out their duty of catechizing. One of the greatest reforms was that promulgated by Pius V. In 1566, he issued the Roman Catechism, "which is a work of the first rank as a summary of Christian teaching and traditional theology for use by priests" (§13.1).

This thumbnail sketch of the history of two thousand years of catechetical experience leads John Paul to three conclusions. First, "the Church has always looked on catechesis as a sacred duty and an inalienable right" (§14.1). This duty falls primarily, but not exclusively, on pastors. Furthermore, every baptized person "has the right to receive from the Church instruction and education enabling him or her to enter on a truly Christian life" (§14.1, cf. §64). Repeating a constant theme of his Magisterium, the Holy Father affirms that the faithful have a fundamental human right to catechesis. Respect for religious freedom enables catechetical activity "to be carried out in favorable circumstances of time and place." It also makes possible "access to the mass media and suitable equipment" and assures that catechesis is given "without discrimination against parents, those receiving catechesis or those imparting it" (§14.2, cf. §§64, 69.3). Where the right to religious instruction is violated, the Pope calls upon States to remove all restraints on the freedom of religion.

Second, the Holy Father recalls that the internal life and missionary commitment of the Church are fostered when her pastoral care gives priority to catechetical instruction. He urges catechesis to become a primary aspect of the Church's mission of evangelization. The "best resources in people and energy, without sparing effort, toil or material means" (§15) should be devoted to catechetical initiatives.

Finally, John Paul draws a third conclusion. Every individual and group in the Church should accept its particular responsibility for catechesis: the Pope and Bishops, priests and Religious, parents and teachers, and men and women catechists. As in the past, the Church today should seek out and put into effect "new methods and new prospects for catechetical instruction" (§15).

Meaning and content of catechesis

According to the Holy Father, catechesis is “the teaching of Christian doctrine imparted, generally speaking, in an organic and systematic way, with a view to initiating the hearers into the fullness of Christian life” (§18.4). Without claiming to be exhaustive, the Pope describes four characteristics that belong to a definition of catechesis: its relation to evangelization, to a growth in knowledge, to the sacraments, and to Christian life in the Church and in the world. Each of these considerations sheds light on the nature of catechesis.

Evangelization focuses on the initial proclamation of the Gospel to people, a proclamation which leads individuals to faith and Baptism. For its part, catechesis aims more at “educating the true disciple of Christ by means of a deeper and more systematic knowledge of the Person and the message of our Lord Jesus Christ” (§19.1) . . . “to think like him, to judge like him, to act in conformity with his commandments” (§20.2). Catechesis is not the same as evangelization, but the two “integrate and complement each other” (§18.5). At least in theory, catechesis is directed at maturing the faith initially stirred up by evangelization. But, in pastoral practice, catechesis must often take on the task of “arousing it [faith] unceasingly with the help of grace, with opening the heart, with converting, and with preparing total adherence to Jesus Christ on the part of those who are still on the threshold of faith” (§19.2). Today’s catechists cannot assume that those whom they are addressing have in fact already been evangelized. This is the situation of baptized children without any religious formation, unbaptized children attending catechetical instruction, and baptized adolescents wavering in their adherence to Christ.

Throughout Catechesi Tradendae the Pope restates the need for a systematic and organic catechesis. It is reflective study “that fundamentally distinguishes catechesis from all other ways of presenting the word of God” (§21.1). This methodical instruction must deal with all the essentials of the faith, foster an ever deeper knowledge of them, and promote the fullness of Christian living of those being catechized. Moreover, systematic catechesis has an apologetic purpose: it trains people “to make a defense to anyone who calls them to account for the hope that is in them” (§25.3).

Third, catechesis entails more than imparting sure knowledge of the faith. It is also “intrinsically linked with the whole of liturgical and sacramental activity” (§23.1). John Paul expresses this connection in two ways. On the one hand, authentic catechesis nourishes the initial seed of faith, preparing for a deeper sharing in the sacramental life of the Church, above all through the sacraments of initiation and the Eucharist. On the other hand, all liturgical celebrations have a catechetical dimension; they enlighten the mind as well as deepen divine life in the soul. In the Church's public worship God speaks to his people and nurtures their faith. Summarizing this link, the Pope writes: "Sacramental life is impoverished and very soon turns into hollow ritualism if it is not based on serious knowledge of the meaning of the sacraments, and catechesis becomes intellectualized if it fails to come alive in the sacramental practice" (§23.2).

Lastly, the exhortation rejects playing off orthodoxy against orthopraxy: true catechesis is aimed at deepening discipleship by fostering personal communion with Jesus and consistent Christian living. "Firm and well-thought-out convictions," it states, "lead to courageous and upright action" (§22.1). The ecclesial community should provide the kind of catechesis which sustains people in putting into practice in their daily lives what they have learned and inspires missionary dynamism.

In chapter four the Holy Father deals with the content of catechesis: its chief sources, essential components, and three principles regarding its integrity.

Catechesis "draws its content from the living source of the word of God transmitted in Tradition and the Scriptures" (§27.1). It is imbued with the outlook and spirit of the Bible, reading the scriptural texts "with the intelligence and heart of the Church" (§27.2). Such a reading is found in the Church's various Creeds which contain a synthetic catechetical expression of the handing down of God's word in the Tradition. The Pope singles out for special praise Paul VI's Creed of the People of God (1968), which summarizes the "essential elements of the Catholic faith" and is "a sure point of reference for the content of catechesis" (§28.2). Although John Paul provides no list of all the elements to be included in the content of a program of religious instruction, he specifically mentions Christology, ecclesiology, Christian anthropology, and the Church's moral and social teaching.

Chapter four's last sections take up three points concerning the individual's right "to receive 'the word of faith' not in mutilated, falsified or diminished form but whole and entire, in all its rigor and vigor" (§30.2). Above all, sound catechesis must present the entire deposit of faith; it neither rejects nor neglects any doctrine. Second, pedagogical methods suitable to ensuring integrity in teaching should be used. Lastly, catechesis today calls for an ecumenical dimension. This aspect fosters the desire for the unity of Christians, promotes respect for the faith of others, and encourages collaboration in catechesis. On the one hand, this practical cooperation with other Christians helps Catholics to affirm their own identity. But, on the other hand, it must never entail watering down doctrine to the lowest common denominator.

Catechesi Tradendae

The catechized

Following the position taken by the Synod, Catechesi Tradendae affirms two principles concerning those to whom catechesis is directed. In the first place, “nobody in the Church of Jesus Christ should feel excused from receiving catechesis” (§45.3). The exhortation outlines five different stages of life, which extend from infancy to adulthood, and describes the characteristics of instruction suitable for each age group. Secondly, the relation between those who “give” and those who “receive” catechesis is complementary. Certainly adult Catholics have much to offer children and young people, but “they can also receive much from them for the growth of their own Christian lives” (§45.2).

By their word and witness of life, parents have an obligation to acquaint their children, beginning at a tender age, with “a simple and true presentation of the Christian faith” (§36). Preschoolers are to be introduced into a relationship with God as a loving and provident Father. School-age children require a catechesis that is “aimed at inserting him or her organically into the life of the Church, a moment that includes an immediate preparation for the celebration of the sacraments” (§37). Such a catechesis teaches all the mysteries of faith in a way intelligible to boys and girls and helps them to bear witness to their beliefs in their everyday lives.

According to John Paul, the catechesis offered to adolescents must be sensitive to their particular life-situation. Given the turmoil of these years, teenagers should be shown how Jesus is their “friend, guide and model, capable of being admired but also imitated” (§38). Catechists are to present Jesus’ saving message as the answer to the deep-seated questions of adolescents. For older teenagers and young men and women, catechesis ought to take into account that at this time in their lives they are engaged in making important decisions. The onset of maturity makes it possible for the Gospel to “be presented, understood and accepted as capable of giving meaning to life” (§39.1). For everyone, from infancy to maturity, catechesis is “a permanent school of the faith . . . a beacon lighting the path of the child, the adolescent and the young person” (§39.3).

Even though the theme of the 1977 Synod was directed mainly to “the catechesis of children and young people,” John Paul believes that all Christians need to be catechized. It is a lifelong task. Indeed, catechesis is above all directed to adults, because they have “the greatest responsibilities and the capacity to live the Christian message in its fully developed form” (§43). Here, at the outset of his Pontificate, the Holy Father insists on the need for the ongoing formation of adults, a topic to which he frequently returns in his subsequent teaching. “For catechesis to be effective,” he writes, “it must be permanent” (§43). Among the adults, he singles out for special attention those who are not yet evangelized, those who are from traditionally Christian areas or cultures but who lack education in the faith, and those who received a childhood catechesis but have drifted away from religious practice. Whereas the first group requires true evangelization, the latter two are the object of what the Pope will later refer to as the “new evangelization,” a primary concern of the Church on the threshold of the third millennium.

Catechetical methods

Chapters six, seven, and eight consider current pastoral and theological questions concerning catechetical instruction. The exhortation describes the difficulties facing catechesis today, the basic principles of its methodology, the different ways of imparting it, and its relation to ideology, culture, popular piety, and theology.

The Holy Father briefly takes stock of the troubled and indifferent world in which catechesis takes place. The present state of affairs is marked by “hesitation, uncertainty and insipidity” (§56). Certain contemporary schools of philosophy and theology, because they present faith as if it were a kind of blindness rather than vision, promote this climate of uncertainty. To combat this false understanding of faith, catechists should provide “the simple but solid certainties” (§60.4) that will nourish assurance and conviction. Today’s situation calls for a catechesis “which trains the young people and adults of our communities to remain clear and consistent in their faith, to affirm serenely their Christian and Catholic identity” (§57). It challenges catechists to be joyful and steadfast witnesses of the Gospel.

Efforts to find “the most suitable ways and means” for catechizing deserve encouragement. Up-to-date methods are needed to transmit a sturdy faith to future generations. While enthusiastically endorsing creative initiatives in catechetical pedagogy, the Pope proposes that all fresh undertakings should be guided by three norms. First, the presentation of the entire Christian message is never to be diluted by a method “harmful to the unity of the teaching of the one faith” (§51.2). Second, diversity of catechetical methods should be treasured as a sign of vitality and a resource to be exploited. In fact, different ages, degrees of spiritual development, social contexts, and cultural backgrounds “demand that catechesis should adopt widely differing methods for the attainment of its specific aim: education in the faith” (§51.1, cf. §47.2). Third, the “original pedagogy of the faith” (§58.1), which takes Christ the Teacher as its model, must be respected. This pedagogy makes use of, but does not simply imitate, methods taken from contemporary educational theory.

In the same three chapters, the Holy Father also comments on various practical ways of fostering a more effective catechesis. He writes optimistically about “the great possibilities” offered by the whole range of modern means of social communication (cf. §45.2). The Pope also lists different occasions whose catechetical potential can be taken advantage of: pilgrimages, parish missions, Bible-study groups, and meetings of ecclesial basic communities and associations of young people. In particular, he encourages youth groups to promote the “serious study of Christian doctrine” (§47.1) so as to fulfill their ecclesial mission better. The homily, too, has a specific catechetical role. Preaching centered on the scriptural readings assigned by the Church’s official liturgy, John Paul says, should “familiarize the faithful with the whole of the mysteries of the faith and with the norms of Christian living” (§48). Catechesis will also be improved, the Pope believes, if memorization is judiciously used in catechetical instruction, especially of Jesus’ words, important Bible passages, the ten commandments, the Creeds, liturgical texts, basic prayers, and key doctrines (cf. §55.2).

In its discussion of methodology, Catechesi Tradendae devotes most of its attention to catechetical materials. Many of these works are “a real treasure in the service of catechetical instruction,” but others are “ambiguous and harmful to young people and to the life of the Church” (§49.1). The latter bewilder those being taught “either by deliberately or unconsciously omitting elements essential to the Church’s faith, or by attributing excessive importance to certain themes at the expense of others, or, chiefly, by a rather horizontalist overall view out of keeping with the teaching of the Church’s Magisterium” (§49.1). Bishops have the responsibility of correcting these errors. In agreement with the Holy See, they should prepare catechisms for local use that are faithful to the content of revelation and pedagogically sound.

John Paul also discusses the link between catechesis and ideology, culture, popular devotions, and theology. He points out the danger of mixing “catechetical teaching unduly with overt or masked ideological views, especially political and social ones, or with personal political options” (§52). If a catechist propagates any kind of temporal, social, or political “messianism,” he or she is guilty of radically distorting the Christian message.

Culture has a profound influence on catechetical methods, an impact requiring further study which will enable the Church better to express the unsearchable riches of Christ (cf. Eph 3:8). Genuine catechesis must “take flesh” in the various cultures if it is to address its audience effectively. It is to bring “the power of the Gospel into the very heart of culture and cultures” (§53.1). For John Paul, fruitful inculturation must be guided by two principles. Christianity is not merely an idea but is rooted in historical events. On the one hand, the Gospel always remains tied in some way to the cultural expressions of the time and place of its origin and of its subsequent doctrinal development. Later generations cannot simply ignore the doctrinal formulations shaped by earlier Christians. On the other hand, Christ’s message is transcendent; it has the power to transform and regenerate every culture which it encounters.

In keeping with his high regard for traditional religious piety, John Paul emphasizes the catechetical value of the valid elements of popular religiosity. The prayers and practices of this piety, when purified of unhealthy factors, can be profitably used “to help people advance toward knowledge of the mystery of Christ and of his message” (§54).

Lastly, the Pope describes the relation between catechesis and theology. He observes that, because “every stirring in the field of theology also has repercussions in that of catechesis” (§61.2), catechists should know and respect the difference between the Church’s faith and theological opinions. By teaching the doctrine proposed by the Magisterium they avoid the confusion of “outlandish theories, useless questions and unproductive discussions” (§61.4).

Catechists and places of catechesis

Unlike the more discriminating tone of the previous three chapters on catechetical methods, chapter nine is more exhortative. It outlines the ways of implementing the Pope's call to confident action: "Yes, I wish to sow courage, hope and enthusiasm abundantly in the hearts of all those many diverse people who are in charge of religious instruction and training for life in keeping with the Gospel" (§62). The Holy Father inspires the various groups responsible for religious instruction – Bishops, priests, Religious, and laity – to commit themselves ever more zealously to the Church's catechetical mission, and then he describes the settings in which it takes place.

John Paul begins by reminding his brother Bishops that they have "the chief management of catechesis" (§63.3) in their local Churches. They have a fivefold task: fostering "a real passion for catechesis" (§63.3) among all their people; assuring the availability of competent personnel, suitable equipment, and financial resources; denouncing deviations and correcting errors; approving catechisms; and overseeing the formation of lay catechists. Together with the Pope, Bishops also bear a responsibility for the overall catechetical mission of the Church.

Priests, as the closest assistants of their Bishop, are also instructors in the faith. They are to provide "a well-organized and well-oriented catechetical effort" (§64) for the growth of the local ecclesial community entrusted to their pastoral care. For their part, men and women Religious should "dedicate as much as possible of what ability and means they have to the specific work of catechesis" (§65).

John Paul warmly encourages all the men and women who devote themselves to catechizing others, describing their work as "an eminent form of the lay apostolate" (§66.1). Even if their task is "not a formally instituted ministry" (§71.1), it is of utmost importance to the Church's life. Above all he praises the catechists in mission lands, recognizing their valuable contribution to the flourishing of the young Churches.

Next the Pope describes the four main settings where catechesis takes place. He offers encouragement and specific suggestions for improving its quality in parishes, families, schools, and ecclesial organizations. The parish community "must continue to be the prime mover and preeminent place for catechesis." It is still "a major point of reference for the Christian people, even for the non-practicing" (§67.2). In order to give a new impetus to parish catechesis, the Holy Father further asks that steps be taken to train parishioners for the catechetical apostolate.

In line with Pope John Paul's staunch promotion of the vocation and mission of the family, he points out its irreplaceable role in catechizing its members. This task is especially important where legislation prohibits or impedes religious instruction in the public sphere or where unbelief and secularism dominate social life. Parents are the primary catechists of their children. They carry out this ministry chiefly by the silent and powerful witness of their lives. But parents also fulfill their responsibility by explaining to their children the religious significance of the events of family life and by reinforcing the more methodical teaching received in the parish or at school. Family catechesis “precedes, accompanies and enriches all other forms of catechesis” (§68.2).

The Pope urges Catholic and public schools, as well as lay organizations, to assume responsibility for the Church’s catechetical apostolate in ways appropriate to them. For their part, Catholic schools should integrate religious instruction into the students’ overall curriculum, not restricting it to being merely one course isolated from the others. This integration, says the Holy Father, gives Catholic schools their special character: religious faith imbues the students’ whole educational experience. It is the main reason why parents choose them for their children. In Catholic schools, the imparting of implicit and indirect religious education ought to complement scheduled times of explicit catechesis, not replace it.

Where Catholic children attend public schools, John Paul urges governments to respect their right to religious freedom. Public school children have the right to receive religious instruction, which “can be offered either by the school or in the setting of the school, or again with the framework of an agreement with the public authorities regarding school timetables, if catechesis takes place only in the parish or in another pastoral center” (§69.2).

Lastly, the Holy Father encourages lay associations, movements, and groups to provide ongoing catechesis for their members. Those who are actively engaged in temporal activities need further formation. “They will all accomplish their objectives better, and serve the Church better,” he writes, “if they give an important place in their internal organization and their method of action to the serious religious training of their members” (§70.1).

Key Themes

Among the topics treated in Catechesi Tradendae three very significant ones stand out: the emphasis on Christ as the point of reference of all catechesis, the need for doctrinal integrity, and the importance of using pedagogical methods aimed at adapting catechesis to various listeners. Each theme reveals a specific dimension of the theological perspective and pastoral approach of John Paul II.

Catechesi Tradendae

Christological vision

In all his writings the Pope stresses that Christ is the focal point of the Church's teaching and life. From its beginning, Christianity has had a Christological focus. The exhortation's insistence on the absolute uniqueness of Christ, revealed by the Incarnation and Redemption, is an essential element of John Paul's Christocentric vision. Only in light of the Word made flesh can the mystery of God and the dignity and vocation of the human person be adequately understood. Jesus Christ is "the Teacher who reveals God to man and man to himself" (§9.2). He is the blueprint for humanity fashioned in the divine image (cf. Gen 1:26-27). Even though Catechesi Tradendae shows less intensity and poetic passion than Redemptor Hominis (1979), the encyclical's dominant theme – "the Redeemer of man, Jesus Christ, is the center of the universe and of history" (§1.1) – leaves a profound imprint on John Paul's first apostolic exhortation.

At the center of every catechetical initiative are the Person and teaching of Christ. The Holy Father forcefully endorses the Synod's conviction of "the Christocentricity of all authentic catechesis" (§5.1). Indeed, he insists that Jesus Christ is the object and subject of all catechesis. All religious instruction should be carried out in reference to Christ, making him more known and leading to a deeper love of him.

There is more to transmitting the faith to people than teaching its truths. According to the Pope, "the primary and essential object of catechesis . . . is 'the mystery of Christ'" (§5.3, cf. §§4.2, 20.2, 22.1), that is, God's saving plan fulfilled in his Son (cf. Eph 3:9, 18-19). The Christocentricity of catechesis entails both attachment to the Person of Christ and knowledge of his message. Catechesis has "the definitive aim" of putting those taught "in communion, in intimacy with Jesus Christ" (§5.3). It creates a bond which leads "to the love of the Father in the Spirit" (§6). Religious education brings people to a personal encounter with Jesus of Nazareth by making them his disciples. It inspires them to follow him, thus "initiating the hearers into the fullness of Christian life" (§18.4).

Besides fostering Christian discipleship, catechesis also teaches the whole truth about Christ, "the way, and the truth, and the life" (Jn 14:6). His Person and message are the heart of all catechetical activity. An individual, after having entrusted himself to Jesus in faith, "endeavors to know better this Jesus to whom he has entrusted himself: to know his 'mystery'" (§20.3). Catechists help people to deepen their knowledge of Christ by presenting the fullness of his teaching. According to John Paul, authentic catechesis entails an orderly and systematic presentation of God's revelation in Christ, "a revelation stored in the depths of the Church's memory and in Sacred Scripture, and constantly communicated from one generation to the next by a living, active traditio” (§22.3). The relationship between love of Christ and knowledge of his life-giving truth is dynamic. To teach doctrine without adherence to Christ is sterile, just as to foster adherence to Christ without doctrine leads to confusion.

The content of all catechetical programs must give pride of place to a sound Christology, one which emphasizes Christ’s divinity as well as his humanity and affirms the spiritual dimension of his message. Programs should therefore clearly set forth the mysteries of the Incarnation, life and ministry of Jesus, Redemption, and his continuing presence in the Church through the sacraments (cf. §§29.2, 30.2, 35.2, 52, 54). This emphasis on the centrality of Christ in all catechetical instruction is evident in a question about pastoral responsibility which the Pope puts to the Bishops: “How are we to reveal Jesus Christ, God made man . . . his message, the plan of God that he has revealed, the call he addresses to each person, and the Kingdom that he wishes to establish in this world?” (§35.2).

For the Holy Father, the Gospel message responds to the deepest yearnings of the human heart. Speaking about youth, but evoking a principle applicable to everyone, he says that “in spite of appearances, these young people have within them, even though often in a confused way, not just a readiness or openness, but rather a real desire to know Jesus” (§40.1). Only the revelation of his Person and message can answer the difficulties and dilemmas facing people today. Jesus Christ is the definitive answer to humanity’s religious and moral questions. To make his point more forcefully, the Pope cites Redemptor Hominis §10.1, where he had written: “The man who wishes to understand himself thoroughly – and not just in accordance with immediate, partial, often superficial, and even illusory standards and measures of his being – must come to Christ with his unrest and uncertainty, and even his weakness and sinfulness, his life and death. He must, so to speak, enter into Christ with all his own self, he must ‘appropriate’ Christ and assimilate the whole of the reality of the Incarnation and Redemption in order to find himself” (§61.5). Christ is the focal point of the Pope’s vision.

A final way in which John Paul expresses his Christocentric vision is evident in his description of Christ as the “one” Teacher (cf. Mt 23:8). Not only is Jesus the object of catechesis, what is taught, but he is also its subject, the one who teaches. He alone can teach the truth he has received from the Father (cf. Jn 7:16). From Christ, through the mediation of the Church, the truth of the Gospel can reach everyone. Catechists, as teachers of the mystery of faith, are the Church’s instruments which enable Christ to bring a share in the life of the Trinity to his people. The Pope also points out that the religious educator teaches Christ’s message under the guidance of the Holy Spirit, who is the principal agent of the Church’s catechetical mission. Catechesis, he writes, is “a work of the Holy Spirit, a work that he alone can initiate and sustain in the Church” (§72.6). Christ, working through the power of his Spirit, is the permanent goal, content, and point of reference of the Church's whole catechetical ministry.

Catechesi Tradendae

Fullness of the faith

According to Catechesi Tradendae, the compromise or dilution of the doctrinal content of religious instruction is the most serious obstacle to catechetical renewal. The Pope's concern for orthodoxy reflects the unique responsibility of the Petrine ministry for defending and fostering the unity of faith. By his office, the Successor of Peter is obliged to ensure that the fullness of revealed truth is taught everywhere in the Church. Hence solicitude for a catechesis that is clear, unambiguous, and completely obedient to the revealed deposit of faith.

John Paul is particularly interested in recovering a sense of the wholeness, interior logic, and beauty of the Church's "symphony of faith." By stressing the integrity of her teaching, he hopes to overcome the confusion caused by opinions on faith, morals, and discipline which are at odds with the Magisterium. Accordingly, in Catechesi Tradendae the Pope vigorously exhorts catechists to teach Catholic doctrine integrally and systematically.

Even though the Holy Father does not dwell on the point, he is disturbed by the deficiencies that have crept into the catechetical renewal. "These limitations are particularly serious," he says, "when they endanger integrity of content" (§17). The exhortation provides no official list of specific errors to be combated. Nonetheless, the Pope does identify three areas of possible doctrinal distortion: first, a Christology which would "reduce Christ to his humanity alone or his message to no more than an earthly dimension" (§29.2); second, the use of "language that would result in altering the substance of the content of the Creed, under any pretext whatever, even a pretended scientific one" (§59.2); and third, an understanding of faith as "a seeking that never attains its object" (§61.2). As part of his pastoral strategy designed to minimize the influence of erroneous opinions, the Pope reminds the Bishops of their "thankless task of denouncing deviations and correcting errors" in catechesis (§63.3).

Few catechists deny Church doctrine outright. More frequently, they fail to present certain doctrines in their teaching. John Paul forcefully affirms that there is never sufficient reason for depriving the faithful of the fullness of the Gospel. They have the right to receive the Gospel in its integrity. He applies this principle of doctrinal integrity to ecumenism, pedagogical materials, and inculturation. Cooperation in catechetical initiatives with other Christians "must never mean a 'reduction' to a common minimum" (§33). Furthermore, the instructional materials used in passing on the mystery of Christ must avoid unsettling those being catechized "either by deliberately or unconsciously omitting elements essential to the Church's faith, or by attributing excessive importance to certain themes at the expense of others” (§49.2). Moreover, while the Gospel needs to be embodied in the world’s various cultures, the Holy Father warns against accepting “an impoverishment of catechesis through a renunciation or obscuring of its message, by adaptations, even in language, that would endanger the ‘precious deposit’ of the faith, or by concessions in matters of faith or morals” (§53.5). Fidelity to divine revelation requires that religious educators never omit from their program any essential truth of faith.

Another threat to doctrinal integrity comes from catechists who teach “personal opinions and options as if they expressed Christ’s teaching and the lessons of his life” (§6). Whenever catechists introduce political and social ideologies into their instruction, they compromise the Gospel, “to the point of obscuring it and putting it in second place or even using it to further their own ends” (§52). In addition, no catechist should “make a selection of what he considers important in the deposit of faith as opposed to what he considers unimportant, so as to teach the one and reject the other” (§30.2).

Also with his eye trained on doctrinal vigilance, John Paul discusses the relation between catechetics and theology. First of all, he praises many of the theological works written since the Second Vatican Council; they are “a real treasure in the service of catechetical instruction” (§49.1). But the Pope also laments that these positive initiatives have been accompanied by “articles and publications which are ambiguous and harmful to young people and the life of the Church” (§49.1). Catechists, he reminds us, receive their mission from the Church; they do not teach on their own authority. Consequently, educators in the faith should neither present theological opinions as certainties equivalent to Church teaching nor take sides in scholarly debates. The Holy Father admonishes catechists to “have the wisdom to pick from the field of theological research those points that can provide light for their own reflection and their teaching, drawing, like the theologians, from the true sources, in the light of the Magisterium” (§61.4, cf. §52).

Undoubtedly John Paul is concerned about doctrinal deviations in catechesis. But he prefers to concentrate his exhortatory remarks on what is positive: the marvelous “fullness” of the Church’s faith. He encourages teaching doctrine in its integrity by emphasizing what belongs to sound catechesis. An integral religious education is marked by three characteristics. It illumines the whole of life; it is doctrinally complete; and it is taught in a systematic and orderly way.

A complete catechesis aims to initiate its recipients into “the fullness of Christian life” (§18.4), imbuing their whole humanity with the Gospel. Again and again the Pope teaches that catechesis involves “an integral Christian initiation, open to all the other factors of Christian life” (§21.2, cf. §33.1). It is a matter of mind and heart, of intellect and will. Orthodoxy and orthopraxy are complementary, since “Christianity is inseparably both” (§22.1). Faithfulness to the word of God entails fidelity to the full riches of Catholic teaching and to a life of discipleship. Divine revelation illumines “the whole of life with the light of the Gospel” (§22.3). A catechesis that is directed to the whole person ensures the integrity of teaching. Doctrine and life are inseparably linked.

A second of John Paul’s concerns about the content of catechesis touches its completeness. According to him, every stage of teaching should communicate “the whole and not just a part of ‘the words of eternal life’ and the ‘ways of life’ ” (§31). In a manner adapted to the recipient, an authentic catechetical program must take up all the mysteries of faith and norms of Christian living. Repeatedly he stresses that doctrine is to be taught “in all its dimensions” (§5.3), so that the instruction will be “sufficiently complete” (§21.2) and “whole and entire” (§30.2). Catechetical works, he writes, “must make a point of giving the whole message of Christ and his Church” (§49.2). And programs should be designed which will communicate “God’s revelation in its entirety” (§58.2), including the Gospel’s demanding moral norms and implications for social justice. Good catechesis, imparted by those who practice their faith, fosters serious commitment from its recipients.

The doctrinal integrity of catechesis also requires a systematic presentation of Church teaching (cf. §§18.4, 21.1, 21.3, 22.3, 26). According to the exhortation, catechesis must be “systematic, not improvised but programmed to reach a precise goal” (§21.2). The Pope fears that in certain quarters the orderly presentation of material is all too often neglected. Hence he makes a point of stressing the advantages of a systematic study of the truths of faith. Such study is necessary if catechesis is to succeed in stimulating the serious reflection which distinguishes it from other ways of presenting God’s word.

Catechesis and culture

As a way of teaching the fullness of the faith, John Paul encourages catechists to use creative pedagogical methods suitable to religious education. The Church is ever attentive to imparting catechesis in ways attuned to those receiving instruction. In line with this openness, the Pope urges a catechetical renewal marked “by the revision of its methods, by the search for suitable language, and by the utilization of new means of transmitting the message” (§17). With this in mind, he mentions the importance of inculturation, an idea much discussed in contemporary philosophy and theology. A solid catechesis must deal with the vital connection between faith and culture.

Inculturation is born of the need for the Gospel message to sink its roots deeply “into the very heart of culture and cultures” (§53.1). From the beginning of Christianity, the teaching of the faith has been “adapted to the various situations of believers and the many different situations in which the Church finds herself” (§13.2). Catechists and teachers have always looked for the most appropriate ways of communicating the Gospel to their listeners. Today, too, their methods should be relevant to the “real life of the generation to which they are addressed,” and catechists “must try to speak a language comprehensible to the generation in question” (§49.2). These “generations” which receive the message are various. They are conditioned by age, level of intellectual and spiritual maturity, but also – and this is especially relevant for the younger Churches throughout the world – by their social and cultural milieu. Catechesis, then, must “take flesh” in very different environments. This process of enfleshment, which seeks to make the Gospel more readily understandable so that it can be lived more deeply and explained to others more persuasively, is called “inculturation.”

The doctrinal foundation of inculturation is the truth that, as Redeemer, Christ saves what he has assumed to himself. According to the Holy Father, those who transmit the faith must know the specific “culture” that they are addressing, learn its most significant expressions, and respect its particular values which can be placed at the service of the Gospel. Through their preaching, catechists should help their listeners “to bring forth from their own living tradition original expressions of Christian life, celebration and thought” (§53.1). In this way catechesis will enrich the Church’s catholicity without endangering her unity.

A single warning note is sounded about the vital importance of embodying the Gospel in different cultures: inculturation is a process which, if not carefully supervised, could involve risks to the integrity of the faith. In order to minimize this danger, John Paul proposes two norms which should guide the inculturation of catechesis. First, he recalls that the Gospel is always heard by people already embedded in a particular culture. This was true when Christianity first took root in the Semitic culture of Jesus' day and, later, in the Greco-Roman world as well. For the Holy Father, "the Gospel message cannot be purely and simply isolated from the culture in which it was first inserted" or "from the cultures in which it has already been expressed down the centuries" (§53.2). Revealed truth reaches those being catechized today as a message already stamped by different cultures of the past. These cultures on occasion – as in the definitions of Ecumenical Councils – have authoritatively interpreted the Gospel. New cultural expressions of the Gospel cannot therefore simply bypass the Church's Tradition. Rather, "apostolic dialogue which inevitably becomes part of a certain dialogue of cultures" must take place (§53.2) as part of the arduous task of inculturation.

Second, while the Gospel is necessarily expressed in the culture of those who adhere to Christ, its message also transcends every particular cultural embodiment. Not only does the Gospel receive from the culture in which it is incarnated, it also gives to that culture. God's word has the power to purify and regenerate every culture. Thus, catechesis seeks to transform all peoples' authentic cultural values by integrating them into Christianity.

The Pope concludes his apostolic exhortation with a pressing appeal for the renewal of the "catechetical dynamism in the Church" (§72.10). He implores Mary to obtain this grace through her maternal intercession. As Jesus' mother, she was his catechist, forming him "in human knowledge of the Scriptures and of the history of God's plan for his people, and in adoration of the Father" (§73.1). As her Son's disciple, Mary was the first one catechized in the New Covenant, receiving from Jesus lessons that she pondered in her heart (cf. Lk 2:51). John Paul therefore describes Mary as "the mother and model of catechists" (§73.1), and asks that she intercede with the Holy Spirit to grant the Church a fresh enthusiasm in carrying out her catechetical mission.

Introduction

Christ's final command

1.1 The Church has always considered catechesis one of her primary tasks, for, before Christ ascended to his Father after his Resurrection, he gave the Apostles a final command – to make disciples of all nations and to teach them to observe all that he had commanded.<sup>1</sup> He thus entrusted them with the mission and power to proclaim to humanity what they had heard, what they had seen with their eyes, what they had looked upon and touched with their hands, concerning the Word of Life.<sup>2</sup> He also entrusted them with the mission and power to explain with authority what he had taught them, his words and actions, his signs and commandments. And he gave them the Spirit to fulfill this mission.

1.2 Very soon the name of catechesis was given to the whole of the efforts within the Church to make disciples, to help people to believe that Jesus is the Son of God, so that believing they might have life in his name,<sup>3</sup> and to educate and instruct them in this life and thus build up the Body of Christ. The Church has not ceased to devote her energy to this task.

Paul VI's solicitude

2 The most recent Popes gave catechesis a place of eminence in their pastoral solicitude. Through his gestures, his preaching, his authoritative interpretation of the Second Vatican Council (considered by him the great catechism of modern times), and through the whole of his life, my venerated Predecessor Paul VI served the Church's catechesis in a particularly exemplary fashion. On March 18, 1971, he approved the General Catechetical Directory prepared by the Sacred Congregation for the Clergy, a directory that is still the basic document for encouraging and guiding catechetical renewal throughout the Church. He set up the International Council for Catechesis in 1975. He defined in masterly fashion the role and significance of catechesis in the life and mission of the Church when he addressed the participants in the first International Catechetical Congress on September 25, 1971,<sup>4</sup> and he returned explicitly to the subject in his Apostolic Exhortation Evangelii Nuntiandi.<sup>5</sup> He decided that catechesis, especially that meant for children and young people, should be the theme of the Fourth General Assembly of the Synod of Bishops,<sup>6</sup> which was held in October 1977 and which I myself had the joy of taking part in.

<sup>6</sup> According to the Motu Proprio Apostolica Sollicitudo (September 15, 1965), the Synod of Bishops can come together in General Assembly, in Extraordinary Assembly or in Special Assembly. In the present Apostolic Exhortation the words "Synod," "Synod Fathers" and "Synod Hall" always refer, unless otherwise indicated, to the Fourth General Assembly of the Synod of Bishops on catechesis, held in Rome in October 1977.

A fruitful Synod

3.1 At the end of that Synod the Fathers presented the Pope with a very rich documentation, consisting of the various interventions during the Assembly, the conclusions of the working groups, the Message that they had with his consent sent to the People of God,<sup>7</sup> and especially the imposing list of “Propositions” in which they expressed their views on a very large number of aspects of present-day catechesis.

3.2 The Synod worked in an exceptional atmosphere of thanksgiving and hope. It saw in catechetical renewal a precious gift from the Holy Spirit to the Church of today, a gift to which the Christian communities at all levels throughout the world are responding with a generosity and inventive dedication that win admiration. The requisite discernment could then be brought to bear on a reality that is very much alive, and it could benefit from great openness among the People of God to the grace of the Lord and the directives of the Magisterium.

Purpose of this Exhortation

4.1 It is in the same climate of faith and hope that I am today addressing this Apostolic Exhortation to you, Venerable Brothers and dear sons and daughters. The theme is extremely vast and the Exhortation will keep to only a few of the most topical and decisive aspects of it, as an affirmation of the happy results of the Synod. In essence, the Exhortation takes up again the reflections that were prepared by Pope Paul VI, making abundant use of the documents left by the Synod. Pope John Paul I, whose zeal and gifts as a catechist amazed us all, had taken them in hand and was preparing to publish them when he was suddenly called to God. To all of us he gave an example of catechesis at once popular and concentrated on the essential, one made up of simple words and actions that were able to touch the heart. I am therefore taking up the inheritance of these two Popes in response to the request which was expressly formulated by the Bishops at the end of the Fourth General Assembly of the Synod and which was welcomed by Pope Paul VI in his closing speech.<sup>8</sup> I am also doing so in order to fulfill one of the chief duties of my apostolic charge. Catechesis has always been a central care in my ministry as a priest and as a Bishop.

4.2 I ardently desire that this Apostolic Exhortation to the whole Church should strengthen the solidity of the faith and of Christian living, should give fresh vigor to the initiatives in hand, should stimulate creativity – with the required vigilance – and should help to spread among the communities the joy of bringing the mystery of Christ to the world.

Putting into communion with the Person of Christ

5.1 The Fourth General Assembly of the Synod of Bishops often stressed the Christocentricity of all authentic catechesis. We can here use the word “Christocentricity” in both its meanings, which are not opposed to each other or mutually exclusive, but each of which rather demands and completes the other.

5.2 In the first place, it is intended to stress that at the heart of catechesis we find, in essence, a Person, the Person of Jesus of Nazareth, “the only Son from the Father . . . full of grace and truth,”<sup>9</sup> who suffered and died for us and who now, after rising, is living with us forever. It is Jesus who is “the way, and the truth, and the life,”<sup>10</sup> and Christian living consists in following Christ, the sequela Christi.

5.3 The primary and essential object of catechesis is, to use an expression dear to Saint Paul and also to contemporary theology, “the mystery of Christ.” Catechizing is in a way to lead a person to study this mystery in all its dimensions: “to make all men see what is the plan of the mystery . . . comprehend with all the saints what is the breadth and length and height and depth . . . know the love of Christ which surpasses knowledge . . . (and be filled) with all the fullness of God.”<sup>11</sup> It is therefore to reveal in the Person of Christ the whole of God’s eternal design reaching fulfillment in that Person. It is to seek to understand the meaning of Christ’s actions and words and of the signs worked by him, for they simultaneously hide and reveal his mystery. Accordingly, the definitive aim of catechesis is to put people not only in touch but in communion, in intimacy, with Jesus Christ: only he can lead us to the love of the Father in the Spirit and make us share in the life of the Holy Trinity.

Transmitting Christ's teaching

6 Christocentricity in catechesis also means the intention to transmit not one's own teaching or that of some other master, but the teaching of Jesus Christ, the Truth that he communicates or, to put it more precisely, the Truth that he is.<sup>12</sup> We must therefore say that in catechesis it is Christ, the Incarnate Word and Son of God, who is taught – everything else is taught with reference to him – and it is Christ alone who teaches – anyone else teaches to the extent that he is Christ's spokesman, enabling Christ to teach with his lips. Whatever be the level of his responsibility in the Church, every catechist must constantly endeavor to transmit by his teaching and behavior the teaching and life of Jesus. He will not seek to keep directed toward himself and his personal opinions and attitudes the attention and the consent of the mind and heart of the person he is catechizing. Above all, he will not try to inculcate his personal opinions and options as if they expressed Christ's teaching and the lessons of his life. Every catechist should be able to apply to himself the mysterious words of Jesus: "My teaching is not mine, but his who sent me."<sup>13</sup> Saint Paul did this when he was dealing with a question of prime importance: "I received from the Lord what I also delivered to you."<sup>14</sup> What assiduous study of the word of God transmitted by the Church's Magisterium, what profound familiarity with Christ and with the Father, what a spirit of prayer, what detachment from self must a catechist have in order that he can say: My teaching is not mine!"

Christ the Teacher

7.1 This teaching is not a body of abstract truths. It is the communication of the living mystery of God. The Person teaching it in the Gospel is altogether superior in excellence to the “masters” in Israel, and the nature of his doctrine surpasses theirs in every way because of the unique link between what he says, what he does and what he is. Nevertheless, the Gospels clearly relate occasions when Jesus “taught.” “Jesus began to do and teach”<sup>15</sup> – with these two verbs, placed at the beginning of the Book of the Acts, Saint Luke links and at the same time distinguishes two poles in Christ’s mission.

7.2 Jesus taught. It is the witness that he gives of himself: “Day after day I sat in the temple teaching.”<sup>16</sup> It is the admiring observation of the Evangelists, surprised to see him teaching everywhere and at all times, teaching in a manner and with an authority previously unknown: “Crowds gathered to him again; and again, as his custom was, he taught them”<sup>17</sup>; “and they were astonished at his teaching, for he taught them as one who had authority.”<sup>18</sup> It is also what his enemies note for the purpose of drawing from it grounds for accusation and condemnation: “He stirs up the people, teaching throughout all Judaea, from Galilee even to this place.”<sup>19</sup>

The one "Teacher"

8.1 One who teaches in this way has a unique title to the name of "Teacher." Throughout the New Testament, especially in the Gospels, how many times is he given this title of Teacher!<sup>20</sup> Of course the Twelve, the other disciples, and the crowds of listeners call him "Teacher" in tones of admiration, trust and tenderness.<sup>21</sup> Even the Pharisees and the Sadducees, the Doctors of the Law, and the Jews in general do not refuse him the title: "Teacher, we wish to see a sign from you"<sup>22</sup>; "Teacher, what shall I do to inherit eternal life?"<sup>23</sup> But above all, Jesus himself at particularly solemn and highly significant moments calls himself Teacher: "You call me Teacher and Lord; and you are right, for so I am"<sup>24</sup>; and he proclaims the singularity, the uniqueness of his character as Teacher: "You have one teacher,"<sup>25</sup> the Christ. One can understand why people of every kind, race and nation have for two thousand years in all the languages of the earth given him this title with veneration, repeating in their own ways the exclamation of Nicodemus: "We know that you are a teacher come from God."<sup>26</sup>

8.2 This image of Christ the Teacher is at once majestic and familiar, impressive and reassuring. It comes from the pen of the Evangelists and it has often been evoked subsequently in iconography since earliest Christian times,<sup>27</sup> so captivating is it. And I am pleased to evoke it in my turn at the beginning of these considerations on catechesis in the modern world.

NOTES:

<sup>20</sup> In nearly fifty places in the four Gospels, this title, inherited from the whole Jewish tradition but here given a new meaning that Christ himself often seeks to emphasize, is attributed to Jesus.

<sup>21</sup> Cf. among others, Mt 8:19; Mk 4:38, 9:38, 10:35, 13:1; Jn 11:28.

<sup>24</sup> Jn 13:13-14; cf. Mt 10:25, 26:18 and parallel passages.

<sup>25</sup> Mt 23:8. Saint Ignatius of Antioch takes up this affirmation and comments as follows: "We have received the faith; this is why we hold fast, in order to be recognized as disciples of Jesus Christ, our only Teacher" (Epistola ad Magnesios, 9, 2: Patres Apostolici, ed. F. X. Funk, I, 198).

<sup>27</sup> The portrayal of Christ as Teacher goes back as far as the Roman catacombs. It is frequently used in the mosaics of Romano-Byzantine art of the third and fourth centuries. It was to form a predominant artistic motif in the sculptures of the great Romanesque and Gothic cathedrals of the Middle Ages.

Teaching through his life as a whole

9.1 In doing so, I am not forgetful that the majesty of Christ the Teacher and the unique consistency and persuasiveness of his teaching can only be explained by the fact that his words, his parables and his arguments are never separable from his life and his very being. Accordingly, the whole of Christ's life was a continual teaching: his silences, his miracles, his gestures, his prayer, his love for people, his special affection for the little and the poor, his acceptance of the total sacrifice on the Cross for the Redemption of the world, and his Resurrection are the actualization of his word and the fulfillment of revelation. Hence for Christians the crucifix is one of the most sublime and popular images of Christ the Teacher.

9.2 These considerations follow in the wake of the great traditions of the Church and they all strengthen our fervor with regard to Christ, the Teacher who reveals God to man and man to himself, the Teacher who saves, sanctifies and guides, who lives, who speaks, rouses, moves, redresses, judges, forgives, and goes with us day by day on the path of history, the Teacher who comes and will come in glory.

9.3 Only in deep communion with him will catechists find light and strength for an authentic, desirable renewal of catechesis.

The mission of the Apostles

10.1 The image of Christ the Teacher was stamped on the spirit of the Twelve and of the first disciples, and the command “Go . . . and make disciples of all nations”<sup>28</sup> set the course for the whole of their lives. Saint John bears witness to this in his Gospel when he reports the words of Jesus: “No longer do I call you servants, for the servant does not know what his master is doing; but I have called you friends, for all that I have heard from my Father I have made known to you.”<sup>29</sup> It was not they who chose to follow Jesus; it was Jesus who chose them, kept them with him, and appointed them even before his Passover, that they should go and bear fruit and that their fruit should remain.<sup>30</sup> For this reason he formally conferred on them after the Resurrection the mission of making disciples of all nations.

10.2 The whole of the Book of the Acts of the Apostles is a witness that they were faithful to their vocation and to the mission they had received. The members of the first Christian community are seen in it as “devoted to the Apostles’ teaching and fellowship, to the breaking of bread and the prayers.”<sup>31</sup> Without any doubt we find in that a lasting image of the Church being born of and continually nourished by the word of the Lord, thanks to the teaching of the Apostles, celebrating that word in the Eucharistic Sacrifice and bearing witness to it before the world in the sign of charity.

10.3 When those who opposed the Apostles took offense at their activity, it was because they were “annoyed because (the Apostles) were teaching the people”<sup>32</sup> and the order they gave them was not to teach at all in the name of Jesus.<sup>33</sup> But we know that the Apostles considered it right to listen to God rather than to men on this very matter.<sup>34</sup>

Catechesis in the apostolic age

11.1 The Apostles were not slow to share with others the ministry of apostleship.<sup>35</sup> They transmitted to their successors the task of teaching. They entrusted it also to the deacons from the moment of their institution: Stephen, “full of grace and power,” taught unceasingly, moved by the wisdom of the Spirit.<sup>36</sup> The Apostles associated “many others” with themselves in the task of teaching,<sup>37</sup> and even simple Christians scattered by persecution “went about preaching the word.”<sup>38</sup> Saint Paul was in a preeminent way the herald of this preaching, from Antioch to Rome, where the last picture of him that we have in Acts is that of a person “teaching about the Lord Jesus Christ quite openly.”<sup>39</sup> His numerous letters continue and give greater depth to his teaching. The Letters of Peter, John, James and Jude are also, in every case, evidence of catechesis in the apostolic age.

11.2 Before being written down, the Gospels were the expression of an oral teaching passed on to the Christian communities, and they display with varying degrees of clarity a catechetical structure. Saint Matthew’s account has indeed been called the catechist’s Gospel, and Saint Mark’s the catechumen’s Gospel.

The Fathers of the Church

12.1 This mission of teaching that belonged to the Apostles and their first fellow workers was continued by the Church. Making herself day after day a disciple of the Lord, she earned the title of “Mother and Teacher.”<sup>40</sup> From Clement of Rome to Origen,<sup>41</sup> the post-apostolic age saw the birth of remarkable works. Next we see a striking fact: some of the most impressive Bishops and pastors, especially in the third and fourth centuries considered it an important part of their episcopal ministry to deliver catechetical instructions and write treatises. It was the age of Cyril of Jerusalem and John Chrysostom, of Ambrose and Augustine, the age that saw the flowering, from the pen of numerous Fathers of the Church, of works that are still models for us.

12.2 It would be impossible here to recall, even very briefly, the catechesis that gave support to the spread and advance of the Church in the various periods of history, in every continent, and in the widest variety of social and cultural contexts. There was indeed no lack of difficulties. But the word of the Lord completed its course down the centuries; it sped on and triumphed, to use the words of the Apostle Paul.<sup>42</sup>

NOTES:

<sup>40</sup> Cf. John XXIII, Encyclical Letter Mater et Magistra (May 15, 1961), intro.: AAS 53 (1961), 401: the Church is “mother” because by Baptism she unceasingly begets new children and increases God’s family; she is “teacher” because she makes her children grow in the grace of their Baptism by nourishing their sensus fidei through instruction in the truths of faith.

Councils and missionary activity

13.1 The ministry of catechesis draws ever fresh energy from the Councils. The Council of Trent is a noteworthy example of this. It gave catechesis priority in its constitutions and decrees. It lies at the origin of the Roman Catechism, which is also known by the name of that Council and which is a work of the first rank as a summary of Christian teaching and traditional theology for use by priests. It gave rise to a remarkable organization of catechesis in the Church. It aroused the clergy to their duty of giving catechetical instruction. Thanks to the work of holy theologians such as Saint Charles Borromeo, Saint Robert Bellarmine and Saint Peter Canisius, it involved the publication of catechisms that were real models for that period. May the Second Vatican Council stir up in our time a like enthusiasm and similar activity!

13.2 The missions are also a special area for the application of catechesis. The People of God have thus continued for almost two thousand years to educate themselves in the faith in ways adapted to the various situations of believers and the many different circumstances in which the Church finds herself.

13.3 Catechesis is intimately bound up with the whole of the Church's life. Not only her geographical extension and numerical increase, but even more, her inner growth and correspondence with God's plan depend essentially on catechesis. It is worthwhile pointing out some of the many lessons to be drawn from the experiences in Church history that we have just recalled.

Catechesi Tradendae

Catechesis as the Church's right and duty

14.1 To begin with, it is clear that the Church has always looked on catechesis as a sacred duty and an inalienable right. On the one hand, it is certainly a duty springing from a command given by the Lord and resting above all on those who in the New Covenant receive the call to the ministry of being pastors. On the other hand, one can likewise speak of a right: from the theological point of view every baptized person, precisely by reason of being baptized, has the right to receive from the Church instruction and education enabling him or her to enter on a truly Christian life; and from the viewpoint of human rights, every human being has the right to seek religious truth and adhere to it freely, that is to say, “without coercion on the part of individuals or of social groups and any human power,” in such a way that in this matter of religion, “no one is to be forced to act against his or her conscience or prevented from acting in conformity to it.”<sup>43</sup>

14.2 That is why catechetical activity should be able to be carried out in favorable circumstances of time and place, and should have access to the mass media and suitable equipment, without discrimination against parents, those receiving catechesis or those imparting it. At present this right is admittedly being given growing recognition, at least on the level of its main principles, as is shown by international declarations and conventions in which, whatever their limitations, one can recognize the desires of the consciences of many people today.<sup>44</sup> But the right is being violated by many States, even to the point that imparting catechesis, having it imparted, and receiving it become punishable offenses. I vigorously raise my voice in union with the Synod Fathers against all discrimination in the field of catechesis, and at the same time I again make a pressing appeal to those in authority to put a complete end to these constraints on human freedom in general and on religious freedom in particular.

Priority of this task

15 The second lesson concerns the place of catechesis in the Church's pastoral programs. The more the Church, whether on the local or the universal level, gives catechesis priority over other works and undertakings the results of which would be more spectacular, the more she finds in catechesis a strengthening of her internal life as a community of believers and of her external activity as a missionary Church. As the twentieth century draws to a close, the Church is bidden by God and by events – each of them a call from him – to renew her trust in catechetical activity as a prime aspect of her mission. She is bidden to offer catechesis her best resources in people and energy, without sparing effort, toil or material means, in order to organize it better and to train qualified personnel. This is no mere human calculation; it is an attitude of faith. And an attitude of faith always has reference to the faithfulness of God, who never fails to respond.

Shared but differentiated responsibility

16 The third lesson is that catechesis always has been and always will be a work for which the whole Church must feel responsible and must wish to be responsible. But the Church's members have different responsibilities, derived from each one's mission. Because of their charge, Pastors have, at differing levels, the chief responsibility for fostering, guiding and coordinating catechesis. For his part, the Pope has a lively awareness of the primary responsibility that rests on him in this field: in this he finds reasons for pastoral concern but principally a source of joy and hope. Priests and Religious have in catechesis a preeminent field for their apostolate. On another level, parents have a unique responsibility. Teachers, the various ministers of the Church, catechists, and also organizers of social communications, all have in various degrees very precise responsibilities in this education of the believing conscience, an education that is important for the life of the Church and affects the life of society as such. It would be one of the best results of the General Assembly of the Synod that was entirely devoted to catechesis if it stirred up in the Church as a whole and in each sector of the Church a lively and active awareness of this differentiated but shared responsibility.

Catechesi Tradendae

Continual balanced renewal

17 Finally, catechesis needs to be continually renewed by a certain broadening of its concept, by the revision of its methods, by the search for suitable language, and by the utilization of new means of transmitting the message. Renewal is sometimes unequal in value; the Synod Fathers realistically recognized, not only an undeniable advance in the vitality of catechetical activity and promising initiatives, but also the limitations or even “deficiencies” in what has been achieved to date.<sup>45</sup> These limitations are particularly serious when they endanger integrity of content. The Message to the People of God rightly stressed that “routine, with its refusal to accept any change, and improvisation, with its readiness for any venture, are equally dangerous” for catechesis.<sup>46</sup> Routine leads to stagnation, lethargy and eventual paralysis. Improvisation begets confusion on the part of those being given catechesis and, when these are children, on the part of their parents; it also begets all kinds of deviations, and the fracturing and eventually the complete destruction of unity. It is important for the Church to give proof today, as she has done at other periods of her history, of evangelical wisdom, courage and fidelity in seeking out and putting into operation new methods and new prospects for catechetical instruction.

Catechesis in the Church's Pastoral and Missionary Activity

Catechesi Tradendae

Catechesis as a stage in evangelization

18.1 Catechesis cannot be dissociated from the Church's pastoral and missionary activity as a whole. Nevertheless it has a specific character which was repeatedly the object of inquiry during the preparatory work and throughout the course of the Fourth General Assembly of the Synod of Bishops. The question also interests the public both within and outside the Church.

18.2 This is not the place for giving a rigorous formal definition of catechesis, which has been sufficiently explained in the General Catechetical Directory.<sup>47</sup> It is for specialists to clarify more and more its concept and divisions.

18.3 In view of uncertainties in practice, let us simply recall the essential landmarks – they are already solidly established in Church documents – that are essential for an exact understanding of catechesis and without which there is a risk of failing to grasp its full meaning and import.

18.4 All in all, it can be taken here that catechesis is an education of children, young people and adults in the faith, which includes especially the teaching of Christian doctrine imparted, generally speaking, in an organic and systematic way, with a view to initiating the hearers into the fullness of Christian life. Accordingly, while not being formally identified with them, catechesis is built on a certain number of elements of the Church's pastoral mission that have a catechetical aspect, that prepare for catechesis, or that spring from it. These elements are: the initial proclamation of the Gospel or missionary preaching through the kerygma to arouse faith, apologetics or examination of the reasons for belief, experience of Christian living, celebration of the sacraments, integration into the ecclesial community, and apostolic and missionary witness.

18.5 Let us first of all recall that there is no separation or opposition between catechesis and evangelization. Nor can the two be simply identified with each other. Instead, they have close links whereby they integrate and complement each other.

18.6 The Apostolic Exhortation Evangelii Nuntiandi of December 8, 1975, on evangelization in the modern world, rightly stressed that evangelization – which has the aim of bringing the Good News to the whole of humanity, so that all may live by it – is a rich, complex and dynamic reality, made up of elements, or one could say moments, that are essential and different from each other, and that must all be kept in view simultaneously.<sup>48</sup> Catechesis is one of these moments – a very remarkable one – in the whole process of evangelization.

Catechesis and the initial proclamation of the Gospel

19.1 The specific character of catechesis, as distinct from the initial conversion-bringing proclamation of the Gospel, has the twofold objective of maturing the initial faith and of educating the true disciple of Christ by means of a deeper and more systematic knowledge of the Person and the message of our Lord Jesus Christ.<sup>49</sup>

19.2 But in catechetical practice, this model order must allow for the fact that the initial evangelization has often not taken place. A certain number of children baptized in infancy come for catechesis in the parish without receiving any other initiation into the faith and still without any explicit personal attachment to Jesus Christ; they only have the capacity to believe placed within them by Baptism and the presence of the Holy Spirit; and opposition is quickly created by the prejudices of their non-Christian family background or of the positivist spirit of their education. In addition, there are other children who have not been baptized and whose parents agree only at a later date to religious education: for practical reasons, the catechumenal stage of these children will often be carried out largely in the course of the ordinary catechesis. Again, many preadolescents and adolescents who have been baptized and been given a systematic catechesis and the sacraments still remain hesitant for a long time about committing their whole lives to Jesus Christ, even though they do actually try to avoid religious education in the name of their freedom. Finally, even adults are not safe from temptations to doubt or to abandon their faith, especially as a result of their unbelieving surroundings. This means that “catechesis” must often concern itself not only with nourishing and teaching the faith, but also with arousing it unceasingly with the help of grace, with opening the heart, with converting, and with preparing total adherence to Jesus Christ on the part of those who are still on the threshold of faith. This concern will in part decide the tone, the language and the method of catechesis.

Specific aim of catechesis

20.1 Nevertheless, the specific aim of catechesis is to develop, with God's help, an as yet initial faith, and to advance in fullness and to nourish day by day the Christian life of the faithful, young and old. It is in fact a matter of giving growth, at the level of knowledge and in life, to the seed of faith sown by the Holy Spirit with the initial proclamation and effectively transmitted by Baptism.

20.2 Catechesis aims therefore at developing understanding of the mystery of Christ in the light of God's word, so that the whole of a person's humanity is impregnated by that word. Changed by the working of grace into a new creature, the Christian thus sets himself to follow Christ and learns more and more within the Church to think like him, to judge like him, to act in conformity with his commandments, and to hope as he invites us to.

20.3 To put it more precisely: within the whole process of evangelization, the aim of catechesis is to be the teaching and maturation stage, that is to say, the period in which the Christian, having accepted by faith the Person of Jesus Christ as the one Lord and having given him complete adherence by sincere conversion of heart, endeavors to know better this Jesus to whom he has entrusted himself: to know his "mystery," the Kingdom of God proclaimed by him, the requirements and promises contained in his Gospel message, and the paths that he has laid down for anyone who wishes to follow him.

20.4 It is true that being a Christian means saying "yes" to Jesus Christ, but let us remember that this "yes" has two levels: it consists in surrendering to the word of God and relying on it, but it also means, at a later stage, endeavoring to know better and better the profound meaning of this word.

Catechesi Tradendae

Need for systematic catechesis

21.1 In his closing speech at the Fourth General Assembly of the Synod, Pope Paul VI rejoiced “to see how everyone drew attention to the absolute need for systematic catechesis, precisely because it is this reflective study of the Christian mystery that fundamentally distinguishes catechesis from all other ways of presenting the word of God.”<sup>50</sup>

21.2 In view of practical difficulties, attention must be drawn to some of the characteristics of this instruction:

- it must be systematic, not improvised but programmed to reach a precise goal;
- it must deal with essentials, without any claim to tackle all disputed questions or to transform itself into theological research or scientific exegesis;
- it must nevertheless be sufficiently complete, not stopping short at the initial proclamation of the Christian mystery such as we have in the kerygma;
- it must be an integral Christian initiation, open to all the other factors of Christian life.

21.3 I am not forgetting the interest of the many different occasions for catechesis connected with personal, family, social and ecclesial life – these occasions must be utilized and I shall return to them in chapter VI – but I am stressing the need for organic and systematic Christian instruction, because of the tendency in various quarters to minimize its importance.

Catechesis and life experience

22.1 It is useless to play off orthopraxy against orthodoxy: Christianity is inseparably both. Firm and well-thought-out convictions lead to courageous and upright action; the endeavor to educate the faithful to live as disciples of Christ today calls for and facilitates a discovery in depth of the mystery of Christ in the history of salvation.

22.2 It is also quite useless to campaign for the abandonment of serious and orderly study of the message of Christ in the name of a method concentrating on life experience. “No one can arrive at the whole truth on the basis solely of some simple private experience, that is to say, without an adequate explanation of the message of Christ, who is ‘the way, and the truth, and the life’ (Jn 14:6).”51

22.3 Nor is any opposition to be set up between a catechesis taking life as its point of departure and a traditional doctrinal and systematic catechesis.52 Authentic catechesis is always an orderly and systematic initiation into the revelation that God has given of himself to humanity in Christ Jesus, a revelation stored in the depths of the Church’s memory and in Sacred Scripture, and constantly communicated from one generation to the next by a living, active traditio. This revelation is not, however, isolated from life or artificially juxtaposed to it. It is concerned with the ultimate meaning of life and it illumines the whole of life with the light of the Gospel, to inspire it or to question it.

22.4 That is why we can apply to catechists an expression used by the Second Vatican Council with special reference to priests: “instructors (of the human being and his life) in the faith.”53

Catechesi Tradendae

Catechesis and sacraments

23.1 Catechesis is intrinsically linked with the whole of liturgical and sacramental activity, for it is in the sacraments, especially in the Eucharist, that Christ Jesus works in fullness for the transformation of human beings.

23.2 In the early Church, the catechumenate and preparation for the Sacraments of Baptism and the Eucharist were the same thing. Although in the countries that have long been Christian the Church has changed her practice in this field, the catechumenate has never been abolished; on the contrary, it is experiencing a renewal in those countries<sup>54</sup> and is abundantly practiced in the young missionary Churches. In any case, catechesis always has reference to the sacraments. On the one hand, the catechesis that prepares for the sacraments is an eminent kind, and every form of catechesis necessarily leads to the sacraments of faith. On the other hand, authentic practice of the sacraments is bound to have a catechetical aspect. In other words, sacramental life is impoverished and very soon turns into hollow ritualism if it is not based on serious knowledge of the meaning of the sacraments, and catechesis becomes intellectualized if it fails to come alive in the sacramental practice.

Catechesis and ecclesial community

24.1 Finally, catechesis is closely linked with the responsible activity of the Church and of Christians in the world. A person who has given adherence to Jesus Christ by faith and is endeavoring to consolidate that faith by catechesis needs to live in communion with those who have taken the same step. Catechesis runs the risk of becoming barren if no community of faith and Christian life takes the catechumen in at a certain stage of his catechesis. That is why the ecclesial community at all levels has a twofold responsibility with regard to catechesis: it has the responsibility of providing for the training of its members, but it also has the responsibility of welcoming them into an environment where they can live as fully as possible what they have learned.

24.2 Catechesis is likewise open to missionary dynamism. If catechesis is done well, Christians will be eager to bear witness to their faith, to hand it on to their children, to make it known to others, and to serve the human community in every way.

Catechesis in the wide sense necessary for maturity and strength of faith

25.1 Thus through catechesis the Gospel kerygma (the initial ardent proclamation by which a person is one day overwhelmed and brought to the decision to entrust himself to Jesus Christ by faith) is gradually deepened, developed in its implicit consequences, explained in language that includes an appeal to reason, and channeled toward Christian practice in the Church and the world. All this is no less evangelical than the kerygma, in spite of what is said by certain people who consider that catechesis necessarily rationalizes, dries up and eventually kills all that is living, spontaneous and vibrant in the kerygma. The truths studied in catechesis are the same truths that touched the person's heart when he heard them for the first time. Far from blunting or exhausting them, the fact of knowing them better should make them even more challenging and decisive for one's life.

25.2 In the understanding expounded here, catechesis keeps the entirely pastoral perspective with which the Synod viewed it. This broad meaning of catechesis in no way contradicts but rather includes and goes beyond a narrow meaning which was once commonly given to catechesis in didactic expositions, namely, the simple teaching of the formulas that express faith.

25.3 In the final analysis, catechesis is necessary both for the maturation of the faith of Christians and for their witness in the world: it is aimed at bringing Christians to "attain to the unity of the faith and of the knowledge of the Son of God, to mature manhood, to the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ"<sup>55</sup>; it is also aimed at making them prepared to make a defense to anyone who calls them to account for the hope that is in them.<sup>56</sup>

Content of the message

26 Since catechesis is a moment or aspect of evangelization, its content cannot be anything else but the content of evangelization as a whole. The one message – the Good News of salvation – that has been heard once or hundreds of times and has been accepted with the heart, is in catechesis probed unceasingly by reflection and systematic study, by awareness of its repercussions on one's personal life – an awareness calling for ever greater commitment – and by inserting it into an organic and harmonious whole, namely, Christian living in society and the world.

Catechesi Tradendae

The source

27.1 Catechesis will always draw its content from the living source of the word of God transmitted in Tradition and the Scriptures, for “Sacred Tradition and Sacred Scripture make up a single sacred deposit of the word of God, which is entrusted to the Church,” as was recalled by the Second Vatican Council, which desired that “the ministry of the word – pastoral preaching, catechetics and all forms of Christian instruction . . . – (should be) healthily nourished and (should) thrive in holiness through the word of Scripture.”<sup>57</sup>

27.2 To speak of Tradition and Scripture as the source of catechesis is to draw attention to the fact that catechesis must be impregnated and penetrated by the thought, the spirit and the outlook of the Bible and the Gospels through assiduous contact with the texts themselves; but it is also a reminder that catechesis will be all the richer and more effective for reading the texts with the intelligence and the heart of the Church and for drawing inspiration from the 2,000 years of the Church’s reflection and life.

27.3 The Church’s teaching, liturgy and life spring from this source and lead back to it, under the guidance of the Pastors and, in particular, of the doctrinal Magisterium entrusted to them by the Lord.

The Creed, an exceptionally important expression of doctrine

28.1 An exceptionally important expression of the living heritage placed in the custody of the Pastors is found in the Creed or, to put it more concretely, in the Creeds that at crucial moments have summed up the Church's faith in felicitous syntheses. In the course of the centuries an important element of catechesis was constituted by the traditio Symboli (transmission of the summary of the faith), followed by the transmission of the Lord's Prayer. This expressive rite has in our time been reintroduced into the initiation of catechumens.<sup>58</sup> Should not greater use be made of an adapted form of it to mark that most important stage at which a new disciple of Jesus Christ accepts with full awareness and courage the content of what will from then on be the object of his earnest study?

28.2 In the Creed of the People of God, proclaimed at the close of the nineteenth centenary of the martyrdom of the Apostles Peter and Paul, my Predecessor Paul VI decided to bring together the essential elements of the Catholic faith, especially those that presented greater difficulty or risked being ignored.<sup>59</sup> This is a sure point of reference for the content of catechesis.

The principal truths of faith and the principles of morality are contained here. This is not only a historical object. It is a document of life. [It has even been called] 'the Polish catechism'": AAS 71 (1979), 754.

Factors that must not be neglected

29.1 In the third chapter of his Apostolic Exhortation Evangelii Nuntiandi, the same Pope recalled “the essential content, the living substance” of evangelization.<sup>60</sup> Catechesis, too, must keep in mind each of these factors and also the living synthesis of which they are part.<sup>61</sup>

29.2 I shall therefore limit myself here simply to recalling one or two points.<sup>62</sup> Anyone can see, for instance, how important it is to make the child, the adolescent, the person advancing in faith understand “what can be known about God”<sup>63</sup>; to be able in a way to tell them: “What you worship as unknown, this I proclaim to you”<sup>64</sup>; to set forth briefly for them<sup>65</sup> the mystery of the Word of God become man and accomplishing man’s salvation by his Passover, that is to say, through his Death and Resurrection, but also by his preaching, by the signs worked by him, and by the sacraments of his permanent presence in our midst. The Synod Fathers were indeed inspired when they asked that care should be taken not to reduce Christ to his humanity alone or his message to no more than an earthly dimension, but that he should be recognized as the Son of God, the mediator giving us in the Spirit free access to the Father.<sup>66</sup>

29.3 It is important to display before the eyes of the intelligence and of the heart, in the light of faith, the sacrament of Christ’s presence constituted by the mystery of the Church, which is an assembly of human beings who are sinners and yet have at the same time been sanctified and who make up the family of God gathered together by the Lord under the guidance of those whom “the Holy Spirit has made . . . guardians, to feed the Church of God.”<sup>67</sup>

29.4 It is important to explain that the history of the human race, marked as it is by grace and sin, greatness and misery, is taken up by God in his Son Jesus, “foreshadowing in some way the age which is to come.”<sup>68</sup>

29.5 Finally, it is important to reveal frankly the demands – demands that involve self-denial but also joy – made by what the Apostle Paul liked to call “newness of life,”<sup>69</sup> “a new creation,”<sup>70</sup> being in Christ,<sup>71</sup> and “eternal life in Christ Jesus,”<sup>72</sup> which is the same thing as life in the world but lived in accordance with the Beatitudes and called to an extension and transfiguration hereafter.

29.6 Hence the importance in catechesis of personal moral commitments in keeping with the Gospel and of Christian attitudes, whether heroic or very simple, to life and the world – what we call the Christian or evangelical virtues. Hence also, in its endeavor to educate faith, the concern of catechesis not to omit but to clarify properly realities such as man’s activity for his integral liberation,<sup>73</sup> the search for a society with greater solidarity and fraternity, the fight for justice and the building of peace.

29.7 Besides, it is not to be thought that this dimension of catechesis is altogether new. As early as the patristic age, Saint Ambrose and Saint John Chrysostom – to quote only them – gave prominence to the social consequences of the demands made by the Gospel. Close to our own time, the catechism of Saint Pius X explicitly listed oppressing the poor and depriving workers of their just wages among the sins that cry to God for vengeance.<sup>74</sup> Since Rerum Novarum especially, social concern has been actively present in the catechetical teaching of the Popes and the Bishops. Many Synod Fathers rightly insisted that the rich heritage of the Church's social teaching should, in appropriate forms, find a place in the general catechetical education of the faithful.

Integrity of content

30.1 With regard to the content of catechesis, three important points deserve special attention today.

30.2 The first point concerns the integrity of the content. In order that the sacrificial offering of his or her faith<sup>75</sup> should be perfect, the person who becomes a disciple of Christ has the right to receive “the word of faith”<sup>76</sup> not in mutilated, falsified or diminished form but whole and entire, in all its rigor and vigor. Unfaithfulness on some point to the integrity of the message means a dangerous weakening of catechesis and putting at risk the results that Christ and the ecclesial community have a right to expect from it. It is certainly not by chance that the final command of Jesus in Matthew’s Gospel bears the mark of a certain entirety: “All authority . . . has been given to me . . . make disciples of all nations . . . teaching them to observe all . . . I am with you always.” This is why, when a person first becomes aware of “the surpassing worth of knowing Christ Jesus,”<sup>77</sup> whom he has encountered by faith, and has the perhaps unconscious desire to know him more extensively and better, “hearing about him and being taught in him, as the truth is in Jesus,”<sup>78</sup> there is no valid pretext for refusing him any part whatever of that knowledge. What kind of catechesis would it be that failed to give their full place to man’s creation and sin; to God’s plan of redemption and its long, loving preparation and realization; to the Incarnation of the Son of God; to Mary, the Immaculate One, the Mother of God, ever Virgin, raised body and soul to the glory of heaven, and to her role in the mystery of salvation; to the mystery of lawlessness at work in our lives<sup>79</sup> and the power of God freeing us from it; to the need for penance and asceticism; to the sacramental and liturgical actions; to the reality of the Eucharistic presence; to participation in divine life here and hereafter, and so on? Thus, no true catechist can lawfully, on his own initiative, make a selection of what he considers important in the deposit of faith as opposed to what he considers unimportant, so as to teach the one and reject the other.

By means of suitable pedagogical methods

31 This gives rise to a second remark. It can happen that in the present situation of catechesis, reasons of method or pedagogy suggest that the communication of the riches of the content of catechesis should be organized in one way rather than another. Besides, integrity does not dispense from balance and from the organic hierarchical character through which the truths to be taught, the norms to be transmitted, and the ways of Christian life to be indicated will be given the proper importance due to each. It can also happen that a particular sort of language proves preferable for transmitting this content to a particular individual or group. The choice made will be a valid one to the extent that, far from being dictated by more or less subjective theories or prejudices stamped with a certain ideology, it is inspired by the humble concern to stay closer to a content that must remain intact. The method and language used must truly be means for communicating the whole and not just a part of “the words of eternal life”<sup>80</sup> and the “ways of life.”<sup>81</sup>

Ecumenical dimension of catechesis

32.1 The great movement, one certainly inspired by the Spirit of Jesus, that has for some years been causing the Catholic Church to seek with other Christian Churches or confessions the restoration of the perfect unity willed by the Lord, brings me to the question of the ecumenical character of catechesis. This movement reached its full prominence in the Second Vatican Council<sup>82</sup> and since then has taken on a new extension within the Church, as is shown concretely by the impressive series of events and initiatives with which everyone is now familiar.

32.2 Catechesis cannot remain aloof from this ecumenical dimension, since all the faithful are called to share, according to their capacity and place in the Church, in the movement toward unity.<sup>83</sup>

32.3 Catechesis will have an ecumenical dimension if, while not ceasing to teach that the fullness of the revealed truths and of the means of salvation instituted by Christ is found in the Catholic Church,<sup>84</sup> it does so with sincere respect, in words and in deeds, for the Ecclesial Communities that are not in perfect communion with this Church.

32.4 In this context, it is extremely important to give a correct and fair presentation of the other Churches and Ecclesial Communities that the Spirit of Christ does not refrain from using as means of salvation; “moreover, some, even very many, of the outstanding elements and endowments which together go to build up and give life to the Church herself, can exist outside the visible boundaries of the Catholic Church.”<sup>85</sup> Among other things this presentation will help Catholics to have both a deeper understanding of their own faith and a better acquaintance with and esteem for their other Christian brethren, thus facilitating the shared search for the way toward full unity in the whole truth. It should also help non-Catholics to have a better knowledge and appreciation of the Catholic Church and her conviction of being the “universal help toward salvation.”

32.5 Catechesis will have an ecumenical dimension if, in addition, it creates and fosters a true desire for unity. This will be true all the more if it inspires serious efforts – including the effort of self-purification in the humility and the fervor of the Spirit in order to clear the ways – with a view not to facile irenics made up of omissions and concessions on the level of doctrine, but to perfect unity, when and by what means the Lord will wish.

32.6 Finally, catechesis will have an ecumenical dimension if it tries to prepare Catholic children and young people, as well as adults, for living in contact with non-Catholics, affirming their Catholic identity while respecting the faith of others.

Ecumenical collaboration in the field of catechesis

33.1 In situations of religious plurality, the Bishops can consider it opportune or even necessary to have certain experiences of collaboration in the field of catechesis between Catholics and other Christians, complementing the normal catechesis that must in any case be given to Catholics. Such experiences have a theological foundation in the elements shared by all Christians.<sup>86</sup> But the communion of faith between Catholics and other Christians is not complete and perfect; in certain cases there are even profound divergences. Consequently, this ecumenical collaboration is by its very nature limited: it must never mean a “reduction” to a common minimum. Furthermore, catechesis does not consist merely in the teaching of doctrine: it also means initiating into the whole of Christian life, bringing full participation in the sacraments of the Church. Therefore, where there is an experience of ecumenical collaboration in the field of catechesis, care must be taken that the education of Catholics in the Catholic Church should be well ensured in matters of doctrine and of Christian living.

33.2 During the Synod, a certain number of Bishops drew attention to what they referred to as the increasingly frequent cases in which the civil authority or other circumstances impose on the schools in some countries a common instruction in the Christian religion, with common textbooks, class periods, etc., for Catholics and non-Catholics alike. Needless to say, this is not true catechesis. But this teaching also has ecumenical importance when it presents Christian doctrine fairly and honestly. In cases where circumstances impose it, it is important that in addition a specifically Catholic catechesis should be ensured with all the greater care.

The question of textbooks dealing with the various religions

34 At this point another observation must be made on the same lines but from a different point of view. State schools sometimes provide their pupils with books that for cultural reasons (history, morals or literature) present the various religions, including the Catholic religion. An objective presentation of historical events, of the different religions and of the various Christian confessions can make a contribution here to better mutual understanding. Care will then be taken that every effort is made to ensure that the presentation is truly objective and free from the distorting influence of ideological and political systems or of prejudices with claims to be scientific. In any case, such schoolbooks can obviously not be considered catechetical works: they lack both the witness of believers stating their faith to other believers and an understanding of the Christian mysteries and of what is specific about Catholicism, as these are understood within the faith.

The importance of children and the young

35.1 The theme designated by my Predecessor Paul VI for the Fourth General Assembly of the Synod of Bishops was: “Catechesis in our time, with special reference to the catechesis of children and young people.” The increase in the number of young people is without doubt a fact charged with hope and at the same time with anxiety for a large part of the contemporary world. In certain countries, especially those of the Third World, more than half of the population is under twenty-five or thirty years of age. This means millions and millions of children and young people preparing for their adult future. And there is more than just the factor of numbers: recent events, as well as the daily news, tell us that, although this countless multitude of young people is here and there dominated by uncertainty and fear, seduced by the escapism of indifference or drugs, or tempted by nihilism and violence, nevertheless it constitutes in its major part the great force that amid many hazards is set on building the civilization of the future.

35.2 In our pastoral care we ask ourselves: how are we to reveal Jesus Christ, God made man, to this multitude of children and young people, reveal him not just in the fascination of a first fleeting encounter but through an acquaintance, growing deeper and clearer daily, with him, his message, the plan of God that he has revealed, the call he addresses to each person, and the Kingdom that he wishes to establish in this world with the “little flock”<sup>87</sup> of those who believe in him, a Kingdom that will be complete only in eternity? How are we to enable them to know the meaning, the import, the fundamental requirements, the law of love, the promises and the hopes of this Kingdom?

35.3 There are many observations that could be made about the special characteristics that catechesis assumes at the different stages of life.

Infants

36 One moment that is often decisive is the one at which the very young child receives the first elements of catechesis from its parents and the family surroundings. These elements will perhaps be no more than a simple revelation of a good and provident Father in heaven to whom the child learns to turn its heart. The very short prayers that the child learns to lisp will be the start of a loving dialogue with this hidden God whose word it will then begin to hear. I cannot insist too strongly on this early initiation by Christian parents in which the child's faculties are integrated into a living relationship with God. It is a work of prime importance. It demands great love and profound respect for the child who has a right to a simple and true presentation of the Christian faith.

Children

37 For the child there comes soon, at school and in church, in institutions connected with the parish or with the spiritual care of the Catholic or State school not only an introduction into a wider social circle, but also the moment for a catechesis aimed at inserting him or her organically into the life of the Church, a moment that includes an immediate preparation for the celebration of the sacraments. This catechesis is didactic in character, but is directed toward the giving of witness in the faith. It is an initial catechesis but not a fragmentary one, since it will have to reveal, although in an elementary way, all the principal mysteries of faith and their effects on the child's moral and religious life. It is a catechesis that gives meaning to the sacraments, but at the same time it receives from the experience of the sacraments a living dimension that keeps it from remaining merely doctrinal, and it communicates to the child the joy of being a witness to Christ in ordinary life.

Adolescents

38 Next comes puberty and adolescence, with all the greatness and dangers which that age brings. It is the time of discovering oneself and one's own inner world, the time of generous plans, the time when the feeling of love awakens, with the biological impulses of sexuality, the time of the desire to be together, the time of a particularly intense joy connected with the exhilarating discovery of life. But often it is also the age of deeper questioning, of anguished or even frustrating searching, of a certain mistrust of others and dangerous introspection, and the age sometimes of the first experiences of setbacks and of disappointments. Catechesis cannot ignore these changeable aspects of this delicate period of life. A catechesis capable of leading the adolescent to reexamine his or her life and to engage in dialogue, a catechesis that does not ignore the adolescent's great questions – self-giving, belief, love and the means of expressing it constituted by sexuality – such a catechesis can be decisive. The revelation of Jesus Christ as a friend, guide and model, capable of being admired but also imitated; the revelation of his message which provides an answer to the fundamental questions; the revelation of the loving plan of Christ the Savior as the incarnation of the only authentic love and as the possibility of uniting the human race – all this can provide the basis for genuine education in faith. Above all, the mysteries of the Passion and Death of Jesus, through which, according to Saint Paul, he merited his glorious Resurrection, can speak eloquently to the adolescent's conscience and heart and cast light on his first sufferings and on the suffering of the world that he is discovering.

The young

39.1 With youth comes the moment of the first great decisions. Although the young may enjoy the support of the members of their family and their friends, they have to rely on themselves and their own conscience and must ever more frequently and decisively assume responsibility for their destiny. Good and evil, grace and sin, life and death will more and more confront one another within them, not just as moral categories but chiefly as fundamental options which they must accept or reject lucidly, conscious of their own responsibility. It is obvious that a catechesis which denounces selfishness in the name of generosity, and which without any illusory over-simplification presents the Christian meaning of work, of the common good, of justice and charity, a catechesis on international peace and on the advancement of human dignity, on development, and on liberation, as these are presented in recent documents of the Church,<sup>88</sup> fittingly completes in the minds of the young the good catechesis on strictly religious realities which is never to be neglected. Catechesis then takes on considerable importance, since it is the time when the Gospel can be presented, understood and accepted as capable of giving meaning to life and thus of inspiring attitudes that would have no other explanation, such as self-sacrifice, detachment, forbearance, justice, commitment, reconciliation, a sense of the Absolute and the unseen. All these are traits that distinguish a young person from his or her companions as a disciple of Jesus Christ.

39.2 Catechesis thus prepares for the important Christian commitments of adult life. For example, it is certain that many vocations to the priesthood and religious life have their origin during a well-imparted catechesis in infancy and adolescence.

39.3 From infancy until the threshold of maturity, catechesis is thus a permanent school of the faith and follows the major stages of life, like a beacon lighting the path of the child, the adolescent and the young person.

The adaptation of catechesis for young people

40.1 It is reassuring to note that, during the Fourth General Assembly of the Synod and the following years, the Church has widely shared the concern about how to impart catechesis to children and young people. God grant that the attention thus aroused will long endure in the Church's consciousness! In this way the Synod has been valuable for the whole Church by seeking to trace with the greatest possible precision the complex characteristics of present-day youth; by showing that these young persons speak a language into which the message of Jesus must be translated with patience and wisdom and without betrayal; by demonstrating that, in spite of appearances, these young people have within them, even though often in a confused way, not just a readiness or openness, but rather a real desire to know "Jesus . . . who is called Christ"<sup>89</sup>; and by indicating that if the work of catechesis is to be carried out rigorously and seriously, it is today more difficult and tiring than ever before, because of the obstacles and difficulties of all kinds that it meets; but it is also more consoling, because of the depth of the response it receives from children and young people. This is a treasure which the Church can and should count on in the years ahead.

40.2 Some categories of young people to whom catechesis is directed call for special attention because of their particular situation.

The handicapped

41 Children and young people who are physically or mentally handicapped come first to mind. They have a right, like others of their age, to know “the mystery of faith.” The greater difficulties that they encounter give greater merit to their efforts and to those of their teachers. It is pleasant to see that Catholic organizations especially dedicated to young handicapped people contributed to the Synod a renewed desire to deal better with this important problem. They deserve to be given warm encouragement in this endeavor.

Young people without religious support

42 My thoughts turn next to the ever increasing number of children and young people born and brought up in a non-Christian or at least non-practicing home but who wish to know the Christian faith. They must be ensured a catechesis attuned to them, so that they will be able to grow in faith and live by it more and more, in spite of the lack of support or even the opposition they meet in their surroundings.

Adults

43 To continue the series of receivers of catechesis, I cannot fail to emphasize now one of the most constant concerns of the Synod Fathers, a concern imposed with vigor and urgency by present experiences throughout the world: I am referring to the central problem of the catechesis of adults. This is the principal form of catechesis, because it is addressed to persons who have the greatest responsibilities and the capacity to live the Christian message in its fully developed form.<sup>90</sup> The Christian community cannot carry out a permanent catechesis without the direct and skilled participation of adults, whether as receivers or as promoters of catechetical activity. The world, in which the young are called to live and to give witness to the faith which catechesis seeks to deepen and strengthen, is governed by adults. The faith of these adults too should continually be enlightened, stimulated and renewed, so that it may pervade the temporal realities in their charge. Thus, for catechesis to be effective, it must be permanent, and it would be quite useless if it stopped short at the threshold of maturity, since catechesis, admittedly under another form, proves no less necessary for adults.

Quasi-catechumens

44 Among the adults who need catechesis, our pastoral missionary concern is directed to those who were born and reared in areas not yet Christianized, and who have never been able to study deeply the Christian teaching that the circumstances of life have at a certain moment caused them to come across. It is also directed to those who in childhood received a catechesis suited to their age but who later drifted away from all religious practice and as adults find themselves with religious knowledge of a rather childish kind. It is likewise directed to those who feel the effects of a catechesis received early in life but badly imparted or badly assimilated. It is directed to those who, although they were born in a Christian country or in sociologically Christian surroundings, have never been educated in their faith and, as adults, are really catechumens.

Diversified and complementary forms of catechesis

45.1 Catechesis is therefore for adults of every age, including the elderly – persons who deserve particular attention in view of their experience and their problems – no less than for children, adolescents and the young. We should also mention migrants, those who are bypassed by modern developments, those who live in areas of large cities which are often without churches, buildings and suitable organization, and other such groups. It is desirable that initiatives meant to give all these groups a Christian formation, with appropriate means (audio-visual aids, booklets, discussions, lectures), should increase in number, enabling many adults to fill the gap left by an insufficient or deficient catechesis, to complete harmoniously at a higher level their childhood catechesis, or even to prepare themselves enough in this field to be able to help others in a more serious way.

45.2 It is important also that the catechesis of children and young people, permanent catechesis, and the catechesis of adults should not be separate watertight compartments. It is even more important that there should be no break between them. On the contrary, their perfect complementarity must be fostered: adults have much to give to young people and children in the field of catechesis, but they can also receive much from them for the growth of their own Christian lives.

45.3 It must be restated that nobody in the Church of Jesus Christ should feel excused from receiving catechesis. This is true even of young seminarians and young Religious, and of all those called to the task of being pastors and catechists. They will fulfill this task all the better if they are humble pupils of the Church, the great giver as well as the great receiver of catechesis.

Some Ways and Means of Catechesis

Catechesi Tradendae

Communications media

46.1 From the oral teaching by the Apostles and the letters circulating among the Churches down to the most modern means, catechesis has not ceased to look for the most suitable ways and means for its mission, with the active participation of the communities and at the urging of the Pastors. This effort must continue.

46.2 I think immediately of the great possibilities offered by the means of social communication and the means of group communication: television, radio, the press, records, tape-recordings – the whole series of audio-visual means. The achievements in these spheres are such as to encourage the greatest hope. Experience shows, for example, the effect had by instruction given on radio or television, when it combines a high aesthetic level and rigorous fidelity to the Magisterium. The Church now has many opportunities for considering these questions – as, for instance, on Social Communications Days – and it is not necessary to speak of them at length here, in spite of their prime importance.

Catechesi Tradendae

Utilization of various places, occasions and gatherings

47.1 I am also thinking of various occasions of special value which are exactly suitable for catechesis: for example, diocesan, regional or national pilgrimages, which gain from being centered on some judiciously chosen theme based on the life of Christ, of the Blessed Virgin or of the saints. Then there are the traditional missions, often too hastily dropped but irreplaceable for the periodic and vigorous renewal of Christian life – they should be revived and brought up to date. Again there are Bible-study groups, which ought to go beyond exegesis and lead their members to live by the word of God. Yet other instances are the meetings of ecclesial basic communities, insofar as they correspond to the criteria laid down in the Apostolic Exhortation Evangelii Nuntiandi.<sup>91</sup> I may also mention the youth groups that, under varying names and forms but always with the purpose of making Jesus Christ known and of living by the Gospel, are in some areas multiplying and flourishing in a sort of springtime that is very comforting for the Church: these include Catholic Action groups, charitable groups, prayer groups and Christian meditation groups. These groups are a source of great hope for the Church of tomorrow. But, in the name of Jesus, I exhort the young people who belong to them, their leaders, and the priests who devote the best part of their ministry to them: no matter what it costs, do not allow these groups – which are exceptional occasions for meeting others, and which are blessed with such riches of friendship and solidarity among the young, of joy and enthusiasm, of reflection on events and facts – do not allow them to lack serious study of Christian doctrine. If they do, they will be in danger – a danger that has unfortunately proved only too real – of disappointing their members and also the Church.

47.2 The catechetical endeavor that is possible in these various surroundings, and in many others besides, will have all the greater chance of being accepted and bearing fruit if it respects their individual nature. By becoming part of them in the right way, it will achieve the diversity and complementarity of approach that will enable it to develop all the riches of its concept, with its three dimensions of word, memorial and witness – doctrine, celebration and commitment in living – which the Synod Message to the People of God emphasized.<sup>92</sup>

The homily

48 This remark is even more valid for the catechesis given in the setting of the liturgy, especially at the Eucharistic assembly. Respecting the specific nature and proper cadence of this setting, the homily takes up again the journey of faith put forward by catechesis, and brings it to its natural fulfillment. At the same time it encourages the Lord's disciples to begin anew each day their spiritual journey in truth, adoration and thanksgiving. Accordingly, one can say that catechetical teaching too finds its source and its fulfillment in the Eucharist, within the whole circle of the liturgical year. Preaching, centered upon the Bible texts, must then in its own way make it possible to familiarize the faithful with the whole of the mysteries of the faith and with the norms of Christian living. Much attention must be given to the homily: it should be neither too long nor too short; it should always be carefully prepared, rich in substance and adapted to the hearers, and reserved to ordained ministers. The homily should have its place not only in every Sunday and feast-day Eucharist, but also in the celebration of Baptisms, penitential liturgies, marriages and funerals. This is one of the benefits of the liturgical renewal.

Catechetical literature

49.1 Among these various ways and means – all the Church's activities have a catechetical dimension – catechetical works, far from losing their essential importance, acquire fresh significance. One of the major features of the renewal of catechetics today is the rewriting and multiplication of catechetical books taking place in many parts of the Church. Numerous very successful works have been produced and are a real treasure in the service of catechetical instruction. But it must be humbly and honestly recognized that this rich flowering has brought with it articles and publications which are ambiguous and harmful to young people and to the life of the Church. In certain places, the desire to find the best forms of expression or to keep up with fashions in pedagogical methods has often enough resulted in certain catechetical works which bewilder the young and even adults, either by deliberately or unconsciously omitting elements essential to the Church's faith, or by attributing excessive importance to certain themes at the expense of others, or, chiefly, by a rather horizontalist overall view out of keeping with the teaching of the Church's Magisterium.

49.2 Therefore, it is not enough to multiply catechetical works. In order that these works may correspond with their aim, several conditions are essential:

a) they must be linked with the real life of the generation to which they are addressed, showing close acquaintance with its anxieties and questionings, struggles and hopes;

b) they must try to speak a language comprehensible to the generation in question;

c) they must make a point of giving the whole message of Christ and his Church, without neglecting or distorting anything, and in expounding it they will follow a line and structure that highlights what is essential;

d) they must really aim to give to those who use them a better knowledge of the mysteries of Christ, aimed at true conversion and a life more in conformity with God's will.

Catechisms

50.1 All those who take on the heavy task of preparing these catechetical tools, especially catechism texts, can do so only with the approval of the Pastors who have the authority to give it, and taking their inspiration as closely as possible from the General Catechetical Directory, which remains the standard of reference.<sup>93</sup>

50.2 In this regard, I must warmly encourage Episcopal Conferences of the whole world to undertake, patiently but resolutely, the considerable work to be accomplished in agreement with the Apostolic See in order to prepare genuine catechisms which will be faithful to the essential content of revelation and up-to-date in method, and which will be capable of educating the Christian generations of the future to a sturdy faith.

50.3 This brief mention of ways and means of modern catechetics does not exhaust the wealth of suggestions worked out by the Synod Fathers. It is comforting to think that at the present time every country is seeing valuable collaboration for a more organic and more secure renewal of these aspects of catechetics. There can be no doubt that the Church will find the experts and the right means for responding, with God's grace, to the complex requirements of communicating with the people of today.

How To Impart Catechesis

Catechesi Tradendae

Diversity of methods

51.1 The age and the intellectual development of Christians, their degree of ecclesial and spiritual maturity and many other personal circumstances demand that catechesis should adopt widely differing methods for the attainment of its specific aim: education in the faith. On a more general level, this variety is also demanded by the social and cultural surrounding in which the Church carries out her catechetical work.

51.2 The variety in the methods used is a sign of life and a resource. That is how it was considered by the Fathers of the Fourth General Assembly of the Synod, although they also drew attention to the conditions necessary for that variety to be useful and not harmful to the unity of the teaching of the one faith.

Catechesi Tradendae

At the service of revelation and conversion

52 The first question of a general kind that presents itself here concerns the danger and the temptation to mix catechetical teaching unduly with overt or masked ideological views, especially political and social ones, or with personal political options. When such views get the better of the central message to be transmitted, to the point of obscuring it and putting it in second place or even using it to further their own ends, catechesis then becomes radically distorted. The Synod rightly insisted on the need for catechesis to remain above one-sided divergent trends – to avoid “dichotomies” – even in the field of theological interpretation of such questions. It is on the basis of revelation that catechesis will try to set its course, revelation as transmitted by the universal Magisterium of the Church, in its solemn or ordinary form. This revelation tells of a creating and redeeming God, whose Son has come among us in our flesh and enters not only into each individual’s personal history but into human history itself, becoming its center. Accordingly, this revelation tells of the radical change of man and the universe, of all that makes up the web of human life under the influence of the Good News of Jesus Christ. If conceived in this way, catechesis goes beyond every form of formalistic moralism, although it will include true Christian moral teaching. Chiefly, it goes beyond any kind of temporal, social or political “messianism.” It seeks to arrive at man’s innermost being.

The message embodied in cultures

53.1 Now a second question. As I said recently to the members of the Biblical Commission: “The term ‘acculturation’ or ‘inculturation’ may be a neologism, but it expresses very well one factor of the great mystery of the Incarnation.”<sup>94</sup> We can say of catechesis, as well as of evangelization in general, that it is called to bring the power of the Gospel into the very heart of culture and cultures. For this purpose, catechesis will seek to know these cultures and their essential components; it will learn their most significant expressions; it will respect their particular values and riches. In this manner it will be able to offer these cultures the knowledge of the hidden mystery<sup>95</sup> and help them to bring forth from their own living tradition original expressions of Christian life, celebration and thought. Two things must, however, be kept in mind.

53.2 On the one hand, the Gospel message cannot be purely and simply isolated from the culture in which it was first inserted (the biblical world or, more concretely, the cultural milieu in which Jesus of Nazareth lived), nor, without serious loss, from the cultures in which it has already been expressed down the centuries; it does not spring spontaneously from any cultural soil; it has always been transmitted by means of an apostolic dialogue which inevitably becomes part of a certain dialogue of cultures.

53.3 On the other hand, the power of the Gospel everywhere transforms and regenerates. When that power enters into a culture, it is no surprise that it rectifies many of its elements. There would be no catechesis if it were the Gospel that had to change when it came into contact with the cultures.

53.4 To forget this would simply amount to what Saint Paul very forcefully calls “emptying the Cross of Christ of its power.”<sup>96</sup>

53.5 It is a different matter to take, with wise discernment, certain elements, religious or otherwise, that form part of the cultural heritage of a human group and use them to help its members to understand better the whole of the Christian mystery. Genuine catechists know that catechesis “takes flesh” in the various cultures and milieux: one has only to think of the peoples with their great differences, of modern youth, of the great variety of circumstances in which people find themselves today. But they refuse to accept an impoverishment of catechesis through a renunciation or obscuring of its message, by adaptations, even in language, that would endanger the “precious deposit” of the faith,<sup>97</sup> or by concessions in matters of faith or morals. They are convinced that true catechesis eventually enriches these cultures by helping them to go beyond the defective or even inhuman features in them, and by communicating to their legitimate values the fullness of Christ.<sup>98</sup>

The contribution of popular devotion

54 Another question of method concerns the utilization in catechetical instruction of valid elements in popular piety. I have in mind devotions practiced by the faithful in certain regions with moving fervor and purity of intention, even if the faith underlying them needs to be purified or rectified in many aspects. I have in mind certain easily understood prayers that many simple people are fond of repeating. I have in mind certain acts of piety practiced with a sincere desire to do penance or to please the Lord. Underlying most of these prayers and practices, besides elements that should be discarded, there are other elements which, if they were properly used, could serve very well to help people advance toward knowledge of the mystery of Christ and of his message: the love and mercy of God, the Incarnation of Christ, his redeeming Cross and Resurrection, the activity of the Spirit in each Christian and in the Church, the mystery of the hereafter, the evangelical virtues to be practiced, the presence of the Christian in the world, etc. And why should we appeal to non-Christian or even anti-Christian elements refusing to build on elements which, even if they need to be revised or improved, have something Christian at their root?

Memorization

55.1 The final methodological question the importance of which should at least be referred to – one that was debated several times in the Synod – is that of memorization. In the beginnings of Christian catechesis, which coincided with a civilization that was mainly oral, recourse was had very freely to memorization. Catechesis has since then known a long tradition of learning the principal truths by memorizing. We are all aware that this method can present certain disadvantages, not the least of which is that it lends itself to insufficient or at times almost non-existent assimilation, reducing all knowledge to formulas that are repeated without being properly understood. These disadvantages and the different characteristics of our own civilization have in some places led to the almost complete suppression – according to some, alas, the definitive suppression – of memorization in catechesis. And yet certain very authoritative voices made themselves heard on the occasion of the Fourth General Assembly of the Synod, calling for the restoration of a judicious balance between reflection and spontaneity, between dialogue and silence, between written work and memory work. Moreover certain cultures still set great value on memorization.

55.2 At a time when, in non-religious teaching in certain countries, more and more complaints are being made about the unfortunate consequences of disregarding the human faculty of memory, should we not attempt to put this faculty back into use in an intelligent and even an original way in catechesis, all the more since the celebration or “memorial” of the great events of the history of salvation require a precise knowledge of them? A certain memorization of the words of Jesus, of important Bible passages, of the ten commandments, of the formulas of profession of the faith, of the liturgical texts, of the essential prayers, of key doctrinal ideas, etc., far from being opposed to the dignity of young Christians, or constituting an obstacle to personal dialogue with the Lord, is a real need, as the Synod Fathers forcefully recalled. We must be realists. The blossoms, if we may call them that, of faith and piety do not grow in the desert places of a memory-less catechesis. What is essential is that the texts that are memorized must at the same time be taken in and gradually understood in depth, in order to become a source of Christian life on the personal level and the community level.

55.3 The plurality of methods in contemporary catechesis can be a sign of vitality and ingenuity. In any case, the method chosen must ultimately be referred to a law that is fundamental for the whole of the Church’s life: the law of fidelity to God and of fidelity to man in a single loving attitude.

Affirming Christian identity

56 We live in a difficult world in which the anguish of seeing the best creations of man slip away from him and turn against him creates a climate of uncertainty.<sup>99</sup> In this world catechesis should help Christians to be, for their own joy and the service of all, “light” and “salt.”<sup>100</sup> Undoubtedly this demands that catechesis should strengthen them in their identity and that it should continually separate itself from the surrounding atmosphere of hesitation, uncertainty and insipidity. Among the many difficulties, each of them a challenge for faith, I shall indicate a few in order to assist catechesis in overcoming them.

In an indifferent world

57 A few years ago, there was much talk of the secularized world, the post-Christian era. Fashion changes, but a profound reality remains. Christians today must be formed to live in a world which largely ignores God or which – in religious matters, in place of an exacting and fraternal dialogue, stimulating for all – too often flounders in a debasing indifferentism, if it does not remain in a scornful attitude of “suspicion” in the name of the progress it has made in the field of scientific “explanations.” To “hold on” in this world, to offer to all a “dialogue of salvation”<sup>101</sup> in which each person feels respected in his or her most basic dignity, the dignity of one who is seeking God, we need a catechesis which trains the young people and adults of our communities to remain clear and consistent in their faith, to affirm serenely their Christian and Catholic identity, to “see him who is invisible”<sup>102</sup> and to adhere so firmly to the absoluteness of God that they can be witnesses to him in a materialistic civilization that denies him.

With the original pedagogy of the faith

58.1 The irreducible originality of Christian identity has for corollary and condition no less original a pedagogy of the faith. Among the many prestigious sciences of man that are nowadays making immense advances, pedagogy is certainly one of the most important. The attainments of the other sciences – biology, psychology, sociology – are providing it with valuable elements. The science of education and the art of teaching are continually being subjected to review, with a view to making them better adapted or more effective, with varying degrees of success.

58.2 There is also a pedagogy of faith, and the good that it can do for catechesis cannot be overstated. In fact, it is natural that techniques perfected and tested for education in general should be adapted for the service of education in the faith. However, account must always be taken of the absolute originality of faith. Pedagogy of faith is not a question of transmitting human knowledge, even of the highest kind; it is a question of communicating God's revelation in its entirety. Throughout sacred history, especially in the Gospel, God himself used a pedagogy that must continue to be a model for the pedagogy of faith. A technique is of value in catechesis only to the extent that it serves the faith that is to be transmitted and learned; otherwise it is of no value.

Language suited to the service of the Credo

59.1 A problem very close to the preceding one is that of language. This is obviously a burning question today. It is paradoxical to see that, while modern studies, for instance in the field of communication, semantics and symbology, attribute extraordinary importance to language, nevertheless language is being misused today for ideological mystification, for mass conformity in thought and for reducing man to the level of an object.

59.2 All this has extensive influence in the field of catechesis. For catechesis has a pressing obligation to speak a language suited to today's children and young people in general and to many other categories of people – the language of students, intellectuals and scientists; the language of the illiterate or of people of simple culture; the language of the handicapped, and so on. Saint Augustine encountered this same problem and contributed to its solution for his own time with his well-known work De Catechizandis Rudibus. In catechesis as in theology, there is no doubt that the question of language is of the first order. But there is good reason for recalling here that catechesis cannot admit any language that would result in altering the substance of the content of the Creed, under any pretext whatever, even a pretended scientific one. Deceitful or beguiling language is no better. On the contrary, the supreme rule is that the great advances in the science of language must be capable of being placed at the service of catechesis so as to enable it really to “tell” or “communicate” to the child, the adolescent, the young people and adults of today the whole content of doctrine without distortion.

Catechesi Tradendae

Research and certainty of faith

60.1 A more subtle challenge occasionally comes from the very way of conceiving faith. Certain contemporary philosophical schools, which seem to be exercising a strong influence on some theological currents and, through them, on pastoral practice, like to emphasize that the fundamental human attitude is that of seeking the infinite, a seeking that never attains its object. In theology, this view of things will state very categorically that faith is not certainty but questioning, not clarity but a leap in the dark.

60.2 These currents of thought certainly have the advantage of reminding us that faith concerns things not yet in our possession, since they are hoped for; that as yet we see only “in a mirror dimly”<sup>103</sup>; and that God dwells always in inaccessible light.<sup>104</sup> They help us to make the Christian faith not the attitude of one who has already arrived, but a journey forward as with Abraham. For all the more reason one must avoid presenting as certain things which are not.

60.3 However, we must not fall into the opposite extreme, as too often happens. The Letter to the Hebrews says that “faith is the assurance of things hoped for, the conviction of things not seen.”<sup>105</sup> Although we are not in full possession, we do have an assurance and a conviction. When educating children, adolescents and young people, let us not give them too negative an idea of faith – as if it were absolute non-knowing, a kind of blindness, a world of darkness – but let us show them that the humble yet courageous seeking of the believer, far from having its starting point in nothingness, in plain self-deception, in fallible opinions or in uncertainty, is based on the word of God who cannot deceive or be deceived, and is unceasingly built on the immovable rock of this word. It is the search of the Magi under the guidance of a star,<sup>106</sup> the search of which Pascal, taking up a phrase of Saint Augustine, wrote so profoundly: “You would not be searching for me, if you had not found me.”<sup>107</sup>

60.4 It is also one of the aims of catechesis to give young catechumens the simple but solid certainties that will help them to seek to know the Lord more and better.

Catechesis and theology

61.1 In this context, it seems important to me that the connection between catechesis and theology should be well understood.

61.2 Obviously this connection is profound and vital for those who understand the irreplaceable mission of theology in the service of faith. Thus it is no surprise that every stirring in the field of theology also has repercussions in that of catechesis. In this period immediately after the Council, the Church is living through an important but hazardous time of theological research. The same must be said of hermeneutics with respect to exegesis.

61.3 Synod Fathers from all continents dealt with this question in very frank terms: they spoke of the danger of an “unstable balance” passing from theology to catechesis and they stressed the need to do something about this difficulty. Pope Paul VI himself had dealt with the problem in no less frank terms in the introduction to his Solemn Profession of Faith<sup>108</sup> and in the Apostolic Exhortation marking the fifth anniversary of the close of the Second Vatican Council.<sup>109</sup>

61.4 This point must again be insisted on. Aware of the influence that their research and their statements have on catechetical instruction, theologians and exegetes have a duty to take great care that people do not take for a certainty what on the contrary belongs to the area of questions of opinion or of discussion among experts. Catechists for their part must have the wisdom to pick from the field of theological research those points that can provide light for their own reflection and their teaching, drawing, like the theologians, from the true sources, in the light of the Magisterium. They must refuse to trouble the minds of the children and young people, at this stage of their catechesis, with outlandish theories, useless questions and unproductive discussions, things that Saint Paul often condemned in his Pastoral Letters.<sup>110</sup>

61.5 The most valuable gift that the Church can offer to the bewildered and restless world of our time is to form within it Christians who are confirmed in what is essential and who are humbly joyful in their faith. Catechesis will teach this to them, and it will itself be the first to benefit from it: “The man who wishes to understand himself thoroughly – and not just in accordance with immediate, partial, often superficial, and even illusory standards and measures of his being – must come to Christ with his unrest and uncertainty, and even his weakness and sinfulness, his life and death. He must, so to speak, enter into Christ with all his own self, he must ‘appropriate’ Christ and assimilate the whole of the reality of the Incarnation and Redemption in order to find himself.”<sup>111</sup>

Encouragement to all responsible for catechesis

62 Now, beloved Brothers and sons and daughters, I would like my words, which are intended as a serious and heartfelt exhortation from me in my ministry as Pastor of the universal Church, to set your hearts aflame, like the Letters of Saint Paul to his companions in the Gospel, Titus and Timothy, or like Saint Augustine writing for the deacon Deogratias, when the latter lost heart before his task as a catechist, a real little treatise on the joy of catechizing.<sup>112</sup> Yes, I wish to sow courage, hope and enthusiasm abundantly in the hearts of all those many diverse people who are in charge of religious instruction and training for life in keeping with the Gospel.

Bishops

63.1 To begin with, I turn to my brother Bishops: the Second Vatican Council has already explicitly reminded you of your task in the catechetical area,<sup>113</sup> and the Fathers of the Fourth General Assembly of the Synod have also strongly underlined it.

63.2 Dearly beloved Brothers, you have here a special mission within your Churches: you are beyond all others the ones primarily responsible for catechesis, the catechists par excellence. Together with the Pope, in the spirit of episcopal collegiality, you too have charge of catechesis throughout the Church. Accept therefore what I say to you from my heart.

63.3 I know that your ministry as Bishops is growing daily more complex and overwhelming. A thousand duties call you: from the training of new priests to being actively present within the lay communities, from the living, worthy celebration of the sacraments and acts of worship to concern for human advancement and the defense of human rights. But let the concern to foster active and effective catechesis yield to no other care whatever in any way. This concern will lead you to transmit personally to your faithful the doctrine of life. But it should also lead you to take on in your Diocese, in accordance with the plans of the Episcopal Conference to which you belong, the chief management of catechesis, while at the same time surrounding yourselves with competent and trustworthy assistants. Your principal role will be to bring about and maintain in your Churches a real passion for catechesis, a passion embodied in a pertinent and effective organization, putting into operation the necessary personnel, means and equipment, and also financial resources. You can be sure that if catechesis is done well in your local Churches, everything else will be easier to do. And needless to say, although your zeal must sometimes impose upon you the thankless task of denouncing deviations and correcting errors, it will much more often win for you the joy and consolation of seeing your Churches flourishing because catechesis is given in them as the Lord wishes.

Priests

64 For your part, priests, here you have a field in which you are the immediate assistants of your Bishops. The Council has called you “instructors in the faith”<sup>114</sup>; there is no better way for you to be such instructors than by devoting your best efforts to the growth of your communities in the faith. Whether you are in charge of a parish, or are chaplains to primary or secondary schools or universities, or have responsibility for pastoral activity at any level, or are leaders of large or small communities, especially youth groups, the Church expects you to neglect nothing with a view to a well-organized and well-oriented catechetical effort. The deacons and other ministers that you may have the good fortune to have with you are your natural assistants in this. All believers have a right to catechesis; all pastors have the duty to provide it. I shall always ask civil leaders to respect the freedom of catechetical teaching; but with all my strength I beg you, ministers of Jesus Christ: do not, for lack of zeal or because of some unfortunate preconceived idea, leave the faithful without catechesis. Let it not be said that “the children beg for food, but no one gives to them.”<sup>115</sup>

Men and women Religious

65 Many Religious Institutes for men and women came into being for the purpose of giving Christian education to children and young people, especially the most abandoned. Throughout history, men and women Religious have been deeply committed to the Church's catechetical activity, doing particularly apposite and effective work. At a time when it is desired that the links between Religious and Pastors should be accentuated and consequently the active presence of Religious communities and their members in the pastoral projects of the local Churches, I wholeheartedly exhort you, whose Religious consecration should make you even more readily available for the Church's service, to prepare as well as possible for the task of catechesis according to the differing vocations of your Institutes and the missions entrusted to you, and to carry this concern everywhere. Let the communities dedicate as much as possible of what ability and means they have to the specific work of catechesis.

Lay catechists

66.1 I am anxious to give thanks in the Church's name to all of you, lay teachers of catechesis in the parishes, the men and the still more numerous women throughout the world, who are devoting yourselves to the Religious education of many generations. Your work is often lowly and hidden but it is carried out with ardent and generous zeal, and it is an eminent form of the lay apostolate, a form that is particularly important where for various reasons children and young people do not receive suitable Religious training in the home. How many of us have received from people like you our first notions of catechism and our preparation for the Sacrament of Penance, for our first Communion and Confirmation! The Fourth General Assembly of the Synod did not forget you. I join with it in encouraging you to continue your collaboration for the life of the Church.

66.2 But the term "catechists" belongs above all to the catechists in mission lands. Born of families that are already Christian or converted at some time to Christianity and instructed by missionaries or by another catechist, they then consecrate their lives, year after year, to catechizing children and adults in their own country. Churches that are flourishing today would not have been built up without them. I rejoice at the efforts made by the Sacred Congregation for the Evangelization of Peoples to improve more and more the training of these catechists. I gratefully recall the memory of those whom the Lord has already called to himself. I beg the intercession of those whom my Predecessors have raised to the glory of the altars. I wholeheartedly encourage those engaged in the work. I express the wish that many others may succeed them and that they may increase in numbers for a task so necessary for the missions.

In the parish

67.1 I now wish to speak of the actual setting in which all these catechists normally work. I am returning this time, taking a more overall view, to the “places” for catechesis, some of which have already been mentioned in chapter VI: the parish, the family, the school, organizations.

67.2 It is true that catechesis can be given anywhere, but I wish to stress, in accordance with the desire of very many Bishops, that the parish community must continue to be the prime mover and preeminent place for catechesis. Admittedly, in many countries the parish has been, as it were, shaken by the phenomenon of urbanization. Perhaps some have too easily accepted that the parish should be considered old-fashioned, if not doomed to disappear, in favor of more pertinent and effective small communities. Whatever one may think, the parish is still a major point of reference for the Christian people, even for the non-practicing. Accordingly, realism and wisdom demand that we continue along the path aiming to restore to the parish, as needed, more adequate structures and, above all a new impetus through the increasing integration into it of qualified, responsible and generous members. This being said, and taking into account the necessary diversity of places for catechesis (the parish as such, families taking in children and adolescents, chaplaincies for State schools, Catholic educational establishments, apostolic movements that give periods of catechesis, clubs open to youth in general, spiritual formation weekends, etc.), it is supremely important that all these catechetical channels should really converge on the same confession of faith, on the same membership of the Church, and on commitments in society lived in the same Gospel spirit: “one Lord, one faith, one baptism, one God and Father.”<sup>116</sup> That is why every big parish or every group of parishes with small numbers has the serious duty to train people completely dedicated to providing catechetical leadership (priests, men and women Religious, and lay people), to provide the equipment needed for catechesis under all aspects, to increase and adapt the places for catechesis to the extent that it is possible and useful to do so, and to be watchful about the quality of the religious formation of the various groups and their integration into the ecclesial community.

67.3 In short, without monopolizing or enforcing uniformity, the parish remains, as I have said, the preeminent place for catechesis. It must rediscover its vocation, which is to be a fraternal and welcoming family home, where those who have been baptized and confirmed become aware of forming the People of God. In that home, the bread of good doctrine and the Eucharistic Bread are broken for them in abundance, in the setting of the one act of worship<sup>117</sup>; from that home they are sent out day by day to their apostolic mission in all the centers of activity of the life of the world.

In the family

68.1 The family's catechetical activity has a special character, which is in a sense irreplaceable. This special character has been rightly stressed by the Church, particularly by the Second Vatican Council.<sup>118</sup> Education in the faith by parents, which should begin from the children's tenderest age,<sup>119</sup> is already being given when the members of a family help each other to grow in faith through the witness of their Christian lives, a witness that is often without words but which perseveres throughout a day-to-day life lived in accordance with the Gospel. This catechesis is more incisive when, in the course of family events (such as the reception of the sacraments, the celebration of great liturgical feasts, the birth of a child, a bereavement) care is taken to explain in the home the Christian or religious content of these events. But that is not enough: Christian parents must strive to follow and repeat, within the setting of family life, the more methodical teaching received elsewhere. The fact that these truths about the main questions of faith and Christian living are thus repeated within a family setting impregnated with love and respect will often make it possible to influence the children in a decisive way for life. The parents themselves profit from the effort that this demands of them, for in a catechetical dialogue of this sort each individual both receives and gives.

68.2 Family catechesis therefore precedes, accompanies and enriches all other forms of catechesis. Furthermore, in places where anti-religious legislation endeavors even to prevent education in the faith, and in places where widespread unbelief or invasive secularism makes real religious growth practically impossible, "the Church of the home"<sup>120</sup> remains the one place where children and young people can receive an authentic catechesis. Thus there cannot be too great an effort on the part of Christian parents to prepare for this ministry of being their own children's catechists and to carry it out with tireless zeal. Encouragement must also be given to the individuals or institutions that, through person-to-person contacts, through meetings, and through all kinds of pedagogical means, help parents to perform their task: the service they are doing to catechesis is beyond price.

NOTES:

<sup>118</sup> Since the High Middle Ages, Provincial Councils have insisted on the responsibility of parents in regard to education in the faith: cf. Sixth Council of Arles (813), Canon 19; Council of Mainz (813), Canons 45, 47; Sixth Council of Paris (829), Book 1, Chapter 7: Mansi, Sacrorum Conciliorum Nova et Amplissima Collectio, XIV, 62; 74; 542. Among the more recent documents of the Magisterium, note Pius XI, Encyclical Letter Divini Illius Magistri (December 31, 1929): AAS 22 (1930), 49-86; the many addresses and messages of Pius XII;

At school

69.1 Together with and in connection with the family, the school provides catechesis with possibilities that are not to be neglected. In the unfortunately decreasing number of countries in which it is possible to give education in the faith within the school framework, the Church has the duty to do so as well as possible. This of course concerns first and foremost the Catholic school: it would no longer deserve this title if, no matter how much it shone for its high level of teaching in non-religious matters, there were justification for reproaching it for negligence or deviation in strictly religious education. Let it not be said that such education will always be given implicitly and indirectly. The special character of the Catholic school, the underlying reason for it, the reason why Catholic parents should prefer it, is precisely the quality of the religious instruction integrated into the education of the pupils. While Catholic establishments should respect freedom of conscience, that is to say, avoid burdening consciences from without by exerting physical or moral pressure, especially in the case of the religious activity of adolescents, they still have a grave duty to offer a religious training suited to the often widely varying religious situations of the pupils. They also have a duty to make them understand that, although God's call to serve him in spirit and truth, in accordance with the commandments of God and the precepts of the Church, does not apply constraint, it is nevertheless binding in conscience.

69.2 But I am also thinking of non-confessional and public schools. I express the fervent wish that, in response to a very clear right of the human person and of the family, and out of respect for everyone's religious freedom, all Catholic pupils may be enabled to advance in their spiritual formation with the aid of a religious instruction dependent on the Church, but which, according to the circumstances of different countries, can be offered either by the school or in the setting of the school, or again within the framework of an agreement with the public authorities regarding school timetables, if catechesis takes place only in the parish or in another pastoral center. In fact, even in places where objective difficulties exist, it should be possible to arrange school timetables in such a way as to enable the Catholics to deepen their faith and religious experience, with qualified teachers, whether priests or lay people.

69.3 Admittedly, apart from the school, many other elements of life help in influencing the mentality of the young, for instance, recreation, social background and work surroundings. But those who study are bound to bear the stamp of their studies, to be introduced to cultural or moral values within the atmosphere of the establishment in which they are taught, and to be faced with many ideas met with in school. It is important for catechesis to take full account of this effect of the school on the pupils, if it is to keep in touch with the other elements of the pupil's knowledge and education; thus the Gospel will impregnate the mentality of the pupils in the field of their learning, and the harmonization of their culture will be achieved in the light of faith. Accordingly, I give encouragement to the priests, Religious and lay people who are devoting themselves to sustaining these pupils' faith. This is moreover an occasion for me to reaffirm my firm conviction that to show respect for the Catholic faith of the young to the extent of facilitating its education, its implantation, its consolidation, its free profession and practice would certainly be to the honor of any government, whatever be the system on which it is based or the ideology from which it draws its inspiration.

Within organizations

70.1 Lastly, encouragement must be given to the lay associations, movements and groups, whether their aim is the practice of piety, the direct apostolate, charity and relief work, or a Christian presence in temporal matters. They will all accomplish their objectives better, and serve the Church better, if they give an important place in their internal organization and their method of action to the serious religious training of their members. In this way every association of the faithful in the Church has by definition the duty to educate in the faith.

70.2 This makes more evident the role given to the laity in catechesis today, always under the pastoral direction of their Bishops, as the Propositions left by the Synod stressed several times.

Catechesi Tradendae

Training institutes

71.1 We must be grateful to the Lord for this contribution by the laity, but it is also a challenge to our responsibility as Pastors, since these lay catechists must be carefully prepared for what is, if not a formally instituted ministry, at the very least a function of great importance in the Church. Their preparation calls on us to organize special centers and institutes, which are to be given assiduous attention by the Bishops. This is a field in which diocesan, interdiocesan or national cooperation proves fertile and fruitful. Here also the material aid provided by the richer Churches to their poorer sisters can show the greatest effectiveness, for what better assistance can one Church give to another than to help it to grow as a Church with its own strength?

71.2 I would like to recall to all those who are working generously in the service of the Gospel, and to whom I have expressed here my lively encouragement, the instruction given by my venerated Predecessor Paul VI: “As evangelizers, we must offer . . . the image of people who are mature in faith and capable of finding a meeting-point beyond the real tensions, thanks to a shared, sincere and disinterested search for truth. Yes, the destiny of evangelization is certainly bound up with the witness of unity given by the Church. This is a source of responsibility and also of comfort.”<sup>121</sup>

Conclusion

Catechesi Tradendae

The Holy Spirit, the Teacher within

72.1 At the end of this Apostolic Exhortation, the gaze of my heart turns to him who is the principle inspiring all catechetical work and all who do this work – the Spirit of the Father and of the Son, the Holy Spirit.

72.2 In describing the mission that this Spirit would have in the Church, Christ used the significant words: “He will teach you all things, and bring to your remembrance all that I have said to you.”<sup>122</sup> And he added: “When the Spirit of truth comes, he will guide you into all the truth . . . he will declare to you the things that are to come.”<sup>123</sup>

72.3 The Spirit is thus promised to the Church and to each Christian as a teacher within, who, in the secret of the conscience and the heart, makes one understand what one has heard but was not capable of grasping: “Even now the Holy Spirit teaches the faithful,” said Saint Augustine in this regard, “in accordance with each one’s spiritual capacity. And he sets their hearts aflame with greater desire according as each one progresses in the charity that makes him love what he already knows and desire what he has yet to know.”<sup>124</sup>

72.4 Furthermore, the Spirit’s mission is also to transform the disciples into witnesses to Christ: “He will bear witness to me; and you also are witnesses.”<sup>125</sup>

72.5 But this is not all. For Saint Paul, who on this matter synthesizes a theology that is latent throughout the New Testament, it is the whole of one’s “being a Christian,” the whole of the Christian life, the new life of the children of God, that constitutes a life in accordance with the Spirit.<sup>126</sup> Only the Spirit enables us to say to God: “Abba, Father.”<sup>127</sup> Without the Spirit we cannot say: “Jesus is Lord.”<sup>128</sup> From the Spirit come all the charisms that build up the Church, the community of Christians.<sup>129</sup> In keeping with this, Saint Paul gives each disciple of Christ the instruction: “Be filled with the Spirit.”<sup>130</sup> Saint Augustine is very explicit: “Both (our believing and our doing good) are ours because of the choice of our will, and yet both are gifts from the Spirit of faith and charity.”<sup>131</sup>

72.6 Catechesis, which is growth in faith and the maturing of Christian life toward its fullness, is consequently a work of the Holy Spirit, a work that he alone can initiate and sustain in the Church.

72.7 This realization, based on the text quoted above and on many other passages of the New Testament, convinces us of two things.

72.8 To begin with, it is clear that, when carrying out her mission of giving catechesis, the Church – and also every individual Christian devoting himself to that mission within the Church and in her name – must be very much aware of acting as a living, pliant instrument of the Holy Spirit. To invoke this Spirit constantly, to be in communion with him, to endeavor to know his authentic inspirations must be the attitude of the teaching Church and of every catechist.

72.9 Secondly, the deep desire to understand better the Spirit's action and to entrust oneself to him more fully – at a time when “in the Church we are living an exceptionally favorable season of the Spirit,” as my Predecessor Paul VI remarked in his Apostolic Exhortation Evangelii Nuntiandi<sup>132</sup> – must bring about a catechetical awakening. For “renewal in the Spirit” will be authentic and will have real fruitfulness in the Church, not so much according as it gives rise to extraordinary charisms, but according as it leads the greatest possible number of the faithful, as they travel their daily paths, to make a humble, patient and persevering effort to know the mystery of Christ better and better, and to bear witness to it.

72.10 I invoke on the catechizing Church this Spirit of the Father and the Son, and I beg him to renew catechetical dynamism in the Church.

Mary, Mother and model of the disciple

73.1 May the Virgin of Pentecost obtain this for us through her intercession! By a unique vocation, she saw her Son Jesus “increase in wisdom and in stature, and in favor.”<sup>133</sup> As he sat on her lap and later as he listened to her throughout the hidden life at Nazareth, this Son, who was “the only Son from the Father,” “full of grace and truth,” was formed by her in human knowledge of the Scriptures and of the history of God’s plan for his people, and in adoration of the Father.<sup>134</sup> She in turn was the first of his disciples. She was the first in time, because even when she found her adolescent Son in the Temple she received from him lessons that she kept in her heart.<sup>135</sup> She was the first disciple above all else because no one has been “taught by God”<sup>136</sup> to such depth. She was “both Mother and disciple,” as Saint Augustine said of her, venturing to add that her discipleship was more important for her than her motherhood.<sup>137</sup> There are good grounds for the statement made in the Synod Hall that Mary is “a living catechism” and “the Mother and model of catechists.”

73.2 May the presence of the Holy Spirit, through the prayers of Mary, grant the Church unprecedented enthusiasm in the catechetical work that is essential for her. Thus will she effectively carry out, at this moment of grace, her inalienable and universal mission, the mission given her by her Teacher: “Go therefore and make disciples of all nations.”<sup>138</sup>

"The future of humanity passes by way of the family" (§86.2). More than any previous Pope, John Paul II has spoken passionately and at length about the family's irreplaceable role in ecclesial and social life. From the beginning of his Pontificate the Holy Father has insisted that the fabric of society and of the Church can be healed only by means of the family. On November 22, 1981, he published the apostolic exhortation Familiaris Consortio, on the role of the Christian family in the world. This document is a "summa" of the Church's teaching on the family's identity, decisive tasks, and pastoral care.

The 1980 Synod on the family was the first Assembly at which John Paul presided as Pope. This choice of topic was entirely fitting, since it reflected his long-standing philosophical and pastoral interest in marriage and the family. As a professor of ethics at Lublin and Archbishop of Cracow, he published widely in these areas, including Love and Responsibility (1960), a book on sexual ethics, and The Jeweler's Shop (1960), a play on the trials of married life. As Pope, he has addressed themes touching human sexuality, marriage, and family on countless occasions, most ardently and extensively during the International Year of the Family in 1994. Besides countless discourses, homilies, messages, reflections, and interventions through the different organs of the Holy See, John Paul also treated these topics in his Letter to Families Gratissimam Sane (1994) and in his Message for the 1994 World Day of Peace.

The Pope admits his great debt to the deliberations and proposals of the Synod Fathers as important sources of Familiaris Consortio. At the end of the Assembly, they asked him to be "a spokesman before humanity of the Church's lively care for the family and to give suitable indications for renewed pastoral effort in this fundamental sector of the life of man and of the Church" (§2.3). His apostolic exhortation is a personal synthesis of the Synod's "very valuable contribution of teaching and experience" (§2.4).

Almost every page of Familiaris Consortio reflects the Church's firm commitment to safeguard and foster family life. Opposing those who consider the family merely an historically contingent way of organizing social life, the Holy Father defends "the entire truth and the full dignity of marriage and the family" (§5.1). The Christian community gives these initiatives her support because the truth about their identity and mission belongs to the proclamation of the Gospel. Indeed, since the Church is "illuminated by the faith that gives her an understanding of all the truth concerning the great value of marriage and the family and their deepest meaning" (§3.1), she is well equipped to proclaim this “good news” boldly and joyfully to everyone.

According to the Pope, when the Church voices her concern for the family, she takes into account the needs of three different groups. First, she supports those who are already aware of the precious value of marriage and the family and are trying to live in accordance with the Church’s teaching. Second, the Christian community strives to enlighten those who are uncertain, bewildered, or still searching for the truth about conjugal life and marriage. Third, the Church wishes to strengthen those who are in any way hindered from freely living their family life. This exhortation is designed to encourage and inspire “every person who wonders about the destiny of marriage and the family” (§1.2). The Church’s teaching in these areas is relevant for all men and women of good will. John Paul singles out young people in a special way as privileged recipients of Familiaris Consortio. It presents them with new horizons and helps them to discover “the beauty and grandeur of the vocation to love and the service of life” (§1.3).

In keeping with the genre of post-synodal papal documents, the Pope is especially attentive to ensuring its pastoral character and exhortative tone. Familiaris Consortio is therefore neither a theoretical text nor an historical survey of the Magisterium’s doctrine of marriage and the family. Rather, the exhortation betrays the calm security and optimism which stem from the Pope’s confidence in the family, a confidence rooted in Christ as the inexhaustible source of grace for married couples. In clearly proposing the truth with all its demands, he encourages families to live according to God’s plan. Even though the Holy Father unmask errors which are eroding the essential values of marriage and the family, he is chiefly concerned with forming people’s consciences in light of the truth revealed by creation and Redemption. His goal is to express persuasively theological principles and pastoral guidelines.

In Familiaris Consortio, John Paul relies on a variety of sources. From the Scriptures, he cites most frequently texts from Genesis 1-3 and Ephesians 5:21-33. As is always true in his writings, he sprinkles his exhortation with innumerable references to the documents of the Second Vatican Council, above all to the section on marriage in Gaudium et Spes (§§47-52), and to Lumen Gentium and Apostolicam Actuositatem. Also the Pope often quotes or refers to Paul VI’s encyclical Humanae Vitae (1968), especially in his discussion of the transmission of life. And, for the first time in an apostolic exhortation, he cites directly from several of the proposals which the Fathers handed over to him at the end of their Assembly. In fact, Familiaris Consortio is a systematic synthesis of the Synod’s conclusions, which were then given shape by John Paul’s theological vision, pastoral concerns, and stylistic touches.

Familiaris Consortio

Summary

As well as its introduction and conclusion, the apostolic exhortation is tightly organized in four principal sections. Chapter one, “Bright Spots and Shadows for the Family Today” (§§4-10), describes the positive and negative aspects of the contemporary family. In chapter two, “The Plan of God for Marriage and the Family” (§§11-16), the Holy Father analyzes the nature of the family as a community of persons built on love. Chapter three, “The Role of the Christian Family” (§§17-64), is a thorough treatment of the family’s mission. It explains the family’s tasks in four subsections: forming a community of persons (§§18-27), serving life (§§28-41), participating in the development of society (§§42-48), and sharing in the life and mission of the Church (§§49-64). In chapter four, “Pastoral Care of the Family: Stages, Structures, Agents and Situations” (§§65-85), the Pope recommends that the Church undertake vigorous initiatives on behalf of families, especially those that are wounded in some way.

Evangelical discernment of the family's current situation

According to John Paul II, today's family is in crisis; it is "the object of numerous forces that seek to destroy it or in some way to deform it" (§3.4). If the Church is to challenge these destructive forces effectively, she must scrutinize the signs of the times which influence sexuality, marriage, and the family in this period of rapid social and cultural change.

Familiaris Consortio describes the positive and negative aspects of the family's present situation as "an interplay of light and darkness" (§6.5). Among the encouraging signs of Christ's saving grace at work in the family are a greater awareness of personal freedom and the value of interpersonal relationships, the promotion of women's dignity, and the increased concern for responsible procreation, the education of children, interfamily support, and the family's responsibility to society and the Church. Along with these bright spots, the Pope describes the shadows cast over family life, to which he devotes more attention. Included among the negative phenomena that bespeak a disturbing degradation of family values are the following: "a mistaken theoretical and practical concept of the independence of the spouses in relation to each other; serious misconceptions regarding the relationship of authority between parents and children; the concrete difficulties that the family itself experiences in the transmission of values; the growing number of divorces; the scourge of abortion; the ever more frequent recourse to sterilization; the appearance of a truly contraceptive mentality" (§6.2). Other shadows mentioned later in the exhortation include confusion about the meaning of human sexuality, the exploitation of women, "machismo," cohabitation without marriage, and recourse to civil marriage by Catholics. Each of these has a destructive effect on individuals and society.

As is customary, the Holy Father goes beyond a description of the particular situation to an analysis of the root of the sickness requiring a remedy. He diagnoses the fundamental cause of family breakdown as "a corruption of the idea and the experience of freedom, conceived not as a capacity for realizing the truth of God's plan for marriage and the family, but as an autonomous power of self-affirmation, often against others, for one's own selfish well-being" (§6.3). Liberal societies interpret freedom as the right to do whatever one wants. Moreover, the distorted notion of freedom which they promote feeds the view that the family is merely a group of autonomous individuals who come together out of self-interest. Here, as elsewhere in his writings, John Paul vigorously upholds his conviction that the exercise of authentic freedom is always yoked to the objective truth of creation and Redemption.

According to Familiaris Consortio, the Church is the steward of the truth about the family. She “knows the path by which the family can reach the heart of the deepest truth about itself” (§86.8). But the Church does not labor arrogantly or alone. She works along with all those who are seeking the truth, offering her evangelical discernment as “an orientation in order that the entire truth and the full dignity of marriage and the family may be preserved and realized” (§5.1).

This process of discernment, of which the apostolic exhortation is itself a striking example, is a task for Bishops and laity alike. In questions touching on marriage and family life, Christian spouses, in virtue of the Sacrament of Matrimony, have received a particular charism of discernment. This gift allows them to make a “unique and irreplaceable contribution to the elaboration of an authentic evangelical discernment in the various situations and cultures in which men and women live their marriage and their family life” (§5.5). While Bishops must dutifully listen to the voice of the laity’s experience and prayer, it remains their responsibility to “examine and authoritatively judge” the genuineness of the insights of the lay faithful (§5.4). It is the doctrine of the hierarchical Magisterium on marriage and the family, the Holy Father maintains, “which is the one authentic guide for the People of God” (§31.4).

God's plan for the family founded on marriage

Before outlining the family's mission in society and in the Church, John Paul describes its identity as revealed in the plan of the Creator and Redeemer. In chapter two he develops a theological vision which traces the family's origin to the will of God. The divine design for marriage and the family is first expressed in creation and then fulfilled in the New and Eternal Covenant sealed by the blood of Christ.

Familiaris Consortio begins its presentation of the theology of the family with a consideration of "the original design of God for marriage and the family" (§10.4). Following the example of Christ, who referred to the "beginning" (cf. Mt 19:8), when God revealed his will for ordering conjugal and family life, the Pope takes us back to the creation of man and woman. This "beginning," the time before the disruption in human relations caused by original sin, sets forth the original truth of the family. Today, due to the mystery of the Redemption, families can once again live this "beginning" with the help of Christ's grace (cf. §§3.3, 13.2). Accordingly, "the family must go back to the 'beginning' of God's creative act, if it is to attain self-knowledge and self-realization" (§17.2). In that journey back to the "beginning" the family discovers that it is a community of love and life.

One of the Pope's favorite scriptural texts is Genesis 1:27: "God created man in his own image, in the image of God he created him; male and female he created them" (1:27). Human beings are called into existence "through love" and "for love" (§11.1). Bearing the divine image, their vocation is to act as God acts. That is, they are to love as he does and to give themselves to others as he does: "Love is therefore the fundamental and innate vocation of every human being" (§11.2). This call to love and be loved is at the heart of the spousal covenant which forms the wider community of the family. Conjugal love and marriage "are ordained to the procreation and education of children, in whom they find their crowning" (§14.1). When a couple give themselves to one another in marital relations, they give not just their body and spirit "but also the reality of children, who are a living reflection of their love, a permanent sign of conjugal unity and a living and inseparable synthesis of their being a father and a mother" (§14.2).

For the Holy Father, each human being is an incarnate spirit, a person with a body, who expresses and receives love through that body. He or she "is called to love in his unified totality. Love includes the human body, and the body is made a sharer in spiritual love" (§11.3). As male or female the human body has a "nuptial meaning" (§37.6). And conjugal love, the basis of marriage and the family, is willed by God himself. It, too, is to be lived according to his design established in the “beginning.”

The Old Testament recounts that God revealed his love for Israel by forming a Covenant with his people. This communion of love is meaningfully expressed by the marriage covenant between husband and wife. “Their bond of love,” writes the Holy Father, “becomes the image and the symbol of the Covenant which unites God and his people” (§12.2). Covenantal love is thus the model of the faithful and life-giving love to which spouses are called and on which marriage is built.

It is, however, the New and Eternal Covenant brought about by Christ’s redemptive sacrifice on Calvary which fully discloses God’s plan for marriage and the family: “In this sacrifice there is entirely revealed that plan which God has imprinted on the humanity of man and woman since their creation” (§13.3). This Covenant, which is sealed by the blood of the Cross, confirms the original truth about marriage. Christ is the Bridegroom who unites the Church to himself as his Bride (cf. Eph 5:21-33). By means of this union, he removes the “hardness of heart” (Mt 19:8) caused by sin and, in his Church, “makes man capable of realizing this truth in its entirety” (§13.2). God’s plan for marriage, first revealed in creation, is now elevated to a sacrament of the New Covenant. The marriage of baptized spouses – “in the Lord” (1 Cor 7:39) – is “a real symbol” (§13.3) of Christ’s faithful and eternal love for his Bride, the Church. The belonging of husband and wife to each other is “the real representation,” writes the Pope, “of the very relationship of Christ with the Church” (§13.7, cf. §51.2). The love of Christ for the Church furnishes the interpretive key for the exhortation’s later discussion of the specific characteristics of conjugal and family love as total, sacrificial, faithful, exclusive, and indissoluble.

John Paul ends the chapter on God’s plan for marriage and the family with a section devoted to virginity and celibacy. The choice of renouncing marriage for the sake of the Kingdom, he says, is also a calling, an exalted but less common way for a believer, to live his or her vocation to love. Virginity presupposes a high regard for marriage: “When marriage is not esteemed, neither can consecrated virginity or celibacy exist” (§16.1). The Pope holds that virginity or celibacy “keeps alive in the Church a consciousness of the mystery of marriage and defends it from any reduction and impoverishment” (§16.4). Moreover, he reaffirms the Church’s Tradition regarding “the superiority of this charism to that of marriage.” This objective excellence, which is distinct from an individual’s holiness of life, is based on “the wholly singular link which it has with the Kingdom of God” (§16.5). By their virginal way of life, celibates express the definitive value of the Kingdom and anticipate the world of future resurrection (cf. Mt 22:30).

Family as a community of persons

According to John Paul II, the family is a community of love and life which arises from the spousal covenant of marriage. It is the path taken by most people in living out their vocation to love. Thus, “the essence and role of the family are in the final analysis specified by love”: the family “has the mission to guard, reveal and communicate love, and this is a living reflection of and a real sharing in God’s love for humanity and the love of Christ the Lord for the Church his Bride” (§17.2). In order to foster this mission of love the family is called to assume four responsibilities. It must form a community of persons, serve life, contribute to the development of society, and share in the Church’s life and mission.

The first task of the family is to live faithfully and foster the growth of its inner life as a true community of persons. This means that love must be the family’s life-giving principle. Its growth and fulfillment as a community of persons depends on love. Only love between spouses and among family members can establish and sustain this institution as a community of persons.

Before defining the specific traits of the family community, Familiaris Consortio describes two characteristics of the communion between husband and wife on which it is founded. First, this communion is marked by a continual growth in the spouses’ mutual self-giving, a sharing of their entire life-project together. Thus husband and wife progress toward “an ever richer union with each other on all levels – of the body, of the character, of the heart, of the intelligence and will, of the soul” (§19.3). The unity and exclusivity of conjugal communion is “radically contradicted by polygamy” (§19.4), a practice which contradicts God’s original revealed plan for man and woman. Second, authentic spousal communion must be indissoluble. The divine design of creation, renewed by Christ’s teaching and grace, requires that the foundation of the family rest on a bond that “participates truly in the irrevocable indissolubility that binds Christ to the Church his Bride, loved by him to the end” (§20.4). Divorce and a subsequent marital union deny the truth of the indissolubility of marriage.

Just as Christ’s grace bestowed in the Sacrament of Matrimony raises the union of husband and wife to a higher level than that given in creation, so also does that sacramental grace enable the broader community of the family to be united in a deeper communion, one which perfects the natural bonds of love between its members. Following the teaching of the Second Vatican Council, the Holy Father describes the Christian family as a “domestic Church,” or Church of the home, since it is “a specific revelation and realization of ecclesial communion” (§21.3). The family intensifies its life as a community of persons by enabling each member to give and receive love from the others, by fostering the spirit of sacrifice, generosity, self-giving, forgiveness, and especially by celebrating the Sacraments of Reconciliation and Eucharist.

John Paul also mentions several serious obstacles that prevent the family from becoming a community of persons which fosters the personal dignity of each of its members. This concern leads him to take up questions dealing with women and mothers, men and husbands, children, and the elderly.

As persons of equal dignity created in God's image and likeness, husband and wife form the primary human community. The Holy Father forcefully asserts, as a truth of revelation, "the equal dignity and responsibility of women with men" (§22.3). He resolutely condemns the mentality which treats women as "things" rather than "persons"; such an attitude produces the bitter fruits of contempt, slavery, pornography, prostitution, and other forms of degrading discrimination against women (cf. §24). For John Paul, "the true advancement of women requires that clear recognition be given to the value of their maternal and family role, by comparison with all other public roles and all other professions" (§23.2). The promotion of the family as a community of persons also demands a renewed theology of work, especially as it affects women. This theology entails the recognition of and respect for the irreplaceable value of women's work in the family. It also requires that wives and mothers not be compelled to work outside the home in order to make ends meet.

Husbands and fathers, too, are to foster family community in suitable ways. Each one must show "a profound respect for the equal dignity of his wife" (§25.3). Men should be intimately involved in family life, yet without becoming an oppressive presence. The Pope excoriates "machismo," which he defines as "a wrong superiority of male prerogatives which humiliates women and inhibits the development of healthy family relationships" (§25.4). The provision of a sound education for the children is among the father's chief tasks in ensuring the family's growth as a community of persons.

The exhortation also recalls that parents foster the family's identity as a community of persons by showing profound esteem for their children's personal dignity and respect for their rights. This attitude calls for the parents to show a tender love to offspring, especially when sick, suffering, or handicapped, and to assume responsibility for their children's material, emotional, educational, and spiritual welfare. Moreover, John Paul observes that children can "offer their own precious contribution to building up the family community and even to the sanctification of their parents" (§26.4). Finally, he notes the need, where it has been neglected, to treasure the essential contribution made by the elderly in forming the family as a community of persons.

Serving life: procreation and education

A frequent theme of John Paul's teaching, and one repeated here, is that of the family's fundamental task to serve life, to make present in history "the original blessing of the Creator" (§28.2). After God created man and woman in his own image, he ordered them to "be fruitful and multiply" (Gen 1:28). Consequently, from the "beginning," husband and wife are to share in God's love and power "through their free and responsible cooperation in transmitting the gift of human life" (§28.1). Spousal fruitfulness is a unique participation in, and prolongation of, God's creative love; children are "the fruit and the sign of conjugal love" (§28.3).

Since procreation is such a sacred reality, the Church staunchly defends and fosters the dignity of conjugal love in her teaching. She shows this vigilance because "doubt or error in the field of marriage or the family involves obscuring to a serious extent the integral truth about the human person" (§31.4). In keeping with the defense of an authentic Christian anthropology, a concern which marks his entire Pontificate, John Paul reaffirms the Church's teaching on conjugal sexuality, as proposed by the Second Vatican Council and Paul VI's encyclical Humanae Vitae (1968). Certainly the Church's pastoral practice must reckon with the contemporary social and cultural situation which often makes her teaching difficult to understand. But, despite today's widespread pessimism about the future, pursuit of selfish pleasure, and exaggerated fear of demographic increase, she must boldly make known her "prophetic proclamation" (§29.2) on the transmission of human life. Amid society's widespread confusion which falsifies or misinterprets the meaning of conjugal love, "the Church more urgently feels how irreplaceable is her mission of presenting sexuality as a value and task of the whole person, created male and female in the image of God" (§32.1). Central to her teaching is the conviction that the procreative and unitive meanings of sex cannot be deliberately separated without distorting the true significance of conjugal relations.

In Familiaris Consortio, the Holy Father deals at length with contraception, as we shall examine later in detail. With insights based on his personalist ethics he explains why it is intrinsically immoral, and why it strikes "at God's creation itself at the level of the deepest interaction of nature and person" (§32.6). The Pope also clarifies the difference between contraception and natural methods of regulating fertility and spells out the pastoral ramifications of the Church's teaching on responsible parenthood.

In matters of conjugal morality, the Church is inseparably Teacher and Mother. As Teacher, she proposes the full truth of the revealed moral norms received from her Lord. As Mother, she is “close to the many married couples who find themselves in difficulty over this important point of the moral life” (§33.3). The Church’s pastoral approach to contraception is rooted in her conviction that the divine law on transmitting life fosters the true good of married love and family communion. When faced by a couple’s lack of understanding and failures in practice, all those engaged in family ministry must present the moral norms governing responsible procreation clearly and forcefully. But, at the same time, they must also make a “tenacious and courageous effort to create and uphold all the human conditions – psychological, moral and spiritual – indispensable for understanding and living the moral value and norm” (§33.5). The whole Church community – Bishops, priests, Religious, parents, and families – ought to assume responsibility for instilling conviction about the truth of human sexuality and offering the practical help necessary which enables spouses to live their conjugal life in light of Christ’s teaching.

Besides following the Church’s norms on responsible procreation, serving life in the family also entails the duty of parents to pass on to their children the “fruits of moral, spiritual and supernatural life” (§28.4). Because they participate in God’s creative activity, mothers and fathers have the task of educating their offspring. Providing an integral education is a spiritual prolongation of procreation. It completes the conjugal love of parents and brings it to fulfillment. Through the rearing of children a mother and father become “fully parents” (§39.4).

The Holy Father lists four characteristics of the parents’ right and duty to educate their children. First and foremost, parental love is “the animating principle and therefore the norm inspiring and guiding all concrete educational activity” (§36.3). Second, the education of children is a constitutive element of being a mother and a father. Third, parents are the most important educators of their own children; their role is “original and primary with regard to the educational role of others” (§36.2). Fourth, the parents’ educational mission is “irreplaceable and inalienable” (§36.2). When any other people or institutions share in their responsibility, as is the case in all modern societies, they must respect the principle of subsidiarity, which recognizes the parents’ prevailing rights in this domain.

John Paul then describes the content of the human and Christian education of children. He encourages parents to “train their children in the essential values of human life” (§37.1). In this way they carry out the family’s task of being “the first and fundamental school of social living” (§37.2). He especially points out the primary right and duty of parents to provide a “clear and delicate” sex education and a formation in chastity for their children (cf. §37.3). Their instruction in this realm should be based on “a knowledge of and respect for the moral norms”

Like the universal Church, the family is both mother and teacher, “called together by word and sacrament as the Church of the home” (§38.3). Through the consecration received in the Sacrament of Matrimony parents receive the vocation and grace of “building up the Church in their children” (§38.3, cf. §39.3). This mission requires them to “present to their children all the topics that are necessary for the gradual maturing of their personality from a Christian and ecclesial point of view” (§39.1). Parents are the first heralds of the Gospel for their children, whom they instruct chiefly by the living witness of their lives.

No doubt having totalitarian regimes in mind, the Pope maintains that “the right of parents to choose an education in conformity with their religious faith must be absolutely guaranteed” (§40.3). This is in accordance with the principle of subsidiarity, which acknowledges the parents’ God-given right to be the principal educators of their own children. The State and the Church are obliged to help parents to carry out their educational mission, but not to replace them. Parents, for their part, must offer cooperation to school and ecclesial authorities.

Family's mission to society

John Paul is convinced that the family, as the first and basic cell of society, has a key role to play in revitalizing social life. It is “the first school of the social virtues that are the animating principle of the existence and development of society itself” (§42.2). He describes this educational role by pointing out the contribution that the family should make to society, and the contribution that society should make to the family.

Contemporary society is becoming depersonalized. Things, efficiency, and technique are often given more importance than persons. But, according to John Paul II, the family can stem this negative tide. In fact, it is “the most effective means for humanizing and personalizing society” (§43.4). As its life-giving nucleus, the family participates in developing society. Every social institution, every concern touching education, work, economics, culture, and politics is connected with this vital social cell. The family makes its “first and fundamental contribution to society” (§43.1) by living its own interior vocation: being a communion of persons.

It is in the family that a person first becomes aware of his or her unique dignity and learns what it means to love and to be loved. Here, where “respecting and fostering personal dignity in each and every one” is regarded “as the only basis for value” (§43.2), the social fabric is reinforced. Families offset the anonymity and impersonality of modern social life by recognizing the uniqueness of each member, age or “usefulness” notwithstanding. To the extent that the family promotes true communion among its members, it can serve as “the first and irreplaceable school of social life, and example and stimulus for the broader community relationships marked by respect, justice, dialogue and love” (§43.3).

By becoming more what it is – a community of persons – the family, either singly or in association, can effectively contribute to the development of social and cultural life. Furthermore, the Pope urges families to take an active part in the political arena. He invites them to assume their responsibility for transforming society by becoming protagonists of “family politics.” This task leads them to be “the first to take steps to see that the laws and institutions of the State not only do not offend but support and positively defend the rights and duties of the family” (§44.5).

For its part, society should defend and foster the family, respecting its specific identity and inalienable duties. Again the Pope mentions the importance of subsidiarity. The State is never to usurp the family's role of attending to its needs, which it accomplishes either on its own or in association with other families. Political authority must respect the family's rightful autonomy and refrain from regulating its internal life. Rather, the State should “favor and encourage as far as possible responsible initiative by families” (§45.3). At the same time, public authorities should strive to ensure that families have the economic, social, educational, and cultural help needed for their own development. As a way of protecting the family against incursions and of reminding the State of its duties, the Pope promises that the Holy See will draw up a Charter of the Rights of the Family which it will then present to the relevant authorities (cf. §46). This Charter was issued in 1983.

Family's mission in and for the Church

Even more important than the family's social role is its ecclesial task. Through the Sacrament of Matrimony, the Christian family "is grafted into the mystery of the Church to such a degree as to become a sharer, in its own way, in the saving mission proper to the Church" (§49.4). The family, then, is a saved community that is also called to be a saving community. It has the vocation of building up the Kingdom of God precisely as a community of persons. In the Holy Father's words: "The family's sharing in the Church's mission should follow a community pattern: the spouses together as a couple, the parents and children as a family, must live their service to the Church and to the world" (§50.2). Following the traditional depiction of Christ as Prophet, Priest, and King, Familiaris Consortio describes the family's threefold mission as prophetic, priestly, and kingly.

The family fulfills its prophetic mission by being a believing and an evangelizing community. As a believing community, it welcomes the word of God faithfully and bears witness to it in daily life. The family is also called to be an evangelizing community. For John Paul, "the future of evangelization depends in great part on the Church of the home" (§52.2, cf. §65.3). This ministry of evangelization within the domestic Church first embraces the children, but it extends to any member of the family who lacks faith or practices it inconsistently. The family's prophetic task also commits it to sharing in the Church's duty to "preach the Gospel to the whole creation" (Mk 16:15). It carries this out by the luminous witness of family love, by working in mission territories, and by fostering missionary vocations among its members.

As a community in dialogue with God, the family discharges its priestly calling through sharing in the sacraments, offering the spiritual sacrifice of life, and prayer. "The Christian family," writes the Pope, "is called to be sanctified and to sanctify the ecclesial community and the world" (§55.3). The Sacrament of Matrimony "is the specific source and original means of sanctification for Christian married couples and families" (§56.1). It is an act of worship whose graces are conferred on husband and wife and, through them, on the children. The family also lives out its priestly mission by partaking in the Eucharist, through which "the different members of the Christian family become one body" (§57.2), and by accepting forgiveness in Reconciliation. Matrimony also gives family members "the grace and moral obligation of transforming their whole lives into a 'spiritual sacrifice' " (§56.5, cf. §59.1). Lastly, the family is sanctified by prayer offered in common or in private for its specific needs.

The family's kingly mission is expressed in its service of love toward God and neighbor. Just as Christ exercises his royal power by serving others (cf. Mk 10:45), so also does the Christian family. It participates in Christ's kingship by "sharing his spirit and practice of service to man" (§63.4). As a community of persons sustained by the grace of the Sacrament of Matrimony, the family should work to bring about "a more homelike or family dimension" (§64.2) in the Church and to promote the truly human advancement of society.

Stages in the pastoral care of the family

In chapter four of Familiaris Consortio, John Paul II urges the whole Church to accept the challenge of strengthening the pastoral care of the family, an activity which he considers “a real matter of priority” (§65.3). He systematically describes the stages, structures, agents, and difficult situations of this pastoral intervention. Not given to laying down prohibitions or formulating a set of rules, the Pope proceeds by enlightening and encouraging. He stresses that the family’s pastoral care is guided by three principles. First, it fosters the family’s foundation in its vocation to safeguard love, the basis of its stability and vitality. Second, family ministry reaches out to all families, whether Christian or not, above all to those in difficult or irregular situations. Third, wise pastoral initiatives take into account that the path to holiness is arduous and achieved step by step.

According to the Holy Father, the pastoral care of the family begins with the promotion of “better and more intensive programs of marriage preparation” (§66.2). While education for married life is first of all the family’s responsibility, today’s situation calls for the Church and society to play a role in this process as well. Remote preparation begins in the home during childhood. Through the primarily silent witness of parents, children learn about relationships, values, and the human and spiritual meaning of marriage. A more proximate preparation for marriage and family life is provided during the teenage years by catechesis and religious formation. When a couple is engaged to be married, there should be an intense period of immediate preparation. Familiaris Consortio compares this last period to a catechumenate. Its purpose is to lead the couple to “a deeper knowledge of the mystery of Christ and the Church, of the meaning of grace and of the responsibility of Christian marriage” (§66.8).

The wedding ceremony itself also deserves pastoral attention. Those responsible for preparing the couple are to ensure that the proposed marriage meets the Church’s regulations regarding free consent, absence of impediments, the observance of canonical form, and the liturgical rite of the marriage itself. Provision should also be made for appropriate cultural adaptations of the liturgical celebration and the participation of the wider community. The Pope also takes up the sensitive problem presented by a couple who are non-practicing but wishes a sacramental marriage. He warns against being overly rigorous in this regard. In particular, when motives of a social nature play a large part, he cautions against laying down rigid criteria which would too readily lead to refusing a sacramental marriage. As long as the couple at least implicitly consent to what the Church intends by Matrimony, they should not be turned away. The sacrament is to be denied only when, in spite of all efforts, “engaged couples show that they reject explicitly and formally what the Church intends to do when the marriage of baptized persons is celebrated” (§68.7).

The Church’s pastoral concern should also be evident after the wedding. All members of the local community are invited to help the newly married to live their new vocation. Christian spouses with experience in living the Sacrament of Matrimony faithfully are the most valuable mentors of young couples.

Familiaris Consortio

Structures and agents of pastoral care

“No plan for organized pastoral work, at any level,” writes John Paul, “must ever fail to take into consideration the pastoral care of the family” (§70.2). To carry out this ministry the Church has at her disposal various structures and devoted workers. As a way of preparing some members of the community more specifically for the family apostolate, the Pope recommends that they receive a specialized formation, if possible in institutes set up for this purpose.

By virtue of the grace of Matrimony, families have a unique role in providing pastoral care for themselves and for other families. This mission is particularly effective when it is carried out in the various movements of spirituality, formation, and apostolate which have family care among their specific concerns. Christian families are also called to take part in non-ecclesial associations which safeguard and promote authentic family life.

Familiaris Consortio singles out six different groups that minister to the family: Bishops, priests and deacons, Religious, theologians, lay specialists, and professionals in the field of social communications. The local Bishop, of course, is the one “principally responsible in the Diocese for the pastoral care of the family” (§73.1). For him, this ministry must be a priority: “He must devote to it personal interest, care, time, personnel and resources, but above all personal support for the families and for all those who, in the various diocesan structures, assist him in the pastoral care of the family” (§73.1).

After a serious preparation for the family apostolate, priests and deacons assist families by celebrating the sacraments and preaching the truth. The Holy Father reminds the clergy that their teaching and advice must “always be in full harmony with the authentic Magisterium of the Church.” This fidelity, he maintains, will enable “the People of God to gain a correct sense of the faith” which can then be applied to everyday life (§73.4). With the same concern for doctrinal orthodoxy, the Pope addresses theologians. He exhorts them to explain clearly and thoroughly the Church’s teaching on the family and recalls that “the proximate and obligatory norm in the teaching of the faith – also concerning family matters – belongs to the hierarchical Magisterium” (§73.5, cf. §31.4).

The Pope appeals to men and women Religious to develop their apostolate on behalf of the family. Likewise, lay specialists in the various professions, whether individually or in associations, can support families by their professional services and advice. Lastly, he asks those involved in the field of social communications to make every effort to promote authentic family values in the media and to avoid presenting distorted ways of looking at the family which undermine its dignity and mission.

Pastoral care in difficult cases

Families in difficult situations deserve from the Church a “generous, intelligent and prudent pastoral commitment, modeled on the Good Shepherd” (§77.1). John Paul invites all those entrusted with pastoral responsibilities to help wounded families to experience Christ’s love, the Church’s maternal comfort, and God’s mercy, a mercy which is never separated from the demands of truth. Among the situations requiring special pastoral care are mixed marriages, de facto free unions, common-law marriages, civil marriages, and divorce (which is dealt with at greater length in the following section).

According to the Pope, marriages between Catholics and other baptized persons need pastoral attention in at least three important areas. First, before the marriage, care must be taken to guarantee that the Catholic party will enjoy “the free exercise of the faith” and that he or she accepts the “obligation to ensure, as far as is possible, the Baptism and upbringing of the children in the Catholic faith” (§78.3). Second, pastors should help spouses in mixed marriages to respect each other’s right to religious freedom. Neither partner is to pressure the other to change his or her beliefs or to put obstacles in the way of the other’s religious practice. Third, those who prepare a couple for a mixed marriage are to be sensitive to its ecumenical implications. They should make a real effort “to establish cordial cooperation between the Catholic and the non-Catholic ministers from the time that preparations begin for the marriage and the wedding ceremony” (§78.8). Even more special pastoral assistance ought to be given to a couple when one of the partners is non-baptized.

The Holy Father begins his discussion of pastoral care in situations which are “irregular,” in a religious sense and often in a civil sense as well, with trial marriages: what Americans usually call “living together.” Drawing on his personalist philosophy, John Paul gives two reasons that explain why premarital sex harms the couple involved and undermines the family as a social and ecclesial institution.

First, the Pope observes that conjugal relations outside marriage entail “carrying out an ‘experiment’ with human beings, whose dignity demands that they should be always and solely the term [that is, end] of a self-giving love without limitations of time or of any other circumstance” (§80.1). For those living together without the commitment to marriage, their sexual relations, which are meant to express a total and irrevocable self-gift, are conditioned: they withhold the future from each other. By choosing not to be married, the gift of self expressed in their conjugal relations is incomplete. In an earlier section, the Holy Father makes the same point very clearly: “The total physical self-giving would be a lie if it were not the sign and fruit of a total personal self-giving, in which the whole person, including the temporal dimension, is present: if the person were to withhold something or reserve the possibility of deciding otherwise in the future, by this very fact he or she would not be giving totally” (§11.5). A counterfeit gift of self treats the other person as an object to be “used” and cannot express the true love found in marriage.

Second, for those who are baptized, conjugal relations are “a real symbol of the union of Christ and the Church” (§80.2), and this union of the Bridegroom with the Bride is eternal and permanent. Christ has covenanted himself forever to the Church for which he sacrificed himself (cf. Eph 5:25). Any way of living a conjugal relationship which is not coupled with a promise of lifelong fidelity suggests that Christ’s union with his Bride is temporary. The “language” of a time-conditioned sign, which is what premarital relations are, implies something false about the divine Covenant.

Familiaris Consortio refers to de facto free unions as those which lack any religious or civil recognition. In the United States they are called common-law marriages. The exhortation outlines many reasons which lead couples to make this choice. These couples present the Church “with arduous pastoral problems” (§81.3) which the ecclesial community should strive to resolve. John Paul recommends two ways of doing this.

In order to inspire couples to regularize their situation, those in family ministry should seek them out, enlighten them patiently, and explain to them the value of Christian marriage and family life. When dealing with Catholics who have contracted a civil marriage, the Pope recommends that pastoral action should “make these people understand the need for consistency between their choice of life and the faith that they profess, and to try to do everything possible to induce them to regularize their situation in the light of Christian principles” (§82.2). Second, he urges that pastors should promote “a campaign of prevention” (§81.4), which would foster a true sense of marriage and the family among the young.

As is customary, the Holy Father concludes his apostolic exhortation with an urgent appeal. While acknowledging the many difficulties encountered, he calls upon Christians and other people of good will to restore their confidence in the riches that the family “possesses by nature and grace, and in the mission that God has entrusted to it” (§86.6). Invoking the protection of the Holy Family of Nazareth, John Paul asks the Virgin Mary to give new life to the family by showing herself as “the Mother of ‘the Church of the home’ ” (§86.13).

Key Themes

Familiaris Consortio is a document rich in doctrine and pastoral wisdom. From such wealth, this section treats three themes: one more strictly doctrinal, and two which touch pressing pastoral questions. In the first category is the exhortation's treatment of spousal communion and family community. This provides a kind of hermeneutical key to John Paul's bracing vision of marriage and family life. In the second category, which deals with questions that are more controversial and highlighted by the media, is his presentation of the Church's teaching and pastoral practice on contraception and divorce.

Spousal communion and family community

Among the doctrinal threads running through the apostolic exhortation is its teaching that the origin of the family lies in God's plan first revealed in creation and "interiorly ordained to fulfillment in Christ" (§3.3). This emphasis on the divine design for marriage and the family frequently takes him back to the "beginning," to the creation of man and woman. Adam and Eve were created in the image and likeness of God as male and female, as the first married couple (cf. Gen 1:26-27). Thus their creation as a couple imaged the Holy Trinity, which is itself a communion of divine Persons. Because spouses image the Triune God, they form "the first communion . . . and they are called to grow continually in their communion through day-to-day fidelity to their marriage promise of total mutual self-giving" (§19.1). This communion of husband and wife gives birth to the family as a community. In Familiaris Consortio, as throughout his teaching, John Paul underscores that a sound Christian anthropology must take into account the uniqueness of every individual and his or her fulfillment "through a sincere gift of self" (Gaudium et Spes, §24). The apostolic exhortation combines the person-centeredness of his philosophy with his emphasis on the value of communion and community as essential to human perfection.

For John Paul, the tensions and conflicts which shake the modern world are "caused by the violent clash of various kinds of individualism and selfishness" (§37.2). Such individualism exalts the isolated person in an absolute way, leaving little or no place for openness to others and communion with them. In order to combat an individualistic concept of freedom, which minimizes a person's inherently relational dimension and undermines the family, the Pope insists on a basic truth of Christian anthropology. Human beings find their fulfillment in interpersonal communion; they exist and act with others and for others. Moreover, only equal persons who address each other as an "I" and a "thou" can live in communion. Marriage, as the coming together of husband and wife in "one flesh" (Gen 2:24; Mt 19:6), expresses the most intimate communion possible between two persons and is the primary antidote to individualism.

Spousal communion is an image of the Trinity, which itself "lives a mystery of personal loving communion" (§11.2). This unity of divine Persons in communion reveals a profound truth about what it means for a man and a woman to be created in God's image as a couple. From the "beginning," the conjugal love of husband and wife embodies and fosters a true communion of persons. Each one exists for the other but, at the same time, the unique dignity of husband and wife is personally perfected. Just as God exists as a unity in communion, so also does the couple created in the Trinitarian likeness. Thus husband and wife are called to live in a way that mirrors for the world the communion of love that is God's inner life (cf. 1 Jn 4:16).

The marital communion of love and life is perfected when the spouses become parents. Their conjugal communion, their "one flesh," is "the foundation of the wider community of the family" (§14.1). The "I-thou" relationship of husband and wife is profoundly dynamic and moves toward the formation of a new "we." The family, then, is "a community of persons: of husband and wife, of parents and children, of relatives" (§18.1, cf. §21.1). It brings to fulfillment the relationship of communion between husband and wife, creating the first human society as a genuine community.

Within the Trinity the three Persons love one another in the intimate mystery of their divine life. Likewise, love is the inner principle which animates the family community. Because love is "the fundamental and innate vocation of every human being" (§11.2), writes the Pope, "the essence and role of the family are in the final analysis specified by love" (§17.2, cf. §64.2). He affirms emphatically: "Without love the family cannot live, grow and perfect itself as a community of persons" (§18.2, cf. §§21.4, 37.2). "Love is essentially a gift" (§14.2), and the family is the place where the "sincere gift of self" is made to others. It is a community of persons where each member, after the example of the parents who receive the "gift" of a child (cf. §21.5), exists for others, becoming a "gift" for them.

The family, as a community built on spousal communion, has specific responsibilities to the Church and society. John Paul affirms that its "first task is to live with fidelity the reality of communion in a constant effort to develop an authentic community of persons" (§18.1). In the family each person's dignity is regarded as the sole measure of value. The affirmation of the other as a person occurs only if the other is loved for his or her own sake; this love is shown and nourished first and foremost in the family. Because its members form a unique community of persons, "the family finds in love the source and the constant impetus for welcoming, respecting and promoting each one of its members in his or her lofty dignity as a person" (§22.1, cf. §43.2). Thus, the measure of a family's success in living as a community of persons is dependent on the degree to which the dignity of individual family members is fostered.

Precisely because it is a community of persons, the family strengthens the social fabric. As society's first vital cell, it enables the wider community to be permeated and enlivened by the interpersonal relationships which it nourishes. In this way social life is less likely to fall prey to "the risk of becoming more and more depersonalized and standardized and therefore inhuman and dehumanizing" (§43.5). The family, inspired by self-giving love, carries out its mission of being the basic school of social life. According to the Holy Father, this experience of communion and sharing in the home, “represents its first and fundamental contribution to society” (§43.1).

Likewise, the family community contributes to the mission in the Church. In the family, the love of God is first experienced, the art of loving learned, and the love of neighbor taught and practiced. The love between spouses and family members constitutes “the nucleus of the saving mission of the Christian family in the Church and for the Church” (§50.3). This way of life in the family, which is marked by that love characteristic of a true community of persons, enriches the wider ecclesial community. It gives the Church a more family-like quality and serves to develop “a more human and fraternal style of relationships” among the People of God (§64.2).

Contraception and responsible parenthood

The widespread practice of contraception raises serious pastoral difficulties. This problem must be confronted if the family is to flourish according to God's plan. In Familiaris Consortio, John Paul faces the challenge head-on. He addresses the cultural situation which promotes contraception and a contraceptive mentality, confirms the Church's doctrine, endeavors to provide fresh and convincing reasons for this teaching, and offers pastoral guidance aimed at helping couples to live holy lives in conformity with the moral norms of conjugal chastity.

In many contemporary societies prosperity is joined to anguish and uncertainty about the future. An exaggerated fear of demographic increase influences many couples to limit the size of their family. Others, under the sway of selfishness, view children as an obstacle to their personal fulfillment. These attitudes all too often lead to perceiving new life "not as a blessing, but as a danger from which to defend oneself" (§6.4). When these fears are combined with today's emphasis on the individual's right to self-fulfillment and people's infatuation with absolute control over their own destiny, couples regard contraceptive sex as an answer to their difficulties. At the root of this contraceptive mentality, the Pope says, "is the absence in people's hearts of God, whose love alone is stronger than all the world's fears" (§30.2). At the same time, John Paul also recognizes that many people fail to see the moral gravity of contraception: "The teaching of the Church in our day is placed in a social and cultural context which renders it more difficult to understand and yet more urgent and irreplaceable for promoting the true good of men and women" (§30.1).

Despite the failure of many Catholics to understand and live the Church's teaching on conjugal chastity, the Holy Father reaffirms that this doctrine is well grounded and secure. The Church has received from Christ "the special mission of guarding and protecting the lofty dignity of marriage and the most serious responsibility of the transmission of human life" (§29.1). Her doctrine is based on obedience to the revealed truth. As Teacher, the Church proclaims the moral norm about the responsible transmission of human life. She is very aware of being "in no way the author or the arbiter of this norm" (§33.2). The Church's teaching, which excludes every form of contraception, is rooted in God's loving plan. Consequently, it responds to "the deepest demands of the human being created by God" and serves "that person's full humanity" (§34.2).

The authoritative teaching of the Church, which Familiaris Consortio reconfirms, has been clearly proposed by the Second Vatican Council (§§29.2, 31.2, 32.3), by Paul VI, especially in his encyclical Humanae Vitae (cf. §29.1, 31.2, 34.4), and by the Synod Fathers (cf. §29.3). The core of this teaching is straightforward: each time a couple has marital relations both the unitive and the procreative meaning of the conjugal act must be respected. These two goods, the strengthening of interpersonal unity and love between the spouses and the openness to new life, cannot be willfully separated in any act of marital love. Contraception is defined as a conjugal act which is intentionally rendered unfruitful and, as such, is “intrinsically immoral” (§32.3). A husband and a wife, when they engage in contraceptive sex, make two decisions: to have marital relations and to act deliberately against the life-giving meaning of sex.

In order to shed light on the moral disorder of contraception, John Paul takes two approaches. First, he presents contraception as a couple’s refusal to accept God’s sovereignty over life. Those who contracept act “as ‘arbiters’ of the divine plan” (§32.4); they fail to respect that plan in which they are meant to be collaborators. Second, and this is more innovative, the Holy Father affirms that contraceptive sex also undermines the unitive meaning of sexual communion. To make his point, he refers to the “innate language” which conjugal relations are meant to express. Through their bodily union husband and wife are to embody “the total reciprocal self-giving” of one to the other (§32.4, cf. §§11.6, 28.3). Included in this total gift of self, which includes the gift of fertility, is the potential of gracing one’s spouse with motherhood or fatherhood. Contraception, however, introduces “an objectively contradictory language, namely, that of not giving oneself totally to the other” (§32.4). Instead of accepting each other totally, spouses who contracept reject an integral aspect of the other – the power of love to be fruitful. In this instance, the Pope says that there is “a falsification of the inner truth of conjugal love” (§32.4). The gift of self, which should be total, is incomplete, even counterfeit. The sexual language spoken in contraceptive sex is a lie.

The Church’s full teaching on the morality of conjugal life also includes the need for procreation in a responsible way. This requires couples to be faithful interpreters of God’s plan. John Paul supports couples who choose natural methods of regulating their fertility. When, for serious reasons, a husband and wife limit conjugal relations to periods of infertility, they make no decision to act against the life-giving meaning of sex. Rather, they act as “ ‘ministers’ of God’s plan and they ‘benefit from’ their sexuality according to the original dynamism of ‘total’ self-giving, without manipulation or alteration” (§32.5). By accepting the natural rhythms of their fertility, such couples show themselves to be faithful stewards of the biological laws inscribed in the human person. This regulation of fertility, which is commonly called natural family planning, is anthropologically and morally different from contraceptive intercourse (cf. §32.6). For this reason, the Pope recommends that “every effort must be made to render such knowledge accessible to all married people and also to young adults before marriage, through clear, timely and serious instruction and education given by married couples, doctors and experts” (§33.7, cf. §§35.2, 72.3).

As befits the exhortatory nature of a post-synodal document, the Holy Father does more than teach “the true meaning of human sexuality” (§32.1). He also provides pastoral guidance to the many married couples who have difficulty in accepting and living this teaching. Often spouses find it hard not only to fulfill the moral norm governing conjugal sexuality but even to understand its value. The Pope seeks to lead couples to the conviction that “there can be no true contradiction between the divine law on transmitting life and that on fostering authentic married love” (§33.4).

In spite of the sacrifices very often entailed, married couples are called to accomplish the full moral good of conjugal love. Pastors of souls must gently guide the spouses to fulfill their vocation to holiness. As a point of departure, husbands and wives should be led to “recognize clearly the teaching of Humanae Vitae as indicating the norm for the exercise of their sexuality, and that they should endeavor to establish the conditions necessary for observing that norm” (§34.4). The Pope is particularly concerned lest husbands and wives think that the Church’s prohibition of contraception is “merely an ideal to be achieved in the future.” Rather, he admonishes, “they must consider it as a command of Christ the Lord to overcome difficulties with constancy” (§34.4).

In various ways the Church helps couples to live their marital chastity. She makes every effort to present the truth of her teaching with a single voice unmarred by dissent; she encourages theologians to explain the reasons for this doctrine more persuasively; she recalls the indispensable role of asceticism and sacrifice in every Christian life; she encourages couples to pray and receive the Sacraments of Reconciliation and the Eucharist; lastly, she offers couples practical help, especially by making the natural methods of regulating fertility more widely known.

Indissolubility and divorce

Another dark shadow on family life today is the growing number of divorces, even on the part of Catholics. Although the Church is pressured from all sides to compromise her teaching on the indissolubility of sacramental marriage, her service to humanity obliges her to hold steadfast to the Gospel she has received. In Familiaris Consortio, the Pope reaffirms the Church's teaching on divorce, explains why conjugal love requires the permanent covenant of marriage, and encourages the whole Church to develop a pastoral response to those who are divorced and remarried. In the face of a culture that widely rejects the indissolubility of marriage, he wishes to "reconfirm the good news of the definitive nature of that conjugal love that has in Christ its foundation and strength" (§20.2).

John Paul insists that the Church's teaching on the permanence of the marital covenant is neither an arbitrary divine law nor merely a matter of ecclesiastical discipline. The indissolubility of marriage is rooted "in the plan that God has manifested in his revelation" (§20.3, cf. §68.3). It is an ethical demand springing from the meaning of love and of conjugal life.

The Law of Moses allowed for divorce because of people's "hardness of heart" (Mt 19:8). It regulated a practice which contradicted the original truth of creation. Christ, however, "renews the first plan that the Creator inscribed in the hearts of man and woman" (§20.4). He offers a "new heart" (Ezek 36:26) which enables spouses to carry out his command: "What therefore God has joined together, let not man put asunder" (Mt 19:6). Rooted in creation and confirmed by Christ, the indissolubility of marriage fosters the true welfare of the family.

Love, especially conjugal love which touches the innermost being of the human person, is meant to be "total." For the sexual "language" of physical self-giving to be honest, nothing can be held back, including the possibility of deciding otherwise in the future. As the Pope says, "The gift of the body in the sexual relationship is a real symbol of the giving of the whole person" (§80.2, cf. §11.5). Here the "yes" to the other reaches out to embrace the "forever." Love is true only when it is definitive. The imposition of any temporal condition – "I will love you until . . ." – falsifies the total self-giving "spoken" in the act of marital love. Thus, the marital gift of one person to another, if it is to be authentic, must be irrevocable.

Already in the Old Covenant, the bond of marriage was "the image and the symbol of the Covenant which unites God with his people" (§12.2). God pledged himself never to break the solemn alliance he had made with his people. Moreover, he intended his ever-faithful love to be mirrored in the enduring love between husband and wife, created in his image and likeness. The full and definitive revelation of God's covenantal love, however, comes to fulfillment in the New Covenant. By assuming a human nature, the Word of God made a definitive gift of himself to humanity and accomplished its salvation on the Cross. At the same time, he gave a new meaning to the marriage of baptized persons. It is now "a real symbol of that New and Eternal Covenant sanctioned in the blood of Christ" (§13.3). The conjugal love of husband and wife is thus raised up to a new supernatural level, because it participates in "the spousal covenant of Christ with the Church" (§13.6, cf. §20.4).

Christ will never break the Eternal Covenant that binds him to his Bride, the Church. His love is enduring. Nor will the Church, despite her infidelities, ever abandon her Bridegroom and Lord. Likewise, Christian spouses, who share in the permanent alliance of the Bridegroom and the Bride, can never break their covenant relationship, as long as they are both alive. By the very fact of their sacramental marriage, husband and wife are integrated into the permanent relationship of Christ to the Church. It follows, therefore, that "Christian couples are called to participate truly in the irrevocable indissolubility that binds Christ to the Church his Bride, loved by him to the end" (§20.4). In virtue of the Sacrament of Marriage, baptized spouses are bound to one another in such a way that they really represent the enduring relationship of Christ with his Church. For the Church and the world they are a " 'sign' – a small and precious sign, sometimes also subjected to temptation, but always renewed – of the unfailing fidelity with which God and Jesus Christ love each and every human being" (§20.6, cf. §13.7).

While encouraging Christian couples to bear witness to the inestimable value of the indissolubility of marriage as the foundation of family life, the Holy Father also turns his attention to those who are separated, divorced, or divorced and remarried. Their sufferings place an urgent pastoral challenge before the Church. To them she shows herself as a merciful Mother. The ecclesial community must offer solidarity and practical help to those who are separated or divorced. John Paul especially praises those who, despite the hardship, remain faithful to the Church's teaching on the indissolubility of marriage, bearing witness to "fidelity and Christian consistency" (§83.3, cf. §20.6). Their painful situation places no obstacle to admission to the Church's full sacramental life.

Those who have divorced and remarried also have a claim on the Church's pastoral care. The Pope affirms that the Church "cannot abandon to their own devices those who have been previously bound by sacramental marriage and who have attempted a second marriage." Instead, he adds, she will make "untiring efforts to put at their disposal her means of salvation" (§84.1). Pastoral initiatives for those in irregular second marriages are to be guided by two principles. First, divorced and remarried individuals remain members of the Church. Second, because of their irregular situation, they lack the fullness of ecclesial communion which is signified by reception of the Holy Eucharist.

The Church remains deeply concerned about the spiritual well-being of her divorced and remarried members. Hence the Pope urges that every effort should be made lest they “consider themselves as separated from the Church, for as baptized persons they can, and indeed must, share in her life” (§84.3). The ecclesial community should welcome divorced and remarried Catholics with the charity of Christ, exhort them to trust in God’s mercy, and prudently encourage them to take the necessary steps to reintegrate themselves fully into the Church’s sacramental life.

John Paul also reaffirms the Church’s traditional teaching and practice, which are based upon Sacred Scripture (cf. Mk 10:11-12), of not admitting to Eucharistic Communion divorced persons who have remarried. This norm is not intended as a punishment. Rather, as the Pope explains, it expresses an objective situation which makes it impossible for such persons to receive Holy Communion. “Their state and condition of life,” he writes, “objectively contradict that union of love between Christ and the Church which is signified and effected by the Eucharist” (§84.4). The Holy Father also mentions a pastoral reason for the Church’s practice. Admitting the divorced and remarried to the Eucharist could easily lead the faithful into error or confusion about the Church’s doctrine on the indissolubility of marriage. Only if a divorced and remarried person is willing to live without conjugal relations can he or she be restored to full ecclesial and Eucharist Communion. In pastoral care respect for this norm is always to be followed out of fidelity to God, who “communicates the indissolubility of marriage as a fruit, a sign and a requirement of the absolutely faithful love that God has for man and that the Lord Jesus has for the Church” (§20.3).

In confirming the Church’s teaching on the truth about marriage and the family, the Pope is safeguarding its holiness. Familiaris Consortio forcefully proclaims that the history of humanity and of salvation passes by way of the family. This path is well known to the Church; she has learned it “at the school of Christ and the school of history interpreted in the light of the Spirit” (§86.8).

The Church at the service of the family

1.1 The family in the modern world, as much as and perhaps more than any other institution, has been beset by the many profound and rapid changes that have affected society and culture. Many families are living this situation in fidelity to those values that constitute the foundation of the institution of the family. Others have become uncertain and bewildered over their role or even doubtful and almost unaware of the ultimate meaning and truth of conjugal and family life. Finally, there are others who are hindered by various situations of injustice in the realization of their fundamental rights.

1.2 Knowing that marriage and the family constitute one of the most precious of human values, the Church wishes to speak and offer her help to those who are already aware of the value of marriage and the family and seek to live it faithfully, to those who are uncertain and anxious and searching for the truth, and to those who are unjustly impeded from living freely their family lives. Supporting the first, illuminating the second and assisting the others, the Church offers her services to every person who wonders about the destiny of marriage and the family.<sup>1</sup>

1.3 In a particular way the Church addresses the young, who are beginning their journey toward marriage and family life, for the purpose of presenting them with new horizons, helping them to discover the beauty and grandeur of the vocation to love and the service of life.

The Synod of 1980 in continuity with preceding Synods

2.1 A sign of this profound interest of the Church in the family was the last Synod of Bishops, held in Rome from September 26 to October 25, 1980. This was a natural continuation of the two preceding Synods:<sup>2</sup> the Christian family, in fact, is the first community called to announce the Gospel to the human person during growth and to bring him or her, through a progressive education and catechesis, to full human and Christian maturity.

2.2 Furthermore, the recent Synod is logically connected in some way as well with that on the ministerial priesthood and on justice in the modern world. In fact, as an educating community, the family must help man to discern his own vocation and to accept responsibility in the search for greater justice, educating him from the beginning in interpersonal relationships, rich in justice and in love.

2.3 At the close of their Assembly, the Synod Fathers presented me with a long list of proposals in which they had gathered the fruits of their reflections, which had matured over intense days of work, and they asked me unanimously to be a spokesman before humanity of the Church's lively care for the family and to give suitable indications for renewed pastoral effort in this fundamental sector of the life of man and of the Church.

2.4 As I fulfill that mission with this Exhortation, thus actuating in a particular matter the apostolic ministry with which I am entrusted, I wish to thank all the members of the Synod for the very valuable contribution of teaching and experience that they made, especially through the Propositiones, the text of which I am entrusting to the Pontifical Council for the Family with instructions to study it so as to bring out every aspect of its rich content.

The precious value of marriage and of the family

3.1 Illuminated by the faith that gives her an understanding of all the truth concerning the great value of marriage and the family and their deepest meaning, the Church once again feels the pressing need to proclaim the Gospel, that is the “good news,” to all people without exception, in particular to all those who are called to marriage and are preparing for it, to all married couples and parents in the world.

3.2 The Church is deeply convinced that only by the acceptance of the Gospel are the hopes that man legitimately places in marriage and in the family capable of being fulfilled.

3.3 Willed by God in the very act of creation,<sup>3</sup> marriage and the family are interiorly ordained to fulfillment in Christ<sup>4</sup> and have need of his graces in order to be healed from the wounds of sin<sup>5</sup> and restored to their “beginning,”<sup>6</sup> that is, to full understanding and the full realization of God’s plan.

3.4 At a moment of history in which the family is the object of numerous forces that seek to destroy it or in some way to deform it, and aware that the well-being of society and her own good are intimately tied to the good of the family,<sup>7</sup> the Church perceives in a more urgent and compelling way her mission of proclaiming to all people the plan of God for marriage and the family, ensuring their full vitality and human and Christian development, and thus contributing to the renewal of society and of the People of God.

Familiaris Consortio

The need to understand the situation

4.1 Since God's plan for marriage and the family touches men and women in the concreteness of their daily existence in specific social and cultural situations, the Church ought to apply herself to understanding the situations within which marriage and the family are lived today, in order to fulfill her task of serving.<sup>8</sup>

4.2 This understanding is, therefore, an inescapable requirement of the work of evangelization. It is, in fact, to the families of our times that the Church must bring the unchangeable and ever new Gospel of Jesus Christ, just as it is the families involved in the present conditions of the world that are called to accept and to live the plan of God that pertains to them. Moreover, the call and demands of the Spirit resound in the very events of history, and so the Church can also be guided to a more profound understanding of the inexhaustible mystery of marriage and the family by the circumstances, the questions and the anxieties and hopes of the young people, married couples and parents of today.<sup>9</sup>

4.3 To this ought to be added a further reflection of particular importance at the present time. Not infrequently ideas and solutions which are very appealing, but which obscure in varying degrees the truth and the dignity of the human person, are offered to the men and women of today, in their sincere and deep search for a response to the important daily problems that affect their married and family life. These views are often supported by the powerful and pervasive organization of the means of social communication, which subtly endanger freedom and the capacity for objective judgment.

4.4 Many are already aware of this danger to the human person and are working for the truth. The Church, with her evangelical discernment, joins with them, offering her own service to the truth, to freedom and to the dignity of every man and every woman.

Evangelical discernment

5.1 The discernment effected by the Church becomes the offering of an orientation in order that the entire truth and the full dignity of marriage and the family may be preserved and realized.

5.2 This discernment is accomplished through the sense of faith,<sup>10</sup> which is a gift that the Spirit gives to all the faithful,<sup>11</sup> and is therefore the work of the whole Church according to the diversity of the various gifts and charisms that, together with and according to the responsibility proper to each one, work together for a more profound understanding and activation of the word of God. The Church, therefore, does not accomplish this discernment only through the Pastors, who teach in the name and with the power of Christ, but also through the laity: Christ “made them his witnesses and gave them understanding of the faith and the grace of speech (cf. Acts 2:17-18; Rev 19:10), so that the power of the Gospel might shine forth in their daily social and family life.”<sup>12</sup> The laity, moreover, by reason of their particular vocation have the specific role of interpreting the history of the world in the light of Christ, inasmuch as they are called to illuminate and organize temporal realities according to the plan of God, Creator and Redeemer.

5.3 The “supernatural sense of faith,”<sup>13</sup> however, does not consist solely or necessarily in the consensus of the faithful. Following Christ, the Church seeks the truth, which is not always the same as the majority opinion. She listens to conscience and not to power, and in this way she defends the poor and the downtrodden. The Church values sociological and statistical research, when it proves helpful in understanding the historical context in which pastoral action has to be developed and when it leads to a better understanding of the truth. Such research alone, however, is not to be considered in itself an expression of the sense of faith.

5.4 Because it is the task of the apostolic ministry to ensure that the Church remains in the truth of Christ and to lead her ever more deeply into that truth, the Pastors must promote the sense of the faith in all the faithful, examine and authoritatively judge the genuineness of its expressions, and educate the faithful in an ever more mature evangelical discernment.<sup>14</sup>

5.5 Christian spouses and parents can and should offer their unique and irreplaceable contribution to the elaboration of an authentic evangelical discernment in the various situations and cultures in which men and women live their marriage and their family life. They are qualified for this role by their charism or specific gift, the gift of the Sacrament of Matrimony.<sup>15</sup>

The situation of the family in the world today

6.1 The situation in which the family finds itself presents positive and negative aspects: the first are a sign of the salvation of Christ operating in the world; the second, a sign of the refusal that man gives to the love of God.

6.2 On the one hand, in fact, there is a more lively awareness of personal freedom and greater attention to the quality of interpersonal relationships in marriage, to promoting the dignity of women, to responsible procreation, to the education of children. There is also an awareness of the need for the development of interfamily relationships, for reciprocal spiritual and material assistance, the rediscovery of the ecclesial mission proper to the family and its responsibility for the building of a more just society. On the other hand, however, signs are not lacking of a disturbing degradation of some fundamental values: a mistaken theoretical and practical concept of the independence of the spouses in relation to each other; serious misconceptions regarding the relationship of authority between parents and children; the concrete difficulties that the family itself experiences in the transmission of values; the growing number of divorces; the scourge of abortion; the ever more frequent recourse to sterilization; the appearance of a truly contraceptive mentality.

6.3 At the root of these negative phenomena there frequently lies a corruption of the idea and the experience of freedom, conceived not as a capacity for realizing the truth of God's plan for marriage and the family, but as an autonomous power of self-affirmation, often against others, for one's own selfish well-being.

6.4 Worthy of our attention also is the fact that, in the countries of the so-called Third World, families often lack both the means necessary for survival, such as food, work, housing and medicine, and the most elementary freedoms. In the richer countries, on the contrary, excessive prosperity and the consumer mentality, paradoxically joined to a certain anguish and uncertainty about the future, deprive married couples of the generosity and courage needed for raising up new human life: thus life is often perceived not as a blessing, but as a danger from which to defend oneself.

6.5 The historical situation in which the family lives therefore appears as an interplay of light and darkness.

6.6 This shows that history is not simply a fixed progression toward what is better, but rather an event of freedom, and even a struggle between freedoms that are in mutual conflict, that is, according to the well-known expression of Saint Augustine, a conflict between two loves: the love of God to the point of disregarding self, and the love of self to the point of disregarding God.16

6.7 It follows that only an education for love rooted in faith can lead to the capacity of interpreting “the signs of the times,” which are the historical expression of this twofold love.

The influence of circumstances on the consciences of the faithful

7.1 Living in such a world, under the pressures coming above all from the mass media, the faithful do not always remain immune from the obscuring of certain fundamental values, nor set themselves up as the critical conscience of family culture and as active agents in the building of an authentic family humanism.

7.2 Among the more troubling signs of this phenomenon, the Synod Fathers stressed the following, in particular: the spread of divorce and of recourse to a new union, even on the part of the faithful; the acceptance of purely civil marriage in contradiction to the vocation of the baptized to “be married in the Lord”; the celebration of the Marriage Sacrament without living faith, but for other motives; the rejection of the moral norms that guide and promote the human and Christian exercise of sexuality in marriage.

Familiaris Consortio

Our age needs wisdom

8.1 The whole Church is obliged to a deep reflection and commitment, so that the new culture now emerging may be evangelized in depth, true values acknowledged, the rights of men and women defended, and justice promoted in the very structures of society. In this way the “new humanism” will not distract people from their relationship with God, but will lead them to it more fully.

8.2 Science and its technical applications offer new and immense possibilities in the construction of such a humanism. Still, as a consequence of political choices that decide the direction of research and its applications, science is often used against its original purpose, which is the advancement of the human person.

8.3 It becomes necessary, therefore, on the part of all, to recover an awareness of the primacy of moral values, which are the values of the human person as such. The great task that has to be faced today for the renewal of society is that of recapturing the ultimate meaning of life and its fundamental values. Only an awareness of the primacy of these values enables man to use the immense possibilities given him by science in such a way as to bring about the true advancement of the human person in his or her whole truth, in his or her freedom and dignity. Science is called to ally itself with wisdom.

8.4 The following words of the Second Vatican Council can therefore be applied to the problems of the family: “Our era needs such wisdom more than bygone ages if the discoveries made by man are to be further humanized. For the future of the world stands in peril unless wiser people are forthcoming.”<sup>17</sup>

8.5 The education of the moral conscience, which makes every human being capable of judging and of discerning the proper ways to achieve self-realization according to his or her original truth, thus becomes a pressing requirement that cannot be renounced.

8.6 Modern culture must be led to a more profoundly restored covenant with divine Wisdom. Every man is given a share of such Wisdom through the creating action of God. And it is only in faithfulness to this covenant that the families of today will be in a position to influence positively the building of a more just and fraternal world.

Gradualness and conversion

9.1 To the injustice originating from sin – which has profoundly penetrated the structures of today's world – and often hindering the family's full realization of itself and of its fundamental rights, we must all set ourselves in opposition through a conversion of mind and heart, following Christ Crucified by denying our own selfishness: such a conversion cannot fail to have a beneficial and renewing influence even on the structures of society.

9.2 What is needed is a continuous, permanent conversion which, while requiring an interior detachment from every evil and an adherence to good in its fullness, is brought about concretely in steps which lead us ever forward. Thus a dynamic process develops, one which advances gradually with the progressive integration of the gifts of God and the demands of his definitive and absolute love in the entire personal and social life of man. Therefore an educational growth process is necessary, in order that individual believers, families and peoples, even civilization itself, by beginning from what they have already received of the mystery of Christ, may patiently be led forward, arriving at a richer understanding and a fuller integration of this mystery in their lives.

Familiaris Consortio

Inculturation

10.1 In conformity with her constant Tradition, the Church receives from the various cultures everything that is able to express better the unsearchable riches of Christ.<sup>18</sup> Only with the help of all the cultures will it be possible for these riches to be manifested ever more clearly, and for the Church to progress toward a daily more complete and profound awareness of the truth, which has already been given to her in its entirety by the Lord.

10.2 Holding fast to the two principles of the compatibility with the Gospel of the various cultures to be taken up and of communion with the universal Church, there must be further study, particularly by the Episcopal Conferences and the appropriate departments of the Roman Curia, and greater pastoral diligence so that this “inculturation” of the Christian faith may come about ever more extensively, in the context of marriage and the family as well as in other fields.

10.3 It is by means of “inculturation” that one proceeds toward the full restoration of the covenant with the Wisdom of God, which is Christ himself. The whole Church will be enriched also by the cultures which, though lacking technology, abound in human wisdom and are enlivened by profound moral values.

10.4 So that the goal of this journey might be clear and consequently the way plainly indicated, the Synod was right to begin by considering in depth the original design of God for marriage and the family: it “went back to the beginning,” in deference to the teaching of Christ.<sup>19</sup>

The Plan of God for Marriage and the Family

Familiaris Consortio

Man, the image of the God who is love

11.1 God created man in his own image and likeness:20 calling him to existence through love, he called him at the same time for love.

11.2 God is love21 and in himself he lives a mystery of personal loving communion. Creating the human race in his own image and continually keeping it in being, God inscribed in the humanity of man and woman the vocation, and thus the capacity and responsibility, of love and communion.22 Love is therefore the fundamental and innate vocation of every human being.

11.3 As an incarnate spirit, that is a soul which expresses itself in a body and a body informed by an immortal spirit, man is called to love in his unified totality. Love includes the human body, and the body is made a sharer in spiritual love.

11.4 Christian revelation recognizes two specific ways of realizing the vocation of the human person, in its entirety, to love: marriage and virginity or celibacy. Either one is, in its own proper form, an actuation of the most profound truth of man, of his being “created in the image of God.”

11.5 Consequently, sexuality, by means of which man and woman give themselves to one another through the acts which are proper and exclusive to spouses, is by no means something purely biological, but concerns the innermost being of the human person as such. It is realized in a truly human way only if it is an integral part of the love by which a man and a woman commit themselves totally to one another until death. The total physical self-giving would be a lie if it were not the sign and fruit of a total personal self-giving, in which the whole person, including the temporal dimension, is present: if the person were to withhold something or reserve the possibility of deciding otherwise in the future, by this very fact he or she would not be giving totally.

11.6 This totality which is required by conjugal love also corresponds to the demands of responsible fertility. This fertility is directed to the generation of a human being, and so by its nature it surpasses the purely biological order and involves a whole series of personal values. For the harmonious growth of these values a persevering and unified contribution by both parents is necessary.

11.7 The only “place” in which this self-giving in its whole truth is made possible is marriage, the covenant of conjugal love freely and consciously chosen, whereby man and woman accept the intimate community of life and love willed by God himself,23 which only in this light manifests its true meaning. The institution of marriage is not an undue interference by society or authority, nor the extrinsic imposition of a form. Rather it is an interior requirement of the covenant of conjugal love which is publicly affirmed as unique and exclusive, in order to live in complete fidelity to the plan of God, the Creator. A person’s freedom, far from being restricted by this fidelity, is secured against every form of subjectivism or relativism and is made a sharer in creative Wisdom.

Marriage and communion between God and people

12.1 The communion of love between God and people, a fundamental part of the revelation and faith experience of Israel, finds a meaningful expression in the marriage covenant which is established between a man and a woman.

12.2 For this reason the central word of revelation, “God loves his people,” is likewise proclaimed through the living and concrete word whereby a man and a woman express their conjugal love. Their bond of love becomes the image and the symbol of the Covenant which unites God and his people.<sup>24</sup> And the same sin which can harm the conjugal covenant becomes an image of the infidelity of the people to their God: idolatry is prostitution,<sup>25</sup> infidelity is adultery, disobedience to the law is abandonment of the spousal love of the Lord. But the infidelity of Israel does not destroy the eternal fidelity of the Lord, and therefore the ever faithful love of God is put forward as the model of the relations of faithful love which should exist between spouses.<sup>26</sup>

NOTES:

<sup>26</sup> Cf. Hos 3.

Familiaris Consortio

Jesus Christ, Bridegroom of the Church, and the Sacrament of Matrimony

13.1 The communion between God and his people finds its definitive fulfillment in Jesus Christ, the Bridegroom who loves and gives himself as the Savior of humanity, uniting it to himself as his Body.

13.2 He reveals the original truth of marriage, the truth of the “beginning,”<sup>27</sup> and, freeing man from his hardness of heart, he makes man capable of realizing this truth in its entirety.

13.3 This revelation reaches its definitive fullness in the gift of love which the Word of God makes to humanity in assuming a human nature, and in the sacrifice which Jesus Christ makes of himself on the Cross for his Bride, the Church. In this sacrifice there is entirely revealed that plan which God has imprinted on the humanity of man and woman since their creation<sup>28</sup>; the marriage of baptized persons thus becomes a real symbol of that New and Eternal Covenant sanctioned in the blood of Christ. The Spirit which the Lord pours forth gives a new heart, and renders man and woman capable of loving one another as Christ has loved us. Conjugal love reaches that fullness to which it is interiorly ordained, conjugal charity, which is the proper and specific way in which the spouses participate in and are called to live the very charity of Christ who gave himself on the Cross.

13.4 In a deservedly famous page, Tertullian has well expressed the greatness of this conjugal life in Christ and its beauty: “How can I ever express the happiness of the marriage that is joined together by the Church, strengthened by an offering, sealed by a blessing, announced by angels and ratified by the Father? . . . How wonderful the bond between two believers with a single hope, a single desire, a single observance, a single service! They are both brethren and both fellow-servants; there is no separation between them in spirit or flesh; in fact they are truly two in one flesh, and where the flesh is one, one is the spirit.”<sup>29</sup>

13.5 Receiving and meditating faithfully on the word of God, the Church has solemnly taught and continues to teach that the marriage of the baptized is one of the seven sacraments of the New Covenant.<sup>30</sup>

13.6 Indeed, by means of Baptism, man and woman are definitively placed within the New and Eternal Covenant, in the spousal Covenant of Christ with the Church. And it is because of this indestructible insertion that the intimate community of conjugal life and love, founded by the Creator,<sup>31</sup> is elevated and assumed into the spousal charity of Christ, sustained and enriched by his redeeming power.

13.7 By virtue of the sacramentality of their marriage, spouses are bound to one another in the most profoundly indissoluble manner. Their belonging to each other is the real representation, by means of the sacramental sign, of the very relationship of Christ with the Church.

13.8 Spouses are therefore the permanent reminder to the Church of what happened on the Cross; they are for one another and for the children witnesses to the salvation in which the sacrament makes them sharers. Of this salvation event marriage, like every sacrament, is a memorial, actuation and prophecy: “As a memorial, the sacrament gives them the grace and duty of commemorating the great works of God and of bearing witness to them before their children. As actuation, it gives them the grace and duty of putting into practice in the present, toward each other and their children, the demands of a love which forgives and redeems. As prophecy, it gives them the grace and duty of living and bearing witness to the hope of the future encounter with Christ.”<sup>32</sup>

13.9 Like each of the seven sacraments, so also marriage is a real symbol of the event of salvation, but in its own way. “The spouses participate in it as spouses, together, as a couple, so that the first and immediate effect of marriage (res et sacramentum) is not supernatural grace itself, but the Christian conjugal bond, a typically Christian communion of two persons because it represents the mystery of Christ’s Incarnation and the mystery of his Covenant. The content of participation in Christ’s life is also specific: conjugal love involves a totality, in which all the elements of the person enter – appeal of the body and instinct, power of feeling and affectivity, aspiration of the spirit and of will. It aims at a deeply personal unity, the unity that, beyond union in one flesh, leads to forming one heart and soul; it demands indissolubility and faithfulness in definitive mutual giving; and it is open to fertility (cf. Humanae Vitae, 9). In a word, it is a question of the normal characteristics of all natural conjugal love, but with a new significance which not only purifies and strengthens them, but raises them to the extent of making them the expression of specifically Christian values.”<sup>33</sup>

Children, the precious gift of marriage

14.1 According to the plan of God, marriage is the foundation of the wider community of the family, since the very institution of marriage and conjugal love are ordained to the procreation and education of children, in whom they find their crowning.<sup>34</sup>

14.2 In its most profound reality, love is essentially a gift; and conjugal love, while leading the spouses to the reciprocal “knowledge” which makes them “one flesh,”<sup>35</sup> does not end with the couple, because it makes them capable of the greatest possible gift, the gift by which they become cooperators with God for giving life to a new human person. Thus the couple, while giving themselves to one another, give not just themselves but also the reality of children, who are a living reflection of their love, a permanent sign of conjugal unity and a living and inseparable synthesis of their being a father and a mother.

14.3 When they become parents, spouses receive from God the gift of a new responsibility. Their parental love is called to become for the children the visible sign of the very love of God, “from whom every family in heaven and on earth is named.”<sup>36</sup>

14.4 It must not be forgotten, however, that, even when procreation is not possible, conjugal life does not for this reason lose its value. Physical sterility in fact can be for spouses the occasion for other important services to the life of the human person, for example, adoption, various forms of educational work, and assistance to other families and to poor or handicapped children.

The family, a communion of persons

15.1 In matrimony and in the family a complex of interpersonal relationships is set up – married life, fatherhood and motherhood, filiation and fraternity – through which each human person is introduced into the “human family” and into the “family of God,” which is the Church.

15.2 Christian marriage and the Christian family build up the Church: for in the family the human person is not only brought into being and progressively introduced by means of education into the human community, but by means of the rebirth of Baptism and education in the faith the child is also introduced into God’s family, which is the Church.

15.3 The human family, disunited by sin, is reconstituted in its unity by the redemptive power of the Death and Resurrection of Christ.<sup>37</sup> Christian marriage, by participating in the salvific efficacy of this event, constitutes the natural setting in which the human person is introduced into the great family of the Church.

15.4 The commandment to grow and multiply, given to man and woman in the beginning, in this way reaches its whole truth and full realization.

15.5 The Church thus finds in the family, born from the sacrament, the cradle and the setting in which she can enter the human generations, and where these in their turn can enter the Church.

Marriage and virginity or celibacy

16.1 Virginity or celibacy for the sake of the Kingdom of God not only does not contradict the dignity of marriage but presupposes it and confirms it. Marriage and virginity or celibacy are two ways of expressing and living the one mystery of the Covenant of God with his people. When marriage is not esteemed, neither can consecrated virginity or celibacy exist; when human sexuality is not regarded as a great value given by the Creator, the renunciation of it for the sake of the Kingdom of heaven loses its meaning.

16.2 Rightly indeed does Saint John Chrysostom say: “Whoever denigrates marriage also diminishes the glory of virginity. Whoever praises it makes virginity more admirable and resplendent. What appears good only in comparison with evil would not be particularly good. It is something better than what is admitted to be good that is the most excellent good.”38

16.3 In virginity or celibacy, the human being is awaiting, also in a bodily way, the eschatological marriage of Christ with the Church, giving himself or herself completely to the Church in the hope that Christ may give himself to the Church in the full truth of eternal life. The celibate person thus anticipates in his or her flesh the new world of the future resurrection.39

16.4 By virtue of this witness, virginity or celibacy keeps alive in the Church a consciousness of the mystery of marriage and defends it from any reduction and impoverishment.

16.5 Virginity or celibacy, by liberating the human heart in a unique way,40 “so as to make it burn with greater love for God and all humanity,”41 bears witness that the Kingdom of God and his justice is that pearl of great price which is preferred to every other value no matter how great, and hence must be sought as the only definitive value. It is for this reason that the Church, throughout her history, has always defended the superiority of this charism to that of marriage, by reason of the wholly singular link which it has with the Kingdom of God.42

16.6 In spite of having renounced physical fecundity, the celibate person becomes spiritually fruitful, the father and mother of many, cooperating in the realization of the family according to God’s plan.

16.7 Christian couples therefore have the right to expect from celibate persons a good example and a witness of fidelity to their vocation until death. Just as fidelity at times becomes difficult for married people and requires sacrifice, mortification and self-denial, the same can happen to celibate persons, and their fidelity, even in the trials that may occur, should strengthen the fidelity of married couples.43

16.8 These reflections on virginity or celibacy can enlighten and help those who, for reasons independent of their own will, have been unable to marry and have then accepted their situation in a spirit of service.

The Role of the Christian Family

Familiaris Consortio

Family, become what you are

17.1 The family finds in the plan of God the Creator and Redeemer not only its identity, what it is, but also its mission, what it can and should do. The role that God calls the family to perform in history derives from what the family is; its role represents the dynamic and existential development of what it is. Each family finds within itself a summons that cannot be ignored, and that specifies both its dignity and its responsibility: family, become what you are.

17.2 Accordingly, the family must go back to the “beginning” of God’s creative act, if it is to attain self-knowledge and self-realization in accordance with the inner truth not only of what it is but also of what it does in history. And since in God’s plan it has been established as an “intimate community of life and love,”<sup>44</sup> the family has the mission to become more and more what it is, that is to say, a community of life and love, in an effort that will find fulfillment, as will everything created and redeemed, in the Kingdom of God. Looking at it in such a way as to reach its very roots, we must say that the essence and role of the family are in the final analysis specified by love. Hence the family has the mission to guard, reveal and communicate love, and this is a living reflection of and a real sharing in God’s love for humanity and the love of Christ the Lord for the Church his Bride.

17.3 Every particular task of the family is an expressive and concrete actuation of that fundamental mission. We must therefore go deeper into the unique riches of the family’s mission and probe its contents, which are both manifold and unified.

17.4 Thus, with love as its point of departure and making constant reference to it, the recent Synod emphasized four general tasks for the family:

- 1) forming a community of persons;
- 2) serving life;
- 3) participating in the development of society;
- 4) sharing in the life and mission of the Church.

1. Forming a Community of Persons

Familiaris Consortio

Love as the principle and power of communion

18.1 The family, which is founded and given life by love, is a community of persons: of husband and wife, of parents and children, of relatives. Its first task is to live with fidelity the reality of communion in a constant effort to develop an authentic community of persons.

18.2 The inner principle of that task, its permanent power and its final goal is love: without love the family is not a community of persons and, in the same way, without love the family cannot live, grow and perfect itself as a community of persons. What I wrote in the Encyclical Redemptor Hominis applies primarily and especially within the family as such: “Man cannot live without love. He remains a being that is incomprehensible for himself, his life is senseless, if love is not revealed to him, if he does not encounter love, if he does not experience it and make it his own, if he does not participate intimately in it.”<sup>45</sup>

18.3 The love between husband and wife and, in a “derivatory” and broader way, the love between members of the same family – between parents and children, brothers and sisters, and relatives and members of the household – is given life and sustenance by an unceasing inner dynamism leading the family to ever deeper and more intense communion, which is the foundation and soul of the community of marriage and the family.

The indivisible unity of conjugal communion

19.1 The first communion is the one which is established and which develops between husband and wife: by virtue of the covenant of married life, the man and woman “are no longer two but one flesh”<sup>46</sup> and they are called to grow continually in their communion through day-to-day fidelity to their marriage promise of total mutual self-giving.

19.2 This conjugal communion sinks its roots in the natural complementarity that exists between man and woman, and is nurtured through the personal willingness of the spouses to share their entire life-project, what they have and what they are: for this reason such communion is the fruit and the sign of a profoundly human need. But in the Lord Christ, God takes up this human need, confirms it, purifies it and elevates it, leading it to perfection through the Sacrament of Matrimony: the Holy Spirit, who is poured out in the sacramental celebration, offers Christian couples the gift of a new communion of love that is the living and real image of that unique unity which makes of the Church the indivisible Mystical Body of the Lord Jesus.

19.3 The gift of the Spirit is a commandment of life for Christian spouses and at the same time a stimulating impulse so that every day they may progress toward an ever richer union with each other on all levels – of the body, of the character, of the heart, of the intelligence and will, of the soul<sup>47</sup> – revealing in this way to the Church and to the world the new communion of love, given by the grace of Christ.

19.4 Such a communion is radically contradicted by polygamy: this, in fact, directly negates the plan of God which was revealed from the beginning, because it is contrary to the equal personal dignity of men and women who in matrimony give themselves with a love that is total and therefore unique and exclusive. As the Second Vatican Council writes: “Firmly established by the Lord, the unity of marriage will radiate from the equal personal dignity of husband and wife, a dignity acknowledged by mutual and total love.”<sup>48</sup>

An indissoluble communion

20.1 Conjugal communion is characterized not only by its unity but also by its indissolubility: “As a mutual gift of two persons, this intimate union, as well as the good of children, imposes total fidelity on the spouses and argues for an unbreakable oneness between them.”49

20.2 It is a fundamental duty of the Church to reaffirm strongly, as the Synod Fathers did, the doctrine of the indissolubility of marriage. To all those who, in our times, consider it too difficult, or indeed impossible, to be bound to one person for the whole of life, and to those caught up in a culture that rejects the indissolubility of marriage and openly mocks the commitment of spouses to fidelity, it is necessary to reconfirm the good news of the definitive nature of that conjugal love that has in Christ its foundation and strength.50

20.3 Being rooted in the personal and total self-giving of the couple, and being required by the good of the children, the indissolubility of marriage finds its ultimate truth in the plan that God has manifested in his revelation: he wills and he communicates the indissolubility of marriage as a fruit, a sign and a requirement of the absolutely faithful love that God has for man and that the Lord Jesus has for the Church.

20.4 Christ renews the first plan that the Creator inscribed in the hearts of man and woman, and in the celebration of the Sacrament of Matrimony offers a “new heart”: thus the couples are not only able to overcome “hardness of heart,”51 but also and above all they are able to share the full and definitive love of Christ, the New and Eternal Covenant made flesh. Just as the Lord Jesus is the “faithful witness,”52 the “yes” of the promises of God<sup>53</sup> and thus the supreme realization of the unconditional faithfulness with which God loves his people, so Christian couples are called to participate truly in the irrevocable indissolubility that binds Christ to the Church his Bride, loved by him to the end.54

20.5 The gift of the sacrament is at the same time a vocation and commandment for the Christian spouses, that they may remain faithful to each other forever, beyond every trial and difficulty, in generous obedience to the holy will of the Lord: “What therefore God has joined together, let not man put asunder.”55

20.6 To bear witness to the inestimable value of the indissolubility and fidelity of marriage is one of the most precious and most urgent tasks of Christian couples in our time. So, with all my Brothers who participated in the Synod of Bishops, I praise and encourage those numerous couples who, though encountering no small difficulty, preserve and develop the value of indissolubility: thus, in a humble and courageous manner, they perform the role committed to them of being in the world a “sign” – a small and precious sign, sometimes also subjected to temptation, but always renewed – of the unfailing fidelity with which God and Jesus Christ love each and every human being. But it is also proper to recognize the value of the witness of those spouses who, even when abandoned by their partner, with the strength of faith and of Christian hope have not entered a new union: these spouses too give an authentic witness to fidelity, of which the world today has a great need. For this reason they must be encouraged and helped by the pastors and the faithful of the Church.

The broader communion of the family

21.1 Conjugal communion constitutes the foundation on which is built the broader communion of the family, of parents and children, of brothers and sisters with each other, of relatives and other members of the household.

21.2 This communion is rooted in the natural bonds of flesh and blood, and grows to its specifically human perfection with the establishment and maturing of the still deeper and richer bonds of the spirit: the love that animates the interpersonal relationships of the different members of the family constitutes the interior strength that shapes and animates the family communion and community.

21.3 The Christian family is also called to experience a new and original communion which confirms and perfects natural and human communion. In fact the grace of Jesus Christ, “the first-born among many brethren,”<sup>56</sup> is by its nature and interior dynamism “a grace of brotherhood,” as Saint Thomas Aquinas calls it.<sup>57</sup> The Holy Spirit, who is poured forth in the celebration of the sacraments, is the living source and inexhaustible sustenance of the supernatural communion that gathers believers and links them with Christ and with each other in the unity of the Church of God. The Christian family constitutes a specific revelation and realization of ecclesial communion, and for this reason too it can and should be called “the domestic Church.”<sup>58</sup>

21.4 All members of the family, each according to his or her own gift, have the grace and responsibility of building, day by day, the communion of persons, making the family “a school of deeper humanity”:<sup>59</sup> this happens where there is care and love for the little ones, the sick, the aged; where there is mutual service every day; when there is a sharing of goods, of joys and of sorrows.

21.5 A fundamental opportunity for building such a communion is constituted by the educational exchange between parents and children,<sup>60</sup> in which each gives and receives. By means of love, respect and obedience toward their parents, children offer their specific and irreplaceable contribution to the construction of an authentically human and Christian family.<sup>61</sup> They will be aided in this if parents exercise their unrenounceable authority as a true and proper “ministry,” that is, as a service to the human and Christian well-being of their children, and in particular as a service aimed at helping them acquire a truly responsible freedom, and if parents maintain a living awareness of the “gift” they continually receive from their children.

21.6 Family communion can only be preserved and perfected through a great spirit of sacrifice. It requires, in fact, a ready and generous openness of each and all to understanding, to forbearance, to pardon, to reconciliation. There is no family that does not know how selfishness, discord, tension and conflict violently attack and at times mortally wound its own communion: hence there arise the many and varied forms of division in family life. But, at the same time, every family is called by the God of peace to have the joyous and renewing experience of “reconciliation,” that is, communion reestablished, unity restored. In particular, participation in the Sacrament of Reconciliation and in the banquet of the one Body of Christ offers to the Christian family the grace and the responsibility of overcoming every division and of moving toward the fullness of communion willed by God, responding in this way to the ardent desire of the Lord: “that they may be one.”<sup>62</sup>

The rights and role of women

22.1 In that it is, and ought always to become, a communion and community of persons, the family finds in love the source and the constant impetus for welcoming, respecting and promoting each one of its members in his or her lofty dignity as a person, that is, as a living image of God. As the Synod Fathers rightly stated, the moral criterion for the authenticity of conjugal and family relationships consists in fostering the dignity and vocation of the individual persons, who achieve their fullness by sincere self-giving.<sup>63</sup>

22.2 In this perspective the Synod devoted special attention to women, to their rights and role within the family and society. In the same perspective are also to be considered men as husbands and fathers, and likewise children and the elderly.

22.3 Above all it is important to underline the equal dignity and responsibility of women with men. This equality is realized in a unique manner in that reciprocal self-giving by each one to the other and by both to the children which is proper to marriage and the family. What human reason intuitively perceives and acknowledges is fully revealed by the word of God: the history of salvation, in fact, is a continuous and luminous testimony of the dignity of women.

22.4 In creating the human race “male and female,”<sup>64</sup> God gives man and woman an equal personal dignity, endowing them with the inalienable rights and responsibilities proper to the human person. God then manifests the dignity of women in the highest form possible, by assuming human flesh from the Virgin Mary, whom the Church honors as the Mother of God, calling her the new Eve and presenting her as the model of redeemed woman. The sensitive respect of Jesus toward the women that he called to his following and his friendship, his appearing on Easter morning to a woman before the other disciples, the mission entrusted to women to carry the good news of the Resurrection to the Apostles – these are all signs that confirm the special esteem of the Lord Jesus for women. The Apostle Paul will say: “In Christ Jesus you are all children of God through faith. . . . There is neither Jew nor Greek, there is neither slave nor free, there is neither male nor female; for you are all one in Christ Jesus.”<sup>65</sup>

Women and society

23.1 Without intending to deal with all the various aspects of the vast and complex theme of the relationships between women and society, and limiting these remarks to a few essential points, one cannot but observe that in the specific area of family life a widespread social and cultural tradition has considered women's role to be exclusively that of wife and mother, without adequate access to public functions which have generally been reserved for men.

23.2 There is no doubt that the equal dignity and responsibility of men and women fully justifies women's access to public functions. On the other hand the true advancement of women requires that clear recognition be given to the value of their maternal and family role, by comparison with all other public roles and all other professions. Furthermore, these roles and professions should be harmoniously combined, if we wish the evolution of society and culture to be truly and fully human.

23.3 This will come about more easily if, in accordance with the wishes expressed by the Synod, a renewed "theology of work" can shed light upon and study in depth the meaning of work in the Christian life and determine the fundamental bond between work and the family, and therefore the original and irreplaceable meaning of work in the home and in rearing children.<sup>66</sup> Therefore the Church can and should help modern society by tirelessly insisting that the work of women in the home be recognized and respected by all in its irreplaceable value. This is of particular importance in education: for possible discrimination between the different types of work and professions is eliminated at its very root once it is clear that all people, in every area, are working with equal rights and equal responsibilities. The image of God in man and in woman will thus be seen with added luster.

23.4 While it must be recognized that women have the same right as men to perform various public functions, society must be structured in such a way that wives and mothers are not in practice compelled to work outside the home, and that their families can live and prosper in a dignified way even when they themselves devote their full time to their own family.

23.5 Furthermore, the mentality which honors women more for their work outside the home than for their work within the family must be overcome. This requires that men should truly esteem and love women with total respect for their personal dignity, and that society should create and develop conditions favoring work in the home.

23.6 With due respect to the different vocations of men and women, the Church must in her own life promote as far as possible their equality of rights and dignity: and this for the good of all, the family, the Church and society.

23.7 But clearly all of this does not mean for women a renunciation of their femininity or an imitation of the male role, but the fullness of true feminine humanity which should be expressed in their activity, whether in the family or outside of it, without disregarding the differences of customs and cultures in this sphere.

Offenses against women's dignity

24.1 Unfortunately the Christian message about the dignity of women is contradicted by that persistent mentality which considers the human being not as a person but as a thing, as an object of trade, at the service of selfish interest and mere pleasure: the first victims of this mentality are women.

24.2 This mentality produces very bitter fruits, such as contempt for men and for women, slavery, oppression of the weak, pornography, prostitution – especially in an organized form – and all those various forms of discrimination that exist in the fields of education, employment, wages, etc.

24.3 Besides, many forms of degrading discrimination still persist today in a great part of our society that affect and seriously harm particular categories of women, as for example childless wives, widows, separated or divorced women, and unmarried mothers.

24.4 The Synod Fathers deplored these and other forms of discrimination as strongly as possible. I therefore ask that vigorous and incisive pastoral action be taken by all to overcome them definitively so that the image of God that shines in all human beings without exception may be fully respected.

Familiaris Consortio

Men as husbands and fathers

25.1 Within the conjugal and family communion-community, the man is called upon to live his gift and role as husband and father.

25.2 In his wife he sees the fulfillment of God's intention: "It is not good that the man should be alone; I will make him a helper fit for him,"<sup>67</sup> and he makes his own the cry of Adam, the first husband: "This at last is bone of my bones and flesh of my flesh."<sup>68</sup>

25.3 Authentic conjugal love presupposes and requires that a man have a profound respect for the equal dignity of his wife: "You are not her master," writes Saint Ambrose, "but her husband; she was not given to you to be your slave, but your wife. . . . Reciprocate her attentiveness to you and be grateful to her for her love."<sup>69</sup> With his wife a man should live "a very special form of personal friendship."<sup>70</sup> As for the Christian, he is called upon to develop a new attitude of love, manifesting toward his wife a charity that is both gentle and strong like that which Christ has for the Church.<sup>71</sup>

25.4 Love for his wife as mother of their children and love for the children themselves are for the man the natural way of understanding and fulfilling his own fatherhood. Above all where social and cultural conditions so easily encourage a father to be less concerned with his family or at any rate less involved in the work of education, efforts must be made to restore socially the conviction that the place and task of the father in and for the family is of unique and irreplaceable importance.<sup>72</sup> As experience teaches, the absence of a father causes psychological and moral imbalance and notable difficulties in family relationships, as does, in contrary circumstances, the oppressive presence of a father, especially where there still prevails the phenomenon of "machismo," or a wrong superiority of male prerogatives which humiliates women and inhibits the development of healthy family relationships.

25.5 In revealing and in reliving on earth the very fatherhood of God,<sup>73</sup> a man is called upon to ensure the harmonious and united development of all the members of the family: he will perform this task by exercising generous responsibility for the life conceived under the heart of the mother, by a more solicitous commitment to education, a task he shares with his wife,<sup>74</sup> by work which is never a cause of division in the family but promotes its unity and stability, and by means of the witness he gives of an adult Christian life which effectively introduces the children into the living experience of Christ and the Church.

The rights of children

26.1 In the family, which is a community of persons, special attention must be devoted to the children by developing a profound esteem for their personal dignity, and a great respect and generous concern for their rights. This is true for every child, but it becomes all the more urgent the smaller the child is and the more it is in need of everything, when it is sick, suffering or handicapped.

26.2 By fostering and exercising a tender and strong concern for every child that comes into this world, the Church fulfills a fundamental mission: for she is called upon to reveal and put forward anew in history the example and the commandment of Christ the Lord, who placed the child at the heart of the Kingdom of God: “Let the children come to me, and do not hinder them; for to such belongs the Kingdom of heaven.”<sup>75</sup>

26.3 I repeat once again what I said to the General Assembly of the United Nations on October 2, 1979: “I wish to express the joy that we all find in children, the springtime of life, the anticipation of the future history of each of our present earthly homelands. No country on earth, no political system can think of its own future otherwise than through the image of these new generations that will receive from their parents the manifold heritage of values, duties and aspirations of the nation to which they belong and of the whole human family. Concern for the child, even before birth, from the first moment of conception and then throughout the years of infancy and youth, is the primary and fundamental test of the relationship of one human being to another. And so, what better wish can I express for every nation and for the whole of mankind, and for all the children of the world than a better future in which respect for human rights will become a complete reality throughout the third millennium, which is drawing near?”<sup>76</sup>

26.4 Acceptance, love, esteem, many-sided and united material, emotional, educational and spiritual concern for every child that comes into this world should always constitute a distinctive, essential characteristic of all Christians, in particular of the Christian family: thus children, while they are able to grow “in wisdom and in stature, and in favor with God and man,”<sup>77</sup> offer their own precious contribution to building up the family community and even to the sanctification of their parents.<sup>78</sup>

The elderly in the family

27.1 There are cultures which manifest a unique veneration and great love for the elderly: far from being outcasts from the family or merely tolerated as a useless burden, they continue to be present and to take an active and responsible part in family life, though having to respect the autonomy of the new family; above all they carry out the important mission of being a witness to the past and a source of wisdom for the young and for the future.

27.2 Other cultures, however, especially in the wake of disordered industrial and urban development, have both in the past and in the present set the elderly aside in unacceptable ways. This causes acute suffering to them and spiritually impoverishes many families.

27.3 The pastoral activity of the Church must help everyone to discover and to make good use of the role of the elderly within the civil and ecclesial community, in particular within the family. In fact, “the life of the aging helps to clarify a scale of human values; it shows the continuity of generations and marvelously demonstrates the interdependence of God’s people. The elderly often have the charism to bridge generation gaps before they are made: how many children have found understanding and love in the eyes and words and caresses of the aging! And how many old people have willingly subscribed to the inspired word that the ‘crown of the aged is their children’s children’ (Prov 17:6)!”<sup>79</sup>

Cooperators in the love of God the Creator

28.1 With the creation of man and woman in his own image and likeness, God crowns and brings to perfection the work of his hands: he calls them to a special sharing in his love and in his power as Creator and Father, through their free and responsible cooperation in transmitting the gift of human life: “God blessed them, and God said to them, ‘Be fruitful and multiply, and fill the earth and subdue it.’”<sup>80</sup>

28.2 Thus the fundamental task of the family is to serve life, to actualize in history the original blessing of the Creator – that of transmitting by procreation the divine image from person to person.<sup>81</sup>

28.3 Fecundity is the fruit and the sign of conjugal love, the living testimony of the full reciprocal self-giving of the spouses: “While not making the other purposes of matrimony of less account, the true practice of conjugal love, and the whole meaning of the family life which results from it, have this aim: that the couple be ready with stout hearts to cooperate with the love of the Creator and the Savior, who through them will enlarge and enrich his own family day by day.”<sup>82</sup>

28.4 However, the fruitfulness of conjugal love is not restricted solely to the procreation of children, even understood in its specifically human dimension: it is enlarged and enriched by all those fruits of moral, spiritual and supernatural life which the father and mother are called to hand on to their children, and through the children to the Church and to the world.

The Church's teaching and norm, always old yet always new

29.1 Precisely because the love of husband and wife is a unique participation in the mystery of life and of the love of God himself, the Church knows that she has received the special mission of guarding and protecting the lofty dignity of marriage and the most serious responsibility of the transmission of human life.

29.2 Thus, in continuity with the living Tradition of the ecclesial community throughout history, the recent Second Vatican Council and the Magisterium of my Predecessor Paul VI, expressed above all in the Encyclical Humanae Vitae, have handed on to our times a truly prophetic proclamation, which reaffirms and repropose with clarity the Church's teaching and norm, always old yet always new, regarding marriage and regarding the transmission of human life.

29.3 For this reason the Synod Fathers made the following declaration at their last Assembly: "This sacred Synod, gathered together with the Successor of Peter in the unity of faith, firmly holds what has been set forth in the Second Vatican Council (cf. Gaudium et Spes, 50) and afterwards in the Encyclical Humanae Vitae, particularly that love between husband and wife must be fully human, exclusive and open to new life (Humanae Vitae, 11, cf. 9, 12)." Section 11 of the Encyclical Letter Humanae Vitae (July 25, 1968) ends with the statement: "The Church, calling people back to the observance of the norms of the natural law, as interpreted by her constant doctrine, teaches that each and every marriage act must remain open to the transmission of life (ut quilibet matrimonii usus ad vitam humanam pro-creandam per se destinatus permaneat)": AAS 60 (1968), 488.

The Church stands for life

30.1 The teaching of the Church in our day is placed in a social and cultural context which renders it more difficult to understand and yet more urgent and irreplaceable for promoting the true good of men and women.

30.2 Scientific and technical progress, which contemporary man is continually expanding in his dominion over nature, not only offers the hope of creating a new and better humanity, but also causes ever greater anxiety regarding the future. Some ask themselves if it is a good thing to be alive or if it would be better never to have been born; they doubt therefore if it is right to bring others into life when perhaps they will curse their existence in a cruel world with unforeseeable terrors. Others consider themselves to be the only ones for whom the advantages of technology are intended and they exclude others by imposing on them contraceptives or even worse means. Still others, imprisoned in a consumer mentality and whose sole concern is to bring about a continual growth of material goods, finish by ceasing to understand, and thus by refusing, the spiritual riches of a new human life. The ultimate reason for these mentalities is the absence in people's hearts of God, whose love alone is stronger than all the world's fears and can conquer them.

30.3 Thus an anti-life mentality is born, as can be seen in many current issues: one thinks, for example, of a certain panic deriving from the studies of ecologists and futurologists on population growth, which sometimes exaggerate the danger of demographic increase to the quality of life.

30.4 But the Church firmly believes that human life, even if weak and suffering, is always a splendid gift of God's goodness. Against the pessimism and selfishness which cast a shadow over the world, the Church stands for life: in each human life she sees the splendor of that "Yes," that "Amen," who is Christ himself.<sup>84</sup> To the "No" which assails and afflicts the world, she replies with this living "Yes," thus defending the human person and the world from all who plot against and harm life.

30.5 The Church is called upon to manifest anew to everyone, with clear and stronger conviction, her will to promote human life by every means and to defend it against all attacks, in whatever condition or state of development it is found.

30.6 Thus the Church condemns as a grave offense against human dignity and justice all those activities of governments or other public authorities which attempt to limit in any way the freedom of couples in deciding about children. Consequently, any violence applied by such authorities in favor of contraception or, still worse, of sterilization and procured abortion, must be altogether condemned and forcefully rejected. Likewise to be denounced as gravely unjust are cases where, in international relations, economic help given for the advancement of peoples is made conditional on programs of contraception, sterilization and procured abortion.<sup>85</sup>

That God's design may be ever more completely fulfilled

31.1 The Church is certainly aware of the many complex problems which couples in many countries face today in their task of transmitting life in a responsible way. She also recognizes the serious problem of population growth in the form it has taken in many parts of the world and its moral implications.

31.2 However, she holds that consideration in depth of all the aspects of these problems offers a new and stronger confirmation of the importance of the authentic teaching on birth regulation reposed in the Second Vatican Council and in the Encyclical Humanae Vitae.

31.3 For this reason, together with the Synod Fathers, I feel it is my duty to extend a pressing invitation to theologians, asking them to unite their efforts in order to collaborate with the hierarchical Magisterium and to commit themselves to the task of illustrating ever more clearly the biblical foundations, the ethical grounds and the personalistic reasons behind this doctrine. Thus it will be possible, in the context of an organic exposition, to render the teaching of the Church on this fundamental question truly accessible to all people of good will, fostering a daily more enlightened and profound understanding of it: in this way God's plan will be ever more completely fulfilled for the salvation of humanity and for the glory of the Creator.

31.4 A united effort by theologians in this regard, inspired by a convinced adherence to the Magisterium, which is the one authentic guide for the People of God, is particularly urgent for reasons that include the close link between Catholic teaching on this matter and the view of the human person that the Church proposes: doubt or error in the field of marriage or the family involves obscuring to a serious extent the integral truth about the human person, in a cultural situation that is already so often confused and contradictory. In fulfillment of their specific role, theologians are called upon to provide enlightenment and a deeper understanding, and their contribution is of incomparable value and represents a unique and highly meritorious service to the family and humanity.

In an integral vision of the human person and of his or her vocation

32.1 In the context of a culture which seriously distorts or entirely misinterprets the true meaning of human sexuality, because it separates it from its essential reference to the person, the Church more urgently feels how irreplaceable is her mission of presenting sexuality as a value and task of the whole person, created male and female in the image of God.

32.2 In this perspective the Second Vatican Council clearly affirmed that “when there is a question of harmonizing conjugal love with the responsible transmission of life, the moral aspect of any procedure does not depend solely on sincere intentions or on an evaluation of motives. It must be determined by objective standards. These, based on the nature of the human person and his or her acts, preserve the full sense of mutual self-giving and human procreation in the context of true love. Such a goal cannot be achieved unless the virtue of conjugal chastity is sincerely practiced.”<sup>86</sup>

32.3 It is precisely by moving from “an integral vision of man and of his vocation, not only his natural and earthly, but also his supernatural and eternal vocation,”<sup>87</sup> that Paul VI affirmed that the teaching of the Church “is founded upon the inseparable connection, willed by God and unable to be broken by man on his own initiative, between the two meanings of the conjugal act: the unitive meaning and the procreative meaning.”<sup>88</sup> And he concluded by reemphasizing that there must be excluded as intrinsically immoral “every action which, either in anticipation of the conjugal act, or in its accomplishment, or in the development of its natural consequences, proposes, whether as an end or as a means, to render procreation impossible.”<sup>89</sup>

32.4 When couples, by means of recourse to contraception, separate these two meanings that God the Creator has inscribed in the being of man and woman and in the dynamism of their sexual communion, they act as “arbiters” of the divine plan and they “manipulate” and degrade human sexuality – and with it themselves and their married partner – by altering its value of “total” self-giving. Thus the innate language that expresses the total reciprocal self-giving of husband and wife is overlaid, through contraception, by an objectively contradictory language, namely, that of not giving oneself totally to the other. This leads not only to a positive refusal to be open to life but also to a falsification of the inner truth of conjugal love, which is called upon to give itself in personal totality.

32.5 When, instead, by means of recourse to periods of infertility, the couple respect the inseparable connection between the unitive and procreative meanings of human sexuality, they are acting as “ministers” of God’s plan and they “benefit from” their sexuality according to the original dynamism of “total” self-giving, without manipulation or alteration.<sup>90</sup>

32.6 In the light of the experience of many couples and of the data provided by the different human sciences, theological reflection is able to perceive and is called to study further the difference, both anthropological and moral, between contraception and recourse to the rhythm of the cycle: it is a difference which is much wider and deeper than is usually thought, one which involves in the final analysis two irreconcilable concepts of the human person and of human sexuality. The choice of the natural rhythms involves accepting the cycle of the person, that is the woman, and thereby accepting dialogue, reciprocal respect, shared responsibility and self-control. To accept the cycle and to enter into dialogue means to recognize both the spiritual and corporal character of conjugal communion and to live personal love with its requirement of fidelity. In this context the couple comes to experience how conjugal communion is enriched with those values of tenderness and affection which constitute the inner soul of human sexuality, in its physical dimension also. In this way sexuality is respected and promoted in its truly and fully human dimension, and is never “used” as an “object” that, by breaking the personal unity of soul and body, strikes at God’s creation itself at the level of the deepest interaction of nature and person.

The Church as Teacher and Mother for couples in difficulty

33.1 In the field of conjugal morality the Church is Teacher and Mother and acts as such.

33.2 As Teacher, she never tires of proclaiming the moral norm that must guide the responsible transmission of life. The Church is in no way the author or the arbiter of this norm. In obedience to the truth which is Christ, whose image is reflected in the nature and dignity of the human person, the Church interprets the moral norm and proposes it to all people of good will, without concealing its demands of radicalness and perfection.

33.3 As Mother, the Church is close to the many married couples who find themselves in difficulty over this important point of the moral life: she knows well their situation, which is often very arduous and at times truly tormented by difficulties of every kind, not only individual difficulties but social ones as well; she knows that many couples encounter difficulties not only in the concrete fulfillment of the moral norm but even in understanding its inherent values.

33.4 But it is one and the same Church that is both Teacher and Mother. And so the Church never ceases to exhort and encourage all to resolve whatever conjugal difficulties may arise without ever falsifying or compromising the truth: she is convinced that there can be no true contradiction between the divine law on transmitting life and that on fostering authentic married love.<sup>91</sup> Accordingly, the concrete pedagogy of the Church must always remain linked with her doctrine and never be separated from it. With the same conviction as my Predecessor, I therefore repeat: “To diminish in no way the saving teaching of Christ constitutes an eminent form of charity for souls.”<sup>92</sup>

33.5 On the other hand, authentic ecclesial pedagogy displays its realism and wisdom only by making a tenacious and courageous effort to create and uphold all the human conditions – psychological, moral and spiritual – indispensable for understanding and living the moral value and norm.

33.6 There is no doubt that these conditions must include persistence and patience, humility and strength of mind, filial trust in God and in his grace, and frequent recourse to prayer and to the Sacraments of the Eucharist and of Reconciliation.<sup>93</sup> Thus strengthened, Christian husbands and wives will be able to keep alive their awareness of the unique influence that the grace of the Sacrament of Marriage has on every aspect of married life, including therefore their sexuality: the gift of the Spirit, accepted and responded to by husband and wife, helps them to live their human sexuality in accordance with God’s plan and as a sign of the unitive and fruitful love of Christ for his Church.

33.7 But the necessary conditions also include in the knowledge of the bodily aspect and the body's rhythms of fertility. Accordingly, every effort must be made to render such knowledge accessible to all married people and also to young adults before marriage, through clear, timely and serious instruction and education given by married couples, doctors and experts. Knowledge must then lead to education in self-control: hence the absolute necessity for the virtue of chastity and for permanent education in it. In the Christian view, chastity by no means signifies rejection of human sexuality or lack of esteem for it: rather it signifies spiritual energy capable of defending love from the perils of selfishness and aggressiveness, and able to advance it toward its full realization.

33.8 With deeply wise and loving intuition, Paul VI was only voicing the experience of many married couples when he wrote in his Encyclical: "To dominate instinct by means of one's reason and free will undoubtedly requires ascetical practices, so that the affective manifestations of conjugal life may observe the correct order, in particular with regard to the observance of periodic continence. Yet this discipline which is proper to the purity of married couples, far from harming conjugal love, rather confers on it a higher human value. It demands continual effort, yet, thanks to its beneficent influence, husband and wife fully develop their personalities, being enriched with spiritual values. Such discipline bestows upon family life fruits of serenity and peace, and facilitates the solution of other problems; it favors attention for one's partner, helps both parties to drive out selfishness, the enemy of true love, and deepens their sense of responsibility. By its means, parents acquire the capacity of having a deeper and more efficacious influence in the education of their offspring."<sup>94</sup>

The moral progress of married people

34.1 It is always very important to have a right notion of the moral order, its values and its norms; and the importance is all the greater when the difficulties in the way of respecting them become more numerous and serious.

34.2 Since the moral order reveals and sets forth the plan of God the Creator, for this very reason it cannot be something that harms man, something impersonal. On the contrary, by responding to the deepest demands of the human being created by God, it places itself at the service of that person's full humanity with the delicate and binding love whereby God himself inspires, sustains and guides every creature toward its happiness.

34.3 But man, who has been called to live God's wise and loving design in a responsible manner, is an historical being who day by day builds himself up through his many free decisions; and so he knows, loves and accomplishes moral good by stages of growth.

34.4 Married people too are called upon to progress unceasingly in their moral life, with the support of a sincere and active desire to gain ever better knowledge of the values enshrined in and fostered by the law of God. They must also be supported by an upright and generous willingness to embody these values in their concrete decisions. They cannot, however, look on the law as merely an ideal to be achieved in the future: they must consider it as a command of Christ the Lord to overcome difficulties with constancy. "And so what is known as 'the law of gradualness' or step-by-step advance cannot be identified with 'gradualness of the law,' as if there were different degrees or forms of precept in God's law for different individuals and situations. In God's plan, all husbands and wives are called in marriage to holiness, and this lofty vocation is fulfilled to the extent that the human person is able to respond to God's command with serene confidence in God's grace and in his or her own will."<sup>95</sup> On the same lines, it is part of the Church's pedagogy that husbands and wives should first of all recognize clearly the teaching of Humanae Vitae as indicating the norm for the exercise of their sexuality, and that they should endeavor to establish the conditions necessary for observing that norm.

34.5 As the Synod noted, this pedagogy embraces the whole of married life. Accordingly, the function of transmitting life must be integrated into the overall mission of Christian life as a whole, which without the Cross cannot reach the Resurrection. In such a context it is understandable that sacrifice cannot be removed from family life, but must in fact be wholeheartedly accepted if the love between husband and wife is to be deepened and become a source of intimate joy.

34.6 This shared progress demands reflection, instruction and suitable education on the part of the priests, Religious and lay people engaged in family pastoral work: they will all be able to assist married people in their human and spiritual progress, a progress that demands awareness of sin, a sincere commitment to observe the moral law, and the ministry of reconciliation. It must also be kept in mind that conjugal intimacy involves the wills of two persons, who are, however, called to harmonize their mentality and behavior: this requires much patience, understanding and time. Uniquely important in this field is unity of moral and pastoral judgment by priests, a unity that must be carefully sought and ensured, in order that the faithful may not have to suffer anxiety of conscience.<sup>96</sup>

34.7 It will be easier for married people to make progress if, with respect for the Church's teaching and with trust in the grace of Christ, and with the help and support of the pastors of souls and the entire ecclesial community, they are able to discover and experience the liberating and inspiring value of the authentic love that is offered by the Gospel and set before us by the Lord's commandment.

Instilling conviction and offering practical help

35.1 With regard to the question of lawful birth regulation, the ecclesial community at the present time must take on the task of instilling conviction and offering practical help to those who wish to live out their parenthood in a truly responsible way.

35.2 In this matter, while the Church notes with satisfaction the results achieved by scientific research aimed at a more precise knowledge of the rhythms of women's fertility, and while it encourages a more decisive and wide-ranging extension of that research, it cannot fail to call with renewed vigor on the responsibility of all – doctors, experts, marriage counselors, teachers and married couples – who can actually help married people to live their love with respect for the structure and finalities of the conjugal act which expresses that love. This implies a broader, more decisive and more systematic effort to make the natural methods of regulating fertility known, respected and applied.<sup>97</sup>

35.3 A very valuable witness can and should be given by those husbands and wives who through the joint exercise of periodic continence have reached a more mature personal responsibility with regard to love and life. As Paul VI wrote: “To them the Lord entrusts the task of making visible to people the holiness and sweetness of the law which unites the mutual love of husband and wife with their cooperation with the love of God, the author of human life.”<sup>98</sup>

2) EDUCATION

Familiaris Consortio

The right and duty of parents regarding education

36.1 The task of giving education is rooted in the primary vocation of married couples to participate in God's creative activity: by begetting in love and for love a new person who has within himself or herself the vocation to growth and development, parents by that very fact take on the task of helping that person effectively to live a fully human life. As the Second Vatican Council recalled, "since parents have conferred life on their children, they have a most solemn obligation to educate their offspring. Hence, parents must be acknowledged as the first and foremost educators of their children. Their role as educators is so decisive that scarcely anything can compensate for their failure in it. For it devolves on parents to create a family atmosphere so animated with love and reverence for God and others that a well-rounded personal and social development will be fostered among the children. Hence, the family is the first school of those social virtues which every society needs."<sup>99</sup>

36.2 The right and duty of parents to give education is essential, since it is connected with the transmission of human life; it is original and primary with regard to the educational role of others, on account of the uniqueness of the loving relationship between parents and children; and it is irreplaceable and inalienable, and therefore incapable of being entirely delegated to others or usurped by others.

36.3 In addition to these characteristics, it cannot be forgotten that the most basic element, so basic that it qualifies the educational role of parents, is parental love, which finds fulfillment in the task of education as it completes and perfects its service of life: as well as being a source, the parents' love is also the animating principle and therefore the norm inspiring and guiding all concrete educational activity, enriching it with the values of kindness, constancy, goodness, service, disinterestedness and self-sacrifice that are the most precious fruit of love.

Educating in the essential values of human life

37.1 Even amid the difficulties of the work of education, difficulties which are often greater today, parents must trustingly and courageously train their children in the essential values of human life. Children must grow up with a correct attitude of freedom with regard to material goods, by adopting a simple and austere lifestyle and being fully convinced that “man is more precious for what he is than for what he has.”<sup>100</sup>

37.2 In a society shaken and split by tensions and conflicts caused by the violent clash of various kinds of individualism and selfishness, children must be enriched not only with a sense of true justice, which alone leads to respect for the personal dignity of each individual, but also and more powerfully by a sense of true love, understood as sincere solicitude and disinterested service with regard to others, especially the poorest and those in most need. The family is the first and fundamental school of social living: as a community of love, it finds in self-giving the law that guides it and makes it grow. The self-giving that inspires the love of husband and wife for each other is the model and norm for the self-giving that must be practiced in the relationships between brothers and sisters and the different generations living together in the family. And the communion and sharing that are part of everyday life in the home at times of joy and at times of difficulty are the most concrete and effective pedagogy for the active, responsible and fruitful inclusion of the children in the wider horizon of society.

37.3 Education in love as self-giving is also the indispensable premise for parents called to give their children a clear and delicate sex education. Faced with a culture that largely reduces human sexuality to the level of something commonplace, since it interprets and lives it in a reductive and impoverished way by linking it solely with the body and with selfish pleasure, the educational service of parents must aim firmly at a training in the area of sex that is truly and fully personal: for sexuality is an enrichment of the whole person – body, emotions and soul – and it manifests its inmost meaning in leading the person to the gift of self in love.

37.4 Sex education, which is a basic right and duty of parents, must always be carried out under their attentive guidance, whether at home or in educational centers chosen and controlled by them. In this regard, the Church reaffirms the law of subsidiarity, which the school is bound to observe when it cooperates in sex education, by entering into the same spirit that animates the parents.

37.5 In this context education for chastity is absolutely essential, for it is a virtue that develops a person’s authentic maturity and makes him or her capable of respecting and fostering the “nuptial meaning” of the body. Indeed Christian parents, discerning the signs of God's call, will devote special attention and care to education in virginity or celibacy as the supreme form of that self-giving that constitutes the very meaning of human sexuality.

37.6 In view of the close links between the sexual dimension of the person and his or her ethical values, education must bring the children to a knowledge of and respect for the moral norms as the necessary and highly valuable guarantee for responsible personal growth in human sexuality.

37.7 For this reason the Church is firmly opposed to an often widespread form of imparting sex information dissociated from moral principles. That would merely be an introduction to the experience of pleasure and a stimulus leading to the loss of serenity – while still in the years of innocence – by opening the way to vice.

The mission to educate and the Sacrament of Marriage

38.1 For Christian parents the mission to educate, a mission rooted, as we have said, in their participation in God's creative activity, has a new specific source in the Sacrament of Marriage, which consecrates them for the strictly Christian education of their children: that is to say, it calls upon them to share in the very authority and love of God the Father and Christ the Shepherd, and in the motherly love of the Church, and it enriches them with wisdom, counsel, fortitude and all the other gifts of the Holy Spirit in order to help the children in their growth as human beings and as Christians.

38.2 The Sacrament of Marriage gives to the educational role the dignity and vocation of being really and truly a "ministry" of the Church at the service of the building up of her members. So great and splendid is the educational ministry of Christian parents that Saint Thomas has no hesitation in comparing it with the ministry of priests: "Some only propagate and guard spiritual life by a spiritual ministry: this is the role of the Sacrament of Orders; others do this for both corporal and spiritual life, and this is brought about by the Sacrament of Marriage, by which a man and a woman join in order to beget offspring and bring them up to worship God."<sup>101</sup>

38.3 A vivid and attentive awareness of the mission that they have received with the Sacrament of Marriage will help Christian parents to place themselves at the service of their children's education with great serenity and trustfulness, and also with a sense of responsibility before God, who calls them and gives them the mission of building up the Church in their children. Thus in the case of baptized people, the family, called together by word and sacrament as the Church of the home, is both teacher and mother, the same as the worldwide Church.

First experience of the Church

39.1 The mission to educate demands that Christian parents should present to their children all the topics that are necessary for the gradual maturing of their personality from a Christian and ecclesial point of view. They will therefore follow the educational lines mentioned above, taking care to show their children the depths of significance to which the faith and love of Jesus Christ can lead. Furthermore, their awareness that the Lord is entrusting to them the growth of a child of God, a brother or sister of Christ, a temple of the Holy Spirit, a member of the Church, will support Christian parents in their task of strengthening the gift of divine grace in their children's souls.

39.2 The Second Vatican Council describes the content of Christian education as follows: "Such an education does not merely strive to foster maturity . . . in the human person. Rather, its principal aims are these: that as baptized persons are gradually introduced into a knowledge of the mystery of salvation, they may daily grow more conscious of the gift of faith which they have received; that they may learn to adore God the Father in spirit and in truth (cf. Jn 4:23), especially through liturgical worship; that they may be trained to conduct their personal life in true righteousness and holiness, according to their new nature (Eph 4:22-24), and thus grow to maturity, to the stature of the fullness of Christ (cf. Eph 4:13), and devote themselves to the upbuilding of the Mystical Body. Moreover, aware of their calling, they should grow accustomed to giving witness to the hope that is in them (cf. 1 Pet 3:15), and to promoting the Christian transformation of the world."102

39.3 The Synod too, taking up and developing the indications of the Council, presented the educational mission of the Christian family as a true ministry through which the Gospel is transmitted and radiated, so that family life itself becomes an itinerary of faith and in some way a Christian initiation and a school of following Christ. Within a family that is aware of this gift, as Paul VI wrote, "all the members evangelize and are evangelized."103

39.4 By virtue of their ministry of educating, parents are, through the witness of their lives, the first heralds of the Gospel for their children. Furthermore, by praying with their children, by reading the word of God with them and by introducing them deeply through Christian initiation into the Body of Christ – both the Eucharistic and the ecclesial Body – they become fully parents, in that they are begetters not only of bodily life but also of the life that through the Spirit's renewal flows from the Cross and Resurrection of Christ.

39.5 In order that Christian parents may worthily carry out their ministry of educating, the Synod Fathers expressed the hope that a suitable catechism for families would be prepared, one that would be clear, brief and easily assimilated by all. The Episcopal Conferences were warmly invited to contribute to producing this catechism.

Relations with other educating agents

40.1 The family is the primary but not the only and exclusive educating community. Man's community aspect itself – both civil and ecclesial – demands and leads to a broader and more articulated activity resulting from well-ordered collaboration between the various agents of education. All these agents are necessary, even though each can and should play its part in accordance with the special competence and contribution proper to itself.<sup>104</sup>

40.2 The educational role of the Christian family therefore has a very important place in organic pastoral work. This involves a new form of cooperation between parents and Christian communities, and between the various educational groups and pastors. In this sense, the renewal of the Catholic school must give special attention both to the parents of the pupils and to the formation of a perfect educating community.

40.3 The right of parents to choose an education in conformity with their religious faith must be absolutely guaranteed.

40.4 The State and the Church have the obligation to give families all possible aid to enable them to perform their educational role properly. Therefore both the Church and the State must create and foster the institutions and activities that families justly demand, and the aid must be in proportion to the families' needs. However, those in society who are in charge of schools must never forget that the parents have been appointed by God himself as the first and principal educators of their children and that their right is completely inalienable.

40.5 But corresponding to their right, parents have a serious duty to commit themselves totally to a cordial and active relationship with the teachers and the school authorities.

40.6 If ideologies opposed to the Christian faith are taught in the schools, the family must join with other families, if possible through family associations, and with all its strength and with wisdom help the young not to depart from the faith. In this case the family needs special assistance from pastors of souls, who must never forget that parents have the inviolable right to entrust their children to the ecclesial community.

Manifold service to life

41.1 Fruitful married love expresses itself in serving life in many ways. Of these ways, begetting and educating children are the most immediate, specific and irreplaceable. In fact, every act of true love toward a human being bears witness to and perfects the spiritual fecundity of the family, since it is an act of obedience to the deep inner dynamism of love as self-giving to others.

41.2 For everyone this perspective is full of value and commitment, and it can be an inspiration in particular for couples who experience physical sterility.

41.3 Christian families, recognizing with faith all human beings as children of the same heavenly Father, will respond generously to the children of other families, giving them support and love not as outsiders but as members of the one family of God's children. Christian parents will thus be able to spread their love beyond the bonds of flesh and blood, nourishing the links that are rooted in the spirit and that develop through concrete service to the children of other families, who are often without even the barest necessities.

41.4 Christian families will be able to show greater readiness to adopt and foster children who have lost their parents or have been abandoned by them. Rediscovering the warmth of affection of a family, these children will be able to experience God's loving and provident fatherhood witnessed to by Christian parents, and they will thus be able to grow up with serenity and confidence in life. At the same time the whole family will be enriched with the spiritual values of a wider fraternity.

41.5 Family fecundity must have an unceasing "creativity," a marvelous fruit of the Spirit of God, who opens the eyes of the heart to discover the new needs and sufferings of our society and gives courage for accepting them and responding to them. A vast field of activity lies open to families: today, even more preoccupying than child abandonment is the phenomenon of social and cultural exclusion, which seriously affects the elderly, the sick, the disabled, drug addicts, ex-prisoners, etc.

41.6 This broadens enormously the horizons of the parenthood of Christian families: these and many other urgent needs of our time are a challenge to their spiritually fruitful love. With families and through them, the Lord Jesus continues to "have compassion" on the multitudes.

3. Participating in the Development of Society

Familiaris Consortio

The family as the first and vital cell of society

42.1 “Since the Creator of all things has established the conjugal partnership as the beginning and basis of human society,” the family is “the first and vital cell of society.”<sup>105</sup>

42.2 The family has vital and organic links with society, since it is its foundation and nourishes it continually through its role of service to life: it is from the family that citizens come to birth and it is within the family that they find the first school of the social virtues that are the animating principle of the existence and development of society itself.

42.3 Thus, far from being closed in on itself, the family is by nature and vocation open to other families and to society, and undertakes its social role.

Familiaris Consortio

Family life as an experience of communion and sharing

43.1 The very experience of communion and sharing that should characterize the family's daily life represents its first and fundamental contribution to society.

43.2 The relationships between the members of the family community are inspired and guided by the law of "free giving." By respecting and fostering personal dignity in each and every one as the only basis for value, this free giving takes the form of heartfelt acceptance, encounter and dialogue, disinterested availability, generous service and deep solidarity.

43.3 Thus the fostering of authentic and mature communion between persons within the family is the first and irreplaceable school of social life, and example and stimulus for the broader community relationships marked by respect, justice, dialogue and love.

43.4 The family is thus, as the Synod Fathers recalled, the place of origin and the most effective means for humanizing and personalizing society: it makes an original contribution in depth to building up the world, by making possible a life that is properly speaking human, in particular by guarding and transmitting virtues and "values." As the Second Vatican Council states, in the family "the various generations come together and help one another to grow wiser and to harmonize personal rights with the other requirements of social living."<sup>106</sup>

43.5 Consequently, faced with a society that is running the risk of becoming more and more depersonalized and standardized and therefore inhuman and dehumanizing, with the negative results of many forms of escapism – such as alcoholism, drugs and even terrorism – the family possesses and continues still to release formidable energies capable of taking man out of his anonymity, keeping him conscious of his personal dignity, enriching him with deep humanity and actively placing him, in his uniqueness and unrepeatability, within the fabric of society.

The social and political role

44.1 The social role of the family certainly cannot stop short at procreation and education, even if this constitutes its primary and irreplaceable form of expression.

44.2 Families therefore, either singly or in association, can and should devote themselves to manifold social service activities, especially in favor of the poor, or at any rate for the benefit of all people and situations that cannot be reached by the public authorities' welfare organization.

44.3 The social contribution of the family has an original character of its own, one that should be given greater recognition and more decisive encouragement, especially as the children grow up, and actually involving all its members as much as possible.<sup>107</sup>

44.4 In particular, note must be taken of the ever greater importance in our society of hospitality in all its forms, from opening the door of one's home and still more of one's heart to the pleas of one's brothers and sisters, to concrete efforts to ensure that every family has its own home, as the natural environment that preserves it and makes it grow. In a special way the Christian family is called upon to listen to the Apostle's recommendation: "Practice hospitality,"<sup>108</sup> and therefore, imitating Christ's example and sharing in his love, to welcome the brother or sister in need: "Whoever gives to one of these little ones even a cup of cold water because he is a disciple, truly, I say to you, he shall not lose his reward."<sup>109</sup>

44.5 The social role of families is called upon to find expression also in the form of political intervention: families should be the first to take steps to see that the laws and institutions of the State not only do not offend but support and positively defend the rights and duties of the family. Along these lines, families should grow in awareness of being "protagonists" of what is known as "family politics" and assume responsibility for transforming society; otherwise, families will be the first victims of the evils that they have done no more than note with indifference. The Second Vatican Council's appeal to go beyond an individualistic ethic therefore also holds good for the family as such.<sup>110</sup>

Society at the service of the family

45.1 Just as the intimate connection between the family and society demands that the family be open to and participate in society and its development, so also it requires that society should never fail in its fundamental task of respecting and fostering the family.

45.2 The family and society have complementary functions in defending and fostering the good of each and every human being. But society – more specifically the State – must recognize that “the family is a society in its own original right”<sup>111</sup> and so society is under a grave obligation in its relations with the family to adhere to the principle of subsidiarity.

45.3 By virtue of this principle, the State cannot and must not take away from families the functions that they can just as well perform on their own or in free associations; instead it must positively favor and encourage as far as possible responsible initiative by families. In the conviction that the good of the family is an indispensable and essential value of the civil community, the public authorities must do everything possible to ensure that families have all those aids – economic, social, educational, political and cultural assistance – that they need in order to face all their responsibilities in a human way.

The charter of family rights

46.1 The ideal of mutual support and development between the family and society is often very seriously in conflict with the reality of their separation and even opposition.

46.2 In fact, as was repeatedly denounced by the Synod, the situation experienced by many families in various countries is highly problematical, if not entirely negative: institutions and laws unjustly ignore the inviolable rights of the family and of the human person; and society, far from putting itself at the service of the family, attacks it violently in its values and fundamental requirements. Thus the family, which in God's plan is the basic cell of society and a subject of rights and duties before the State or any other community, finds itself the victim of society, of the delays and slowness with which it acts, and even of its blatant injustice.

46.3 For this reason, the Church openly and strongly defends the rights of the family against the intolerable usurpations of society and the State. In particular, the Synod Fathers mentioned the following rights of the family:

- the right to exist and progress as a family, that is to say, the right of every human being, even if he or she is poor, to found a family and to have adequate means to support it;
- the right to exercise its responsibility regarding the transmission of life and to educate children;
- the right to the intimacy of conjugal and family life;
- the right to the stability of the bond and of the institution of marriage;
- the right to believe in and profess one's faith and to propagate it;
- the right to bring up children in accordance with the family's own traditions and religious and cultural values, with the necessary instruments, means and institutions;
- the right, especially of the poor and the sick, to obtain physical, social, political and economic security;
- the right to housing suitable for living family life in a proper way;
- the right to expression and to representation, either directly or through associations, before the economic, social and cultural public authorities and lower authorities;
- the right to form associations with other families and institutions, in order to fulfill the family's role suitably and expeditiously;
- the right to protect minors by adequate institutions and legislation from harmful drugs, pornography, alcoholism, etc.;
- the right to wholesome recreation of a kind that also fosters family values;

- the right of the elderly to a worthy life and a worthy death;
- the right to emigrate as a family in search of a better life.<sup>112</sup>

46.4 Acceding to the Synod's explicit request, the Holy See will give prompt attention to studying these suggestions in depth and to the preparation of a Charter of Rights of the Family, to be presented to the quarters and authorities concerned.

The Christian family's grace and responsibility

47.1 The social role that belongs to every family pertains by a new and original right to the Christian family, which is based on the Sacrament of Marriage. By taking up the human reality of the love between husband and wife in all its implications, the sacrament gives to Christian couples and parents a power and a commitment to live their vocation as lay people and therefore to “seek the Kingdom of God by engaging in temporal affairs and by ordering them according to the plan of God.”<sup>113</sup>

47.2 The social and political role is included in the kingly mission of service in which Christian couples share by virtue of the Sacrament of Marriage, and they receive both a command which they cannot ignore and a grace which sustains and stimulates them.

47.3 The Christian family is thus called upon to offer everyone a witness of generous and disinterested dedication to social matters, through a “preferential option” for the poor and disadvantaged. Therefore, advancing in its following of the Lord by special love for all the poor, it must have special concern for the hungry, the poor, the old, the sick, drug victims and those who have no family.

For a new international order

48.1 In view of the worldwide dimension of various social questions nowadays, the family has seen its role with regard to the development of society extended in a completely new way: it now also involves cooperating for a new international order, since it is only in worldwide solidarity that the enormous and dramatic issues of world justice, the freedom of peoples and the peace of humanity can be dealt with and solved.

48.2 The spiritual communion between Christian families, rooted in a common faith and hope and given life by love, constitutes an inner energy that generates, spreads and develops justice, reconciliation, fraternity and peace among human beings. Insofar as it is a “small-scale Church,” the Christian family is called upon, like the “large-scale Church,” to be a sign of unity for the world and in this way to exercise its prophetic role by bearing witness to the Kingdom and peace of Christ, toward which the whole world is journeying.

48.3 Christian families can do this through their educational activity – that is to say by presenting to their children a model of life based on the values of truth, freedom, justice and love – both through active and responsible involvement in the authentically human growth of society and its institutions, and by supporting in various ways the associations specifically devoted to international issues.

4. Sharing in the Life and Mission of the Church

Familiaris Consortio

The family, within the mystery of the Church

49.1 Among the fundamental tasks of the Christian family is its ecclesial task: the family is placed at the service of the building up of the Kingdom of God in history by participating in the life and mission of the Church.

49.2 In order to understand better the foundations, the contents and the characteristics of this participation, we must examine the many profound bonds linking the Church and the Christian family and establishing the family as a “Church in miniature” (Ecclesia domestica), 114 in such a way that in its own way the family is a living image and historical representation of the mystery of the Church.

49.3 It is, above all, the Church as Mother that gives birth to, educates and builds up the Christian family, by putting into effect in its regard the saving mission which she has received from her Lord. By proclaiming the word of God, the Church reveals to the Christian family its true identity, what it is and should be according to the Lord’s plan; by celebrating the sacraments, the Church enriches and strengthens the Christian family with the grace of Christ for its sanctification to the glory of the Father; by the continuous proclamation of the new commandment of love, the Church encourages and guides the Christian family to the service of love, so that it may imitate and relive the same self-giving and sacrificial love that the Lord Jesus has for the entire human race.

49.4 In turn, the Christian family is grafted into the mystery of the Church to such a degree as to become a sharer, in its own way, in the saving mission proper to the Church: by virtue of the sacrament, Christian married couples and parents “in their state and way of life have their own special gift among the People of God.” 115 For this reason they not only receive the love of Christ and become a saved community, but they are also called upon to communicate Christ’s love to their brethren, thus becoming a saving community. In this way, while the Christian family is a fruit and sign of the supernatural fecundity of the Church, it stands also as a symbol, witness and participant of the Church’s motherhood. 116

A specific and original ecclesial role

50.1 The Christian family is called upon to take part actively and responsibly in the mission of the Church in a way that is original and specific, by placing itself, in what it is and what it does as an “intimate community of life and love,” at the service of the Church and of society.

50.2 Since the Christian family is a community in which the relationships are renewed by Christ through faith and the sacraments, the family’s sharing in the Church’s mission should follow a community pattern: the spouses together as a couple, the parents and children as a family, must live their service to the Church and to the world. They must be “of one heart and soul”<sup>117</sup> in faith, through the shared apostolic zeal that animates them, and through their shared commitment to works of service to the ecclesial and civil communities.

50.3 The Christian family also builds up the Kingdom of God in history through the everyday realities that concern and distinguish its state of life. It is thus in the love between husband and wife and between the members of the family – a love lived out in all its extraordinary richness of values and demands: totality, oneness, fidelity and fruitfulness<sup>118</sup> – that the Christian family’s participation in the prophetic, priestly and kingly mission of Jesus Christ and of his Church finds expression and realization. Therefore, love and life constitute the nucleus of the saving mission of the Christian family in the Church and for the Church.

50.4 The Second Vatican Council recalls this fact when it writes: “Families will share their spiritual riches generously with other families too. Thus the Christian family, which springs from marriage as a reflection of the loving Covenant uniting Christ with the Church, and as a participation in that Covenant will manifest to all people the Savior’s living presence in the world, and the genuine nature of the Church. This the family will do by the mutual love of the spouses, by their generous fruitfulness, their solidarity and faithfulness, and by the loving way in which all the members of the family work together.”<sup>119</sup>

50.5 Having laid the foundation of the participation of the Christian family in the Church’s mission, it is now time to illustrate its substance in reference to Jesus Christ as prophet, priest and king – three aspects of a single reality – by presenting the Christian family as 1) a believing and evangelizing community, 2) a community in dialogue with God, and 3) a community at the service of man.

Familiaris Consortio

1) THE CHRISTIAN FAMILY AS A BELIEVING AND EVANGELIZING COMMUNITY

Familiaris Consortio

Faith as the discovery and admiring awareness of God's plan for the family

51.1 As a sharer in the life and mission of the Church, which listens to the word of God with reverence and proclaims it confidently,<sup>120</sup> the Christian family fulfills its prophetic role by welcoming and announcing the word of God: it thus becomes more and more each day a believing and evangelizing community.

51.2 Christian spouses and parents are required to offer “the obedience of faith.”<sup>121</sup> They are called upon to welcome the word of the Lord which reveals to them the marvelous news – the Good News – of their conjugal and family life sanctified and made a source of sanctity by Christ himself. Only in faith can they discover and admire with joyful gratitude the dignity to which God has deigned to raise marriage and the family, making them a sign and meeting place of the loving Covenant between God and man, between Jesus Christ and his Bride, the Church.

51.3 The very preparation for Christian marriage is itself a journey of faith. It is a special opportunity for the engaged to rediscover and deepen the faith received in Baptism and nourished by their Christian upbringing. In this way they come to recognize and freely accept their vocation to follow Christ and to serve the Kingdom of God in the married state.

51.4 The celebration of the Sacrament of Marriage is the basic moment of the faith of the couple. This sacrament, in essence, is the proclamation in the Church of the Good News concerning married love. It is the word of God that “reveals” and “fulfills” the wise and loving plan of God for the married couple, giving them a mysterious and real share in the very love with which God himself loves humanity. Since the sacramental celebration of marriage is itself a proclamation of the word of God, it must also be a “profession of faith” within and with the Church, as a community of believers, on the part of all those who in different ways participate in its celebration.

51.5 This profession of faith demands that it be prolonged in the life of the married couple and of the family. God, who called the couple to marriage, continues to call them in marriage.<sup>122</sup> In and through the events, problems, difficulties and circumstances of everyday life, God comes to them, revealing and presenting the concrete “demands” of their sharing in the love of Christ for his Church in the particular family, social and ecclesial situation in which they find themselves.

51.6 The discovery of and obedience to the plan of God on the part of the conjugal and family community must take place in “togetherness,” through the human experience of love between husband and wife, between parents and children, lived in the Spirit of Christ.

51.7 Thus the little domestic Church, like the greater Church, needs to be constantly and intensely evangelized: hence its duty regarding permanent education in the faith.

The Christian family's ministry of evangelization

52.1 To the extent in which the Christian family accepts the Gospel and matures in faith, it becomes an evangelizing community. Let us listen again to Paul VI: "The family, like the Church, ought to be a place where the Gospel is transmitted and from which the Gospel radiates. In a family which is conscious of this mission, all the members evangelize and are evangelized. The parents not only communicate the Gospel to their children, but from their children they can themselves receive the same Gospel as deeply lived by them. And such a family becomes the evangelizer of many other families, and of the neighborhood of which it forms part."<sup>123</sup>

52.2 As the Synod repeated, taking up the appeal which I launched at Puebla, the future of evangelization depends in great part on the Church of the home.<sup>124</sup> This apostolic mission of the family is rooted in Baptism and receives from the grace of the Sacrament of Marriage new strength to transmit the faith, to sanctify and transform our present society according to God's plan.

52.3 Particularly today, the Christian family has a special vocation to witness to the Paschal Covenant of Christ by constantly radiating the joy of love and the certainty of the hope for which it must give an account: "The Christian family loudly proclaims both the present virtues of the Kingdom of God and the hope of a blessed life to come."<sup>125</sup>

52.4 The absolute need for family catechesis emerges with particular force in certain situations that the Church unfortunately experiences in some places: "In places where anti-religious legislation endeavors even to prevent education in the faith, and in places where widespread unbelief or invasive secularism makes real religious growth practically impossible, 'the Church of the home' remains the one place where children and young people can receive an authentic catechesis."<sup>126</sup>

Ecclesial service

53.1 The ministry of evangelization carried out by Christian parents is original and irreplaceable. It assumes the characteristics typical of family life itself, which should be interwoven with love, simplicity, practicality and daily witness.<sup>127</sup>

53.2 The family must educate the children for life in such a way that each one may fully perform his or her role according to the vocation received from God. Indeed, the family that is open to transcendent values, that serves its brothers and sisters with joy, that fulfills its duties with generous fidelity, and is aware of its daily sharing in the mystery of the glorious Cross of Christ, becomes the primary and most excellent seedbed of vocations to a life of consecration to the Kingdom of God.

53.3 The parents' ministry of evangelization and catechesis ought to play a part in their children's lives also during adolescence and youth, when the children, as often happens, challenge or even reject the Christian faith received in earlier years. Just as in the Church the work of evangelization can never be separated from the sufferings of the apostle, so in the Christian family parents must face with courage and great interior serenity the difficulties that their ministry of evangelization sometimes encounters in their own children.

53.4 It should not be forgotten that the service rendered by Christian spouses and parents to the Gospel is essentially an ecclesial service. It has its place within the context of the whole Church as an evangelized and evangelizing community. Insofar as the ministry of evangelization and catechesis of the Church of the home is rooted in and derives from the one mission of the Church and is ordained to the upbuilding of the one Body of Christ,<sup>128</sup> it must remain in intimate communion and collaborate responsibly with all the other evangelizing and catechetical activities present and at work in the ecclesial community at the diocesan and parochial levels.

To preach the Gospel to the whole creation

54.1 Evangelization, urged on within by irrepressible missionary zeal, is characterized by a universality without boundaries. It is the response to Christ's explicit and unequivocal command: "Go into all the world and preach the Gospel to the whole creation."<sup>129</sup>

54.2 The Christian family's faith and evangelizing mission also possesses this catholic missionary inspiration. The Sacrament of Marriage takes up and repropose the task of defending and spreading the faith, a task that has its roots in Baptism and Confirmation,<sup>130</sup> and makes Christian married couples and parents witnesses of Christ "to the end of the earth,"<sup>131</sup> missionaries, in the true and proper sense, of love and life.

54.3 A form of missionary activity can be exercised even within the family. This happens when some member of the family does not have the faith or does not practice it with consistency. In such a case the other members must give him or her a living witness of their own faith in order to encourage and support him or her along the path toward full acceptance of Christ the Savior.<sup>132</sup>

54.4 Animated in its own inner life by missionary zeal, the Church of the home is also called to be a luminous sign of the presence of Christ and of his love for those who are "far away," for families who do not yet believe, and for those Christian families who no longer live in accordance with the faith that they once received. The Christian family is called to enlighten "by its example and its witness . . . those who seek the truth."<sup>133</sup>

54.5 Just as at the dawn of Christianity Aquila and Priscilla were presented as a missionary couple,<sup>134</sup> so today the Church shows forth her perennial newness and fruitfulness by the presence of Christian couples and families who dedicate at least a part of their lives to working in missionary territories, proclaiming the Gospel and doing service to their fellowman in the love of Jesus Christ.

54.6 Christian families offer a special contribution to the missionary cause of the Church by fostering missionary vocations among their sons and daughters<sup>135</sup> and, more generally, "by training their children from childhood to recognize God's love for all people."<sup>136</sup>

2) THE CHRISTIAN FAMILY AS A COMMUNITY IN DIALOGUE WITH GOD

Familiaris Consortio

The Church's sanctuary in the home

55.1 The proclamation of the Gospel and its acceptance in faith reach their fullness in the celebration of the sacraments. The Church which is a believing and evangelizing community is also a priestly people invested with the dignity and sharing in the power of Christ the High Priest of the New and Eternal Covenant.<sup>137</sup>

55.2 The Christian family too is part of this priestly people which is the Church. By means of the Sacrament of Marriage, in which it is rooted and from which it draws its nourishment, the Christian family is continuously vivified by the Lord Jesus and called and engaged by him in a dialogue with God through the sacraments, through the offering of one's life, and through prayer.

55.3 This is the priestly role which the Christian family can and ought to exercise in intimate communion with the whole Church, through the daily realities of married and family life. In this way the Christian family is called to be sanctified and to sanctify the ecclesial community and the world.

Marriage as a sacrament of mutual sanctification and an act of worship

56.1 The Sacrament of Marriage is the specific source and original means of sanctification for Christian married couples and families. It takes up again and makes specific the sanctifying grace of Baptism. By virtue of the mystery of the Death and Resurrection of Christ, of which the spouses are made part in a new way by marriage, conjugal love is purified and made holy: “This love the Lord has judged worthy of special gifts, healing, perfecting and exalting gifts of grace and of charity.”<sup>138</sup>

56.2 The gift of Jesus Christ is not exhausted in the actual celebration of the Sacrament of Marriage, but rather accompanies the married couple throughout their lives. This fact is explicitly recalled by the Second Vatican Council when it says that Jesus Christ “abides with them so that, just as he loved the Church and handed himself over on her behalf, the spouses may love each other with perpetual fidelity through mutual self-bestowal. . . . For this reason, Christian spouses have a special sacrament by which they are fortified and receive a kind of consecration in the duties and dignity of their state. By virtue of this sacrament, as spouses fulfill their conjugal and family obligations, they are penetrated with the Spirit of Christ, who fills their whole lives with faith, hope and charity. Thus they increasingly advance toward their own perfection, as well as toward their mutual sanctification, and hence contribute jointly to the glory of God.”<sup>139</sup>

56.3 Christian spouses and parents are included in the universal call to sanctity. For them this call is specified by the sacrament they have celebrated and is carried out concretely in the realities proper to their conjugal and family life.<sup>140</sup> This gives rise to the grace and requirement of an authentic and profound conjugal and family spirituality that draws its inspiration from the themes of creation, Covenant, Cross, Resurrection, and sign, which were stressed more than once by the Synod.

56.4 Christian marriage, like the other sacraments, “whose purpose is to sanctify people, to build up the Body of Christ, and finally, to give worship to God,”<sup>141</sup> is in itself a liturgical action glorifying God in Jesus Christ and in the Church. By celebrating it, Christian spouses profess their gratitude to God for the sublime gift bestowed on them of being able to live in their married and family lives the very love of God for people and that of the Lord Jesus for the Church, his Bride.

56.5 Just as husbands and wives receive from the sacrament the gift and responsibility of translating into daily living the sanctification bestowed on them, so the same sacrament confers on them the grace and moral obligation of transforming their whole lives into a “spiritual sacrifice.”<sup>142</sup> What the Council says of the laity applies also to Christian spouses and parents, especially with regard to the earthly and temporal realities that characterize their lives: “As worshipers leading holy lives in every place, the laity consecrate the world itself to God.”<sup>143</sup>

Marriage and the Eucharist

57.1 The Christian family's sanctifying role is grounded in Baptism and has its highest expression in the Eucharist, to which Christian marriage is intimately connected. The Second Vatican Council drew attention to the unique relationship between the Eucharist and marriage by requesting that "marriage normally be celebrated within the Mass."<sup>144</sup> To understand better and live more intensely the graces and responsibilities of Christian marriage and family life, it is altogether necessary to rediscover and strengthen this relationship.

57.2 The Eucharist is the very source of Christian marriage. The Eucharistic Sacrifice, in fact, represents Christ's Covenant of love with the Church, sealed with his blood on the Cross.<sup>145</sup> In this sacrifice of the New and Eternal Covenant, Christian spouses encounter the source from which their own marriage covenant flows, is interiorly structured and continuously renewed. As a representation of Christ's sacrifice of love for the Church, the Eucharist is a fountain of charity. In the Eucharistic gift of charity the Christian family finds the foundation and soul of its "communion" and its "mission": by partaking in the Eucharistic bread, the different members of the Christian family become one body, which reveals and shares in the wider unity of the Church. Their sharing in the Body of Christ that is "given up" and in his Blood that is "shed" becomes a never-ending source of missionary and apostolic dynamism for the Christian family.

The sacrament of conversion and reconciliation

58.1 An essential and permanent part of the Christian family's sanctifying role consists in accepting the call to conversion that the Gospel addresses to all Christians, who do not always remain faithful to the "newness" of the Baptism that constitutes them "saints." The Christian family too is sometimes unfaithful to the law of baptismal grace and holiness proclaimed anew in the Sacrament of Marriage.

58.2 Repentance and mutual pardon within the bosom of the Christian family, so much a part of daily life, receive their specific sacramental expression in Christian Penance. In the Encyclical Humanae Vitae, Paul VI wrote of married couples: "And if sin should still keep its hold over them, let them not be discouraged, but rather have recourse with humble perseverance to the mercy of God, which is abundantly poured forth in the Sacrament of Penance."<sup>146</sup>

58.3 The celebration of this sacrament acquires special significance for family life. While they discover in faith that sin contradicts not only the Covenant with God, but also the covenant between husband and wife and the communion of the family, the married couple and the other members of the family are led to an encounter with God, who is "rich in mercy,"<sup>147</sup> who bestows on them his love which is more powerful than sin,<sup>148</sup> and who reconstructs and brings to perfection the marriage covenant and the family communion.

Family prayer

59.1 The Church prays for the Christian family and educates the family to live in generous accord with the priestly gift and role received from Christ the High Priest. In effect, the baptismal priesthood of the faithful, exercised in the Sacrament of Marriage, constitutes the basis of a priestly vocation and mission for the spouses and family by which their daily lives are transformed into “spiritual sacrifices acceptable to God through Jesus Christ.”<sup>149</sup> This transformation is achieved not only by celebrating the Eucharist and the other sacraments and through offering themselves to the glory of God, but also through a life of prayer, through prayerful dialogue with the Father, through Jesus Christ, in the Holy Spirit.

59.2 Family prayer has its own characteristic qualities. It is prayer offered in common, husband and wife together, parents and children together. Communion in prayer is both a consequence of and a requirement for the communion bestowed by the Sacraments of Baptism and Matrimony. The words with which the Lord Jesus promises his presence can be applied to the members of the Christian family in a special way: “Again I say to you, if two of you agree on earth about anything they ask, it will be done for them by my Father in heaven. For where two or three are gathered in my name, there am I in the midst of them.”<sup>150</sup>

59.3 Family prayer has for its very own object family life itself, which in all its varying circumstances is seen as a call from God and lived as a filial response to his call. Joys and sorrows, hopes and disappointments, births and birthday celebrations, wedding anniversaries of the parents, departures, separations and homecomings, important and far-reaching decisions, the death of those who are dear, etc. – all of these mark God’s loving intervention in the family’s history. They should be seen as suitable moments for thanksgiving, for petition, for trusting abandonment of the family into the hands of their common Father in heaven. The dignity and responsibility of the Christian family as the domestic Church can be achieved only with God’s unceasing aid, which will surely be granted if it is humbly and trustingly petitioned in prayer.

Educators in prayer

60.1 By reason of their dignity and mission, Christian parents have the specific responsibility of educating their children in prayer, introducing them to gradual discovery of the mystery of God and to personal dialogue with him: “It is particularly in the Christian family, enriched by the grace and the office of the Sacrament of Matrimony, that from the earliest years children should be taught, according to the faith received in Baptism, to have a knowledge of God, to worship him and to love their neighbor.”<sup>151</sup>

60.2 The concrete example and living witness of parents is fundamental and irreplaceable in educating their children to pray. Only by praying together with their children can a father and mother – exercising their royal priesthood – penetrate the innermost depths of their children’s hearts and leave an impression that the future events in their lives will not be able to efface. Let us again listen to the appeal made by Paul VI to parents: “Mothers, do you teach your children the Christian prayers? Do you prepare them, in conjunction with the priests, for the sacraments that they receive when they are young: Confession, Communion and Confirmation? Do you encourage them when they are sick to think of Christ suffering, to invoke the aid of the Blessed Virgin and the saints? Do you say the family rosary together? And you, fathers, do you pray with your children, with the whole domestic community, at least sometimes? Your example of honesty in thought and action, joined to some common prayer, is a lesson for life, an act of worship of singular value. In this way you bring peace to your homes: Pax huic domui. Remember, it is thus that you build up the Church.”<sup>152</sup>

Liturgical prayer and private prayer

61.1 There exists a deep and vital bond between the prayer of the Church and the prayer of the individual faithful, as has been clearly reaffirmed by the Second Vatican Council.<sup>153</sup> An important purpose of the prayer of the domestic Church is to serve as the natural introduction for the children to the liturgical prayer of the whole Church, both in the sense of preparing for it and of extending it into personal, family and social life. Hence the need for gradual participation by all the members of the Christian family in the celebration of the Eucharist, especially on Sundays and feast days, and of the other sacraments, particularly the sacraments of Christian initiation of the children. The directives of the Council opened up a new possibility for the Christian family when it listed the family among those groups to whom it recommends the recitation of the Divine Office in common.<sup>154</sup> Likewise, the Christian family will strive to celebrate at home, and in a way suited to the members, the times and feasts of the liturgical year.

61.2 As preparation for the worship celebrated in Church, and as its prolongation in the home, the Christian family makes use of private prayer, which presents a great variety of forms. While this variety testifies to the extraordinary richness with which the Spirit vivifies Christian prayer, it serves also to meet the various needs and life-situations of those who turn to the Lord in prayer. Apart from morning and evening prayers, certain forms of prayer are to be expressly encouraged, following the indications of the Synod Fathers, such as reading and meditating on the word of God, preparation for the reception of the sacraments, devotion and consecration to the Sacred Heart of Jesus, the various forms of veneration of the Blessed Virgin Mary, grace before and after meals, and observance of popular devotions.

61.3 While respecting the freedom of the children of God, the Church has always proposed certain practices of piety to the faithful with particular solicitude and insistence. Among these should be mentioned the recitation of the rosary: “We now desire, as a continuation of the thought of our Predecessors, to recommend strongly the recitation of the family rosary. . . . There is no doubt that . . . the rosary should be considered as one of the best and most efficacious prayers in common that the Christian family is invited to recite. We like to think, and sincerely hope, that when the family gathering becomes a time of prayer the rosary is a frequent and favored manner of praying.”<sup>155</sup> In this way authentic devotion to Mary, which finds expression in sincere love and generous imitation of the Blessed Virgin’s interior spiritual attitude, constitutes a special instrument for nourishing loving communion in the family and for developing conjugal and family spirituality. For she who is the Mother of Christ and of the Church is in a special way the Mother of Christian families, of domestic Churches.

Prayer and life

62.1 It should never be forgotten that prayer constitutes an essential part of Christian life, understood in its fullness and centrality. Indeed, prayer is an important part of our very humanity: it is “the first expression of man’s inner truth, the first condition for authentic freedom of spirit.”<sup>156</sup>

62.2 Far from being a form of escapism from everyday commitments, prayer constitutes the strongest incentive for the Christian family to assume and comply fully with all its responsibilities as the primary and fundamental cell of human society. Thus the Christian family’s actual participation in the Church’s life and mission is in direct proportion to the fidelity and intensity of the prayer with which it is united with the fruitful vine that is Christ the Lord.<sup>157</sup>

62.3 The fruitfulness of the Christian family in its specific service to human advancement, which of itself cannot but lead to the transformation of the world, derives from its living union with Christ, nourished by the liturgy, by self-oblation and by prayer.<sup>158</sup>

The new commandment of love

63.1 The Church, a prophetic, priestly and kingly people, is endowed with the mission of bringing all human beings to accept the word of God in faith, to celebrate and profess it in the sacraments and in prayer, and to give expression to it in the concrete realities of life in accordance with the gift and new commandment of love.

63.2 The law of Christian life is to be found not in a written code, but in the personal action of the Holy Spirit who inspires and guides the Christian. It is the “law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus”:<sup>159</sup> “God’s love has been poured into our hearts through the Holy Spirit who has been given to us.”<sup>160</sup>

63.3 This is true also for the Christian couple and family. Their guide and rule of life is the Spirit of Jesus poured into their hearts in the celebration of the Sacrament of Matrimony. In continuity with Baptism in water and the Spirit, marriage sets forth anew the evangelical law of love, and with the gift of the Spirit engraves it more profoundly on the hearts of Christian husbands and wives. Their love, purified and saved, is a fruit of the Spirit acting in the hearts of believers and constituting, at the same time, the fundamental commandment of their moral life to be lived in responsible freedom.

63.4 Thus, the Christian family is inspired and guided by the new law of the Spirit and, in intimate communion with the Church, the kingly people, it is called to exercise its “service” of love toward God and toward its fellow human beings. Just as Christ exercises his royal power by serving us,<sup>161</sup> so also the Christian finds the authentic meaning of his participation in the kingship of his Lord in sharing his spirit and practice of service to man. “Christ has communicated this power to his disciples that they might be established in royal freedom and that by self-denial and a holy life they might conquer the reign of sin in themselves (cf. Rom 6:12). Further, he has shared this power so that by serving him in their fellow human beings they might through humility and patience lead their brothers and sisters to that King whom to serve is to reign. For the Lord wishes to spread his Kingdom by means of the laity also, a Kingdom of truth and life, a Kingdom of holiness and grace, a Kingdom of justice, love and peace. In this Kingdom, creation itself will be delivered out of its slavery to corruption and into the freedom of the glory of the children of God (cf. Rom 8:21).”<sup>162</sup>

To discover the image of God in each brother and sister

64.1 Inspired and sustained by the new commandment of love, the Christian family welcomes, respects and serves every human being, considering each one in his or her dignity as a person and as a child of God.

64.2 It should be so especially between husband and wife and within the family, through a daily effort to promote a truly personal community, initiated and fostered by an inner communion of love. This way of life should then be extended to the wider circle of the ecclesial community of which the Christian family is a part. Thanks to love within the family, the Church can and ought to take on a more homelike or family dimension, developing a more human and fraternal style of relationships.

64.3 Love, too, goes beyond our brothers and sisters of the same faith since “everybody is my brother or sister.” In each individual, especially in the poor, the weak, and those who suffer or are unjustly treated, love knows how to discover the face of Christ, and discover a fellow human being to be loved and served.

64.4 In order that the family may serve man in a truly evangelical way, the instructions of the Second Vatican Council must be carefully put into practice: “That the exercise of such charity may rise above any deficiencies in fact and even in appearance, certain fundamentals must be observed. Thus, attention is to be paid to the image of God in which our neighbor has been created, and also to Christ the Lord to whom is really offered whatever is given to a needy person.”<sup>163</sup>

64.5 While building up the Church in love, the Christian family places itself at the service of the human person and the world, really bringing about the “human advancement” whose substance was given in summary form in the Synod’s Message to Families: “Another task for the family is to form persons in love and also to practice love in all its relationships, so that it does not live closed in on itself, but remains open to the community, moved by a sense of justice and concern for others, as well as by a consciousness of its responsibility toward the whole of society.”<sup>164</sup>

The Church accompanies the Christian family on its journey through life

65.1 Like every other living reality, the family too is called upon to develop and grow. After the preparation of engagement and the sacramental celebration of marriage, the couple begin their daily journey toward the progressive actuation of the values and duties of marriage itself.

65.2 In the light of faith and by virtue of hope, the Christian family too shares, in communion with the Church, in the experience of the earthly pilgrimage toward the full revelation and manifestation of the Kingdom of God.

65.3 Therefore, it must be emphasized once more that the pastoral intervention of the Church in support of the family is a matter of urgency. Every effort should be made to strengthen and develop pastoral care for the family, which should be treated as a real matter of priority, in the certainty that future evangelization depends largely on the domestic Church.<sup>165</sup>

65.4 The Church's pastoral concern will not be limited only to the Christian families closest at hand; it will extend its horizons in harmony with the Heart of Christ, and will show itself to be even more lively for families in general and for those families in particular which are in difficult or irregular situations. For all of them the Church will have a word of truth, goodness, understanding, hope and deep sympathy with their sometimes tragic difficulties. To all of them she will offer her disinterested help so that they can come closer to that model of a family which the Creator intended from "the beginning" and which Christ has renewed with his redeeming grace.

65.5 The Church's pastoral action must be progressive, also in the sense that it must follow the family, accompanying it step by step in the different stages of its formation and development.

Preparation for marriage

66.1 More than ever necessary in our times is preparation of young people for marriage and family life. In some countries it is still the families themselves that, according to ancient customs, ensure the passing on to young people of the values concerning married and family life, and they do this through a gradual process of education or initiation. But the changes that have taken place within almost all modern societies demand that not only the family but also society and the Church should be involved in the effort of properly preparing young people for their future responsibilities. Many negative phenomena which are today noted with regret in family life derive from the fact that, in the new situations, young people not only lose sight of the correct hierarchy of values but, since they no longer have certain criteria of behavior, they do not know how to face and deal with the new difficulties. But experience teaches that young people who have been well prepared for family life generally succeed better than others.

66.2 This is even more applicable to Christian marriage, which influences the holiness of large numbers of men and women. The Church must therefore promote better and more intensive programs of marriage preparation, in order to eliminate as far as possible the difficulties that many married couples find themselves in, and even more in order to favor positively the establishing and maturing of successful marriages.

66.3 Marriage preparation has to be seen and put into practice as a gradual and continuous process. It includes three main stages: remote, proximate and immediate preparation.

66.4 Remote preparation begins in early childhood, in that wise family training which leads children to discover themselves as being endowed with a rich and complex psychology and with a particular personality with its own strengths and weaknesses. It is the period when esteem for all authentic human values is instilled, both in interpersonal and in social relationships, with all that this signifies for the formation of character, for the control and right use of one's inclinations, for the manner of regarding and meeting people of the opposite sex, and so on. Also necessary, especially for Christians, is solid spiritual and catechetical formation that will show that marriage is a true vocation and mission, without excluding the possibility of the total gift of self to God in the vocation to the priestly or religious life.

66.5 Upon this basis there will subsequently and gradually be built up the proximate preparation, which – from the suitable age and with adequate catechesis, as in a catechumenal process – involves a more specific preparation for the sacraments, as it were, a rediscovery of them. This renewed catechesis of young people and others preparing for Christian marriage is absolutely necessary in order that the sacrament may be celebrated and lived with the right moral and spiritual dispositions. The religious formation of young people should be integrated, at the right moment and in accordance with the various concrete requirements, with a preparation for life as a couple. This preparation will present marriage as an interpersonal relationship of a man and a woman that has to be continually developed, and it will encourage those concerned to study the nature of conjugal sexuality and responsible parenthood, with the essential medical and biological knowledge connected with it. It will also acquaint those concerned with correct methods for the education of children, and will assist them in gaining the basic requisites for well-ordered family life, such as stable work, sufficient financial resources, sensible administration, notions of housekeeping.

66.6 Finally, one must not overlook preparation for the family apostolate, for fraternal solidarity and collaboration with other families, for active membership in groups, associations, movements and undertakings set up for the human and Christian benefit of the family.

66.7 The immediate preparation for the celebration of the Sacrament of Matrimony should take place in the months and weeks immediately preceding the wedding, so as to give a new meaning, content and form to the so-called premarital enquiry required by canon law. This preparation is not only necessary in every case, but is also more urgently needed for engaged couples that still manifest shortcomings or difficulties in Christian doctrine and practice.

66.8 Among the elements to be instilled in this journey of faith, which is similar to the catechumenate, there must also be a deeper knowledge of the mystery of Christ and the Church, of the meaning of grace and of the responsibility of Christian marriage, as well as preparation for taking an active and conscious part in the rites of the marriage liturgy.

66.9 The Christian family and the whole of the ecclesial community should feel involved in the different phases of the preparation for marriage, which have been described only in their broad outlines. It is to be hoped that the Episcopal Conferences, just as they are concerned with appropriate initiatives to help engaged couples to be more aware of the seriousness of their choice and also to help pastors of souls to make sure of the couples' proper dispositions, so they will also take steps to see that there is issued a Directory for the Pastoral Care of the Family. In this they should lay down, in the first place, the minimum content, duration and method of the "preparation courses," balancing the different aspects – doctrinal, pedagogical, legal and medical – concerning marriage, and structuring them in such a way that those preparing for marriage will not only receive an intellectual training but will also feel a desire to enter actively into the ecclesial community.

66.10 Although one must not underestimate the necessity and obligation of the immediate preparation for marriage – which would happen if dispensations from it were easily given – nevertheless such preparation must always be set forth and put into practice in such a way that omitting it is not an impediment to the celebration of marriage.

Familiaris Consortio

The celebration

67.1 Christian marriage normally requires a liturgical celebration expressing in social and community form the essentially ecclesial and sacramental nature of the conjugal covenant between baptized persons.

67.2 Inasmuch as it is a sacramental action of sanctification, the celebration of marriage – inserted into the liturgy, which is the summit of the Church's action and the source of her sanctifying power<sup>166</sup> – must be per se valid, worthy and fruitful. This opens a wide field for pastoral solicitude, in order that the needs deriving from the nature of the conjugal covenant, elevated into a sacrament, may be fully met, and also in order that the Church's discipline regarding free consent, impediments, the canonical form and the actual rite of the celebration may be faithfully observed. The celebration should be simple and dignified, according to the norms of the competent authorities of the Church. It is also for them – in accordance with concrete circumstances of time and place and in conformity with the norms issued by the Apostolic See<sup>167</sup> – to include in the liturgical celebration such elements proper to each culture which serve to express more clearly the profound human and religious significance of the marriage contract, provided that such elements contain nothing that is not in harmony with Christian faith and morality.

67.3 Inasmuch as it is a sign, the liturgical celebration should be conducted in such a way as to constitute, also in its external reality, a proclamation of the word of God and a profession of faith on the part of the community of believers. Pastoral commitment will be expressed here through the intelligent and careful preparation of the Liturgy of the Word and through the education to faith of those participating in the celebration and, in the first place, the couple being married.

67.4 Inasmuch as it is a sacramental action of the Church, the liturgical celebration of marriage should involve the Christian community, with the full, active and responsible participation of all those present, according to the place and task of each individual: the bride and bridegroom, the priest, the witnesses, the relatives, the friends, the other members of the faithful, all of them members of an assembly that manifests and lives the mystery of Christ and his Church. For the celebration of Christian marriage in the sphere of ancestral cultures or traditions, the principles laid down above should be followed.

Celebration of marriage and evangelization of non-believing baptized persons

68.1 Precisely because in the celebration of the sacrament very special attention must be devoted to the moral and spiritual dispositions of those being married, in particular to their faith, we must here deal with a not infrequent difficulty in which the pastors of the Church can find themselves in the context of our secularized society.

68.2 In fact, the faith of the person asking the Church for marriage can exist in different degrees, and it is the primary duty of pastors to bring about a rediscovery of this faith and to nourish it and bring it to maturity. But pastors must also understand the reasons that lead the Church also to admit to the celebration of marriage those who are imperfectly disposed.

68.3 The Sacrament of Matrimony has this specific element that distinguishes it from all the other sacraments: it is the sacrament of something that was part of the very economy of creation; it is the very conjugal covenant instituted by the Creator “in the beginning.” Therefore the decision of a man and a woman to marry in accordance with this divine plan, that is to say, the decision to commit by their irrevocable conjugal consent their whole lives in indissoluble love and unconditional fidelity, really involves, even if not in a fully conscious way, an attitude of profound obedience to the will of God, an attitude which cannot exist without God’s grace. They have thus already begun what is in a true and proper sense a journey toward salvation, a journey which the celebration of the sacrament and the immediate preparation for it can complement and bring to completion, given the uprightness of their intention.

68.4 On the other hand it is true that in some places engaged couples ask to be married in church for motives which are social rather than genuinely religious. This is not surprising. Marriage, in fact, is not an event that concerns only the persons actually getting married. By its very nature it is also a social matter, committing the couple being married in the eyes of society. And its celebration has always been an occasion of rejoicing that brings together families and friends. It therefore goes without saying that social as well as personal motives enter into the request to be married in church.

68.5 Nevertheless, it must not be forgotten that these engaged couples, by virtue of their Baptism, are already really sharers in Christ’s marriage Covenant with the Church, and that, by their right intention, they have accepted God’s plan regarding marriage and therefore at least implicitly consent to what the Church intends to do when she celebrates marriage. Thus, the fact that motives of a social nature also enter into the request is not enough to justify refusal on the part of pastors. Moreover, as the Second Vatican Council teaches, the sacraments by words and ritual elements nourish and strengthen faith: <sup>168</sup> that faith toward which the married couple are already journeying by reason of the uprightness of their intention, which Christ's grace certainly does not fail to favor and support.

68.6 As for wishing to lay down further criteria for admission to the ecclesial celebration of marriage, criteria that would concern the level of faith of those to be married, this would above all involve grave risks. In the first place, the risk of making unfounded and discriminatory judgments; secondly, the risk of causing doubts about the validity of marriages already celebrated, with grave harm to Christian communities, and new and unjustified anxieties to the consciences of married couples; one would also fall into the danger of calling into question the sacramental nature of many marriages of brethren separated from full communion with the Catholic Church, thus contradicting ecclesial Tradition.

68.7 However, when in spite of all efforts, engaged couples show that they reject explicitly and formally what the Church intends to do when the marriage of baptized persons is celebrated, the pastor of souls cannot admit them to the celebration of marriage. In spite of his reluctance to do so, he has the duty to take note of the situation and to make it clear to those concerned that, in these circumstances, it is not the Church that is placing an obstacle in the way of the celebration that they are asking for, but themselves.

68.8 Once more there appears in all its urgency the need for evangelization and catechesis before and after marriage, effected by the whole Christian community, so that every man and woman that gets married celebrates the Sacrament of Matrimony not only validly but also fruitfully.

Pastoral care after marriage

69.1 The pastoral care of the regularly established family signifies, in practice, the commitment of all the members of the local ecclesial community to helping the couple to discover and live their new vocation and mission. In order that the family may be ever more a true community of love, it is necessary that all its members should be helped and trained in their responsibilities as they face the new problems that arise, in mutual service, and in active sharing in family life.

69.2 This holds true especially for young families, which, finding themselves in a context of new values and responsibilities, are more vulnerable, especially in the first years of marriage, to possible difficulties, such as those created by adaptation to life together or by the birth of children. Young married couples should learn to accept willingly, and make good use of, the discreet, tactful and generous help offered by other couples that already have more experience of married and family life. Thus, within the ecclesial community – the great family made up of Christian families – there will take place a mutual exchange of presence and help among all the families, each one putting at the service of others its own experience of life, as well as the gifts of faith and grace. Animated by a true apostolic spirit, this assistance from family to family will constitute one of the simplest, most effective and most accessible means for transmitting from one to another those Christian values which are both the starting point and goal of all pastoral care. Thus young families will not limit themselves merely to receiving, but in their turn, having been helped in this way, will become a source of enrichment for other longer established families, through their witness of life and practical contribution.

69.3 In her pastoral care of young families, the Church must also pay special attention to helping them to live married love responsibly in relationship with its demands of communion and service to life. She must likewise help them to harmonize the intimacy of home life with the generous shared work of building up the Church and society. When children are born and the married couple becomes a family in the full and specific sense, the Church will still remain close to the parents in order that they may accept their children and love them as a gift received from the Lord of life, and joyfully accept the task of serving them in their human and Christian growth.

2. Structures of Family Pastoral Care

Pastoral activity is always the dynamic expression of the reality of the Church, committed to her mission of salvation. Family pastoral care too – which is a particular and specific form of pastoral activity – has as its operative principle and responsible agent the Church herself, through her structures and workers.

The ecclesial community and in particular the parish

70.1 The Church, which is at the same time a saved and a saving community, has to be considered here under two aspects: as universal and particular. The second aspect is expressed and actuated in the diocesan community, which is pastorally divided up into lesser communities, of which the parish is of special importance.

70.2 Communion with the universal Church does not hinder but rather guarantees and promotes the substance and originality of the various particular Churches. These latter remain the more immediate and more effective subjects of operation for putting the pastoral care of the family into practice. In this sense every local Church and, in more particular terms, every parochial community, must become more vividly aware of the grace and responsibility that it receives from the Lord in order that it may promote the pastoral care of the family. No plan for organized pastoral work, at any level, must ever fail to take into consideration the pastoral care of the family.

70.3 Also to be seen in the light of this responsibility is the importance of the proper preparation of all those who will be more specifically engaged in this kind of apostolate. Priests and men and women Religious, from the time of their formation, should be oriented and trained progressively and thoroughly for the various tasks. Among the various initiatives I am pleased to emphasize the recent establishment in Rome, at the Pontifical Lateran University, of a Higher Institute for the study of the problems of the family. Institutes of this kind have also been set up in some Dioceses. Bishops should see to it that as many priests as possible attend specialized courses there before taking on parish responsibilities. Elsewhere, formation courses are periodically held at Higher Institutes of theological and pastoral studies. Such initiatives should be encouraged, sustained, increased in number, and of course are also open to lay people who intend to use their professional skills (medical, legal, psychological, social or educational) to help the family.

The family

71.1 But it is especially necessary to recognize the unique place that, in this field, belongs to the mission of married couples and Christian families, by virtue of the grace received in the sacrament. This mission must be placed at the service of the building up of the Church, the establishing of the Kingdom of God in history. This is demanded as an act of docile obedience to Christ the Lord. For it is he who, by virtue of the fact that marriage of baptized persons has been raised to a sacrament, confers upon Christian married couples a special mission as apostles, sending them as workers into his vineyard, and, in a very special way, into this field of the family.

71.2 In this activity, married couples act in communion and collaboration with the other members of the Church, who also work for the family, contributing their own gifts and ministries. This apostolate will be exercised in the first place within the families of those concerned, through the witness of a life lived in conformity with the divine law in all its aspects, through the Christian formation of the children, through helping them to mature in faith, through education to chastity, through preparation for life, through vigilance in protecting them from the ideological and moral dangers with which they are often threatened, through their gradual and responsible inclusion in the ecclesial community and the civil community, through help and advice in choosing a vocation, through mutual help among family members for human and Christian growth together, and so on. The apostolate of the family will also become wider through works of spiritual and material charity toward other families, especially those most in need of help and support, toward the poor, the sick, the old, the handicapped, orphans, widows, spouses that have been abandoned, unmarried mothers and mothers-to-be in difficult situations who are tempted to have recourse to abortion, and so on.

Associations of families for families

72.1 Still within the Church, which is the subject responsible for the pastoral care of the family, mention should be made of the various groupings of members of the faithful in which the mystery of Christ's Church is in some measure manifested and lived. One should therefore recognize and make good use of – each one in relationship to its own characteristics, purposes, effectiveness and methods – the different ecclesial communities, the various groups and the numerous movements engaged in various ways, for different reasons and at different levels, in the pastoral care of the family.

72.2 For this reason the Synod expressly recognized the useful contribution made by such associations of spirituality, formation and apostolate. It will be their task to foster among the faithful a lively sense of solidarity, to favor a manner of living inspired by the Gospel and by the faith of the Church, to form consciences according to Christian values and not according to the standards of public opinion, to stimulate people to perform works of charity for one another and for others with a spirit of openness which will make Christian families into a true source of light and a wholesome leaven for other families.

72.3 It is similarly desirable that, with a lively sense of the common good, Christian families should become actively engaged, at every level, in other non-ecclesial associations as well. Some of these associations work for the preservation, transmission and protection of the wholesome ethical and cultural values of each people, the development of the human person, the medical, juridical and social protection of mothers and young children, the just advancement of women and the struggle against all that is detrimental to their dignity, the increase of mutual solidarity, knowledge of the problems connected with the responsible regulation of fertility in accordance with natural methods that are in conformity with human dignity and the teaching of the Church. Other associations work for the building of a more just and human world; for the promotion of just laws favoring the right social order with full respect for the dignity and every legitimate freedom of the individual and the family, on both the national and international level; for collaboration with the school and with the other institutions that complete the education of children, and so forth.

Familiaris Consortio

3. Agents of the Pastoral Care of the Family

As well as the family, which is the object but above all the subject of pastoral care of the family, one must also mention the other main agents in this particular sector.

Familiaris Consortio

Bishops and priests

73.1 The person principally responsible in the Diocese for the pastoral care of the family is the Bishop. As father and Pastor, he must exercise particular solicitude in this clearly priority sector of pastoral care. He must devote to it personal interest, care, time, personnel and resources, but above all personal support for the families and for all those who, in the various diocesan structures, assist him in the pastoral care of the family. It will be his particular care to make the Diocese ever more truly a “diocesan family,” a model and source of hope for the many families that belong to it. The setting up of the Pontifical Council for the Family is to be seen in this light: to be a sign of the importance that I attribute to pastoral care for the family in the world, and at the same time to be an effective instrument for aiding and promoting it at every level.

73.2 The Bishops avail themselves especially of the priests, whose task – as the Synod expressly emphasized – constitutes an essential part of the Church’s ministry regarding marriage and the family. The same is true of deacons to whose care this sector of pastoral work may be entrusted.

73.3 Their responsibility extends not only to moral and liturgical matters but to personal and social matters as well. They must support the family in its difficulties and sufferings, caring for its members and helping them to see their lives in the light of the Gospel. It is not superfluous to note that from this mission, if it is exercised with due discernment and with a truly apostolic spirit, the minister of the Church draws fresh encouragement and spiritual energy for his own vocation too and for the exercise of his ministry.

73.4 Priests and deacons, when they have received timely and serious preparation for this apostolate, must unceasingly act toward families as fathers, brothers, pastors and teachers, assisting them with the means of grace and enlightening them with the light of truth. Their teaching and advice must therefore always be in full harmony with the authentic Magisterium of the Church, in such a way as to help the People of God to gain a correct sense of the faith, to be subsequently applied to practical life. Such fidelity to the Magisterium will also enable priests to make every effort to be united in their judgments, in order to avoid troubling the consciences of the faithful.

73.5 In the Church, the Pastors and the laity share in the prophetic mission of Christ: the laity do so by witnessing to the faith by their words and by their Christian lives; the Pastors do so by distinguishing in that witness what is the expression of genuine faith from what is less in harmony with the light of faith; the family, as a Christian community, does so through its special sharing and witness of faith. Thus there begins a dialogue also between pastors and families.

Theologians and experts in family matters can be of great help in this dialogue, by explaining exactly the content of the Church's Magisterium and the content of the experience of family life. In this way the teaching of the Magisterium becomes better understood and the way is opened to its progressive development. But it is useful to recall that the proximate and obligatory norm in the teaching of the faith – also concerning family matters – belongs to the hierarchical Magisterium. Clearly defined relationships between theologians, experts in family matters and the Magisterium are of no little assistance for the correct understanding of the faith and for promoting – within the boundaries of the faith – legitimate pluralism.

Men and women Religious

74.1 The contribution that can be made to the apostolate of the family by men and women Religious and consecrated persons in general finds its primary, fundamental and original expression precisely in their consecration to God. By reason of this consecration, “for all Christ’s faithful Religious recall that wonderful marriage made by God, which will be fully manifested in the future age, and in which the Church has Christ for her only Spouse,”<sup>169</sup> and they are witnesses to that universal charity which, through chastity embraced for the Kingdom of heaven, makes them ever more available to dedicate themselves generously to the service of God and to the works of the apostolate.

74.2 Hence the possibility for men and women Religious, and members of Secular Institutes and other institutes of perfection, either individually or in groups, to develop their service to families, with particular solicitude for children, especially if they are abandoned, unwanted, orphaned, poor or handicapped. They can also visit families and look after the sick; they can foster relationships of respect and charity toward one-parent families or families that are in difficulties or are separated; they can offer their own work of teaching and counseling in the preparation of young people for marriage, and in helping couples toward truly responsible parenthood; they can open their own houses for simple and cordial hospitality, so that families can find there the sense of God’s presence and gain a taste for prayer and recollection, and see the practical examples of lives lived in charity and fraternal joy as members of the larger family of God.

74.3 I would like to add a most pressing exhortation to the heads of institutes of consecrated life to consider – always with substantial respect for the proper and original charism of each one – the apostolate of the family as one of the priority tasks, rendered even more urgent by the present state of the world.

Lay specialists

75 Considerable help can be given to families by lay specialists (doctors, lawyers, psychologists, social workers, consultants, etc.) who either as individuals or as members of various associations and undertakings offer their contribution of enlightenment, advice, orientation and support. To these people one can well apply the exhortations that I had the occasion to address to the Confederation of Family Advisory Bureaus of Christian Inspiration: “Yours is a commitment that well deserves the title of mission, so noble are the aims that it pursues, and so determining, for the good of society and the Christian community itself, are the results that derive from it. . . . All that you succeed in doing to support the family is destined to have an effectiveness that goes beyond its own sphere and reaches other people too and has an effect on society. The future of the world and of the Church passes through the family.”<sup>170</sup>

Recipients and agents of social communications

76.1 This very important category in modern life deserves a word of its own. It is well known that the means of social communication “affect, and often profoundly, the minds of those who use them, under the affective and intellectual aspect and also under the moral and religious aspect,” especially in the case of young people.<sup>171</sup> They can thus exercise a beneficial influence on the life and habits of the family and on the education of children, but at the same time they also conceal “snares and dangers that cannot be ignored.”<sup>172</sup> They could also become a vehicle – sometimes cleverly and systematically manipulated, as unfortunately happens in various countries of the world – for divisive ideologies and distorted ways of looking at life, the family, religion and morality, attitudes that lack respect for man’s true dignity and destiny.

76.2 This danger is all the more real inasmuch as “the modern life style – especially in the more industrialized nations – all too often causes families to abandon their responsibility to educate their children. Evasion of this duty is made easy for them by the presence of television and certain publications in the home, and in this way they keep their children’s time and energies occupied.”<sup>173</sup> Hence “the duty . . . to protect the young from the forms of aggression they are subjected to by the mass media,” and to ensure that the use of the media in the family is carefully regulated. Families should also take care to seek for their children other forms of entertainment that are more wholesome, useful and physically, morally and spiritually formative, “to develop and use to advantage the free time of the young and direct their energies.”<sup>174</sup>

76.3 Furthermore, because the means of social communication, like the school and the environment, often have a notable influence on the formation of children, parents as recipients must actively ensure the moderate, critical, watchful and prudent use of the media, by discovering what effect they have on their children and by controlling the use of the media in such a way as to “train the conscience of their children to express calm and objective judgments, which will then guide them in the choice or rejection of programs available.”<sup>175</sup>

76.4 With equal commitment parents will endeavor to influence the selection and the preparation of the programs themselves, by keeping in contact – through suitable initiatives – with those in charge of the various phases of production and transmission. In this way they will ensure that the fundamental human values that form part of the true good of society are not ignored or deliberately attacked. Rather they will ensure the broadcasting of programs that present in the right light family problems and their proper solution. In this regard my venerated Predecessor Paul VI wrote: “Producers must know and respect the needs of the family, and this sometimes presupposes in them true courage, and always a high sense of responsibility. In fact they are expected to avoid anything that could harm the family in its existence, its stability, its balance and its happiness. Every attack on the fundamental value of the family – meaning eroticism or violence, the defense of divorce or of antisocial attitudes among young people – is an attack on the true good of man.”<sup>176</sup>

76.5 I myself, on a similar occasion, pointed out that families “to a considerable extent need to be able to count on the good will, integrity and sense of responsibility of the media professionals – publishers, writers, producers, directors, playwrights, newsmen, commentators and actors.”<sup>177</sup> It is therefore also the duty of the Church to continue to devote every care to these categories, at the same time encouraging and supporting Catholics who feel the call and have the necessary talents, to take up this sensitive type of work.

4. Pastoral Care of the Family in Difficult Cases

Familiaris Consortio

Particular circumstances

77.1 An even more generous, intelligent and prudent pastoral commitment, modeled on the Good Shepherd, is called for in the case of families which, often independently of their own wishes and through pressures of various other kinds, find themselves faced by situations which are objectively difficult.

77.2 In this regard it is necessary to call special attention to certain particular groups which are more in need not only of assistance but also of more incisive action upon public opinion and especially upon cultural, economic and juridical structures, in order that the profound causes of their needs may be eliminated as far as possible.

77.3 Such for example are the families of migrant workers; the families of those obliged to be away for long periods, such as members of the armed forces, sailors and all kinds of itinerant people; the families of those in prison, of refugees and exiles; the families in big cities living, practically speaking, as outcasts; families with no home; incomplete or single-parent families; families with children that are handicapped or addicted to drugs; the families of alcoholics; families that have been uprooted from their cultural and social environment or are in danger of losing it; families discriminated against for political or other reasons; families that are ideologically divided; families that are unable to make ready contact with the parish; families experiencing violence or unjust treatment because of their faith; teenage married couples; the elderly, who are often obliged to live alone with inadequate means of subsistence.

77.4 The families of migrants, especially in the case of manual workers and farm workers, should be able to find a homeland everywhere in the Church. This is a task stemming from the nature of the Church, as being the sign of unity in diversity. As far as possible these people should be looked after by priests of their own rite, culture and language. It is also the Church's task to appeal to the public conscience and to all those in authority in social, economic and political life, in order that workers may find employment in their own regions and homelands, that they may receive just wages, that their families may be reunited as soon as possible, be respected in their cultural identity and treated on an equal footing with others, and that their children may be given the chance to learn a trade and exercise it, as also the chance to own the land needed for working and living.

77.5 A difficult problem is that of the family which is ideologically divided. In these cases particular pastoral care is needed. In the first place it is necessary to maintain tactful personal contact with such families. The believing members must be strengthened in their faith and supported in their Christian lives. Although the party faithful to Catholicism cannot give way, dialogue with the other party must always be kept alive. Love and respect must be freely shown, in the firm hope that unity will be maintained. Much also depends on the relationship between parents and children. Moreover, ideologies which are alien to the faith can stimulate the believing members of the family to grow in faith and in the witness of love.

77.6 Other difficult circumstances in which the family needs the help of the ecclesial community and its pastors are: the children's adolescence, which can be disturbed, rebellious and sometimes stormy; the children's marriage, which takes them away from their family; lack of understanding or lack of love on the part of those held most dear; abandonment by one of the spouses, or his or her death, which brings the painful experience of widowhood, or the death of a family member, which breaks up and deeply transforms the original family nucleus.

77.7 Similarly, the Church cannot ignore the time of old age, with all its positive and negative aspects. In old age married love, which has been increasingly purified and ennobled by long and unbroken fidelity, can be deepened. There is the opportunity of offering to others, in a new form, the kindness and the wisdom gathered over the years, and what energies remain. But there is also the burden of loneliness, more often psychological and emotional rather than physical, which results from abandonment or neglect on the part of children and relations. There is also suffering caused by ill-health, by the gradual loss of strength, by the humiliation of having to depend on others, by the sorrow of feeling that one is perhaps a burden to one's loved ones, and by the approach of the end of life. These are the circumstances in which, as the Synod Fathers suggested, it is easier to help people understand and live the lofty aspects of the spirituality of marriage and the family, aspects which take their inspiration from the value of Christ's Cross and Resurrection, the source of sanctification and profound happiness in daily life, in the light of the great eschatological realities of eternal life.

77.8 In all these different situations let prayer, the source of light and strength and the nourishment of Christian hope, never be neglected.

Familiaris Consortio

Mixed marriages

78.1 The growing number of mixed marriages between Catholics and other baptized persons also calls for special pastoral attention in the light of the directives and norms contained in the most recent documents of the Holy See and in those drawn up by the Episcopal Conferences, in order to permit their practical application to the various situations.

78.2 Couples living in a mixed marriage have special needs, which can be put under three main headings.

78.3 In the first place, attention must be paid to the obligations that faith imposes on the Catholic party with regard to the free exercise of the faith and the consequent obligation to ensure, as far as is possible, the Baptism and upbringing of the children in the Catholic faith.178

78.4 There must be borne in mind the particular difficulties inherent in the relationships between husband and wife with regard to respect for religious freedom: this freedom could be violated either by undue pressure to make the partner change his or her beliefs, or by placing obstacles in the way of the free manifestation of these beliefs by religious practice.

78.5 With regard to the liturgical and canonical form of marriage, Ordinaries can make wide use of their faculties to meet various necessities.

78.6 In dealing with these special needs, the following points should be kept in mind:

- In the appropriate preparation for this type of marriage, every reasonable effort must be made to ensure a proper understanding of Catholic teaching on the qualities and obligations of marriage, and also to ensure that the pressures and obstacles mentioned above will not occur.

- It is of the greatest importance that, through the support of the community, the Catholic party should be strengthened in faith and positively helped to mature in understanding and practicing that faith, so as to become a credible witness within the family through his or her own life and through the quality of love shown to the other spouse and the children.

78.7 Marriages between Catholics and other baptized persons have their own particular nature, but they contain numerous elements that could well be made good use of and developed, both for their intrinsic value and for the contribution that they can make to the ecumenical movement. This is particularly true when both parties are faithful to their religious duties. Their common Baptism and the dynamism of grace provide the spouses in these marriages with the basis and motivation for expressing their unity in the sphere of moral and spiritual values.

78.8 For this purpose, and also in order to highlight the ecumenical importance of mixed marriages which are fully lived in the faith of the two Christian spouses, an effort should be made to establish cordial cooperation between the Catholic and the non-Catholic ministers from the time that preparations begin for the marriage and the wedding ceremony, even though this does not always prove easy.

78.9 With regard to the sharing of the non-Catholic party in Eucharistic Communion, the norms issued by the Secretariat for Promoting Christian Unity should be followed.<sup>179</sup>

78.10 Today in many parts of the world marriages between Catholics and non-baptized persons are growing in numbers. In many such marriages the non-baptized partner professes another religion, and his beliefs are to be treated with respect, in accordance with the principles set out in the Second Vatican Council's Declaration Nostra Aetate on relations with non-Christian religions. But in many other such marriages, particularly in secularized societies, the non-baptized person professes no religion at all. In these marriages there is a need for Episcopal Conferences and for individual Bishops to ensure that there are proper pastoral safeguards for the faith of the Catholic partner and for the free exercise of his faith, above all in regard to his duty to do all in his power to ensure the Catholic Baptism and education of the children of the marriage. Likewise the Catholic must be assisted in every possible way to offer within his family a genuine witness to the Catholic faith and to Catholic life.

Pastoral action in certain irregular situations

79 In its solicitude to protect the family in all its dimensions, not only the religious one, the Synod of Bishops did not fail to take into careful consideration certain situations which are irregular in a religious sense and often in the civil sense too. Such situations, as a result of today's rapid cultural changes, are unfortunately becoming widespread also among Catholics with no little damage to the very institution of the family and to society, of which the family constitutes the basic cell.

a) TRIAL MARRIAGES

80.1 A first example of an irregular situation is provided by what are called “trial marriages,” which many people today would like to justify by attributing a certain value to them. But human reason leads one to see that they are unacceptable, by showing the unconvincing nature of carrying out an “experiment” with human beings, whose dignity demands that they should be always and solely the term of a self-giving love without limitations of time or of any other circumstance.

80.2 The Church, for her part, cannot admit such a kind of union, for further and original reasons which derive from faith. For, in the first place, the gift of the body in the sexual relationship is a real symbol of the giving of the whole person: such a giving, moreover, in the present state of things cannot take place with full truth without the concourse of the love of charity, given by Christ. In the second place, marriage between two baptized persons is a real symbol of the union of Christ and the Church, which is not a temporary or “trial” union but one which is eternally faithful. Therefore between two baptized persons there can exist only an indissoluble marriage.

80.3 Such a situation cannot usually be overcome unless the human person, from childhood, with the help of Christ’s grace and without fear, has been trained to dominate concupiscence from the beginning and to establish relationships of genuine love with other people. This cannot be secured without a true education in genuine love and in the right use of sexuality, such as to introduce the human person in every aspect, and therefore the bodily aspect too, into the fullness of the mystery of Christ.

80.4 It will be very useful to investigate the causes of this phenomenon, including its psychological and sociological aspect, in order to find the proper remedy.

b) DE FACTO FREE UNIONS

81.1 This means unions without any publicly recognized institutional bond, either civil or religious. This phenomenon, which is becoming ever more frequent, cannot fail to concern pastors of souls, also because it may be based on widely varying factors, the consequences of which may perhaps be containable by suitable action.

81.2 Some people consider themselves almost forced into a free union by difficult economic, cultural or religious situations, on the grounds that, if they contracted a regular marriage, they would be exposed to some form of harm, would lose economic advantages, would be discriminated against, etc. In other cases, however, one encounters people who scorn, rebel against or reject society, the institution of the family and the social and political order, or who are solely seeking pleasure. Then there are those who are driven to such situations by extreme ignorance or poverty, sometimes by a conditioning due to situations of real injustice, or by a certain psychological immaturity that makes them uncertain or afraid to enter into a stable and definitive union. In some countries, traditional customs presume that the true and proper marriage will take place only after a period of cohabitation and the birth of the first child.

81.3 Each of these elements presents the Church with arduous pastoral problems, by reason of the serious consequences deriving from them, both religious and moral (the loss of the religious sense of marriage seen in the light of the Covenant of God with his people; deprivation of the grace of the sacrament; grave scandal), and also social consequences (the destruction of the concept of the family; the weakening of the sense of fidelity, also toward society; possible psychological damage to the children; the strengthening of selfishness).

81.4 The pastors and the ecclesial community should take care to become acquainted with such situations and their actual causes, case by case. They should make tactful and respectful contact with the couples concerned, and enlighten them patiently, correct them charitably and show them the witness of Christian family life, in such a way as to smooth the path for them to regularize their situation. But above all there must be a campaign of prevention, by fostering the sense of fidelity in the whole moral and religious training of the young, instructing them concerning the conditions and structures that favor such fidelity, without which there is no true freedom; they must be helped to reach spiritual maturity and enabled to understand the rich human and supernatural reality of marriage as a sacrament.

81.5 The People of God should also make approaches to the public authorities, in order that the latter may resist these tendencies which divide society and are harmful to the dignity, security and welfare of the citizens as individuals, and they must try to ensure that public opinion is not led to undervalue the institutional importance of marriage and the family. And since in many regions young people are unable to get married properly because of extreme poverty deriving from unjust or inadequate social and economic structures, society and the public authorities should favor legitimate marriage by means of a series of social and political actions which will guarantee a family wage, by issuing directives ensuring housing fitting for family life and by creating opportunities for work and life.

c) CATHOLICS IN CIVIL MARRIAGES

82.1 There are increasing cases of Catholics who, for ideological or practical reasons, prefer to contract a merely civil marriage, and who reject or at least defer religious marriage. Their situation cannot of course be likened to that of people simply living together without any bond at all, because in the present case there is at least a certain commitment to a properly defined and probably stable state of life, even though the possibility of a future divorce is often present in the minds of those entering a civil marriage. By seeking public recognition of their bond on the part of the State, such couples show that they are ready to accept not only its advantages but also its obligations. Nevertheless, not even this situation is acceptable to the Church.

82.2 The aim of pastoral action will be to make these people understand the need for consistency between their choice of life and the faith that they profess, and to try to do everything possible to induce them to regularize their situation in the light of Christian principles. While treating them with great charity and bringing them into the life of the respective communities, the pastors of the Church will regrettably not be able to admit them to the sacraments.

d) SEPARATED OR DIVORCED PERSONS WHO HAVE NOT REMARRIED

83.1 Various reasons can unfortunately lead to the often irreparable breakdown of valid marriages. These include mutual lack of understanding and the inability to enter into interpersonal relationships. Obviously, separation must be considered as a last resort, after all other reasonable attempts at reconciliation have proved vain.

83.2 Loneliness and other difficulties are often the lot of separated spouses, especially when they are the innocent parties. The ecclesial community must support such people more than ever. It must give them much respect, solidarity, understanding and practical help, so that they can preserve their fidelity even in their difficult situation; and it must help them to cultivate the need to forgive which is inherent in Christian love, and to be ready perhaps to return to their former married life.

83.3 The situation is similar for people who have undergone divorce, but, being well aware that the valid marriage bond is indissoluble, refrain from becoming involved in a new union and devote themselves solely to carrying out their family duties and the responsibilities of Christian life. In such cases their example of fidelity and Christian consistency takes on particular value as a witness before the world and the Church. Here it is even more necessary for the Church to offer continual love and assistance, without there being any obstacle to admission to the sacraments.

e) DIVORCED PERSONS WHO HAVE REMARRIED

84.1 Daily experience unfortunately shows that people who have obtained a divorce usually intend to enter into a new union, obviously not with a Catholic religious ceremony. Since this is an evil that, like the others, is affecting more and more Catholics as well, the problem must be faced with resolution and without delay. The Synod Fathers studied it expressly. The Church, which was set up to lead to salvation all people and especially the baptized, cannot abandon to their own devices those who have been previously bound by sacramental marriage and who have attempted a second marriage. The Church will therefore make untiring efforts to put at their disposal her means of salvation.

84.2 Pastors must know that, for the sake of truth, they are obliged to exercise careful discernment of situations. There is in fact a difference between those who have sincerely tried to save their first marriage and have been unjustly abandoned, and those who through their own grave fault have destroyed a canonically valid marriage. Finally, there are those who have entered into a second union for the sake of the children's upbringing, and who are sometimes subjectively certain in conscience that their previous and irreparably destroyed marriage had never been valid.

84.3 Together with the Synod, I earnestly call upon pastors and the whole community of the faithful to help the divorced, and with solicitous care to make sure that they do not consider themselves as separated from the Church, for as baptized persons they can, and indeed must, share in her life. They should be encouraged to listen to the word of God, to attend the Sacrifice of the Mass, to persevere in prayer, to contribute to works of charity and to community efforts in favor of justice, to bring up their children in the Christian faith, to cultivate the spirit and practice of penance and thus implore, day by day, God's grace. Let the Church pray for them, encourage them and show herself a merciful Mother, and thus sustain them in faith and hope.

84.4 However, the Church reaffirms her practice, which is based upon Sacred Scripture, of not admitting to Eucharistic Communion divorced persons who have remarried. They are unable to be admitted thereto from the fact that their state and condition of life objectively contradict that union of love between Christ and the Church which is signified and effected by the Eucharist. Besides this, there is another special pastoral reason: if these people were admitted to the Eucharist, the faithful would be led into error and confusion regarding the Church's teaching about the indissolubility of marriage.

84.5 Reconciliation in the Sacrament of Penance, which would open the way to the Eucharist, can only be granted to those who, repenting of having broken the sign of the Covenant and of fidelity to Christ, are sincerely ready to undertake a way of life that is no longer in contradiction to the indissolubility of marriage. This means, in practice, that when, for serious reasons, such as for example the children's upbringing, a man and a woman cannot satisfy the obligation to separate, they "take on themselves the duty to live in complete continence, that is, by abstinence from the acts proper to married couples."<sup>180</sup>

84.6 Similarly, the respect due to the Sacrament of Matrimony, to the couples themselves and their families, and also to the community of the faithful, forbids any pastor, for whatever reason or pretext even of a pastoral nature, to perform ceremonies of any kind for divorced people who remarry. Such ceremonies would give the impression of the celebration of a new sacramentally valid marriage, and would thus lead people into error concerning the indissolubility of a validly contracted marriage.

84.7 By acting in this way, the Church professes her own fidelity to Christ and to his truth. At the same time she shows motherly concern for these children of hers, especially those who, through no fault of their own, have been abandoned by their legitimate partner.

84.8 With firm confidence she believes that those who have rejected the Lord's command and are still living in this state will be able to obtain from God the grace of conversion and salvation, provided that they have persevered in prayer, penance and charity.

Those without a family

85.1 I wish to add a further word for a category of people whom, as a result of the actual circumstances in which they are living, and this often not through their own deliberate wish, I consider particularly close to the Heart of Christ and deserving of the affection and active solicitude of the Church and of pastors.

85.2 There exist in the world countless people who unfortunately cannot in any sense claim membership of what could be called in the proper sense a family. Large sections of humanity live in conditions of extreme poverty, in which promiscuity, lack of housing, the irregular nature and instability of relationships and the extreme lack of education make it impossible in practice to speak of a true family. There are others who, for various reasons, have been left alone in the world. And yet for all of these people there exists a “good news of the family.”

85.3 On behalf of those living in extreme poverty, I have already spoken of the urgent need to work courageously in order to find solutions, also at the political level, which will make it possible to help them and to overcome this inhuman condition of degradation.

85.4 It is a task that faces the whole of society but in a special way the authorities, by reason of their position and the responsibilities flowing therefrom, and also families, which must show great understanding and willingness to help.

85.5 For those who have no natural family the doors of the great family which is the Church – the Church which finds concrete expression in the diocesan and the parish family, in ecclesial basic communities and in movements of the apostolate – must be opened even wider. No one is without a family in this world: the Church is a home and family for everyone, especially those who “labor and are heavy laden.”<sup>181</sup>

Conclusion

86.1 At the end of this Apostolic Exhortation my thoughts turn with earnest solicitude:

to you, married couples, to you, fathers and mothers of families;

to you, young men and women, the future and the hope of the Church and the world, destined to be the dynamic central nucleus of the family in the approaching third millennium;

to you, venerable and dear Brothers in the Episcopate and in the priesthood, beloved sons and daughters in the religious life, souls consecrated to the Lord, who bear witness before married couples to the ultimate reality of the love of God;

to you, upright men and women, who for any reason whatever give thought to the fate of the family.

86.2 The future of humanity passes by way of the family.

86.3 It is therefore indispensable and urgent that every person of good will should endeavor to save and foster the values and requirements of the family.

86.4 I feel that I must ask for a particular effort in this field from the sons and daughters of the Church. Faith gives them full knowledge of God's wonderful plan: they therefore have an extra reason for caring for the reality that is the family in this time of trial and of grace.

86.5 They must show the family special love. This is an injunction that calls for concrete action.

86.6 Loving the family means being able to appreciate its values and capabilities, fostering them always. Loving the family means identifying the dangers and the evils that menace it, in order to overcome them. Loving the family means endeavoring to create for it an environment favorable for its development. The modern Christian family is often tempted to be discouraged and is distressed at the growth of its difficulties; it is an eminent form of love to give it back its reasons for confidence in itself, in the riches that it possesses by nature and grace, and in the mission that God has entrusted to it. "Yes indeed, the families of today must be called back to their original position. They must follow Christ." 182

86.7 Christians also have the mission of proclaiming with joy and conviction the Good News about the family, for the family absolutely needs to hear ever anew and to understand ever more deeply the authentic words that reveal its identity, its inner resources and the importance of its mission in the city of God and in that of man.

86.8 The Church knows the path by which the family can reach the heart of the deepest truth about itself. The Church has learned this path at the school of Christ and the school of history interpreted in the light of the Spirit. She does not impose it but she feels an urgent need to propose it to everyone without fear and indeed with great confidence and hope, although she knows that the Good News includes the subject of the Cross. But it is through the Cross that the family can attain the fullness of its being and the perfection of its love.

86.9 Finally, I wish to call on all Christians to collaborate cordially and courageously with all people of good will who are serving the family in accordance with their responsibilities. The individuals and groups, movements and associations in the Church which devote themselves to the family's welfare, acting in the Church's name and under her inspiration, often find themselves side by side with other individuals and institutions working for the same ideal. With faithfulness to the values of the Gospel and of the human person and with respect for lawful pluralism in initiatives, this collaboration can favor a more rapid and integral advancement of the family.

86.10 And now, at the end of my pastoral message, which is intended to draw everyone's attention to the demanding yet fascinating roles of the Christian family, I wish to invoke the protection of the Holy Family of Nazareth.

86.11 Through God's mysterious design, it was in that family that the Son of God spent long years of a hidden life. It is therefore the prototype and example for all Christian families. It was unique in the world. Its life was passed in anonymity and silence in a little town in Palestine. It underwent trials of poverty, persecution and exile. It glorified God in an incomparably exalted and pure way. And it will not fail to help Christian families – indeed, all the families in the world – to be faithful to their day-to-day duties, to bear the cares and tribulations of life, to be open and generous to the needs of others, and to fulfill with joy the plan of God in their regard.

86.12 Saint Joseph was “a just man,” a tireless worker, the upright guardian of those entrusted to his care. May he always guard, protect and enlighten families.

86.13 May the Virgin Mary, who is the Mother of the Church, also be the Mother of “the Church of the home.” Thanks to her motherly aid, may each Christian family really become a “little Church” in which the mystery of the Church of Christ is mirrored and given new life. May she, the Handmaid of the Lord, be an example of humble and generous acceptance of the will of God. May she, the Sorrowful Mother at the foot of the Cross, comfort the sufferings and dry the tears of those in distress because of the difficulties of their families.

86.14 May Christ the Lord, the Universal King, the King of Families, be present in every Christian home as he was at Cana, bestowing light, joy, serenity and strength. On the solemn day dedicated to his kingship I beg of him that every family may generously make its own contribution to the coming of his Kingdom in the world – “a Kingdom of truth and life, a Kingdom of holiness and grace, a Kingdom of justice, love, and peace,”<sup>183</sup> toward which history is journeying.

86.15 I entrust each family to him, to Mary, and to Joseph. To their hands and their hearts I offer this Exhortation: may it be they who present it to you, venerable Brothers and beloved sons and daughters, and may it be they who open your hearts to the light that the Gospel sheds on every family!

86.16 I assure you all of my constant prayers and I cordially impart the Apostolic Blessing to each and every one of you, in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit.

Given in Rome, at Saint Peter’s, on November 22, the Solemnity of Our Lord Jesus Christ, Universal King, in the year 1981, the fourth of my Pontificate.

Editor's Introduction

“Repent, and believe in the Gospel” (Mk 1:15). In the opening paragraph of his Reconciliatio et Paenitentia, Pope John Paul II cites Jesus’ words and invites all people to “accept the good news of love, of adoption as children of God and hence of brotherhood” (§1.1). The Pope’s third post-synodal apostolic exhortation, published on December 2, 1984, treats “reconciliation and penance in the mission of the Church today,” the theme discussed at the Sixth Ordinary General Assembly of the Synod of Bishops held in 1983. In this document the Holy Father continues his teaching on the mystery of Redemption, presenting Jesus as the Reconciler of a shattered world. He urges the Church and the world to “discover and travel the path of penance, the only path that can lead it to full reconciliation” (§35.7).

The Pope deals with the theme of reconciliation and penance so as to revive in the Church a deeper awareness of the mission proclaimed by the Apostle Paul: “God . . . through Christ reconciled us to himself and gave us the ministry of reconciliation. . . . We beseech you on behalf of Christ, be reconciled to God” (2 Cor 5:18, 20). Christianity is a religion of reconciliation. It liberates humanity from the chains of sin and, beginning in each human heart, leads to the renewal of society. Already in his second encyclical, Dives in Misericordia (1980), the Holy Father turned his attention to conversion as fundamental to Christian existence. In Reconciliatio et Paenitentia, John Paul admits that he took up his subject following “an interior impulse which . . . was obeying both an inspiration from on high and the appeals of humanity” (§4.3). As well as establishing that the topic of the 1983 Synod of Bishops would be reconciliation and penance, he also decided that 1983 would be celebrated as a Jubilee Year of the Redemption. Even though his decision to commemorate the 1,950th anniversary of Christ’s saving Death and Resurrection by a special Holy Year emerged after choosing the Synod’s theme, the two initiatives complete each other. Both suited the Pope’s desire to foster among people a deeper sense of sin, a greater acceptance of the fruits of the Redemption, and a renewal in the practice of sacramental Penance.

The deep-seated alienation which spawns countless divisions in the world greatly troubles John Paul II. The world needs reconciliation and longs for it. So does the Church. The Pope endorses Pius XII’s observation that “the sin of the century is the loss of the sense of sin” (§18.3). In contemporary culture this situation is accompanied by a loss of the sense of God and an obscuring of the moral conscience. In the Church, John Paul is concerned about trends which minimize the personal nature of sin, misinterpret social sin, disregard the distinction between mortal and venial sin, and propose erroneous views of “grave” sin and the fundamental option. Also in the background are decisive pastoral problems: dissent from the Church’s moral teaching, the need for a revitalized penitential discipline, the decline in the practice of confession, the loss of zeal by many priests for hearing confessions, the unauthorized use of general absolution. Each of these finds an echo in Reconciliatio et Paenitentia.

More than in his previous two post-synodal apostolic exhortations, John Paul explicitly recalls the contribution which the Synod Fathers made to its composition. While unquestionably a papal document – “a serious and welcome duty of my ministry” (§4.12) – Reconciliatio et Paenitentia depends heavily on the Synod’s input. The Pope says that “the contents of these pages come from the Synod: from its remote and immediate preparation, from the Instrumentum Laboris, from the interventions in the Synod Hall and the circuli minores, and especially from the sixty-three propositions” (§4.13). He specifically acknowledges the influential role played by the Council of the General Secretariat of the Synod. It digested the Synod’s documentation and then suggested to him “the lines considered most suitable for the preparation of the present document” (§4.13). In several instances John Paul invokes the Fathers’ authority to explain or buttress his position on specific issues: for example, the distinction between mortal and venial sin (§17.12), the existence of intrinsically evil acts (§17.12), practical pastoral action in favor of penance and reconciliation (§23.7) and on catechesis and confession as the Church’s principal means of promoting them (§26.1), the importance of priests’ hearing confessions (§29.6), and general absolution (§33.2). This reliance of Peter’s Successor on the Synod of Bishops shows the extent to which Reconciliatio et Paenitentia is the result of a truly collegial reflection. In this document he assumes the role of being the spokesman for his brother Bishops.

Despite the close collaboration of others, the post-synodal apostolic exhortation still bears the unmistakable imprint of John Paul’s particular interests in the theme: concern for the deep-seated divisions in the world and in the Church, insistence on the personal nature of reconciliation and sacramental Penance, encouragement of priests to be zealous confessors, readiness to implement the Second Vatican Council’s directives on Penance in light of the Church’s broader Tradition, especially as expressed at the Council of Trent (1545-1563), and conviction that only God can satisfy man’s desire for reconciliation. The exhortation’s language seems less vivid and passionate than that of his encyclicals – a fact probably due to the numerous authors who lent a hand to its composition. As is now customary, the Holy Father speaks in the first person on various occasions, especially when confirming a synodal recommendation.

In Reconciliatio et Paenitentia, John Paul cites extensively from the conciliar and papal Magisterium, especially from Vatican II's Gaudium et Spes and Lumen Gentium. But he also frequently refers to the chapters and canons from the Council of Trent's Decree on Penance. Another important source of the Pope's thought is the Ordo Paenitentiae, or Rite of Penance. Paul VI promulgated this document in 1973 to reform the ritual of the Sacrament of Reconciliation in light of the Fathers' request at Vatican II. The new Rite, John Paul says, "made its own the whole of the teaching brought together by the Council of Trent . . . in order to translate it faithfully into terms more in keeping with the context of our own time" (§30.3).

The numerous references to these various ecclesial sources are, however, less important than his appeals to Scripture. More than half of the document's 207 footnotes refer to the Bible. Noteworthy, too, is the Pope's reliance on the methods and conclusions of contemporary historical-critical method. He uses philology (§21.1, note 68), syntax (§20.1, note 105), and elements of form criticism (§20.1) to explain some important points. The Holy Father also introduces uncharacteristic distinctions such as "Saint Paul's Christology" (§7.2) and "a long sapiential passage drawing from the Exodus tradition" (§29.1). He even cites the authority of biblical scholars to support his views (§§20.1, 20.4). Also innovative, and in keeping with the personal emphasis that he wishes to give to reconciliation and penance, is the place given to great biblical figures. Each one dramatizes a particular aspect of sin, conversion, and reconciliation: Cain (§§15.2, 31.14), David (§§13.2, 23.2, 31.14), the prodigal son (§§5-6, 13.2, 29.6, 31.8, 31.10, 31.14), the merciful father (§§5.2, 5.3, 6.2, 6.3, 10.3, 31.14), and Christ the Reconciler (§§7, 10.6-7, 20, 26.3). Like many other papal documents, Reconciliatio et Paenitentia "actualizes" certain biblical narratives in light of present-day experiences. For instance, in the parable of the prodigal son (Lk 15:11-32) every person is considered to be both the younger and the older son (§§5.3, 6.2). And in the account of the tower of Babel (Gen 1:1-11), the Pope concludes that "the tragedy of humanity today, as indeed of every period in history, consists precisely in its similarity to the experience of Babel" (§13.7).

John Paul, besides writing his exhortation for "the sons and daughters of the Church," envisions a wider audience. He intends it for "all those who, whether they are believers or not, look to the Church with interest and sincerity" (§4.13). Indeed, the Holy Father is convinced that "every institution or organization concerned with serving people and saving them in their fundamental dimensions must closely study reconciliation, in order to grasp more fully its meaning and significance, and in order to draw the necessary practical conclusions" (§4.1). Consequently, "the message and ministry of penance are addressed to all men and women, because all need conversion and reconciliation" (§13.4).

Summary

As well as having an introduction and conclusion, Reconciliatio et Paenitentia has three main chapters, each with several subsections. The introduction (§§1-4) describes the divisions of the modern world, humanity's desire for reconciliation, and the Synod's contribution to the post-synodal apostolic exhortation. In chapter one, "Conversion and Reconciliation: the Church's Task and Commitment" (§§5-12), the Pope affirms that the Church's mission is to work for the conversion of hearts. Chapter two, "The Love That Is Greater Than Sin" (§§13-22), deals with sin as the radical cause of the wounds which mar the relationships of individuals with themselves, God, neighbor, and creation. In light of God's mercy, it also discusses the nature and gravity of sin, and its personal and social dimensions. With a more pastoral eye, John Paul then turns in chapter three, "The Pastoral Ministry of Penance and Reconciliation" (§§23-34), to the means which the Church uses to foster reconciliation. His concluding chapter (§35) contains a final appeal for unity and conversion of heart.

Reconciliatio et Paenitentia

A shattered world yearning for reconciliation

At the outset of his exhortation, the Holy Father sketches the contemporary situation, which portrays “the existence of many deep and painful divisions” (§1.5) in the world and in the Church. He laments the increasingly acute rifts between individuals, between individuals and groups, and between larger groups themselves. Among “the painful social phenomena of our time” (§2.2) he includes the rivalry between blocs of nations, torture, terrorism, the arms race, class division, ideological conflict, economic and political polarization, unfair distribution of the world’s resources and of the assets of civilization, tribalism, discrimination, and the trampling of basic human rights, especially the right to life and to religious freedom. Of equal concern to the Pope are the divisions among Christians and within the Church herself. Not only do Christians lack full communion, but “the Church today is experiencing within herself sporadic divisions among her own members” (§2.3, cf. §§9, 25.8).

Despite this picture of a broken world and wounded Church, John Paul musters his characteristic optimism. The human heart cries out for fulfillment. Beneath the troubled waters he sees “an unmistakable desire among people of good will and true Christians to mend the divisions, to heal the wounds and to reestablish at all levels, an essential unity” (§3.1). The signs of division are accompanied by “the no less eloquent and significant signs of reconciliation” (§4.2). Although the word “reconciliation” may not be used, the desire for it is “without a shadow of doubt a fundamental driving force in our society” (§3.1). If the Church is to heal social and ecclesial divisions, she must discern their cause and apply the necessary remedy. For the Holy Father, reconciliation with God, self, and others can result only if the infected source of division is confronted: “that original wound which is the root of all other wounds: namely, sin” (§3.1).

Parable of reconciliation

The Pope uses the parable of the prodigal son (Lk 15:11-32) to explain the process of conversion and reconciliation. Above all the parable reveals God as a Father “rich in mercy” (Eph 2:4), who is always ready to forgive. Again and again John Paul repeats that “reconciliation is a gift of God, an initiative on his part” (§7.1, cf. §§4.9, 5.4, 6.3, 10.1, 10.4, 31.16). The Church too, then, must ensure that her “mission of reconciliation is the initiative, full of compassionate love and mercy, of that God who is love” (§10.1).

At the same time, the parable reveals man to himself. The Pope points out that each brother, in a different way, distances himself from his father’s love and causes a rift with him. “This prodigal son is man – every human being: bewitched by the temptation to separate himself from his father in order to lead his own independent existence” (§5.3). In his desire to be forgiven, the younger son represents every sinner who recognizes his error and seeks to return to the father whom he has offended, confident that he will be restored to friendship. The older son is also “every human being” (§6.2). His selfishness divides the brothers and in this way represents “the story of the human family” (§6.3). He, too, needs a profound change of heart. The parable of the sinful brothers and the loving father enables the Church to grasp “her mission of working, in imitation of the Lord, for the conversion of hearts and for the reconciliation of people with God and with one another” (§6.4).

Christ and the Church as reconcilers

God's initiative in reconciling us to himself is made concrete in his Son, "Christ the Redeemer, the Reconciler and the Liberator of man from sin in all its forms" (§7.1, cf. §10.4). His Paschal Mystery is the cause of reconciliation. More specifically, the cause of reconciliation is the mystery of the Cross, "the loftiest drama in which Christ perceives and suffers to the greatest possible extent the tragedy of the division of man from God" (§7.7). Its vertical crossbeam symbolizes the fruit of Redemption as reconciliation between God and humanity and its horizontal crossbeam, reconciliation between people. The Cross and Resurrection free people from sin and elevate them to communion with the Trinity.

Because Christ's reconciling work lives on in the Church, she "must strive above all to bring all people to full reconciliation" (§8.4). As his Body and Bride, the Church shares in her Lord's ministry of reconciliation. By means of the Church Christ's redemptive act radiates throughout the world. This ecclesial ministry is carried out first of all by those ordained to be ministers of reconciliation in persona Christi, but also by the whole community of believers. According to John Paul, the Church's central task is "reconciling people: with God, with themselves, with neighbor, with the whole of creation" (§8.5).

Just as the Church cannot evangelize successfully until she is evangelized, so she cannot be a force for reconciliation unless she is first reconciled within herself. If reconciled, she can bear convincing, if silent, witness to reconciliation before the world. The Church is the great sacrament of reconciliation, "that is to say, the sign and means of reconciliation" (§11.1). In the face of divisions among Catholics, the Holy Father recalls that everyone "must try to be united in what is essential for Christian faith and life, in accordance with the ancient maxim: in what is doubtful, freedom; in what is necessary, unity; in all things, charity" (§9.3). John Paul also affirms that the Church must seek the restoration of unity among all Christians, as well as promote the "dialogue of salvation" (§9.5) with all men and women of good will. In every instance authentic reconciliation demands obedience to the truth. "The Church," writes the Pope, "promotes reconciliation in the truth, knowing well that neither reconciliation nor unity is possible outside or in opposition to the truth" (§9.6).

The ecclesial community fulfills her mission of reconciliation in various ways. First, she proclaims the message of conversion and reconciliation. As John Paul says, "the Church carries on the proclamation of reconciliation which Christ caused to echo through the villages of Galilee and all Palestine and does not cease to invite all humanity to be converted and to believe in the Good News" (§10.6).

Before the whole world she untiringly condemns sin, preaches the need for conversion, and invites people to accept reconciliation. The Church proclaims her message “with clarity and tenacity in season and out of season” (§23.5). Besides preaching, the community’s pastoral activity includes “all the activities whereby the Church, through each and every one of her members – Pastors and faithful, at all levels and in all spheres, and with all the means at her disposal, words and actions, teaching and prayer – leads people individually or as groups to true penance and thus sets them on the path to full reconciliation” (§23.6): the intercessory prayer of the saints, catechesis, and especially the celebration of the sacraments, above all the Sacrament of Penance.

Reconciliatio et Paenitentia

Mystery of sin

After describing the good news of the divine gift of reconciliation, the Pope takes up the radical cause of every rupture between individuals and God, and among themselves: sin. There can be no conversion or reconciliation unless the need for forgiveness is first recognized.

Citing the First Letter of John (1:8-9, 3:20), the Holy Father makes two significant assertions about the human condition. On the one hand, personal and social sin are “an integral part of the truth about man” (§13.1). The Church intervenes to help bring about this awareness, enabling each person to acknowledge “being a sinner, capable of sin and inclined to commit sin” (§13.2). This humble recognition is the first and essential step in the long process of conversion. On the other hand, this situation of universal guilt must also take into account a divine dimension: “the love that is greater than sin.” Human sin must therefore be viewed as “countered by the truth of divine love, which is just, generous and faithful, and which reveals itself above all in forgiveness and redemption” (§13.1).

John Paul invokes the biblical account of the tower of Babel to illuminate what he calls “the mystery of sin”: the dark and hidden power at work in individuals which leads them away from eternal life. The narrative tells of the attempt to build a society without God, even if not in direct opposition to him. Whereas the first sin in Eden entailed an act of direct disobedience, the sin of Babel involved the neglect of God. “In the story of Babel the exclusion of God is presented not so much under the aspect of opposition to him as of forgetfulness and indifference toward him, as if God were of no relevance in the sphere of man’s joint projects” (§14.2). In each case God’s sovereignty over human life is denied, and a rupture occurs between the person and God.

Babel and Eden show that sin is a suicidal act, “an act of disobedience by a creature who rejects, at least implicitly, the very one from whom he came and who sustains him in life” (§15.4). Refusal to submit to God’s sovereignty destroys man’s “internal balance” and “almost inevitably causes damage to the fabric of his relationship with others and with the created world” (§15.4). Every sin opens a double wound in the sinner: in himself and in relationships with his neighbor. Consequently, it calls for the twofold healing of reconciliation – at the personal and social level.

Personal and social sin

Throughout Reconciliatio et Paenitentia John Paul emphasizes that “sin, in the proper sense, is always a personal act, since it is an act of freedom on the part of an individual person, and not properly of a group or community” (§16.1).

Undoubtedly, numerous external factors or internal factors can influence or condition individuals in their moral choices. If powerful enough, they may diminish freedom and therefore responsibility or guilt. But these social, cultural, and psychological factors cannot abolish the truth that sin is a product of the freedom proper to an individual’s human dignity.

The exhortation discusses “social” sin at greater length, describing three legitimate meanings given to the concept. First, because of the supernatural solidarity of all people, “every sin has repercussions on the entire ecclesial body and the whole human family” (§16.5). No matter how private or hidden, each sin stains the Church’s holiness and diminishes the world’s social harmony. Second, some sins directly attack social life, the love due to others: “They are an offense against God because they are offenses against one’s neighbor” (§16.6). Third, social sin refers to the disordered relationships between different human communities, when these relationships are based on injustice, conflict, or the denial of human dignity. John Paul carefully points out that these skewed relationships are more precisely referred to as a social “evil.” In fact, sinful structures and situations always result from “the accumulation and concentration of many personal sins” (§16.9). The Pope cautions against thinking of social institutions or structures as subjects of moral acts, as if they themselves were sinful rather than evil. He adds that “if one speaks of social sin here, the expression obviously has an analogical meaning” (§16.7).

Mortal and venial sin

At some length Reconciliatio et Paenitentia examines the gravity of sin: the classical distinction between mortal and venial sin. John Paul is disturbed by this subject and he returns to it later in his 1993 encyclical Veritatis Splendor (§§69-70). The reason for his preoccupation is twofold. Some contemporary moral theologians seem to suggest that it is nearly impossible for a practicing Christian to commit a mortal sin which severs divine life in the soul. Others introduce the concept of “grave” sin. Such a sin has serious spiritual consequences, they maintain, but it does not break an individual’s relationship with God. To combat these mistaken opinions, the Pope reaffirms the Church’s traditional teaching on the difference between mortal and venial sin. His thorough treatment includes its foundations in Scripture, Tradition, and the Magisterium.

Already the Old Testament testifies to a distinction between different kinds of sin. For some sins, the penalty could be death, while for others, especially those committed through ignorance, forgiveness could be obtained by making a sacrificial offering. In the New Testament, the Pope notes, two passages refer directly to serious sins. The First Letter of John (5:16-17) distinguishes between “a sin which leads to death” and “a sin which does not lead to death” (§17.4). Matthew’s Gospel refers to a “blasphemy against the Holy Spirit” that “will not be forgiven” (12:31). For the Holy Father, Scripture provides the basis for the Church’s distinction between sins that bring about spiritual death and those that do not.

It was, however, Saint Thomas Aquinas “who was to formulate in the clearest possible terms the doctrine which became constant in the Church” (§17.8) concerning the definition of, and distinction between, mortal and venial sins. Thomas analyzed this difference from three perspectives. First, mortal sin deprives the sinner of the supernatural life of charity, of friendship with God, while venial sin harms that relationship. Second, mortal sin, if unforgiven, leads to eternal punishment, whereas venial sin does not. Third, from the point of view of its matter, mortal sin is “sin whose object is grave matter and which is also committed with full knowledge and deliberate consent” (§17.12). Venial sin, on the other hand, entails a choice that is not considered gravely disordered or one committed with less than full knowledge of its evil or consent of the will.

The Pope uses the distinction between mortal and venial sins to draw four further conclusions. Invoking the Synod’s authority, he reaffirms that some acts are intrinsically morally evil because of their freely chosen matter: “There exist acts which, per se and in themselves, independently of circumstances, are always seriously wrong by reason of their object. These acts, if carried out with sufficient awareness and freedom, are always gravely sinful” (§17.12, cf. §18.7). John Paul then mentions that some Synod Fathers proposed to classify sins in a threefold way: as venial, grave, or mortal. They understood “grave” sins to be those whose matter is objectively serious but lack the moral agent’s full awareness and freedom. On the one hand, the Pope agrees that the category of “grave” sin can serve to highlight the scale of seriousness among sins. But, on the other hand, nothing can compromise the teaching that “there is no middle way between life and death” (§17.16), between mortal and venial sin. Third, the Holy Father reminds his readers that venial sin is to be neither ignored nor regarded “as a sin of little importance” (§17.13). Consequently, he gives a fresh impetus to celebrating sacramental Penance “for venial sins alone, as is borne out by a centuries-old doctrinal tradition and practice” (§32.6). Lastly, the Pope cautions against an interpretation of the “fundamental option” which would minimize the moral significance of individual acts. Here he specifically rejects the opinion that mortal sin can be reduced to an act of a person’s fundamental option, when this is limited to an act which explicitly and formally shows contempt for God or one’s neighbor. He insists, rather, that “the fundamental orientation can be radically changed by individual acts” (§17.17).

Loss of the sense of sin

After outlining a theology of sin, Pope John Paul treats the pastoral problem presented by the modern world's loss of the sense of sin. His purpose in this section is clear: "The restoration of a proper sense of sin is the first way of facing the grave spiritual crisis looming over man today" (§18.11). Only if we grasp the reasons for this loss can a healthy sense of sin be restored, one which can open to conversion and reconciliation.

The Pope is convinced that an authentic sense of sin "is rooted in man's moral conscience and is as it were its thermometer" (§18.2). In today's world, unfortunately, the moral conscience is being deadened. This eclipse is accompanied by an obscuring of the sense of God "and as a result, with the loss of this decisive inner point of reference, the sense of sin is lost" (§18.3). The loss of the sense of sin is therefore a consequence of the prior loss, even the denial, of the sense of God. "To sin," the Pope writes, "is also to live as if he did not exist, to eliminate him from one's daily life" (§18.9). Four reasons account for the contemporary loss of the sense of sin in society.

First there is secularism. It excludes God and the transcendent from the dynamic life of society. By striving to build a world without God, secularism interprets sin as "what offends man" (§18.5). It sees "errors and faults only in the context of society" (§18.9), with no reference to God. A second reason for today's diminished sense of sin derives from an erroneous evaluation based on some findings of psychology, sociology, and cultural anthropology. Each of these human sciences has led many to doubt whether they are personally responsible for their actions or even whether they can sin. Third, contemporary ethical theories which derive from historical relativism weaken people's sensitivity to the gravity of sin. These theories not only deny intrinsically evil acts but also attenuate personal responsibility for evil. Lastly, the true sense of sin disappears in society when people erroneously identify it "with a morbid feeling of guilt, or with the mere transgression of legal norms and precepts" (§18.8).

John Paul maintains that society alone cannot be blamed for today's loss of the sense of sin. Within the Church certain trends favor the same view. He mentions, for example, that past attitudes to sin – seeing it everywhere, stressing fear of eternal punishment, and severity in correcting erroneous consciences – have been replaced by new exaggerations: not recognizing sin anywhere, preaching a God who does not punish sin, and respecting conscience to the point of ignoring the moral truth. The Pope adds another reason. Many people are now confused "by differences of opinions and teachings in theology, preaching, catechesis and spiritual direction on serious and delicate questions of Christian morals"

(§18.10). Lastly, John Paul casts some blame for the loss of a healthy sense of sin on “certain deficiencies in the practice of sacramental Penance” (§18.10): failure to maintain the balance between the personal and social-ecclesial dimensions of sin, and routine ritualism in sacramental celebration.

Despite its power, sin is not the protagonist, still less the victor, in God’s saving plan. Within the dynamism of history, the mystery of divine mercy will conquer the mystery of sin. John Paul builds on a verse of Paul’s First Letter to Timothy – “great indeed, we confess, is the mystery of our religion (mysterium pietatis)” (3:16) – to convince his readers about the greatness of divine mercy. According to the Pope, this “mystery of our religion” (mysterium pietatis) is the whole saving plan of Christ’s life, Death and Resurrection for us. This mystery is God’s infinite loving kindness toward us: a mercy “capable of penetrating to the hidden roots of our iniquity, in order to evoke in the soul a movement of conversion, in order to redeem it and set it on course toward reconciliation” (§20.3). At the same time, this mystery of divine mercy beckons a human response: “The loving kindness of God toward the Christian must be matched by the piety of the Christian toward God” (§21.1).

Dialogue and reconciliation

In the third chapter of his exhortation, the Pope discusses the practical dimensions of the Church's pastoral ministry of penance and reconciliation. A fundamental presupposition governs his presentation: "What is pastoral is not opposed to what is doctrinal. Nor can pastoral action prescind from doctrinal content, from which in fact it draws its substance and real validity" (§26.2). For him, dialogue, catechesis, and the sacraments are the primary means that the Church has at her disposal to foster reconciliation.

John Paul II follows the Second Vatican Council and Paul VI in proposing dialogue as a way for the Church to carry out her mission to the Church and the world. This "dialogue of salvation" – in the words of Paul VI in his encyclical Ecclesiam Suam (1964) – "is aimed above all at the rebirth of individuals, through interior conversion and repentance, but always with profound respect for consciences and with patience and at the step-by-step pace indispensable for modern conditions" (§25.4). In typical Wojtylan fashion, the Pope reminds his readers of the basic principle underlying all authentic dialogue. It does not begin with indifference to the truth, but "from a presentation of the truth, offered in a calm way, with respect for the intelligence and consciences of others. The dialogue of reconciliation can never replace or attenuate the proclamation of the truth of the Gospel" (§25.15). The Church engages in dialogue at three levels: within herself, with other Christians, and with the world.

First of all, the Holy Father calls for "permanent and renewed dialogue within the Catholic Church herself" (§25.7). This dialogue contributes to overcoming internal tensions which could become factors of division. The Pope warns especially against following subjective views and divisive ideological choices in theology and pastoral practice. His solution to division is an appeal to everyone to seek the truth "in the divine word itself and in the authentic interpretation of that word provided by the Magisterium of the Church" (§25.8). Internal dialogue likewise serves the Church's credibility and effectiveness in the world.

While the perseveration of open and sincere dialogue can help to secure reconciliation within the Catholic Church, such dialogue must also be directed to other Churches and Ecclesial Communities. John Paul expresses his commitment to ecumenical dialogue with other Christians as a means of achieving the full communion which all long for. Such a dialogue must be frank, clear in presenting positions, and faithful to the Magisterium. It should proceed "without facile optimism but also without distrust and without hesitation or delays" (§25.10). The Church is called to be a witness to reconciliation in her internal life and a servant of reconciliation for others.

In the world, the Church likewise works for reconciliation by fostering the method of dialogue. At the international level, the Holy See uses, and encourages others to use, dialogue as a way of resolving conflicts. At the local level, the Church carries out her reconciling activity in the world through Bishops and Episcopal Conferences, and especially through the lay faithful. Lay men and women “are called upon to engage directly in dialogue or to work for dialogue aimed at reconciliation” (§25.14).

Catechesis and sacraments

Pastors also discharge their pastoral ministry of penance and reconciliation by providing a catechesis suitably adapted to the audience addressed. Catechesis on reconciliation should be grounded in the Bible, especially in Jesus' teaching. After this biblical catechesis, a theological catechesis should follow. This latter synthesis "will also integrate the elements of psychology, sociology and the other human sciences which can serve to clarify situations, describe problems accurately, and persuade listeners or readers to make concrete resolutions" (§26.3).

In their catechesis on penance, John Paul reminds pastors to stress three points. First, an effective catechesis emphasizes the importance of conversion, the necessary precondition of reconciliation. Sinners are to recognize their situation of sinfulness and to turn away from it. Second, a catechesis on penance entails showing the need for repentance. Thus, "a good catechesis will show how repentance, just like conversion, is far from being a superficial feeling but a real overturning of the soul" (§26.5). Finally, catechesis should also point out that penance involves the external expression of the interior attitudes of conversion and repentance. This is "doing penance." Above all, it means "to reestablish the balance and harmony broken by sin, to change direction even at the cost of sacrifice" (§26.6).

Besides stressing these three themes in their catechesis, pastors should give due attention to the importance of the Church's penitential discipline and the proper formation of conscience. In addition, John Paul mentions the need to treat the following topics in their catechesis on penance: a healthy sense of sin, the meaning of temptation, the value of fasting and almsgiving, the four last things (death, judgment, heaven, and hell), and the contribution of the Church's social teaching to reconciliation in human relationships.

Before treating the Sacrament of Penance in detail, the Holy Father briefly explains how "each sacrament, over and above its own proper grace, is also a sign of penance and reconciliation" (§27.2). Baptism effectively brings about reconciliation with God by the forgiveness of sins, while Confirmation signifies and accomplishes "a greater conversion of heart" (§27.4). As the renewal of the Sacrifice of the Cross, the Eucharist is an efficacious sign of community reconciliation. Holy Orders provides for ministers of reconciliation. In Matrimony, the couple and family share in Christ's victory over the disintegrating forces of conflict and become an effective sign of "the reconciled and reconciling Church for a world reconciled in all its structures and institutions" (§27.8). For its part, Anointing of the Sick is a sign of definitive conversion to the Lord and full reconciliation with God.

Doctrinal convictions

John Paul devotes a long section of his apostolic exhortation specifically to the Sacrament of Penance. In light of today's crisis in the understanding and practice of the sacrament, he summarizes its doctrine, the respective roles of the confessor and penitent, and the three forms of its liturgical celebration.

In line with the judgment of the Synod Fathers, the Pope affirms that the Sacrament of Reconciliation is in crisis. He hopes that, by clarifying the reasons for this crisis, a positive solution will be found. The same factors which contribute to the lessening of the sense of sin also undermine the practice of sacramental confession. In addition, however, negative influences come from within the Church, especially "the sometimes widespread idea that one can obtain forgiveness directly from God, even in a habitual way, without approaching the Sacrament of Reconciliation" (§28.3). To meet this challenge, the Pope reaffirms the Church's convictions of faith about this sacrament "which represents and at the same time accomplishes penance and reconciliation" (§28.1).

Even in the Old Testament, God is described as compassionate and ready to forgive sins. In the New Testament, Jesus is not only merciful but also has the power to forgive sins, a power which he confers on his Apostles (cf. Jn 20:22). They received this authority from Jesus as a power they could transmit to their successors in the apostolic ministry. Thus there developed among Christians "the certainty that the Lord Jesus himself instituted and entrusted to the Church . . . a special sacrament for the forgiveness of sins committed after Baptism" (§30.1). God, through the Holy Spirit, forgives sins when the Church absolves penitents by means of her official ministers. In taking account of the sacrament's historical development, the Pope invokes the classical distinction between its unchanging "substance" and its changing forms of celebration. Speaking of Penance, John Paul says that "with regard to the substance of the sacrament there has always remained firm and unchanged in the consciousness of the Church the certainty that, by the will of Christ, forgiveness is offered to each individual by means of sacramental absolution given by the ministers of Penance" (§30.2).

The first conviction of faith deals with the divine institution of Penance as the sacrament of forgiveness. Christ himself left it as a gift for his Church. A second conviction affirms that "for a Christian the Sacrament of Penance is the ordinary way of obtaining forgiveness and the remission of serious sin committed after Baptism" (§31.2, cf. §§32.2, 33.2). Even though God's mercy extends beyond the sacramental sign of Reconciliation, Christ provides this specific means of forgiveness. It would be foolish and presumptuous to disregard his will in this regard. John Paul's third dogmatic conviction is that Penance is "a kind of judicial action” (§31.3). Today this notion is often obscured in favor of the more accessible idea that Reconciliation is directed to spiritual healing. While accepting this healing role, the Pope still insists that Penance remains a kind of tribunal, even though “a tribunal of mercy” wherein the minister judges and heals.

The confessor

As healer and judge, the confessor is “a figure of God the Father welcoming and forgiving the one who returns” (§31.11). When the priest pronounces the words of absolution, at that very moment “the Trinity becomes present in order to blot out sin and restore innocence” (§31.11). Sacramental absolution is a visible and effective sign of the divine intervention which imparts to the penitent the salvation won by Christ’s Paschal Mystery.

According to John Paul, the power given to ordained ministers to forgive sins is “one of the most awe-inspiring innovations of the Gospel” (§29.3). In countless discourses and documents he exhorts priests to be frequent penitents and willing confessors. Moreover, he often praises as models of priestly zeal the saints who were “apostles of the confessional” (§29.9). The ministers of Reconciliation thus enjoy a certain “grandeur.” Acting in persona Christi, they make Christ present as “the brother of man, the merciful High Priest, faithful and compassionate, the Shepherd intent on finding the lost sheep” (§29.5). When celebrating the Sacrament of Penance priests are totally at Christ’s disposal; they speak and act only with the power received through the Church.

In his treatment of confessors, the Pope is especially exhortative. Hearing confessions, he writes, “is undoubtedly the most difficult and sensitive, the most exhausting and demanding ministry of the priest, but also one of the most beautiful and consoling” (§29.6). Above all, priests have the duty of hearing confessions willingly, since the faithful have “an inviolable and inalienable right” to individual confession (§33.3). The Pope explains the qualities, training, and spiritual practices necessary for priests if they are to be protagonists of the renewal in the celebration of the Sacrament of Penance called for by the Second Vatican Council.

In order to minister effectively, the confessor needs the human qualities of “prudence, discretion, discernment and a firmness tempered by gentleness and kindness” (§29.7). Careful preparation is also necessary, especially the serious study of theology and the human sciences and training in dialogue and dealing with people in a pastoral way. More importantly, confessors must have the spiritual qualities necessary for a fruitful ministry: a deep life of prayer, practice of the theological and moral virtues, obedience to the will of God, love for the Church, and docility to the Magisterium. Those who have seriously embarked on the path of Christian perfection can best lead others on the same journey.

Above all, John Paul believes that a good confessor approaches Reconciliation frequently and devoutly. “If a priest were no longer to go to confession or properly confess his sins,” the Pope writes, “his priestly being and his priestly action would feel its effects very soon, and this would also be noticed by the community of which he was the pastor” (§31.18). Moreover, the Holy Father thinks that a priest’s regular experience of the sacramental grace of Penance can become an incentive for others. As a beneficiary of mercy he is more likely to encourage the faithful to celebrate the sacrament frequently and “to arrange special times for the celebration of the sacrament” (§32.8).

In deference to the Synod’s wishes, the Holy Father briefly treats the pastoral care of two “delicate cases” – the divorced and remarried and priests living in irregular unions. When dealing with these and similar situations, he reminds priests to take into account two important principles. First, confessors, aware that the Church always seeks the conversion of sinners, should show compassion, mercy, and patience. Second, they should safeguard “truth and consistency, whereby the Church does not agree to call good evil and evil good” (§34.2). Confessors can celebrate Penance only for those with the required dispositions, including a firm purpose of amendment. If these dispositions are lacking, then the ministers of Reconciliation must encourage those seeking forgiveness to seek divine mercy in non-sacramental ways, such as by prayer, fasting, and almsgiving.

The penitent

John Paul examines the three acts of the penitent who undergoes the journey of interior conversion through the work of the Holy Spirit: contrition, confession, and satisfaction. Together these acts are considered the sacramental sign of Reconciliation.

Reconciliatio et Paenitentia defines contrition as “a clear and decisive rejection of the sin committed, together with a resolution not to commit it again, out of the love which one has for God and which is reborn with repentance” (§31.8). This contrition is “the beginning and the heart of conversion” (§31.8). It is a “drawing near to the holiness of God, a rediscovery of one’s true identity, which has been upset and disturbed by sin, a liberation in the very depth of self and thus a regaining of lost joy” (§31.9). The validity of sacramental Penance depends on the penitent’s heartfelt contrition. Essential to this interior attitude of sorrow is the admission of personal sinfulness, a recognition made possible by an examination of conscience. In this examination one’s acts or omissions are compared sincerely and calmly, without anxious psychological introspection, “with the interior moral law, with the evangelical norms proposed by the Church, with Jesus Christ himself, who is our Teacher and Model of life, and with the heavenly Father, who calls us to goodness and perfection” (§31.7).

The personal confession of sins to a priest also forms part of the sacramental sign of Reconciliation. “A sincere and complete confession of sins,” writes the Pope, “is inherent in the very nature of the sacrament” (§31.5). Penance is “a sign of the meeting of the sinner with the mediation of the Church in the person of the minister; a sign of the person’s revealing of self as a sinner in the sight of God and the Church, of facing his own sinful condition in the eyes of God” (§31.10). Far more than a gesture of psychological self-liberation, the auricular confession of sins is a solemn liturgical act. The recounting of one’s sins enables the confessor to be the penitent’s spiritual judge and healer.

The penitent’s third and final act, now performed after absolution, is called satisfaction or penance. According to the Pope, the penance assigned by the confessor consists of “acts of worship, charity, mercy or reparation” suited to the penitent’s specific situation; it should “not be reduced to mere formulas to be recited” (§31.12). Certainly these simple and humble acts are not a price paid for the forgiveness obtained. Rather, they are a sign of the penitent’s personal commitment to a new life of holiness. Doing penance after absolution reminds the pardoned sinner of two important truths. Like all suffering, the specified “physical and spiritual mortification” can serve to unite a person more closely with Christ’s Passion. Furthermore, the penance also reminds him that, even after sacramental forgiveness, there still remains to be overcome “a dark area, due to the wound of sin, to the imperfection of love in repentance, to the weakening of the spiritual faculties” (§31.12).

Liturgical celebration of Penance

The exhortation treats in some detail the three liturgical forms prescribed by the Church for the celebration of Penance: reconciliation of individual penitents, reconciliation of many penitents with individual confession and individual absolution, and reconciliation of many penitents with general confession and general absolution. Whereas the first two rites are usual ways of celebrating Reconciliation, general absolution “is exceptional in character . . . [and] is regulated by a special discipline” (§32.2).

John Paul could not be more explicit about the need to maintain the practice of individual confession. It is “the only normal and ordinary way of celebrating the sacrament, and it cannot and must not be allowed to fall into disuse or be neglected” (§32.2, cf. §33.2). He favors this form because it embodies faithfulness to the will of Christ who instituted the sacrament of forgiveness, respects the Church’s perennial Tradition and practice, and highlights the specifically personal dimension of the penitential process. Individual confession emphasizes the penitent’s concrete situation: the desire for reconciliation with God and the need for assistance in one’s spiritual life.

When individual confession is celebrated with others in a liturgical rite, it safeguards the personal value of Penance. At the same time, this second rite stresses “the ecclesial character of conversion and reconciliation” (§32.4). It vividly recalls that reconciliation with God also entails reconciliation with the Church. Because this form maintains individual confession and absolution, it can be considered a normal and ordinary way of celebrating the sacrament. The Pope notes that it is particularly meaningful for the different liturgical seasons and for special events. But the Holy Father adds a cautionary note. He admonishes priests to choose the form of celebration in light of “the true spiritual good of the faithful, in obedience to the penitential discipline of the Church” and not for “situational and subjective reasons” (§32.5).

John Paul is profoundly troubled by the increasingly irregular practice of general confession and absolution. To combat what he regards as a serious spiritual danger, the Pope insists that the liturgical and canonical norms which regulate this third form of celebration “must be accepted and applied in such a way as to avoid any sort of arbitrary interpretation” (§33.1). Throughout his treatment the Pope stresses that the use of general confession and absolution is limited to exceptional circumstances of grave necessity. He also includes an admonition: the Church’s doctrine and discipline on Reconciliation is “not our property” but is always to be served “in truth” (§33.4).

Reconciliatio et Paenitentia ends with a call to the “unity of spirit” mentioned by Peter in his First Letter (3:8). John Paul entrusts his appeal of penance and reconciliation to the Father who is “rich in mercy,” to the Son “made man as our Redeemer and Reconciler,” and to the Holy Spirit who is the “source of unity and peace” (§35.4). The Pope expresses the hope that his exhortation will bear abundant fruit, and he turns to the Immaculate Heart of Mary “that through her intercession humanity may discover and travel the path of penance, the only path that can lead it to full reconciliation” (§35.7).

Key Themes

Among the most significant contributions of John Paul II's teaching is his development of a Christian anthropology: "the truth about man, a truth that is revealed to us in its fullness and depth in Christ" (Dives in Misericordia, §1.2). Essential to the truth of the human person is his or her absolute uniqueness. In Redemptor Hominis, the Pope writes: "We are not dealing with the 'abstract' man, but the real, 'concrete,' 'historical' man. We are dealing with 'each' man, for each one is included in the mystery of the Redemption and with each one Christ has united himself for ever through this mystery" (§13.3). In the Word made flesh, individuals enjoy their dignity as free and responsible moral agents. Their freely chosen acts make them who they are. It is not surprising, therefore, that this view of the human person marks Reconciliatio et Paenitentia. Indeed, the Holy Father's treatment of the intimately personal nature of sin, conversion, reconciliation, the meaning of social sin, and his preoccupation with general absolution are all solidly grounded in his anthropology.

Reconciliatio et Paenitentia

Personal nature of sin, conversion, and reconciliation

A reverence for the inalienable dignity of the human person is at the heart of John Paul's Christian anthropology. His pastoral objective is to foster human dignity in all its dimensions, a project which includes a correct understanding of freedom and responsibility. Here, as in all his writings, the Pope maintains that people must preserve their moral responsibility and freedom if they are to safeguard and foster authentic human dignity. Thus, if light is to be shed on the dynamic of the Holy Father's thought, the personal character of sin and reconciliation need to be understood.

The Pope, like John in his First Letter, believes that "if we say we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us" (1:8). Sin, John Paul says, is "an integral part of the truth about man" (§13.1); it is an essential dimension of personhood. People can and do act against God, the ultimate end of their existence. Through a conscious and free act of will, a person "can change course and go in a direction opposed to God's will, separating himself from God (aversio a Deo), rejecting loving communion with him, detaching himself from the life-principle which God is" (§17.14).

Because people are free, they can perform truly human acts and therefore have the ability to sin. In a person's capacity to misuse the gift of freedom – to sin – the Pope sees a confirmation of human dignity. Sin, he writes, "is a product of man's freedom" (§14.1); it is "an act of freedom on the part of an individual person" (§16.1). Any ideology or theory which disregards this truth of individual freedom and responsibility meets with his staunch resistance. Of course, the Holy Father believes that internal and external factors and circumstances can attenuate an individual's degree of subjective guilt for a particular action, but they can never deny the existence of sin or justify it. He adamantly affirms not only that sin exists but that it proceeds from human freedom. According to John Paul, to reject these truths "would be to deny the person's dignity and freedom, which are manifested – even though in a negative and disastrous way – also in this responsibility for sin committed. Hence there is nothing so personal and untransferable in each individual as merit for virtue or responsibility for sin" (§16.1). Even the abuse of freedom, then, confirms human dignity. Sin itself emphasizes the personal responsibility and human dignity which the Pope so vigorously defends.

The preservation of human dignity demands that individuals take responsibility for the sins they freely commit, an act which sets them on the path of conversion. Each sinner must be able to say, "I have sinned against the Lord" (2 Sam 12:13). Reluctant as contemporary people are to recognize their mistakes, they must do so if they are to have that “knowledge of self” (§13.4) necessary to those seeking reconciliation. The words appropriate to acceptance of responsibility are “I repent” or “I am sorry”: “Against you, you alone, have I sinned and done what is evil in your sight” (Ps 51:4).

If sin is personal for John Paul, so too, then, is conversion. “To acknowledge one’s sin, indeed – penetrating still more deeply into the consideration of one’s own personhood – to recognize oneself as being a sinner, capable of sin and inclined to commit sin, is the essential first step in returning to God” (§13.2). Conversion requires the acknowledgment of one’s sin. Throughout his exhortation, the Holy Father points out that the same person who freely sins can also freely repent. He believes that this recognition is necessary if “the conversion of heart of every individual, of his or her return to God” (§4.11, cf. §§4.12, 13.4, 26.4) is to happen. The path to reconciliation can only be trod by those who have first walked the way of personal conversion and repentance.

Just as conversion is a personal experience that occurs in the depths of the human heart, so also is reconciliation; it “takes place in people’s hearts and minds” (§4.7). While the Cross and Resurrection accomplish the reconciliation of humanity, making it available to all, each individual shares in the Paschal Mystery by personally appropriating the fruits of Redemption. Sin, which begins as “a wound in man’s inmost self” (§2.4), first affects an individual’s relationship with God. Inevitably, however, sin brings about further ruptures “within the various circles of a person’s life” (§13.5).

Each of these divisions requires the healing of the divine gift of reconciliation. Underlining the profoundly interpersonal dynamics of sin and reconciliation, the Pope teaches that the “first and fundamental reconciliation” (§6.3) is the one which restores the sinner to filial friendship with God. He emphasizes that “the most precious result of the forgiveness obtained in the Sacrament of Penance consists in reconciliation with God, which takes place in the inmost heart of the son who was lost and found again” (§31.15). Just as sin spreads out in concentric circles, so also does the work of reconciliation. John Paul frequently recalls that reconciliation with God, which is always primary, is always accompanied by other reconciliations which repair the breaches caused by sin. When a person is forgiven, he “is reconciled with himself in his inmost being, where he regains his own true identity. He is reconciled with his brethren whom he has in some way attacked and wounded. He is reconciled with the Church. He is reconciled with all creation” (§31.15, cf. §§4.5, 26.15).

In Reconciliatio et Paenitentia, the Pope also emphasizes the personal nature of sin in several less direct ways. First, he draws on biblical images of individuals – from Adam and Eve, Cain and Abel, David, the prodigal son and merciful father – to reinforce his teaching that conversion from sin and divine reconciliation first of all heal the relationship between a person and God. Second, throughout his discussion of the Sacrament of Penance the Holy Father stresses the personal interchange between the confessor and the penitent. The confessor must know the penitent's state of soul if he is to be an effective judge and healer. For his part, the penitent must acknowledge and confess his sins if he is to be absolved and healed. Indeed, the confession of sins must be individual precisely because "sin is a deeply personal matter" (§31.10). All told, John Paul's teaching on the personal dimension of sin, conversion, and reconciliation is yet another way in which he defends the responsibility and freedom, and ultimately the immeasurable dignity, of the human person created in God's image and likeness.

Social sin

Human freedom, personal sin, and interior conversion are essential elements of John Paul's anthropology. At the same time they shed light on his view that the Church works to change unjust structures and situations primarily by appealing to the constant need for interior conversion. In his apostolic exhortation, the Pope squarely faces the theological and pastoral ramifications of "social" sin, a term frequently used at the 1983 Synod. He clearly distinguishes three meanings of "social" sin, the last of which merits his particular attention.

In the first place, sin is social because "by virtue of human solidarity which is as mysterious and intangible as it is real and concrete, each individual's sin in some way affects others" (§16.5). Every sin, even the most seemingly private, has repercussions on the Church and the human family. Drawing on many examples from Sacred Scripture, John Paul concludes that "man's rupture with God leads tragically to divisions between brothers" (§15.1) and damages his relationship with the created world. According to the Pope, the reason for this disorder lies in what he calls the "communion of sin." This supernatural solidarity of sinners is the reverse side of the profound mystery of the communion of saints which binds God's People together such that the holiness of one benefits others. Likewise, every sinner is united with all others. Through his sin, an individual drags down not only himself but also those to whom he is linked in God's saving plan.

Second, some sins can be considered "social" in another way. These social sins are direct attacks against the love of neighbor. Such sins, either of commission or omission, can be committed by an individual against another individual or against the community, or by the community against an individual. Here the Pope includes offenses against a person's human rights – especially the right to life, freedom of religion, and workers' rights – and sins against the common good.

Third, social sin "refers to the relationships between the various human communities" (§16.7) which violate God's plan. This meaning, made popular by Latin American liberation theology, is the most controversial, and John Paul carefully distinguishes an acceptable from an unacceptable sense. He accepts that human sinfulness and guilt frequently express themselves in various human communities and institutional structures. These, in turn, influence people living in them and lead to even further violations of God's will. The condemnation of unjust social, economic, and political situations is a constant of papal teaching. Nonetheless, the Holy Father, strictly speaking, does not consider such situations, whether the class struggle or the military confrontation of world blocs, as social sin. Instead, he refers to these situations or structures as a social evil. The Pope adds an important clarification for those who fail to make his distinction: “If one speaks of social sin here, the expression obviously has an analogical meaning” (§16.7). Social sin, therefore, is a term used to express an ethical judgment on a situation or structure, but it cannot be considered “sin” in the strict and proper sense.

The reasons which lead John Paul to affirm the analogical meaning of social sin in these cases is based on his anthropology. He reminds his readers that evil situations are caused by acts of individual freedom. Accordingly, the Pope warns against a minimizing of human freedom which would replace the responsibility of the moral conscience with blame laid at the doors of “some vague entity or anonymous collectivity, such as the situation, the system, society, structures, or institutions” (§16.8). Only individual persons are subjects of moral acts and thus capable of sinning; situations, structures, or institutions are not. John Paul insists that social evil – or social sin “by analogy” – always stems from an individual’s abuse of freedom. An unjust situation is, he writes, “the result of the accumulation and concentration of many personal sins” (§16.9). At the heart of every situation or network of sin “are always to be found sinful people” (§16.11).

Changing the innumerable structures of social evil which plague the world can therefore come about only if people’s hearts are converted. Neither legislation nor force of arms can do this. Evil structures are caused and maintained by people who make free moral decisions. Rather than excusing such individuals from their responsibility, the Pope challenges them to recognize their personal complicity in the vast and seemingly anonymous institutions and webs of oppression. He makes a forceful “appeal to the consciences of all, so that each may shoulder his or her responsibility seriously and courageously in order to change those disastrous conditions and intolerable situations” (§16.7). The Holy Father’s teaching on social sin secures human dignity and opens the way to greater social justice because it reminds us that institutions and structures, while they embody disorder and sinfulness, nonetheless owe their origin and continuance to the free choices of responsible individuals.

Individual confession and general absolution

The specific pastoral question at the 1983 Synod of Bishops which drew the most media attention was undoubtedly general absolution. In their interventions many of the Synod Fathers called for fewer restrictions surrounding the third form of liturgical celebration outlined in the Rite of Penance: general absolution without individual confession of sins. Ten years of experience with the 1973 Rite led many of them to believe that a renewal in sacramental practice would come about by making this form of communal celebration more widely available. John Paul, however, disagrees. He takes an unequivocal stand in favor of individual confession and absolution as the only “normal and ordinary way of celebrating the sacrament” (§32.2). His reasons are founded on fidelity to divine revelation and on the anthropology contained in it.

A crucial question concerns the Church’s power over the administration of the sacraments. Does this power extend to allowing general absolution to be considered an ordinary way of celebrating it? For centuries, pastoral practice has permitted, in certain circumstances, the granting of absolution without individual confession. This is allowed, for example, in dealing with the deaf or penitents without access to a confessor who speaks their language. In such instances, they have a clear will to confess their sins, even though auricular confession is impossible. During the two World Wars permission to grant absolution without prior individual confession was extended to cover the situation of large groups – troops before going into battle. Absolution was offered without prior individual confession, and the practice came to be called “general absolution.” Since the Second Vatican Council, the Magisterium has declared in the Pastoral Norms (1972) issued by the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, in the Rite of Penance (1973), and in the Code of Canon Law (1983) that, apart from wars, other situations might arise in which collective absolution without individual confession could be pastorally justified.

The Church, therefore, allows for general absolution in principle. It is a lawful practice which does not exceed the “power of the keys” given to forgive sins in the Sacrament of Penance. Nonetheless, the Pope decisively teaches that this practice must be interpreted in the correct theological light and practiced with due pastoral safeguards. John Paul explicitly invokes “fidelity to the will of the Lord Jesus, transmitted by the doctrine of the Church . . . [and] the unchanged teaching which the Church has derived from the most ancient Tradition” (§33.2) as the reason underlying his position. This teaching, which has been codified in her disciplinary laws, is clear: “The individual and integral confession of sins with individual absolution constitutes the only ordinary way in which the faithful who are conscious of serious sin are reconciled with God and with the Church” (§33.2). The obligation to confess mortal sins to a priest is postponed by general absolution; it is not eliminated. Consequently, obedience to divine revelation requires that general absolution be granted only if two conditions are met.

First, the Pope insists that priests are to give general absolution only “in cases of grave necessity” (§33.3). According to the Code of Canon Law, this situation occurs when there is no time to hear individual confessions, when either the danger of death is imminent or there are so many penitents that they would be deprived of the sacrament for a lengthy period of time (Canon 961). John Paul reminds Bishops of their serious obligation to respect the law and practice of the Church in this regard. They are not to leave to pastors or the faithful the decision about which form of celebration to use. He especially cautions that “the exceptional use of the third form of celebration must never lead to a lesser regard for, still less an abandonment of, the ordinary forms, nor must it lead to this form being considered an alternative to the other two forms” (§33.3). Second, the Holy Father recalls the doctrinal truth that can never be compromised: “Every serious sin must always be stated, with its determining circumstances, in an individual confession” (§33.2). As a consequence of this doctrine, he states that “the obligation to make an individual confession of serious sins before again having recourse to another general absolution” must be made clear to the penitents (§33.3).

More indirectly, in his presentation of individual confession, John Paul provides more reasons for limiting general absolution to truly exceptional circumstances. These reasons all bear on the Pope’s distrust of certain collectivist tendencies in modern thought and practice and his desire to highlight the dignity of the human person.

As beings who live in time and history, persons can discover their own identity only when they abandon their own sinful past and open themselves to conversion. In this process of conversion the sacramental confession of sins is a necessary step, one which renews communion with God and others. Individual confession is “a sign of the person’s revealing of self as a sinner in the sight of God and the Church, of facing his own sinful condition in the eyes of God” (§31.10). Indeed, there is nothing “more personal and intimate” than Reconciliation, where “the sinner stands alone before God with his sin, repentance and trust” (§31.14). It is therefore understandable why “the confession of sins must ordinarily be individual not collective, just as sin is a deeply personal matter” (§31.10). For the Pope, the celebration of communal confession and general absolution can obscure the radically personal nature of conversion and reconciliation celebrated in the Sacrament of Penance. While the support of the ecclesial community can contribute a great deal to penitential practice, the community can never be a substitute for the individual, who must personally place his guilt and trust in God's hands.

The Holy Father's remarks on the confessor's important role in Penance also clarify his judicious approach to general absolution. First of all, the confessor is a judge who has "to evaluate both the seriousness of the sins and the repentance of the penitent" (§31.10). Likewise, he is a healer who "must acquaint himself with the condition of the sick person in order to treat and heal him" (§31.10). As both a tribunal of mercy and a place of spiritual healing, Reconciliation requires "a knowledge of the sinner's heart in order to be able to judge and absolve, to cure and heal" (§31.5). Moreover, the confessor, who acts in persona Christi in granting absolution, assures not only the Church's presence but also the personal nature of the encounter. He also guarantees, through hearing the individual confession, offering counsel and spiritual direction, and requiring an appropriate penance, that "the sacramental celebration [will] correspond more closely to the concrete situation of the penitent" (§32.3). According to John Paul, individual confession is the ordinary sacramental way for the Church to accomplish her mission of working for the conversion of hearts and the reconciliation of people with God and one another.

TO THE BISHOPS

CLERGY AND FAITHFUL

ON RECONCILIATION AND PENANCE

IN THE MISSION OF THE CHURCH TODAY

Reconciliatio et Paenitentia

Reconciliatio et Paenitentia

Introduction

Reconciliatio et Paenitentia

Origin and meaning of the document

1.1 To speak of reconciliation and penance is, for the men and women of our time, an invitation to rediscover, translated into their own way of speaking, the very words with which our Savior and Teacher Jesus Christ began his preaching: “Repent, and believe in the Gospel,”<sup>1</sup> that is to say, accept the good news of love, of adoption as children of God and hence of brotherhood.

1.2 Why does the Church put forward once more this subject and this invitation?

1.3 The concern to know better and to understand modern man and the contemporary world, to solve their puzzle and reveal their mystery, to discern the ferments of good and evil within them, has long caused many people to direct at man and the world a questioning gaze. It is the gaze of the historian and sociologist, philosopher and theologian, psychologist and humanist, poet and mystic: above all, it is the gaze, anxious yet full of hope, of the pastor.

1.4 In an exemplary fashion this is shown on every page of the important Pastoral Constitution of the Second Vatican Council Gaudium et Spes on the Church in the Modern World, particularly in its wide-ranging and penetrating introduction. It is likewise shown in certain documents issued through the wisdom and charity of my esteemed Predecessors, whose admirable Pontificates were marked by the historic and prophetic event of that Ecumenical Council.

1.5 In common with others, the pastor too can discern among the various unfortunate characteristics of the world and of humanity in our time the existence of many deep and painful divisions.

NOTES:

<sup>1</sup> Mk 1:15.

A shattered world

2.1 These divisions are seen in the relationships between individuals and groups, and also at the level of larger groups: nations against nations, and blocs of opposing countries, in a headlong quest for domination. At the root of this alienation it is not hard to discern conflicts which, instead of being resolved through dialogue, grow more acute in confrontation and opposition.

2.2 Careful observers, studying the elements that cause division, discover reasons of the most widely differing kinds: from the growing disproportion between groups, social classes and countries, to ideological rivalries that are far from dead; from the opposition between economic interests to political polarization; from tribal differences to discrimination for social and religious reasons. Moreover, certain facts that are obvious to all constitute as it were the pitiful face of the division of which they are the fruit, and demonstrate its seriousness in an inescapably concrete way. Among the many other painful social phenomena of our times one can note:

- the trampling upon the basic rights of the human person, the first of these being the right to life and to a worthy quality of life, which is all the more scandalous in that it coexists with a rhetoric never before known on these same rights;

- hidden attacks and pressures against the freedom of individuals and groups, not excluding the freedom which is most offended against and threatened: the freedom to have, profess and practice one's own faith;

- the various forms of discrimination: racial, cultural, religious, etc.;

- violence and terrorism;

- the use of torture and unjust and unlawful methods of repression;

- the stockpiling of conventional or atomic weapons, the arms race with the spending on military purposes of sums which could be used to alleviate the undeserved misery of peoples that are socially and economically depressed;

- an unfair distribution of the world's resources and of the assets of civilization, which reaches its highest point in a type of social organization whereby the distance between the human conditions of the rich and the poor becomes ever greater.<sup>2</sup> The overwhelming power of this division makes the world in which we live a world shattered<sup>3</sup> to its very foundations.

2.3 Moreover, the Church – without identifying herself with the world or being of the world – is in the world and is engaged in dialogue with the world.<sup>4</sup> It is therefore not surprising if one notices in the structure of the Church herself repercussions and signs of the division affecting human society. Over and above the divisions between the Christian Communions that have afflicted her for centuries, the Church today is experiencing within herself sporadic divisions among her own members, divisions caused by differing views or options in the doctrinal and pastoral field.<sup>5</sup> These divisions too can at times seem incurable.

2.4 However disturbing these divisions may seem at first sight, it is only by a careful examination that one can detect their root: it is to be found in a wound in man's inmost self. In the light of faith we call it sin: beginning with original sin, which all of us bear from birth as an inheritance from our first parents, to the sin which each one of us commits when we abuse our own freedom.

<sup>3</sup> The idea of a "shattered world" is seen in the works of numerous contemporary writers, both Christian and non-Christian, witnesses of man's condition in this tormented period of history.

<sup>5</sup> At the very beginning of the Church, the Apostle Paul wrote with words of fire about division in the body of the Church, in the famous passage 1 Cor 1:10-16. ### Longing for reconciliation

3.1 Nevertheless, that same inquiring gaze, if it is discerning enough, detects in the very midst of division an unmistakable desire among people of good will and true Christians to mend the divisions, to heal the wounds and to reestablish at all levels, an essential unity. This desire arouses in many people a real longing for reconciliation even in cases where there is no actual use of this word.

3.2 Some consider reconciliation as an impossible dream which ideally might become the lever for a true transformation of society. For others, it is to be gained by arduous efforts and therefore a goal to be reached through serious reflection and action. Whatever the case, the longing for sincere and consistent reconciliation is without a shadow of doubt a fundamental driving force in our society, reflecting an irrepressible desire for peace. And it is as strongly so as the factors of division, even though this is a paradox.

3.3 But reconciliation cannot be less profound than the division itself. The longing for reconciliation, and reconciliation itself, will be complete and effective only to the extent that they reach – in order to heal it – that original wound which is the root of all other wounds: namely, sin.

Reconciliatio et Paenitentia

The Synod's view

4.1 Therefore, every institution or organization concerned with serving people and saving them in their fundamental dimensions must closely study reconciliation, in order to grasp more fully its meaning and significance, and in order to draw the necessary practical conclusions.

4.2 The Church of Jesus Christ could not fail to make this study. With the devotion of a Mother and the understanding of a Teacher, she earnestly and carefully applies herself to detecting in society not only the signs of division but also the no less eloquent and significant signs of the quest for reconciliation. For she knows that she especially has been given the ability, and assigned the mission, to make known the true and profoundly religious meaning of reconciliation and its full scope. She is thereby already helping to clarify the essential terms of the question of unity and peace.

4.3 My Predecessors constantly preached reconciliation, and invited to reconciliation the whole of humanity and every section and portion of the human community that they saw wounded and divided.<sup>6</sup> And I myself, by an interior impulse which – I am certain – was obeying both an inspiration from on high and the appeals of humanity, decided to emphasize the subject of reconciliation and to do this in two ways, each of them solemn and exacting. In the first place, by convoking the Sixth General Assembly of the Synod of Bishops; in the second place, by making reconciliation the center of the Jubilee Year called to celebrate the 1,950th anniversary of the Redemption.<sup>7</sup> Having to assign a theme to the Synod, I found myself fully in accord with the one suggested by many of my Brothers in the Episcopate, namely, the fruitful theme of reconciliation in close connection with the theme of penance.<sup>8</sup>

4.4 The term and the very concept of penance are very complex. If we link penance with the metánoia which the Synoptics refer to, it means the inmost change of heart under the influence of the word of God and in the perspective of the Kingdom.<sup>9</sup> But penance also means changing one's life in harmony with the change of heart, and in this sense doing penance is completed by bringing forth fruits worthy of penance:<sup>10</sup> it is one's whole existence that becomes penitential, that is to say, directed toward a continuous striving for what is better. But doing penance is something authentic and effective only if it is translated into deeds and acts of penance. In this sense, penance means, in the Christian theological and spiritual vocabulary, asceticism, that is to say, the concrete daily effort of a person, supported by God's grace, to lose his or her own life for Christ as the only means of gaining it<sup>11</sup>; an effort to put off the old man and put on the new<sup>12</sup>; an effort to overcome in oneself what is of the flesh in order that what is spiritual<sup>13</sup> may prevail; a continual effort to rise from the things of here below to the things of above, where Christ is.<sup>14</sup> Penance is therefore a conversion that passes from the heart to deeds, and then to the Christian's whole life.

4.5 In each of these meanings penance is closely connected with reconciliation, for reconciliation with God, with oneself and with others implies overcoming that radical break which is sin. And this is achieved only through the interior transformation or conversion which bears fruit in a person's life through acts of penance.

4.6 The basic document of the Synod (also called the Lineamenta), which was prepared with the sole purpose of presenting the theme while stressing certain fundamental aspects of it, enabled the ecclesial communities throughout the world to reflect for almost two years on these aspects of a question – that of conversion and reconciliation – which concerns everyone. It also enabled them to draw from it a fresh impulse for the Christian life and apostolate. That reflection was further deepened in the more immediate preparation for the work of the Synod, thanks to the Instrumentum Laboris which was sent in due course to the Bishops and their collaborators. After that, the Synod Fathers, assisted by all those called to attend the actual sessions, spent a whole month assiduously dealing with the theme itself and with the numerous and varied questions connected with it. There emerged from the discussions, from the common study and from the diligent and accurate work done, a large and precious treasure which the final Propositiones sum up in their essence.

4.7 The Synod's view does not ignore the acts of reconciliation (some of which pass almost unobserved in their daily ordinariness) which, though in differing degrees, serve to resolve the many tensions, to overcome the many conflicts and to conquer the divisions both large and small, by restoring unity. But the Synod's main concern was to discover, in the depth of these scattered acts, the hidden root – reconciliation so to speak “at the source,” which takes place in people's hearts and minds.

4.8 The Church's charism and likewise her unique nature vis-à-vis reconciliation, at whatever level it needs to be achieved, lie in the fact that she always goes back to that reconciliation at the source. For by reason of her essential mission, the Church feels an obligation to go to the roots of that original wound of sin, in order to bring healing and to reestablish, so to speak, an equally original reconciliation which will be the effective principle of all true reconciliation. This is the reconciliation which the Church had in mind and which she put forward through the Synod.

4.9 Sacred Scripture speaks to us of this reconciliation, inviting us to make every effort to attain it.<sup>15</sup> But Scripture also tells us that it is above all a merciful gift of God to humanity.<sup>16</sup> The history of salvation – the salvation of the whole of humanity, as well as of every human being of whatever period – is the wonderful history of a reconciliation: the reconciliation whereby God, as Father, in the Blood and the Cross of his Son made man, reconciles the world to himself and thus brings into being a new family of those who have been reconciled.

4.10 Reconciliation becomes necessary because there has been the break of sin from which derive all the other forms of break within man and about him. Reconciliation therefore, in order to be complete, necessarily requires liberation from sin, which is to be rejected in its deepest roots. Thus a close internal link unites conversion and reconciliation. It is impossible to split these two realities or to speak of one and say nothing of the other.

4.11 The Synod at the same time spoke about the reconciliation of the whole human family and of the conversion of the heart of every individual, of his or her return to God: it did so because it wished to recognize and proclaim the fact that there can be no union among people without an internal change in each individual. Personal conversion is the necessary path to harmony between individuals.<sup>17</sup> When the Church proclaims the good news of reconciliation, or proposes achieving it through the sacraments, she is exercising a truly prophetic role, condemning the evils of man in their infected source, showing the root of divisions and bringing hope in the possibility of overcoming tensions and conflict and reaching brotherhood, concord and peace at all levels and in all sections of human society. She is changing an historical condition of hatred and violence into a civilization of love. She is offering to everyone the evangelical and sacramental principle of that reconciliation at the source, from which comes every other gesture or act of reconciliation, also at the social level.

4.12 It is this reconciliation, the result of conversion, which is dealt with in the present Apostolic Exhortation. For, as happened at the end of the three previous Assemblies of the Synod, this time too the Fathers who had taken part presented the conclusions of the Synod's work to the Bishop of Rome, the universal Pastor of the Church and the Head of the College of Bishops, in his capacity as President of the Synod. I accepted, as a serious and welcome duty of my ministry, the task of drawing from the enormous abundance of the Synod in order to offer to the People of God, as the fruit of the same Synod, a doctrinal and pastoral message on the subject of penance and reconciliation. In the first part I shall speak of the Church in the carrying out of her mission of reconciliation, in the work of the conversion of hearts in order to bring about a renewed embrace between man and God, man and his brother, man and the whole of creation. In the second part there will be indicated the radical cause of all wounds and divisions between people, and in the first place between people and God: namely, sin. Afterward I shall indicate the means that enable the Church to promote and encourage full reconciliation between people and God and, as a consequence, of people with one another.

4.13 The document which I now entrust to the sons and daughters of the Church and also to all those who, whether they are believers or not, look to the Church with interest and sincerity, is meant to be a fitting response to what the Synod asked of me. But it is also – and I wish to say this clearly as a duty to truth and justice – something produced by the Synod itself. For the contents of these pages come from the Synod: from its remote and immediate preparation, from the Instrumentum Laboris, from the interventions in the Synod Hall and the circuli minores, and especially from the sixty-three propositions. Here we have the result of the joint work of the Fathers, who included the representatives of the Eastern Churches, whose theological, spiritual and liturgical heritage is so rich and venerable, also with regard to the subject that concerns us here. Furthermore, it was the Council of the Synod Secretariat which evaluated, in two important sessions, the results and orientations of the Synod Assembly just after it had ended, which highlighted the dynamics of the already mentioned Propositiones, and which then indicated the lines considered most suitable for the preparation of the present document. I am grateful to all those who did this work, and, in fidelity to my mission, I wish here to pass on the elements from the doctrinal and pastoral treasure of the Synod which seem to me providential for people's lives at this magnificent yet difficult moment in history.

4.14 It is appropriate – and very significant – to do this while there remains fresh in people's minds the memory of the Holy Year, which was lived in the spirit of penance, conversion and reconciliation. May this Exhortation, entrusted to my Brothers in the Episcopate and to their collaborators, the priests and deacons, to men and women Religious, and to all men and women of upright conscience, be a means of purification, enrichment and deepening in personal faith. May it also be a leaven capable of encouraging the growth in the midst of the world of peace and brotherhood, hope and joy – values which spring from the Gospel as it is accepted, meditated upon and lived day by day after the example of Mary, Mother of our Lord Jesus Christ, through whom it pleased God to reconcile all things to himself.<sup>18</sup>

NOTES:

<sup>6</sup> The Encyclical Letter Pacem in Terris (April 11, 1963), John XXIII's spiritual testament, is often considered a "social document" and even a "political message," and in fact it is, if these terms are understood in their broadest sense. As is evident more than twenty years after its publication, the document is in fact more than a strategy for the peaceful coexistence of people and nations; it is a pressing reminder of the higher values without which peace on earth becomes a mere dream. One of these values is precisely that of reconciliation among people, and John XXIII often referred to this subject. With regard to Paul VI, it will suffice to recall that in calling the Church and the world to celebrate the Holy Year of 1975, he wished "renewal and reconciliation” to be the central idea of that important event. Nor can one forget the catechesis which he devoted to this key theme, also in explaining the Jubilee itself.

<sup>7</sup> As I wrote in the Bull of Indiction of the Jubilee Year of the Redemption: “This special time, when all Christians are called upon to realize more profoundly their vocation to reconciliation with the Father in the Son, will only reach its full achievement if it leads to a fresh commitment by each and every person to the service of reconciliation, not only among all the disciples of Christ but also among all men and women”: Bull Aperite Portas Redemptori (January 6, 1983), 3: AAS 75 (1983), 93.

<sup>16</sup> “We also rejoice in God through our Lord Jesus Christ, through whom we have now received our reconciliation”: Rom 5:11; cf. Col 1:20.

<sup>17</sup> The Second Vatican Ecumenical Council noted in the Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World Gaudium et Spes, 10: “The dichotomy affecting the modern world is, in fact, a symptom of the deeper dichotomy that is in man himself. He is the meeting point of many conflicting forces. In his condition as a created being he is subject to a thousand shortcomings, but feels untrammelled in his inclinations and destined for a higher form of life. Torn by a welter of anxieties he is compelled to choose between them and repudiate some among them. Worse still, feeble and sinful as he is, he often does the very thing he hates and does not do what he wants (cf. Rom 7:14ff). And so he feels himself divided, and the result is a host of discords in social life.”

1. A Parable of Reconciliation

5.1 At the beginning of this Apostolic Exhortation there comes into my mind that extraordinary passage in Saint Luke, the deeply religious as well as human substance of which I have already sought to illustrate in a previous document.<sup>19</sup> I refer to the parable of the prodigal son.<sup>20</sup>

<sup>20</sup> Cf. Lk 15:11-32.

From the brother who was lost . . .

5.2 “There was a man who had two sons; the younger of them said to his father, ‘Father, give me the share of property that falls to me,’ ” says Jesus as he begins the dramatic story of that young man: the adventurous departure from his father’s house, the squandering of all his property in a loose and empty life, the dark days of exile and hunger, but even more of lost dignity, humiliation and shame and then nostalgia for his own home, the courage to go back, the father’s welcome. The father had certainly not forgotten his son, indeed he had kept unchanged his affection and esteem for him. So he had always waited for him, and now he embraces him and he gives orders for a great feast to celebrate the return of him who was dead, and is alive; “he was lost, and is found.”

5.3 This prodigal son is man – every human being: bewitched by the temptation to separate himself from his father in order to lead his own independent existence; disappointed by the emptiness of the mirage which had fascinated him; alone, dishonored, exploited when he tries to build a world all for himself; sorely tried, even in the depths of his own misery, by the desire to return to communion with his father. Like the father in the parable, God looks out for the return of his child, embraces him when he arrives and orders the banquet of the new meeting with which the reconciliation is celebrated.

5.4 The most striking element of the parable is the father’s festive and loving welcome of the returning son: it is a sign of the mercy of God, who is always willing to forgive. Let us say at once: reconciliation is principally a gift of the heavenly Father.

Reconciliatio et Paenitentia

... to the brother who stayed at home

6.1 But the parable also brings into the picture the elder brother, who refuses to take his place at the banquet. He rebukes his younger brother for his dissolute wanderings and he rebukes his father for the welcome given to the prodigal son while he himself, a temperate and hard-working person, faithful to father and home, has never been allowed – he says – to have a celebration with his friends. This is a sign that he does not understand the father's goodness. To the extent that this brother, too sure of himself and his own good qualities, jealous and haughty, full of bitterness and anger, is not converted and is not reconciled with his father and brother, the banquet is not yet fully the celebration of a reunion and rediscovery.

6.2 Man – every human being – is also this elder brother. Selfishness makes him jealous, hardens his heart, blinds him and shuts him off from other people and from God. The loving kindness and mercy of the father irritate and enrage him; for him the happiness of the brother who has been found again has a bitter taste.<sup>21</sup> From this point of view he too needs to be converted in order to be reconciled.

6.3 The parable of the prodigal son is above all the story of the inexpressible love of a Father – God – who offers to his son when he comes back to him the gift of full reconciliation. But when the parable evokes, in the figure of the elder son, the selfishness which divides the brothers, it also becomes the story of the human family: it describes our situation and shows the path to be followed. The prodigal son, in his anxiety for conversion, to return to the arms of his father and to be forgiven, represents those who are aware of the existence in their inmost hearts of a longing for reconciliation at all levels and without reserve, and who realize with an inner certainty that this reconciliation is possible only if it derives from a first and fundamental reconciliation – the one which brings a person back from distant separation to filial friendship with God, whose infinite mercy is clearly known. But if the parable is read from the point of view of the other son, it portrays the situation of the human family, divided by forms of selfishness. It throws light on the difficulty involved in satisfying the desire and longing for one reconciled and united family. It therefore reminds us of the need for a profound transformation of hearts through the rediscovery of the Father's mercy and through victory over misunderstanding and over hostility among brothers and sisters.

6.4 In the light of this inexhaustible parable of the mercy that wipes out sin, the Church takes up the appeal that the parable contains and grasps her mission of working, in imitation of the Lord, for the conversion of hearts and for the reconciliation of people with God and with one another – these being two realities that are intimately connected.

NOTES:

<sup>21</sup> In the Old Testament, the Book of Jonah is a wonderful anticipation and figure of this aspect of the parable. Jonah's sin is that he was "displeased . . . exceedingly and he was angry" because God is "a gracious God and merciful, slow to anger, and abounding in steadfast love, and repentest of evil." His sin is also that of pitying a castor oil plant "which came into being in a night and perished in a night" and not understanding that the Lord pities Nineveh (Jon 4:1-2, 10).

Reconciliatio et Paenitentia

2. At the Sources of Reconciliation

Reconciliatio et Paenitentia

In the light of Christ the Reconciler

7.1 As we deduce from the parable of the prodigal son, reconciliation is a gift of God, an initiative on his part. But our faith teaches us that this initiative takes concrete form in the mystery of Christ the Redeemer, the Reconciler and the Liberator of man from sin in all its forms. Saint Paul likewise does not hesitate to sum up in this task and function the incomparable mission of Jesus of Nazareth, the Word and the Son of God made man.

7.2 We too can start with this central mystery of the economy of salvation, the key to Saint Paul's Christology. "If while we were enemies we were reconciled to God by the death of his Son," writes Saint Paul, "much more, now that we are reconciled, shall we be saved by his life. Not only so, but we also rejoice in God through our Lord Jesus Christ, through whom we have now received our reconciliation."<sup>22</sup> Therefore, since "God was in Christ reconciling the world to himself," Paul feels inspired to exhort the Christians of Corinth: "Be reconciled to God."<sup>23</sup>

7.3 This mission of reconciliation through death on the Cross is spoken of in another terminology by the Evangelist John, when he observes that Christ had to die "to gather into one the children of God who are scattered abroad."<sup>24</sup>

7.4 But it is once more Saint Paul who enables us to broaden our vision of Christ's work to cosmic dimensions, when he writes that in Christ the Father has reconciled to himself all creatures, those in heaven and those on earth.<sup>25</sup> It can rightly be said of Christ the Redeemer that "in the time of wrath he was taken in exchange"<sup>26</sup> and that, if he is "our peace,"<sup>27</sup> he is also our reconciliation.

7.5 With every good reason his Passion and Death, sacramentally renewed in the Eucharist, are called by the Liturgy the "sacrifice of reconciliation":<sup>28</sup> reconciliation with God and with the brethren, since Jesus teaches that fraternal reconciliation must take place before the sacrifice is offered.<sup>29</sup>

7.6 Beginning with these and other significant passages in the New Testament, we can therefore legitimately relate all our reflections on the whole mission of Christ to his mission as the one who reconciles. Thus there must be proclaimed once more the Church's belief in Christ's redeeming act, in the Paschal Mystery of his Death and Resurrection, as the cause of man's reconciliation, in its twofold aspect of liberation from sin and communion of grace with God.

7.7 It is precisely before the sad spectacle of the divisions and difficulties in the way of reconciliation between people that I invite all to look to the mysterium Crucis as the loftiest drama in which Christ perceives and suffers to the greatest possible extent the tragedy of the division of man from God, so that he cries out in the words of the Psalmist: "My God, my God, why have you forsaken me?"<sup>30</sup> and at the same time accomplishes our reconciliation. With our eyes fixed on the mystery of Golgotha we should be reminded always of that “vertical” dimension of division and reconciliation concerning the relationship between man and God, a dimension which in the eyes of faith always prevails over the “horizontal” dimension, that is to say, over the reality of division between people and the need for reconciliation between them. For we know that reconciliation between people is and can only be the fruit of the redemptive act of Christ, who died and rose again to conquer the kingdom of sin, to reestablish the Covenant with God and thus break down the dividing wall<sup>31</sup> which sin had raised up between people.

The reconciling Church

8.1 But, as Pope Saint Leo said, speaking of Christ's Passion, "Everything that the Son of God did and taught for the reconciliation of the world we know not only from the history of his past actions, but we experience it also in the effectiveness of what he accomplishes in the present."<sup>32</sup> We experience the reconciliation which he accomplished in his humanity in the efficacy of the sacred mysteries which are celebrated by his Church, for which he gave his life and which he established as the sign and also the means of salvation.

8.2 This is stated by Saint Paul, when he writes that God has given to Christ's Apostles a share in his work of reconciliation. He says: "God . . . gave us the ministry of reconciliation . . . and the message of reconciliation."<sup>33</sup>

8.3 To the hands and lips of the Apostles, his messengers, the Father has mercifully entrusted a ministry of reconciliation, which they carry out in a singular way, by virtue of the power to act "in persona Christi." But the message of reconciliation has also been entrusted to the whole community of believers, to the whole fabric of the Church, that is to say, the task of doing everything possible to witness to reconciliation and to bring it about in the world.

8.4 It can be said that the Second Vatican Council too, in defining the Church as a "sacrament – a sign and instrument, that is, of communion with God and of unity among all people," and in indicating as the Church's function that of obtaining "full unity in Christ" for the "people of the present day . . . drawn ever more closely together by social, technical and cultural bonds,"<sup>34</sup> recognized that the Church must strive above all to bring all people to full reconciliation.

8.5 In intimate connection with Christ's mission, one can therefore sum up the Church's mission, rich and complex as it is, as being her central task of reconciling people: with God, with themselves, with neighbor, with the whole of creation; and this in a permanent manner since, as I said on another occasion, "the Church is also by her nature always reconciling."<sup>35</sup>

8.6 The Church is reconciling inasmuch as she proclaims the message of reconciliation, as she has always done throughout her history, from the Apostolic Council of Jerusalem<sup>36</sup> down to the latest Synod and the recent Jubilee of the Redemption. The originality of this proclamation is in the fact that for the Church reconciliation is closely linked with conversion of heart: this is the necessary path to understanding among human beings.

8.7 The Church is also reconciling inasmuch as she shows man the paths and offers the means for reaching this fourfold reconciliation. The paths are precisely those of conversion of heart and victory over sin, whether this latter is selfishness or injustice, arrogance or exploitation of others, attachment to material goods or the unrestrained quest for pleasure. The means are those of faithful and loving attention to God's word; personal and community prayer; and in particular the sacraments, true signs and instruments of reconciliation, among which there excels, precisely under this aspect, the one which we are rightly accustomed to call the Sacrament of Reconciliation or Penance, and to which we shall return later on.

<sup>36</sup> Cf. Acts 15:2-33.

The reconciled Church

9.1 My venerable Predecessor Paul VI commendably highlighted the fact that the Church, in order to evangelize, must begin by showing that she herself has been evangelized, that is to say, that she is open to the full and complete proclamation of the Good News of Jesus Christ in order to listen to it and put it into practice.<sup>37</sup> I too, by bringing together in one document the reflections of the Fourth General Assembly of the Synod, have spoken of a Church that is catechized to the extent that she carries out catechesis.<sup>38</sup>

9.2 I now do not hesitate to resume the comparison, insofar as it applies to the theme I am dealing with, in order to assert that the Church, if she is to be reconciling, must begin by being a reconciled Church. Beneath this simple and indicative expression lies the conviction that the Church, in order ever more effectively to proclaim and propose reconciliation to the world, must become ever more genuinely a community of disciples of Christ (even though it were only “the little flock” of the first days), united in the commitment to be continually converted to the Lord and to live as new people in the spirit and practice of reconciliation.

9.3 To the people of our time, so sensitive to the proof of concrete living witness, the Church is called upon to give an example of reconciliation particularly within herself. And for this purpose we must all work to bring peace to people’s minds, to reduce tensions, to overcome divisions and to heal wounds that may have been inflicted by brother on brother when the contrast of choices in the field of what is optional becomes acute; and on the contrary we must try to be united in what is essential for Christian faith and life, in accordance with the ancient maxim: in what is doubtful, freedom; in what is necessary, unity; in all things, charity.

9.4 It is in accordance with this same criterion that the Church must conduct her ecumenical activity. For in order to be completely reconciled, she knows that she must continue the quest for unity among those who are proud to call themselves Christians but who are separated from one another, also as Churches or Communions, and from the Church of Rome. The latter seeks a unity which, if it is to be the fruit and expression of true reconciliation, is meant to be based neither upon a disguising of the points that divide nor upon compromises which are as easy as they are superficial and fragile. Unity must be the result of a true conversion of everyone, the result of mutual forgiveness, of theological dialogue and fraternal relations, of prayer and of complete docility to the action of the Holy Spirit, who is also the Spirit of reconciliation.

9.5 Finally, in order that the Church may say that she is completely reconciled, she feels that it is her duty to strive ever harder, by promoting the “dialogue of salvation,”<sup>39</sup> to bring the Gospel to those vast sections of humanity in the modern world that do not share her faith, but even, as a result of growing secularism, keep their distance from her and oppose her with cold indifference, when they do not actually hinder and persecute her. She feels the duty to say once more to everyone in the words of Saint Paul: “Be reconciled to God.”<sup>40</sup>

9.6 At any rate, the Church promotes reconciliation in the truth, knowing well that neither reconciliation nor unity is possible outside or in opposition to the truth.

3. God's Initiative and the Church's Ministry

10.1 The Church, as a reconciled and reconciling community, cannot forget that at the source of her gift and mission of reconciliation is the initiative, full of compassionate love and mercy, of that God who is love<sup>41</sup> and who out of love created human beings<sup>42</sup>; and he created them so that they might live in friendship with him and in communion with one another.

<sup>42</sup> Cf. Wis 11:23-26; Gen 1:27; Ps 8:4-8.

Reconciliation comes from God

10.2 God is faithful to his eternal plan even when man, under the impulse of the Evil One<sup>43</sup> and carried away by his own pride, abuses the freedom given to him in order to love and generously seek what is good, and refuses to obey his Lord and Father. God is faithful even when man, instead of responding with love to God's love, opposes him and treats him like a rival, deluding himself and relying on his own power, with the resulting break of relationship with the one who created him. In spite of this transgression on man's part, God remains faithful in love. It is certainly true that the story of the Garden of Eden makes us think about the tragic consequences of rejecting the Father, which becomes evident in man's inner disorder and in the breakdown of harmony between man and woman, brother and brother.<sup>44</sup> Also significant is the Gospel parable of the two brothers who, in different ways, distance themselves from their father and cause a rift between them. Refusal of God's fatherly love and of his loving gifts is always at the root of humanity's divisions.

10.3 But we know that God, "rich in mercy,"<sup>45</sup> like the father in the parable, does not close his heart to any of his children. He waits for them, looks for them, goes to meet them at the place where the refusal of communion imprisons them in isolation and division. He calls them to gather about his table in the joy of the feast of forgiveness and reconciliation.

10.4 This initiative on God's part is made concrete and manifest in the redemptive act of Christ, which radiates through the world by means of the ministry of the Church.

10.5 For, according to our faith, the Word of God became flesh and came to dwell in the world; he entered into the history of the world, summing it up and recapitulating it in himself.<sup>46</sup> He revealed to us that God is love, and he gave us the "new commandment" of love,<sup>47</sup> at the same time communicating to us the certainty that the path of love is open for all people, so that the effort to establish universal brotherhood is not a vain one.<sup>48</sup> By conquering through his death on the Cross evil and the power of sin, by his loving obedience he brought salvation to all and became "reconciliation" for all. In him God reconciled man to himself.

10.6 The Church carries on the proclamation of reconciliation which Christ caused to echo through the villages of Galilee and all Palestine<sup>49</sup> and does not cease to invite all humanity to be converted and to believe in the Good News. She speaks in the name of Christ, making her own the appeal of Saint Paul which we have already recalled: "We are ambassadors for Christ, God making his appeal through us. We beseech you on behalf of Christ, be reconciled to God."<sup>50</sup>

10.7 Those who accept this appeal enter into the economy of reconciliation and experience the truth contained in that other affirmation of Saint Paul, that Christ “is our peace, who has made us both one, and has broken down the dividing wall of hostility . . . , so making peace” that he “might reconcile us both to God.”<sup>51</sup> This text directly concerns the overcoming of the religious division between Israel – as the Chosen People of the Old Testament – and the other peoples, all called to form part of the New Covenant. Nevertheless it contains the affirmation of the new spiritual universality desired by God and accomplished by him through the sacrifice of his Son, the Word made man, without limits or exclusions of any sort, for all those who are converted and who believe in Christ. We are all therefore called to enjoy the fruits of this reconciliation desired by God: every individual and every people.

The Church, the great sacrament of reconciliation

11.1 The Church has the mission of proclaiming this reconciliation and as it were of being its sacrament in the world. The Church is the sacrament, that is to say, the sign and means of reconciliation in different ways, which differ in value but which all come together to obtain what the divine initiative of mercy desires to grant to humanity.

11.2 She is a sacrament in the first place by her very existence as a reconciled community which witnesses to and represents in the world the work of Christ.

11.3 She is also a sacrament through her service as the custodian and interpreter of Sacred Scripture, which is the Good News of reconciliation inasmuch as it tells each succeeding generation about God's loving plan and shows to each generation the paths to universal reconciliation in Christ.

11.4 Finally she is a sacrament by reason of the seven sacraments which, each in its own way, "make the Church."<sup>52</sup> For since they commemorate and renew Christ's Paschal Mystery, all the sacraments are a source of life for the Church, and in the Church's hands they are means of conversion to God and of reconciliation among people.

Other means of reconciliation

12.1 The mission of reconciliation is proper to the whole Church, also and especially to that Church which has already been admitted to the full sharing in divine glory with the Virgin Mary, the angels and the saints, who contemplate and adore the thrice-holy God. The Church in heaven, the Church on earth and the Church in purgatory are mysteriously united in this cooperation with Christ in reconciling the world to God.

12.2 The first means of this salvific action is that of prayer. It is certain that the Blessed Virgin, Mother of Christ and of the Church,<sup>53</sup> and the saints who have now reached the end of their earthly journey and possess God's glory, sustain by their intercession their brethren who are on pilgrimage through the world, in the commitment to conversion, to faith, to getting up again after every fall, to acting in order to help the growth of communion and peace in the Church and in the world. In the mystery of the Communion of Saints universal reconciliation is accomplished in its most profound form, which is also the most fruitful for the salvation of all.

12.3 There is yet another means: that of preaching. The Church, since she is the disciple of the one Teacher Jesus Christ, in her own turn, as Mother and Teacher untiringly exhorts people to reconciliation. And she does not hesitate to condemn the evil of sin, to proclaim the need for conversion, to invite and ask people to "let themselves be reconciled." In fact, this is her prophetic mission in today's world, just as it was in the world of yesterday. It is the same mission as that of her Teacher and Head, Jesus. Like him, the Church will always carry out this mission with sentiments of merciful love and will bring to all people those words of forgiveness and that invitation to hope which come from the Cross.

12.4 There is also the often so difficult and demanding means of pastoral action aimed at bringing back every individual – whoever and wherever he or she may be – to the path, at times a long one, leading back to the Father in the communion of all the brethren.

12.5 Finally there is the means of witness, which is almost always silent. This is born from a twofold awareness on the part of the Church: that of being in herself "unfailingly holy,"<sup>54</sup> but also the awareness of the need to go forward and "daily be further purified and renewed, against the day when Christ will present her to himself in all her glory without spot or wrinkle," for, by reason of her sins, sometimes "the radiance of the Church's face shines less brightly" in the eyes of those who behold her.<sup>55</sup> This witness cannot fail to assume two fundamental aspects. The first aspect is that of being the sign of that universal charity which Jesus Christ left as an inheritance to his followers, as a proof of belonging to his Kingdom. The second aspect is translation into ever new manifestations of conversion and reconciliation both within the Church and outside her, by the overcoming of tensions, by mutual forgiveness, by growth in the spirit of brotherhood and peace which is to be spread throughout the world. By this means the Church will effectively be able to work for the creation of what my Predecessor Paul VI called the “civilization of love.”

The tragedy of man

13.1 In the words of Saint John the Apostle, “if we say we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us. If we confess our sins, he is faithful and just and will forgive our sins.”<sup>56</sup> Written at the very dawn of the Church, these inspired words introduce better than any other human expression the theme of sin, which is intimately connected with that of reconciliation. These words present the question of sin in its human dimension: sin as an integral part of the truth about man. But they immediately relate the human dimension to its divine dimension, where sin is countered by the truth of divine love, which is just, generous and faithful, and which reveals itself above all in forgiveness and redemption. Thus Saint John also writes a little further on that “whatever accusations (our conscience) may raise against us, God is greater than our conscience.”<sup>57</sup>

13.2 To acknowledge one’s sin, indeed – penetrating still more deeply into the consideration of one’s own personhood – to recognize oneself as being a sinner, capable of sin and inclined to commit sin, is the essential first step in returning to God. For example, this is the experience of David, who “having done what is evil in the eyes of the Lord” and having been rebuked by the Prophet Nathan,<sup>58</sup> exclaims: “For I know my transgressions, and my sin is ever before me. Against you, you alone, have I sinned and done what is evil in your sight.”<sup>59</sup> Similarly, Jesus himself puts the following significant words on the lips and in the heart of the prodigal son: “Father, I have sinned against heaven and before you.”<sup>60</sup>

13.3 In effect, to become reconciled with God presupposes and includes detaching oneself consciously and with determination from the sin into which one has fallen. It presupposes and includes, therefore, doing penance in the fullest sense of the term: repenting, showing this repentance, adopting a real attitude of repentance – which is the attitude of the person who starts out on the road of return to the Father. This is a general law and one which each individual must follow in his or her particular situation. For it is not possible to deal with sin and conversion only in abstract terms.

13.4 In the concrete circumstances of sinful humanity, in which there can be no conversion without the acknowledgment of one’s own sin, the Church’s ministry of reconciliation intervenes in each individual case with a precise penitential purpose. That is, the Church’s ministry intervenes in order to bring the person to the “knowledge of self” – in the words of Saint Catherine of Siena<sup>61</sup> – to the rejection of evil, to the reestablishment of friendship with God, to a new interior ordering, to a fresh ecclesial conversion. Indeed, even beyond the boundaries of the Church and the community of believers, the message and ministry of penance are addressed to all men and women, because all need conversion and reconciliation.<sup>62</sup>

13.5 In order to carry out this penitential ministry adequately, we shall have to evaluate the consequences of sin with “eyes enlightened”<sup>63</sup> by faith. These consequences of sin are the reasons for division and rupture, not only within each person, but also within the various circles of a person’s life: in relation to the family, to the professional and social environment, as can often be seen from experience; it is confirmed by the passage in the Bible about the city of Babel and its tower.<sup>64</sup> Intent on building what was to be at once a symbol and a source of unity, those people found themselves more scattered than before, divided in speech, divided among themselves, incapable of consensus and agreement.

13.6 Why did the ambitious project fail? Why did “the builders labor in vain”?<sup>65</sup> They failed because they had set up as a sign and guarantee of the unity they desired a work of their own hands alone, and had forgotten the action of the Lord. They had attended only to the horizontal dimension of work and social life, forgetting the vertical dimension by which they would have been rooted in God, their Creator and Lord, and would have been directed toward him as the ultimate goal of their progress.

13.7 Now it can be said that the tragedy of humanity today, as indeed of every period in history, consists precisely in its similarity to the experience of Babel.

1. The Mystery of Sin

14.1 If we read the passage in the Bible on the city and tower of Babel in the new light offered by the Gospel, and if we compare it with the other passage on the fall of our first parents, we can draw from it valuable elements for an understanding of the mystery of sin. This expression, which echoes what Saint Paul writes concerning the mystery of evil,<sup>66</sup> helps us to grasp the obscure and intangible element hidden in sin. Clearly, sin is a product of man's freedom. But deep within its human reality there are factors at work which place it beyond the merely human, in the border area where man's conscience, will and sensitivity are in contact with the dark forces which, according to Saint Paul, are active in the world almost to the point of ruling it.<sup>67</sup>

Disobedience to God

14.2 A first point which helps us to understand sin emerges from the biblical narrative on the building of the tower of Babel: the people sought to build a city, organize themselves into a society and to be strong and powerful without God, if not precisely against God.<sup>68</sup> In this sense the story of the first sin in Eden and the story of Babel, in spite of notable differences in content and form, have one thing in common: in both there is an exclusion of God, through direct opposition to one of his commandments, through an act of rivalry, through the mistaken pretension of being “like him.”<sup>69</sup> In the story of Babel the exclusion of God is presented not so much under the aspect of opposition to him as of forgetfulness and indifference toward him, as if God were of no relevance in the sphere of man’s joint projects. But in both cases the relationship to God is severed with violence. In the case of Eden there appears in all its seriousness and tragic reality that which constitutes the ultimate essence and darkness of sin: disobedience to God, to his law, to the moral norm that he has given man, inscribing it in his heart and confirming and perfecting it through revelation.

14.3 Exclusion of God, rupture with God, disobedience to God: throughout the history of mankind this has been and is, in various forms, sin. It can go as far as a very denial of God and his existence: this is the phenomenon called atheism.

14.4 It is the disobedience of a person who, by a free act, does not acknowledge God’s sovereignty over his or her life, at least at that particular moment in which he or she transgresses God’s law.

NOTES:

<sup>68</sup> The terminology used in the Septuagint Greek translation and in the New Testament for “sin” is significant. The most common term for sin is hamartía, with its various derivatives. It expresses the concept of offending more or less gravely against a norm or law, or against a person or even a divinity. But sin is also called adikía, and the concept here is of acting unjustly. The Bible also speaks of parábasis (transgression), asébeia (impiety) and other concepts. They all convey the image of sin.

<sup>69</sup> Gen 3:5: “And you will be like God, knowing good and evil”; cf. Gen 3:22.

Reconciliatio et Paenitentia

Division between brothers

15.1 In the biblical narratives mentioned above, man's rupture with God leads tragically to divisions between brothers.

15.2 In the description of the "first sin," the rupture with Yahweh simultaneously breaks the bond of friendship that had united the human family. Thus the subsequent pages of Genesis show us the man and the woman as it were pointing an accusing finger at each other.<sup>70</sup> Later we have the brother hating his brother and finally taking his life.<sup>71</sup>

15.3 According to the Babel story, the result of sin is the shattering of the human family, already begun with the first sin and now reaching its most extreme form on the social level.

15.4 No one wishing to investigate the mystery of sin can ignore this link between cause and effect. As a rupture with God, sin is an act of disobedience by a creature who rejects, at least implicitly, the very one from whom he came and who sustains him in life. It is therefore a suicidal act. Since by sinning man refuses to submit to God, his internal balance is also destroyed and it is precisely within himself that contradictions and conflicts arise. Wounded in this way, man almost inevitably causes damage to the fabric of his relationship with others and with the created world. This is an objective law and an objective reality, verified in so many ways in the human psyche and in the spiritual life, as well as in society, where it is easy to see the signs and effects of internal disorder.

15.5 The mystery of sin is composed of this twofold wound which the sinner opens in himself and in his relationship with his neighbor. Therefore one can speak of personal and social sin: from one point of view, every sin is personal; from another point of view, every sin is social, insofar as and because it also has social repercussions.

Personal sin and social sin

16.1 Sin, in the proper sense, is always a personal act, since it is an act of freedom on the part of an individual person, and not properly of a group or community. This individual may be conditioned, incited and influenced by numerous and powerful external factors. He may also be subjected to tendencies, defects and habits linked with his personal condition. In not a few cases such external and internal factors may attenuate, to a greater or lesser degree, the person's freedom and therefore his responsibility and guilt. But it is a truth of faith, also confirmed by our experience and reason, that the human person is free. This truth cannot be disregarded in order to place the blame for individuals' sins on external factors such as structures, systems or other people. Above all, this would be to deny the person's dignity and freedom, which are manifested – even though in a negative and disastrous way – also in this responsibility for sin committed. Hence there is nothing so personal and untransferable in each individual as merit for virtue or responsibility for sin.

16.2 As a personal act, sin has its first and most important consequences in the sinner himself: that is, in his relationship with God, who is the very foundation of human life; and also in his spirit, weakening his will and clouding his intellect.

16.3 At this point we must ask what was being referred to by those who, during the preparation of the Synod and in the course of its actual work, frequently spoke of social sin.

16.4 The expression and the underlying concept in fact have various meanings.

16.5 To speak of social sin means in the first place to recognize that, by virtue of human solidarity which is as mysterious and intangible as it is real and concrete, each individual's sin in some way affects others. This is the other aspect of that solidarity which on the religious level is developed in the profound and magnificent mystery of the Communion of Saints, thanks to which it has been possible to say that “every soul that rises above itself, raises up the world.”<sup>72</sup> To this law of ascent there unfortunately corresponds the law of descent.

Consequently one can speak of a communion of sin, whereby a soul that lowers itself through sin drags down with itself the Church and, in some way, the whole world. In other words, there is no sin, not even the most intimate and secret one, the most strictly individual one, that exclusively concerns the person committing it. With greater or lesser violence, with greater or lesser harm, every sin has repercussions on the entire ecclesial body and the whole human family. According to this first meaning of the term, every sin can undoubtedly be considered as social sin.

16.6 Some sins, however, by their very matter constitute a direct attack on one's neighbor and, more exactly, in the language of the Gospel, against one's brother or sister. They are an offense against God because they are offenses against one's neighbor. These sins are usually called social sins, and this is the second meaning of the term. In this sense social sin is sin against love of neighbor, and in the law of Christ it is all the more serious in that it involves the second commandment, which is "like unto the first."<sup>73</sup> Likewise, the term social applies to every sin against justice in interpersonal relationships, committed either by the individual against the community or by the community against the individual. Also social is every sin against the rights of the human person, beginning with the right to life and including the life of the unborn, or against a person's physical integrity. Likewise social is every sin against others' freedom, especially against the supreme freedom to believe in God and adore him; social is every sin against the dignity and honor of one's neighbor. Also social is every sin against the common good and its exigencies in relation to the whole broad spectrum of the rights and duties of citizens. The term social can be applied to sins of commission or omission – on the part of political, economic or trade union leaders, who though in a position to do so, do not work diligently and wisely for the improvement and transformation of society according to the requirements and potential of the given historic moment; as also on the part of workers who through absenteeism or non-cooperation fail to ensure that their industries can continue to advance the well-being of the workers themselves, of their families and of the whole of society.

16.7 The third meaning of social sin refers to the relationships between the various human communities. These relationships are not always in accordance with the plan of God, who intends that there be justice in the world, and freedom and peace between individuals, groups and peoples. Thus the class struggle, whoever the person who leads it or on occasion seeks to give it a theoretical justification, is a social evil. Likewise, obstinate confrontation between blocs of nations, between one nation and another, between different groups within the same nation – all this too is a social evil. In both cases one may ask whether moral responsibility for these evils, and therefore sin, can be attributed to any person in particular. Now it has to be admitted that realities and situations such as those described, when they become generalized and reach vast proportions as social phenomena, almost always become anonymous, just as their causes are complex and not always identifiable. Hence if one speaks of social sin here, the expression obviously has an analogical meaning. However, to speak even analogically of social sins must not cause us to underestimate the responsibility of the individuals involved. It is meant to be an appeal to the consciences of all, so that each may shoulder his or her responsibility seriously and courageously in order to change those disastrous conditions and intolerable situations.

16.8 Having said this in the clearest and most unequivocal way, one must add at once that there is one meaning sometimes given to social sin that is not legitimate or acceptable even though it is very common in certain quarters today.<sup>74</sup> This usage contrasts social sin and personal sin, not without ambiguity, in a way that leads more or less unconsciously to the watering down and almost the abolition of personal sin, with the recognition only of social guilt and responsibilities. According to this usage, which can readily be seen to derive from non-Christian ideologies and systems – which have possibly been discarded today by the very people who formerly officially upheld them – practically every sin is a social sin, in the sense that blame for it is to be placed not so much on the moral conscience of an individual but rather on some vague entity or anonymous collectivity, such as the situation, the system, society, structures, or institutions.

16.9 Whenever the Church speaks of situations of sin, or when she condemns as social sins certain situations or the collective behavior of certain social groups, big or small, or even of whole nations and blocs of nations, she knows and she proclaims that such cases of social sin are the result of the accumulation and concentration of many personal sins. It is a case of the very personal sins of those who cause or support evil or who exploit it; of those who are in a position to avoid, eliminate or at least limit certain social evils but who fail to do so out of laziness, fear or the conspiracy of silence, through secret complicity or indifference; of those who take refuge in the supposed impossibility of changing the world; and also of those who sidestep the effort and sacrifice required, producing specious reasons of a higher order. The real responsibility, then, lies with individuals.

16.10 A situation – or likewise an institution, a structure, society itself – is not in itself the subject of moral acts. Hence a situation cannot in itself be good or bad.

16.11 At the heart of every situation of sin are always to be found sinful people. So true is this that even when such a situation can be changed in its structural and institutional aspects by the force of law, or – as unfortunately more often happens – by the law of force, the change in fact proves to be incomplete, of short duration, and ultimately vain and ineffective – not to say counterproductive – if the people directly or indirectly responsible for that situation are not converted.

Mortal and venial

17.1 But here we come to a further dimension in the mystery of sin, one on which the human mind has never ceased to ponder: the question of its gravity. It is a question which cannot be overlooked and one which the Christian conscience has never refused to answer. Why and to what degree is sin a serious matter in the offense it commits against God and in its effects on man? The Church has a teaching on this matter which she reaffirms in its essential elements, while recognizing that it is not always easy in concrete situations to define clear and exact limits.

17.2 Already in the Old Testament, individuals guilty of several kinds of sins – sins committed deliberately,<sup>75</sup> the various forms of impurity,<sup>76</sup> idolatry,<sup>77</sup> the worship of false gods<sup>78</sup> – were ordered to be “taken away from the people,” which could also mean to be condemned to death.<sup>79</sup> Contrasted with these were other sins, especially sins committed through ignorance, that were forgiven by means of a sacrificial offering.<sup>80</sup>

17.3 In reference also to these texts, the Church has for centuries spoken of mortal sin and venial sin. But it is above all the New Testament that sheds light on this distinction and these terms. Here there are many passages which enumerate and strongly reprove sins that are particularly deserving of condemnation.<sup>81</sup> There is also the confirmation of the Decalogue by Jesus himself.<sup>82</sup> Here I wish to give special attention to two passages that are significant and impressive.

17.4 In a text of his First Letter, Saint John speaks of a sin which leads to death (pros thánaton), as opposed to a sin which does not lead to death (mè pros thánaton).<sup>83</sup> Obviously, the concept of death here is a spiritual death. It is a question of the loss of the true life or “eternal life,” which for John is knowledge of the Father and the Son,<sup>84</sup> and communion and intimacy with them. In that passage the sin that leads to death seems to be the denial of the Son,<sup>85</sup> or the worship of false gods.<sup>86</sup> At any rate, by this distinction of concepts John seems to wish to emphasize the incalculable seriousness of what constitutes the very essence of sin, namely the rejection of God. This is manifested above all in apostasy and idolatry: repudiating faith in revealed truth and making certain created realities equal to God, raising them to the status of idols or false gods.<sup>87</sup> But in this passage the Apostle’s intention is also to underline the certainty that comes to the Christian from the fact of having been “born of God” through the coming of the Son: the Christian possesses a power that preserves him from falling into sin; God protects him, and “the evil one does not touch him.” If he should sin through weakness or ignorance, he has confidence in being forgiven, also because he is supported by the joint prayer of the community.

17.5 In another passage of the New Testament, namely in Saint Matthew's Gospel,<sup>88</sup> Jesus himself speaks of a "blasphemy against the Holy Spirit" that "will not be forgiven" by reason of the fact that in its manifestation it is an obstinate refusal to be converted to the love of the Father of mercies.

17.6 Here of course it is a question of extreme and radical manifestations: rejection of God, rejection of his grace, and therefore opposition to the very source of salvation<sup>89</sup> – these are manifestations whereby a person seems to exclude himself voluntarily from the path of forgiveness. It is to be hoped that very few persist to the end in this attitude of rebellion or even defiance of God. Moreover, God in his merciful love is greater than our hearts, as Saint John further teaches us,<sup>90</sup> and can overcome all our psychological and spiritual resistance. So that, as Saint Thomas writes, "considering the omnipotence and mercy of God, no one should despair of the salvation of anyone in this life."<sup>91</sup>

17.7 But when we ponder the problem of a rebellious will meeting the infinitely just God, we cannot but experience feelings of salutary "fear and trembling," as Saint Paul suggests.<sup>92</sup> Moreover, Jesus' warning about the sin "that will not be forgiven" confirms the existence of sins which can bring down on the sinner the punishment of "eternal death."

17.8 In the light of these and other passages of Sacred Scripture, Doctors and theologians, spiritual teachers and pastors have divided sins into mortal and venial. Saint Augustine, among others, speaks of letalia or mortifera crimina, contrasting them with venialia, levia or quotidiana.<sup>93</sup> The meaning which he gives to these adjectives was to influence the successive Magisterium of the Church. After him, it was Saint Thomas who was to formulate in the clearest possible terms the doctrine which became constant in the Church.

17.9 In defining and distinguishing between mortal and venial sins, Saint Thomas and the theology of sin that has its source in him could not be unaware of the biblical reference and therefore of the concept of spiritual death. According to Saint Thomas, in order to live spiritually man must remain in communion with the supreme principle of life, which is God, since God is the ultimate end of man's being and acting. Now sin is a disorder perpetrated by man against this life-principle. And when "through sin, the soul commits a disorder that reaches the point of turning away from its ultimate end – God – to which it is bound by charity, then the sin is mortal; on the other hand, whenever the disorder does not reach the point of a turning away from God, the sin is venial."<sup>94</sup> For this reason venial sin does not deprive the sinner of sanctifying grace, friendship with God, charity, and therefore eternal happiness, whereas just such a deprivation is precisely the consequence of mortal sin.

17.10 Furthermore, when sin is considered from the point of view of the punishment it merits, for Saint Thomas and other Doctors mortal sin is the sin which, if unforgiven, leads to eternal punishment; whereas venial sin is the sin that merits merely temporal punishment (that is, a partial punishment which can be expiated on earth or in purgatory).

17.11 Considering sin from the point of view of its matter, the ideas of death, of radical rupture with God, the Supreme Good, of deviation from the path that leads to God or interruption of the journey toward him (which are all ways of defining mortal sin) are linked with the idea of the gravity of sin's objective content. Hence, in the Church's doctrine and pastoral action, grave sin is in practice identified with mortal sin.

17.12 Here we have the core of the Church's traditional teaching, which was reiterated frequently and vigorously during the recent Synod. The Synod in fact not only reaffirmed the teaching of the Council of Trent concerning the existence and nature of mortal and venial sins,<sup>95</sup> but it also recalled that mortal sin is sin whose object is grave matter and which is also committed with full knowledge and deliberate consent. It must be added – as was likewise done at the Synod – that some sins are intrinsically grave and mortal by reason of their matter. That is, there exist acts which, per se and in themselves, independently of circumstances, are always seriously wrong by reason of their object. These acts, if carried out with sufficient awareness and freedom, are always gravely sinful.<sup>96</sup>

17.13 This doctrine, based on the Decalogue and on the preaching of the Old Testament, and assimilated into the kerygma of the Apostles and belonging to the earliest teaching of the Church, and constantly reaffirmed by her to this day, is exactly verified in the experience of the men and women of all times. Man knows well by experience that, along the road of faith and justice which leads to the knowledge and love of God in this life and toward perfect union with him in eternity, he can cease to go forward or can go astray, without abandoning the way of God; and in this case there occurs venial sin. This, however, must never be underestimated, as though it were automatically something that can be ignored, or regarded as “a sin of little importance.”

17.14 For man also knows, through painful experience, that by a conscious and free act of his will he can change course and go in a direction opposed to God's will, separating himself from God (aversio a Deo), rejecting loving communion with him, detaching himself from the life-principle which God is, and consequently choosing death.

17.15 With the whole Tradition of the Church, we call mortal sin the act by which man freely and consciously rejects God, his law, the Covenant of love that God offers, preferring to turn in on himself or to some created and finite reality, something contrary to the divine will (conversio ad creaturam). This can occur in a direct and formal way in the sins of idolatry, apostasy and atheism; or in an equivalent way, as in every act of disobedience to God's commandments in a grave matter. Man perceives that this disobedience to God destroys the bond that unites him with his life-principle: it is a mortal sin, that is, an act which gravely offends God and ends in turning against man himself with a dark and powerful force of destruction.

17.16 During the Synod Assembly some Fathers proposed a threefold distinction of sins, classifying them as venial, grave and mortal. This threefold distinction might illustrate the fact that there is a scale of seriousness among grave sins. But it still remains true that the essential and decisive distinction is between sin which destroys charity, and sin which does not kill the supernatural life: there is no middle way between life and death.

17.17 Likewise, care will have to be taken not to reduce mortal sin to an act of "fundamental option" – as is commonly said today – against God, intending thereby an explicit and formal contempt for God or neighbor. For mortal sin exists also when a person knowingly and willingly, for whatever reason, chooses something gravely disordered. In fact, such a choice already includes contempt for the divine law, a rejection of God's love for humanity and the whole of creation: the person turns away from God and loses charity. Thus the fundamental orientation can be radically changed by individual acts. Clearly there can occur situations which are very complex and obscure from a psychological viewpoint, and which have an influence on the sinner's subjective culpability. But from a consideration of the psychological sphere one cannot proceed to the construction of a theological category, which is what the "fundamental option" precisely is, understanding it in such a way that it objectively changes or casts doubt upon the traditional concept of mortal sin.

17.18 While every sincere and prudent attempt to clarify the psychological and theological mystery of sin is to be valued, the Church nevertheless has a duty to remind all scholars in this field of the need to be faithful to the word of God that teaches us also about sin. She likewise has to remind them of the risk of contributing to a further weakening of the sense of sin in the modern world.

Reconciliatio et Paenitentia

The loss of the sense of sin

18.1 Over the course of generations, the Christian mind has gained from the Gospel as it is read in the ecclesial community a fine sensitivity and an acute perception of the seeds of death contained in sin, as well as a sensitivity and an acuteness of perception for identifying them in the thousand guises under which sin shows itself. This is what is commonly called the sense of sin.

18.2 This sense is rooted in man's moral conscience and is as it were its thermometer. It is linked to the sense of God, since it derives from man's conscious relationship with God as his Creator, Lord and Father. Hence, just as it is impossible to eradicate completely the sense of God or to silence the conscience completely, so the sense of sin is never completely eliminated.

18.3 Nevertheless, it happens not infrequently in history, for more or less lengthy periods and under the influence of many different factors, that the moral conscience of many people becomes seriously clouded. "Have we the right idea of conscience?" – I asked two years ago in an address to the faithful – "Is it not true that modern man is threatened by an eclipse of conscience? By a deformation of conscience? By a numbness or 'deadening' of conscience?"<sup>97</sup> Too many signs indicate that such an eclipse exists in our time. This is all the more disturbing in that conscience, defined by the Council as "the most secret core and sanctuary of a man,"<sup>98</sup> is "strictly related to human freedom. . . . For this reason conscience, to a great extent, constitutes the basis of man's interior dignity and, at the same time, of his relationship to God."<sup>99</sup> It is inevitable therefore that in this situation there is an obscuring also of the sense of sin, which is closely connected with the moral conscience, the search for truth and the desire to make a responsible use of freedom. When the conscience is weakened the sense of God is also obscured, and as a result, with the loss of this decisive inner point of reference, the sense of sin is lost. This explains why my Predecessor Pius XII one day declared, in words that have almost become proverbial, that "the sin of the century is the loss of the sense of sin."<sup>100</sup>

18.4 Why has this happened in our time? A glance at certain aspects of contemporary culture can help us to understand the progressive weakening of the sense of sin, precisely because of the crisis of conscience and crisis of the sense of God already mentioned.

18.5 "Secularism" is by nature and definition a movement of ideas and behavior which advocates a humanism totally without God, completely centered upon the cult of action and production and caught up in the heady enthusiasm of consumerism and pleasure-seeking, unconcerned with the danger of "losing one's soul." This secularism cannot but undermine the sense of sin. At the very most, sin will be reduced to what offends man. But it is precisely here that we are faced with the bitter experience which I already alluded to in my first Encyclical, namely, that man can build a world without God, but this world will end by turning against him.<sup>101</sup> In fact, God is the origin and the supreme end of man, and man carries in himself a divine seed.<sup>102</sup> Hence it is the reality of God that reveals and illustrates the mystery of man. It is therefore vain to hope that there will take root a sense of sin against man and against human values, if there is no sense of offense against God, namely the true sense of sin.

18.6 Another reason for the disappearance of the sense of sin in contemporary society is to be found in the errors made in evaluating certain findings of the human sciences. Thus on the basis of certain affirmations of psychology, concern to avoid creating feelings of guilt or to place limits on freedom leads to a refusal ever to admit any shortcoming. Through an undue extrapolation of the criteria of the science of sociology, it finally happens – as I have already said – that all failings are blamed upon society, and the individual is declared innocent of them. Again, a certain cultural anthropology so emphasizes the undeniable environmental and historical conditioning and influences which act upon man that it reduces his responsibility to the point of not acknowledging his ability to perform truly human acts and therefore his ability to sin.

18.7 The sense of sin also easily declines as a result of a system of ethics deriving from a certain historical relativism. This may take the form of an ethical system which relativizes the moral norm, denying its absolute and unconditional value, and as a consequence denying that there can be intrinsically illicit acts independent of the circumstances in which they are performed by the subject. Herein lies a real “overthrowing and downfall of moral values,” and “the problem is not so much one of ignorance of Christian ethics,” but ignorance “rather of the meaning, foundations and criteria of the moral attitude.”<sup>103</sup> Another effect of this ethical turning upside down is always such an attenuation of the notion of sin as almost to reach the point of saying that sin does exist but no one knows who commits it.

18.8 Finally the sense of sin disappears, when – as can happen in the education of youth, in the mass media and even in education within the family – it is wrongly identified with a morbid feeling of guilt, or with the mere transgression of legal norms and precepts.

18.9 The loss of the sense of sin is thus a form or consequence of the denial of God: not only in the form of atheism but also in the form of secularism. If sin is the breaking off of one’s filial relationship to God in order to situate one’s life outside of obedience to him, then to sin is not merely to deny God. To sin is also to live as if he did not exist, to eliminate him from one’s daily life. A model of society which is mutilated or distorted in one sense or another, as is often encouraged by the mass media, greatly favors the gradual loss of the sense of sin. In such a situation the obscuring or weakening of the sense of sin comes from several sources: from a rejection of any reference to the transcendent in the name of the individual's aspiration to personal independence; from acceptance of ethical models imposed by general consensus and behavior, even when condemned by the individual conscience; from the tragic social and economic conditions that oppress a great part of humanity, causing a tendency to see errors and faults only in the context of society; finally and especially, from the obscuring of the notion of God's fatherhood and dominion over man's life.

18.10 Even in the field of the thought and life of the Church certain trends inevitably favor the decline of the sense of sin. For example, some are inclined to replace exaggerated attitudes of the past with other exaggerations: from seeing sin everywhere they pass to not recognizing it anywhere; from too much emphasis on the fear of eternal punishment they pass to preaching a love of God that excludes any punishment deserved by sin; from severity in trying to correct erroneous consciences they pass to a kind of respect for conscience which excludes the duty of telling the truth. And should it not be added that the confusion caused in the consciences of many of the faithful by differences of opinions and teachings in theology, preaching, catechesis and spiritual direction on serious and delicate questions of Christian morals ends by diminishing the true sense of sin almost to the point of eliminating it altogether? Nor can certain deficiencies in the practice of sacramental Penance be overlooked. These include the tendency to obscure the ecclesial significance of sin and of conversion and to reduce them to merely personal matters; or vice versa, the tendency to nullify the personal value of good and evil and to consider only their community dimension. There also exists the danger, never totally eliminated, of routine ritualism that deprives the sacrament of its full significance and formative effectiveness.

18.11 The restoration of a proper sense of sin is the first way of facing the grave spiritual crisis looming over man today. But the sense of sin can only be restored through a clear reminder of the unchangeable principles of reason and faith which the moral teaching of the Church has always upheld.

18.12 There are good grounds for hoping that a healthy sense of sin will once again flourish, especially in the Christian world and in the Church. This will be aided by sound catechetics, illuminated by the biblical theology of the Covenant, by an attentive listening and trustful openness to the Magisterium of the Church, which never ceases to enlighten consciences, and by an ever more careful practice of the Sacrament of Penance.

2. “Mysterium Pietatis”

19.1 In order to understand sin we have had to direct our attention to its nature as made known to us by the revelation of the economy of salvation: this is the mysterium iniquitatis. But in this economy sin is not the main principle, still less the victor. Sin fights against another active principle which – to use a beautiful and evocative expression of Saint Paul – we can call the mysterium or sacramentum pietatis. Man’s sin would be the winner and in the end destructive, God’s salvific plan would remain incomplete or even totally defeated, if this mysterium pietatis were not made part of the dynamism of history in order to conquer man’s sin.

19.2 We find this expression in one of Saint Paul’s Pastoral Letters, the First Letter to Timothy. It appears unexpectedly, as if by an exuberant inspiration. The Apostle had previously devoted long paragraphs of his message to his beloved disciple to an explanation of the meaning of the ordering of the community (the liturgical order and the related hierarchical one). Next he had spoken of the role of the heads of the community, before turning to the conduct of Timothy himself in “the Church of the living God, the pillar and bulwark of the truth.” Then at the end of the passage, suddenly but with a profound purpose he evokes the element which gives meaning to everything that he has written: “Great indeed, we confess, is the mystery of our religion.”<sup>104</sup>

19.3 Without in the least betraying the literal sense of the text, we can broaden this magnificent theological insight of Saint Paul into a more complete vision of the role which the truth proclaimed by him plays in the economy of salvation: “Great indeed,” we repeat with him, “is the mystery of our religion,” because it conquers sin.

19.4 But what is the meaning of this expression, in Paul’s mind?

NOTES:

<sup>104</sup> 1 Tim 3:15-16.

It is Christ himself

20.1 It is profoundly significant that when Paul presents this mysterium pietatis he simply transcribes, without making a grammatical link with what he has just written,<sup>105</sup> three lines of a Christological hymn which – in the opinion of authoritative scholars – was used in the Greek-speaking Christian communities.

20.2 In the words of that hymn, full of theological content and rich in noble beauty, those first-century believers professed their faith in the mystery of Christ, whereby:

- he was made manifest in the reality of human flesh and was constituted by the Holy Spirit as the Just One who offers himself for the unjust;

- he appeared to the angels, having been made greater than them, and he was preached to the nations, as the bearer of salvation;

- he was believed in, in the world, as the one sent by the Father, and by the same Father assumed into heaven, as Lord.<sup>106</sup>

20.3 The mystery or sacrament of pietas, therefore, is the very mystery of Christ. It is, in a striking summary, the mystery of the Incarnation and Redemption, of the full Passover of Jesus, the Son of God and Son of Mary: the mystery of his Passion and Death, of his Resurrection and glorification. What Saint Paul in quoting the phrases of the hymn wished to emphasize was that this mystery is the hidden vital principle which makes the Church the house of God, the pillar and bulwark of the truth. Following the Pauline teaching, we can affirm that this same mystery of God's infinite loving kindness toward us is capable of penetrating to the hidden roots of our iniquity, in order to evoke in the soul a movement of conversion, in order to redeem it and set it on course toward reconciliation.

20.4 Saint John too, undoubtedly referring to this mystery, but in his own characteristic language which differs from Saint Paul's, was able to write that "anyone born of God does not sin, but he who was born of God keeps him, and the evil one does not touch him."<sup>107</sup> In this Johannine affirmation there is an indication of hope, based on the divine promises: the Christian has received the guarantee and the necessary strength not to sin. It is not a question therefore of a sinlessness acquired through one's own virtue or even inherent in man, as the Gnostics thought. It is a result of God's action. In order not to sin the Christian has knowledge of God, as Saint John reminds us in this same passage. But a little before he had written: "No one born of God commits sin; for God's seed abides in him."<sup>108</sup> If by "God's seed" we understand, as some commentators suggest, Jesus the Son of God, then we can say that in order not to sin, or in order to gain freedom from sin, the Christian has within himself the presence of Christ and the mystery of Christ, which is the mystery of God's loving kindness.

NOTES:

<sup>105</sup> The text presents a certain difficulty, since the relative pronoun which opens the literal translation does not agree with the neuter mysterion. Some later manuscripts have adjusted the text in order to correct the grammar. But it was Paul's intention merely to put next to what he had written a venerable text which for him was fully explanatory.

<sup>106</sup> The early Christian community expresses its faith in the crucified and glorified Christ, whom the angels adore and who is the Lord. But the striking element of this message remains the phrase "manifested in the flesh": that the eternal Son of God became man is the "great mystery."

The effort of the Christian

21.1 But there is another aspect to the mysterium pietatis: the loving kindness of God toward the Christian must be matched by the piety of the Christian toward God. In this second meaning of the word, piety (eusébeia) means precisely the conduct of the Christian who responds to God's fatherly loving kindness with his own filial piety.

21.2 In this sense too we can say with Saint Paul that "great indeed is the mystery of our religion." In this sense too piety, as a force for conversion and reconciliation, confronts iniquity and sin. In this case too the essential aspects of the mystery of Christ are the object of piety in the sense that the Christian accepts the mystery, contemplates it and draws from it the spiritual strength necessary for living according to the Gospel. Here too one must say that "no one born of God commits sin"; but the expression has an imperative sense: sustained by the mystery of Christ as by an interior source of spiritual energy, the Christian, being a child of God, is warned not to sin, and indeed receives the commandment not to sin but to live in a manner worthy of "the house of God, that is the Church of the living God."109

Toward a reconciled life

22.1 Thus the word of Scripture, as it reveals to us the mystery of pietas, opens the intellect to conversion and reconciliation, understood not as lofty abstractions but as concrete Christian values to be achieved in our daily lives.

22.2 Deceived by the loss of the sense of sin and at times tempted by an illusion of sinlessness which is not at all Christian, the people of today too need to listen again to Saint John's admonition, as addressed to each one of them personally: "If we say we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us,"<sup>110</sup> and indeed "the whole world is in the power of the evil one."<sup>111</sup> Every individual therefore is invited by the voice of divine truth to examine realistically his or her conscience, and to confess that he or she has been brought forth in iniquity, as we say in the Miserere Psalm.<sup>112</sup>

22.3 Nevertheless, though threatened by fear and despair, the people of today can feel uplifted by the divine promise which opens to them the hope of full reconciliation.

22.4 The mystery of pietas, on God's part, is that mercy in which our Lord and Father – I repeat it again – is infinitely rich.<sup>113</sup> As I said in my Encyclical on the subject of divine mercy,<sup>114</sup> it is a love more powerful than sin, stronger than death. When we realize that God's love for us does not cease in the face of our sin or recoil before our offenses, but becomes even more attentive and generous; when we realize that this love went so far as to cause the Passion and Death of the Word made flesh who consented to redeem us at the price of his own blood, then we exclaim in gratitude: "Yes, the Lord is rich in mercy," and even: "The Lord is mercy."

22.5 The mystery of pietas is the path opened by divine mercy to a reconciled life.

The Pastoral Ministry of Penance and Reconciliation

Reconciliatio et Paenitentia

Promoting penance and reconciliation

23.1 To evoke conversion and penance in man's heart and to offer him the gift of reconciliation is the specific mission of the Church as she continues the redemptive work of her divine Founder. It is not a mission which consists merely of a few theoretical statements and the putting forward of an ethical ideal unaccompanied by the energy with which to carry it out. Rather it seeks to express itself in precise ministerial functions, directed toward a concrete practice of penance and reconciliation.

23.2 We can call this ministry, which is founded on and illumined by the principles of faith which we have explained, and which is directed toward precise objectives and sustained by adequate means, the pastoral activity of penance and reconciliation. Its point of departure is the Church's conviction that man, to whom every form of pastoral activity is directed but principally that of penance and reconciliation, is the man marked by sin whose striking image is to be found in King David. Rebuked by the Prophet Nathan, David faces squarely his own iniquity and confesses: "I have sinned against the Lord,"<sup>115</sup> and proclaims: "I know my transgressions, and my sin is ever before me."<sup>116</sup> But he also prays: "Purge me with hyssop, and I shall be clean; wash me, and I shall be whiter than snow,"<sup>117</sup> and he receives the response of the divine mercy: "The Lord has put away your sin; you shall not die."<sup>118</sup>

23.3 The Church thus finds herself face to face with man – with the whole human world – wounded by sin and affected by sin in the innermost depths of his being. But at the same time he is moved by an unrestrainable desire to be freed from sin and, especially if he is a Christian, he is aware that the mystery of pietas, Christ the Lord, is already acting in him and in the world by the power of the Redemption.

23.4 The Church's reconciling role must therefore be carried out in accordance with that intimate link which closely connects the forgiveness and remission of the sin of each person with the fundamental and full reconciliation of humanity which took place with the Redemption. This link helps us to understand that, since sin is the active principle of division – division between man and the nature created by God – only conversion from sin is capable of bringing about a profound and lasting reconciliation wherever division has penetrated.

23.5 I do not need to repeat what I have already said about the importance of this "ministry of reconciliation,"<sup>119</sup> and of the pastoral activity whereby it is carried out, in the Church's consciousness and life. This pastoral activity would be lacking an essential aspect of its being and failing in an indispensable function if the "message of reconciliation"<sup>120</sup> were not proclaimed with clarity and tenacity in season and out of season, and if the gift of reconciliation were not offered to the world. But it is worth repeating that the importance of the ecclesial service of reconciliation extends beyond the confines of the Church to the whole world.

23.6 To speak of the pastoral activity of penance and reconciliation, then, is to refer to all the tasks incumbent on the Church, at all levels, for their promotion. More concretely, to speak of this pastoral activity is to evoke all the activities whereby the Church, through each and every one of her members – Pastors and faithful, at all levels and in all spheres, and with all the means at her disposal, words and actions, teaching and prayer – leads people individually or as groups to true penance and thus sets them on the path to full reconciliation.

23.7 The Fathers of the Synod, as representatives of their brother Bishops and as leaders of the people entrusted to them, concerned themselves with the most practical and concrete elements of this pastoral activity. And I am happy to echo their concerns by associating myself with their anxieties and hopes, by receiving the results of their research and experiences, and by encouraging them in their plans and achievements. May they find in this part of the present Apostolic Exhortation the contribution which they themselves made to the Synod, a contribution the usefulness of which I wish to extend, through these pages, to the whole Church.

23.8 I therefore propose to call attention to the essentials of the pastoral activity of penance and reconciliation by emphasizing, with the Synod Assembly, the following two points:

1. The means used and the paths followed by the Church in order to promote penance and reconciliation.
2. The Sacrament par excellence of Penance and Reconciliation.

1. The Promotion of Penance and Reconciliation: Ways and Means

24 In order to promote penance and reconciliation, the Church has at her disposal two principal means which were entrusted to her by her Founder himself: catechesis and the sacraments. Their use has always been considered by the Church as fully in harmony with the requirements of her salvific mission and at the same time as corresponding to the requirements and spiritual needs of people in all ages. This use can be in forms and ways both old and new, among which it will be a good idea to remember in particular what we can call, in the expression of my Predecessor Paul VI, the method of dialogue.

Reconciliatio et Paenitentia

Dialogue

25.1 For the Church, dialogue is in a certain sense a means and especially a way of carrying out her activity in the modern world.

25.2 The Second Vatican Council proclaims that “the Church, by virtue of her mission to shed on the whole world the radiance of the Gospel message, and to unify under one Spirit all people . . . stands forth as a sign of that fraternal solidarity which allows honest dialogue and invigorates it.” The Council adds that the Church should be capable of “establishing an ever more fruitful dialogue among all those who compose the one People of God,”<sup>121</sup> and also of “establishing a dialogue with human society.”<sup>122</sup>

25.3 My Predecessor Paul VI devoted to dialogue a considerable part of his first Encyclical Ecclesiam Suam, in which he describes it and significantly characterizes it as the dialogue of salvation.<sup>123</sup>

25.4 The Church in fact uses the method of dialogue in order the better to lead people – both those who through Baptism and the profession of faith acknowledge their membership of the Christian community and also those who are outside – to conversion and repentance, along the path of a profound renewal of their own consciences and lives, in the light of the mystery of the Redemption and salvation accomplished by Christ and entrusted to the ministry of his Church. Authentic dialogue, therefore, is aimed above all at the rebirth of individuals, through interior conversion and repentance, but always with profound respect for consciences and with patience and at the step-by-step pace indispensable for modern conditions.

25.5 Pastoral dialogue aimed at reconciliation continues to be today a fundamental task of the Church in different spheres and at different levels.

25.6 The Church in the first place promotes an ecumenical dialogue, that is, with Churches and Ecclesial Communities which profess faith in Christ, the Son of God and only Savior. She also promotes dialogue with the other communities of people who are seeking God and wish to have a relationship of communion with him.

25.7 At the basis of this dialogue with the other Churches and Christian Communities and with the other religions, and as a condition of her credibility and effectiveness, there must be a sincere effort of permanent and renewed dialogue within the Catholic Church herself. She is aware that, by her nature, she is the sacrament of the universal communion of charity<sup>124</sup>; but she is equally aware of the tensions within her, tensions which risk becoming factors of division.

25.8 The heartfelt and determined invitation which was already extended by my Predecessor in preparation for the 1975 Holy Year<sup>125</sup> is also valid at the present moment. In order to overcome conflicts and to ensure that normal tensions do not prove harmful to the unity of the Church, we must all apply to ourselves the word of God; we must relinquish our own subjective views and seek the truth where it is to be found, namely in the divine word itself and in the authentic interpretation of that word provided by the Magisterium of the Church. In this light, listening to one another, respect, refraining from all hasty judgments, patience, the ability to avoid subordinating the faith which unites to the opinions, fashions and ideological choices which divide – these are all qualities of a dialogue within the Church which must be persevering, open and sincere. Obviously dialogue would not have these qualities and would not become a factor of reconciliation if the Magisterium were not heeded and accepted.

25.9 Thus actively engaged in seeking her own internal communion, the Catholic Church can address an appeal for reconciliation to the other Churches with which there does not exist full communion, as well as to the other religions and even to all those who are seeking God with a sincere heart. This she has been doing for some time.

25.10 In the light of the Council and of the Magisterium of my Predecessors, whose precious inheritance I have received and am making every effort to preserve and put into effect, I can affirm that the Catholic Church at every level is committed to frank ecumenical dialogue, without facile optimism but also without distrust and without hesitation or delays. The fundamental laws which she seeks to follow in this dialogue are, on the one hand, the conviction that only a spiritual ecumenism – namely an ecumenism founded on common prayer and in a common docility to the one Lord – enables us to make a sincere and serious response to the other exigencies of ecumenical action.<sup>126</sup> The other law is the conviction that a certain facile irenicism in doctrinal and especially dogmatic matters could perhaps lead to a form of superficial and short-lived coexistence, but it could not lead to that profound and stable communion which we all long for. This communion will be reached at the hour willed by divine Providence. But in order to reach it, the Catholic Church, for her part, knows that she must be open and sensitive to all “the truly Christian endowments from our common heritage which are to be found among our separated brethren”<sup>127</sup>; but she also knows that she must likewise base a frank and constructive dialogue upon a clarity regarding her own positions, and upon fidelity and consistency with the faith transmitted and defined in accordance with the perennial tradition of her Magisterium. Notwithstanding the threat of a certain defeatism, and despite the inevitable slowness which rashness could never correct, the Catholic Church continues with all other Christian brethren to seek the paths to unity, and with the followers of the other religions she continues to seek to have sincere dialogue.

May this interreligious dialogue lead to the overcoming of all attitudes of hostility, distrust, mutual condemnation and even mutual invective, which is the precondition for encounter at least in faith in one God and in the certainty of eternal life for the immortal soul. May the Lord especially grant that ecumenical dialogue will also lead to a sincere reconciliation concerning everything that we already have in common with the other Christian Churches: faith in Jesus Christ, the Son of God made man, our Savior and Lord; a listening to the word; the study of revelation and the Sacrament of Baptism.

25.11 To the extent to which the Church is capable of generating active harmony – unity in variety – within herself, and of offering herself as a witness to and humble servant of reconciliation with the other Churches and Ecclesial Communities and the other religions, she becomes, in the expressive definition of Saint Augustine, a “reconciled world.”<sup>128</sup> Then she will be able to be a sign of reconciliation in the world and for the world.

25.12 The Church is aware of the extreme seriousness of the situation created by the forces of division and war, which today constitute a grave threat not only to the balance and harmony of nations but to the very survival of humanity, and she feels it her duty to offer and suggest her own unique collaboration for the overcoming of conflicts and the restoration of concord.

25.13 It is a complex and delicate dialogue of reconciliation in which the Church is engaged, especially through the work of the Holy See and its different organisms. The Holy See already endeavors to intervene with the leaders of nations and the heads of the various international bodies, or seeks to associate itself with them, conduct a dialogue with them and encourage them to dialogue with one another, for the sake of reconciliation in the midst of the many conflicts. It does this not for ulterior motives or hidden interests – since it has none – but “out of a humanitarian concern,”<sup>129</sup> placing its institutional structure and moral authority, which are altogether unique, at the service of concord and peace. It does this in the conviction that as “in war two parties rise against one another” so “in the question of peace there are also necessarily two parties which must know how to commit themselves,” and in this “one finds the true meaning of a dialogue for peace.”<sup>130</sup>

25.14 The Church engages in dialogue for reconciliation also through the Bishops in the competency and responsibility proper to them, either individually in the direction of their respective local Churches or united in their Episcopal Conferences, with the collaboration of the priests and of all those who make up the Christian communities. They truly fulfill their task when they promote this indispensable dialogue and proclaim the human and Christian need for reconciliation and peace. In communion with their Pastors, the laity, who have as “their own field of evangelizing activity . . . the vast and complicated world of politics, society . . . economics . . . (and) international life,”<sup>131</sup> are called upon to engage directly in dialogue or to work for dialogue aimed at reconciliation. Through them too the Church carries out her reconciling activity. Thus the fundamental presupposition and secure basis for any lasting renewal of society and for peace between nations lies in the regeneration of hearts through conversion and penance.

25.15 It should be repeated that, on the part of the Church and her members, dialogue, whatever form it takes (and these forms can be and are very diverse, since the very concept of dialogue has an analogical value), can never begin from an attitude of indifference to the truth. On the contrary, it must begin from a presentation of the truth, offered in a calm way, with respect for the intelligence and consciences of others. The dialogue of reconciliation can never replace or attenuate the proclamation of the truth of the Gospel, the precise goal of which is conversion from sin and communion with Christ and the Church. It must be at the service of the transmission and realization of that truth through the means left by Christ to the Church for the pastoral activity of reconciliation, namely catechesis and penance.

Catechesis

26.1 In the vast area in which the Church has the mission of operating through dialogue, the pastoral ministry of penance and reconciliation is directed to the members of the body of the Church principally through an adequate catechesis concerning the two distinct and complementary realities to which the Synod Fathers gave a particular importance and which they emphasized in some of the concluding Propositiones: these are penance and reconciliation. Catechesis is therefore the first means to be used.

26.2 At the basis of the Synod's very opportune recommendation is a fundamental presupposition: what is pastoral is not opposed to what is doctrinal. Nor can pastoral action prescind from doctrinal content, from which in fact it draws its substance and real validity. Now, if the Church is the "pillar and bulwark of the truth"132 and is placed in the world as Mother and Teacher, how could she neglect the task of teaching the truth which constitutes a path of life?

26.3 From the pastors of the Church one expects, first of all, catechesis on reconciliation. This must be founded on the teaching of the Bible, especially the New Testament, on the need to rebuild the Covenant with God in Christ the Redeemer and Reconciler. And, in the light of this new communion and friendship, and as an extension of it, it must be founded on the teaching concerning the need to be reconciled with one's brethren, even if this means interrupting the offering of the sacrifice.133 Jesus strongly insists on this theme of fraternal reconciliation: for example, when he invites us to turn the other cheek to the one who strikes us, and to give our cloak too to the one who has taken our coat,134 or when he instills the law of forgiveness: forgiveness which each one receives in the measure that he or she forgives,135 forgiveness to be offered even to enemies,136 forgiveness to be granted seventy times seven times,137 which means in practice without any limit. On these conditions, which are realizable only in a genuinely evangelical climate, it is possible to have a true reconciliation between individuals, families, communities, nations and peoples. From these biblical data on reconciliation there will naturally derive a theological catechesis, which in its synthesis will also integrate the elements of psychology, sociology and the other human sciences which can serve to clarify situations, describe problems accurately, and persuade listeners or readers to make concrete resolutions.

26.4 The pastors of the Church are also expected to provide catechesis on penance. Here too the richness of the biblical message must be its source. With regard to penance this message emphasizes particularly its value for conversion, which is the term that attempts to translate the word in the Greek text, metánoia,<sup>138</sup> which literally means to allow the spirit to be overturned in order to make it turn toward God. These are also the two fundamental elements which emerge from the parable of the son who was lost and found: his “coming to himself”<sup>139</sup> and his decision to return to his father. There can be no reconciliation unless these attitudes of conversion come first, and catechesis should explain them with concepts and terms adapted to people’s various ages and their differing cultural, moral and social backgrounds.

26.5 This is a first value of penance and it extends into a second: penance also means repentance. The two meanings of metánoia appear in the significant instruction given by Jesus: “If your brother repents (= returns to you), forgive him; and if he sins against you seven times in the day, and turns to you seven times and says, ‘I repent,’ you must forgive him.”<sup>140</sup> A good catechesis will show how repentance, just like conversion, is far from being a superficial feeling but a real overturning of the soul.

26.6 A third value is contained in penance, and this is the movement whereby the preceding attitudes of conversion and repentance are manifested externally: this is doing penance. This meaning is clearly perceptible in the term metánoia, as used by John the Baptist in the texts of the Synoptics.<sup>141</sup> To do penance means, above all, to reestablish the balance and harmony broken by sin, to change direction even at the cost of sacrifice.

26.7 A catechesis on penance, therefore, and one that is as complete and adequate as possible, is absolutely essential at a time like ours, when dominant attitudes in psychology and social behavior are in such contrast with the threefold value just illustrated. Contemporary man seems to find it harder than ever to recognize his own mistakes and to decide to retrace his steps and begin again after changing course. He seems very reluctant to say “I repent” or “I am sorry.” He seems to refuse instinctively, and often irresistibly, anything that is penance in the sense of a sacrifice accepted and carried out for the correction of sin. In this regard I would like to emphasize that the Church’s penitential discipline, even though it has been mitigated for some time, cannot be abandoned without grave harm both to the interior life of individual Christians and of the ecclesial community, and also to their capacity for missionary influence. It is not uncommon for non-Christians to be surprised at the negligible witness of true penance on the part of Christ’s followers. It is clear, however, that Christian penance will only be authentic if it is inspired by love and not by mere fear; if it consists in a serious effort to crucify the “old man” so that the “new” can be born by the power of Christ; if it takes as its model Christ, who though he was innocent chose the path of poverty, patience, austerity and, one can say, the penitential life.

26.8 As the Synod recalled, the pastors of the Church are also expected to provide catechesis on conscience and its formation. This too is a very relevant topic, in view of the fact that, in the upheavals to which our present culture is subjected, this interior sanctuary, man's innermost self, his conscience, is too often attacked, put to the test, confused and obscured. Valuable guidelines for a wise catechesis on conscience can be found both in the Doctors of the Church and in the theology of the Second Vatican Council, and especially in the documents on the Church in the modern world<sup>142</sup> and on religious liberty.<sup>143</sup> Along these same lines, Pope Paul VI often reminded us of the nature and role of conscience in our life.<sup>144</sup> I myself, following his footsteps, miss no opportunity to throw light on this most lofty element of man's greatness and dignity,<sup>145</sup> this "sort of moral sense which leads us to discern what is good and what is evil . . . like an inner eye, a visual capacity of the spirit, able to guide our steps along the path of good." And I have reiterated the need to form one's conscience, lest it become "a force which is destructive of the true humanity of the person, rather than that holy place where God reveals to him his true good."<sup>146</sup>

26.9 On other points too, of no less relevance for reconciliation, one looks to the pastors of the Church for catechesis.

26.10 On the sense of sin, which, as I have said, has become considerably weakened in our world.

26.11 On temptation and temptations: the Lord Jesus himself, the Son of God, "who in every respect has been tempted as we are, yet without sin,"<sup>147</sup> allowed himself to be tempted by the Evil One<sup>148</sup> in order to show that, like himself, his followers too would be subjected to temptation, and in order to show how one should behave when subjected to temptation. For those who beseech the Father not to be tempted beyond their own strength<sup>149</sup> and not to succumb to temptation,<sup>150</sup> and for those who do not expose themselves to occasions of sin, being subjected to temptation does not mean that they have sinned; rather it is an opportunity for growing in fidelity and consistency through humility and watchfulness.

26.12 Catechesis is also expected on fasting: this can be practiced in old forms and new, as a sign of conversion, repentance and personal mortification and, at the same time, as a sign of union with Christ Crucified and of solidarity with the starving and suffering.

26.13 Catechesis on almsgiving: this is a means of making charity a practical thing, by sharing what one possesses with those suffering the consequences of poverty.

26.14 Catechesis on the intimate connection which links the overcoming of divisions in the world with perfect communion with God and among people, which is the eschatological purpose of the Church.

26.15 Catechesis on the concrete circumstances in which reconciliation has to be achieved (in the family, in the civil community, in social structures) and particularly catechesis on the four reconciliations which repair the four fundamental rifts: reconciliation of man with God, with self, with the brethren and with the whole of creation.

26.16 Nor can the Church omit, without serious mutilation of her essential message, a constant catechesis on what the traditional Christian language calls the four last things of man: death, judgment (universal and particular), hell and heaven. In a culture which tends to imprison man in the earthly life at which he is more or less successful, the pastors of the Church are asked to provide a catechesis which will reveal and illustrate with the certainties of faith what comes after the present life: beyond the mysterious gates of death, an eternity of joy in communion with God or the punishment of separation from him. Only in this eschatological vision can one realize the exact nature of sin and feel decisively moved to penance and reconciliation.

26.17 Pastors who are zealous and creative never lack opportunities for imparting this broad and varied catechesis, taking into account the different degrees of education and religious formation of those to whom they speak. Such opportunities are often given by the biblical readings and the rites of the Mass and the sacraments, as also by the circumstances of their celebration. For the same purpose many initiatives can be taken such as sermons, lectures, discussions, meetings, courses of religious education, etc., as happens in many places. Here I wish to point out in particular the importance and effectiveness of the old-style popular missions for the purposes of such catechesis. If adapted to the peculiar needs of the present time, such missions can be, today as yesterday, a useful instrument of religious education also regarding penance and reconciliation.

26.18 In view of the great relevance of reconciliation based on conversion in the delicate field of human relationships and social interaction at all levels, including the international level, catechesis cannot fail to inculcate the valuable contribution of the Church's social teaching. The timely and precise teaching of my Predecessors from Pope Leo XIII onward, to which was added the substantial contribution the Pastoral Constitution Gaudium et Spes of the Second Vatican Council and the contributions of the different Episcopates elicited by various circumstances in their respective countries, has made up an ample and solid body of doctrine. This regards the many different needs inherent in the life of the human community, in relationships between individuals, families, groups in their different spheres, and in the very constitution of a society that intends to follow the moral law, which is the foundation of civilization.

26.19 At the basis of this social teaching of the Church there is obviously to be found the vision which the Church draws from the word of God concerning the rights and duties of individuals, the family and the community; concerning the value of liberty and the nature of justice; concerning the primacy of charity; concerning the dignity of the human person and the exigencies of the common good, to which politics and the economy itself must be directed. Upon these fundamental principles of the social Magisterium, which confirm and repropose the universal dictates of reason and of the conscience of peoples, there rests in great part the hope for a peaceful solution to many social conflicts and, in short, the hope for universal reconciliation.

The sacraments

27.1 The second divinely instituted means which the Church offers for the pastoral activity of penance and reconciliation is constituted by the sacraments.

27.2 In the mysterious dynamism of the sacraments, so rich in symbolism and content, one can discern one aspect which is not always emphasized: each sacrament, over and above its own proper grace, is also a sign of penance and reconciliation. Therefore in each of them it is possible to relive these dimensions of the spirit.

27.3 Baptism is of course a salvific washing which, as Saint Peter says, is effective “not as a removal of dirt from the body but as an appeal to God for a clear conscience.”<sup>151</sup> It is death, burial and resurrection with the dead, buried and risen Christ.<sup>152</sup> It is a gift of the Holy Spirit through Christ.<sup>153</sup> But this essential and original constituent of Christian Baptism, far from eliminating the penitential element already present in the Baptism which Jesus himself received from John “to fulfill all righteousness,”<sup>154</sup> in fact enriches it. In other words, it is a fact of conversion and of reintegration into the right order of relationships with God, of reconciliation with God, with the elimination of the original stain and the consequent introduction into the great family of the reconciled.

27.4 Confirmation likewise, as a ratification of Baptism and together with Baptism a sacrament of initiation, in conferring the fullness of the Holy Spirit and in bringing the Christian life to maturity, signifies and accomplishes thereby a greater conversion of the heart and brings about a more intimate and effective membership of the same assembly of the reconciled, which is the Church of Christ.

27.5 The definition which Saint Augustine gives of the Eucharist as “sacramentum pietatis, signum unitatis, vinculum caritatis”<sup>155</sup> clearly illustrates the effects of personal sanctification (pietas) and community reconciliation (unitas and caritas) which derive from the very essence of the Eucharistic mystery as an unbloody renewal of the Sacrifice of the Cross, the source of salvation and of reconciliation for all people.

27.6 However, it must be remembered that the Church, guided by faith in this great Sacrament, teaches that no Christian who is conscious of grave sin can receive the Eucharist before having obtained God’s forgiveness. This we read in the Instruction Eucharisticum Mysterium which, duly approved by Paul VI, fully confirms the teaching of the Council of Trent: “The Eucharist is to be offered to the faithful also ‘as a remedy, which frees us from daily faults and preserves us from mortal sin’ and they are to be shown the fitting way of using the penitential parts of the liturgy of the Mass. The person who wishes to receive Holy Communion is to be reminded of the precept: ‘Let a man examine himself’ (1 Cor 11:28). And the Church’s custom shows that such an examination is necessary, because no one who is conscious of being in mortal sin, however contrite he may believe himself to be, is to approach the Holy Eucharist without having first made a sacramental confession. If this person finds himself in need and has no means of going to confession, he should first make an act of perfect contrition.”<sup>156</sup>

27.7 The Sacrament of Orders is intended to give to the Church the pastors who, besides being teachers and guides, are called to be witnesses and workers of unity, builders of the family of God, and defenders and preservers of the communion of this family against the sources of division and dispersion.

27.8 The Sacrament of Matrimony, the exaltation of human love under the action of grace, is a sign of the love of Christ for the Church. But it is also a sign of the victory which Christ grants to couples in resisting the forces which deform and destroy love, in order that the family born from this sacrament may be a sign also of the reconciled and reconciling Church for a world reconciled in all its structures and institutions.

27.9 Finally, the Anointing of the Sick, in the trial of illness and old age and especially at the Christian’s final hour, is a sign of definitive conversion to the Lord and of total acceptance of suffering and death as a penance for sins. And in this is accomplished supreme reconciliation with the Father.

27.10 However, among the sacraments there is one which, though it has often been called the Sacrament of Confession because of the accusation of sins which takes place in it, can more appropriately be considered by antonomasia the Sacrament of Penance, as it is in fact called. And thus it is the sacrament of conversion and reconciliation. The recent Synod particularly concerned itself with this sacrament because of its importance with regard to reconciliation.

2. The Sacrament of Penance and Reconciliation

28.1 In all its phases and at all its levels, the Synod considered with the greatest attention that sacramental sign which represents and at the same time accomplishes penance and reconciliation. This sacrament in itself certainly does not contain all possible ideas of conversion and reconciliation. From the very beginning, in fact, the Church has recognized and used many and varying forms of penance. Some are liturgical or paraliturgical and include the penitential act in the Mass, services of atonement and pilgrimages; others are of an ascetical character, such as fasting. But of all such acts none is more significant, more divinely efficacious or more lofty and at the same time easily accessible as a rite than the Sacrament of Penance.

28.2 From its preparatory stage, and then in the numerous interventions during the sessions, in the group meetings and in the final Propositiones, the Synod took into account the statement frequently made, with varying nuances and emphases, namely: the Sacrament of Penance is in crisis. The Synod took note of this crisis. It recommended a more profound catechesis, but it also recommended a no less profound analysis of a theological, historical, psychological, sociological and juridical character of penance in general and of the Sacrament of Penance in particular. In all of this the Synod's intention was to clarify the reasons for the crisis and to open the way to a positive solution, for the good of humanity. Meanwhile, from the Synod itself the Church has received a clear confirmation of its faith regarding the sacrament which gives to every Christian and to the whole community of believers the certainty of forgiveness through the power of the redeeming blood of Christ.

28.3 It is good to renew and reaffirm this faith at a moment when it might be weakening, losing something of its completeness or entering into an area of shadow and silence, threatened as it is by the negative elements of the above-mentioned crisis. For the Sacrament of Confession is indeed being undermined, on the one hand by the obscuring of the moral and religious conscience, the lessening of a sense of sin, the distortion of the concept of repentance, and the lack of effort to live an authentically Christian life. And on the other hand it is being undermined by the sometimes widespread idea that one can obtain forgiveness directly from God, even in a habitual way, without approaching the Sacrament of Reconciliation. A further negative influence is the routine of a sacramental practice sometimes lacking in fervor and real spontaneity, deriving perhaps from a mistaken and distorted idea of the effects of the sacrament.

28.4 It is therefore appropriate to recall the principal aspects of this great sacrament.

Reconciliatio et Paenitentia

“Whose sins you shall forgive”

29.1 The Books of the Old and New Testament provide us with the first and fundamental fact concerning the Lord’s mercy and forgiveness. In the Psalms and in the preaching of the Prophets, the name merciful is perhaps the one most often given to the Lord, in contrast to the persistent cliché whereby the God of the Old Testament is presented above all as severe and vengeful. Thus in the Psalms there is a long sapiential passage drawing from the Exodus tradition, which recalls God’s kindly action in the midst of his people. This action, though represented in an anthropomorphic way, is perhaps one of the most eloquent Old Testament proclamations of the divine mercy. Suffice it to quote the verse: “Yet he, being compassionate, forgave their iniquity and did not destroy them; he restrained his anger often, and did not stir up all his wrath. He remembered that they were but flesh, a wind that passes and comes not again.”<sup>157</sup>

29.2 In the fullness of time, the Son of God, coming as the Lamb who takes away and bears upon himself the sin of the world,<sup>158</sup> appears as the one who has the power both to judge<sup>159</sup> and to forgive sins,<sup>160</sup> and who has come not to condemn but to forgive and save.<sup>161</sup>

29.3 Now this power to “forgive sins” Jesus confers, through the Holy Spirit, upon ordinary men, themselves subject to the snare of sin, namely his Apostles: “Receive the Holy Spirit. Whose sins you shall forgive, they are forgiven; whose sins you shall retain, they are retained.”<sup>162</sup> This is one of the most awe-inspiring innovations of the Gospel! He confers this power on the Apostles also as something which they can transmit – as the Church has understood it from the beginning – to their successors, charged by the same Apostles with the mission and responsibility of continuing their work as proclaimers of the Gospel and ministers of Christ’s redemptive work.

29.4 Here there is seen in all its grandeur the figure of the minister of the Sacrament of Penance, who by very ancient custom is called the confessor.

29.5 Just as at the altar where he celebrates the Eucharist and just as in each one of the sacraments, so the priest, as the minister of Penance, acts “in persona Christi.” The Christ whom he makes present and who accomplishes the mystery of the forgiveness of sins is the Christ who appears as the brother of man,<sup>163</sup> the merciful High Priest, faithful and compassionate,<sup>164</sup> the Shepherd intent on finding the lost sheep,<sup>165</sup> the Physician who heals and comforts,<sup>166</sup> the one Master who teaches the truth and reveals the ways of God,<sup>167</sup> the Judge of the living and the dead,<sup>168</sup> who judges according to the truth and not according to appearances.<sup>169</sup>

29.6 This is undoubtedly the most difficult and sensitive, the most exhausting and demanding ministry of the priest, but also one of the most beautiful and consoling. Precisely for this reason and with awareness also of the strong recommendation of the Synod, I will never grow weary of exhorting my brothers, the Bishops and priests, to the faithful and diligent performance of this ministry.<sup>170</sup> Before the consciences of the faithful, who open up to him with a mixture of fear and trust, the confessor is called to a lofty task which is one of service to penance and human reconciliation. It is a task of learning the weaknesses and falls of those faithful people, assessing their desire for renewal and their efforts to achieve it, discerning the action of the Holy Spirit in their hearts, imparting to them a forgiveness which God alone can grant, “celebrating” their reconciliation with the Father, portrayed in the parable of the prodigal son, reinstating these redeemed sinners in the ecclesial community with their brothers and sisters, and paternally admonishing these penitents with a firm, encouraging and friendly “Do not sin again.”<sup>171</sup>

29.7 For the effective performance of this ministry, the confessor must necessarily have human qualities of prudence, discretion, discernment and a firmness tempered by gentleness and kindness. He must likewise have a serious and careful preparation, not fragmentary but complete and harmonious, in the different branches of theology, pedagogy and psychology, in the methodology of dialogue, and above all in a living and communicable knowledge of the word of God. But it is even more necessary that he should live an intense and genuine spiritual life. In order to lead others along the path of Christian perfection the minister of Penance himself must first travel this path. More by actions than by long speeches he must give proof of real experience of lived prayer, the practice of the theological and moral virtues of the Gospel, faithful obedience to the will of God, love of the Church and docility to her Magisterium.

29.8 All this fund of human gifts, Christian virtues and pastoral capabilities has to be worked for and is only acquired with effort. Every priest must be trained for the ministry of sacramental Penance from his years in the seminary, not only through the study of dogmatic, moral, spiritual and pastoral theology (which are simply parts of a whole), but also through the study of the human sciences, training in dialogue and especially in how to deal with people in the pastoral context. He must then be guided and looked after in his first activities. He must always ensure his own improvement and updating by means of permanent study. What a wealth of grace, true life and spiritual radiation would be poured out on the Church if every priest were careful never to miss, through negligence or various excuses, the appointment with the faithful in the confessional, and if he were even more careful never to go to it unprepared or lacking the necessary human qualities and spiritual and pastoral preparation!

29.9 In this regard I cannot but recall with devout admiration those extraordinary apostles of the confessional such as Saint John Nepomucene, Saint John Vianney, Saint Joseph Cafasso and Saint Leopold of Castelnuovo, to mention only the best-known confessors whom the Church has added to the list of her saints. But I also wish to pay homage to the innumerable host of holy and almost always anonymous confessors to whom is owed the salvation of so many souls who have been helped by them in conversion, in the struggle against sin and temptation, in spiritual progress and, in a word, in achieving holiness. I do not hesitate to say that even the great canonized saints are generally the fruit of those confessionals, and not only the saints but also the spiritual patrimony of the Church and the flowering of a civilization permeated with the Christian spirit! Praise then to this silent army of our brothers who have served well and serve each day the cause of reconciliation through the ministry of sacramental Penance!

The sacrament of forgiveness

30.1 From the revelation of the value of this ministry and power to forgive sins, conferred by Christ on the Apostles and their successors, there developed in the Church an awareness of the sign of forgiveness, conferred through the Sacrament of Penance. It is the certainty that the Lord Jesus himself instituted and entrusted to the Church – as a gift of his goodness and loving kindness<sup>172</sup> to be offered to all – a special sacrament for the forgiveness of sins committed after Baptism.
