Introduction

Aelorea. Paaz-Iru. Axia. Sylvari. Most of thee probably do not know what these words mean, or perhaps thou knowest a couple, but thee are rusty on the others. It is for that very reason that I crafted this manual, that it might help thee learn of these things and the wonders they encompass. Ah, but where are my manners! Thou doth not even know mine name! Allow me to introduce myself: my name is Elanthelos the Elder, Sage of the University of Stalis. It has been my task for these last forty or fifty winters to chronicle the lands of my beloved homeland, known to thee as Mythosa. Starting out as a young, enthusiastic, adventuresome pup, I traveled the length and breadth of this marvelous world of ours, gathering information, making observations, listening to legends and stories, and writing, constantly writing, that I might recount to thee all thee would ever need to know about our realms. While this work is not by any means compleat, it is the most comprehensive work on the land to date (pardon my lack of modesty).

Why did I write this book? Well, it became known to the Sages of the University of Stalis that a great many people who should know much of our world knew in fact very little. These people included kings, ambassadors, merchants, and other such folk. The Sages also learned that persons from other worlds were journeying to Mythosa - as far-fetched as this may seem - and had little, if any, knowledge of our fair realms. For this reason, they commissioned myself (actually, I volunteered whole-heartedly) to journey throughout the continents, gather what I could, and return with my notes. Well, after forty-odd years, I came back, with a caravan filled with material. Compilation and editing took the past four years, but now, with the generous assistance of the Iberian Press, I may share our fair world with thee, o gentle reader. Welcome to the world of Mythosa! Marvel at the heights of the Stone Curtain, the beauty of Havenwood, and the power of the Council of Nine! Learn thee lessons from the wasteland of Kharas, and experience the future in Ilmara. The gates are open, dear reader. It is up to you to step through. I welcome you, and I dearly hope you enjoy your stay.

Chapter the First:

Overview of Mythosa

Mythosa's Place in the Cosmos

The world upon which we live is known as Mythosa. According to the Royal Ambian Ministry of Astronomical Studies, the world is a planet; that is, a spherical object suspended by no means (as our ancestry thought), but which exists in space, an ether between our world, the stars, and other heavenly bodies. From their findings, they have determined our world to have a diameter of approximately 2,160 lenars, and a circumference of 6,790 lenars. Mythosa is the third planet from the Eye of Alluminara (this name is derived from the ancient belief that this was an eye of the Sun God; perhaps it is truth). Two planets have been observed to be closer to the sun, and have been given the name Harkis and Relnac. There are at least two worlds beyond Mythosa (Odaes and Llar); if there are more, or if any kind of life exists on these other spheres, their discovery will have to wait until more powerful telescopes are developed.

The world of Mythosa is orbited by five moons, three considered 'major' and two considered 'minor.' The major moons are Axia, Ataxia, and Eqlos. The moon Axia is the brightest of the three, appearing pure white in the evening sky. Eqlos appears with a dimmer light, more of a greyish tone. The moon Ataxia, however, reflects no light, and actually seems to absorb that light which approaches it. It can be seen as a round shadow in the sky. Magi, druids, and others say that these moons are representative of the Pantheonic Philosophy, and that the moons have a great deal of power, especially during certain phases and conjunctions. The minor moons are known as Meera and Ralos. They appear as slightly greyish orbs and look like smaller versions of Eqlos. The magickal community attributes no special qualities to the minor moons, but those who believe in lycanthropy claim that when these moons are full, those under the Curse of the Beast change their form...

The Known Continents of Mythosa

In the known reaches of our world are three major land masses, surrounded by hundreds of islands and countless seas. The first of these is the continent containing the realms collectively known as Yara-Kai and Ryh'ardha. The two regions are separated by the Great Barrier Desert, so easterners know little about the oriental lands. Yara-Kai extends for about 400 lenars westward, where oceans then cut it off. The north of the continent is home to the Savageland Jungles, an immense tropical rain forest, covering thousands of square lenars. The extent of the lands beyond the Savagelands is unknown, but it is said to go hundreds of lenars north, beyond the equator.

To the southeast of the Ryh'ardhan/Yara Kain continent, one finds the land mass containing Arsaenea and the Eastern Reaches. These two areas have some separation by the Wild Plains (a region of steppes and barbarian clans, also known as the Barbarian Plains), but the contact is greater than in the north. The Eastern Reaches extend for 300 lenars or so to the east, then break up into huge archipelagoes. The extreme southern regions of the continent have not yet been explored, as they are close to the southern pole, and are extremely dangerous and treacherous.

The other major land mass known is the Outremer. Discovered relatively recently, this area is west of Arsaenea. Only a small part of the Outremer has been explored and settled, and the lands to the west of the colonies remain very much a mystery.

Finally, there are the Island Kingdoms, also known as the Ocean Kingdoms. Found in the seas between Ryh'ardha and Arsaenea, these nations are Sorcalia and Talismarr. These are the only major countries in the oceanic region.

Mankind and His Kin

Many races have inhabited our world; some are extinct and gone, others still developing, others have yet to come into being. While there are many sentient races dwelling on Mythosa, there are three races which have dominated the globe since they first emerged. These races (known, surprisingly enough, as 'The Three Races') are the Malden, the Runir, and the Sylvari.

Most of us are familiar with the Malden, an ancient word for 'Mankind', so explanation is unnecessary. At present, this race claims dominion over most of the known world; though they actually control very little, they have been quite powerful (during the Imperial Age) and continue to be the foremost species of the globe.

The Runir are a race similar to man, though they are much shorter and dwell predominantly underground (though many live alongside Man in the cities and towns of the surface). Due to their diminutive nature, humanity has given the name 'dwarf' to these creatures.

The Sylvari are another race similar to humanity, but they are taller, more willowy, and are closer to nature and wooded lands than the Malden. Humans call the Sylvari various names, including elves, wood elves, or white elves.

While these three races constitute the dominant species of the world, there is a fourth race worth mentioning, which could be, but is not, grouped with the Sylvari: the Drakari. The Drakari are a race similar to the Sylvari, but they reside underground, and are an evil race, while the Sylvari generally are good. Physically, the Drakari are the same as their woodland cousins, but they have skin of jet black and hair of white and silver. According to elven lore, the Drakari used to be part of the Sylvari race, but temptation of certain elves by the Dark Gods caused a rebellion against traditional elven thinking, and a civil war, which the Drakari lost (they were subsequently banished to the underground). Mankind knows the Drakari as dark elves, black elves, or darklings.

The Pantheonic Philosophy

As our clergy would have us believe, and many of us do, there is an epic struggle fought on Mythosa, the hells and heavens, and every place where sentient beings exist. This struggle is known as the Pantheonic Philosophy, or Pantheonic Conflict. While it is said that this battle is constantly fought and permeates all life, very few people understand exactly what it is that the priests are speaking of. Hopefully, the following will clarify things for the reader.

The base argument of the Conflict is that there are two forces present in the universe (or, including the other planes of existence, the multiverse). These forces are in a perpetual war with one another, each trying to overcome the other. However, if one of these forces were to win, which could only be accomplished by the destruction of the other, the victor, too, would perish, and all existence as we know it would cease to exist. To prevent this from happening, and preserve all life, a third force exists, to balance out the struggle and keep either side from gaining sizable advantage over the other. These three forces are known as Law, Chaos, and Equilibrium (or Neutrality).

The force of Law is exemplified by the concepts of goodness, love, beauty, peace, honesty, all that is just and pure. According to the theory, this force manifests itself in the gods of the pantheon of Law, and in the Elder God Varanishu.

The force of Chaos is typified by the notions of evil, hatred, ugliness, discord, and other things profane and corrupt. Again, the theory says Chaos reveals itself in the gods of the Chaos pantheon, and in the Elder God Zarayama.

The force of Equilibrium is characterized by having no extremes, but being a fulcrum, a balance, or a symmetry. The gods of the Equilibrium are those beings that govern things neither good nor evil, such as time, death, and nature. The Elder God Asrantha is the personification of the neutral force.

Since the gods of the three pantheons best show the conflict of the forces, it is named the Pantheonic Philosophy. The priesthood recognizes that a constant struggle between good and evil, balanced by neutrality, is necessary for existence of all beings. Many priests of Lawful gods realize this, and fundamental try not to eradicate evil, but keep it under control so that it still exists, but does not threaten goodness. The same is true for the priests of Chaotic gods. All priests of Neutrality realize this in one way or another, and constantly make sure one side does not become too powerful.

While there is plenty of evidence to show that this theory is valid, there is enough to suggest it isn't. Additionally, many in the intellectual community believe it is just an excuse used by priests to classify everything as either 'good' or 'evil', leaving no room for compromise.

Magick in Mythosa

One of the most wondrous features of life in our world is the presence of magick. A mystic force wielded by an elite caste of magi and wizards, magick is an accepted, albeit feared and respected, part of daily life. However, a surprisingly small number of the common folk know how magick works. Whereas the people understand that the powers of priests come from their patron deity, the general perception of wizardry is that a few words are said, some magic dust is thrown, and voila! a magical effect takes place; this is far from the actual practice of the Lost Art. This treatise does not try to explain how spells are cast nor does it try to teach one to wield sorcery (for this, seek ye a willing teacher or a university). Rather, it explains the principles behind the spells; in other words, what is happening to allow wizards to cast spells. This whole system can be broken down into nexuses, ley lines, and the moons.

According to the Druids, magical power originates in areas known as nexuses. A nexus is a region where a great deal of akasa (magical power) can be found, and where it 'flows' to other nexus points. There are purported to be hundreds of nexuses across Mythosa, but the exact location of all of them is unknown (even to the Council of Nine). It is said that the Druids know the locations of all the nexuses, but they will never reveal that information (the Council has tried to extract it, but through their efforts it was learned that the ArchDruidic Conclave was one of the few cabals more powerful than the Nine Magi; accordingly, the knowledge has remained secret). Through independent efforts, a few nexuses have been discovered. These include the center of Magewood in Sorcalia, Caer Celtos in Kaermyr, the city-state of Oasys, the Black City of Wizardry, the Church of Celestial Harmony, and Amansyr, the capital of Ilmara. It is speculated that Ral'Ghast and Czarán are also built on nexuses. The locations of these magick centers have suggested that either the power of these regions attracted the construction of the cities and temples and such, or perhaps power given to the area by the settlement created the nexus. Only the Druids know the answer to this question, and they aren't revealing the answer.

Ley lines are the invisible streams of akasic power that flow between the nexuses. It is said that the lines are almost everywhere, and a mage draws power from a line when spell casting. Due to the power of the lines, a wizard need not be right in the path of one; they radiate power to be picked up and changed into magick.

The major moons of Mythosa, Axia, Ataxia, and Eqlos, are also said to influence magical power. It is said that when a moon is full, the powers of a mage corresponding to the moon (a good wizard when Axia is full, evil for Ataxia, etc.) are increased. Likewise, when the moon is new, the powers dim. Whether there is truth to this is unknown, but most magicians discount it as a wives' tale. However, most people stay indoors and avoid travel on nights when Ataxia is full...just in case.

Finally, every mage or would-be wizard should know of two strange features of Mythosan magick. These are the wylde magick zones and dead magick zones.

Wylde magick zones are regions where magick is completely unpredictable. Spell casting in these areas may not conform to what the mage desired, and may produce results totally unrelated to the intended effects. Scholars of magick are unsure what causes these areas, but fortunately, they are a rare occurrence. Sorcalia's Universaetie di Magius catalogs the known regions of wylde magick, and pays well for information leading to location of valid zones.

In addition to wylde magick zones, there are also dead magick zones. For some reason, sorcery will not work in these areas. Magick spells, enchanted objects, even innate abilities of certain monsters are negated in these regions. According to Druidic lore, ley lines are too far apart in these places for magic to function. Like wylde magick zones, dead magick zones are a rarity.

The Mythosan Calendar

The birth of the faith of Chronos (god of time) dates back thousands of years; modern-day scholars place the origin at around -2825 GY. The Sylvari were the first to worship the god, whom they call Lorleos. It is said that the deity gave his first priests a calendar that they might chronicle his sphere. Though different names have been applied to the days, months, etc., the calendar has been the same in its organization for the past 6000+ years. The names given on the next page were adopted by the Order of the Holy Balance (Church of Celestial Harmony) in 1000 GY as standard.

The astute reader will note that the calendar follows an exact pattern, and does so year after year. This suggests an influence of some Lawful deity; Chronos serves Equilibrium, but the heavens, which govern the calendar, are ruled by Celestya, a Lawful goddess.

THE MYTHOSAN CALENDAR

			Vesmer	Month of Vaen the Hawk
			Malruik	Month of Skeva the Rat
		Winter	Lyhtan	Month of Brune the Bear
			Jynval	Month of Kane the Wolf

The names of the days of the week are from Old Altaevian; they stand for various periods that occurred during the Pantheon War, a mythological conflict that is said to have occurred when the gods walked the mortal plane. The totem animals of the months are supposedly the first creatures of their kind, who aided various deities during the War, and whose contributions were honoured by having their forms cast into the heavens. The month that corresponds to each animal is the month when that creature's constellation is predominant in the night sky.

Holidays

Though each religion has its own varied holidays, there are four days of the year that, while having religious significance for some, are generally recognized throughout the realms even by the secular community. These are:

Harvestart - Occurs at the end of Theres; it is a celebration of the beginning of planting

Midsummre - Occurs at the end of Halember; probably the most sacred of all holidays, and especially honoured by the Druids. It is said to be a magickal, mystical night.

Harvestide - At the end of Vesmer, it celebrates the harvest and the end of the growing season.

Yuletide - Occurring at the end of Jynval, Yuletide is a universal celebration, honouring the end of the year and the beginning of the next. Gifts are often exchanged during the holiday.

Phases of the Moons

The three major moons, Axia, Ataxia, and Eqlos, each go through a fullness cycle once during the year. The reader is directed to Zoara's Orbs of the Heavens for further information on these satellites.

The two minor moons, Meera and Ralos, go through the phases more often. Meera waxes and wanes every 30 days, give or take a day. Ralos cycles five times a year. The moons, their phases, and the relative dates they occur on are shown below:

The Dawn of Mankind

The settlement of the lands of known Mythosa began many aeons ago. The bulk of the human population originated in two areas, Antelesa and Gaelaran. The massive tribes of the Antelesian region began to migrate east and west, as the once fertile region slowly began to turn to desert. The Yarak tribes traveled west, settling in the lands unchronicled by Arsaenean historians (the Arsaenean term 'Yara-Kai,' referring to these Oriental lands, is derived from the Yarak name); the Adani tribes journeyed east. As the bulk of the clans traveled southeasterly, around the Varghani mountain range, the Sharaq clan settled just to the west of the peaks. They counted on the change in elevation (from the land ridge known as 'Northrise') to prevent the desert from spreading any further. The Varghani tribes settled to the south of the Sharaq, in modern day Khazrantia, while the rest of the Adani continued east.

While the lands thus far occupied were devoid of intelligent life, the Adani tribes discovered a new civilization beyond the Red River. A race of reptilian humanoids dwelled in the eastern lands, from Haran to Hykarasha. The creatures dwelt in great cities of white stone and high towers. According to ancient writings, the reptiles were great scholars and historians; the acquisition of knowledge was their main objective. At first, the humans worshipped the Saurians (as they came to be known) as gods. The lizard men allowed this, since it enabled them to study this new race more closely. Eventually, they let the Adani know that they were not deities; they, too, were mortal beings. The Saurians hoped to teach the tribes, to assist them in their development. However, the humans were angered at the deception and the loss of their gods; a frenzied war engulfed the ancient land as the Adani sought to destroy the Saurians. The peaceful scholars were no match for the savage ferocity of the humans; a few fled into the jungles, but most were slaughtered, and their cities razed (modern-day sages and scholars often lament of the knowledge lost when the Saurian libraries were destroyed during this era). Eventually, the Adani clans settled the ancients' old empire, and formed Adanistan, Haran, Asyradad, Elstanbul, and Jardoni.

About this time, far to the southeast, the tribes of the Gaelari River Valley began to journey northward, to escape the advance of a great sheet of glacial ice. The Gaelari traveled until they reached what is now Aelorea. They, like the Adani, discovered a new civilization. Ancient records do not accurately describe these beings, but they were said to be "...hideous, nightmarish, and blasphemous." Rather than embrace the humans, in hopes to study and nurture them as did the Saurians, the Others (as they are dubbed) chose to enslave this 'lesser' race. At first, the human clans were easily subjugated by the Others, who used dark, bizarre magicks and twisted, daemonic rites in their efforts to indenture the tribes.

Though the humans were easily enthralled, the Others were an old, dying race, and their realm covered only a small portion of Arsaenea. Eventually, warfare broke out between the remaining free tribes and thralls against the Others. It wasn't long before the tide of the conflict drastically shifted against the evil race; in their desperation to crush the rebellion, a cabal of Other sorcerers invoked an ancient, forbidden enchantment designed to destroy the Gaelari. However, the power they unleashed was much greater than they expected; an energy surge of apocalyptic proportions swept across the world. The Other magi succeeded in destroying the rebelling slaves, plus many free Gaelari tribes, their own race, and countless others, who perished in the massive geographical changes wrought by the devastating cataclysm. Subsequent flooding, volcanic eruptions, earthquakes, tornadoes, and epic windstorms swept through the realms.

After the catastrophe was over, the Gaelari tribes regrouped, and continued their migration, now free from the oppressive Others. Once faction, the Marrshites, broke away from the rest of the group, and ventured west, settling in Vargros, Bardelea, Ambia, Kharas, Teravula, Daemar, and their eventual resting land, Marrshae. The Gaelari continued north, settling in Ys, Loran, Moras, and Kathnay.

The Meeting of the Races

The tribes eventually developed cities and fledgling nations. Though these states claimed dominion over large expanses of land, they actually truly controlled very little. The small pockets of civilization were surrounded by vast wilderness. As the human nations slowly expanded, they came into contact with some new humanoid races. The humans already had knowledge of various destructive and evil creatures, such as orcs, trolls, and ogres. These new races, however, were different. They resembled humans more than the others, and were more benevolent. In the mountains and hills, mankind encountered a stout, hearty race, bearded and earthy. The humans learned much of the Runir - dubbed "dwarves," due to their small stature - a race far older than their own. The dwarves lived mainly underground, mining gems, metals, and other valuables.

While some tribes were mingling with the Runir, others came across another friendly race. The Sylvari (known as "elves" to humankind) were a race almost the opposite of the diminutive subterranean miners. They were tall - taller than humans - and were quite lithe and frail-looking (though this is a deceiving quality). Whereas the Runir lived underground, involving themselves with non-living rocks, gems, and such, the Sylvari dwelled in the living forest, reveling in the life of the flora and fauna around them.

According to Sylvari historians, their race, along with the Runir, existed at the same time as the Saurians and the Others. The elves had some contact with the reptilian race, but they stayed fairly isolated. When questioned about the Others, the Sylvari wouldn't say anything (they are as equally silent about their ancient civil war, fought when the race was young. The war split the race into the Sylvari and the Drakari - dark, evil elves who apparently lost and were forced underground). As for the Runir, they know nothing of the pre-human civilizations; they had not yet come down from the mountains and hills when the two races existed.

Eventually, elves and dwarves began to mingle into the human society, and now are a very common sight. However, their hearts still belong to their homelands, and it is to those realms that the two races seek to return when they reach a venerable age.

The Age of Prosperity and the Rise of the Pantheonic Faiths

For years, the human nations, co-existing with their dwarven and elven brethren, prospered and progressed. Magi refined their mystic practices, strengthening their power and mystery. Craftsmen bonded together in secret societies known as Guilds. The Guilds aided their members and furthered their individual arts. Trade was plentiful, and peacefulness abounded.

About this time, with religion flourishing as well, there arose a new church, known as the Order of the Holy Balance. A large clerical brotherhood, the order preached allegiance to not just one god, but to many deities, which they called "the Gods of the Equilibrium." These divinities, they said, maintained the balance between the Gods of Law (gods of goodness, beauty, and such, whose actuality was long suspected, but never proven), and the Gods of Chaos (greatly feared beings of evil, darkness, etc., whose existence was only hinted at in the blackest of legends). The Order's gods also controlled the natural harmony of things, neither good nor evil, such as the seasons, the elements, life, death, time, and the like. The Church gained a high following from priests and monks, and won favour with the common folk, who knew not what to make of this metaphysical philosophy, but who honoured those gods of nature and the land. With popular support, the Order constructed a massive temple in Aladalos, capital city of the empire of Ambia.

Though the Order of the Holy Balance was prospering, one high-ranking priest, Allalym the Pious, grew dissatisfied with the precepts of the Order. In his opinion, they should be giving adoration to the Gods of Law, so as to crush the sinister Lords of Chaos. While the Church preached that a balance must be maintained between the opposing pantheons, Allalym argued that a balance wouldn't be necessary if Law destroyed Chaos. The Church began to be split, as the followers of Allalym, now dubbed "the Upsetter," sought to change church doctrine, while the rest of the clergy remained true to the Order's fundament. A violent conflict threatened to erupt between the zealous factions, but Allalym chose to exile himself, rather than stain the holy temple with blood borne of conflict. With his followers, the Upsetter traveled north, settling in southern Xolta, just north of a great forest. The Church Fathers accepted his decision, since they discovered, much to their chagrin, that priests of Law would soon be needed...

Desecrated shrines, disappearances, and hideous sacrifices began to spread like wildfire throughout the realms. Compared to these atrocities, the squabble of the priesthood seemed petty. The Church was not a stranger to these dark practices, since they knew of vile cults and evil temples that indulged in them, but they had never occurred in such great amounts, nor in as seemingly an organized manner. The Order's patriarchs came to a chilling conclusion: these evil rites were not the work of individual cults (at least not the majority), but of a new, third Church: a faith of Chaos.

The Order's ruling council set out to curb the evils of the Chaos Church, but were indecisive about exactly what should be done. Some argued that the Order should destroy the Church of Law, since the location of their cathedral was well-known, and by crushing them, they would equally eradicate Chaos. This idea was quickly rejected, though, since it was agreed that the opposition Churches would have come about anyway. Nothing really could be done, but to remain vigilant and try to maintain the balance.

The Rise of the Empires and Their Expansionary Conquests

In time, there emerged six nations which, through various means, stood above all other countries. In the north was Khazrantia, an immense nation, and Marasinia, a kingdom rich from trade and control of the eastern seas. Arsaenea was dominated by the empire of Ambia, the ancient kingdom of Gaelaran, and the powerhouses of Xolta and Moras. Through economic, political, and oftentimes military means, Ambia, Gaelaran, Khazrantia, Marasinia, and Xolta-Moras (a series of nobility marriages united the two small giants into one large one) conquered most of the lands of Ryh'ardha and Arsaenea. Not all of the lands felt the rule of the empires, however. Alaslantya, for instance, successfully drove off the repeated attacks of Khazrantia. The elves of mainland Elshay, driven back to the island portion of their nation, held off attacks by both Gaelaran and Xolta-Moras. The isle of Marrshae and the nations of Daemar and Teravula did not fare as well, however; they were worse off than most of the conquered lands, since they were in the middle of contested regions. The eastern half of the peninsula was held by Xolta-Moras, and the western by Ambia. The border constantly shifted as the two empires contended for control of the region, with the Daemarrans and Teravulans feeling the worst of the onslaught. The Marrshites experienced the same tragedy, as their island nation was combated over by Ambia, Xolta-Moras, and Marasinia. Eventually, the continents reached saturation, and an uneasy peace settled in.

The Imperial Age

What followed the expansionism of the empires was an age of fortune and enlightenment. Each of the five mega-nations had control of vast amounts of capital, resources, and the like. The civilized forces pushed the wilderness back farther and farther. Great roads were built, monuments were raised, and trade flourished. Magick experienced another renaissance, as did religion. Sylvari and Runir, driven back by imperialistic expansion, re-mingled with the human lands. Peace and prosperity abounded. Unfortunately, this was not to last.

While the emperors preached of the golden peace and abundance of the great nations, they were building up immense treasuries, and with that financing massive military growth. Though the wealth they possessed was greater than any king in history had known, power-borne greed made the emperors lust for more lands. The only areas open for conquest belonged to the established empires, and thusly had to be taken by force.

The Imperial Wars

The pot of tensions finally boiled over in 2503 GY. The isle of Marrshae, ruled by various state-supported factions, experienced a massive civil war. The majority of the island was ruled by a government supported by Marasinia and Xolta-Moras, while the rest was governed by Ambia. A major rebellion, secretly supported by Gaelaran, took place against the Xolta-Moras/Marasinia rulers. The revolt eventually spilled over into the Ambian-controlled region. Reacting to the combat, the Ambian emperor sent a contingent of soldiers to subdue the whole island, stating that "...the security of the Empire has been placed at risk by this unfortunate event, to which we have no choice but to take entirely under our control." Marasinia and Xolta-Moras ordered Ambia to withdraw its forces to the pre-war borders. Ambia refused, and additionally staged raids on Urekal and Xoltan Dragaport. Shortly after, Marasinia and Xolta-Moras declared war on Ambia.

Marasinia began a massive naval invasion, attacking the Marrshite peninsula, and the Llaran Sea area. Morasan forces came by sea into the Daemaran peninsula and by land through Radima and Kharas. The battles went on for about three years, when Ambia called on Gaelaran for assistance. Accepting her alliance (since Xolta-Moras would control most of the continent if Ambia fell), Gaelaran began a counterattack. Their naval invasion from the east was severely limited, as the Sylvari prevented the Gaelarians from entering the Havenwood. However, moving into Kathnay in the east and Radima from the south eased the pressure on Ambia. Help also unexpectedly came for Ambia from a different source; Marasinia was forced to withdraw some of its invading troops to meet a new threat to its power: Khazrantia. The Khazrantians, built-up as everyone else, took advantage of Marasinia's distraction with Ambia, and invaded, crossing Bwanika Bay in the south, and going around the Asyran mountains, through the Savageland jungles in the north.

For the next ten years, the wars raged on. Though the battle fronts continuously shifted back and forth, no empire really gained anything from the wars. On the contrary, all suffered extremely, in everything from war-dead to lack of monies. The emperors were too blind to see that nothing could come of the senseless wars. Each believed he had a little more than the others, and could easily win if he stuck it out until the end. That ideology only drove the mighty nations straight into the ground. Treasuries were exhausted, roads and cities neglected, and lives needlessly lost.

The Decline and Collapse of the Great Empires

A number of factors eventually led to the downfall of the Great Empires. At first, most of the imperial citizens were behind the wars; the greater the glory for their country! As the years dragged on, though, the enthusiasm vanished; people were sick of paying increasing taxes to replenish rapidly depleted treasuries; they were tired of sending their sons off to die; and the pleasures they enjoyed during the Imperial Age, such as well-maintained roads, and excellent coach and ferry services, virtually disappeared. Many towns now had no protection from marauders, wild animals, etc., as all able-bodied men had been sent to the battle fronts.

Finally, the people had had enough. Tired of the wars, and unsympathetic to the nobility, the people began to revolt. Nationalism ran rampant as memories of forced acquisition resurfaced. Areas farthest from the front began to rebel. The thrones didn't have enough troops to quell the revolts, and many of the soldiers began to return to their homelands, tired of fighting for a lost cause, and preferring to help the fledgling armies of the re-emerging nations. As time went on, the wars fell apart, as the emperors called back their armies to hold capital cities and surrounding regions.

And so passed the Age of Empires, which had brought a period of illumination, only to be darkened by the greed and lust of petty men.

The Age of Darkness

After the fall of the imperial states, the world came to a virtual halt. Expansion stopped, progress halted, and trade diminished to next-to-nothing. Nations, per se, no longer existed. Instead, the populace flocked to the largest cities and city-states. Whole countrysides became deserted, leaving behind towns, strongholds, and the like to be ravaged by the wilderness. For a period of time, many cities (the ones that received the most refugees) foundered on the edge of collapse, as the large number of people strained their food and monetary supplies, and created over-crowding problems. A few cities did fall, but most utilized the growth potential of their new citizens and stabilized themselves.

Though the metropolis' controlled vast regions around them, most of the previously held lands fell back to the wilderness. The proud nations of ancient times now consisted of isolated city-states, surrounded by dark and dangerous wildes.

The Pantheonic Churches in the Age of Darkness

The fall of the empires did not bring down the Pantheonic Churches. Though they suffered hardships as everyone did, they were still able to stand strong.

The Church of Law gained followers in many cities, as people turned to the Gods of Law for refuge from the wilderland. The Church helped out the city-states as best as they could, but did little else.

The Order of the Holy Balance (which became known as the Church of Celestial Harmony during this time; the reason for the name change never was revealed) fared better than its Lawful companion. The Church already had temples in most of the major cities, and most of those cities had survived the Imperial Wars. A spiritual 'network' existed between the various temples, and allowed communication between the holy shrines. For some of the more isolated cities, this was the only contact they had with the rest of the world.

Over time, as the city-states began to civilize the areas around them, the Church's clerics began traveling between nearer cities. During their sojourns, they sometimes acted as couriers or messengers between the states, thus beginning the re-emergence of trade and communication of the old nations.

Though the process of returning to the power they once held was slow and tedious, the sequestered cities began to regain their old national lands. The states slowly reclaimed the wilderness around them, creating new trails over the ancient Imperial highways. Eventually, through trailblazing and travel of the clerics of Celestial Harmony, trade routes returned. Fleets and armadas were built up again, as coastal cities set out to resettle the shores. Expansion has steadily continued, though no nation has total control over as much land as they did before and during the Imperial Age; countries may claim their dominion lies over a region, but in truth, the wilderness is its true ruler.

The Vengeance of the Gods

The island-nation of Alaslantya was, like the Pantheonic Churches, a domain that survived the Fall of the Empires. Though Khazrantia had tried to annex the country repeatedly, the Alaslantians proved too much for the Khanate.

When the Great Empires collapsed, Alaslantya was at the height of its power. The nation was enjoying a glorious era: great cities sprawled across the island, filled with the monuments of skilled artisans and master craftsmen. The people desired nothing, for the nation was rich in economics, culture, and prosperity. Its warriors rivalled the greatest fighters of the Imperial Age, and its sorcerers were without peer (they were even more powerful than those who would later form the Council of Nine). It is rumoured that part of the power and prosperity of the Alaslantians was due in part to their not being completely human. The idea, however, is generally dismissed as an attempt to discredit the ancient kingdom.

At the start of the Age of Darkness, the despair that had taken hold of many of the citizens of the former empires was momentarily lifted. The Alaslantians journeyed from their island to Ryh'ardha and Arsaenea; at first, they were feared, for the people thought that they had come to conquer them, as the old empires had done in the past. The Alaslantians, however, declared that they would help the people of the elder nations to become self-sufficient; they would free them from the shackles of the empires that still held them in fear and ignorance.

While this boded well for the countrymen of Ryh'ardha and Arsaenea, the Alaslantians went one step too far. They proclaimed that their fortune was due to a reliance on the power of the mortal spirit. For the people of the continents to realize their full potential, they would have to forsake the worship of the Gods. For the Gods, claimed the Alaslantians, held mortals back. True power lay in the heart of Man, and his capacity was being stifled by the so-called 'Divine Powers'. The islanders told the people that they would help them to be rid of religion, just as they had done for themselves years before.

Needless to say, this did not please the Gods, who decided to teach these imputent mortals a lesson. Unto Alaslantia did they unleash the Three Great Plagues.

First to come to Alaslantia were the Angels. These heavenly beings spirited away those few beings who were judged to be undeserving of the fate that would fall upon their fellows. It is unknown where these lucky ones were taken, but it is not believed they were taken to Elysia. Most likely, they were deposited elsewhere on Mythosa, but no one knows where.

The Second Plague to strike Alaslantia was the Dragons. Great Wyrms attacked the island, destroying its great monuments and cities, burning the forests, and boiling away the lakes and rivers. Where once was a beautiful, magnificent kingdom now was little more than a blackened wasteland.

Finally, the third and most devious Plague came: the Demons. Hordes of the Infernal fiends came forth, and slew all remaining life on Alaslantia, mortal or otherwise.

After the Plagues, the gods caused a great earthquake to sink the entire island. This was their final testament to Man and his kin: do not anger the Gods.

(In recent years, 3417 to be exact, another earthquake south of Khazrantia occurred. This quake actually wrenched the ancient nation back to the surface. It is unknown what remains, however, as the island is feared and believed cursed.)

The Inquisitus Magius

Around 3050 GY, a tragic catastrophe struck the lands of the realm. All magic, from enchanted weapons to the spells of magi, failed to function. Though priestly powers still performed, secular dweomercraft disappeared; wands and staves lost their power, wizards couldn't cast spells, and magical armour and weapons became as normal armaments. The common folk turned on the practitioners of magic, somehow blaming the sorcerers and conjurers for 'using up' the magical power of the world. Judicial tribunals and inquests (collectively known as the Inquisitus Magius, or 'Magical Inquisition') were held to determine the 'guilt' of known magi. Many wizards vanished during this time, either fleeing from persecution or having been caught and judged guilty (a verdict of guilt, which almost always was the result of a trial, resulted in the penalty of death or life enslavement). The Inquisition lasted about a year; afterwards, magicians were completely gone from Mythosa.

The Discovery of the Outremer

In 3172 GY, an Ambian fleet and an Khazrantian armada met in the Southron Ocean. Neither nation was very friendly to each other at this time, and a naval battle quickly ensued. Into the midst of the battle, however, a large storm blew in, borne of the Sea of Ice. The ships were tossed about like toys. Many capsized, or disappeared, but a few managed to return to their homelands.

Soon after, rescue ships were sent out to find any survivors. Some were found, and a few carried astonishing news: a few galleons of both sides had been blown far to the southwest, where they came upon a new, unexplored, uninhabited continent, ripe for the picking. Khazrantia and Ambia quickly sent ships and men to the new land, known as the 'Outremer,' and began colonization.

The colonies expanded quickly, Ambia taking the eastern region and Khazrantia the land to the northeast (the southern peninsula was, for the most part, uninhabitable). No other nation (save one) has attempted to colonize the new land, being too far from the continent for settlement to be feasible or worthwhile.

The Return of Magick to Mythosa

Magick returned to Mythosa in 3250 GY. In the spring of that year, a ship of unknown origin arrived in the city-state of Araelan. The passengers wore the flowing, glyph-covered robes of the magi of old. Though the Inquisitorial Laws were still in effect, the city guard didn't enforce them. The visitors, granted an audience with the Lord Mayor, announced that they were ambassadors from the nation of Sorcalia, an island located to the west of Alaslantya. The sorcerers said the flow of magic, disrupted over 200 years ago, had been restored, though they gave enigmatic answers to those who inquired how the flow was disrupted, or how it was returned; the only things clear was that it involved an evil ArchFiend named Gathmalor, and the nation of Gothmoor (formerly Kathnay; the similarity in the names suggested a connection between the evil nation and the demon). It was also revealed that Sorcalia had a small colony in the Outremer. The ambassadors then left the city-state, and carried their information throughout Arsaenea and Ryh'ardha.

Eventually, magical items and relics, long since unused, regained their enchantments. Wizards and conjurers walked the lands again. Most countries, recognizing the wrongs of past rulerships, abolished the Inquisitorial Laws and officially admitted the errors of bygone days. A few nations, however, did not; these included Al'Sharaq, Haran, Gothmoor, and Aelorea.

Al'Sharaq and Haran do not enforce the Laws, but they still are 'officially' in effect in those nations (a warning to traveling magi to watch their step). Gothmoor still enforces the Laws, but they are known to have wizards inhabiting their nation; it is said that evil mages are free to come and go, but those that don't follow Darkness are imprisoned and worse. Aelorea officially declared that not only were the archaic Laws still in effect, the practice of magick was illegal (in the statement, they said it was an offense in any nation; naturally, they can only enforce that doctrine within their own borders), and the penalty for thaumaturgy was (and still is) death. Accordingly, magicians avoid the theocracy.

The Ilmaran Revolution

For a number of years, three of the more powerful Mythosan nations controlled much of the known Outremer (Sorcalia was discovered to have colonized the new land as well as Khazrantia and Ambia). The use of the colonies was mainly for resources, and an outlet for populations. Both Sorcalia and Khazrantia ruled their colonies as extensions of their countries, with all rights and privileges of the homeland. A number of citizens moved from the islands to the Outremer, enjoying the new, pristine wilderness.

The situation was different for the Ambian colony. Being close to the cold south and the rugged mountains, the region required much work to develop, and Ambia's tyrannical emperor forced citizens to move there to quicken the process. Unrest fomented, among both the colonists and the mainlanders; the colonists felt anger at being forced to move, and the mainlanders felt uncertainty as to their own fates.

The revolution began in early 3308 GY. The Ambian colonists, treated horribly by the crown, declared themselves to be an independent nation. Ambia immediately declared war on their former colony, and prepared to deal with them.

A huge armada was assembled in Stalis, prepared to ferry to the Outremer soldiers, war machines, and other materiel. However, Khazrantian intelligence agents in Aladalos (Ambia's capital) discovered some interesting information. The Ambian army was large enough to crush the rebels, plus the other three colonies in the Outremer. According to the spies, the empire planned on taking the colony and then claiming the Alaslantyan and Sorcalia colonies had thrown in with the insurgents; and subsequently, the army would be 'forced' to deal with the other colonies, to protect 'Ambia's interests in the Outremer.' The plan would make the Empire the only nation in control of the continent. Khazrantia informed its island neighbour of the plan, and together the two prepared a contingency strategy to deal with the Ambian threat. Agents from the kingdoms leaked the information out to Ambia, and the two countries declared their support for the revolution. Aladalos was not prepared to deal with a major war, and especially did not wish to incur the wrath of Sorcalia's Council of Nine. Grudgingly, Ambia withdrew its declaration of war and halted its military plans. The new nation, free to begin its existence, named itself 'Ilmara,' after an Olde Ambian word for freedom, and became the first independent country of the Outremer.

The Destruction of the Chaos Host of the Temple of Kharyn

Even since the emergence of the Church of Chaos in 1629 GY, the forces that served Darkness were never much of a problem for the civilized lands (though it is unknown how rampant Chaos was during the Age of Darkness). However, in 3350 GY, a mighty temple of Cyclopean proportions 'appeared' in northern Ambia and spelled trouble for the forces of good and truth. Evil in architecture and purpose, it acted as a cancer upon the Empire, with sinister tentacles creeping out into other realms. It is not known exactly why the temple appeared when it did, or from where it came from, but it apparently was a sign for certain Chaos forces, whose armies began to pour out of the underground and the wilderlands to plague the realms of Man, Elf, and Dwarf. A massive conflict, triggered by the appearance of the temple, swept across Ryh'ardha, Arsaenea, the Ocean Kingdoms, and even the Outremer. Such epic warfare had not occurred since the ancient Imperial Wars.

Eventually, it was learned that the dark temple was the nexus of the strife that had overcome the land. Fortunately, a troupe of heroes, the famed 'Legion of Lazuli', assaulted the temple, and destroyed the ancient Chaos demigod Kharyn, source of the darkness. Kharyn had been entombed beneath the temple, and was prepared to rise up and led the Chaos armies to victory over the nations of Mythosa when the Legion eradicated him. After the destruction of the temple, the Imperial Ambian Army crushed the main Chaos Host, which had gathered about the temple. Soon after, the disharmony that had taken the realms dissipated. However, Evil had only been routed for a short time...

The Daemonic Invasion of the Brotherhood of the Horned Shadow

The sage Geranus once said that one of the 'redeeming values' of evil was that it constantly was in conflict with itself. While Good and Law strive against it, different factions of evil fight each other, creating a weak, divided ethos. This philosophy can be applied to the actions of a mysterious cult known as the 'Brotherhood of the Horned Shadow' following the destruction of the Temple of Kharyn.

The major forces of darkness, from the Church of Chaos to evil nations like Gothmoor, all had stakes in what the rise of Kharyn had to offer. Therefore, when the demigod was destroyed and a major source of daemonic power obliterated, these forces felt the blow. After Kharyn's death, the hordes of Chaos fell back to regroup and recuperate. Except for the Brotherhood. During this time, they had been watching what transpired between the forces of light and dark, waiting for the opportune moment to strike. Once the temple was destroyed, the forces of evil were weak and disorganized and the forces of good were enervated as well...an perfect time for the cult to make its move.

Even before the combatants had time to lick their wounds, the Brotherhood, utilizing an ancient, evil artifact known as the Orb of Daemos, began opening portals to the Planes Infernal, allowing hordes of daemons, devils, and other fiendish beasts entry to the material plane. The nations of Mythosa were hard-pressed to keep from being overwhelmed by the onslaught of the Brotherhood-controlled summonings. However, before long, the cult lost control of its diabolic armies, as too many gateways had been opened, and too many fiends had passed through. Fortunately, the Legion of Lazuli, with the assistance of another band of heroes, known as Mortis' Marauders, were able to destroy the Orb, which subsequently closed the portals. However, there still remained an abnormal number of devils on the material plane, and to this day there remain some that haven't been slain or banished.

The Destruction of the Pentad of Evil

For a time, peace again reigned throughout the land. The forces of Chaos were still suffering from the destruction of Kharyn, and the Brotherhood of the Horned Shadow had been utterly defeated. However, in these turbulent times, peace was a precious commodity...

A major conflict shook the lands again, this time in 3376 GY. Though the specifics are a well-guarded secret of the ArchDruidic Conclave, all across the continents know something happened, as magick began to go awry, prayers to deities went unanswered for a time, and strange, unexplainable events plagued the realms (for a detailed account of these times, the reader is referred to Andryla Lynthial's marvelous tome, Wylde Tymes). From what this humble sage has managed to gather, a group of five powerful entities, known as the Pentad of Evil, attempted the unspeakable by casting down the Gods of Chaos and establishing themselves as the Lords of Darkness! It is rumoured that a who's-who of heroes took part in the foiling of the Pentad, including members from the Legion of Lazuli, Mortis's Marauders, the children of some of the members of the Legion, and even an ancient vampyr and Zewdye the Mad! How much of this is truth and how much fabrication, I cannot say. Know thee, however, whoever was involved, succeeded, as the Pentad is no more (though the Gods of Chaos are still, unfortunately).

Li Inversus di Metallica

The last major event to shake the land occurred in 3391, and was dubbed Li Inversus di Metallica (The Metal Inversion). Massive inflation began to plague the realms as the national economies were flooded with gold and silver coins. At the same time, a shortage of useful metals (such as iron and steel) occurred. Prices of everything from kitchen utensils to weapons and armour skyrocketed, which in turn pulled up the price of more mundane items. Eventually, a number of economic initiatives on the parts of various governments (such as price ceilings and tax increases) removed much of the excess gold and silver from the commoners (and placed it in the royal treasuries, no doubt), though the effects are still felt today. It is unknown who or what was responsible for the glut of coinage, with various theories naming everything from twisted cults to fabled dragons, and even a dwarven conspiracy!

The Lands As They Are Today

With the Inversus di Metallica having run its course over forty years ago, Mythosa has been relatively calm. Except for minor border skirmishes, and petty baronies fighting other petty baronies, nothing major or significant has occurred. Most of the nations are minding to their own affairs, and relative peace abounds. How long will it last? If our history is any indicator, not long; you'll recall that the Age of Prosperity and the Imperial Age, both times of peace and relative harmony, ended in devastation and ruin...could this era be heading for its destructive closing? The relatively recent attacks on the lands by the forces of evil have been repelled, but at what cost? Are the victories of good a reassurance for the future? Or is Darkness slowly weakening us, each attack just a precursor to a more sinister finale? Only seers and madmen know for sure...

Chapter the Fourth:

Geography of Mythosa

Presented for thy perusal, a brief overview of the geographical features of Mythosa, from her majestic mountain ranges to her loathsome wastelands...

Mountains

ASHEN PEAKS

This range of mountains stretches from the southern ends of the Llaran Sea and Moras Bay. The peaks effectively cut off the Agarossean Peninsula from the rest of Arsaenea, while affording a weather barrier to further make Kharas a wasteland. A large chasm network, the Great Rift Canyon, runs north and south through the mountains. It was one of the many results of the Cataclysm. A large Runir community dwells in the gem-rich Rift. The majority of their living areas are in a large, ruined city, fallen into the canyon, but greatly intact. The origin of the metropolis is unknown, even to the dwarves.

ASYRAN MOUNTAINS

The Asyran Mountains are the bane of many Ryh'ardhans. Some of the largest concentrations of orcs and goblinoids dwell here, frequently raiding the Zhuntari, Alsyrria, the Burning Sands nomads, and occasionally striking as far as Elmani and Haran. It is said that great veins of precious metals are embedded in the mountains, but very little has been mined, due to the aforementioned inhabitants.

DWARF MOUNTAINS

This oxymoron is the nom de plume of an extremely high and treacherous mountain range. It is so named because it is the homeland of the Runir; it contains the subterranean capital city, Runehelheim, home to 15,000 dwarves. The mountains, as most of Arsaenea's peaks, are rich in gems and metals. A number of other races dwell here as well, most notably the Drakari, who are constantly warring against the dwarves.

EASTERN MOUNTAINS

These mountains are located on the eastern coast of northern Arsaenea. They are fairly barren of life, and even have been abandoned by dwarves, due to an influx of vile, Chaos creatures from Gothmoor.

MARASINIAN MOUNTAINS

Bearing the name of the ill-fated empire, the Marasinian peaks rise against the Savageland jungles. Neither the Zhuntari tribes or the Hykarashans have tried to develop the region, so it is unknown as to what can be found there, living or otherwise. The Hykarashans are too enveloped in their civil wars, and the Zhuntari avoid them because they believe the mountains to be the place where the gods reside when they come to the earthly plane.

STONE CURTAIN MOUNTAINS

The Stone Curtain is Mythosa's largest known mountain range. It sprawls across the southern regions of Arsaenea, stretching from the Sea of Ice in the west to Southwood in the east. The peaks are high and jagged, with terrible snow and ice storms. Legends abound concerning the mountains, including the tale of Kharzahelm, the Great Lost Runir City, and the Ice Palace of the god Aegar. Besides the treacherous weather and dangerous slopes, hosts of deadly creatures, such as frost giants and ice dragons, dwell in the peaks, so many explorations never reveal if the legends are true...

VARGHANI MOUNTAINS

The oldest mountain range in known Mythosa, the Varghani stretch from the Abd'Ghani Forest far to the north, deep into the Savagelands; it is unknown how far the mountains go. The Varghanis are a very diverse mountainous region. Various races, from dwarves to ogres, dwell here. Rumours abound (as usual) about such things as lost civilizations to palaces of gods. Some of these may be true...

Other Ranges of Note:

OUTREMIC MOUNTAINS

These unnamed mountains are found in the south of the Outremer. In recent years, the peaks have yielded a fair amount of metals and gems to Ilmara.

SHESADAN MOUNTAINS

The Shesadan Mountains form the north and west borders of the Emirate. Rain clouds blown up from the south and the 'River of Life' keep the area fertile and prevent it from being enveloped by the Great Barrier Desert. A large concentration of Runir is found here.

YSIREAN MOUNTAINS

The western border of Ambia is covered by these young, high peaks. They have not been readily exploited by the Empire, though it is rumoured that large quantities of silver can be found here. Inquiries to the government only return that the mountains are forbidden to private mining; it is a mystery as to why.

Forests and Woodlands

ABD'GHANI FOREST

A predominantly hardwood forest, the Abd'Ghani once covered all of eastern Khazrantia, and the region between the Red River and Amedinawood. Gradual deforestation for fuel, building, and export reduced the timberland to what it is now. Khazrantia declares sovereignty over the Abd'Ghani, and carefully tends it, so as not to lose one of its more valuable resources.

Occasional skirmishes occur between Khazrantian border guards and Ramadahd lumber-poachers.

AMEDINAWOOD

The Amedinawood appears to be a normal hardwood forest, so it is unknown why the Khemali government keeps a tight patrol around it. The legendary Khemali longbows are made from the trees of this forest, and it is figured that they have some secret hidden there.

ANORFORET

Altaevian for 'South Forest,' this pinewood timberland forms the border of Ambia and Nordica. The Nordicans stage many raids from the safety of the woods, and the Ambian throne would just as soon raise the trees, were it not for the pressure of Druid's Keep and the Sylvari.

COASTWOOD

The trees of Agarossean Coastwood are the only major terrain in a relatively featureless peninsula. The yew trees of the forest are highly prized by fletchers, and the bows created from them are second only to those of Khemal.

FROSTWOOD

A large pine forest dominating western Zarlev. Hardy hunters secure a great deal of fur from the abundant game that dwells within. Frostwood was a larger forest at one time, but the area south of the Urksa River and north of Tetrigrad was burned and destroyed during the War of the Crystal Sceptre (2979 - 2983 GY), one of Aelorea's annoying holy crusades. The burning did create a fertile agricultural region, however.

HAVENWOOD

The largest forest on Arsaenea, Havenwood stretches from the west coast in Zeldora to the east coast of the continent. The wood is filled with game and replete with mystery, mainly due to the fact that visitors are not welcomed east of Silvrebroom. Arsaenea's largest concentration of Sylvari are found here, as well as rangers and Druids. Caer Celtos is the 'capital' of the region but is not much more than a college of huts and towers, used by rangers and Druids. A small keep is here, which is occasionally used by the Druids in their struggle against Gothmoor.

MAGEWOOD

A small woodland on the magical isle of Sorcalia, Magewood is said to be a source of immense akasic power. An ancient ring of standing stones is found here, inscribed with Druidic glyphs, though no Druids are found on the island, and it was supposed to have been uninhabited when the exiled mages first arrived (rumour has it that the stones have some connection with the ancient Alaslantians).

NORSEWOOD

The Nordican forest, used by Nords for hunting and lumbering.

OUTREMIC WOODS

While the colonies have explored and exploited the timberlands in their own territories, the great expanse of trees west of the Border River still remains very much a mystery. While nothing too hostile has been encountered, parties travelling too far have been known not to return...

SACREWOOD

A predominantly softwood forest in southern Aelorea. The hierarchy forbids entrance into the forest, claiming religious sacredness. Many believe they fear something that dwells within, and the heavy guard around the forest is not to keep people out, but to keep something within.

SAVAGELAND JUNGLES

Stretching far to the north, the extent of these tropical timbers is unknown. The vast palms and mahoganies are home to hundreds of species, from primitive human tribes, feline predators, and fabled elephants, to supposed clans of savage elves, and even dinosaurs. The timber from this land is prized in the south, and is harvested by Khazrantia, the Varghani city-states, and others.

VIDHRFORET

One of Arsaenea's largest timberlands, the Vidhrforest covers northern Ambia (the word is Altaevian for 'North Forest'). The woods are home to various Sylvari clans, and the Druid's Keep is found here, the only true castle occupied by Druids. It is said that an ancient civilization built the stronghold, and it was found by an ArchDruid. Regardless, from this citadel, the Vidhrforet Druids keep close tabs on Ambia, so as to keep them from despoiling the woodlands.

XOLTAWOOD

Years ago, this forest was once lush, green, and alive with game. After Gathmalor arrived on this plane, and established himself in Kathnay, however, the trees 'died,' in a sense. While they still live, they are horribly twisted and cursed, as if possessed by daemonic dryads. Where deer and boars once freely roamed, now tread trolls, mutated horrors, and far, far worse. Fortunately for the surrounding regions, the worst evil is deep in the heart of the timber, and vigilance of Kelsha, Rael-gahr, and the priests of Law contain most all of the fringe-dwellers.

YDDILLIC FOREST

Radima's southern timberland, the Yddilic is forested somewhat less than in previous years, as certain abominations from the Grey Wasteland have managed to find their way into the woods.

YULSAR FOREST

A woodland found on Arsaenea's east coast, the Yulsar spreads over southeastern Aelorea and the Lorani isles of Relesor and Raal. The forest is home to dreaded Yulsaran Wolves, feared canine predators similar to, but worse than, dire wolves. Loran has often charged that Aelorea sends religious dissidents into the Yulsar to be devoured by the wolves, but the hierarchy vehemently denies the accusations.

Oceans and Seas

EAST OCEANS

The East Oceans are the easternmost seas of Mythosa. They are bordered in the west by Arsaenea, and on the south by the Wild Plains and the Eastern Reaches. In the 'center' of these seas is the archipelago of the Sylvan Isles, the ancient elven homeland.

ELJARDON BAY

This inlet separates almost all Hykarasha from Ryh'ardha. Unlike the Marasinian Sea, which the Bay empties into, the waters of this gulf are dark and murky; it is poison to drink the waters. The cause of this despoilment is unknown.

GREAT OCEAN (NORTHRON AND SOUTHRON)

The Great Ocean is the largest traversed body of water in known Mythosa. It spans the region from southern Ryh'ardha to western Arsaenea and the eastern Outremer. Literally hundreds of species of plants and aquatic creatures reside in its waters.

LLARAN SEA

The Llaran Sea lies between Ambia, the Agaros, and Talismarr. It is a fairly deep body of water, and is rich in aquatic life (mainly fish). The southern region of the sea is dangerous for large ships, due to huge, jagged reefs, and are only plied by small cogs and fishing vessels.

MARANVIAN SEA

This body of water is found east of Arsaenea. A one time, this region was not a sea, but a landmass, fused with (what are now) the Lorani isles and the Arsaenean mainland. However, in 248 GY, when the ancient Others brought down the devastation on Mythosa, this region disappeared under the waves. Today, the sea yields a bountiful fish harvest, and is plied by merchants from the Vargrossean Valley, Loran, Zarlev, Gaelaran, and the Eastern Reaches. All who sail on the sea, however, must be wary of Aelorea's Inquisition Fleets, who see fit to stop and search every ship they come across. Woe be to those who possess magick and refuse to part with it when the Aeloreans come...

MARASINIAN SEA

Just a step under an ocean, the Marasinian is a huge body of water, and one of Mythosa's deepest. The sea is traversed frequently, from ships of Arsaenea travelling to Ryh'ardha, and vice-versa. Many sub-marine races dwell in the Marasinian, but few even see the light of day.

MORAS BAY

This bay is named after the ancient empire of Moras. It is sailed fairly often by ships of Agaros, Radima, and Zeldora.

OUTREMIC SEA

This body of water lies between the Outremer and southwestern Arsaenea, to the north of the Sea of Ice. It is a cold and rigid sea, but fairly navigable.

SEA OF ETERNITY

The northernmost of known Mythosa's oceans, the Sea of Eternity stretches out for an unknown distance. Many tropical islands and archipelagoes are scattered about this ocean. Some of the nearer islands have shown evidence of a lost civilization. Exploration is not common, as many expeditionary forces have not returned. Tales of sea monsters and a great, winged, feathered serpent are common.

SEA OF ICE

Between the Outremer and Helgard lies this frigid body of water. It is very dangerous to navigate, as it is filled with bergs and ice floes.

SKESGART SEA

This large body of water forms a natural boundary between Nordica and the wilderness west of Ambia.

SORCALASAN SEA

This sea is found between Sorcalia (for which it is named) and the island of Alaslantya. It is a shallow sea, and on a clear day its crystal clear waters allow one to see all the way to the ocean floor.

WESTERN OCEANS

These are the westernmost oceans of the known Mythosan lands. It is unknown as to how far they reach, as no deep exploration has been made into these waters.

Lakes and Rivers

BARDELA LAKE

This lake was crystal-clear years ago, plentiful with fish, and enjoyed for leagues around. It has since been despoiled, however, due to the formation of the Grey Wasteland of Kharas. Nowadays, it is used for some water transportation.

BLACK RIVER

Outremic brook; divides Khazrantian colony and the Sorcalian colony.

BLACKRUN RIVER

This river was once a beautiful, racing stream, but it has been ruined by the evils of Gothmoor. It is pure black (hence the name) and poisonous.

BORDER RIVER

Western border of civilization in the Outremer.

DALI-RAAN

This river is named for an ancient forgotten king of this region. The Dali-Raan and the Lake Apharos contribute to the sustenance of the Rhijadi forest.

DRYBED RUN

This river runs from the Varghanis to the River of Life, and forms the northwestern border of Khazrantia. It is a small river, and would be nonexistent but for the River of Life.

EAST RIVER

The north of Gaelaran is home to this stream, probably named for its running from the east.

JRANI RIVER

This river forms the border between Zarlev and Gaelaran and feeds into the Maranvian Sea.

LACARO RIVER

A mighty river, running through Ambia, then dividing into the Vidhrriver and the Rushyng Waters.

LAKE APHAROS

In a region dominated by dryness and aridity, this lake, and the river that feeds it (the Apharic River) are very important to the populace of central Ryh'ardha. The lake has a few species of fish, but no real value other than the water itself.

LYREBROOK

An Ilmaran river, said to have magical healing properties.

MERRIWYND RIVER

The Merriwynd runs from northern Havenwood to the Marasinian Sea. Though it is next to Gothmoor, it is unspoiled by the evil of that nation.

RED RIVER

Running from the Varghani to the Great Northron Ocean, this river forms the northeastern border of Khazrantia.

RIVER OF LIFE

This great river runs from the Shesadan Mountains to the Western Oceans. It is the only thing preventing the Great Barrier Desert from engulfing Shesada and Khazrantia.

RUSHYING WATERS

A branch of the Lacaro.

SILVREBROOK

This crystal clear river, cherished by Druids and elves, runs from the Dwarf Mountains to the north of Havenwood, where it splits into the Merriwynd and Blackrun.

ULFRAM RIVER

This river forms the border between Nordica and feared Helgard.

URNSKA RIVER

Forms the northern border of Zarlev and empties into the Maranvian Sea.

VIDHRRIVER

A branch of the Lacaro. This river flows through the Ambian capital of Elgarth.

YSIREAN RIVER

This river flows from the Stone Curtain to the Skesgart Sea. It forms the barrier between Nordica and the unclaimed wilderland to the north.

ZARR RIVER

The Zarr runs from the Asyran Mountains to Bwanika Bay. This river provides some irrigation for agriculture in the region.

Swamps, Deserts, and Other Places of Note

BURNING SANDS

A desert in the north of Ryh'ardha, between the Varghani and Asyran mountain ranges. The sands would claim the regions around the Varghani city-states but for the Red and Zarr rivers, and rain-bearing clouds blown up from the Northron Ocean.

BROKEN CRAG CANYON

This region is the former site of the mountain fortress of Gathmalor the ArchDaemon. It is a broken scar of earth, with endless caves, caverns, and shards of rock thrusting into the sky. Fell beasts dwell here, from mundane orcs and trolls to sub-daemons, and even dragons. It is rumoured that a vast treasure lies deep in the canyons, Gathmalor's earthly possessions.

FANGS OF DOOM

A very treacherous area of the ocean, the Fangs of Doom are jagged mountain tops thrusting out of the sea west of Talismarr. This area is inhabited by some of the most vile sea-beasts known.

GREAT BARRIER DESERT

So named for its natural barrier between Ryh'ardha and Yara-Kai, the Great Barrier Desert is the largest wasteland in known Mythosa. The desert extends from the western oceans in the south about 325 lenars to the jungles of the Savagelands in the north. It is immense, but not empty; the desert is populated by various nomadic groups, and many ruins can be found here, the result of civilization lost to the desert sands.

GREAT RIFT CANYON

A creation of the Cataclysm. See the Ashen Peaks (q.v.) for more information.

GREY WASTELAND OF KHARAS

This area is not quite a desert, it is worse. Rather than sand, the wasteland is just greyish black dirt, and the sky is continually overcast. Even if it's a clear summer day in neighbouring Ambia, the clouds stay. More so, the region is plagued by what is called 'Boltus' Rage'; massive thunderstorms replete with dancing lightning and swirling wind, but no rain. Very little, if anything, lives here. The only living things usually are adventuring parties, seeking out the 'Black City,' the ruins of a once-powerful metropolis. It is reputed to contain caches of magical books and artifacts.

YULSAR FENS

This is a huge, fetid, wetland located in northern Gaelaran. Except on the fringes, the swamp exudes gases toxic to most living creatures (such as humans and their kin). The marsh is said to contain rare, magical herbs, but, naturally, it is difficult to obtain them. Added to this is the presence of the apallyons, a race of evil, Chaospawned serpentmen. They are not much of a threat now, as Gaelarian troops from Eaelar keep them in check.

Chapter the Fifth:

Religions of Mythosa

"During that time which was timeless, in the infinite nothingness that was everything, there existed three entities. One of these beings is, and was, Varanishu, which is, in the ways of doshra, that which is good, law, and order. Because of His existence, or because of the Other's existence He exists, there is the entity Zarayama, which in doshra thought is evil, chaos, and discord. Lastly, there is great Asrantha, He Who Maintains the Necessary Equilibrium Amongst All Things. To the doshri, He is balance, neutrality, equilibrium. It is through the power of the Elders that They wrought the beings known in doshra as Gods. Now existed that which did not - Life, Death, Time, War, Fate, and all else."

-Excerpt from the Dh'aavian Codex,
Volume I

The lands of Mythosa are replete with worship of the various super-beings known as gods; those forces which are beyond the ken of normal men, the powers that create, shape, and subsequently destroy the universe in its many facets. It would take many lifetimes to describe even a few faiths in detail; the information presented is almost a blasphemy to those it itemizes by its necessary sparsity; I try to present them all so as to enlighten those that may be ignorant of them.

The Pantheonic Philosophy

The fundament of Mythosan religion, from the primitive worship of goblinoids to the highly-sophisticated veneration of the Sylvari, is known as the Pantheonic Philosophy. This ideology states that the whole of the universe is made up of two opposing forces. These forces are always in conflict, but it is important to never let one overpower the other, for this would rend the fabric of reality, and perhaps precipitate the end of all existence. For this reason, a third force exists, to maintain a balance between the two forces. While abstract philosophers say that this struggle exists in everything on every level, the easiest example to understand is the pantheons of the gods. There are three pantheons, one for the gods of Law (good), one for the gods of Chaos (evil), and another for the gods of Equilibrium (neutrality). The Pantheon of Law contains the gods of healing, heroism, angels, love, etc. The Pantheon of Chaos contains the gods of darkness, hatred, disease, etc. Finally, the Pantheon of Equilibrium contains the gods of death, time, destiny, nature, and other beings whose spheres of influence are neither good nor evil. It is this whole metaphysic theory that constitutes the basis of modern religion.

The Dh'aavian Codex

The Pantheonic Philosophy is an idea which can be found in religions the world over; even isolated races living in the Darkrealms, never having had contact with other civilizations, have the same basis for their worship. This underlying idea is one of the two major things that lends to the legitimacy of the Pantheonic Philosophy. The other is the Dh'aavian Codex.

The Dh'aavian Codex is a collection of scrolls, tomes, and other such writings that have been found all over the known world. The origin of the works of the Codex is an enigma; throughout a span of hundreds of years, a number of texts were found in various lands of Mythosa. These writings are unique, in that they all use the same language, which has never been found to exist anywhere else. The varied works all deal with religion, and have a distinct link between them; in other words, it is as if someone wrote an immense book, copied it to scrolls and librams, then scattered them across the face of the earth (which very well might have been the case).

Though it took much time, priests and monks have deciphered the Dh'aavian language, and have pieced together the works into different volumes, with educated guesses made to determine the gaps in the Codex. Presently, the Church of Celestial Harmony holds the largest known collection of books, having copies of volumes 1, 2, 5, 7, 13, and 20. It is believed that more volumes exist, and they just have yet to be found (though many hope not to see volume 21, which is held to be the last book, and which is said to detail the End of All Existence). The hierarchy of the gods, explained in the next section, is based on the writings in the Codex.

Hierarchy of the Gods

According to popular belief, reinforced by evidence in the Dh'aavian Codex, there exists a sort of hierarchy amongst the gods. This pyramidical structure is detailed below.

DH'AAV

The Creator of All Things, The Father of the Elders, He Who Is Everything; these are just a few of the names used to describe the enigmatic being known as "Dh'aav." According to the Codex and modern-day religious scholars, Dh'aav is the Ultimate Being, who created the Elder Gods. Except for the idea that Dh'aav is the most powerful of the gods, very little is known about Him (or Her, or It, as the case might be).

ELDER GODS

Three entities comprise the group known as the "Elder Gods." These beings are Varanishu, Zarayama, and Asrantha. Varanishu is said to be the epitome of Law and goodness, and is supposed to have created the gods of the pantheon of Law. Zarayama is his/her/its antithesis, and is responsible for the creation of the gods of Chaos. Asrantha, being the pinnacle of the equilibrium, supposedly created the deities of Neutrality.

There are a number of arguments about the Elder Gods (or simply, the Elders). Some say that the Elders and Dh'aav are the same being, in that the Elders are three distinct parts of the Dh'aav. Others say that the Elders do not exist, but are just personifications of the three ethoi. Once again, no one (except for the Elders and Dh'aav, if they exist) knows the truth.

GREATER AND LESSER GODS

The gods everyone knows and sometimes worship are known as the Greater Gods. These are the deities of the three pantheons, and exemplify various facets of the universe. There also exist some well-known entities which are known as Lesser Gods.

Greater Gods and Lesser Gods are distinguished by a number of differences. Greater Gods have followers the world over; different cultures may call them different names, but they are still the same god. Lesser Gods generally have small followings, or a large number in a centralized location. Greater Gods rule over the major facets of the world: life, death, love, hate, etc., while Lesser Gods rule minor ideas, such as strength, archery, twilight, etc. Finally, the biggest difference is in the power of the deities. According to the most widely accepted idea, gods receive power from the number of followers they have, and the degree of their devotion; the larger and more pious a church, the more power the god receives. Greater Gods have a "set" amount of power they receive automatically, and this is augmented by worship on this material plane. Lesser Gods, however, depend completely on their followers; in fact, most come to be by the faith of a cult or church. While they didn't exist before the faith began, the devotion of the followers bring about their existence. And, while a Greater God will still be around even if all His or Her followers are destroyed, a Lesser God without enough faithful will cease to exist. It is unknown whether this is a truthful theory, but it would explain why certain religions are wiped out (to destroy an undesirable god) or why worshippers of one god will fight worshippers of another (to give greater power to their faith and lessen the power of the other).

DEMIGODS

Demigods are not gods in the true sense of the word, but are extremely powerful mortal beings who have powers far above that of normal persons; they are likened to gods because of this. A demigod, if worshipped and given "faith power," may become a Lesser God, however.

Greater Gods and Goddesses of Mythosa

The Gods and Goddesses of Mythosa are listed in the following manner:

Name	The name of the deity. First given in Arsaenean form, followed by Ryh'ardhan, Eastern Reaches, Yara-Kain, Sylvari, and Runir. If the god is known by other titles, these follow as well.
Spheres	Those things which the deity is the patron of.
Gender	The deity's sex.
Symbol	The items that represent the god. Some symbols are not easily given to description, so illustrations follow the listings.
Relations	This details the relationships the gods have with one another. The designation of "antithetical" refers to the deity that the god is philosophically opposed to. Neutral gods have no antithesis.
Areas of Worship	The general geographical area or the general type of people who pay homage to the god.
Description	The abstracts are followed by a physical description of the deity. These description are generalized, as people of different cultures view details in different ways; a Yara-Kain samurai would describe the God of War differently than an Arsaenean knight, for example.

Lesser Gods and Goddesses

The following is a partial list of the more well-known Lesser Gods of Mythosa. There are undoubtedly more, but space does not permit their inclusion.

ABARAS

A good god, he is dedicated to truth and verity. This deity is gaining a large following, and it is said he is approaching the power of Beldarus himself.

ALLUMINIA

A beautiful blond goddess, she is seen as having hair of sunlight and being clothed in pink and yellow clouds. Alluminia is the daughter of the greater god Alluminara.

ALYNYS

Popular among rich and poor alike, Alynys is the neutral god of debauchery. The temples to this deity are well-known for their wild orgies and drunken parties. Most other clergy disdain this faith, but oftentimes are found amongst the revelers in Alynysian churches.

CALOS

A strange deity, this entity is dedicated to silence. One of the strictures of the faith is to completely abdicate speaking; some of the more zealous remove their tongues. Why anyone would want to follow this god is not known, but it is said that those who serve him seek peace and solitude in the silence he brings. A few rumours persist that the priests are taught by Calos to communicate with their minds, so speech is unnecessary.

CARZAKK

This is an evil god, worshipped as a gargantuan, chaotic bat. The surprisingly large cult to this god is centered in the Burning Sands desert, north of Oasys.

DALARR

Popular in Zeldora, the worship of Dalarr is on the rise. She is the neutral goddess of wealth and materialism. Her churches are extremely resplendant and gilded in precious metals.

ELAESA

Spies and agents may have created this mysterious, hauntingly beautiful goddess. Elaesa is the neutral power of scrying, twilight, and espionage. It is believed that she is a sister to Nocturna, but this hasn't been proven.

ELESK

After witnessing the horrors of suffering wrought on prisoners in Aelorean dungeons, and experiencing it himself, an unnamed holy man brought forth the faith of Elesk, the good god of suffering. Though the tortures of the Iberian Inquisition are not shared by all the world, there are plenty of down-trodden masses to whom Elesk offers a ray of hope.

HARAK

Neutral god of strength, Harak is gaining a following among warriors and others who put their faith in strength and physical power.

HUKKO

The antithesis of Abaras, Hukko is an evil god of lies and deception. Like his nemesis, this deity is gaining great power; though it is in doubt whether this is on his own account, or if it is due to Abaras' growing power. In any case, the cultists of Skelexor are constantly on the watch for Hukko followers, in hopes to eradicate him through their deaths.

HUZZRYLLZZA

The neutral god of insects. There are no known human cults to this being, but he is known to exist. Therefore, the frightening notion is that there is a species of intelligent insectoid beings dwelling somewhere who give homage to this entity. Farmers occasionally give lip-service to this god, in hopes he will prevent their lands from being ravaged by locusts or the like.

NATIONAL PATRONS

There are a number of deities honoured by the citizens of various nations. They are similar to city-state patrons, as they are heros, founders, etc. Generally, national patrons are more powerful than city-state god, due simply to the larger number of worshippers.

ORAS

A new faith coming from Khazrantia, Oras is a neutral god, dedicated to vengeance. The main cult dedicated to Oras calls itself 'The Avengers.' They hire out to those who have scores to settle, but cannot or will not deliver justice to those who deserve it.

PAROS

Blacksmith and leatherworkers give praise to this god, who is the neutral deity of smithing and craftsmanship. This god first was recorded to exist in 590 GY, when the ancient Guilds emerged. After the Age of Darkness, when the Guilds disappeared, the worship of this power faded as well. However, with the re-emergence of the ancient lore of the craft-societies, it appears Paros has also returned.

PATRONS OF CITY-STATES

Most city-states in Mythosa have a patron of some sort; usually a beneficial guardian of the city, or a great past hero, perhaps the founder of the metropolis. The power of the deity comes from the faith of the citizenry; it is said that when a city-state god ceases to exist, it spells doom for the city.

RAELFELSKAR

A strange new deity, he is the evil god of fear. The worship of this entity is a splinter cult of Grimm.

ROHBAN

Depicted as a woodland ranger, this deity is the neutral power dedicated to archery and marksmanship. He carries a small following among bowmen.

SEWRACKZA

This being is another evil bestial god created by dark, misanthropic worshippers. Sewrakza is worshipped primarily in Labyrinth City, but the evil faith is spreading to other Vargrossean city-states, and minor cults have been uncovered in Westfaire, Eastfaire, and even Aladalos! Ambian, Vargrossean, and Aelorean moderate patrols have been trying to flush out the cult, but so far they have had little success.

YAAZA

This being is a god of evil, represented as a large, daemonic spider. The worship of Yaaza is centered in the southern Varghani city-states, primarily in the port city of Sakhir. Though the cult is outlawed by the government, they do not try hard to eradicate it.

YASELLA

A beautiful goddess, her comeliness hides her evil. Yasella is the patron of vices, such as gambling, adultery, and laziness.

ZARR-ZEN

It is not quite known what this deity is (or if, in fact, it is a deity). Better known as "The God Destroyer," this entity is recognized as having destroyed at least three lesser gods and seven demigods. There are no cults to this being, for it appears to exist on its own account. Many religious scholars believe Zarr-Zen is an agent of the greater gods, who use it to crush those forces which they feel are becoming too powerful.

Demigods

DAAGOR

An evil fish-daemon, supposedly dwelling in the Marasinian Sea.

DAEMOS

An wizard who lived in ancient times, he survived after death as a liche.

DRACOSARIA

A draconian liche, this undead wyrm is said to dwell deep within the Stone Curtain Mountains, and has a treasure to rival that of the ancient emperors.

GHAADARAK

A giant ape, said to dwell in the Savagelands.

IRU

A chaotic bird-daemon, purportedly living in northern Ryh'ardha, on the fringe of the Savagelands.

KARAKENTO

A huge and powerful octopus or squid, dwelling in the deepest depths of the Great Ocean.

MARADARK THE MIGHTY

A great barbarian warrior, whose current whereabouts are unknown. It is claimed that he will someday come to unite the barbarian clans and lead them to victory over the nations of the West.

MORTHRAX

A two-headed, gold-and-silver dragon, he is the epitome of Law, as far as dragonkind is concerned. Morthrax is the arch-enemy of Tarzelosis.

NECROMORIA

A female necromancer, whose evil soul does not mar her outward beauty. She is said to be a cohort of the liche of the Necropolis.

NOVA

An archmage of unrivalled power and beauty. Though she travels to other planes, her home is on Mythosa, in the city of Spyre.

TARZELOSIS

A great dragon, five-headed and of different powers. This evil and immensely powerful wyrm is the arch-rival of Morthrax.

TYREXUS

A gargantuan dinosaur reported to be found in the Savageland jungles.

XYLKHRI

An evil archmage-high priest, he is the leader of the Council of Darkness, the cabal that is the head of the Church of Chaos. Xylkhri and his associates dwell in the Temple of Eternal Darkness, the Chaos temple matching the Cathedral of Law and the Church of Celestial Harmony. The location of the Temple, however, is unknown.

Chapter the Sixth:

Various Essays Concerning Mythosa

Population Distribution on the Mythosan Land Masses

Though the various nations of Ryh'ardha and Arsaenea hold claim to most all of the respective continents, except the mountain ranges and the deserts, they actually control only a small part, with the wildes being under their own power. An accompanying crude map shows what is considered 'civilized,' 'borderland,' and 'wilderness.'

Civilized regions are found around nationally governed cities, and areas frequently transversed and worked by people (major roads, farms, etc.). They are generally well patrolled, and very rarely will marauders (bandits, orcs, etc.) harass the citizenry.

Borderland areas are those regions which lie between civilization and wilderness. Fortresses and citadels are most commonly found here; defenses against the frequent raids of brigands and goblinoids. Areas surrounding city-states are often borderlands, as the states concentrate on their own metropolitan locality.

Wilderness regions encompass mountains, dense forest, jungles, deserts, etc. These areas are wild, unexplored, and extremely dangerous. Monsters abound in the untamed territories, from bands of orcs to forgotten races, even to creatures of legend, such as wyverns and the Great Wyrms.

While these classifications apply to humans, elves and dwarves differ slightly. Generally, the Sylvari dwell in so-called 'wilderness,' and prefer the wildes which keep the humans at bay. Both the Drakari and Runir dwell underground, in various mountain ranges, where classifications fall short in most circumstances.

A View of Human Racial Stock of the Mythosan Continents

Herein lies an examination of the various human races inhabiting known Mythosa, and the traits and features predominant. It may serve useful in determining the origin of a stranger.

GAELARESE

The inhabitants of southern Arsaenea (Aelamarr to Gaelaran) originated from Gaelarese stock. These people generally are a tall race, broad-shouldered, with golden hair west of the Stone Curtain, tending towards reddish in the to the east.

MARRSHITES

The Marrshite people inhabit the central majority region of Arsaenea. They are a haughty, hardy people, grey-eyed and dark haired, with a darker complexion than the Gaelarese.

HASSITES

Southern Hassites (Agaros, Radima) are a darker-skinned, raven-haired, and stout people. In the north, the populace are generally the same, though their hair is darker, as is their skin, which is tinged with bronze.

JARDONI

The Jardoni inhabit eastern Ryh'ardha, from the Alsyrian Mountains to Hykarasha. They are a dusky skinned race, of medium height, broad shoulders, dark eyes, hooked noses, and blue-black hair.

ADANI

The Adani descendents inhabit central Ryh'ardha. The Adani are brown-skinned tall people, with dark hair and hawkish faces.

SHARAQ

The Sharaq are a race similar to the Adani, but have a darker, more cynical mood about them.

VARGHANI

A splinter race of the Adani, the Varghani are a fairer-skinned race, who generally occupy the upper-class and nobility.

Languages of the Three Races

There are as many different tongues in Mythosa as there are sentient races. This treatise covers only those spoken by humanity and its kin. Note: different dialects are not detailed here, since there are so many that a separate book would be needed to list them, and several more volumes to detail them. One would be advised to seek out a sage learned in the ways of language if thou art truly interested.

GAELARESE

This language is primarily spoken in southern Arsaenea, with dialects varying slightly in Ambia/Vargros, Aelorea/Loran, Zarlev, and western Gaelaran. Agarosseans speak Gaelarese as well, with a distinct accent of their own.

ADANESE

Spoken by the peoples of Ryh'ardha of Bwanika Bay.

JARDON

The language of areas east of Bwanika Bay.

AERLADESE

An offshoot of Gaelarese, this is spoken in the Radiman Confederation, Zeldora, and northern Arsaenea.

ISLANDER

This language is spoken by the inhabitants of Talismarr and Sorcalia. Its roots lie in Adanese, Gaelarese, Aerlandese, and various languages from the original homelands of Sorcalia's founders, and the magical isle's dialect borrows a lot from the ancient language of Zenaan.

OUTTALK

A mixture of Islander and Gaelarese, the colonies and Ilmara are gradually developing their own language.

EASTENSPEAK

The language of the Eastern Reaches, the barbarians of the Wild Plains have brought some of this tongue to southeastern Arsaenea.

DARKTONGUE

A vile, corrupt cant, spoken by those in league with forces of Chaos.

The Sylvari speak a tongue (Sylvadriel) which is the same in all their clans and colonies. To human ears, it resembles a high, sing-song speech which flows and blends continuously.

Drakdriel is the language of the dark elves. It is a twisted perversion of Sylvadriel, almost conveying its evil to a listener. While it still retains its original feel of Sylvadriel, it is vile and repulsive, especially to the sylvan elves.

The Runir of Mythosa speak the language of Runic, derived from the rune-letters of their alphabet. Like the people who speak it, Runic is a harsh, brusque language.

Power Groups and Alliances

The following is a list of some of the more powerful organizations and alliances found in Mythosa. The list is not complete, but briefly details those groups who are more well known around the realms.

THE BROTHERHOOD OF THE AZURE LION

The Brotherhood of the Azure Lion emerged in 3375 GY, a force of paladins based in Aladalos, Ambia. It was formed from the elite Imperial Guard of Ambia. When civil war threatened the nation during that period, the guard broke off from the Empire and decided to fight the Scarlet Guard (who were behind the strife) on their own. Though they helped return the Empress Dalbright to her throne, the Brotherhood has remained an independent force, dedicated to the fight against Chaos and Darkness. They are currently the antithesis of the Scarlet Guard (for more information on the civil war that almost took place in Ambia, see Madassa Delshea's marvelous tome, Thorn in the Lion's Paw: A History of the Scarlet Guard).

THE FELLOWSHIP OF THE SUN

The city-state of Kharaja is home to this adventuring company. As exploration and adventure becomes more and more popular, this group is gaining a large following of adventurers, mercenaries, and the similar folk. The Fellowship coffers have not suffered from the patronage, either.

ORDER OF THE FLAMING PYRAMID

This quasi-religious assassination cult is found throughout the two continents (and, perhaps, beyond). For more information on this group, see "Al'Sharaq."

PANTHEONIC CHURCHES

The three churches of the philosophies hold considerable influence around the lands. The Church of Celestial Harmony is most powerful, having the general support of the common people. The Church of Law is most supported by heroes and such, and is revered and respected by most. On the underside of Mythosan society, one can find the marks of the Church of Chaos. Unbeknownst to many (including most of their own members), a great deal of thieves' guilds and assassin's guilds are directly controlled by the Chaos Faith.

SCARLET GUARD

An elite troop of Imperial Ambian Warriors, this was the personal guard to the Ambian royalty (specifically the emperor). The Scarlet Guard also ran the Secret Police and the Intelligence Bureau. After the Empress Syrana Dalbright took power (grandmother of the current Empress), she disbanded the ruthless force, but it is rumoured to still exist in an underground capacity, plotting revenge against the throne.

THE SEVEN HYKARASHAN HOUSES

The Seven Hykarashan Houses (though only five remain, the name has stuck throughout the ages) hold considerable power the world over. Houses Agrar, Amehni, and Monteago have merchant companies and other such things throughout northern Arsaenea and Ryh'ardha. These ventures help finance their war effort, and they help hold the Houses' position in the world of nobility. House Delshea, one of the Rhijadi Triumvirate, is an extremely wealthy House; since they left the coffer-draining Hykarashan civil war, their treasuries have overflowed. If House Delshea wants something done, anywhere in the world, it will get done; it's just a matter of how much they have to pay. House Anleah, the weakest of the remaining Houses, still enjoys influence in northern Arsaenea (often bringing them into conflict with the Church of Law).

WARLORDS OF KH'IA

The Warlords of Kh'ia is an elite mercenary organization, based in Elstanidad, Rhijad (they are a member of the Rhijadi Triumvirate). The warriors are sought the world over for armies, expeditions, and the like. The current roster of the group numbers about 20,000 (with 5,000 always remaining in Rhijad). It is unknown what "Kh'ia" is supposed to mean, exactly; some say it refers to some ancient nation, others, an obscure deity. No one knows for sure, and the Warlords aren't telling (they themselves may not know).

Slavery in the Mythosan Lands

AELOREA

While the ReichePriest has forbidden slavery, it is permissible to enslave those who are considered "infidels," which is a broad enough category that anyone entering the nation is suspect.

AMBIA

Before Empress Dalbright took power, slavery was a common feature of the Empire. Now, however, it has been outlawed, though it still goes on in the black market and in backwater baronies.

GAELARAN

Though Ambia outlawed slavery after receiving a new ruler, Gaelaran unfortunately did not. As with the old regime, the ruler is new, but the culture remains the same.

LORAN

Slavery is illegal here and is punishable by death.

NORDICA

The Nords are vehemently opposed to enslavement, and have been known to include in their raids slaving ships, in order to release the unfortunate cargoes. Those who wish to remain with the Nords may do so, and those who don't are set free.

NORTHERN ARSAENEA

The nations and city-states of northern Arsaenea forbid the practice of slavery, with two exceptions: Gothmoor, where enslavement is a common convention, and Zeldora. Zeldoran law forbids the practice of slavery by its citizenry, but allows it to be done by foreigners (to the oligarchy, humans and their kin are just another commodity).

OUTREMER

Nowhere in the Outremer is the practice of slave trade legal. Ilmara forbids it, as do the Sorcalians. The Khazrantians do allow it in their homeland, but not in their colony.

RYH'ARDHA

In most of the nations and city-states of Ryh'ardha, slavery is legal, or at least condoned by the government. Enslavement may result from overdue debts, captivity after a war, or any number of things. In general, the average person needs not fear becoming a slave in Ryh'ardha, but the out-of-place stranger had best watch his back, lest those who recognize him as a foreigner see a need for his services...

SORCALIA

The enslavement of another being is forbidden by Sorcalian doctrine. The dogma includes the use of magicks to subjugate another. There is an exception to this law, however, and that deals with the summoning and binding (comparable to enslavement) of extra-planar creatures.

VARGROS

The Vargrossean city-states do not condone slavery, but it is not illegal in any of the cities. In most, it is a backstreet, dirty business, but it is flaunted in the open in a few places (such as Maar).

ZARLEV

Like their western neighbours the Nords, Zarlevites abhor slavery and forbid its practice, punishing law-breakers with death.

Known Narcotics of Mythosa

The following is excerpted from the book Narcotics and Opiates: Magic for the Masses, a book by the renowned alchemist Amorco Claudann. It is a summary of some of the more infamous chemicals in Mythosa. The traveler is warned to be wary of these dangerous concoctions.

BELLADONNA

This drug is derived from the deadly Nightshade plant. It is used as a hallucinogen, and is heavily abused by the Goths. Belladonna has a moderate addiction level, and has a high usage risk; few are the addicts who survive more than a couple of months after becoming hooked.

DARKLIGHT

This narcotic comes in three strains, one a stimulant, one a depressant, the final a hallucinogen. The Drakari of the Darkrealms cultivate certain subterranean fungi and refine the strains from these plants. Though they themselves do not use Darklight, the black elves distribute it on the surface, shipping mainly through Sharaq channels. They would see the fools of the sunlit world destroy themselves with this drug, making it all the easier for their eventual conquest. Darklight has a high addiction rate with a medium potency.

DRAGON'S BREATH

This strange hallucinogen is a partially magical powder. It is of unknown origin, though it is speculated that a renegade archmage is responsible for its creation. This highly addictive, highly potent drug is used almost exclusively by magi.

LOTUS

The infamous lotus plant of Yara-Kai comes in five varieties: white, blue, grey, red, and black. Each colour has a different effect:

White

Least potent, it is a relaxant with a low addiction rate. It is not widely used, except by leeches with dealing with patients.

Another relaxant, blue lotus is similar to white except it is highly addictive. Blue lotus is a rather difficult plant to locate.

Grey

Grey lotus is a combination stimulant-hallucinogen. It is commonly used to induce berserker-like behaviour in warriors.

Red

A highly addictive stimulant, red lotus can also induce hallucinations. The usual results of inhaling the vapours of this plant are violence and psychosis.

Only a small amount of the drug is needed to attain a desired effect; too large a dose induces what is known as the "Red Death": the user enters a state of a coma, and, while not being dead, is hopelessly gone.

Black

The dreaded black lotus is the most potent and deadliest of the lotus plants. The after-effect of its vapours can range from stimulant to depressant to anything in between. The effects are random, and the user's weight, intellect, etc. have no bearing on the outcome (though some very experienced users are rumoured to be able to produce a desired effect). Though black lotus is not addictive, the amount needed to feel its potency and the amount needed to kill vary with each usage, making this an extremely dangerous drug.

MANROOT

Manroot is a moderately stimulating narcotic derived from the mandrake root.

SOMA

Soma is a depressant- hallucinogen. It is used to induce a relaxed state with fantastic colours and visions. Low quantities of soma are sometimes used in spiritual rituals, and high quantities are consumed by decadent members of the upper class and nobility. The main exportation of soma is from Haran, which receives shipments from nomads in the Burning Sands.

VUUL

Vuul is one of the most dangerous and most threatening narcotics on the black market. It is highly potent, highly addictive, and is available at an extremely low price (generally a few silver pieces for one dose). This drug breaks down one's mental processes after prolonged use, and eventually turns the addict into a slobbering, crawling idiot. Speculation has it that Gothmoor is refining and distributing Vuul.

Notable Personalities of Mythosa

ANGUS

Once a great thief in the city-state of Maar, he left to travel with his paramour (and, later, wife) Kayla and her companions in the famed "Legion of Lazuli." After a number of battles, it was discovered that Angus was not actually human, but was in reality a shape-shifting dragon. The thief prefers the company of mankind, and so remains in human form, unless a situation calls for a draconian solution. At present, he and Kayla reside on another plane of existence.

ARIAN SILVERBORNE

A great hero of recent times, this paladin was also a companion of Ranalyn the Mage. Arian recently assumed control of the barony of Westfaire.

ARTEMIS THE ASSISTER

A very long time ago, Artemis was an evil assassin, operating out of Gothmoor. A master killer, his infamy spread throughout Arsaenea, and even into Ryh'ardha. Merchant princes, nobles, and other such folk, whose position or power gave them more enemies than they cared to have, lived in fear of the murderous Goth, for it was said that no security or defense, mundane or magical, could prevent him from carrying out an assassination. For years did Artemis serve the Goths, as well as the Chaos god Hhiltaric. This changed, however. An occasion arose in which Artemis was to join the inner sanctum of Gothmoor's church of Hhiltaric. As part of the initiation, he was allowed to view the suffering of those he himself had murdered. The sickened pleasures of the Unholy Serpent and His host of minions, which they exacted on the innocent souls in the Nether Planes, filled Artemis with disgust and grief. He had never thought about the aftermath of his missions; his only concern was being successful. Now that he could see what he had wrought, Artemis felt such sorrow and pity that he denounced Hhiltaric and Gothmoor entirely. Secretly leaving the country (where he swears he'll never return, except for his "final" assassination, when he plans to slay Zeldros Doombringer himself), Artemis sought solace from his evil past. One evening, the former executioner had a vision in a dream: the god Mortis appeared to him, and bade him to join those dedicated to true Death, not that which was brought on by evil and corruption. Finally, Artemis had found peace. From that point on, he dedicated himself to serving the god of Death, assuming the name "the Assister."

ELANA MCBANE-VRYNNE

It is said that some are born into greatness; such was the case with Elana McBane. Being the daughter of two world heroes, Angus McBane and Kayla, Elana was thrust into world of adventure whether she liked it or not. A unique woman, Elana possessed the beauty of her mother while having the agelessness and powers of her father. Such a combination aided her in the 'Lazuli Progeny' battle against the Pentad of Evil. It also helped attract her husband, the Drakari Kalamarr Vrynne. Elana is currently the Archduchess of the Vidhr Archduchy in Ambia.

FLINTY

Normally, the pets of heroes are not worthy of writing, but this little guy is so damn cute I couldn't help it. Imagine a talking red dragon the size of a house cat, and you know what Flinty looks like. This dragon-puppy, as I call him (but not to his face), is the pet of Elana McBane-Vrynne. He is currently the 'High Imperial Wyrm of Ambia' (a meaningless title, but one he insisted on), and expects to one day grow into a huge red wyrm (not likely).

HASSIM QEDOLOS

Long, long ago, the name Qedolos was an honourable name, the appellation of a Khazrantian noble house with a lineage dating beyond the time of the Imperial Age. In recent years, however, the Qedolos dynasty has suffered terrible setbacks, to the point where they have been finally exiled from the Khanate. According to legend, about three centuries ago, a Qedolos wronged a powerful sorcerer, who placed a curse upon the family which was to last 333 years. Apparently, the curse worked, as evidenced by the downfall of the house. However, the 333 years are almost up, and Hassim, one of the last of the family, believes that it is his destiny to restore the honour of the Qedolos name.

JACOB

The name of Sir Jacob, Knight of the Lion, used to be spoken of proudly. Once he was a great cavalier of the barony of Westfaire, in eastern Ambia. Adored by the people, it was assumed that he would one day rise in the nobility, perhaps attaining the position of Archduke. His fame was heightened even more when he joined the famed "Legion of Lazuli." This changed, however, in a dark temple where the Legion faced dreaded Chaos cultists. Separated from the Legion, Jacob was captured by the evil priests. However, this once noble knight sold his body and soul to the Dark Gods, so he might live on in Their service. Fleeing the temple and the virtuous heroes who once called him a comrade, Jacob returned to Westfaire. After his return, the land suffered terribly. The cavalier had become an evil, greedy, demon-worshipping blackguard. His reign came to an end, however, when the Legion, successful in turning the tide of Chaos and destroying the temple, learned of Jacob's actions. In a grand spectacle, the Legion stormed Jacob's keep, slaying guards, evil magi, and scores of hell-spawned fiends, until they reached the manor house, where Jacob stood, waiting. In a frenzied melee (in which Kayla almost lost her life, while Merrick was hurled to the Astral Plane), the great Og ran Jacob through, ending the knight's miserable life and freeing the people of the barony. It is said that though he was slain, Jacob was so evil that a fellowship of paladins and Lawful clerics journeyed to the Nether Planes to destroy his very soul.

JEAN-LUC VONDARNE

Jean-Luc was once the captain of a great Ambian ship, the Ventura, which sailed throughout the oceans west of Arsaenea. A falling out with one of the Archdukes, however, forced him to a life on land. Until recently, Jean-Luc was a bounty hunter, along with his long-time colleague Artemis the Assister. The two scoured the realms for those who had wronged the Ambian throne, for Jean-Luc hoped to regain his favour with the Empire. After an excursion with the Legion of Lazuli, it was revealed that the Archduke who'd made Vondarne's life miserable was, in fact, a Chaos cultist. The high noble was summarily executed, and Jean-Luc's continuous devotion to Ambia allowed him to assume the office of the Archduke. He held this position for five years, until he and (then) Empress Syrana Dalbright were wed. Jean-Luc was Emperor until his death; the Archducy was given over to Kalamarr Vrynne and Elana McBane-Vrynne.

KALAMARR VRYNNE

For the most part, the Drakari are a feared and reviled race. They are at best mistrusted by humans, at worst hunted and slain by Sylvari. There are certain dark elves, though, who do not follow the precepts of their dark snake-goddess. A good example is the renegade House of Vrynne. The House of Vrynne is a darkling noble house that is dedicated to good as opposed to the standard dark elven evil. Though the House is relatively secret, at least in the Darkrealms, two of its sons have gained a bit of fame on the surface: Kalamarr and Khazmyr. Khazmyr Vrynne, a wylde mage, had a great future ahead of him on the sunlit world, but he mysteriously disappeared in 3405 GY. His brother, Kalamarr, is faring better. Along with the 'Lazuli Progeny,' he helped to crush the infamous Pentad of Evil. He is currently the Archduke of the Vidhr Archduchy in the Empire of Ambia. His wife, Elana McBane-Vrynne rules by his side.

KARTHAS ELZARAK

This Archmage was once a companion of the noble Jean-Luc Vondarne, but the two parted ways over a dispute on how to dispose of an evil necromancer in the Archduke's realm. Karthas wanted to slay the dark mage, since he was responsible for the death of his daughter. Vondarne sympathized with the mage, but he wanted to put the Chaotic wizard on trial for countless other crimes. In the end, Karthas captured the necromancer, tortured him, and imprisoned him in the Nether Planes. This did not please Jean-Luc, who exiled his former compatriot from the Archduchy. Though Elzarak didn't really bear a grudge against Vondarne for this, there was no love lost between them, either. At this time, Karthas' location is unknown (he is a half-elf, so he may still be alive), but he may be residing in the Sorcalian city of Spyre.

KAYLA

Known in legend as the "Dark Mistress," Kayla was a member of the famous "Legion of Lazuli" adventuring troupe. Together with Merrick and Og, she brought about the destruction of an evil Chaos lesser deity, and prevented a dark cult from opening a gateway to the Nether Planes. During her last adventure, she encountered Angus, a friend from her thieving days in Maar, and they rekindled their former love for one another, eventually marrying. Afterwards, Kayla became Guild Mistriss of the Elgarth (capital of Ambia) Thieves Guild, but this career was cut short when she was used as a pawn by an evil demigoddess. She was liberated from her imprisonment, and currently resides with Angus on another plane.

MAERLYSA

The name "Maerlysa" is the epithet of a dynasty of powerful sorceresses, known throughout the Mythosan lands. Though they are different people, each individual is marked by having great beauty not lost with age, great power over magick, and hair of flaming red with one lock of purest white. The first Maerlysa, who was born around 200 years ago, was a powerful enchantress. After giving birth to Maerlysa II, and seeing the birth of her granddaughter, Maerlysa III, the first archmagus disappeared from the material plane, and hasn't been seen since. The same thing occurred with Maerlysa II, who left this plane 115 years ago. When questioned as to why the wizardesses disappear, the subsequent Maerlysas just smile and say "it was time." What they mean by this, no one knows. At this time, there is only one Maerlysa inhabiting Mythosa, Maerlysa V, also known as Shadara. Shadara is the daughter of Maerlysa IV (Shade) and Angus McBane, and is currently the Mage of the Fulcrum of Sorcalia's Council of Nine.

MERRICK

A great archmage, Merrick was also a high priest of Chronos, god of time. According to legend, Merrick was a member of the adventuring company known as the "Legion of Lazuli," referring to the Archduke Lazuli Laros, a noble of Ambia who often sent his charges on great quests. Together with the Legion, Merrick helped destroy an ancient temple dedicated to a Chaotic lesser god, and also, with the help of Jean-Luc Vondarne and Artemis the Assister, prevented an evil cult from summoning hordes of daemons to the Material Plane. During the latter adventure, Merrick encountered Maerlysa IV (q.v.). The two continued to travel together, and eventually married. For a time, Merrick was the Mage of the Fulcrum of Sorcalia's Council of Nine. His current whereabouts are unknown.

OG

Many are the warriors who call themselves "Og" in honour of this great barbarian hero of legend. According to the stories, Og was a member of the renowned "Legion of Lazuli," and fought alongside the archmage Merrick and the master thief Kayla. Like the rest of the Legion, Og helped to destroy an evil Chaos deity and to turn back hordes of daemons attempting to invade the Material Plane. During the latter escapade, he rescued Aladriel, a Sylvari noblewoman, who later became his wife and bore him twelve children. Og was also responsible for slaying the traitor Jacob, gutting him with the magical blade "Demoncleaver," on the steps of his own manor house. Mortis finally caught up with the hero, however, for Og was slain during the Battle of Elvastar. His death was not in vain, though; the battle was the turning point for the elves of the Sylvan Isles, and marked the defeat of the invading darklings.

There is a group who believes that Og is not dead. He is currently being sought out by a group known as the "Cult of Great OG" (both letters capitalized). This small religious group, known as the "Oggites" for short, believes the barbarian hero is the avatar of their deity OG, and they think he will lead them to a far-off land, where wine flows freely and the wenches are ever-willing (if the real Og is actually alive and ever meets up with the Oggites, he might just try to fulfill the task).

RANALYN

Ranalyn is a young wylde mage, currently under the tutelage of Zewdye the Mad (may the gods help him). Ranalyn caught the attention of the Archmage when he accidentally destroyed the town of Alon in southwestern Ambia. Such occurrences, even when involving wylde mages, are rather rare, so Zewdye thought it best to take the fledgling wizard under his wing; may the land not suffer too much...

RANDORIX

The Druids of Mythosa have a hierarchical structure to their orders, starting with the lowest initiates, and rising up to the ArchDruidic Conclave. The Conclave consists of the seven most powerful Druids of Mythosa. Randorix is one of these Druids, and it is he who administers Conclave doctrine from Druid's Keep, the nature-priests' fortress in northern Ambia.

SHADOWMASTER

From taverns to thieves' guilds, the name of Shadowmaster is spoken with awe and reverence. No one knows much about this mysterious person; he comes and goes throughout the lands as a shadow (hence, his name) It is known that Shadowmaster was once a thief in Radima, where his uncanny skill gained him much fame, wealth, and attention. Many are the nobles and high-borne he's stolen from, insulted, or otherwise humbled; many are the assassins and bounty hunters who would love to find him for the rewards offered by the humble.

TAWNEY

This single name refers to the heroine Tawney, daughter of the barbarian hero Og and the elven princess Aladriel. Tawney was one of the 'Lazlui Progeny' and helped defeat the Pentad of Evil. She currently resides in the Wild Plains.

TIMMA JAROKINTE

Sometimes it takes a 'savage' to show us the errors of our 'civilization.' Timma Jarokinte was one such 'savage.' A warrior from the Savagelands, he briefly travelling with the Lazuli progeny, and gained a brief amount of fame in southern Arsaenean towns. Unfortunately, Timma was slain while his fellowship was exploring some ancient ruins in the Great Barrier Desert. However, a small cult has emerged around his worship, and rumours from the desert say that he's not quite dead...

WELIWIX

Weliwix is the current head of the ArchDruidic Conclave, the ruling body of Mythosa's Druids. Weliwix's primary residence in Caer Celtos, the "capital" of Kaermyr.

ZEWDYE THE MAD

An infamous ArchMage who's more than a little insane (and who should have died over 50 years ago, if not earlier). Little is known of this wizard's past, except that he was an exceptional apprentice and almost lost his life when his master, fearing the power young Zewdye had, tried to kill him. The apprentice, while defending himself, accidentally kill his mentor, and destroyed the tower they were in, along with the surrounding countryside. At this point, Zewdye realized that his powers differed slightly from "regular" magick. As it turned out, the wizard was the first known practitioner of "wylde" magick, that dweomercraft which is slightly imbalanced and totally unpredictable (just like Zewdye). According to legend, Zewdye is the only person ever to have entered the feared realm of Helgard and return. The story says that he came back rather insane, and this earned him the moniker of "the Mad." However, most who knew Zewdye before this have said that he always was insane, and were surprised that it took so long for everyone else to realize it. As for his longevity, the crazed wizard is said not to use artificial means to stay alive, so it is wondered why he still lives (said one Sylvari sorcerer: "He just won't go the Hell away!"). Some attribute this to his excursion into Helgard...but who care say?
