

A piece of the high speed network that connects several major points on the Internet. These "backbones" are often fiber optic cables, capable of moving millions of bytes of information in a single second.