

Book of Facts: Acknowledgments

To Bob Urban

The authors would like to thank the following people, whose assistance made this book both more accurate and more complete than it would otherwise have been: At Thunder's Mouth Press, Joan Fucillo, acting managing editor; Barbara Elovic, managing editor; and Marian Cole, editorial assistant; and, at Thumb Print editorial and design services, editors James Waller and Marian Appellof and designers Jay Anning and Areta Buk.

Book of Facts: Table of Contents

Introduction

Guide to the Book of Facts

Key to Sources

The Book of Facts

A Reader's Guide to the Assassination

Book of Facts: Introduction

It has been called the most infamous crime of the century, possibly of our entire history. The assassination of President John F. Kennedy on November 22, 1963, as he rode in a motorcade in Dallas, Texas, has created more controversy than any other single event in American history. Speculation about exactly what happened and who was involved began only brief minutes after the president's car sped from the scene of the shooting and raced to a nearby hospital.

In this volume we have sought to gather accurate information about all the people, places, events, facts, objects, and theories associated directly or indirectly with the young president's death. We feel that presenting these elements in a reference-book format will help the reader better understand the controversies that continue to envelop this tragic incident, which has left an indelible impression on every American old enough to realize what happened that terrible day.

A word about the entries: It was necessary to set guidelines on what was to be included in and excluded from the book and to set a limit on the extent of information presented in any given entry. Without such guidelines this work could have stretched on for years and resulted in several volumes rather than the single-volume, accessible source we envisioned.

To keep the book accessible, each entry has been made as concise as possible, although some entries are necessarily longer and more comprehensive than others. As we watched the book grow in size - with more and more potential entries - some topics were selectively excluded. The result is a volume containing many subjects directly related to the assassination and its aftermath and a lesser number that are more peripherally related to the president's death. So many hundreds of articles and books, containing so many speculations connecting those directly involved with those only marginally - or quite theoretically - implicated, that we had to establish cut-off points. In some cases we have followed up on connections because they appeared relevant; at other times we did not, feeling they were not germane to this book.

We expect that not all readers will agree with our decisions. Some will insist that we should have included an entry on this or that topic, or that there are entries on topics that have no business being here. But ultimately we had to make the decision to include only those entries we believed would best help our readers understand more than they presently do about the assassination of President John F. Kennedy and the controversies engulfing the event. We think that we have included an entry on every topic appropriate to this ambitious goal. In the interest of improving further editions of this book, we shall be glad to hear from readers who want to suggest other topics they feel warrant inclusion. Those who do send suggestions are reminded that we are the arbiters of the book's contents. Readers with recommendations are invited to write to us in care of the publisher, Thunder's Mouth Press, at 54 Greene Street, Suite 4S, New York, NY 10013.

James P. Duffy
Vincent L. Ricci

Book of Facts: Guide

The Assassination of John F. Kennedy: A Complete Book of Facts includes a number of reference-book elements designed to help the reader find his or her way about in the great mass of material relating to the assassination. First, entries are alphabetically arranged. Almost all entries make mention of other topics that are treated separately in their own entries.

In addition to the numerous full entries, the book includes a number of what are called "blind" entries, which simply direct the reader to other places where information on a given topic is to be found. For example, "AM/LASH" was the code name for CIA operative Cubela, Rolando, so the blind entry for AM/LASH directs the reader to see Rolando Cubela.

Almost every full entry is followed by a "source" line to let readers know which book or books we depended upon most heavily in compiling the information in that entry and to tell readers where they can go most easily to find out more information on that topic. The source line is indicated by a book icon that looks like this: . In deciding which sources to list at the ends of entries, we chose the most readily available books: Almost all the books mentioned in the source lines are in print as of this writing. (A much more complete bibliography follows at the end of the book, as does an annotated list of some of the motion pictures and television shows that have been made about the assassination.) In the source lines, book titles are somewhat abbreviated. A key showing the full titles, authors, and publication information follows on the next page.

Book of Facts: Key to Sources

Assassination Tapes: George O'Toole. The Assassination Tapes: An Electronic Probe into the Murder of John F. Kennedy and the Dallas Coverup. New York: Penthouse Press, 1975.

Best Evidence: David S. Lifton. Best Evidence:: Disguise and Deception in the Assassination of John F. Kennedy. New York: Carroll & Graf, 1988.

Conspiracy: Anthony Summers. Conspiracy. New York: Paragon House, 1989.

Conspiracy of Silence: Charles A. Crenshaw. JFK: Conspiracy of Silence. New York: Signet, 1992.

Contract on America: David E. Scheim. Contract on America: The Mafia Murder of President John F. Kennedy. New York: Zebra Books, 1988.

Coup d'Etat: Michael L. Canfield and Alan J. Weberman. Coup d'Etat in America: The CIA and the Assassination of John F. Kennedy. New York: The Third Press, 1975.

Crossfire: Jim Marrs. Crossfire: The Plot That Killed Kennedy. New York: Carroll & Graf, 1989.

Death of a President: William Manchester. The Death of a President: November 20November 25, 1963. 25th anniversary ed. New York: Harper & Row, 1988.

Fatal Hour: G. Robert Blakey and Richard N. Billings. Fatal Hour: The Assassination of President Kennedy by Organized Crime. New York: Berkley, 1992.

Final Disclosure: David W. Belin. Final Disclosure: The Full Truth About the Assassination of President Kennedy. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1988.

Heritage of Stone: Jim Garrison. Heritage of Stone. New York: Berkley, 1972.

High Treason: Robert J. Groden and Harrison Edward Livingstone. High Treason: The Assassination of President Kennedy and the New Evidence of Conspiracy. New York: Berkley, 1990.

High Treason 2: Harrison Edward Livingstone. High Treason 2: The Great Cover-up: The Assassination of President John F. Kennedy. New York: Carroll & Graf, 1992.

Mafia Kingfish: John H. Davis. Mafia Kingfish: Carlos Marcello and the Assassination of John F. Kennedy. New York: McGraw-Hill, 1989.

Mortal Error: Bonar Menninger. Mortal Error: The Shot That Killed JFK. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1992.

On the Trail of the Assassins: Jim Garrison. On the Trail of the Assassins. New York, Warner, 1991.

Plausible Denial: Mark Lane. Plausible Denial: Was the CIA Involved in the Assassination of JFK? New York: Thunder's Mouth Press, 1991.

Reasonable Doubt: Henry Hurt. Reasonable Doubt: An Investigation into the Assassination of John F. Kennedy. New York: Henry Holt, 1985.

Ruby Cover-up: Seth Kantor. The Ruby Cover-up. New York: Zebra Books, 1992.

Rush to Judgment: Mark Lane. Rush to Judgment. New York: Thunder's Mouth Press, 1991.

Texas Connection: Craig I. Zirbel. The Texas Connection: The Assassination of President John F. Kennedy. Scottsdale, Ariz.: The Texas Connection Company, 1991.

Warren Report: The Warren Commission Report (many editions).

Book of Facts: Abadie, William

A onetime employee of Jack Ruby, the man who shot and killed Lee Harvey Oswald, Abadie repaired jukeboxes and slot machines for Ruby's gambling operations. He also briefly doubled as a bookmaker in one of Ruby's clubs. On December 6, 1963, William Abadie told FBI agents that Ruby was well connected with local racketeers and corrupt police officials in both Dallas and Fort Worth. He also claimed to have seen local police officers hanging out in one of Ruby's bars while patrons were engaging in illegal gambling activities.

Contract on America

Book of Facts: Abrams, Gus

Abrams is reportedly one of three hoboes found near the scene of the assassination and taken in for questioning by the Dallas police almost immediately after. Initially charged with vagrancy, all three were later released. There has been confusion about their identities, what they were doing in the railroad yard behind the Grassy Knoll, and why they were released so quickly.

High Treason 2

Book of Facts: "Abrams, Dr. Morris"

This is the fictitious name that researcher David S. Lifton assigned to a doctor who examined President Kennedy's autopsy report together with drawings of the wounds made by Dr. James J. Humes of Bethesda Naval Hospital. Abrams reportedly voiced the opinion that for some inexplicable reason the president's brain had been cut prior to the autopsy.

See also AUTOPSY CONTROVERSY.

Best Evidence

Book of Facts: Abt, John

An attorney with offices in New York City, Abt was noted for his defense of Smith Act violators in the late 1940s and early 1950s. Following his arrest, Lee Harvey Oswald attempted unsuccessfully to contact Abt, who was away from his home on the weekend following the assassination.

Conspiracy

Book of Facts: Accessories After The Fact

Written by Sylvia Meagher and first published by Bobbs-Merrill in 1967, Accessories after the Fact: The Warren Commission, the Authorities, and the Report is an in-depth critique of the Warren Report. In Accessories, Meagher charges that the Warren Report contains important inaccuracies, omissions, misleading statements, and untrue statements. The book is a highly regarded resource that is frequently quoted by critics of the Warren Commission Report.

Book of Facts: Acoustical Evidence

Police departments routinely tape-record the conversations that take place over their radio networks. The Dallas police dispatch tape recorded on November 22, 1963, was used by the Warren Commission and the Dallas police to pinpoint the locations and review the movements of all officers during the presidential motorcade and immediately following the assassination. It then lay untouched for sixteen years, until Mary Ferrell brought it to the attention of investigators from the House Select Committee on Assassinations. The tape was analyzed by several acoustics experts from Bolt Beranek and Newman and by Mark Weiss.

Using highly sophisticated, state-of-the-art acoustical equipment, experts concluded that four shots were fired in Dealey Plaza, not three as the Warren Commission postulated, and that the third shot was fired from the area of the Grassy Knoll. Before the House Assassinations Committee adjourned, the members asked the Justice Department to pursue some of the leads it had developed. The Justice Department requested the National Science Foundation to verify the acoustical evidence on the dispatch tape. The Foundation's findings disputed the earlier hypothesis and have been used to discredit the conclusion that four shots were fired.

See also ARNOLD, GORDON; ASCHKENASY, ERNEST; BARGER, DR. JAMES; BELL LABORATORY; COMMITTEE ON BALLISTICS ACOUSTICS; GRASSY KNOLL WITNESSES; MCLAIN, H. B.; OVERPASS WITNESSES; PELLICANO, ANTHONY.

Conspiracy

Book of Facts: Acoustical Society of America

The House Select Committee on Assassinations solicited recommendations from the Acoustical Society - a nonprofit professional association of acousticians - for experts who could interpret what were presumably gunshots on an audio tape copied from the November 22, 1963, Dallas Police dispatch tape. The Society recommended the firm of Bolt Beranek and Newman of Cambridge, Massachusetts, and Mark Weiss, a computer scientist.

Contract on America

Book of Facts: Adamick, John

John Adamcik is one of three Dallas police detectives (the others being Richard Stovall and Gus Rose) who investigated Buell Wesley Frazier and searched the home of Ruth Paine, where they confiscated Lee Harvey Oswald's possessions. Adamcik provoked a minor conflict when in his testimony before the Warren Commission he disavowed any understanding of the Russian language. This statement directly contradicted the police report submitted to the Commission, which declared that he "understands a little Russian." Adamcik is no longer a member of the Dallas Police; his whereabouts are unknown.

Assassination Tapes

Book of Facts: Adams, Victoria

Adams, a Texas School Book Depository Building employee when the assassination occurred, was interviewed by both federal agents and the Warren Commission counsel. She was on the fourth floor of the Depository when she heard the gunshots that presumably killed the president and wounded Texas Governor John Connally. According to her statements, she rushed to the stairs, descended swiftly to the first floor, and ran outside. If her account of the sequence is accurate, she should have been in the stairwell at the same time Lee Harvey Oswald is alleged by the Warren Commission to have been fleeing from his sixth-floor sniper's nest to the sanctuary of a second-floor cafeteria, where he was seen by Police Officer Marrion L. Baker. Adams claimed she saw or heard no one on the stairs.

In a session with the Warren Commission counsel, Adams volunteered the opinion that the shots she heard came from below her fourth-floor window and to the right, not from above and the left, where Oswald allegedly fired the fatal bullet.

Adams added another unsolicited piece of information that has fueled the controversies surrounding the shooting scene. She recalled that when she reached the street minutes after the assassination, she and coworker Mrs. Avery Davis saw a man at the corner of Houston and Elm streets questioning people much in the manner of a police officer. Later, after viewing Jack Ruby on television, she said he "looked very similar" to the man at Houston and Elm. However, other persuasive testimony places Ruby at the Dallas Morning News offices at the time.

Best Evidence: Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Air Force One

Air Force One was a customized Boeing 707 familiar to most Americans through the media. Although the plane was maintained and flown by select U.S. Air Force personnel, it appeared on the exterior identical to a commercial 707 except for the legend "United States of America" painted in large white letters above the windows on either side. The craft was officially designated #26000 and bore the Secret Service code name "Angel."

The presidential party had come to Dallas's Love Field on the plane, and, following the assassination, Air Force One was used to transport the coffin presumably containing President Kennedy's body, as well as Jacqueline Kennedy, President and Mrs. Lyndon B. Johnson, and members of both presidential staffs, from Dallas to Andrews Air Force Base outside Washington, D.C. President Johnson was sworn into office aboard the plane before it left Dallas. Controversy has surrounded this flight almost from the moment it touched down at Andrews. The fact that it was one-half hour late led to speculation that the president's body was either tampered with during the flight or was removed from the coffin, spirited from the plane at Andrews, secretly placed aboard a nearby Army helicopter, and flown somewhere else to afford members of the conspiracy an opportunity to alter Kennedy's wounds before the autopsy. A second possibility is that the president's body was removed from Air Force One while it was still at Love Field before departing Dallas.

See also AUTOPSY CONTROVERSY; BODY BAG CONTROVERSY; COFFIN CONTROVERSY.
Best Evidence

Book of Facts: Air Force Two

This, as well as Secret Service code name "Angel Two," is the name given to any of a number of aircraft made available to the vice president for official trips. Unlike Air Force One, no single airplane is specifically dedicated to the vice president's use. The Air Force Two designation applies to whatever plane the vice president is flying aboard at the moment. The name itself was coined by members of the vice president's press corps. Researcher David S. Lifton raised, then rejected, the possibility that President Kennedy's body could secretly have been transported to Washington from Dallas aboard Air Force Two.

Best Evidence

Book of Facts: Akin, Dr. Gene C.

Dr. Akin, an anesthesiologist, was one of sixteen doctors at Dallas's Parkland Memorial Hospital who rushed to the emergency room area as the dying president's limousine sped to the hospital. Dr. Akin was one of several doctors who testified to the Warren Commission that the wound in the rear of the president's head, officially designated the entry wound for the bullet that penetrated his brain, was actually an exit wound.

See also PARKLAND MEMORIAL HOSPITAL STAFF.

Best Evidence; High Treason

Book of Facts: Alba, Adrian

Adrian Alba owned and operated the Crescent City Garage on Magazine Street in New Orleans, not far from the famed French Quarter. The garage had contracted with federal government agencies to garage and service official vehicles, including some assigned to the Federal Bureau of Investigation and the Secret Service. Next door was the William Reily Coffee Company, where from early May until mid-July 1963, Lee Harvey Oswald worked as a machinery oiler. Oswald became friendly with Alba, sometimes spending his spare time in the garage browsing through Alba's gun magazines and talking about his firearms collection. Oswald asked Alba about ordering guns by mail, and Alba claims he helped Oswald repair the sling on a Mannlicher-Carcano rifle, the kind of rifle Oswald allegedly used to shoot Kennedy.

Alba, a quiet man who shunned publicity about his friendship with Oswald, related a curious anecdote to researcher Anthony Summers. According to Alba, one day in the early summer of 1963, a man who showed him FBI credentials appeared at the garage and requested a car. The man was given a green Studebaker. The next day Alba saw what seemed to be the same Studebaker stop at the curb in front of the Reily Coffee Company. He saw Oswald approach the car and bend down to look in the window. A hand reached out the window holding what appeared to be a large envelope, which Oswald accepted and slipped inside his shirt. A few days later the car returned and Oswald once again met it; this time he held a brief conversation with the driver. Several days later the agent dropped the Studebaker off at the garage.

Another strange story involving the Crescent City Garage concerns a report, allegedly made by an employee of Alba's, that on the morning of the assassination a man claiming to be a friend of Alba's showed up at the garage asking whether he could look at Alba's gun magazines. Alba was out, but the man was permitted to go through the magazines. After the assassination, federal agents reportedly discovered that a coupon had been cut out of an issue of American Rifleman - and that the torn edges of this clipping matched those of the coupon Oswald allegedly used to order the Mannlicher-Carcano rifle. Curiously, Oswald's coupon had appeared in the magazine's February 1963 issue, whereas the altered American Rifleman in Alba's stack of magazines was the June 1963 issue.

See also AMERICAN RIFLEMAN ADVERTISEMENT; 544 CAMP STREET. Conspiracy; Reasonable Doubt

Book of Facts: Alderson, Dr. Lawrence

A longtime resident of Houston, Dr. Alderson, a dentist, claims that FBI agents placed him under surveillance shortly after the assassination, and finally questioned him in December 1963. Although there is no known official record of this interview, Alderson says the subject of their questions was his friendship with Jean Souetre, a Frenchman who had once attempted the assassination of Charles de Gaulle. Alderson knew Souetre in the early 1950s while he was a lieutenant in the U.S. Army stationed in France, and Souetre was a captain in the French air force.

Alderson told the FBI agents he hadn't seen Souetre since leaving France, but that the two had continued to exchange Christmas greetings each year. The dentist claims that during the interview, the agents indicated that Souetre had been traced to Dallas the day before the assassination, but that they had lost him there. They were trying to determine how the Frenchman had left Dallas, and whether anyone had helped him leave. In 1983, when a reporter asked Souetre about his relationship with Alderson, Souetre denied knowing him, despite the fact that Alderson has a photograph of the two men, taken while they were both in France.

Reasonable Doubt

Book of Facts: Aleman, Jose

A prominent and wealthy figure in Miami's Cuban exile community, Aleman allegedly told the House Select Committee on Assassinations that an organized crime figure told him, in September 1962, that President Kennedy was "going to be hit" because of harassment by his brother, Attorney General Robert F. Kennedy, of Teamsters president Jimmy Hoffa.

Aleman claimed he met Florida Mafia boss Santos Trafficante at the Scott-Bryant Motel in Miami Beach to discuss a $1.5 million loan from the Teamsters Union. According to Aleman, during the meeting Trafficante railed against the Kennedys and said the president was going to get what was coming to him. Thinking Trafficante meant Kennedy would lose the next election, Aleman said he disagreed, that Kennedy would be reelected. Trafficante allegedly replied, "No, José, he is going to be hit."

Aleman insisted that he told the FBI about the threat on the president's life voiced by Trafficante, but nothing was ever done about it. Aleman claimed that FBI agents questioned him hours after the assassination, but the Bureau denied this.

Aleman appeared before the House Select Committee on Assassinations in 1978. Expressing abject fear for his life, he changed his story slightly, testifying that Trafficante was talking about Kennedy losing the next election. Under immunity from prosecution, Trafficante admitted meeting Aleman at the motel in September, but denied predicting Kennedy's death.

See also MARCELLO, CARLOS; ROSELLI, JOHNNY.

Conspiracy; Contract on America

Book of Facts: Alexander, William F.

Alexander was an assistant district attorney for Dallas County when Kennedy was shot. From the time Lee Harvey Oswald was arrested until his murder by Jack Ruby, Alexander was outspoken about Oswald's guilt and his alleged ties to an international communist conspiracy. Alexander is also believed by many to have been the source of rumors circulated among reporters in Dallas shortly after the assassination hinting that Oswald was a paid informer for the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

Later appointed an assistant U.S. attorney for Dallas federal district, Alexander was quoted as saying, fourteen years after the assassination, that there was a "real possibility" Oswald was on his way to meet an accomplice when he shot and killed Dallas Police Officer J. D. Tippit.

See also RIGHT-WING EXTREMISTS.

Assassination Tapes; High Treason

Book of Facts: Aliases Used by Oswald

SELECTIVE SERVICE SYSTEM Approval not required
NOTICE OF CLASSIFICATION

ALEK JAMES HIDELL
(First name) (Middle name) (Last name)

Selective Service No. 492 224 399 5921 has been classified in Class 1-F (Until 19.....) by Local Board Appeal Board,
by vote of to President
(Show vote on appeal board name only)

..... 19.....
(Date of mailing) (Member or clerk of local board)

The law requires you, subject to heavy penalty for violation, to carry this notice, in addition to your Registration Certificate on your person at all times—to exhibit it upon request to authorized officials—to surrender it to your commanding officer upon entering the armed forces.
The law requires you to notify your local board in writing (1) of every change in your address, physical condition, and occupational, marital, family, dependency, and military status, and (2) of any other fact which might change your classification.
FOR ADVICE, SEE YOUR GOVERNMENT APPEAL AGENT

Lee Harvey Oswald is known to have used at least two aliases during the time he lived in Dallas before the assassination. When Oswald was arrested, he was carrying a forged Selective Service card identifying him as Alek James Hidell. Some researchers believe the card was planted on Oswald. The Mannlicher-Carcano rifle allegedly found in the Texas School Book Depository Building following the assassination had been ordered from Klein's Sporting Goods Company by a person identified only as A. Hidell and had been shipped to a post office box rented by Oswald. Oswald also placed a separate order for a .38 caliber Smith & Wesson revolver using the name A. J. Hidell. (Some researchers have postulated that Oswald may have taken the name Hidell from a nickname that members of his Marine Corps unit used for one of Oswald's Marine Corps buddies, John R. Heindel.)

Oswald used the name O. H. Lee when he lived in the Dallas rooming house operated by Mrs. Earlene Roberts. He is also reported to have used the name Leon Oswald in the Odio Incident. Oswald used the name Osborne in the summer of 1963, when ordering materials for the Fair Play for Cuba Committee from two printing houses in New Orleans.
Conspiracy; High Treason; Reasonable Doubt

Book of Facts: Alpha 66

A militant anti-Castro Cuban exile group with headquarters in Florida and Dallas, Alpha 66 made headlines around the world in the early 1960s for its gunboat raids on Cuban ports. Soviet and Cuban ships were favorite targets of these raids. Because President Kennedy had publicly criticized the group's activities and called for a stop to the attacks on Cuba, many Alpha 66 members had become anti-Kennedy. Following the assassination, several individuals charged that the group was behind the murder, but no proof of its involvement could be found.

Interestingly, Antonio Veciana, a leader of Alpha 66, claimed to have witnessed his CIA contact, known to him as Maurice Bishop, talking to a stranger in a downtown Dallas office building lobby in either late August or early September 1963. Veciana said he thought nothing of it until he saw the man's picture displayed on television as the assassin of President Kennedy, Lee Harvey Oswald.

See also BAY OF PIGS.

Conspiracy

Book of Facts: Altgens, James W.

An Associated Press photographer, Altgens had stationed himself at a vantage point on Elm Street across from the Texas School Book Depository Building to photograph the presidential motorcade as it passed through Dealey Plaza and headed onto the Stemmons Freeway. Altgens captured the president on film in a now-famous shot taken within two seconds of the impact of the bullet that struck his head. For a while, controversy raged around a figure visible in the background of the photograph. A man many people thought strongly resembled Lee Harvey Oswald was pictured standing in the front entrance of the Book Depository Building. If it was, in fact, Oswald, he could not have been on the sixth floor of the building when the shots were fired.

The Warren Commission discounted any possibility that the figure was Oswald, and instead identified the man as Billy Nolan Lovelady, another building employee. The man in the photo is wearing a dark, heavy-textured shirt open halfway to the waist over a white undershirt. Lovelady later told reporters that he was wearing a red-and-white-striped sport shirt that day. The identity of the man in the photo has never been clearly established.

James Altgens told Commission investigators that he raced up the Grassy Knoll immediately after the president was hit because several uniformed Dallas police officers ran in that direction with weapons drawn, apparently in response to the sound of gunfire from that direction. Altgens' testimony that "flesh particles flew out of the side of his [Kennedy's] head in my direction from where I was standing . . ." has been cited by many investigators to support the conclusion that the president's head wound was caused by a bullet fired from the Grassy Knoll, which was to Kennedy's right and front, not from the Texas School Book Depository Building, which was to his rear.

See also DEALEY PLAZA WITNESSES; HEAD WOUND CONTROVERSY.

Best Evidence; Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Alvarado, Gilberto

Gilberto Alvarado was a young Nicaraguan who, two days after the assassination, visited the American Embassy in Mexico City and told shocked diplomats he had seen Lee Harvey Oswald at the Cuban consulate there. Alvarado said that two months earlier he had seen Oswald meet on the consulate's private patio with a thin black man who spoke fluent English. They were joined briefly by a Cuban who gave the black man a fistful of U.S. dollars, then departed.

Alvarado swore he heard the black man tell Oswald, "I want to kill the man," to which Oswald replied that he was not man enough to do the job, but that he, Oswald, would take care of it. Oswald then took the money from the black man and said, "The people are waiting for me back there." With that, both men parted company.

Although Alvarado's story was impossible to verify, it received more than a little credibility because the Central Intelligence Agency staff in Mexico City already knew Oswald had been there, thanks to their constant surveillance of the Cuban consulate. (Some researchers believe this "Oswald" to have been an impersonator.) Researchers such as Anthony Summers, who charge that the CIA was involved in the assassination, have labeled Alvarado's story a piece of disinformation calculated to further the belief that Oswald was working for the Cuban government.

Conspiracy

Book of Facts: Ambulance Controversy

When Air Force One landed at Andrews Air Force Base, the president's coffin was removed from the craft and placed inside a Navy ambulance for the trip to Bethesda Naval Hospital. Jacqueline Kennedy and Attorney General Robert F. Kennedy, who had met the plane, also rode in the ambulance. A second ambulance reportedly joined the motorcade from the air base to the hospital to serve as a decoy, drawing the crowd of curiosity seekers away from the ambulance bearing the president's coffin.

The motorcade reached Bethesda at approximately 6:55 P.M., Friday, November 22, 1963. Mrs. Kennedy and the president's brother alighted and entered the front door of the hospital, leaving the ambulance containing the coffin outside under guard by a group of sailors hand-picked specifically for this duty. The Military District of Washington, D.C., Casket Team had flown by helicopter from Andrews to Bethesda, where the members loaded into a pickup truck. They waited near the front entrance to the hospital until the ambulance pulled away to drive around back to the loading dock. The truck attempted to keep pace with the ambulance, which reportedly drove at high speed, but lost sight of it and then lost its bearings. Returning to the hospital's main entrance, the truck started again for the rear of the building, where the ambulance was found waiting. The coffin was finally removed by the Casket Team. Although Bureau records purportedly indicate that FBI agents accompanied the coffin from the ambulance to the autopsy room at 7:17 P.M., the Casket Team case report puts the time the coffin was transferred at 8:00 P.M.

According to a statement that researcher David S. Lifton attributed to Petty Officer Dennis David, who was chief of the day for the medical school when Kennedy's body arrived, David brought with him to the loading platform "seven or eight sailors" who unloaded the coffin and brought it into the autopsy room. This does not correspond with either of the two reports, one by the FBI men at the scene (the O'Neill and Sibert report) and the other by the Casket Team, concerning who unloaded the coffin. Adding to the controversy is a statement Lifton attributed to X-ray technician Jerrold F. Custer that Custer witnessed Mrs. Kennedy's arrival through the front entrance of the hospital while he was carrying X rays of her husband's head to be developed. If the president's body was still in the coffin inside the ambulance in which Mrs. Kennedy arrived, it was impossible for Custer to be arranging to develop X rays of his wounds.

See also AUTOPSY CONTROVERSY; BIRD, SAMUEL R.; BODY BAG CONTROVERSY; COFFIN CONTROVERSY; LIPSEY, RICHARD A.; WEHLE, PHILIP C.
Best Evidence

Book of Facts: American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU)

Lee Harvey Oswald established a curious relationship with the ACLU. After reportedly attending a meeting of the organization's Dallas chapter with Michael and Ruth Paine, he wrote to the group's national headquarters asking how he could get in touch with "ACLU groups in my area" without mentioning that he had already attended the local meeting. Then, on November 1, 1963, he rented a post office box, naming the Fair Play for Cuba Committee and the ACLU as authorized addressees.

When Oswald was arrested on Friday, November 22, 1963, a delegation from the ACLU visited Dallas Police Headquarters. They were assured that Oswald's rights were being protected, but were refused permission to see him. Oswald was not informed of this visit, even when, on the following afternoon, he requested that the ACLU arrange legal representation.

Conspiracy; Death of a President

Book of Facts: American Fact Finding Committee

WELCOME MR. KENNEDY

TO DALLAS...

- ... A CDFI is designed to meet itself and attend for its objectives, not to be a committee to give advice.
- ... A CDFI is not a committee to give advice, but a committee to give advice to the President.
- ... A CDFI is not a committee to give advice, but a committee to give advice to the President.
- ... A CDFI is not a committee to give advice, but a committee to give advice to the President.

MR. KENNEDY, despite our efforts on the part of your administration, the State Department, the House of Representatives, the Dallas City Council, and members of your party, we have found and are continuing to find that you will have through a Committee largely created by you, the right to address our grievances. We therefore you, to do so with you, and to advise you.

In exercising this constitutional right, we wish to ask you address the following question-related questions of personal experience and interest to all the people of our country: we trust you will answer... in detail, without apology. These questions are:

- WHY is Latin America today either self-determination or Communist, as both results increased U.S. foreign aid, State Department action, and your own best (over government)?
- WHY do you see, we have built a "wall of freedom" around Cuba when there is no freedom in Cuba today? Because directly or indirectly, thousands of Cubans have been imprisoned, are starving and being persecuted with thousands directly or indirectly, thousands more awaiting execution and, in addition, the entire population of about 10,000,000 Cubans are living in misery?
- WHY have you supported the sale of Cuban and other oil to the Communist Government, when you know that the Communist Government is a tool of the Soviet Union?
- WHY did you, both, advise and withdraw the U.S. Marine's from Cuba in 1962 when you know that our own army, Navy, and Air Force, and the Cuban people are a great force and leader of Communist?
- WHY are you against general aid, socialist, capitalism, and other forms of Communism, Police, Military and other Communist countries, who have your hand on the throat of America, East Germany, Cuba and other anti-American freedom fighters?
- WHY did Cuba take the U.S. out of its country after we passed nearly 400 million dollars of aid with its other allies?
- WHY do you, the head of the U.S. Communist Party, stand alone away from your political movement that the party will receive and support your leadership in 1968?
- WHY have you found the leading U.S. military force of the "Democratic Revolution" - the words by the House Committee on Un-American Activities regarding Communism in America?
- WHY have you advised or permitted our brother, Fidel Castro, to go with us, Communism, before we have any other ally in the world, who promises to be partners with American who will not give you a word about our own leadership?
- WHY do you, in favor of the U.S. continuing to give economic aid to Argentina, in spite of the fact that Argentina has perverted almost 400 million dollars of American money annually?
- WHY has the House Policy of the United States Department of the State that the CIA is arranging to give and buy the House Committee on Un-American Activities of the U.S. security information?
- WHY have you supported the Monroe Doctrine in favor of the "Right of Mexico" to use copyright in violation of the United States of America, we demand answers to these questions, and we want them NOW!

THE AMERICAN FACT-FINDING COMMITTEE
"An unaffiliated and non-partisan group of citizens who will not be intimidated."
MEMBERS: UNIDENTIFIED
Chairman
P.O. Box 1762 - Dallas 2, Texas

On the day the president was killed, the American Fact-Finding Committee sponsored a full-page advertisement in the Dallas Morning News headlined "Welcome Mr. Kennedy to Dallas." Bordered in black, the ad contained a series of pointed questions and harsh statements critical of the Kennedy administration. The man who signed the ad, Bernard Weissman, testified that he and some friends had invented the committee name when they wrote the ad.

Weissman prepared the ad with help from two other men: Joseph P. Grinnan and Larrie H. Schmidt. There is no indication that any of the three knew either Lee Harvey Oswald or Jack Ruby before the assassination. According to the Warren Commission, the money to pay for the advertisement was contributed by three Dallas businessmen: Nelson Bunker Hunt, Edgar R. Crissey, and H. R. Bright. Warren Report

Book of Facts: American Guild Of Variety Artists (AGVA)_

Characterized in the 1960s and 1970s by federal law enforcement agencies as a mob-influenced union, AGVA represented nightclub performers, among other entertainment workers. Two years before President Kennedy's assassination, Senator Karl Mundt, a member of the U.S. Senate Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations, labeled AGVA "purely a racket to collect money."

As a nightclub owner, Jack Ruby had close ties with AGVA and many of its mob-connected officials. Telephone company records show that, in the days leading up to the assassination, Ruby made numerous telephone calls to AGVA. Ruby claimed he called union officers about unfair practices, asking them to stop his competitors from featuring certain types of shows that Ruby was prevented from staging in his clubs because of union rules. Observers who believe Ruby was part of a mob plot to assassinate the president associate these calls with the assassination planning.

See also MAFIA.

Contract on America

Book of Facts: American Rifleman Advertisement

SELECTIVE SERVICE SYSTEM Approval not required
NOTICE OF CLASSIFICATION

ALEK JAMES HIDELL
(First name) (Middle name) (Last name)

Selective Service No. 492 224 399 5921 has been classified in Class 1-F (Until 19.....) by Local Board Appeal Board,
by vote of to President
(Show vote on appeal board name only)

..... 19.....
(Date of mailing) (Member or clerk of local board)

The law requires you, subject to heavy penalty for violation, to carry this notice, in addition to your Registration Certificate on your person at all times—to exhibit it upon request to authorized officials—to surrender it to your commanding officer upon entering the armed forces.
The law requires you to notify your local board in writing (1) of every change in your address, physical condition, and occupational, marital, family, dependency, and military status, and (2) of any other fact which might change your classification.
FOR ADVICE, SEE YOUR GOVERNMENT APPEAL AGENT

In early 1963, Klein's Sporting Goods Company received a mail-order coupon clipped from an advertisement it had placed in the February issue of American Rifleman. The order was for the Italian-made Mannlicher-Carcano 6.5-millimeter rifle featured in the ad. The handwriting on the coupon was that of Lee Harvey Oswald, but the name on the order form was A. Hidell. The rifle was to be shipped to post office box 2915, Dallas, Texas, a box rented to Oswald. The cost of the rifle was $21.45. According to Klein's records, the rifle the firm shipped in response to that coupon bore serial number C2766, the same serial number on the rifle allegedly discovered on the sixth floor of the Texas School Book Depository Building shortly after President Kennedy was shot. Much has been made of Oswald's allegedly purchasing the rifle through the mail, and thus establishing a definite trail of possession, since he had to provide Klein's with a name and address for shipping purposes, when he simply could have walked into any of more than a dozen stores in Dallas and purchased the same weapon without having to provide even a fictitious name and address.

See also ALBA, ADRIAN; ALIASES USED BY OSWALD.

Death of a President; Reasonable Doubt

Book of Facts: Ammunition Clip

An ammunition clip is a small, bluish metal spring-loaded cartridge receptacle used to load automatic and semiautomatic rifles. It permits rapid firing, which is otherwise not possible by manually loading a new cartridge into the firing chamber after each shot. Whether or not an ammunition clip for the Mannlicher-Carcano rifle was actually found in the Texas School Book Depository Building remains questionable.

The original inventory of articles found in what became known as the sniper's nest, where Lee Harvey Oswald allegedly was when he fired at Kennedy, does not list an ammunition clip despite an otherwise meticulous detailing of every item recovered along with the rifle. According to assassination researcher Sylvia Meagher, the first reference to a clip surfaces in the Warren Report, published in September 1964. Prior to that, no mention of an ammunition clip appears anywhere. Some researchers, seeking to explain the apparent absence of a clip, have advanced the theory that Oswald reloaded the rifle manually and that someone later added the clip to the inventory. Most experts agree that without using a clip Oswald could not possibly have fired more than one round before the president's car sped from the scene, indicating that the additional shots had to have come from a second source.

Reasonable Doubt

Book of Facts: Anderson, Eugene D.

A U.S. Marine Corps marksmanship expert, Major Anderson was, at the time he testified before the Warren Commission, assistant head of the Marksmanship Branch of the Marine Corps. Major Anderson testified that it was possible for Lee Harvey Oswald to have shot the president twice within the time span of 4.8 to 5.6 seconds, the window established by the Commission between the first and second shots that hit Kennedy.

He also testified about Oswald's marksmanship record while he served in the Marine Corps. Anderson's testimony that weather conditions and a poor rifle could account for wide differences in Oswald's marksmanship scores has been challenged by Mark Lane.

See also FIRING SEQUENCE CONTROVERSY.

Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Anderson, Jack

A Washington-based syndicated newspaper columnist, Jack Anderson first reported, in 1967, allegations that Fidel Castro was behind the Kennedy assassination. Anderson's source for much of the information supporting his reports was a high-ranking mobster named Johnny Roselli, who claimed to have worked closely with the Central Intelligence Agency in plotting to kill Castro.

Anderson revealed to his readers that Roselli told him Jack Ruby was ordered by the mob to kill Lee Harvey Oswald because it was feared he would "crack and disclose information that might lead to them." They believed disclosure of mob ties to the assassination would trigger a major crackdown on the Mafia.

G. Gordon Liddy has stated that Anderson was discussed as a target for assassination because of his exposés divulging discreditable CIA activities. Liddy claims the discussion took place during a luncheon attended by himself, E. Howard Hunt, and a CIA agent known as Dr. Gunn.

Conspiracy; Contract on America; Plausible Denial

Book of Facts: Anderton, James

A FBI agent, James Anderton was contacted on Monday, November 25, 1963, by Dr. Jack Harper from Dallas's Methodist Hospital. The doctor explained that his nephew, William Allen Harper, a college student, had found a fragment of what appeared to be a human bone in the grassy triangle just to the left of where the president was hit.

When the Secret Service learned about the fragment, Anderton was told to send it directly to the White House. That order was quickly countermanded by FBI assistant director Alan Belmont, who ordered the piece of bone sent to the FBI laboratory in Washington, D.C.

See also HARPER BONE FRAGMENT.

Best Evidence

Book of Facts: Andrews, Dean

New Orleans attorney with reputed links to underworld figure Carlos Marcello, Dean Adams Andrews, Jr., testified to the Warren Commission that Lee Harvey Oswald had consulted him several times to discuss legal options open to him to reverse his less than honorable discharge from the Marine Corps. Andrews said that Oswald was usually accompanied by a man who appeared to be a Mexican.

Andrews further attested that the day after the assassination, he was called by an acquaintance named Clay Bertrand, a name many investigators believe to be an alias used by CIA operative Clay Shaw. According to Andrews, Bertrand asked him to defend Oswald in Dallas on the charge that he had killed the president.

_____ The attorney later became a key figure in the investigation of the assassination conducted by New Orleans District Attorney Jim Garrison. When Andrews recanted his account of the Bertrand/Shaw incident, Garrison had him indicted for perjury and obtained a conviction.

Conspiracy; On the Trail of the Assassins; Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Andrews Air Force Base

Andrews Air Force Base, located in the Maryland suburbs of Washington, D.C., was the scene of the arrival at 6:05 P.M. on Friday, November 22, 1963, of Air Force One bearing the coffin of the fallen president. The scene took on a surrealistic character. In the harsh brilliance of television klieg lights, with the sound of helicopter rotors beating in the background, the coffin purportedly containing the president's body was removed from the Boeing 707 and placed in a waiting ambulance for the trip to Bethesda Naval Hospital, where an autopsy team prepared to perform the postmortem examination.

Some investigators have expressed doubt that the coffin actually contained the president's body. They theorize that it was removed from the opposite side of the aircraft and taken aboard a nearby Army helicopter, where the wounds could have been altered before the autopsy.

See also BODY BAG CONTROVERSY; COFFIN CONTROVERSY.

Best Evidence; Death of a President

Book of Facts: Angel, Dr. Lawrence

As curator of Physical Anthropology at the Smithsonian Institution, Dr. Lawrence Angel was among those who attempted to isolate the exact place on the president's skull where the Harper bone fragment splintered away. Angel refused, finally, to identify it as positively coming from the back of the skull. Some investigators feel that the inability to match the fragment to a precise location on the skull is proof the head wound was altered.

Best Evidence

Book of Facts: Angleton, James

Former chief of counterintelligence at the Central Intelligence Agency, Angleton led a faction within the Agency that refused to believe Soviet KGB defector Yuri Nosenko when he denied that the KGB had any communication with Lee Harvey Oswald. A memo allegedly signed by Angleton has also tied him to speculation that E. Howard Hunt, a CIA agent who later became a prominent Watergate figure, was in Dallas the day of the assassination. Hunt maintains he was in Washington.
Fatal Hour; Plausible Denial

Book of Facts: Anson, Robert Sam

A television producer and political correspondent, Anson is the author of a book titled They've Killed the President! The Search for the Murderers of John F. Kennedy, published in 1975 by Bantam Books. In his text, Anson assesses the blame for the assassination on organized crime.

See also CONTRACT ON AMERICA.

Book of Facts: Anti-Castro Cubans

A wave of embittered exiles fled Cuba after the success of Fidel Castro's revolution in 1959. Many settled in Miami, which soon became a hotbed of Central Intelligence Agency activity. CIA operative E. Howard Hunt openly recruited disaffected refugees in the streets of Miami, and Operation Mongoose, the CIA's Miami-based plan to overthrow Castro, included many veterans of former Cuban dictator Fulgencio Batista's military.

A particularly troublesome aspect of the CIA's anti-Castro operations was that the Agency worked hand in hand with members of the Mafia in its attempts to overthrow Castro. The Mafia's eagerness to participate in efforts to get rid of Castro resulted from its having been banned from the island by the new communist government and, hence, prevented from continuing to cash in on what had been its extremely lucrative hotel and casino business in Havana.

After the failure of the Bay of Pigs invasion, many of the anti-Castro Cubans who had been involved in the CIA's secret war against Castro felt betrayed. Some blamed President Kennedy for the invasion's failure, thinking that he had withheld air support necessary for its success. They were even more dismayed when, in September 1963, Kennedy authorized William Attwood, his special adviser for African affairs at the United Nations, to meet with Cuba's envoy to the U.N. to discuss the possibility of negotiations.

The possible connection of anti-Castro Cubans to the assassination of President Kennedy has also been suggested by the fact that, in New Orleans, several anti-Castro organizations had their offices at 544 Camp Street, which also housed the offices of Guy Banister and which was the address Lee Harvey Oswald used on literature he distributed for the phony branch of the Fair Play for Cuba Committee (a pro-Castro group) he set up in that city.

See also ALPHA 66; ARAGON, ERNEST; ARCACHA SMITH, SERGIO; BRINGUIER, CARLOS; CASTELLANOS, NESTOR; FERRIE, DAVID; HEMMING, GERRY PATRICK; MILTEER, JOSEPH; ODIO INCIDENT; OPERATION 40; SHAW, CLAY.

Book of Facts: Applin, George

George Applin was a patron in the Texas Theater on November 22, 1963, when Lee Harvey Oswald was arrested there for the murder of Police Officer J. D. Tippit. Applin told the Warren Commission that during Oswald's arrest, he observed a man sitting in the rear of the theater who not only appeared uninterested in the film but also quietly watched over the arrest while other patrons were ducking for cover. In 1979, Applin admitted to the Dallas Morning News that he later recognized Jack Ruby as the man he had seen in the movie house. He said he was afraid to tell the police or the Commission what he knew in 1964 because he had read an article about the deaths of people who were witnesses to the assassination or connected in some way to the incident.

Crossfire

Book of Facts: Aragon, Ernest

Aragon was, according to researchers Michael L. Canfield and Alan J. Weberman, a Secret Service agent in Miami who was assigned to investigate the Odio Incident and everyone involved in it. Researchers have uncovered several glaring omissions in his performance of this assignment. He is accused of neglecting to pursue vigorously his investigation of Juan, or John, Martin, a shadowy individual believed to have been involved in running guns for anti-Castro Cubans. Aragon's detractors also claim he failed to follow up on a lead provided by a long-distance operator in Mexico City who alleged that she overheard two men discussing "the Castro plan" (the Kennedy assassination?) and one of them remarking ominously, "Bobby is next."

Coup d'Etat

Book of Facts: Arcacha-Smith, Sergio

A leader among anti-Castro Cubans in the New Orleans area, Arcacha reportedly had close ties to underworld figure Carlos Marcello and to Guy Banister, a former FBI agent with links to intelligence agencies. Arcacha set up the office of the Cuban Revolutionary Council at 544 Camp Street, though he denied being acquainted with Lee Harvey Oswald. Arcacha was implicated in the Kennedy assassination by a female drug addict who was hospitalized near Eunice, Louisiana, after being thrown from a car during the night of November 20, 1963. According to reports attributed to Lieutenant Francis Frugé, the state police officer who handled her case, she told him the men she was with had discussed killing President Kennedy while he was in Dallas. The woman, known as Rose Cheramie, but whose real name may have been Melba Christine Marcades, said she worked for Jack Ruby at his Dallas club. Two days later, when the assassination actually took place, Frugé used the woman's description to identify one of the men in the car as Arcacha. The owner of a bar where Cheramie and the men had been drinking before she was dumped identified Arcacha in a photograph as one of her companions. Arcacha denied any knowledge of the incident. On September 4, 1965, Cheramie was killed on a Texas highway when an automobile ran her over after she had apparently been thrown from a car. See also BANISTER, GUY; FERRIE, DAVID. Conspiracy; Crossfire

Book of Facts: Arce, Danny Garcia

___ Arce was one of many witnesses at the assassination scene whose perception of the direction from which the shots were fired helped to further the controversy over the Warren Report. Arce told the FBI that he was standing in the grassy area in front of the Texas School Book Depository Building when he heard the shots. He told law enforcement officers he thought they "came from the direction of the railroad tracks near the parking lot at the west end of the Depository Building."

See also DEALEY PLAZA WITNESSES; TEXAS SCHOOL BOOK DEPOSITORY BUILDING EMPLOYEES.

Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Archer, Don

After Jack Ruby shot Lee Harvey Oswald, Dallas police lieutenant Archer reportedly told Ruby that Oswald was dead and that Ruby would probably be executed for the killing. This news apparently brought a sigh of relief from Ruby.

Conspiracy; High Treason

Book of Facts: Armstrong, Andrew

Andrew Armstrong was working as a handyman at Jack Ruby's Carousel Club when President Kennedy was slain. He acknowledged being with his employer when Ruby heard that Dallas Police Officer J. D. Tippit also had been killed. According to Armstrong, Ruby was distraught because, Ruby said, Tippit was a close friend. In testimony before the House Select Committee on Assassinations, Armstrong refuted Ruby's explanation that a suspicious series of calls he made to mob figures and leaders of the American Guild of Variety Artists in the weeks before the assassination were appeals for help because his business was being badly hurt by competitors who were violating union regulations against amateur strippers. Armstrong said, to the contrary, that business had been "picking up" at Ruby's club during the fall of 1963.

Contract on America; Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Armstrong, Leslie

Leslie Armstrong was the jury foreperson at a 1985 trial involving a libel suit brought by CIA agent E. Howard Hunt against the publication Spotlight concerning an article by Victor Marchetti that implicated Hunt in the assassination of President Kennedy. The jury found for Spotlight. After the trial, Armstrong told the press she believed the evidence presented by defense attorney Mark Lane proved that the Central Intelligence Agency had killed Kennedy and that Hunt was involved. The trial is the centerpiece of Lane's best-selling 1991 book, Plausible Denial, published by Thunder's Mouth Press.

Book of Facts: Arnett, George

Dallas police lieutenant George Arnett confirmed to investigators that Jack Ruby and Police Officer J. D. Tippit had had a long-standing friendship. Arnett theorized that Tippit's murder by Lee Harvey Oswald may have been Ruby's true motive for shooting Oswald.

See also WILLIAMS, HAROLD.

Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Arnold, Carolyn

Mrs. Arnold was employed as the secretary to the vice president of the Texas School Book Depository when the assassination took place. Although she never testified before the Warren Commission or the House Select Committee on Assassinations, Arnold was interviewed extensively by the FBI. From that interview FBI agents derived that Mrs. Arnold believed that on November 22, 1963, she saw Lee Harvey Oswald standing on the sidewalk in front of the Texas School Book Depository Building at about 12:15 P.M., only minutes before the fatal shots were fired.

In 1978, however, Mrs. Arnold claimed she was misquoted in the FBI report of the interview, which she read long after it was given. Disavowing the report, she insisted it was a gross misrepresentation of her statements to the FBI, then went on to clarify her original version of what she saw that day: At approximately 12:15 P.M., Mrs. Arnold went to the company lunchroom for a drink of water. She saw Oswald seated in a booth, apparently eating his lunch. Although neither spoke, Arnold declares that she knew Oswald well enough, and passed sufficiently close to him, to be absolutely certain it was he. Mrs. Arnold's testimony raises considerable doubt that Oswald could have fired the rifle that killed the president. He would have had to race to the sixth floor, assassinate the president, and return in less than two minutes to the second-floor cafeteria, where he was confronted by Police Officer Marrion L. Baker and building manager Roy Truly only minutes after the shooting.

See also TEXAS SCHOOL BOOK DEPOSITORY BUILDING EMPLOYEES.

Conspiracy; Crossfire; Reasonable Doubt

Book of Facts: Arnold, Gordon

One of a group that came to be called the Grassy Knoll witnesses, Gordon Arnold was on leave following his Army basic training. He was an amateur cinematographer anxious to film the presidential motorcade from the best possible angle. Dressed in his Army uniform, Arnold first chose as his site the railroad overpass at the western end of Dealey Plaza, which offered a clear, unobstructed view of the plaza, through which the motorcade was to pass. Arnold was prevented from entering the overpass by a well-dressed man who showed him a Secret Service badge and ID. Official records indicate that no Secret Service agents were assigned to patrol the area on foot that day. However, a Dallas police officer and a county deputy sheriff reportedly encountered a second such "agent" on the Grassy Knoll immediately after the shooting.

Arnold then found a suitable vantage point from which to shoot his movie film, only a few feet in front of the stockade fence on the Grassy Knoll. Suddenly he felt a shot whiz past his left ear. He threw himself to the ground in an involuntary reaction, probably due to his recent training. Questioned by a uniformed police officer a few seconds later, Arnold insisted that the shots had come from behind him. The officer confiscated Arnold's film.

Arnold recounted the experience in a 1978 interview published in the Dallas Morning News. While some people discounted his story, it received tacit corroboration from then-senator Ralph Yarborough, who was riding with Vice President Lyndon B. Johnson two cars behind Kennedy's. Yarborough wrote the Morning News that he recalled that when the first shot was fired he saw a uniformed figure immediately "hit the dirt" at the spot where Arnold said he was filming. The senator remembered thinking to himself that the man's quick reaction suggested he must be a "combat veteran."

Nothing more has ever been heard of Arnold's confiscated film, and the police officer who took it and the Secret Service agent who prevented Arnold from going onto the overpass have never been identified.

Conspiracy; Contract on America; Reasonable Doubt

Book of Facts: Artime, Manuel

A leader among anti-Castro Cuban exiles with allegedly close ties to E. Howard Hunt of the Central Intelligence Agency, Artime is believed to have been deeply involved in plots to kill Fidel Castro through an undercover Cuban CIA informant named Rolando Cubela. At the time Kennedy was assassinated, Artime reportedly was maintaining a small force of several hundred Cubans in Nicaragua who were preparing for assassination assignments against the Castro regime. He later served as a civilian representative for Brigade 2506, which was training for the invasion of Cuba.

See also BAY OF PIGS.

Conspiracy; Fatal Hour; High Treason

Book of Facts: Aschkenasy, Ernest

Aschkenasy, an acoustics expert, was called on by the House Select Committee on Assassinations to review earlier acoustics studies of background sounds caught on the Dallas police dispatch tape during the assassination. When Aschkenasy, Dr. James Barger, and Professor Mark Weiss completed their analysis of the taped sounds of what appeared to be four gunshots recorded through the open microphone of a Dallas police officer's motorcycle radio, they concluded that there was a 95 percent or better probability that the report of the third shot came from the area of the Grassy Knoll.

See also ACOUSTICAL EVIDENCE; BELL LABORATORY; RAMSEY REPORT.
Fatal Hour; High Treason

Book of Facts: The Assassination Tapes

Written by George O'Toole, a former CIA computer specialist, and published by Penthouse Press in 1975, this book is based on results obtained with a "psychological stress evaluator," an electronic device that measures voice stress levels to determine whether a subject is lying or telling the truth. O'Toole used the device on myriad taped interviews, press conferences, and the like, with people connected (some remotely) to the assassination and subsequent events. These included eyewitnesses, police officers at the scene, medical examiners, and members of the Warren Commission. O'Toole also conducted additional private interviews. The book purports to prove that two conspiracies existed: one to actually murder the president and the other to frame Lee Harvey Oswald, who the author declares was innocent.

Book of Facts: Atsugi Air Base

In 1957, when Lee Harvey Oswald was serving in the U.S. Marine Corps, one of his assignments was the radar room at Atsugi Air Base, southwest of Tokyo, Japan. During this time, he carried a military security clearance alternately reported as "confidential" and "secret." Atsugi was also a major operations center for the Central Intelligence Agency's supersecret U-2 spy plane program. Oswald's proximity to the CIA installation prompted speculation that he may have been recruited by the Agency while at Atsugi. Researchers have found no consistent pattern to Oswald's activities there, and remain unable to account for his strange, prolonged disappearance from the base, which was ostensibly attributed to treatment for a minor disease.

Conspiracy

Book of Facts: Autopsy Controversy

The president's autopsy was performed at Bethesda Naval Hospital outside of Washington, D.C. Every facet of the autopsy has been controversial, including these provocative questions: Why wasn't it done in Dallas, as Texas law requires and the Dallas medical examiner, Earl Rose, wanted? And why was it that the men selected to perform it lacked experience in performing autopsies on gunshot victims? There is a host of conflicting theories about bullet entry and exit points, the absence of the president's brain at the autopsy, why Secret Service men were temporarily denied entry to the autopsy room with the coffin, and why the chief of the autopsy team, Dr. James J. Humes, burned notes made during the autopsy as well as the first draft of the autopsy report.

The official autopsy report indicated that two bullets struck the president. One, the fatal shot, entered the rear of his head and disintegrated, causing massive loss of skull bone and brain and other tissue. The second entered his back below the shoulders at a steep angle, causing a shallow superficial wound that Humes penetrated with his finger, dislodging the bullet. According to their testimony before the Warren Commission, when the autopsy was performed, the Bethesda doctors were unaware that the hole in the front of the president's neck had been a bullet hole before Dr. Malcolm Perry in Dallas's Parkland Memorial Hospital used it for a tracheotomy. Dr. Perry had identified the original hole in the president's neck as a bullet entry wound, making a persuasive case that the bullet that entered the president's neck had to come from somewhere in front of him.

See also AMBULANCE CONTROVERSY; BODY BAG CONTROVERSY; BOSWELL, DR. THORNTON; COFFIN CONTROVERSY; HEAD WOUND CONTROVERSY; SINGLE BULLET THEORY; THROAT WOUND CONTROVERSY; X-RAY CONTROVERSY.

Assassination Tapes; Best Evidence; High Treason

Book of Facts: Autopsy Participants

Among those who participated in or witnessed the autopsy of President Kennedy's body were the following individuals, each of whom is discussed in a separate entry in this book: Dr. Thornton Boswell, Bethesda's chief of pathology; Dr. George Burkley, chief medical officer of the White House and President Kennedy's personal physician; Dr. Robert Canada; Jerrold F. Custer; Dennis David; Dr. John Ebersole; Dr. Pierre Finck; Dr. Calvin Galloway; Dr. James J. Humes; James E. Metzler; Paul K. O'Connor; Edward Reed; Floyd A. Riebe; and Jan Gail Rudnicki. Many researchers believe that many more people were in the autopsy room, including a number of civilians who sat in the gallery overlooking it, than have been identified in official reports.

See also BAKEMAN, DR. GEORGE.

Book of Facts: Baden, Dr. Michael

A forensic pathologist, Dr. Baden chaired the Forensic Pathology Panel assembled by the House Select Committee on Assassinations. After his panel questioned the Bethesda doctors who performed the autopsy and examined the photographs and X rays of the president's body, Baden focused an important part of his testimony on the location of the back wound caused by the so-called magic bullet. Dr. Baden positioned the entry wound in the president's back a full two inches below the location identified by the autopsy team. This trajectory made the projected path of the bullet even more extraordinary than was earlier believed.

See also AUTOPSY CONTROVERSY; SINGLE BULLET THEORY.

Best Evidence

Book of Facts: "Badgeman"

The "Badgeman" is a shadowy figure who appears in the background of a photograph taken by a witness to the assassination. Precisely when the fatal bullet shattered President Kennedy's skull, Mary Moorman, who was standing near the curb across from the Grassy Knoll, captured the drama in a snapshot taken with her Polaroid camera. Although it was never examined by the Warren Commission, the photo has nevertheless held great interest for many researchers because on the Grassy Knoll in the background is the stockade fence that many believe shielded a second gunman.

Using a slide made from the original photograph, which was sold to United Press International, researchers Gary Mack and Jack White examined blow-ups of the image, ultimately concentrating on two incongruous figures at the north end of the stockade fence. Although not clearly discernible in the fuzzy background, one figure seems to be wearing a police uniform not unlike those worn by Dallas police, while the other appears to be dressed in work clothes and a hard hat. The "uniformed" figure, dubbed "Badgeman" because of a shiny object on his chest believed to be a badge, looks to be holding a rifle that has just been fired. A puff that could be from the muzzle blast partially obscures his face. A 1988 British-made television documentary entitled "The Men Who Killed Kennedy" cast "Badgeman" as Lucien Sarti, an alleged professional killer from Corsica.

*See also GRASSY KNOLL WITNESSES; SMOKE FROM THE GRASSY KNOLL.
Crossfire: High Treason*

Book of Facts: Bakeman, Dr. George

A Dr. George Bakeman is listed in the autopsy report as being among those present in the room when the president's body was examined, but no information exists regarding who he is.

High Treason 2

Book of Facts: Baker, Marrion

Baker was one of several motorcycle officers escorting the presidential motorcade through Dallas. He had just turned off Houston Street onto Elm in front of the Texas School Book Depository Building when he heard a shot. Looking up, he saw a flock of pigeons fly off the roof as if startled by the sound. He parked his motorcycle and raced into the building, followed by the building manager, Roy Truly, who had been watching the motorcade from in front of the building. The two started to take an elevator, but both cars were locked on the fifth floor, so they used the stairs.

Through the glass window in the door of a second-floor lunchroom, Baker saw a man hurrying away from him. With Truly close at his back, Baker flung open the door and challenged the man with gun drawn. When Truly identified the man as a Book Depository employee, Officer Baker continued up the stairs to the roof. According to the report Baker filed with the FBI the following day, the man, who later was identified unequivocally by two competent witnesses as Lee Harvey Oswald, was "drinking a Coke," which he evidently purchased from a lunchroom vending machine only moments before. The words "drinking a Coke" were deleted from the report, and any reference to the soft drink during Baker's testimony before the Warren Commission was stricken.

The Coke has become a pivotal detail with Warren Commission critics for two reasons: first is the Commission's deletion of Baker's statement about it, and second is the testimony of another building employee, Mrs. Robert A. Reid, that she saw Oswald drinking a Coke moments later. Critics argue that the Commission wanted knowledge of the Coke suppressed, because it was impossible for Oswald to have fired the shots that killed the president from the sixth floor, hidden his rifle behind some boxes on the other side of the floor, raced down the stairs to the second floor, purchased a Coke from the vending machine in the lunchroom, and begun drinking it before he was confronted by Baker and Truly. When Captain Will Fritz of the Dallas police asked him about his whereabouts when the assassination happened, Oswald said he was in the second-floor lunchroom drinking a Coca-Cola.

See also TEXAS SCHOOL BOOK DEPOSITORY BUILDING EMPLOYEES.
Best Evidence; High Treason

Book of Facts: Baker, Robert "Barney"

Robert Baker was an associate of former Teamsters boss Jimmy Hoffa. Some investigators who seek to tie the president's homicide to the Mafia identify Baker as a part of that link. He had strong personal reasons for hating the Kennedys. Attorney General Robert F. Kennedy told Baker he was "underworld lice . . . the scum of the earth." The president's brother also called him Hoffa's "ambassador of violence." Two weeks before the assassination, Jack Ruby reportedly received a call from Baker. The following day Ruby called another Hoffa associate in Miami, then he called Baker for a second conversation. Although Baker later testified that Ruby was calling about his problems with the American Guild of Variety Artists, skeptics find that hard to believe. Most suspect the calls were related to the increasing pressure Baker's boss, Hoffa, was receiving from the Kennedy Justice Department.

Conspiracy

Book of Facts: Ball, Joseph

A senior counsel to the Warren Commission, Ball reportedly helped promote the case against Lee Harvey Oswald as the lone assassin. Along with David Belin, he is credited with preparing "The Assassin," chapter 4 of the Warren Report, which details the evidence of Oswald's guilt. According to assassination researcher David S. Lifton, when Ball was asked on a Los Angeles television program about the possibility of a gunman shooting at the president from the Grassy Knoll, he responded, "There were no people there."

Best Evidence

Book of Facts: Ballen, Samuel

Samuel Ballen, a friend of Lee Harvey Oswald's, provided a positive assessment of the presumed assassin's character. According to press reports issued soon after the assassination, Ballen, a petroleum economist, knew Oswald well enough to describe him as "the kind of person I could like." He also described Oswald as physically frail, and said he was an "inquiring young man" who was an independent thinker.

Plausible Denial

Book of Facts: Banister, Guy

One of the FBI agents involved in the killing of the infamous "public enemy number one" John Dillinger, Banister eventually became special agent-in-charge of the FBI's Chicago office. During World War II he reportedly worked in Naval Intelligence, returning to the FBI when the war ended. Following his retirement in the early 1950s he moved to New Orleans to accept the post of deputy chief of police. Forced to retire from that job after threatening a waiter with his gun, Banister set up a private detective agency called Guy Banister Associates.

Many researchers contend that Banister forged a link between Lee Harvey Oswald, the American intelligence community, and anti-Castro Cubans. He maintained offices at 544 Camp Street in New Orleans, an address shared with a number of Cuban organizations attempting to overthrow Fidel Castro. An active supporter of these Cubans, he also had long-standing close ties with several intelligence agencies. The common denominator tying Oswald with Banister and the latter's shadowy activities is the 544 Camp Street address. When Oswald was arrested in New Orleans after a fight with Cubans who were angry because he was distributing pro-Castro material, he had in his possession pamphlets that came from the Fair Play for Cuba Committee, whose address was given as 544 Camp Street. Since this was the address of so many anti-Castro activists, it is strange that Oswald used it for a pro-Castro group.

Guy Banister's death in 1964 was ascribed to a heart attack, although researchers Robert J. Groden and Harrison Edward Livingstone report that "some say" that a bullet wound was found in his body. He was never questioned by anyone from the Warren Commission about his relationship with Oswald or whether he knew anything about the assassination. See also BRINGUIER, CARLOS; FERRIE, DAVID; MARTIN, JACK.

Conspiracy; Crossfire; High Treason

Book of Facts: Barger, Dr. James

Dr. Barger was an acoustics scientist with the Cambridge, Massachusetts, firm of Bolt, Beranek and Newman, which was hired by the House Select Committee on Assassinations to examine the Dallas police dispatch tape. Working with Mark Weiss and Ernest Aschkenasy, Barger created a visual presentation of the gunshots fired in Dealey Plaza when President Kennedy was assassinated. In August 1978, Barger went to Dallas and conducted on-site tests of the sounds of rifles firing from the two critical locations: the Texas School Book Depository Building and the Grassy Knoll. Comparing his results with the sounds on the tape, he concluded that four shots were fired at the president: three coming from the Depository Building and one from the Grassy Knoll.

See also ACOUSTICAL EVIDENCE; BELL LABORATORY; PELLICANO, ANTHONY; RAMSEY REPORT.
Best Evidence; Conspiracy; High Treason

Book of Facts: Barnes, Willie

Sergeant Barnes of the Dallas police was given two spent shells recovered from the J. D. Tippit murder scene by Officer J. M. Poe. For identification purposes, Barnes immediately scratched the initial B inside each shell. When asked by the Warren Commission to identify the shells he had been given by Poe, Barnes could not find his initial in any of the four shells the Commission showed him. This strongly suggests the possibility that the original shells were replaced, while in police custody, with shells that matched the handgun belonging to Lee Harvey Oswald. If this is so, then someone else, not Oswald, shot Tippit.

Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Barnett, Welcome

Barnett, a Dallas police officer, told the Warren Commission that a construction worker approached him shortly after the shooting and said he saw a rifle sticking out of an upper-floor window of the Texas School Book Depository Building. Although the individual was never identified, the Commission assumed it was Howard L. Brennan, a construction worker who gave similar testimony.

Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Barnum, George

Barnum, a Coast Guard yeoman, was a member of the Military District of Washington, D.C., Casket Team that watched as the president's coffin was taken from Air Force One at Andrews Air Force Base and placed inside a Navy ambulance. The team, arriving at Bethesda Naval Hospital separately from the ambulance, removed the coffin from the ambulance and transferred it to the hospital's autopsy room. Seven days later, at the urging of his superior officer, Barnum wrote a complete description of his experience with the death of the president.

See also AMBULANCE CONTROVERSY.

Best Evidence

Book of Facts: Bashour, Dr. Fouad

Although a cardiologist, Dr. Bashour assisted in the emergency room of Parkland Memorial Hospital when the president's body was brought in. When, in 1979, he was shown a copy of the official autopsy photograph of the president's head wound, he is quoted as saying, "Why do they cover it up? This is not the way it was."

See also PARKLAND MEMORIAL HOSPITAL STAFF.

High Treason

Book of Facts: Batchelor, Charles

Batchelor was assistant chief of the Dallas police at the time of the assassination. Batchelor's activities have come under scrutiny by some researchers. For instance, because of the difficulty researchers have had in establishing how Jack Ruby was able to enter the garage at Dallas Police Headquarters, where he murdered Lee Harvey Oswald, the suspicion exists that Batchelor may have allowed Ruby into the building. Criticism has also been directed at the fact that Batchelor, despite failing in his responsibility to protect the president during his visit to Dallas and failing to protect Oswald when he was in police custody, was later promoted to Dallas police chief.

See also DAVIS, RED; GRAVES, L. C.; VAUGHN, ROY.

High Treason

Book of Facts: Baxter, Dr. Charles_

An assistant professor of surgery at Parkland Memorial Hospital, Dr. Baxter was present when the president's body was taken into the Parkland emergency room. He described the head wound to the Warren Commission as a "large gaping wound in the back of the skull." Dr. Baxter's description of the laceration is not only remarkably different from the autopsy report, which placed the lethal injury higher on the head, but is entirely consistent with an exit wound that would have literally blown away the back of the skull.

Baxter characterized the wound in the front of the president's neck as a small-caliber "entry wound." This account coincided precisely with that of the others present at the time, all of whom described the wound as having no jagged edges. Their collective observations conflict with Dr. James J. Humes' description of the hole as having "widely gaping irregular edges." Baxter said that after the cut for a tracheotomy, the opening measured 4 to 5 centimeters at the widest. At Bethesda Naval Hospital, Dr. Humes placed the opening at 6.5 centimeters. These and other differences between the wounds described by the doctors and nurses at Parkland and those described at Bethesda have been cited to support allegations that Kennedy's wounds were altered to provide a basis for the theory that he was shot from behind.

See also AUTOPSY CONTROVERSY; PARKLAND MEMORIAL HOSPITAL STAFF; THROAT WOUND CONTROVERSY.
Best Evidence; High Treason

Book of Facts: Bay of Pigs

On April 17, 1961, a force of Cuban exiles invaded Cuba in a CIA-sponsored attempt to overthrow Fidel Castro's communist dictatorship. Planning for the operation began during the Eisenhower administration, and Kennedy approved going ahead with it after his inauguration in January 1961. The operation was an abject failure. Most of the outnumbered, outgunned invaders were killed or taken prisoner. Both the invasion force, known as Brigade 2506, and the CIA advisers who had armed and trained the troops, attributed the catastrophe to Kennedy's eleventh-hour withdrawal of promised vital air support. Some researchers feel a strong case can be made for putting blame for the president's death on anti-Castro Cubans and/or Central Intelligence Agency agents motivated by bitterness over his abdication of his commitment in the Bay of Pigs Invasion.

Book of Facts: Becker, Edward

A petty underworld fringe figure, Becker related that during a meeting with reputed New Orleans Mafia boss Carlos Marcello in the autumn of 1962, Marcello talked freely about his desire to kill both John and Robert F. Kennedy. His Sicilian-style vendetta against the Kennedys grew out of Bobby's relentless assault on the Mafia boss, particularly Marcello's April 1961 arrest and subsequent (temporary) deportation. Becker says Marcello boasted how he would ensure that the mob would escape blame for the assassination, by "setting up a nut to take the blame."

Conspiracy; Mafia Kingfish

Book of Facts: Belin, David

Belin was assistant counsel to the Warren Commission. He assisted with the investigation into Lee Harvey Oswald's guilt, and helped write "The Assassin," chapter 4 of the Warren Report. He later served as chief counsel to the Rockefeller Commission established by President Gerald Ford (a member of the Warren Commission) to investigate U.S. intelligence operations inside the United States.

Belin remains a strong supporter of the Warren Commission findings and regularly speaks out against its critics and the various conspiracy theories they postulate.

He is the author of two books, November 22, 1963: You Are the Jury, published by Quadrangle in 1973, a defense of the Warren Commission findings, and Final Disclosure: The Full Truth About the Assassination of President Kennedy, published by Scribner's in 1988, largely a critique of what he termed the "assassination scam" created by authors of books advancing conspiracy hypotheses.

See also Ball, Joseph.

Best Evidence; High Treason

Book of Facts: Belknap, Jerry

Jerry Belknap was eventually identified as the man who, shortly before the presidential motorcade arrived, collapsed near the front of the Texas School Book Depository Building in what appeared to be a seizure. He was taken by ambulance to Parkland Memorial Hospital, but left the hospital without receiving treatment. Some researchers find this incident suspicious, saying that it distracted the attention of at least one police officer away from the Grassy Knoll, where other witnesses later reported seeing men heading for the fence there just before the president arrived. When investigation yielded his identity, Belknap said he had suffered seizures since a childhood accident. He claimed he left the hospital because the president was brought in soon after his own arrival and he wasn't getting any treatment.

Crossfire: On the Trail of the Assassins

Book of Facts: Bell, Audrey

Audrey Bell was the operating room nursing supervisor on duty at Parkland Memorial Hospital when the president's body was brought in, yet she was never questioned by either the Warren Commission or the House Select Committee on Assassinations. In interviews with the Dallas Morning News, Bell divulged that she gave a Texas highway patrolman bullet fragments that had been removed from Governor Connally's wrist and thigh, presumably pieces of the so-called magic bullet that allegedly caused his wounds. She resolutely maintained as late as 1978 that she saw four or five bullet fragments, not the three placed in evidence by the Warren Commission; in her description, "the smallest was the size of the striking end of a match and the largest at least twice that big." The fragments she described are too large to account for the small amount of material missing from the magic bullet, and many researchers offer this fact to debunk the single bullet theory.

See also PARKLAND MEMORIAL HOSPITAL STAFF.

Best Evidence; Conspiracy

Book of Facts: Bell Laboratory

According to the House Select Committee on Assassinations, the Warren Commission submitted to the Bell Telephone Acoustics & Speech Research Laboratory for analysis an audiotaped description of the assassination scene by Sam Pate, a local Dallas radio news reporter covering the president's motorcade. The Warren Report made no mention of this tape, and some researchers question why it was never pursued further after the people at the Bell Laboratory reported "six nonvoiced noises" on the tape that many believe were gunshots.

See also ACOUSTICAL EVIDENCE; BARGER, DR. JAMES; WEISS, MARK.

High Treason

Book of Facts: Belmont, Alan

Belmont was the assistant director of the FBI at the time of the Kennedy assassination.
See HARPER BONE FRAGMENT.

Book of Facts: Benavides, Domingo

An auto mechanic, Domingo Benavides witnessed Dallas Police Officer J. D. Tippit's killing, thus becoming involved in the controversy over Lee Harvey Oswald's role in the assassination of President Kennedy. Shortly after 1:00 P.M., less than an hour after the assassination, Benavides was driving his pickup truck west on 10th Street in the Oak Cliff section of Dallas when he witnessed Tippit's murder. The Warren Commission believed he used the radio in Tippit's police car to report the shooting, but this is in some dispute. He did pick up two spent cartridge shells, which he gave to Police Officer J. M. Poe. Benavides was never called in by police to identify Tippit's killer from a lineup, which Warren Commission senior counsel David Belin called "a gross error." Benavides reportedly received death threats after it was widely publicized that he had witnessed the Tippit killing. See also BENAVIDES, EDWARD; BOWLEY, T. F.; TIPPIT MURDER SCENE WITNESSES. Crossfire; Final Disclosure; High Treason; Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Benavides, Edward

In February 1964, Domingo Benavides' brother Edward was killed, the victim of a gunshot to the head. Some assassination researchers believe Edward so closely resembled his brother that his unknown assailant killed him in a case of mistaken identity.

See also BENAVIDES, DOMINGO; BOWLEY, T. F.
High Treason

Book of Facts: Bennett, Glen

Secret Service agent Bennett was riding in the car directly behind the presidential limousine when the bullets struck the president. He was sitting behind presidential aide Dave Powers. During the return trip to Washington aboard Air Force One, Bennett wrote down his impressions. He describes having seen a bullet enter the president's back "about four inches down from the right shoulder," which is consistent with the placement of holes in Kennedy's clothing. Researcher David S. Lifton mistrusts Bennett's account as simply a fabrication to corroborate the results of the autopsy. To support this theory, he presents photographs taken at the time of the assassination showing everyone in Bennett's car facing forward except Bennett, whose head was turned to the right as he looked at the crowd of people lining the route.

Best Evidence

Book of Facts: Bentley, Paul

Dallas policeman Bentley was one of the arresting officers when Lee Harvey Oswald was apprehended at the Texas Theater as a suspect in the killing of Police Officer J. D. Tippit. Bentley claimed he found a false identification bearing the name Alek Hidell in Oswald's wallet, which he examined on the way to Police Headquarters following the arrest. Some researchers question the validity of this, based on the absence of the Hidell ID from the list of items contained in the preliminary record of the radio call to headquarters detailing items bearing the name Lee Harvey Oswald. Skeptics say the bogus identification was ostensibly planted on Oswald later to cement his connection with the Mannlicher-Carcano rifle ordered from Klein's Sporting Goods Company under the name A. Hidell.
See also ALIASES USED BY OSWALD; HILL, GERALD L.
Assassination Tapes

Book of Facts: "Best Evidence"

Published by Macmillan in 1980 and reissued by Carroll & Graf in 1988, Best Evidence: Disguise and Deception in the Assassination of John F. Kennedy is the work of David S. Lifton, who spent fifteen years researching the assassination. A graduate of Cornell University with a degree in engineering physics, he was formerly a NASA computer engineer and has more recently been a consultant for television programs dealing with the assassination. Lifton makes extensive use of statements by individuals at Parkland Memorial Hospital and Bethesda Naval Hospital, as well as many others, to focus on what he believes is evidence that Kennedy's wounds were altered between the time the body left Parkland and when the autopsy was performed at Bethesda. This book is the most detailed account of the medical evidence related to the assassination.

Book of Facts: Bethell, Tom

Bethell is a correspondent for The American Spectator. Claiming he participated in the assassination investigation conducted by New Orleans District Attorney Jim Garrison, Bethell wrote an article that appeared in the December 16, 1991, issue of The National Review exposing what he considers to be a completely false portrayal of the investigation in the movie JFK. He also reveals that Garrison's lawyers and investigators were relieved when they learned of the death of David Ferrie, one of Garrison's leading suspects, in February 1967, because it offered an opportunity for Garrison to drop the investigation. According to Bethell, Garrison's staff felt the investigation had led to nothing more than "a stream of courtroom embarrassments for his lawyers to clean up." Of Garrison, Bethell writes, "His most striking characteristic as D.A. was a truly astounding recklessness and irresponsibility." See also BOXLEY, BILL.

Book of Facts: Bethesda Naval Hospital

The autopsy on President Kennedy's body was performed at Bethesda Naval Hospital, one of the two large military hospitals in the suburbs of Washington, D.C. (The other is Walter Reed Army Medical Center.) According to Texas law, the president's body should not have been removed from the state - where the homicide had occurred - before an autopsy had been performed. Over strenuous objections from the Dallas medical examiner, Dr. Earl Rose, the body was removed from Texas and flown to Washington, D.C. Before Air Force One, bearing the president's coffin, landed at Andrews Air Force Base, there was some confusion about where the body should be taken for an autopsy. It was finally decided to use Bethesda because Kennedy had been a naval officer and it had been his official hospital during his presidency.

See also AMBULANCE CONTROVERSY; AUTOPSY CONTROVERSY.

Best Evidence

Book of Facts: "Betrayal"

Written by former CIA employee Robert D. Morrow and published in 1976 by Henry Regnery Company, Betrayal traces a tangled sequence of events beginning with the Bay of Pigs and culminating in the assassination of President Kennedy. Morrow implicates rogue elements in the Agency in the commission and subsequent cover-up of the crime. This book provides an intriguing insight into the workings of the CIA. Among its shocking disclosures is Morrow's admission that, prior to the assassination, he purchased for the Agency three Mannlicher-Carcano rifles identical to the one allegedly found in the Texas School Book Depository Building on November 22, 1963. See also CENTRAL INTELLIGENCE AGENCY.

Book of Facts: Betzner, Hugh Jr.

Hugh Betzner, Jr., witnessed the assassination almost immediately after snapping three photographs of the scene near the intersection of Houston and Elm streets. He ran through Dealey Plaza in an effort to keep pace with the president's limousine while he took several more pictures. Betzner allegedly told a sheriff's deputy that he believed at least some of the shots were fired from the area of the picket fence on the Grassy Knoll. He surrendered his camera and film to Deputy Eugene L. Boone, who had the film developed and returned both the camera and the negatives to Betzner.

See also "Black Dog Man"; DEALEY PLAZA WITNESSES.

Crossfire; Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Bickers, Benny H.

Bickers owned a nightclub a block from Jack Ruby's Carousel Club in Dallas. He confided to FBI investigators that Ruby was very close to the Dallas Police Department. Bickers complained that Ruby's police contacts allowed him to regularly flout laws regulating the activities and the drinking hours of such clubs.

Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Billings, Richard

A staffer for the House Select Committee on Assassinations, Billings prepared the Committee's report. Along with Committee general counsel G. Robert Blakey, he wrote an article for Parade magazine discussing how the Committee concluded that organized crime was responsible for the president's murder. The two men also co-authored The Plot to Kill the President, published by Times Books in 1981 and reissued as Fatal Hour: The Assassination of President Kennedy by Organized Crime by Berkley Books in 1992. The book also accuses organized crime of masterminding the assassination. Some researchers challenge the book, whose manuscript was approved by the Central Intelligence Agency, as a cover-up of the CIA's involvement in killing Kennedy.
Crossfire: High Treason

Book of Facts: Bird, Samuel

Army Lieutenant Bird was in charge of the Military District of Washington, D.C., Casket Team that stood honor guard when Secret Service agents removed the president's coffin from Air Force One and placed it inside a Navy ambulance. Bird and his team were then flown to Bethesda Naval Hospital by helicopter to meet the ambulance. Bird later suffered an injury in Vietnam that severely hampered his memory, but on December 10, 1963, he had written in his official report that the coffin was taken from the ambulance to the autopsy room at 8:00 P.M. This conflicts with the O'Neill and Sibert report that the coffin was taken into the autopsy room at 7:17 P.M., and with autopsy chief Dr. James J. Humes' report that he received the body at 7:35 P.M. This discrepancy in the times has fueled speculation that the president's wounds could have been altered during the unaccounted-for half hour.

See also AMBULANCE CONTROVERSY; WEHLE, PHILIP C.
Best Evidence

Book of Facts: Bishop, Maurice_

"Maurice Bishop" is a cover name used by a CIA agent who was deeply involved in Central Intelligence Agency activities designed to overthrow the Fidel Castro government in Cuba. He was also the case officer for a Cuban operative named Antonio Veciana, who swears he saw "Bishop" meet with Lee Harvey Oswald in Dallas before the assassination. Veciana also swears that "Bishop" solicited him to pressure his cousin who worked in the Cuban Embassy in Mexico City into accepting a bribe to confirm that he saw Oswald in the embassy. Some observers believe "Bishop" was actually David Atlee Phillips, a CIA agent with a long and active history in Latin American affairs.

Conspiracy; High Treason

Book of Facts: Bissell, Richard

This former deputy director of planning for the Central Intelligence Agency has been linked with plots to assassinate Fidel Castro and with the Bay of Pigs invasion. Following the Bay of Pigs fiasco, Kennedy fired CIA director Allen W. Dulles, Bissell, and others for what he viewed as a lack of leadership. The plots against Castro's life are believed to have been behind Castro's reputed desire to see Kennedy dead.

See also EDWARDS, SHEFFIELD.

High Treason

Book of Facts: "Black Dog Man"

Several photographs taken during the assassination by Hugh Betzner, Jr., and Philip L. Willis show a dark figure that is barely discernible behind a low wall at the south end of the Grassy Knoll. Investigators originally referred to this figure as the "Black Dog Man" because many thought it resembled a dog sitting on the wall. Computer enhancement later disclosed that the figure could actually be a man standing a short distance behind the wall, possibly carrying a long object that some believe might be a gun. If it was a man, he has never been identified.

See also GRASSY KNOLL WITNESSES.

Crossfire

Book of Facts: Blahut, Regis

Blahut was the CIA's liaison with the House Select Committee on Assassinations. He was fired for breaking into the safe holding the Committee's copies of autopsy photographs. For some undisclosed reason the break-in, which occurred in 1978, was not made public until the following year.

High Treason

Book of Facts: Blakey, Robert

A law professor and the director of the Notre Dame Institute on Organized Crime, Blakey was appointed general counsel to the House Select Committee on Assassinations in June 1977. Blakey has come under attack on a number of fronts from virtually every critic of the Warren Report. His appointment came after the Committee investigation, which was being conducted openly, was already under way. (He replaced Richard Sprague.) Blakey's first move was to discontinue the press conferences that until then had been keeping the American public abreast of the Committee's findings. Blakey has been charged with blocking the development of new evidence, firing staffers and investigators who demonstrated too much vigor in their work, and having close ties to the intelligence community, especially the Central Intelligence Agency. Many researchers blame Blakey for underwriting the Committee's failure to investigate the assassination thoroughly.

With Richard N. Billings as his co-author, Blakey wrote a book based on the Committee's findings. Originally titled The Plot to Kill the President (Times Books, 1981) and reissued as Fatal Hour: The Assassination of President Kennedy by Organized Crime (Berkley Books, 1992), the book assesses the blame on organized crime. Some researchers see Fatal Hour as an attempt to divert attention from CIA involvement. Blakey admitted that the Agency reviewed the manuscript before it was published.

Best Evidence; Crossfire; High Treason; Plausible Denial

Book of Facts: Bledsoe, Mary

During October 1963, Mrs. Bledsoe allegedly rented a furnished room in her Dallas house to Lee Harvey Oswald. She took an immediate dislike to him and asked him to leave within the week. On November 22, 1963, Mrs. Bledsoe was at the scene, watching the presidential motorcade. After the assassination, she boarded the same bus, driven by Cecil J. McWatters, that Oswald supposedly took after shooting Police Officer J. D. Tippit. She told the Warren Commission that Oswald came on the bus looking "like a maniac." Her description of the wild-looking man on the bus does not agree with the description given by McWatters.

See also JONES, MILTON R.

Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Body Bag Controversy

According to statements by nurses and others in the emergency room at Dallas's Parkland Memorial Hospital, the president's body was wrapped in sheets when it was placed inside the coffin (which was lined with plastic) in preparation for the trip from Dallas to Washington. The men who removed the body from the coffin in the autopsy room at Bethesda Naval Hospital described the body as wrapped inside a zippered, rubberized body bag similar to the military body bags widely used to send home the remains of soldiers and sailors killed in battle. This discrepancy has led many to believe that the president's wounds were altered between the time the body left Parkland and the autopsy was performed at Bethesda.

See also AMBULANCE CONTROVERSY; COFFIN CONTROVERSY; JENKINS, JAMES CURTIS; O'CONNOR, PAUL K.; RIKE, AUBREY.

Best Evidence; High Treason

Book of Facts: Bogard, Albert

Bogard was a car salesman for Dallas's Downtown Lincoln-Mercury when a man calling himself Lee Oswald asked about a Mercury Comet. That was November 9, 1963. Bogard said he selected a red Comet and joined the prospective customer for a test drive. Oswald drove unusually fast and recklessly, according to Bogard, and finally told the salesman he was coming into some money in two or three weeks and would return then. When Bogard repeated this story to the Warren Commission, he passed an FBI polygraph test verifying that he was telling the truth. His story was also corroborated by other salesmen at the dealership who saw Oswald and spoke with him that day. The Warren Commission discounted his testimony because Oswald was said to be elsewhere that day. If Bogard was correct, and the man who took the test drive was actually Oswald, then from what source did he expect a large sum of money soon after the assassination? If the man wasn't Oswald, who impersonated him, and why? These questions remain unanswered.

On February 14, 1966, in a cemetery in Hallsville, Louisiana, Albert Bogard, age forty-one, was found inside his car with a hose running from the exhaust pipe into the interior. His death, although ruled a suicide, leaves still another question open to speculation. According to one of his fellow salesmen, shortly after testifying before the Commission, Bogard was severely beaten and hospitalized, and then quietly disappeared from Dallas.

High Treason; Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Boggs, Hale

A highly respected long-term congressman from Louisiana, Boggs was selected by President Lyndon B. Johnson to sit on the Warren Commission. Boggs openly faulted the FBI for using "Gestapo tactics" and seriously questioned the Warren Commission findings concerning the assassination. In 1972, the congressman's small plane disappeared while he was flying across Alaska. His body was never recovered.

Crossfire; High Treason

Book of Facts: Bolden, Abraham

Bolden, the first black Secret Service, was assigned to White House security until he criticized the lax security around the president and was transferred to the Chicago office. Bolden later disclosed that prior to November 1, 1963, he had come into possession of an FBI teletype hinting of a plot by four Cuban assassins to kill the president. His attempts at further investigation led to stonewalling by the FBI with denials that the teletype ever existed. Following the assassination, Bolden called Warren Commission counsel J. Lee Rankin and volunteered to testify before the Commission about his foreknowledge of a planned assassination. The Commission ignored his offer, and not long after, he was arrested and jailed for allegedly attempting to sell government files. Bolden claimed that the charges were trumped up.

High Treason; Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Bolt Beranek and Newman_

This high-tech acoustics firm located in Cambridge, Massachusetts, was employed by the House Select Committee on Assassinations to review the Dallas police dispatch tape. In its analysis of the tape, the firm concluded that more than three shots were fired in Dealey Plaza at the time Kennedy was shot.

See also ACOUSTICAL EVIDENCE; ASCHKENASY, ERNEST; BARGER, DR. JAMES; RAMSEY REPORT; WEISS, MARK.

Crossfire; High Treason

Book of Facts: Bookhout, James W.

FBI special agent Bookhout was present when Captain Will Fritz of the Dallas police interrogated Lee Harvey Oswald at Police Headquarters. Bookhout reported that when Oswald was shown a photograph of himself holding a rifle resembling the Mannlicher-Carcano found in the Texas School Book Depository Building, he said the head in the photo might be his, "but that it was entirely possible that the Police Department had superimposed this part of the photograph over the body of someone else." Bookhout added that Oswald denied any involvement in the assassination.

*See also OSWALD, BACKYARD PHOTOGRAPH OF.
Rush to Judgment*

Book of Facts: Boone, Eugene

Deputy Sheriff Boone and Deputy Constable Seymour Weitzman were two of the officers who found the rifle on the sixth floor of the Texas School Book Depository Building minutes after the assassination. Boone told the Warren Commission he "thought it was a 7.65 Mauser." Boone said Captain Will Fritz of the Dallas police also identified the weapon as a Mauser. Weitzman later signed an affidavit concurring with this conclusion, as did initial police reports to the press. When Boone was shown the Mannlicher-Carcano rifle allegedly belonging to Lee Harvey Oswald, he could not identify it as the weapon he found. The legend "Made in Italy, Cal. 6.5" is clearly stamped on the Mannlicher-Carcano.

See also BETZNER, HUGH, JR.; CRAIG, ROGER D.; MOONEY, LUKE; WADE, HENRY W.
Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Boring, Floyd

Assistant chief of the Secret Service White House detail, Boring helped search the presidential limousine after it was flown from Dallas to Washington. Two metal fragments believed to have come from the bullet that struck Governor John Connally were recovered during this search.

See also MAGIC BULLET; MILLS, THOMAS; PATERNI, PAUL.
Best Evidence

Book of Facts: Boswell, Dr. Thornton

Chief of pathology at Bethesda Naval Hospital, Boswell was one of two doctors present when the president's body was removed from the coffin after its arrival from Dallas. The other was Dr. James J. Humes. During the autopsy, Boswell made a sketch of the wound in Kennedy's skull, indicating the missing section as a large rectangular area rising from the lower right rear and extending up across the top. This representation differs greatly from the drawing made at Parkland Memorial Hospital at the time of the president's death, which shows the wound and missing section of skull to be considerably smaller and in the lower rear.

See also AUTOPSY CONTROVERSY; HEAD WOUND CONTROVERSY; LUNDBERG, DR. GEORGE.

Best Evidence

Book of Facts: Bouck, Robert

When the assassination occurred, Bouck was head of the Secret Service Protective Research Section, a position that involved him in a cloudy controversy about an item officially designated as a "missile" that presumably either fell or was removed from the president's body during the autopsy. In this case the "missile" is universally assumed to mean a bullet. Bouck signed a receipt for items given him by the president's physician, Admiral Dr. George Burkley, on November 26, 1963. The seventh item on this receipt was identified as "one receipt from FBI for a missile recovered during examination of the body." Evidently the missile has either been lost or never clearly identified. Bouck was also the person who ordered that the Harper bone fragment be sent to the White House after its discovery.

Best Evidence

Book of Facts, Bowen, John "Jack"

Bowen, a self-styled itinerant preacher, allegedly used the alias Albert Osborne. The Warren Commission was satisfied that Osborne and Lee Harvey Oswald shared a double bus seat during a trip to Mexico City, where Oswald allegedly visited either the Cuban embassy or the Soviet embassy. When Oswald was arrested, he reportedly had in his wallet a library card under the name John L. Bowen. The card has since vanished. Interestingly, "Osborne" was also one of the aliases used by Oswald.

Conspiracy; High Treason

Book of Facts: Bowers, Lee, Jr.

Lee Bowers, Jr., manned a railroad control tower fourteen feet above the ground and approximately fifty feet beyond the Grassy Knoll. He reported having seen three strange vehicles driving through the area around the tower minutes before the assassination, and having noted the presence of two men standing near the fence on the knoll. Although he was occupied at the time, Bowers remembered that something like "a flash of light or smoke or something" caught his attention. He had a sense of it coming from the spot where the two men stood. Friends of Bowers claim that right after the assassination he disappeared for several days and note that when he returned, one of his fingers had been amputated. They suspect that Bowers saw more than he admitted, but feared for his life. On August 9, 1966, Bowers was killed in a mysterious car crash on a lonely stretch of Texas highway.

See also GRASSY KNOLL WITNESSES; SMOKE FROM THE GRASSY KNOLL.

Crossfire; Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Bowles, Jim

Police Officer Bowles, who would later become Dallas county sheriff, commanded the radio division in November 1963 and prepared the Dallas police dispatch tape for review by the House Select Committee on Assassinations. He has reportedly said that the tape was borrowed by federal agents shortly after the assassination and later returned to him. Bowles is also quoted as stating that the police motorcycle with an open microphone that allegedly transmitted the sound of the four shots taped from the Dealey Plaza location was actually two miles away at the time.

Final Disclosure; High Treason

Book of Facts: Bowley, T. F.

Bowley stated that he was driving west on 10th Street in the Oak Cliff section of Dallas when he saw a Police Officer (J. D. Tippit) lying on the ground next to a police cruiser. Checking his watch, he noted the time as 1:10 P.M. When he realized the officer was gravely wounded, Bowley called the police on the car radio. The official Dallas police radio log indicates Bowley's transmission was received by 1:16 P.M. The time of the radio call has been advanced by some researchers as proof that Lee Harvey Oswald did not have time to travel the distance from his rooming house to the Tippit murder scene and kill Officer Tippit.

See also BENAVIDES, DOMINGO; TIPPIT MURDER SCENE WITNESSES.

Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Bowron, Diana

Bowron was a nurse on duty in the emergency room at Parkland Memorial Hospital when the president's body was brought in; she helped remove his clothes. She testified before the Warren Commission that although she clearly saw the large hole in the president's skull, "in the back of the head," she did not see the small bullet entry wound in the rear of the skull described by Dr. James J. Humes in the report of the autopsy performed at Bethesda Naval Hospital.

See also PARKLAND MEMORIAL HOSPITAL STAFF.

Best Evidence

Book of Facts: Boxley, Bill

Bill Boxley was the pseudonym of William Wood, an investigator who worked on the assassination investigation conducted by New Orleans District Attorney Jim Garrison. Boxley reportedly told Garrison he had once worked for the CIA. According to an article by Tom Bethell in the December 16, 1991, issue of The National Review, Garrison's staff forced Boxley out when they realized he was feeding Garrison misleading information that was creating chaos in the investigation.

Book of Facts: Braden, Jim

Braden was arrested in the Dal-Tex Building across from Dealey Plaza minutes after the assassination. He said he was in the building looking for a telephone so he could call his mother to tell her what had happened. Dallas police could find no reason to hold him, and Braden was released. Investigators later identified him as Eugene Hale Brading, a suspected Mafia courier.
Crossfire; High Treason

Book of Facts: Brain Controversy

There has been much speculation about the condition and even the alleged disappearance of the president's brain from the body that was delivered to the autopsy room at Bethesda Naval Hospital. According to Paul K. O'Connor, a surgical assistant at the autopsy whose function was to remove the deceased brain so it could be placed in a hardening substance for later dissection (a routine autopsy procedure), when he removed the president's body from the body bag, there was no brain. It had apparently already been removed. The brain remains unaccounted for, and, along with other vital autopsy-related information such as X rays and photographs, is missing from the National Archives.

*See also AUTOPSY CONTROVERSY; BODY BAG CONTROVERSY; HEAD WOUND CONTROVERSY.
Best Evidence; Crossfire; High Treason 2*

Book of Facts: Brehm, Charles

Brehm was one of the spectators lining the curb on the driver's side of the president's limousine when the assassination took place. He was sufficiently close that he can be seen in the Zapruder film cheering as the car is passing him. Brehm gave eyewitness interviews that same day to newspaper and television reporters, and was also briefly detained at the sheriff's office, where he reportedly gave police a deposition. He described seeing a portion of the president's skull fly backward and to the left when he was hit. According to a quote in a Dallas Times-Herald article, he "seemed to think the shots came from in front of or beside the president." Brehm was never questioned by the Warren Commission, and the Sheriff's Department report no longer exists.

See also HARGIS, BOBBY W.; MARTIN, B. J.
Best Evidence; Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Brennan, Howard L.

Brennan, a forty-five-year-old steamfitter, was working on a job near Dealey Plaza when he broke for lunch and found a place to eat while he waited for the president's motorcade to arrive. According to testimony, Brennan was approximately 107 feet from the front of the Texas School Book Depository Building across the street when he noticed a man standing at a sixth-floor window in the southeast corner of the building. The sound of shots drew his attention back to the window just as the man fired the final shot.

Brennan's detailed description of the sniper is credited by the Warren Commission with leading to Police Officer J. D. Tippit's attempt to arrest Lee Harvey Oswald. Although Brennan failed to pick Oswald out of a lineup at Police Headquarters, he later identified Oswald's corpse as the man he saw in the window. Brennan's testimony is full of discrepancies, including the fact that he said the man in the window was standing, which allowed him to estimate the man's height and weight. Photos taken seconds after the shooting show the window was raised less than halfway, suggesting that the shooter would have had to kneel.

See also EUINS, AMOS L.; MILlicAN, A. J.; SORRELS, FORREST V.; SPEAKER, SANDY; TERRY, L. R.
Assassination Tapes; Best Evidence; Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Brewer, E. D.

E. D. Brewer was a Dallas police motorcycle officer who initially started toward the Grassy Knoll when the shots were fired, but was stopped by an unidentified man who said he saw someone "pull the weapon back through the window from the southeast corner of that Depository building." Brewer was one of at least three officers whose first impression was that the shots came from the Grassy Knoll, but he was distracted from his objective when a nameless bystander intervened and directed his attention to the Depository.

See also HARGIS, BOBBY W.; HAYGOOD, CLYDE A.; TEXAS SCHOOL BOOK DEPOSITORY BUILDING.
Best Evidence

Book of Facts: Brewer, Johnny

On November 22, 1963, Johnny Brewer was at work managing a retail shoe store on Jefferson Boulevard in the Oak Cliff section of Dallas. He heard the news of the assassination on the radio and, shortly after, the announcement that a police officer had been shot not far from the store. Just as he heard police sirens approaching, a man ducked into the entranceway of his store and waited with his back to the street while the police car passed. He then stepped back out onto the sidewalk and walked away. Brewer, suspecting the man might be trying to avoid the police, followed him. Less than a hundred feet up the street, his quarry slipped into the Texas Theater movie house without purchasing a ticket. Brewer told this to the cashier, Julia Postal, who had been distracted because she was listening to news reports of the president's assassination on her radio. Postal called the police.

According to Brewer's testimony to the Warren Commission, when the police arrived, the house lights in the theater were turned up and Brewer singled out Lee Harvey Oswald as the man who had behaved so suspiciously. Brewer's story regarding how the police officers decided that Oswald was the man they wanted in connection with the shooting of Officer J. D. Tippit differs from the stories told by other witnesses. According to the testimony of the arresting officer, M. N. McDonald, Oswald was pointed out by an unidentified man sitting near the front of the theater. Conspiracy; Crossfire

Book of Facts: Bringuier, Carlos

A member of the anti-Castro Cuban exile community living in New Orleans, Bringuier recalls that Lee Harvey Oswald approached him on August 5, 1963, explained he was a former Marine, and volunteered to help train exiles in guerrilla warfare techniques. A few days later, on August 9, Bringuier learned through an associate that the same Oswald was distributing leaflets for the pro-Castro Fair Play for Cuba Committee (FPCC). Bringuier, with two other exiles, combed downtown New Orleans looking for Oswald. When they found him, they took his leaflets and scattered them in the air. Bringuier began shouting that he was a traitor, when police arrived and arrested the group for disturbing the peace.

The true significance of this incident has been debated for years. Some observers think Oswald was attempting to create a cover as a pro-Castro activist because he wanted to move to Cuba. Others believe Oswald and Bringuier staged the entire episode as part of a plan to discredit pro-Castro Americans, especially FPCC.

See also BANISTER, GUY; 544 CAMP STREET.
Conspiracy; Warren Report

Book of Facts: Brock, Mary

Mrs. Brock was the wife of a mechanic who worked at a service station near the scene of the murder of J. D. Tippit. She testified to the Warren Commission that she was visiting her husband at work on November 22, 1963, and that she saw a man she later identified as Lee Harvey Oswald shortly after Officer Tippit was shot. She saw the man walk briskly into a nearby parking lot located behind the service station, which was on the corner of Jefferson and Crawford streets. The jacket Oswald was believed to be wearing when Tippit was killed was allegedly recovered in the same parking lot.

Warren Report

Book of Facts: Bronson Film

Six minutes before the first shot was fired at the president, Charles Bronson filmed the scene in Dealey Plaza, panning in on the motorcade route with his 35mm home-movie camera. Officially dismissed by the FBI as containing no relevant information, the film lay neglected in a storage vault until 1978, when it was retrieved and reviewed by photographic expert Robert J. Groden. His analysis focused on simultaneous movements in two separate sixth-floor windows of the Texas School Book Depository Building, which he interpreted to mean that at least two, and possibly three, people could have been in that crucial area only minutes before the shooting.

See also DEALEY PLAZA WITNESSES; HUGHES, ROBERT; SELZER, ROBERT.

Conspiracy

Book of Facts: Browder, Eddie

A pilot long suspected of having close Mafia contacts, Browder, with Jack Ruby, reportedly smuggled guns to Fidel Castro's forces before the Cuban dictator deposed the Batista regime. Browder's contacts with mob figures have been traced through Norman "Roughhouse" Rothman to Santos Trafficante.

Conspiracy

Book of Facts: Brown, Charles

On November 23, 1963, Charles W. Brown drove a police cruiser to the Dallas Police Headquarters garage to collect the suspect Lee Harvey Oswald for transfer to the Dallas County jail. The car was not in place when Oswald was escorted to the garage, necessitating a brief delay and a longer walk than Oswald's guards had anticipated. It was during that interim that Jack Ruby shot Oswald. The reason the car was not in its designated place before the prisoner was brought to the garage has never been fully explained.

See also GRAVES, L. C.; LEAVELLE, JAMES R.; MONTGOMERY, L. D.
Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Brown, Joe

District court judge Brown presided over Jack Ruby's trial for the murder of Lee Harvey Oswald, reportedly hiring a public relations consultant to polish his image during its duration. Despite the protest of Ruby's lawyers, who introduced numerous news accounts of local hostility toward Ruby, and the support of nearly one hundred Dallas citizens, Brown ruled against a defense motion to move the trial out of Dallas. Brown also refused to exclude as potential jurors anyone who had seen Ruby shoot Oswald on television. The result of the trial - a conviction and a death sentence - was reversed on appeal.

Texas Connection

Book of Facts: Brown, Madeline

Madeline Brown admits to having had an affair with Lyndon B. Johnson for twenty years, beginning in 1948. In an interview on the television program "A Current Affair" broadcast on February 25, 1992, she revealed that after the assassination Johnson had told her that he knew about the assassination in advance. According to Ms. Brown, Johnson confided that the assassination had been the work of the CIA and Texas oil interests, two groups that wanted Kennedy dead for their own reasons.

Texas Connection

Book of Facts: Brown, Oran

Brown was a salesman working in the same Dallas Lincoln-Mercury dealership as Albert G. Bogard, who singled out Lee Harvey Oswald as a prospective new car customer he took for a test drive only two weeks before the assassination. Oswald is said to have told Bogard that he would have "some money coming in," so he would buy a car soon. Brown was questioned by the FBI about the incident, and he buttressed Bogard's testimony. When researcher/author Mark Lane interviewed Brown on April 4, 1966, Brown told him he was reluctant to talk because Bogard had been severely beaten after he testified before the Warren Commission and had then dropped from sight. During this conversation with Lane, Brown was unaware that Bogard's body had been found in Hallsville, Louisiana; his death was ruled a suicide, but the circumstances were strangely suspicious.

See also DOWNTOWN LINCOLN-MERCURY.

Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Bruno, Jerry

Bruno was Kennedy's advance man, responsible for ensuring that the president's Texas trip, essentially a political move to win Texas votes in the 1964 election, went smoothly. Bruno claims he fought a bitter battle with Texas politicians, including Governor John Connally, over the route of the motorcade. He describes this extensively in his book, The Advanceman, published by William Morrow in 1971.

Texas Connection

Book of Facts: Bullets Fired, Number of

The Warren Report stands or falls on the belief that only one person, Lee Harvey Oswald, took part in the assassination of President Kennedy. This lone assassin theory is based on the "fact," as established by the Commission, that there were three shots fired in Dealey Plaza at 12:30 P.M. on November 22, 1963, and that all three were fired from the sixth floor of the Texas School Book Depository Building. The Depository, however, was behind the president when he was shot, so any evidence of a bullet entering the front or side of the president's body would automatically disprove the Commission's findings.

Although a number of expert marksmen, which everyone acknowledges Oswald was not, could not duplicate the feat credited to Oswald of firing three shots in six seconds with the poor-quality rifle he allegedly used, the Commission stood by its opinion. Evidence indicating that more than three shots were fired would also automatically disprove the Commission's finding of a lone assassin because it is impossible that Oswald, or any other single person, could have fired four or more shots in the time available.

On examination of the reports of bullets found or seen at the time of the assassination as described in this book, we arrive at a total of nine. First, there are the bullets acknowledged by the Warren Commission: one that is said to have struck both Kennedy and Governor John Connally (the magic bullet), which is in the National Archives; one that hit the curb in front of James T. Tague, a bystander, and caused slight injury to his cheek; and another that hit the president in the head and disintegrated (bullets #1, #2, and #3). Added to these is a bullet that struck either the left or center lane of Elm Street, as seen by both Sheriff J. E. (Bill) Decker and railroad worker Royce G. Skelton (bullet #4). Another bullet (#5) was found by Police Officer J. W. Foster in the grassy area below the railroad overpass, where it was dug out of the ground by a man who was identified by Dallas Police Chief Jesse E. Curry as an FBI agent but who the FBI claims was not one of its men. The man remains unidentified despite a photograph that shows him digging in the ground while Foster and Sheriff's Deputy Eddy Walthers look on. Then there are the two mounds in the earth that Wayne and Edna Hartman saw near the center of Dealey Plaza, which a police officer told them were caused by two bullets, fired at the presidential limousine from the Grassy Knoll, that missed and came to earth at that spot. No one knows what happened to these bullets (#6 and #7). Next is the bullet Virgie Rachley saw hit the street directly behind the presidential limousine with such impact it caused sparks (bullet #8). Finally, we have the bullet that caused the windshield damage as seen and reported by Dallas Police Officers Starvis Ellis and H. R. Freeman (bullet #9).

Even if we allow that some of these reports may be duplicate sightings of the same bullet - for example, perhaps the bullet that pierced the limousine's windshield was the same bullet Sheriff Decker saw hit the pavement near the center of Elm Street - we are still left with five to seven bullets that are definitely accounted for, far more than Oswald or any other person acting alone could have fired in the few seconds in which the shooting took place.

The House Select Committee on Assassinations said it could account for the sounds of four gunshots. Although this was a step in the right direction, investigation of the bullet sightings recorded in this entry must be made before the number of shooters can be determined accurately.

Book of Facts: Bundy, Vernon

An admitted heroin addict, Bundy was a witness at the trial of Clay Shaw, whom New Orleans District Attorney Jim Garrison charged with participating in the assassination. Bundy claimed to have seen Shaw meet secretly with Lee Harvey Oswald in July 1963 and said Shaw gave Oswald what appeared to be a roll of money.

On the Trail of the Assassins

Book of Facts: Burkley, Dr. George

Admiral Dr. Burkley was the White House medical officer, and therefore the personal physician to President Kennedy. Burkley was riding in a car toward the rear of the motorcade as it made its way through downtown Dallas. Immediately following the shooting, his car was directed first to the Dallas Trade Mart, where the president had been scheduled to deliver a luncheon address, and from there to Parkland Memorial Hospital. Burkley was aboard Air Force One, where he sat with Jacqueline Kennedy and the coffin on the flight to Washington, and he was an observer at the autopsy. Although a uniquely qualified expert witness because he was the only medically trained person to see the president's body at both Parkland and Bethesda Naval Hospital, Burkley was never asked to testify before the Warren Commission.

See also AUTOPSY CONTROVERSY.

Best Evidence

Book of Facts: Bush, George

George Bush, the forty-first president of the United States, denies that he had any relationship with the CIA prior to his 1976 appointment as its director, though there have been charges that he was connected to the activities of Lee Harvey Oswald. In a November 29, 1963, memo, FBI director J. Edgar Hoover mentioned that an FBI agent and a member of the Defense Intelligence Agency briefed "Mr. George Bush of the Central Intelligence Agency" about the assassination. The Agency produced a George Bush, allegedly a former employee, who denied ever having been briefed about the assassination and claimed he had worked for the CIA for only six months in a low-level position examining photographs unrelated to President Kennedy's murder. Discovered after the death of George DeMohrenschildt, the man many believe was Lee Harvey Oswald's CIA control officer, was the following entry in DeMohrenschildt's personal telephone book: "Bush, George H. W. (Poppy) 1412 W. Ohio, also Zapata Petroleum Midland."

Plausible Denial

Book of Facts: Butler, George

A Dallas police lieutenant, Butler was reportedly assigned responsibility for Lee Harvey Oswald's safe transfer from Dallas Police Headquarters downtown to the Dallas County jail. Several witnesses remembered that Butler had appeared to be apprehensive and "jittery" in the moments before Oswald was killed.

High Treason

Book of Facts: Cabana Motel

About midnight, the night before the Kennedy murder, Jack Ruby visited Lawrence Meyers, a guest at the Cabana Motel. Meyers was accompanied by a female companion named Jean West, who is believed to have had ties with Oswald associate David Ferrie, a New Orleans figure investigated by District Attorney Jim Garrison. Staying at the Cabana Motel at the same time was alleged Mafia courier Eugene Hale Brading, who was registered under the alias Jim Braden. The following day, Braden was detained briefly by police near Dealey Plaza shortly after the assassination, but was released.

Crossfire; High Treason

Book of Facts: Cabell, Charles

Brother of Dallas mayor Earle Cabell, U.S. Army General Charles Cabell had been deputy director of the Central Intelligence Agency during the Bay of Pigs exercise. He was among a group of high-level CIA personnel fired by Kennedy after the Cuban invasion fiasco. Charles Cabell has been implicated in CIA schemes to recruit Mafia hitmen to kill Fidel Castro during the 1960s. Some researchers believe Charles Cabell may have had a motive to participate in plans to assassinate Kennedy. There is no hard evidence to prove this.

High Treason

Book of Facts: Cabell, Earle

Mayor of Dallas at the time of the assassination, Earle Cabell rode with his wife six cars behind Kennedy's presidential motorcade. Although there is no evidence that he had anything to do with the assassination, the fact that Cabell's brother, General Charles Cabell, was fired by Kennedy for the poor planning of the Bay of Pigs invasion, and that the assassination took place in Cabell's city has been listed as a "sinister connection" by researchers Robert J. Groden and Harrison Edward Livingstone.
High Treason

Book of Facts: Cabell, Mrs. Earle

The wife of the Dallas mayor was riding in the presidential motorcade six cars back from Kennedy's limousine when the shots were fired. Mrs. Cabell was among several witnesses, including Texas Senator Ralph Yarborough, who told the Warren Commission they could smell the distinct odor of gunpowder in Dealey Plaza. It appears unlikely that people located at street level would smell gunpowder if all the shots were fired from six floors above them, where the odor would be quickly carried away by a breeze that was blowing that day, although it would not be inconsistent with at least one shot being fired from the Grassy Knoll.
Crossfire

Book of Facts: Callaway, Ted

Callaway, the manager of a used-car lot on the corner of Patton Avenue and Jefferson Boulevard in Dallas, heard the sound of the gunshots that killed Police Officer J. D. Tippit. He and another employee, Sam Guinyard, ran toward the sounds, encountering a man who was leaving the scene holding a handgun. Callaway shouted, "Hey, man, what the hell is going on?" The man slowed down briefly, muttered a response, and rounded a corner heading west on Jefferson.

Arriving on the scene and finding Tippit dead, Callaway used the patrol car's radio to call for help and was told police were on the way. He then picked up the officer's gun, and he and a cabdriver, William Scoggins, cruised the neighborhood in an unsuccessful attempt to locate the murderer. Callaway later picked Lee Harvey Oswald out of a police lineup whose fairness has since been questioned for including men who bore not even the slightest resemblance to Oswald. Callaway was one of several witnesses who reported they did not see Helen Louise Markham at the Tippit murder scene.

See also TIPPIT MURDER SCENE WITNESSES.

Warren Report

Book of Facts: Campbell, Ochus

Vice president of the Texas School Book Depository, Campbell was standing in front of the building when President Kennedy was killed. He testified to the Warren Commission that he heard shots "fired from a point which I thought was near the railroad tracks located over the viaduct on Elm Street," indicating the area near the Grassy Knoll. He claimed he had no reason to notice anything unusual about the Depository Building because the shots were coming from somewhere else.

See also TEXAS SCHOOL BOOK DEPOSITORY BUILDING EMPLOYEES.

Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Campisi, Joseph

Owner of the Egyptian Restaurant in Dallas in 1963, Campisi is alleged to have had ties with Mafia boss Santos Trafficante and Joseph Civello, reputed chief of Mafia don Carlos Marcello's operations in Dallas. The night before the assassination, Jack Ruby had dinner at the Egyptian Restaurant. Although he disclaimed intimacy with Ruby, Campisi visited him in jail after Ruby's arrest for killing Lee Harvey Oswald.
Conspiracy

Book of Facts: Camp Smith

Despite Defense Department denials, Hawaii's Camp Smith - a U.S. Marine Corps base - was the site of a secret investigation of President Kennedy's assassination conducted by two Marine Corps teams, according to the testimony of former Marine navigator Larry Huff before the House Select Committee on Assassinations. Huff disclosed that on December 14, 1963, he was the navigator of a C-54 aircraft that flew ten to twelve military investigators on the way to Japan to Wake Island, where they changed planes for the second leg of the trip. During the flight Huff was told the Japan trip was part of an investigation of Lee Harvey Oswald's involvement in the assassination. Huff said that on the return flight, he read a confidential report prepared by the Marine Corps containing a psychological evaluation of Oswald, which concluded that he was psychologically incapable of carrying out the assassination alone. This alleged report has disappeared.

High Treason

Book of Facts: Canada, Captain Robert

Commanding officer of Bethesda Naval Hospital in 1963, Captain Canada was present during the autopsy of President Kennedy. He played only a peripheral role in the postmortem exam and recalled nothing unusual about the body or the wounds.

See also AUTOPSY CONTROVERSY.

Best Evidence

Book of Facts: Cancler, John

Cancler, a convicted burglar and pimp, appeared on television in June 1967 in an NBC "White Paper" program called "The Case of Jim Garrison." On the show Cancler charged that the New Orleans district attorney's office had attempted to get him to put false evidence in the home of Clay Shaw. When called before a grand jury and asked to repeat his claim, Cancler reportedly refused, pleading the Fifth Amendment protection against self-incrimination. When asked to reiterate before a criminal court judge what he had said on television, Cancler once again refused and was found guilty of contempt of court.

On the Trail of the Assassins

Book of Facts: Canfield, Michael L.

___ Canfield is an assassination researcher and co-author of Coup d'Etat in America.

Book of Facts: Carlin, Karen

Carlin was a stripper working at Jack Ruby's nightclub during November 1963 under the name "Little Lynn." She allegedly borrowed five dollars from Ruby for carfare home to Fort Worth the night before he shot Lee Harvey Oswald. The following morning, she called Ruby and asked for an additional $25.00, which he agreed to wire her. At 11:17 on Sunday morning, Ruby sent the money from the Western Union office in downtown Dallas, then walked to Police Headquarters nearby, making his way to the basement garage, where he shot Oswald four minutes later.

This incident would appear to support Ruby's original contention that the shooting was not planned, but was an impulsive and therefore not a conspiratorial act. Many researchers, however, believe it may have been staged, suggesting conspiracy.

See also WARNER, ROGER C.

Contract on America; Ruby Cover-up

Book of Facts: Carousel Club

This nightclub near downtown Dallas was owned by Jack Ruby and featured striptease acts. Ruby also had an interest in a similar operation called the Vegas Club, also in Dallas.

Book of Facts: Carr, Richard R.

Richard Carr was working on the construction of the new county courthouse overlooking Dealey Plaza the day of the assassination. He reports seeing a heavysset man wearing a tan jacket, hat, and horn-rimmed glasses at a window on the sixth floor of the Texas School Book Depository Building just before the shots were fired. After the shooting, Carr says he saw two men running either from behind the building or from inside it. The two jumped into a Rambler station wagon and sped north on Houston Street. A few minutes later, the heavysset man who had been on the sixth floor hurried away from the building.

Researcher J. Gary Shaw contends that FBI agents warned Carr against testifying before the Warren Commission and that, allegedly harassed by Dallas Police officers, Carr then moved to Montana. Trouble followed him when one day he discovered dynamite wired to his car's ignition. Another attempt on his life was foiled with the help of a neighbor who was a local police officer. After testifying at the Clay Shaw trial, Carr was attacked by knife-wielding assassins, but despite receiving several wounds he managed to shoot one of them to death.

See also DEALEY PLAZA WITNESSES.

Crossfire; High Treason; Mortal Error

Book of Facts: Carr, Waggoner

Attorney general for the state of Texas, Waggoner Carr reportedly called J. Lee Rankin, general counsel for the Warren Commission, on January 22, 1964, telling him he had learned that Lee Harvey Oswald had been an "undercover agent" employed by the Federal Bureau of Investigation. Rankin called an emergency session of the full Commission at 5:30 that evening, a session that Commission member Congressman Gerald Ford said was the most "tense and hushed" meeting he could recall attending. As a result, Carr and other Texas officials who claimed they had also learned that since September 1962 Oswald had been FBI undercover agent #179 were summoned to Washington to give their testimony in a top-secret session on January 24. On the basis of denials by J. Edgar Hoover and other FBI officials, the Warren Commission concluded that Oswald had not been in the FBI's employ.

*See also JAWORSKI, LEON; PENA, OREST.
Rush to Judgment; Texas Connection*

Book of Facts: Carrico, Dr. Charles

Dr. Carrico was the first doctor to examine the fatally wounded president at Parkland Memorial Hospital. On the afternoon of November 22, 1963, he wrote and signed a report describing the wound in the president's throat as an entrance wound. He described it as both "small" and "round." This is not the description a doctor would use to identify a bullet exit wound, although the Warren Report concludes this was the exit point of the magic bullet that injured both Kennedy and Governor John Connally. Carrico also reported that the wound in the rear of the president's head was nearly circular and measured 2 to 2 3/4 inches across.

See also HEAD WOUND CONTROVERSY; THROAT WOUND CONTROVERSY; TRACHEOTOMY.
Best Evidence; Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Carter, Arthur E.

Arthur Carter was an FBI agent who took testimony from Texas School Book Depository Building employee Bonnie Ray Williams. The testimony has come under fire because the FBI report of this interview appears to have misquoted Williams concerning the time he was on the sixth floor of the building. The time is crucial because it puts Williams on the same floor as the alleged assassin just minutes before the shooting, yet Williams claims there was no one else on the floor with him.

Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Carter, William

On December 4, 1963, Secret Service special agent Carter received testimony from Harold D. Norman, a Texas School Book Depository Building employee who was on the fifth floor of the building when the assassination took place. Carter's report quotes Norman as saying the shots came from directly above him and that he saw "dust falling from the ceiling" below the window where Oswald allegedly stood when he fired at the president. When questioned about this by the Warren Commission, Norman denied making either of these statements.

See also JARMAN, JAMES; WILLIAMS, BONNIE RAY.

Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Carto, Willis

Carto was the president of Liberty Lobby, which published Spotlight magazine.

Book of Facts: "The Case of Jim Garrison"

This NBC "White Paper" television program attacked the New Orleans district attorney's investigation of the Kennedy assassination. This one-sided look at Jim Garrison's investigation caused Garrison to believe that the show was an attempt to smear him. See also CANCLER, JOHN; LEEMANS, FRED; RUSSO, PERRY; SHERIDAN, WALTER; TORRES, MIGUEL.
On the Trail of the Assassins

Book of Facts: Casket Team

The Joint Casket Bearer Team of the Military District of Washington, D.C., is responsible for handling the caskets for funerals held at Arlington National Cemetery. The Casket Team members responsible for President Kennedy's coffin were Army Lieutenant Samuel R. Bird, Coast Guard Yeoman George A. Barnum, Navy Seaman Hubert Clark, Marine Corporal Timothy Cheek, Army Specialist Douglas Mayfield, Army Sergeant James L. Felder, and Air Force Sergeant Richard E. Gaudreau. Several members of the team remembered a "decoy" ambulance at the front entrance of Bethesda Naval Hospital when they arrived there on the evening of November 22, 1963. See also AMBULANCE CONTROVERSY; COFFIN CONTROVERSY.
Best Evidence

Book of Facts: Castellanos, Nestor

A Cuban exile, Castellanos was alleged to have vehemently attacked the president when he addressed a right-wing group in a Dallas suburb during October 1963. Castellanos supposedly voiced the threat "We are waiting for Kennedy the 22nd. . . . We're going to give him the works when he gets in Dallas." In light of these ominous predictions, it is largely contradictory that no demonstrations by Cuban exiles occurred when Kennedy visited Dallas.

See also ANTI-CASTRO CUBANS.

Conspiracy

Book of Facts: Castro, Fidel

The Cuban dictator has long been suspected of ordering Kennedy's death, with the obvious motive being retaliation for the numerous CIA plots against his life. Proponents who support the premise are convinced Castro sought revenge against the American president, whom he believed was personally responsible for the threats on his life. No hard evidence has ever been produced linking Castro with the assassination.

Book of Facts: The Cellar

Owned by Pat Kirkwood, an acquaintance of Jack Ruby's, The Cellar was an all-night club where nine Secret Service agents, four of whom had motorcade responsibilities the following day, allegedly partied until the early hours of the night of November 2122, while the president slept. Secret Service agents with the White House detail or those traveling with the president are forbidden to drink any alcoholic beverages while "in travel status." This rule also applies to field agents who are augmenting the White House detail, such as those in Dallas during the president's visit. Yet according to a statement attributed to the club's manager, Jimmy Hill, "those guys [the Secret Service agents] were bombed. They were drinking pure Everclear [alcohol]." Reporter Jim Marrs accused the agents responsible for guarding the sleeping president at the Hotel Texas of leaving several Fort Worth firemen to man their posts while they went to The Cellar. Secret Service chief James J. Rowley denied that late-night drinking affected the performance of his men; however, several officials in the motorcade offered different opinions. One of these, Senator Ralph Yarborough, told Marrs, "All of the Secret Service men seemed to me to respond very slowly, with no more than a puzzled look" when the shots rang out in Dealey Plaza.
Crossfire

Book of Facts: Central Intelligence Agency (CIA)

Many informed observers believe the CIA played a critical role in the president's death. The CIA has a long history of involvement in odious activities, ranging from plans to kill foreign rulers, alleged drug dealing in Southeast Asia, and even abetting the infamous Watergate burglars whose arrest ultimately brought about the downfall of President Richard Nixon. It is interesting to note that in the only two court trials in which the assassination of President Kennedy figured, the prosecution of Clay Shaw by Jim Garrison and the libel suit brought by the CIA's E. Howard Hunt against the publication Spotlight, people on both juries arrived at the same conclusion: that the CIA was behind the assassination. Two books that deal primarily with this subject are Plausible Denial, by Mark Lane, and Coup d'Etat in America, by Michael Canfield and Alan J. Weberman. See also OFFICE OF STRATEGIC SERVICES; OPERATION 40; PERMINDEX.

Book of Facts: Chaney, James

Dallas police motorcycle officer Chaney had the president clearly in view when the shots were fired. Shortly afterward, he told local television reporters that Kennedy had been "struck in the face," supporting similar reports that at least one shot came from in front of the president.

See also DEALEY PLAZA WITNESSES.

Crossfire: High Treason

Book of Facts: "Charles, Pedro"

A letter mailed to Lee Harvey Oswald from Havana, Cuba, on November 28, 1963, four days after the entire world knew Oswald was dead, and signed "Pedro Charles," was intercepted by the Secret Service and turned over to the FBI labs. The letter alluded to the "fact" that Oswald had been hired to shoot someone. Soon after, a letter was sent to Robert F. Kennedy identifying "Charles" as a Castro agent. FBI examination found that both letters were typed on the same typewriter. Although the Warren Commission recognized that the "Pedro Charles" letters were a hoax, evidently no further effort was made to discover who was behind it or what the motivation was.

Conspiracy

Book of Facts: Chase, Dr. Norman

Dr. Chase was among a group of medical experts whom the House Select Committee on Assassinations asked to examine the medical evidence produced by the president's autopsy. After reviewing the X rays of the head, Chase said the wound was much too massive to be caused by a direct-on hit by a single-jacketed bullet such as those allegedly used by Lee Harvey Oswald to kill Kennedy. Such a wound would be caused by a bullet tumbling inside the skull, or if it hit at an angle, and would leave a large number of fragments; yet according to Dr. James J. Humes, who performed the autopsy, all that was found were "tiny dustlike particle fragments" more consistent with a bullet driving straight through the skull and bone.

See also HEAD WOUND CONTROVERSY.

High Treason

Book of Facts: Cheek, Timothy

A member of the Casket Team that moved the president's coffin, Marine Lance Corporal Cheek spoke to researcher David S. Lifton, who says Cheek substantiated the confusion surrounding the use of two Navy ambulances and the difficulty the team encountered locating Kennedy's coffin on arrival at Bethesda Naval Hospital.

See also AMBULANCE CONTROVERSY; BIRD, SAMUEL R.
Best Evidence

Book of Facts: Chesher, Bill_

Little is known about Chesher other than that he allegedly had information linking Lee Harvey Oswald with his murderer, Jack Ruby. Chesher never shared that information with anyone, and he died of a heart attack in March 1964.

High Treason

Book of Facts: Chetta, Dr. Nichola

Chetta was the New Orleans coroner who performed autopsies on several individuals - including David Ferrie - who died mysteriously, preventing them from testifying in the court case District Attorney Jim Garrison brought against Clay Shaw for his alleged part in the assassination. Assassination researchers term the deaths of these and some other individuals as "strange" or "related." Dr. Chetta, who was a friend and supporter of Garrison's, himself died of a heart attack on May 25, 1968. His sometime assistant, Dr. Henry Delaune, was killed on January 26, 1969.

High Treason

Book of Facts: Chism, Mr. and Mrs. John

The Chisms and their three-year-old son were standing along the curb with their backs to the Grassy Knoll near the now-famous Stemmons Freeway sign that partially blocked the view of the assassination in the Zapruder film. John Chism and his wife both said the first shots were fired just as the president's car was abreast of them. They both looked behind them to see exactly where the shots were coming from, believing the shooter was somewhere on the knoll. Mrs. Chism said, "It [the second shot] came from what I thought was behind us."

See also DEALEY PLAZA WITNESSES; GRASSY KNOLL WITNESSES.

Best Evidence

Book of Facts: Civello, Joseph

Civello ran the Dallas operations of New Orleans Mafia head Carlos Marcello. He was also a close friend and sometime business associate of Jack Ruby's, whose extensive ties to the underworld also ran through restaurant owner Joseph Campisi. Author John H. Davis charges that the FBI, under J. Edgar Hoover, attempted to cover up Ruby's relationships with Civello, who was considered the number-one Mafia man in Dallas, and with Campisi, who was number two.

Conspiracy; Mafia Kingfish

Book of Facts: Clark, Hubert

A member of the Military District of Washington, D.C., Casket Team, Navy Seaman Apprentice Clark was questioned by assassination researcher David S. Lifton on December 19, 1967. According to Lifton, Clark's version of the events that occurred when the motorcade with the ambulance allegedly carrying Kennedy's body arrived at Bethesda Naval Hospital supports the statements of other members of the team. Like the others, Clark recalled that there was confusion regarding the whereabouts of the ambulance carrying Kennedy's coffin when the team arrived at the hospital.

*See also AMBULANCE CONTROVERSY; BIRD, SAMUEL R.
Best Evidence*

Book of Facts: Clark, Dr. Kemp

Chairman of the Neurosurgery Division of Parkland Memorial Hospital, Dr. Clark was the first one to closely examine the president's head wound. He also pronounced the president dead and signed the death certificate. Among the statements that Dr. Clark made in the hours following the assassination and that contradicted the autopsy results released later was that the president was shot in the throat - meaning he was shot from the front. At a press conference shortly after the president's body was removed from Parkland for the trip to Washington, Clark located the head wound at the "back of his head . . . toward the right side" - also conflicting with the autopsy report, which placed the wound farther toward the top and front, not just in the back.

See also EBERSOLE, DR. JOHN; HEAD WOUND CONTROVERSY; PARKLAND PRESS CONFERENCE; PERRY, DR. MALCOLM; TRACHEOTOMY.

Best Evidence; Conspiracy of Silence

Book of Facts: Clark Panel

In 1968, U.S. Attorney General Ramsey Clark convened a panel of four doctors to review the autopsy photographs and X rays produced at Bethesda Naval Hospital. Published accounts of their report said it confirmed the finding of the Warren Commission that the president had been hit by two shots fired from behind and above him. However, on closer examination, several researchers found that the Clark Panel's report differed from the autopsy report in its description of the location of two wounds. The doctors on the panel were William H. Carnes, Russell Fischer, Russell H. Morgan, and Alan R. Moritz.
See also HEAD WOUND CONTROVERSY.
Best Evidence; High Treason

Book of Facts: Clemons, Acquilla

A witness to the killing of Police Officer J. D. Tippit, Clemons reportedly said she saw two men take part in the shooting, neither of whom resembled Lee Harvey Oswald. Never questioned by federal agents, Mrs. Clemons claimed she was later visited at her home by a man with a gun who she thought was a police officer. The man warned her that if she testified about the shooting, she might be killed.

See also TIPPIT MURDER SCENE WITNESSES.

Crossfire; Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Coffin Controversy

Two basic controversies surround the coffin that allegedly contained the president's body on the trip from Parkland Memorial Hospital to Bethesda Naval Hospital. The first is the description of the coffin. According to the account given by William Manchester, the coffin provided by the Dallas funeral home owned by Vernon Oneal weighed four hundred pounds and was a top-of-the-line bronze unit that sealed hermetically, a "Britannia" model manufactured by the Elgin Casket Company. Several witnesses at Bethesda, including hospital corpsman Dennis David and lab technologist Paul K. O'Connor, described the coffin containing the president's body as a low-priced gray metal unit similar to a shipping coffin. A second subject of controversy involves the time the coffin arrived at Bethesda (see ambulance controversy). The differing descriptions of the coffin in which Kennedy's body arrived at Bethesda have led some to surmise that the president's body was removed from the expensive coffin sometime after that coffin was put aboard Air Force One in Dallas.

See also BODY BAG CONTROVERSY.

Best Evidence; Death of a President; High Treason

Book of Facts: Committee on Ballistic Acoustics

Organized by the National Science Foundation, under the direction of Dr. Norman Ramsey, this group examined the acoustical evidence produced by the Dallas police dispatch tape. The committee concluded that its analysis did not demonstrate that any shots were fired from the Grassy Knoll. Most assassination researchers have criticized the report.

See also ACOUSTICAL EVIDENCE.

High Treason

Book of Facts: Connally, John

Connally, the governor of Texas (and, in 1963, still a Democrat), was seated in the jump seat directly in front of President Kennedy when the shots were fired. One bullet passed through the governor's body, smashing through his wrist and embedding itself in his thigh. According to the Warren Commission, this was the same bullet that entered Kennedy's back and exited his throat, the so-called magic bullet on which the single bullet theory is based. Connally has steadfastly refused to accept this theory and continues to insist that he heard a shot before he was hit, which would not be possible if the shot that struck Kennedy also hit him, since a bullet travels faster than the sound of the gun firing it. Nellie Connally, who was seated next to her husband, testified that she saw the president react physically to a shot before her husband was hit.

Best Evidence

Book of Facts: "Conspiracy"

This book by Anthony Summers, an investigative reporter for the BBC, was published by McGraw-Hill in 1980 (an expanded, updated edition was issued by Paragon House in 1989). It focuses on the theory that Lee Harvey Oswald was a tool of U.S. intelligence agents who are responsible for the assassination.

Book of Facts: Conspiracy Theories

Within hours of the assassination, many individuals began developing theories about the possible existence of conspiracies against the president's life, resulting in dozens of books about the subject. The most popular theories revolve around these groups and individuals: anti-Castro Cubans, who blamed Kennedy for the Bay of Pigs fiasco; Fidel Castro, who held the Kennedy brothers responsible for a series of attempts on his life; the Central Intelligence Agency, because the president fired several of its top men and vowed to clean house in the Agency; members of the military-industrial complex, who believed Kennedy was about to end U.S. involvement in the Vietnam War; right-wing extremists, who opposed Kennedy's policy of "appeasement" toward the Soviet Union; members of the Mafia, because the president's brother, Attorney General Robert F. Kennedy, had turned the powers of the federal government against the underworld; and backers of Vice President Lyndon B. Johnson, unhappy with the news that Kennedy intended to drop him from the ticket before the 1964 election.

These theories, and perhaps as many as half a dozen others, all have adherents who are able to muster from the misinformation and inconsistencies enough circumstantial evidence and supposition to give them the ring of credibility.

Book of Facts: "Contract on America"

Published in 1988 by Zebra Books and written by David E. Scheim, Contract on America: The Mafia Murder of President John F. Kennedy focuses on underworld characters who had both motive and means to kill the president.

Book of Facts: Cooper, John Sherman

A three-time Republican senator from Kentucky, Cooper was selected by President Lyndon B. Johnson to serve as a member of the Warren Commission. Cooper is said to have objected to the single bullet theory from the very outset. He also is credited, along with Commission member Senator Richard B. Russell, with influencing the Commission staff to investigate the CIA link with Lee Harvey Oswald more thoroughly.
Conspiracy; Plausible Denial

Book of Facts: Couch, Malcolm

A cameraman for a local Dallas television station, Couch was riding in a press car eight or nine cars back from the lead car in the Kennedy motorcade. He testified that when the shots were fired, another passenger in the car, photographer Robert H. Jackson, yelled that a rifle was protruding from a window of the Texas School Book Depository Building. Couch said he looked up in time to see a rifle barrel being withdrawn into the window on what appeared to be the sixth or seventh floor.

He also claimed that an individual named Wes Wise, "who works for [television station] KRLD," told him he saw Jack Ruby coming around the side of the Depository Building five to ten minutes after the shooting. Wise never testified before the Warren Commission.

See also DILLARD, THOMAS.

Rush to Judgment; Warren Report

Book of Facts: "Coup d'Etat in America"

Written by Michael L. Canfield and Alan J. Weberman and published in 1975 by The Third Press, the book Coup d'Etat in America: The CIA and the Assassination of John F. Kennedy focuses on what the authors claim was the CIA's involvement in the assassination, including deploying "assassination squad" teams at the scene in Dallas.

Book of Facts: Crafard, Curtis

A drifter who worked at odd jobs in Jack Ruby's Carousel Club, "Larry" Crafard told FBI investigators that he frequently saw Bernard Weissman in the club. Weissman had placed an inflammatory anti-Kennedy ad in the Dallas Morning News the day of the assassination, and was revealed by Crafard to be on personal terms with Ruby. Crafard further said he heard Ruby refer to Weissman by name.

See also AMERICAN FACT-FINDING COMMITTEE.

Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Craig, Roger

A deputy sheriff of Dallas County in November 1963, Craig appears to be another victim of post-assassination duress because his testimony conflicted with the official findings of the Warren Commission. Named Officer of the Year in 1960, Craig had a neatly ordered life that seemingly crumpled after the assassination, and he ultimately committed suicide. Craig figured prominently in three controversial incidents immediately following the assassination. The first was his eyewitness account that shortly after the shooting, he saw a man running down the hill on the north side of Elm Street from the direction of the Texas School Book Depository Building and jump into a Rambler station wagon that had slowed to pick him up. Later at Police Headquarters, he identified Lee Harvey Oswald as the man he saw get into the car. The Warren Commission version was that Oswald boarded a public bus and then switched to a taxicab to flee the area of the shooting. Police Captain Will Fritz, who conducted Oswald's interrogation, denied that Craig was ever in the same room with the suspect, yet a photograph published in 1969 clearly showed Craig standing inside the office during Oswald's questioning.

About ten minutes after the shooting Craig was approached by the family of Arnold Rowland. Mr. Rowland told him he saw two men at the sixth-floor window of the Depository Building. (Mrs. Rowland disagreed with her husband, but neither of their accounts lend credence to the Warren Commission's lone assassin theory.) Shortly after this exchange, Craig and another officer found the rifle that Oswald allegedly used, except that he identified it by its markings as a 7.65-caliber Mauser, not a Mannlicher-Carcano.

Craig's life was thrown into turmoil when he refused to recant his testimony. Several attempts were made on his life, and following the breakup of his marriage, he shot himself.

See also BOONE, EUGENE L.; MOONEY, LUKE; WADE, HENRY W.; WEITZMAN, SEYMOUR.
Crossfire; High Treason; Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Craig, Walter

Under pressure from its critics that the interests of the man accused of killing President Kennedy, Lee Harvey Oswald, were not being protected, the Warren Commission appointed Walter Craig, then president of the American Bar Association, to participate in the hearings in a role vaguely similar to that of a defense attorney. Critics charge that Craig's participation was virtually nil and that his awareness of the facts of the case was practically nonexistent. There is no record of Craig's having called even a single witness to testify in Oswald's defense or of his ever having recalled a witness for cross-examination.

Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Crenshaw, Dr. Charles

A surgeon at Parkland Memorial Hospital, Crenshaw was there when the president was brought in. Never called to testify by any official body, Crenshaw wrote, with Jens Hansen and J. Gary Shaw, an account of his experiences in a book titled JFK: Conspiracy of Silence, published by Signet in 1992. In the book Crenshaw claims that he was fully aware at the time that the wounds to the president's head and throat were caused by bullets fired from in front of Kennedy. He also claims that while he was working to save Lee Harvey Oswald's life after Jack Ruby shot him, he received a telephone call from President Lyndon B. Johnson telling him that a man standing by in the operating room would take Oswald's deathbed confession of the assassination.

See also TRACHEOTOMY.
Conspiracy of Silence

Book of Facts: Crescent City Garage

This automobile parking garage in New Orleans, owned by Adrian Alba, had contracts to garage vehicles owned by the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the Secret Service, and the Office of Naval Intelligence. It was also a hangout for Lee Harvey Oswald, who worked next door at the William Reily Coffee Company.

On the Trail of the Assassins

Book of Facts: "Cross, Ron"

"Ron Cross" was the pseudonym used by an undercover CIA case officer when he testified before the House Select Committee on Investigations that "Maurice Bishop" was actually David Atlee Phillips.
Conspiracy

Book of Facts: "Crossfire"

Published by Carroll & Graf in 1989, Crossfire: The Plot That Killed Kennedy is the work of Dallas journalist Jim Marrs. This book reviews in depth much of what was known about the assassination through 1989, and provides some additional witness information. The book focuses on those groups with the motive and means to carry out the assassination of an American president. It was one of the sources for the Oliver Stone film JFK.

Book of Facts: Cuban Revolutionary Council (CRC)

The CRC was an anti-Castro group allegedly organized by CIA agent E. Howard Hunt whose purpose was to discredit the pro-Castro Fair Play for Cuba Committee. The CRC headquarters was located at 544 Camp Street in New Orleans.

See also BANISTER, GUY.
Crossfire; High Treason

Book of Facts: Cubela, Rolando

In 1961, Cuban official Rolando Cubela, a former assassin for Fidel Castro during the revolution to overthrow the Batista government, allegedly attempted to defect but was persuaded by the Central Intelligence Agency to remain in place. Cubela became a CIA informer under the code name AM/LASH. On the same day Kennedy was assassinated, Cubela was in Paris, France, meeting with a CIA contact to discuss plans to kill Castro. Nothing came of the plans.

In February 1966, Cubela was arrested and was later convicted by the Cuban government of conspiracy against Castro and of treason. He was sentenced to twenty-five years in prison. Some researchers have cited the AM/LASH plots against Castro as motivation for Castro's involvement in Kennedy's death, alleging that Cubela was actually a double agent. Cubela passionately denied this, and no hard evidence exists to support such an assumption.

Conspiracy; Reasonable Doubt

Book of Facts: Cunningham, Cortland

An FBI firearms expert, Cortlandt was asked by the Warren Commission to examine the bullets allegedly recovered from the shooting scene of Police Officer J. D. Tippit. Because the bullets were too badly mangled, he was unable to positively identify them as having been fired from a revolver reportedly owned by Lee Harvey Oswald.

Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Curry, Jesse E.

Dallas Police Chief Curry rode in the lead car of the presidential motorcade. Immediately after the shots were fired, he shouted orders over the police radio, commanding officers to rush to the overpass just ahead of his car to "see what happened up there." The following day, he told reporters the shots came from behind him. Six years after the assassination, Curry was quoted as saying that there was still no hard evidence that Lee Harvey Oswald fired the rifle that was allegedly used to kill President Kennedy. He wrote a book, The JFK Assassination File, published in 1969 by the American Poster and Printing Company.
Crossfire; Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Custer, Jerrol F.

One of two X-ray technicians at the Bethesda Naval Hospital morgue when the president's body was brought in for the autopsy, Custer reportedly said that the president's wounds clearly indicated to him that Kennedy had been shot from the front. Custer also claims that while he was taking the X-ray plates of the president's wounds to be developed, he saw Jacqueline Kennedy enter the hospital. According to official records, the coffin containing the president's body was inside a Navy ambulance parked directly outside the main entrance to the hospital when Mrs. Kennedy entered the building. Custer's statement, if true, means the president's body had already been X-rayed before the coffin allegedly containing his body was unloaded.

On May 28, 1992, Custer attended a press conference along with the autopsy photographer, Floyd A. Riebe, to discuss recent publicity concerning the autopsy. According to a Reuter wire service story of May 29, 1992, Custer said the X rays that had been released to the public showing Kennedy's head wounds were "wrong." Custer then went into detail to demonstrate that the published X rays had been tampered with and did not reflect the president's actual wounds. He was quoted as saying that his job was to locate bullet fragments. He then confirmed a report by one of the Navy doctors present that a complete bullet was recovered under Kennedy's back when his body was moved. This bullet has never been accounted for in the evidence inventory of the case. Custer described the scene at the autopsy as "total chaos."

See also AMBULANCE CONTROVERSY; AUTOPSY CONTROVERSY; JENKINS, JAMES C.; O'CONNOR, PAUL K.; OSBORNE, DR. DAVID; X-RAY CONTROVERSY.

Best Evidence

Book of Facts: Dallas Conference

In 1991, assassination researcher Harrison Edward Livingstone gathered together for the first time a number of the people who were present in the Parkland Memorial Hospital emergency room when the wounded president was brought in, and several who were present when the autopsy was performed at Bethesda Naval Hospital. These doctors, nurses, the ambulance driver, technicians, and other specialists discussed as a group such topics as the president's head and back wounds, the condition of his body, the items used to wrap the body, and the autopsy photographs. The tremendous differences among the descriptions of various key medical details underscore the possibility that Kennedy's wounds were altered between the time the body left Parkland and the time the autopsy was performed.

High Treason 2

Book of Facts: Dallas Police

The Dallas Police Department, under the direction of its appointed chief, Jesse E. Curry, and the man responsible for day-to-day operations, Captain Will Fritz, has come under fire from numerous sources because of what many charge was extremely poor performance during the president's visit to the city. Critics point out that among other lapses, the security Dallas police afforded the motorcade ended one block short of the shooting scene; the investigation of the shooting scene was concentrated on the Texas School Book Depository Building, despite the fact that many police officers on the scene thought the shots were fired from the area of the Grassy Knoll; and the interrogation and protection of the suspect Lee Harvey Oswald was inconsistent with professional police procedures.

Texas Connection

Book of Facts: Dallas Police Dispatch Tape

It is standard operating procedure for the Dallas Police Department to record all conversations broadcast over police frequencies. Just before the assassination, the microphone on a motorcycle in the motorcade escort believed to be Officer H. B. McLain's jammed in the open position. This meant the sounds of activity near the scene, including the gunshots, were recorded on the dispatch tape. Much controversy has raged around the vital subject of the number of shots recorded - with some experts contending there were three, while others claim there were four - and over the direction of the shots seemingly recorded on the tape. The original copy of the recording is missing from the National Archives in Washington, D.C.

See also ACOUSTICAL EVIDENCE; FERRELL, MARY.
High Treason

Book of Facts: Daniels, Hawk

Hawk Daniels, a federal investigator, took part in an investigation concerning alleged plans by former Teamsters boss Jimmy Hoffa to kill Attorney General Robert F. Kennedy, and possibly also the president. Daniels, who later became a judge, claims he listened in on two 1962 telephone conversations in which Hoffa asked Louisiana Teamsters official Edward Partin to obtain plastic explosives for him so he could arrange to blow up Robert Kennedy's home.

Conspiracy

Book of Facts: Daniels, Napoleon

A former member of the Dallas police force, Daniels stated repeatedly that he saw a man somewhat resembling Jack Ruby enter the Main Street auto entrance ramp leading to the lower level of Dallas Police Headquarters moments before Lee Harvey Oswald was shot. He claims the man went unchallenged by Officer Roy Vaughn, who was guarding the entrance at the time. Vaughn denied this.

High Treason; Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Dark Complexioned Man

Several people in Dealey Plaza at the time of the assassination reported seeing at least two men with rifles at the sixth-floor window of the Texas School Book Depository Building. It is possible that one of them might have been Lee Harvey Oswald, but the second man was said to have had a very dark complexion. He was variously described as either Hispanic or Negro by these witnesses. In addition, Deputy Sheriff Roger D. Craig reported that he saw a dark-skinned man driving a Rambler station wagon away from the scene after another man, who had light skin, ran down a slope from the Book Depository Building and jumped into the car before it sped away. Another dark-complexioned man appears somehow to have been associated with the so-called Umbrella Man, whose mysterious behavior in Dealey Plaza before, during, and after the assassination has been a focus of researchers' scrutiny.

See also EUINS, AMOS L.; HENDERSON, RUBY; POWELL, JOHN; ROWLAND, ARNOLD
Crossfire

Book of Facts: David, Dennis

A petty officer in the Medical Service Corps stationed at the Naval Medical School at Bethesda Naval Hospital when the president's body arrived, David has been quoted as claiming he helped unload the coffin allegedly containing Kennedy's body, a direct contradiction of the official report filed by the Casket Team, which unloaded the coffin. David's tale also conflicts with the O'Neill and Sibert report on the autopsy. David has also reportedly provided other information about the events at Bethesda that dispute certain findings of the Warren Commission.

See also AMBULANCE CONTROVERSY; BODY BAG CONTROVERSY; COFFIN CONTROVERSY.
Best Evidence

Book of Facts: Davis, Avery

An employee in the Texas School Book Depository Building, Mrs. Avery Davis was standing in front of the building entrance when the assassination took place. She reportedly told FBI agents that she thought the shots had come from the overpass in front of the motorcade.

See also ADAMS, VICTORIA; TEXAS SCHOOL BOOK DEPOSITORY BUILDING EMPLOYEES.

Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Davis, Barbara and Virginia

Barbara Davis and her sister-in-law Virginia R. Davis claim they witnessed a man running from the direction of the area where Officer J. D. Tippit was shot. The man stopped in front of Barbara Davis' house, where he opened his revolver and allowed several spent shells to fall to the ground. The women retrieved the shells and gave them to a police officer investigating Tippit's murder. Barbara Davis said the man was wearing a dark sport coat. When she was shown the light tan jacket Lee Harvey Oswald was wearing when he was arrested shortly after the shooting, she said it was not the one worn by the man she saw empty the gun.

See also TIPPIT MURDER SCENE WITNESSES.

Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Davis, John

Davis is the author of Mafia Kingfish: Carlos Marcell and the Assassination of John F. Kennedy, published by McGraw-Hill in 1989. This book is a major source of information linking the assassination to organized crime.

Book of Facts: Davis, Red

Researchers Robert J. Groden and Harrison Edward Livingstone claim that Red Davis, a member of the Dallas Police Department, told Officer Roy Vaughn that Assistant Police Chief Charles Batchelor escorted Jack Ruby to the basement of Police Headquarters, where Ruby killed Lee Harvey Oswald.

*See also DANIELS, NAPOLEON J.
High Treason*

Book of Facts: Davis, Thomas

A convicted bank robber, Thomas Eli Davis III was a part-time undersea salvage operator who also took part, along with Jack Ruby, in running guns to Cuba. Davis was allegedly arrested by Moroccan security forces because he had in his possession a letter that discussed Lee Harvey Oswald and the assassination. Intervention by a CIA agent is credited with winning Davis' release. Davis died of accidental electrocution in 1973.

Conspiracy; Ruby Cover-up

Book of Facts: Day, Carl

Dallas police lieutenant Day claimed to have lifted Lee Harvey Oswald's palmprint from the Mannlicher-Carcano rifle allegedly used to kill Kennedy. Inexplicably, Day ignored normal police procedure and failed to photograph the print and protect it with cellophane, even though he followed procedure with other, less valuable prints found on the rifle. No residue of the purported palmprint was found when the rifle was examined by the FBI.

See also DRAIN, VINCENT; LATONA, SEBASTIAN FRANCIS.

Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Dealey Plaza

The scene of the Kennedy assassination is located at the western edge of downtown Dallas. Situated on slightly over three acres, it is crossed by Main Street, Elm Street, and Commerce Street, all three leading to entrances to the freeway system, including Stemmons Freeway, which the motorcade took to Parkland Memorial Hospital after the shooting. Named for George B. Dealey, founder of the Dallas Morning News and an early civic leader, the plaza was the site of the first home, store, and courthouse in Dallas.

Book of Facts: Dealey Plaza Witnesses

At least four hundred people were in and around Dealey Plaza when President Kennedy was killed. Not all of them witnessed the assassination, and of those who did, not all have spoken up about what they saw. Entries have been included in this book for the following people who were on the scene and who have testified or in some other way given witness to the events of November 22, 1963: Associated Press photographer James W. Altgens; Danny Garcia Arce; Police Officer Marrison L. Baker; Secret Service agent Glen Bennett; Hugh Betzner, Jr.; Charles Brehm; Howard L. Brennan; Police Officer E. D. Brewer; Charles Bronson (see BRONSON FILM); Mrs. Earle Cabell, wife of the Dallas mayor; Richard R. Carr; Police Officer James Chaney; Governor John Connally; TV cameraman Malcolm Couch; Deputy Sheriff Roger D. Craig; Sheriff J. E. (Bill) Decker; Dallas Morning News photographer Thomas Dillard; Robert E. Edwards; Amos L. Euins; Ronald B. Fischer; Police Officer Bobby W. Hargis; Police Sergeant D. V. Harkness; Wayne and Edna Hartman; Police Officer Clyde A. Haygood; Ruby Henderson; Secret Service agent Clinton Hill; Jean Hill; Ed Hoffman; Robert Hughes; Texas State Highway Patrolman Hurchel Jacks; Assistant Press Secretary Malcolm Kilduff; W. W. Mabra; Police Officer B. J. Martin; Bill and Gayle Newman (see NEWMAN FAMILY); Jean Newman; Arnold Rowland; NBC cameraman Dave Weigman; Deputy Constable Seymour Weitzman; Robert H. West; Linda Willis; Philip L. Willis.

Book of Facts: Dean, Patrick

Dallas police sergeant Dean claims that shortly after Jack Ruby's arrest, Ruby told him that he had premeditated the murder of Lee Harvey Oswald and had entered the police garage by simply walking down the Main Street entrance ramp. Although several other officers belatedly corroborated Dean's statement about how Ruby entered the building, it remains questionable. Dean, who had known Ruby for several years, took a lie-detector test answering questions he allegedly wrote himself, but failed to achieve a result that would clearly indicate whether he was telling the truth.

See also DANIELS, NAPOLEON J.; GRIFFIN, BURT W.; VAUGHN, ROY.

Conspiracy; Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Death of a President

Written by noted author William Manchester and published in 1967 by Harper & Row, this book is a fairly straightforward account of the assassination and the events preceding and following it, through the president's burial. Commissioned to write the book by the Kennedy family, Manchester later had a falling out with Robert F. Kennedy and the late president's widow, Jacqueline, that resulted in a well-publicized legal battle. The outcome was that certain passages were deleted from Manchester's manuscript and the Kennedy family divorced itself from the work, meaning it was no longer a Kennedy-authorized version of the assassination but Manchester's own history of the events. In a 1988 foreword to a reissue of the book, Manchester discounted all conspiracy theories concerning President Kennedy's assassination.

Book of Facts: DeBrueys, Warren

An FBI agent, deBrueys was stationed in New Orleans and has been identified as Lee Harvey Oswald's contact with the Bureau.

See also PENA, OREST.

Plausible Denial

Book of Facts: Decker, J. E. "Bill"

Dallas County sheriff Decker was riding in the lead car of the presidential motorcade when the fatal shots were fired. He immediately dispatched all available deputies to the railroad yard behind the Grassy Knoll to "see what happened there," and secure the area pending the arrival of detectives. His deputies established a command post behind the stockade fence on the knoll, which they maintained for at least two more hours. Newspaper reports the afternoon of the shooting quoted Decker as saying that after he heard the first shot, he thought he saw a bullet bounce off the pavement.

See also DEALEY PLAZA WITNESSES; ELLIS, STARVIS; GRASSY KNOLL WITNESSES.
High Treason; Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Delgado, Nelson

A Marine who served for a while with Lee Harvey Oswald, Delgado testified that Oswald was a supporter of Fidel Castro, and had spoken of joining the Cuban army. In testimony conflicting with statements made by others about the subject, Delgado described Oswald's marksmanship abilities as a "big joke," saying he often missed the target sheet entirely. Delgado also claimed that FBI agents attempted to get him to change several portions of his testimony so it would more closely align with the findings of the Warren Commission.

See also ANDERSON, EUGENE D.

Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: DeMohrenschildt, George

An oil geologist who formed a close friendship with Lee Harvey Oswald, DeMohrenschildt claimed to be the son of a marshal of nobility in czarist Russia, and was therefore entitled to call himself a baron. DeMohrenschildt is believed to have been an espionage agent for Nazi Germany in the United States and Mexico during World War II and later to have been associated with American intelligence agencies, especially the CIA, for whom he was an informant. Reports indicate that DeMohrenschildt may have been instrumental in getting Oswald a job in 1962 with a graphic arts company that processed photos taken by the U-2 spy planes that flew regular surveillance missions over Soviet territory - a strange employer for a man who had once defected to the Soviet Union.

In March 1977, just hours after arranging an interview with an investigator from the House Select Committee on Assassinations, DeMohrenschildt was found dead of a shotgun blast in the mouth. The death was ruled a suicide.

See also JAGGERS-CHILES-STOVALL; MENDOZA, DR. CHARLES.
Conspiracy; Crossfire

Book of Facts: Dillard, Thomas

Dillard was a photographer for the Dallas Morning News. He was riding in the press car toward the rear of the presidential motorcade when Kennedy was shot. A few seconds after the final shot, he took two photographs of the Texas School Book Depository Building. The Warren Report said one of Dillard's photos showed a partially opened window on the sixth floor of the building. Dillard's photo was among those examined by experts hired by the House Select Committee on Assassinations who determined that boxes visible in photos taken before and after the shooting had been "rearranged." This led assassination researcher Jim Marrs to question how it was possible that Lee Harvey Oswald had time to rearrange boxes on the sixth floor and be discovered on the second floor by a police officer at almost the same time.

See also BAKER, MARRION L.; COUCH, MALCOLM.
Crossfire; Warren Report

Book of Facts: Dodd, Richard C.

A railroad worker who had taken time to watch the presidential motorcade pass through Dealey Plaza, Dodd told assassination researcher Mark Lane that he had seen puffs of smoke rising from the corner of the stockade fence atop the Grassy Knoll. This observation was supported by statements from other railroad workers who were standing nearby.

See also OVERPASS WITNESSES.

Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Donahue, Howard

A ballistics expert, Donahue conducted a study of the shots that killed President Kennedy. His work is chronicled in the book Mortal Error, The Shot That Killed JFK, written by Bonar Menninger and published by St. Martin's Press in 1992. Donahue and Menninger hypothesize that the fatal head wound inflicted on the president was caused by the accidental discharge of a rifle carried by Secret Service Agent George Hickey, who was riding in the car directly behind the president's limousine. Agent Samuel Kinney, who rode in the same car, has denied that Hickey fired a shot.

Book of Facts: Dorman, Elsie

An employee of a publisher with offices in the Texas School Book Depository Building, Dorman was filming the motorcade from the window of her fourth-floor office when the shooting took place. There is no record that she was ever questioned by any official investigators.

See also TEXAS SCHOOL BOOK DEPOSITORY BUILDING EMPLOYEES.

Crossfire

Book of Facts: Dougherty, Jack E.

An employee of the Texas School Book Depository Building, Dougherty was questioned by Warren Commission staff members. Although the Commission concluded that Lee Harvey Oswald entered the building the morning of the assassination carrying a long paper package, which he reportedly claimed contained curtain rods and which the Commission believed concealed the Mannlicher-Carcano rifle he used to kill President Kennedy, Dougherty testified that he saw Oswald enter the building and that he was positive that Oswald carried nothing in his hands.

See also FRAZIER, BUELL WESLEY.

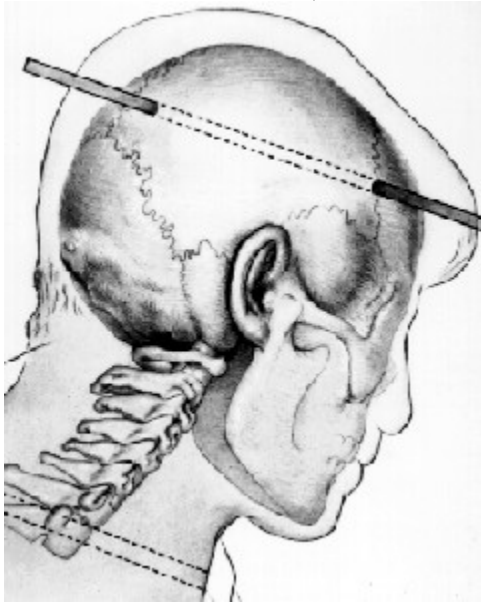

Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Downtown Lincoln Mercury

Several salesmen at the Dallas Downtown Lincoln-Mercury automobile dealership testified to the Warren Commission that on November 9, 1963, a man calling himself Lee Oswald came into the showroom, inquired about buying a Mercury Comet, and took the car on a reckless test drive. The man also told the salesmen that he expected to be coming into a large sum of money in a few weeks' time. The Warren Commission concluded that this man could not have been Lee Harvey Oswald, who, it said, was elsewhere that day. Some researchers speculate that the man calling himself Oswald may have been an impersonator leaving a false trail of evidence.

*See also Bogard, Albert G; BROWN, ORAN; PIZZO, FRANK; WILSON, EUGENE M.
Rush to Judgment*

Book of Facts: Dox, Ida

Dox prepared a series of drawings that accurately reproduced the Kennedy autopsy photographs for the House Select Committee on Assassinations. Photographs of the drawings were then taken, and these photos were used in the Committee's investigation. The decision to use drawings rather than photos was ostensibly made to spare the Kennedy family the pain of having the public view actual photos of the president's corpse.

Best Evidence

Book of Facts: Doyle, Harold

Doyle is one of three hoboes found near the scene and taken in for questioning by the Dallas police shortly after the shooting. Initially charged for vagrancy, all three were later released. There has been confusion about their identities, what they were doing in the railroad yard behind the Grassy Knoll, and why they were released so quickly.

See also ABRAMS, GUS W.; GEDNEY, JOHN FORRESTER.

High Treason 2

Book of Facts: Drain, Vincent

Drain was the FBI agent who took the Mannlicher-Carcano rifle allegedly found in the Texas School Book Depository Building to the FBI labs in Washington, D.C., for examination in the early hours of November 23, 1963. The FBI found no usable fingerprints on the weapon, and on Sunday afternoon, November 24, Drain returned it to the Dallas police.

See also LATONA, SEBASTIAN FRANCIS; PALMPRINT ON RIFLE.

Best Evidence

Book of Facts: Dudman, Richard

A correspondent for the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, Dudman wrote several articles about the assassination investigation during December 1963 that fueled controversies that persist today. These included interviews conducted during the first week of December with some of the doctors at Parkland Memorial Hospital who had worked to save the president's life, who insisted the wound in Kennedy's throat was a bullet entry wound, not an exit wound. On December 18, Dudman reported that two Secret Service agents visited the Parkland surgeons with a copy of the autopsy report from Bethesda Naval Hospital. Following this visit, the Dallas doctors changed their opinion of the wound to "conform" to the Bethesda autopsy report. The Parkland doctors told Dudman that they had not been coerced into changing their minds.

See also AUTOPSY CONTROVERSY; MCCLELLAND, DR. ROBERT N.; PERRY, DR. MALCOLM; TRACHEOTOMY.
Best Evidence

Book of Facts: Duffy, James

An attorney, Duffy (no relation to the present author) wrote Who Killed JFK? The Web: The Kennedy Assassination Cover-up, published by Shapolsky in 1989. Based on official documents, this book examines the life and connections of Lee Harvey Oswald and looks at various conspiracy theories.

Book of Facts: Dulaney, Dr. Richard

A resident at Parkland Memorial Hospital, Dulaney was shown copies of photographs of the president's head wound allegedly taken at the time of the autopsy. He is reported as saying that these photos showed a wound different from the one he remembers seeing in an unobstructed view afforded when another doctor lifted Kennedy's head.

See also HEAD WOUND CONTROVERSY.

High Treason

Book of Facts: Dulles, Allen

A member of the Warren Commission, Dulles was director of the Central Intelligence Agency from 1953 through 1961. Many critics find it hard to justify Dulles' selection for the Commission. He had spent most of his life in the same intelligence organization that President Kennedy had sworn to break up and had himself been forced out by Kennedy after the Bay of Pigs fiasco.

Book of Facts: Duran, Sylvia

A young Mexican woman who was employed in the Cuban Embassy in Mexico City in 1963, Duran was approached several times in late September and early October of that year by an American calling himself Lee Harvey Oswald. The man wanted to arrange for a visa to Cuba, from where, he said, he intended to travel to the Soviet Union. Later, after reportedly making statements that the man she met in Mexico City might not be the same man she saw Jack Ruby kill on television, Duran was arrested twice by Mexican authorities, allegedly at the instigation of the Central Intelligence Agency.

Conspiracy; Plausible Denial

Book of Facts: Ebersole, Dr. John

Ebersole was the radiologist who took autopsy X rays of the president's wounds at Bethesda Naval Hospital. He allegedly told a reporter from his hometown newspaper that he took numerous X rays of the body in an effort to locate a bullet that the autopsy doctors believed entered through the president's back but did not exit. No bullet was ever found. He is also reported as saying that the tracheotomy opening in the president's throat, which was originally a bullet wound, had been sutured closed. The doctors at Parkland Memorial Hospital denied that the wound had been closed. In fact, Dr. Kemp Clark recalled that the tracheotomy tube was left in the body when the body was prepared for shipment to Washington.

See also X-ray Controversy.

Best Evidence

Book of Facts: Eddowes, Michael

Eddowes wrote a book originally titled Khrushchev Killed Kennedy and later republished by Clarkson N. Potter as The Oswald File (1977). Its main premise is that while Lee Harvey Oswald was living in the Soviet Union, he was taken prisoner and replaced by the KGB with a Soviet agent who assumed Oswald's identity. According to Eddowes, it was this KGB agent who later murdered the president. The issue was put to rest when Eddowes sued the state of Texas to have the body in Oswald's grave exhumed; it was, and was, in fact, found to be the real Oswald.

High Treason

Book of Facts: "Eduardo"

Marita Lorenz.

"Eduardo" was an alias used by E. Howard Hunt, according to Book of Facts: Edwards, Robert E.

Dallas County employee Edwards was standing with Ronald B. Fischer across from the Texas School Book Depository Building at the intersection of Elm and Houston streets when something at a sixth-floor window of the building caught his attention. He could see the head and shoulders of a man who was wearing either a white T-shirt or light-colored sport shirt. Edwards reported that it seemed odd to him that the man was not watching for the motorcade, but was staring "transfixed" toward the end of Elm Street near the overpass.

Crossfire

Book of Facts: Edwards, Sheffield

A CIA operative believed to be involved in plots to kill Fidel Castro, Edwards was also a reported liaison between the CIA and mob hitmen.

See also BISSELL, RICHARD.

High Treason

Book of Facts: Ellis, Starvis

Dallas Police Officer Ellis told the House Select Committee on Assassinations that he rode his motorcycle alongside the first car in the presidential motorcade. He reported seeing a bullet strike the pavement, but no such bullet was ever accounted for, and Ellis was never questioned by the Warren Commission.
See also DECKER, J. E. (BILL); WINDSHIELD DAMAGE.
Crossfire

Book of Facts: Epstein, Edward Jay

Epstein is the author of three books dealing with the assassination: Inquest: The Warren Commission and the Establishment of Truth, published by Viking in 1966; Counterplot, published by Viking in 1969; and Legend: The Secret Life of Lee Harvey Oswald, published by Ballantine in 1978. The first established Epstein as a critic of the Warren Report. Epstein's thesis is that Lee Harvey Oswald was an undercover operative of the American intelligence community. Counterplot is an attack on the assassination investigation conducted by New Orleans District Attorney Jim Garrison.

Book of Facts: Euins, Amos L.

According to testimony by James Underwood, who was assistant news director for KRLD-TV in Dallas at the time of the assassination, Euins, who was fifteen years old at the time, told a Dallas motorcycle police officer that he saw a "colored man" with a rifle lean out the sixth-floor window of the Texas School Book Depository Building. Following allegedly threatening telephone calls to his family, Euins, who is black himself, recanted his statement and told the Warren Commission that he didn't know whether the man he saw was white or "colored."

See also DARK-COMPLEXIONED MAN (OR MEN); POWELL, JOHN; ROWLAND, ARNOLD.

Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Ewing, Michael

Ewing was a staff member of the House Select Committee on Assassinations. He is the co-author, with Bernard Fensterwald, of Assassination of JFK by Coincidence or Conspiracy? produced by the Committee to Investigate Assassinations and published by Kensington Publishing Corporation in 1977.

Book of Facts: Executive Action

This was a code name reserved for covert CIA activities involving Agency plans to assassinate unfriendly foreign leaders.

See also ZR/RIFLE.

Conspiracy

Book of Facts: Exner, Judith

A stunning beauty and an intimate of Chicago mob leader Sam Giancana, Exner also engaged in an affair with President Kennedy beginning in March 1960. The liaison ended after March 1962, when it is thought that FBI director J. Edgar Hoover confronted Kennedy with his knowledge of the affair and the fact that Exner was linked to Giancana. Exner later wrote about the affair in a book titled My Story, published by Grove in 1977.

Crossfire

Book of Facts: Fair Play for Cuba Committee (FPCC)

A pro-Castro organization active during the 1960s, the FPCC did not have a chapter in New Orleans, which was home to so many Cubans exiled from their homeland. During the summer of 1963, Lee Harvey Oswald created an FPCC chapter - with an address at 544 Camp Street - that was nothing more than a paper organization naming him the president and only member. Some assassination researchers believe Oswald fabricated this group to help him establish a facade as a pro-Castro sympathizer.

Conspiracy

Book of Facts: FBI Telex Message

On November 17, 1963, the following telex message was sent to all FBI offices in the United States:

URGENT: 1:45 AM EST 11-17-63 HLF 1 PAGE

TO: ALL SACS

FROM: DIRECTOR

THREAT TO ASSASSINATE PRESIDENT KENNEDY IN DALLAS TEXAS NOVEMBER 22 DASH TWENTY THREE NINETEEN SIXTY THREE. MISC INFORMATION CONCERNING. INFORMATION HAS BEEN RECEIVED BY THE BUREAUS [sic] BUREAU HAS DETERMINED THAT A MILITANT REVOLUTIONARY GROUP MAY ATTEMPT TO ASSASSINATE PRESIDENT KENNEDY ON HIS PROPOSED TRIP TO DALLAS TEXAS NOVEMBER TWENTY TWO DASH TWENTY THREE NINETEEN SIXTY THREE. ALL RECEIVING OFFICES SHOULD IMMEDIATELY CONTACT ALL CIS, PCIS LOGICAL RACE AND HATE GROUP INFORMANTS AND DETERMINE IF ANY BASIS FOR THREAT. BUREAU SHOULD BE KEPT ADVISED OF ALL DEVELOPMENTS BY TELETYPE. OTHER OFFICES HAVE BEEN ADVISED. END AND ACK PLS.

According to New Orleans District Attorney Jim Garrison, William S. Walter, an FBI employee of the New Orleans office, claimed that following the assassination, the file copies of this message and a duplicate sent shortly afterward disappeared from the office.

On the Trail of the Assassins

Book of Facts: Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI)

According to Mark North, author of Act of Treason: The Role of J. Edgar Hoover in the Assassination of President Kennedy (Carroll & Graf, 1992), FBI director J. Edgar Hoover knew of a Mafia plot to kill Kennedy but did nothing to stop it. On Kennedy's election in 1960, Hoover began actively to collect potentially damaging information on the Kennedy family. Being an old acquaintance of Kennedy's father, Joseph P. Kennedy, Sr., Hoover was well aware of Kennedy Sr.'s shadier business dealings and felt that John Kennedy would be vulnerable to political blackmail.

By 1962, FBI surveillance of Mafia hideouts had revealed the depth of the mob's resentment of the Kennedys' anti-Mafia crusade. Hoover's own relationship with the Kennedys was not much better. President Kennedy had ousted many former FBI agents from the Secret Service, the State Department, the Central Intelligence Agency, the Immigration and Naturalization Service, and other agencies. In return, Hoover publicly criticized Kennedy's policies while secretly gathering information on Kennedy's affairs with Marilyn Monroe, Judith Exner, and other women. Hoover also quarreled with Attorney General Robert F. Kennedy, whom he felt was overstepping his authority.

There has been some speculation that Lee Harvey Oswald may have secretly been an FBI agent, a charge that Hoover himself denied in a written statement to the Warren Commission.

FBI agents assisted in many aspects of the official investigation into the president's death. Among the more important documents produced by FBI agents was the O'Neill and Sibert report on the autopsy performed at Bethesda Naval Hospital.

See also QUIGLEY, JOHN.

Book of Facts: Felder, James

Army Sergeant James Felder was a member of the Casket Team charged with transporting the president's coffin. Felder was interviewed by researcher David S. Lifton. According to Lifton, Felder substantiated reports of confusion at Bethesda Naval Hospital involving the use of two Navy ambulances and the team's difficulty locating Kennedy's coffin during a thirty-minute interval following its arrival at the hospital.

See also AMBULANCE CONTROVERSY; BIRD, SAMUEL R.
Best Evidence

Book of Facts: Fensterwald, Bernard

Fensterwald was the co-author, with Michael Ewing, of Assassination of JFK by Coincidence or Conspiracy?, published by Kensington Publishing Corporation in 1977.

Book of Facts: Ferrell, Mary

A Dallas-based assassination researcher who has devoted countless hours probing into the president's murder, Ferrell has contributed to numerous books on the subject. It was Ferrell who alerted the House Select Committee on Assassinations to the existence of a Dictabelt recording of sounds at the assassination scene; this recording became known as the Dallas police dispatch tape. An analysis of this tape led the Committee to admit that four shots were fired in Dealey Plaza, rather than the three originally acknowledged by the Warren Commission. Ferrell also reportedly claimed that Captain Will Fritz, the man who interrogated Lee Harvey Oswald, told a friend that Lyndon B. Johnson called while Oswald was in custody and said, "You've got your man, the investigation is over."

See also ACOUSTICAL EVIDENCE.
Conspiracy; High Treason

Book of Facts: Ferrie, David

Photographs of David Ferrie show a man of outlandish appearance. This is partially because he suffered from a disease that caused him to lose all the hair on his body, including his head and eyebrows. He usually compensated for this by wearing a cheap red wig and obviously phony eyebrows. Ferrie had a reputation as an excellent pilot who flew dangerous missions into Cuba before the Bay of Pigs invasion. He was active in right-wing organizations in New Orleans, especially with anti-Castro Cubans. He was also an associate of Guy Banister's and did work for mafioso Carlos Marcello and members of his organization. Ferrie also had connections with Lee Harvey Oswald that dated back at least a dozen years before the assassination. Ferrie died of what officials termed natural causes on February 22, 1967, shortly after New Orleans District Attorney Jim Garrison implicated him in Kennedy's assassination.

Conspiracy; Heritage of Stone; On the Trail of the Assassins.

Book of Facts: Films of the Assassination

See ARNOLD, GORDON; BRONSON FILM; DORMAN, ELSIE; HUGHES, ROBERT; MUCHMORE, MARIE; NIX, ORVILLE; OLIVER, BETTY; WEIGMAN, DAVE; ZAPRUDER FILM.

Book of Facts: Finck, Dr. Pierre

A forensic pathologist, Dr. Finck attended at the autopsy on the president's body conducted at Bethesda Naval Hospital. Finck testified that the depth of the wound in the president's back was "the first fraction of an inch." This was the wound allegedly caused by the magic bullet, which supposedly passed through Kennedy's body and also caused the wounds to Governor John Connally. When asked by the Warren Commission whether the magic bullet could have inflicted the wound in Connally's wrist, Dr. Finck replied, "No; for the reason that there are too many fragments described in that wrist." By contrast, the magic bullet is almost entirely intact.

See also SHAW, DR. ROBERT.

Best Evidence: High Treason

Book of Facts: Firing Sequence Controversy

The Warren Commission concluded that Lee Harvey Oswald fired three times at President Kennedy from the sixth floor of the Texas School Book Depository Building. Despite reports from people at the scene of as few as two shots to as many as six, the Commission settled on three because three spent cartridges were allegedly found in the sniper's nest on the sixth floor of the building. At first the Warren Commission established that two bullets hit Kennedy and one wounded Texas Governor John Connally. This view of events was later changed to correspond with evidence proving that a bystander, James T. Tague, was injured when a bullet hit the pavement at his feet. Thus was created what has become known as the magic bullet theory, according to which one bullet wounded both Kennedy and Connally, and another killed Kennedy, leaving a third to cause the injury to Tague. The Commission relied on the Zapruder film to establish the timing of the shots, and concluded that Oswald had fired all three in 4.8 to 5.6 seconds. Three men rated master marksmen by the National Rifle Association were asked by the Commission to simulate Oswald's firing sequence. The men, positioned about thirty feet off the ground (rather than sixty feet, the level of the Depository Building's sixth floor), each fired six shots at a stationary target. One of these three "masters" was able to match Oswald's alleged timing; the other two failed. Not one of the eighteen shots hit the targeted head and neck. All parties in the assassination debate agree that Oswald could not be called a "master" shot, and he was further handicapped because the sight on his alleged rifle was not aligned accurately.

See also MANNLICHER-CARCANO RIFLE; SIMMONS, RONALD.
Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Fischer, Ronald B.

A Dallas County employee, Fischer was standing on the corner of Elm and Houston streets with Robert E. Edwards just before the presidential motorcade entered Dealey Plaza when he observed a man at the sixth-floor window of the Texas School Book Depository Building. The man wore either a white

T-shirt or a light-colored sport shirt. Fischer noticed that the man stared "transfixed" at Elm Street, looking in the direction of the railroad overpass. He said later he thought the shots that were fired at the president came from the west side of the building, which is the direction of the Grassy Knoll.
Crossfire

Book of Facts: Fischer, Dr. Russell

Maryland state medical examiner Fischer headed the panel of four doctors established by Attorney General Ramsey Clark in 1968 to review the autopsy photographs and X rays of the president's wounds.

See also CLARK PANEL.

Best Evidence; High Treason

Book of Facts: Fitzgerald, Desmond

A CIA officer involved in plots to kill Fidel Castro, FitzGerald once identified himself to Cuban official Rolando Cubela as a senator who represented Attorney General Robert F. Kennedy. He told Cubela that a coup against Castro would have U.S. government backing, and that Kennedy favored assassinating Castro.

Conspiracy; High Treason

Book of Facts: 544 Camp Street

This was the address of a seedy three-story building in New Orleans that figured prominently in Lee Harvey Oswald's activities in that city. When Oswald was arrested in August 1963 following a fight with anti-Castro Cubans who objected to his distributing pro-Castro literature, he was in possession of pamphlets rubber-stamped with the address FPCC, 544 Camp Street, New Orleans. The letters FPCC stood for the Fair Play for Cuba Committee. The Camp Street address was an odd location for a pro-Castro group, since it was the address of the anti-Castro Cuban Revolutionary Council. Also at 544 Camp Street were the offices of Guy Banister, a supporter of anti-Castro groups with reported links to the U.S. intelligence community and the underworld. Other offices in this shabby corner building were used by various Cuban exile groups planning the overthrow of Castro.

See also BRINGUIER, CARLOS.

Conspiracy; Crossfire

Book of Facts: Folsom, Allison

Then Marine Corps Lieutenant Colonel Folsom testified before the Warren Commission, he read aloud the score Lee Harvey Oswald received on a Russian-language test. Did Oswald receive instruction in Russian while he was in the Marines? Why? Despite Folsom's evidence, supporters of the Commission contend that Oswald taught himself Russian because he planned to defect to the Soviet Union.

Heritage of Stone

Book of Facts: Fonzi, Gaeton

Philadelphia journalist who was hired by the House Select Committee on Assassinations, Fonzi traveled widely collecting information to be used in the Committee's investigation of the president's assassination. Fonzi later wrote that the Committee's investigation had been inadequate and recommended that another investigation of the Kennedy assassination be opened.

Book of Facts: Ford, Gerald

Congressman (later President) Ford was selected by Lyndon B. Johnson to serve on the Warren Commission. Assassination researcher Mark Lane has charged that Ford secretly leaked to the FBI information gathered by the Commission's staff during its investigation. Ford co-authored, with John R. Stiles, a book titled Portrait of the Assassin, published in 1965 by Simon & Schuster.

See also WARREN COMMISSION MEMBERS.

Plausible Denial

Book of Facts; Foster, J. W.

Dallas Police Officer Foster was one of two officers assigned to stand on the railroad overpass that spanned Elm Street, and under which the presidential motorcade would pass. After the shooting, Foster reportedly searched the area below and found a tear in the grass where a bullet had hit the ground. Ordered to guard the spot, Foster remained there until an unidentified man, described as an FBI agent, removed the slug and took it with him. A photo showed a sandy-haired man in a suit removing the slug while Foster, in uniform, looked on. Nothing was ever heard about this slug again.

See also HARTMAN, WAYNE AND EDNA; OVERPASS WITNESSES.
Crossfire

Book of Facts: Fox, Sylvan

In 1965, Pulitzer Prizewinning journalist Sylvan Fox wrote the first book challenging the Warren Report. Fox's work, The Unanswered Questions About the Kennedy Assassination, published by Award Books in 1965, was based solely on the Warren Commission's hearings and is credited by many private researchers with sparking their interest in investigating the assassination.

Book of Facts: Frazier, Buell Wesley

Frazier was the Texas School Book Depository Building employee who drove Lee Harvey Oswald to work the day of the assassination. The Warren Commission made much of Frazier's testimony that Oswald carried a long, paper-wrapped parcel with him into the building that day, which he told Frazier contained curtain rods. When the Commission showed Frazier a paper package with the dismantled Mannlicher-Carcano rifle wrapped inside, he told them Oswald's package was much shorter. Frazier described the package Oswald had with him as about twenty-seven inches long. The rifle allegedly found inside the building could not be dismantled to that short a length; a package containing the purported murder weapon had to be no less than 34.8 inches long. Frazier said Oswald carried the package against his body from under his armpit down to the palm of his hand, in such a manner that it wasn't readily visible to others. Like many other building employees, such as Joe R. Molina, Frazier was standing in front of the Depository Building when the president's motorcade passed. When the Commission asked him what he heard, he replied that he thought the shots "come [sic] from down there, you know, where that underpass is."

See also DOUGHERTY, JACK E.; RANDLE, LINNIE MAE.
Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Frazier, Robert

A ballistics and firearms expert employed by the FBI, Frazier testified before the Warren Commission that he examined Commission Exhibit #399, more commonly known as the magic bullet, at the FBI labs. He said the bullet was "clean" of any traces of blood or tissue and that its weight loss, which he placed at three grains, could be attributed to the manufacturing process. If this is true, it means the bullet would have had to pass through both Kennedy and John Connally, doing extensive damage to the bone in Connally's wrist, without being damaged itself. When pressed about the possibility that the bullet did wound both men, Frazier said it was "possible but I don't say that it probably occurred." Frazier also testified that the bullet holes in Kennedy's suit jacket and shirt were five and three-eighths and five and three-quarters inches below the collar. This contradicts the Warren Report, which places the wound at the base of the president's neck.

See also THROAT WOUND CONTROVERSY.

Best Evidence; Warren Commission Report

Book of Facts: Freeman, H. R.

H. R. Freeman was a Dallas motorcycle police officer.
See WINDSHIELD DAMAGE.

Book of Facts: Friends of Democratic Cuba

An anti-Castro Cuban organization.

See SEWALL, FRED.

Book of Facts: Fritz, Will

Dallas police captain Fritz interrogated Lee Harvey Oswald after his arrest. Fritz was allegedly one of the police officers who first identified the rifle found in the Texas School Book Depository Building as a Mauser, not the Mannlicher-Carcano the Warren Commission concluded was the weapon that killed Kennedy. He reportedly made contradictory claims regarding whether prints were found on the rifle.

See also BOONE, EUGENE L.; CRAIG, ROGER D.; MOONEY, LUKE; WADE, HENRY W.; WEITZMAN, SEYMOUR.
High Treason; Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts; Galloway, Dr. Calvin

Admiral Galloway was commanding officer of the National Naval Medical Center at Bethesda when the president's body arrived, and he attended the autopsy. News reports suggested that he drove the ambulance supposedly containing the president's remains from the front entrance of Bethesda Naval Hospital around to the rear, where the coffin was unloaded, an activity he later denied, although he admitted being in the ambulance. According to confidential reports, Galloway later called each military person present during the autopsy into his office individually and requested a signed statement acknowledging that they would not discuss what they had seen during the autopsy under penalty of a court-martial. Galloway was never subpoenaed to testify before the Warren Commission.

See also AMBULANCE CONTROVERSY; BODY BAG CONTROVERSY; CASKET TEAM.

Best Evidence

Book of Facts: Gannaway, W. P.

Captain Gannaway was commanding officer of the Dallas Police Department's Special Service Bureau. When questions arose about the swiftness with which the police broadcast a description of Lee Harvey Oswald as a suspect in the president's shooting, Gannaway reportedly said matters were facilitated by a roll call of Texas School Book Depository Building employees that determined that only Oswald was missing. Author Mark Lane challenged this explanation, pointing out that the police broadcast was made at 12:45 P.M., while many building employees who had been outside the building when the shots were fired at 12:30 still remained outside, unable to reenter because police officers had sealed off all the entrances.

See also REVILL, JACK.

Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Garner, Darrell Wayne

Garner was the boyfriend of Betty Mooney MacDonald and the suspect - later released - in the attempted murder of Warren Reynolds, who was a witness to the murder of Dallas Police Officer J. D. Tippit.

Book of Facts: Garner, Dorothy Ann

An employee in the Texas School Book Depository Building, Garner told police that she was on the fourth floor of the building when the shooting took place, and that she thought the shots came from "a point to the west of the building," which would place the shooter in the area of the Grassy Knoll.

Crossfire; Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Garrison, Jim

Garrison, the New Orleans district attorney, conducted his own investigation of the assassination based on evidence that Lee Harvey Oswald had lived in New Orleans and had contacts with numerous individuals whom Garrison considered highly motivated to kill President Kennedy. In 1967, Garrison indicted businessman Clay Shaw on charges that he participated in a conspiracy to murder the president. Although unable to produce convincing evidence for the court, Garrison alleged that Shaw was a Central Intelligence Agency operative and that the assassination had been a CIA plot. On March 1, 1969, Shaw was acquitted. Several jurors later stated that Garrison did persuade them that the assassination was the result of a conspiracy, although he failed to prove that Shaw was a party to it.

Garrison has written two books, A Heritage of Stone (Putnam, 1970) and On the Trail of the Assassins (Warner, 1991). He was the leading character in Oliver Stone's film JFK.

Plausible Denial

Book of Facts: Gaudet, William George

An employee of the CIA for twenty years, Gaudet allegedly obtained a tourist card to visit Mexico at the same time as Lee Harvey Oswald. These cards were issued by the Mexican consulate in New Orleans in September 1963. According to records, Oswald was issued card number 824085, and Gaudet card number 824084. Gaudet reportedly first admitted, then denied knowing Oswald, and denied that he had ever traveled to Mexico with Oswald, although he doesn't recall why he obtained the tourist card.

See also MEXICO CITY.

Conspiracy

Book of Facts: Gaudreau, Richard E.

An Air Force sergeant, Gaudreau was a member of the Military District of Washington, D.C., Casket Team that handled President Kennedy's coffin at Bethesda Naval Hospital. Researcher David S. Lifton reports that Gaudreau and his wife, Barbara, substantiate the story of the confusion over which of two Navy ambulances at the scene actually contained the coffin with the president's body in it.

See also AMBULANCE CONTROVERSY; BIRD, SAMUEL R.; CHEEK, TIMOTHY.
Best Evidence

Book of Facts: Gedney, John Forrester

Gedney is said to be one of three hoboes Dallas police picked up for questioning near the scene shortly after the shooting. Initially charged with vagrancy, all three were later released. There has been confusion about their identities, what they were doing in the railroad yard behind the Grassy Knoll, and why they were released so quickly.

High Treason 2

Book of Facts: Giancana, Sam

Giancana (real name, Momo Salvatore Guingano) was a Chicago Mafia boss involved in CIA plots to kill Fidel Castro. He was also the target of attacks by Attorney General Robert F. Kennedy, despite the fact that the president had been having an affair with Giancana's paramour, Judith Exner. Robert Kennedy ordered the FBI to make life difficult for Giancana, which it did by shadowing his every move so closely that other mob figures kept their distance from him, effectively isolating him from business and social associates. In desperation, Giancana went to court and obtained an injunction against the FBI.

In 1975, Giancana was murdered just as the Senate Intelligence Committee was preparing to question him about his role in the CIA-Mafia plots to kill Castro. He was shot once in the back of the head and six times around the mouth in an obviously clear statement as to why he was killed. The fact that Giancana was killed with a .22-caliber pistol rather than the larger-caliber guns preferred by professional hitmen led some observers to suspect he was murdered by a killer within the intelligence community.

See also MARCELLO, CARLOS; ROSELLI, JOHNNY; TRAFFICANTE, SANTOS; ZR/RIFLE.
Conspiracy; Crossfire

Book of Facts: Giesecke, Dr. Adolph

Dr. Giesecke was an anesthesiology professor at Southwestern Medical School in Dallas and part of the team that worked on the mortally wounded president at Parkland Memorial Hospital. When assassination researcher Harrison Edward Livingstone described the head wound as a large blowout in the back of the head, Giesecke agreed that that was the wound he saw. This differs from the description of the wound in the report of the autopsy conducted at Bethesda Naval Hospital. When asked by the Warren Commission if he had seen another wound or a bullet hole below the large wound in the back of the head, Giesecke replied he had not. Dr. Giesecke did say that he thought he saw a wound in the president's left temple, as did Dr. Marion Jenkins of Parkland Memorial Hospital, and Norman Similas, a witness at the scene of the shooting.

See also HEAD WOUND CONTROVERSY; TEMPLE WOUND CONTROVERSY.
High Treason; Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Goldberg, Alfred_

___ A staff member of the Warren Commission and, with Norman Redlich, one of the main authors of the Warren Report, Goldberg attempted to get the FBI to investigate the forty-minute time lag between the shooting and the discovery of the so-called sniper's nest and the rifle on the sixth floor of the Texas School Book Depository Building. According to David S. Lifton Goldberg wrote two letters to J. Edgar Hoover urging him to look into the matter, but Hoover declined.

Best Evidence

Book of Facts: Golz, Earl

A Dallas Morning News reporter, Golz has been a tenacious searcher of the truth about the assassination and instrumental in discovering important evidence. In 1978, he located a man who at the time of the shooting had been serving a three-day sentence at the Dallas County Jail on Dealey Plaza. The man claimed that he and several other prisoners saw two dark-complexioned men at the sixth-floor window of the Texas School Book Depository Building adjusting the sight of a rifle. That same year, Golz was one of two researchers who uncovered the existence of the Bronson film, which many believe shows movement in two windows of the building's sixth floor.

Reasonable Doubt

Book of Facts: Gonzalez, Henry

A Democratic congressman from San Antonio, Texas, Gonzalez rode in the presidential motorcade when Kennedy was killed and later served as chairman of the House Select Committee on Assassinations. Gonzalez resigned from the Committee in a dispute with Chief Counsel Richard A. Sprague over control of the Committee's investigative machinery. Gonzalez later charged that the Committee was a "put-up job," and that it was "never intended to work."

High Treason

Book of Facts: Grant, Eva

Eva Grant was Jack Ruby's sister. Grant had an on-and-off relationship with Ruby that would occasionally result in long periods during which they did not speak to each other. She testified to the Warren Commission about Ruby's family life, his reaction to the Kennedy assassination, and the ad placed in the Dallas Morning News by the American Fact-Finding Committee.
Ruby Cover-up

Book of Facts: Grassy Knoll

After the Texas School Book Depository Building, the Grassy Knoll is the most widely known location identified with the assassination. Dozens of witnesses, including civilians, police officers, and people riding in the presidential motorcade, testified that at least some of the shots fired at the president came from the knoll. Situated to the south and west of the Book Depository, the knoll rises up from Elm Street toward the railroad yards behind it. Near the crest is a wooden stockade fence that many witnesses believe served as a cover for the person or persons who shot the president.

According to author John H. Davis, two days before the assassination, two Dallas police officers on routine patrol saw a group of men standing behind the fence engaged in what appeared to be mock target practice. The men sped off in a nearby car before the officers could question them.

See also SMOKE FROM THE GRASSY KNOLL.

Mafia Kingfish

Book of Facts: Grassy Knoll Witnesses

At the time of the shooting, dozens of people were scattered across the face of the Grassy Knoll. Of those who witnessed the assassination from the knoll and were called to testify, virtually all claim the shots fired at President Kennedy came from somewhere behind them. Grassy Knoll witnesses include Gordon Arnold; Lee Bowers; Mr. and Mrs. John Chism; Emmett J. Hudson; Mary E. Woodward; and Abraham Zapruder (see ZAPRUDER FILM).

Book of Facts: Graves, L. C.

Dallas police detective Graves walked on Lee Harvey Oswald's left while escorting the prisoner through the basement garage at Dallas Police Headquarters, where Jack Ruby shot and killed him. Graves told the Warren Commission he was surprised that the reporters and television cameras were allowed so close to the prisoner, since he was under the impression that tight security arrangements had been made. He claimed that Police Chief Jesse E. Curry had said "the newsmen were well back in the garage." Graves also admitted that he was unaware that both the Dallas police and the FBI had received telephoned threats to Oswald's life prior to escorting him to the garage.

See also LEAVELLE, JAMES R.; MONTGOMERY, L. D.

Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Greer, William

Secret Service agent Greer was driving the presidential limousine when Kennedy was shot. Some critics charge that when the first shot was fired, instead of immediately speeding off, he slowed the car almost to a stop, turned to look at the president, and pulled away only after the fatal shot had struck Kennedy in the head. Greer also drove the ambulance carrying the president's official coffin from Andrews Air Force Base to Bethesda Naval Hospital. Greer was one of two Secret Service agents present at the autopsy who described the alleged neck wound as a shoulder wound.

See also KELLERMAN, ROY; SHANEYFELT, LYNDAL.
Best Evidence; High Treason

Book of Facts: Gregory, Dr. Charles

An orthopedic surgeon, Dr. Gregory operated on Governor John Connally's wrist. The Warren Report concludes that the wrist wound was caused by the magic bullet, which supposedly first passed through the president's body, then Connally's body, then his wrist. Dr. Gregory said the bullet "behaved as though it never struck anything except him." Dr. Gregory also testified that he removed two metal fragments from Connally's wrist and that another remained lodged in the governor's chest. The magic bullet had virtually no weight loss, which raises the question of where these fragments came from, and further suggests the possibility that another bullet, unaccounted for by the Commission, could have been fired by a second gunman.

High Treason; Reasonable Doubt

Book of Facts: Griffin, Burt W.

Griffin served as assistant counsel to the Warren Commission. When he questioned Dallas police sergeant Patrick T. Dean about his testimony that Jack Ruby claimed he had entered the Police Headquarters garage by simply walking down the Main Street entrance ramp, Griffin lost his temper and called Dean "a damned liar."

See also VAUGHN, ROY.

Best Evidence; Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Grinnan, Joseph P.

___ Known locally as an independent oil operator and an area coordinator for the John Birch Society, Grinnan took part in preparing an anti-Kennedy newspaper advertisement that appeared in the Dallas Morning News the day the president arrived in Dallas and was assassinated.

See also AMERICAN FACT-FINDING COMMITTEE; WEISSMAN, BERNARD.
Warren Report

Book of Facts: Groden, Robert J.

A photographic expert, Groden created an enhanced version of the Zapruder film, which was broadcast on a late-night television program on March 6, 1976, and became instrumental in reopening the assassination investigation in 1976 by the newly formed House Select Committee on Assassinations. After examining the autopsy photos, Groden told the Committee that four of the photographs showed evidence of forgery. The Committee rejected this claim. Groden is the co-author of JFK: The Case for Conspiracy, published by Manor Books in 1967, and, with Harrison Edward Livingstone, of High Treason, published by Berkley in 1990.
Best Evidence; High Treason

Book of Facts: Groody, Paul

Groody was the director of the Miller Funeral Home in Dallas, where Lee Harvey Oswald's body was embalmed. According to David S. Lifton, Groody told him that during the predawn hours of November 25, 1963, several FBI agents demanded time alone with Oswald's body and took prints of the dead man's fingers and palms. Groody said they left "black gook" on Oswald's hands, which he subsequently removed.

See also MOSELEY, JACK; PALMPRINT ON RIFLE.

Best Evidence

Book of Facts: Grossman, Dr. Robert

A neurosurgeon at Parkland Memorial Hospital, Grossman was never called to testify by either the Warren Commission or the House Select Committee on Assassinations. He reportedly told a reporter from the Boston Globe that he saw a large hole in the back of the president's head that was too large for a bullet entry wound.

See also HEAD WOUND CONTROVERSY.

High Treason

Book of Facts: Guinn, Dr. Vincent

A nuclear chemist consulted by the Warren Commission, Dr. Guinn examined fragments collected from the wounds that allegedly came from the magic bullet. His findings indicated that they were, in fact, part of that bullet. The House Select Committee on Assassinations later asked him to reexamine this material, but Guinn discovered that the fragments sent to him from the National Archives were not the same weight of those listed in the National Archives records. In addition, other fragments originally considered as evidence in this case vanished completely.

*See also NATIONAL ARCHIVES, DOCUMENTS MISSING FROM
Best Evidence; High Treason*

Book of Facts: Hall, Loran

Loran Hall was an activist in anti-Castro circles.
See ODIO INCIDENT.

Book of Facts: Harbison, Charles

Charles Harbison, a Texas highway patrolman, was assigned to guard Governor John Connally's hospital room. Harbison reportedly claimed that someone, possibly a doctor, gave him more than three bullet fragments that had been removed from Connally's body. He allegedly turned them over to an FBI agent.

See also BELL, AUDREY; BORING, FLOYD; GREGORY, DR. CHARLES; MAGIC BULLET.
Conspiracy

Book of Facts: Hardie, Julius

Julius Hardie, a Dallas resident, gave an interview that was published in the August 27, 1978, issue of the Dallas Morning News in which he claimed that on the morning of the assassination, he saw three men on the overpass bordering Dealey Plaza. Two of the men carried long guns, either rifles or shotguns, he couldn't be sure which. No record can be found of the report Hardie said he filed with the FBI directly following the assassination.

Reasonable Doubt

Book of Facts: Hargis, Bobby

This Dallas motorcycle patrolman was riding on the left side of the presidential limousine, just a few feet from Mrs. Kennedy, when the shots were fired. The shot that hit the president's head blew portions of his skull and brain matter against Hargis, who testified to the Warren Commission that the material hit him in the face so hard that at first he thought he had been shot. When he realized what had happened, Hargis stopped his motorcycle and, leaving it running, dismounted and ran in the direction of the wooden fence atop the Grassy Knoll, where he thought the shots had come from. When he reached the fence, he looked around and was surprised to find nothing. Evidently thinking the gunman had escaped across the railroad tracks, he remounted his motorcycle and sped under the overpass, where once again he found nothing suspicious. Later, Hargis said he thought the shooting had come from behind the president's limousine, a perception that explains neither his immediate response to the shooting nor the direction from which the material from the president's head flew when it hit him in the face.

See also BREHM, CHARLES; MARTIN, B. J.
Crossfire; Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Harkness, D.V.

Dallas police sergeant Harkness testified to the Warren Commission that after the shooting, he ran to the rear of the Texas School Book Depository Building toward the railroad yard. Behind the building, he encountered a group of men who identified themselves as Secret Service agents. The Secret Service denies that any of its agents were posted in the area of Dealey Plaza when the motorcade passed through; they were all said to be in vehicles in the motorcade. Harkness' report of encountering Secret Service agents where none were supposed to be is just one among many such reports. Harkness was also the officer who searched the boxcars that were about to depart the railyard behind the Grassy Knoll and discovered and arrested the three hoboes whose identities, presence near the assassination scene, and premature release by the Dallas police have aroused such controversy.

See also HILL, JEAN; SMITH, L. C.; SECRET SERVICE AGENTS, UNKNOWN.
On the Trail of the Assassins

Book of Facts: Harper Bone Fragment

On the evening of Saturday, November 23, 1963, the day after the assassination, a college student named William Allen Harper found a piece of bone in the grassy area to the left of Elm Street, opposite the Grassy Knoll. He took it to his uncle, Jack Harper, a doctor at Methodist Hospital in Dallas, who gave it to the hospital's chief pathologist, Dr. A. B. Cairns. Cairns - and, reportedly, other doctors - identified it as a piece of bone from the rear of a human skull. (Yet others who have seen the fragment have been less certain.) The bone was turned over to FBI agent James Anderton, who, at the instruction of assistant FBI director Alan Belmont, forwarded it to the FBI lab in Washington despite a Secret Service request that it be sent to the White House. According to some investigators, the difficulty of matching the fragment to a precise location in President Kennedy's skull indicates that the head wound was altered.

See also Angel, Dr. Lawrence; HEAD WOUND CONTROVERSY.

Best Evidence

Book of Facts: Harrelson, Charles_

___ On September 1, 1980, reputed Mafia hitman Charles Harrelson was arrested for the ambush killing of U.S. district court judge John H. Wood, Jr., of San Antonio, Texas. During the six hours he held off Texas law officers, Harrelson reportedly admitted not only killing Wood but also participating in the assassination of President Kennedy. Indicted along with Harrelson in Judge Wood's murder was Joe Marcello, brother of New Orleans Mafia boss Carlos Marcello. During interviews with several reporters and assassination researchers, Harrelson, who is in federal prison in Texarkana, has played coy about his involvement in the Kennedy assassination. Several researchers, including Fort Worth graphics expert Jack White, are convinced that Harrelson was one of the three hoboes arrested near the scene of the shooting and then quickly released following the assassination.

Crossfire: Mafia Kingfish

Book of Facts: Hartman, Wayne and Edna

Interviewed in 1986 by author Jim Marrs, the Hartmans claim that immediately after the shooting, they ran to the grassy area on the south side of Elm Street, opposite the Grassy Knoll. A police officer told them shots had been fired at the president from the area across the street, pointing to the Grassy Knoll. Then Edna saw two parallel mounds on the ground and asked if they were from moles. The officer is said to have responded, "Oh no, ma'am, that's where the bullets struck the ground." The Hartmans contacted the FBI and told their story, emphasizing that the two mounds pointed toward the Grassy Knoll. Marrs claims that the FBI reports the Hartmans as saying the mounds pointed toward the Texas School Book Depository Building.

See also Foster, J. W.

Crossfire

Book of Facts: Hathaway, Philip B.

A few minutes before noon on November 22, 1963, Hathaway and a coworker, John Lawrence, were walking toward Main Street, hoping to find a good spot from which to watch the presidential motorcade, when Hathaway spotted a man carrying a cloth-and-leather rifle case that seemed to be packed with a long gun. He described the man, whom he took to be a Secret Service agent, as approximately six feet five inches tall, thick in the chest, and weighing more than 250 pounds. Hathaway said the mysterious rifleman appeared to be in his early thirties, had dirty-blond crew-cut hair, and was wearing a gray business suit. Lawrence also saw the man, but, because of the press of the crowd, he failed to see the rifle case.

See also OWENS, ERNEST JAY.

Crossfire

Book of Facts: Haygood, Clyde A.

Haygood, a Dallas police motorcycle officer, was still on Main Street at the tail end of the motorcade when he heard the shooting. He immediately raced his motorcycle to the corner of Houston Street, turned right and then left on Elm. Upon seeing numerous police officers and civilians running up the Grassy Knoll, he parked his motorcycle and followed, but found nothing suspicious. After speaking to a man he believed was a railroad detective, Haygood returned to his motorcycle. He was then approached by James T. Tague, a witness whose testimony contributed to the formulation of the single bullet theory. Tague told Haygood he was standing on the curb separating Main and Commerce streets, directly opposite the Grassy Knoll, when a piece of concrete flew up from the curb and hit his face, causing a small cut that was still bleeding. Deputy Sheriff Eddy Walthers then accompanied Tague to the spot where he had been standing to look for bullet marks. Haygood was also approached by an unidentified man who told him the first shot had been fired from the Texas School Book Depository Building. Haygood immediately radioed this information to the police dispatcher. Other police officers were also directed to the Depository Building by an unknown witness.

See also BREWER, E. D.; HARGIS, BOBBY W.

Best Evidence: Crossfire

Book of Facts: Head Wound Controversy

When the president was examined at Parkland Memorial Hospital in Dallas, his head wound was described as located at the rear of the skull. Dr. Charles Carrico estimated the size of the wound at 2 to 2 3/4 inches across. During the autopsy at Bethesda Naval Hospital, Dr. Thornton Boswell prepared a drawing of the skull showing the wound reaching much higher across the top, with measurements noted at 3.9 by 6.7 inches. In addition, three individuals at Parkland reported seeing a bullet wound in the president's left temple: Father Oscar Huber, Dr. Marion Jenkins, and Dr. Robert N. McClelland. McClelland mentioned this left temple wound as the cause of death in his hospital report. The conflicting descriptions of the head wound have led some researchers to believe that the wound was altered between Parkland and Bethesda in order to cover up the real direction from which the fatal shot came. They believe that conspirators may have changed the wound's placement and enlarged it to make it plausible that both the bullet's entry and exit occurred toward the rear of the head, rather than that the bullet entered the front of the head or the right side (i.e., the side toward the Grassy Knoll).

See also AUTOPSY CONTROVERSY; TEMPLE WOUND CONTROVERSY; THROAT WOUND CONTROVERSY.
Best Evidence

Book of Facts: Heindel, John R.

Heindel said he had known Lee Harvey Oswald while both were in the Marines, and that many of his Marine buddies called him by the nickname "Hidell." This may be the source of one of Oswald's known aliases.

See also ALIASES USED BY OSWALD.

Conspiracy; Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Helms, Richard

Helms served in the Central Intelligence Agency as deputy director in charge of covert operations, including assassinations (1962-1965), and as director (1966-1973). He was convicted of lying to a Senate committee. Helms was the CIA liaison with the Warren Commission and has come under heavy fire from many assassination researchers who charge that he did everything within his power to hinder the investigation. When asked by the House Select Committee on Assassinations why the CIA did not interview Lee Harvey Oswald when he returned to the United States after having defected to the Soviet Union, Helms replied that "military officers" were under the jurisdiction of Defense Department intelligence agencies. Oswald, however, was never an officer in the Marines. The widespread belief that Oswald was employed by the CIA is supported in part by an FBI memorandum turned up by the Assassinations Committee. The memo states, "We did not know definitely whether or not he had any intelligence assignments at that time."

High Treason; Plausible Denial; Reasonable Doubt

Book of Facts: Hemming, Gerry Patrick

A former CIA agent who had once worked with supporters of Fidel Castro before the success of Castro's revolution in Cuba, Hemming later joined in support of anti-Castro forces. According to defense testimony provided by Marita Lorenz during the libel suit brought by E. Howard Hunt against Spotlight magazine, Hemming was one of a group of men assigned to kill President Kennedy. Lorenz's testimony also fingered Hunt and Frank Sturgis as being other members of this assassination squad. Hemming is also alleged to have been Lee Harvey Oswald's sergeant during the time Oswald was stationed in Japan at Atsugi Air Base.

Hemming is alleged to have told Anthony Summers, author of Conspiracy, that he met Oswald outside the Cuban consulate in Los Angeles in January 1959. Summers reports that Hemming claimed that Oswald was attempting to gain access to representatives of Castro's government and that he suspected Oswald was working for either an American intelligence or law enforcement agency.

Conspiracy

Book of Facts: Henschcliffe, Margret

Henschcliffe, a nurse with extensive experience in dealing with bullet wounds, was in the emergency room at Parkland Memorial Hospital when the president was brought in following the shooting. She described the hole in Kennedy's throat as the size of the tip of her little finger and identified it as "an entrance bullet hole." When asked by Warren Commission assistant counsel Arlen Specter if it could have been a bullet exit wound, she said she had never seen an exit wound "that looked like that."

See also PARKLAND MEMORIAL HOSPITAL STAFF; TRACHEOTOMY.

Best Evidence; High Treason

Book of Facts: Henderson, Ruby

Ruby Henderson reports that a few minutes before the president's motorcade arrived in Dealey Plaza, she saw two men at an upper-floor window of the Texas School Book Depository Building. She thought one man might have been a Mexican because his skin was dark in color.

See also DARK-COMPLEXIONED MAN (OR MEN); EUINS, AMOS L.; POWELL, JOHN; ROWLAND, ARNOLD; WALTHER, CAROLYN.

Conspiracy

Book of Facts: Hess, Jacqueline

Jacqueline Hess was in charge of the "mysterious deaths project" of the House Select Committee on Assassinations. She developed a list of twenty-one people connected in some way to the assassination and its aftermath who died under mysterious circumstances.

High Treason

Book of Facts: Hickey, George

Secret Service agent Hickey was riding in the car directly behind the president's limousine when the shots were fired. In some photos taken at the time, Hickey can be seen standing on the car's running board or sitting atop the rear deck. Bonar Menninger, the author of a book titled Mortal Error: The Shot That Killed JFK (St. Martin's, 1992), which is based on the work of ballistics expert Howard Donahue, charges that Hickey accidentally fired the fatal shot that struck Kennedy's head. Although Hickey never answered the book's publisher's requests to respond to Mortal Error's allegations, Secret Service agent Samuel Kinney denied that Hickey had fired a shot.

Mortal Error

Book of Facts: Hicks, Jim

Hicks is suspected by some assassination researchers of holding open a radio-transmitting microphone during the assassination in an attempt to disrupt police communications so as to give the assassins time to escape. Hicks' fate is difficult to establish. A CIA photo taken of a man in Mexico City that is supposed to be Lee Harvey Oswald is said by researchers Robert J. Groden and Harrison Edward Livingstone to strongly resemble Hicks.

High Treason

Book of Facts: Hidell, Alek James

Alek James Hidell (also "A. Hidell") was one of the aliases used by Oswald.

Book of Facts: Hill, Clinton

A Secret Service agent, Hill is familiar from films as well as photographs taken during the assassination that show him rushing toward the presidential limousine after the first shot, mounting the rear step plate on the bumper, and pushing Mrs. Kennedy off the rear deck, where she had crawled in pursuit of a skull fragment, and back into the relatively safer passenger seat. Hill later testified that he saw that a portion of Kennedy's head had been blown away and lay on the rear seat. Many experts say that this fatal injury is more consistent with a gunshot to the front of the head, not to the rear as the Warren Commission concluded. Hill testified to the Commission that the wound in the president's back was six inches below the neckline, and that "a portion of [his] head on the right rear side was missing."

See also HEAD WOUND CONTROVERSY; THROAT WOUND CONTROVERSY.

Best Evidence

Book of Facts: Hill, Gerald

Dallas police sergeant Hill was one of the officers who arrested Lee Harvey Oswald for shooting Police Officer J. D. Tippit. He told an NBC television interviewer that Oswald refused to identify himself. Hill said he was identified by items inside his billfold. The arresting officers radioed to the dispatcher that they had arrested "one Lee Harvey Oswald." This immediate identification of the suspect as Oswald has led many to question the allegation that at the time of his arrest, Oswald carried identification naming himself as A. Hidell, the name that links him with the rifle allegedly found in the Texas School Book Depository Building. No mention of an identification card with the name Hidell on it was made by Hill or other officers involved in the arrest of Oswald.

See also BENTLEY, PAUL.

Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Hill, Jean

Jean Hill is famous as the "lady in red" because she wore a red coat the day of the assassination and is clearly visible in many photographs of the event. Hill and her friend Mary Moorman were in Dealey Plaza to see a motorcycle police officer whom Hill wanted to date. They were standing across the street from the Grassy Knoll when the motorcade turned onto Elm Street. Hill stepped forward and called to the president, hoping he would look her way so Moorman could take his picture with her Polaroid camera. As Hill called out the president's name, she heard gunshots, then saw Kennedy fall back as the fatal bullet struck his head. Hill claims that at least some of the shots she heard came from the Grassy Knoll area, and even recalls seeing a man up there with what appeared to be a gun. After the president's limousine pulled away, Hill raced to the Grassy Knoll and looked around. She was then grabbed by several men, who walked her to the sheriff's office and questioned her about shots hitting the ground where she had been standing. She said that she knew nothing about any such shots but that she had seen a gunman on the Grassy Knoll. Hill also claims to have seen a man whom she was later able to identify as Jack Ruby in the Dealey Plaza area both before and after the shooting. She co-authored, with Bill Sloan, a book titled JFK: The Last Dissenting Witness, published by Pelican in 1992.

See also DEALEY PLAZA WITNESSES.

Best Evidence; Crossfire

Book of Facts: Hoboes Three

Minutes after the fatal shots were fired at President Kennedy, Dallas police officers discovered three tramps inside a railroad freight car attached to a train waiting to leave the railyard behind the Grassy Knoll and the Texas School Book Depository Building. Photos taken by press photographers on the scene show the three being taken in for questioning.

Over the years, various researchers have attempted to identify these men and link them to the assassination. Among those who have been alleged to have been disguised as these hoboes are E. Howard Hunt, Frank Sturgis, and Charles Harrelson, but there has been no proof of these allegations. In early 1992, the television program "A Current Affair" claimed to have found the original arrest records for the three men, identifying them as Gus W. Abrams, Harold Doyle, and John Forrester Gedney and saying that they were unconnected to the assassination.

High Treason 2

Book of Facts: Hobson, Mrs. Alvin

Building, Mrs. Hobson was on the fourth floor when the shooting took place. She told the FBI she did not think the shots came from her building.

See also TEXAS SCHOOL BOOK DEPOSITORY BUILDING EMPLOYEES.

Best Evidence

Book of Facts: Hoffa Jimmy

James R. Hoffa was the national Teamsters Union president. He reportedly had close ties to Richard M. Nixon and contributed large amounts of Teamsters money to Nixon's presidential race against John Kennedy. Hoffa hated the Kennedys, especially Robert, who targeted many of Hoffa's Mafia friends and reportedly voiced threats against them more than once. Hoffa vanished in July 1972 and has never been found. On January 14, 1992, the New York Post published an interview with Frank Ragano, who claimed to be Hoffa's attorney, in which Ragano said that in early 1963 he delivered a message from Hoffa to Mafia bosses Carlos Marcello and Santos Trafficante that they had to kill President Kennedy. "This has to be done," Ragano quoted Hoffa as saying.

See also KENNEDY, ROBERT F.; MCCLELLAN COMMITTEE.

High Treason

Book of Facts: Hoffman, Ed

A deaf-mute since birth, Hoffman was among the crowd standing along the Stemmons Freeway waiting for the presidential motorcade to exit Dealey Plaza. Deciding he wanted a better view of the president, Hoffman was making his way toward the plaza when he saw a man running behind the wooden fence at the top of the Grassy Knoll. The man, dressed in a dark business suit, was clutching a rifle, which he threw to another man, who dismantled it and put it inside a tool bag. The men went off in different directions. Hoffman, not having heard the shots because of his deafness, wondered what was going on until the presidential limousine sped past him and he glimpsed the president's bloody body in the back seat. Perhaps because of his inability to speak, he was unable to get any police officers on the scene to communicate with him. Several attempts over the years to tell his story to the FBI met with no interest, and his own family advised him to stay out of it. Finally, in 1985, assassination researcher Jim Marrs discovered Hoffman's story.

Crossfire

Book of Facts: Holland, Sam

A railroad supervisor, Holland was working on the overpass when he stopped to watch the presidential motorcade. He stated that the shots came from his left, and when he looked that way, he saw a puff of smoke rise behind the wooden fence atop the Grassy Knoll. Along with other railroad workers, including James Simmons, he ran to the spot and found it empty. On the ground, impressed in the damp earth, were hundreds of footprints that looked as if they had been made by someone (or perhaps more than one person) who was there a long time, pacing back and forth.

See also JOHNSON, CLEMMON; MILLER, AUSTIN; REILLY, FRANK; SMOKE FROM THE GRASSY KNOLL.

Reasonable Doubt

Book of Facts: Holmes, Harry D.

Holmes was the postal inspector for the Dallas Post Office in 1963. He testified that Oswald had rented a postal box but that it had been closed on May 14, 1963. He said postal regulations require that when a box is closed, the portion of the box application that lists names of persons other than the applicant who are authorized to receive mail at the box be destroyed. This meant he could not tell the Warren Commission whether A. Hidell, the name used to order the alleged assassination weapon, was authorized to receive mail at the box to which the rifle was sent. Holmes was wrong. Postal regulations require that the entire application remain on file for two years after a box is closed. The New York Times of November 30, 1963, quotes Holmes as saying that no one other than Oswald was authorized to receive mail at the box he had rented. If this was true, why was mail addressed to A. Hidell put in Oswald's postal box?

See also ALIASES USED BY OSWALD; POST OFFICE BOX 2915.
Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Hoover, J. Edgar

Hoover has come under fire from assassination researchers because he consistently supported the idea that Lee Harvey Oswald was the sole assassin and that he was not part of a larger conspiracy. Few assassination researchers have implicated Hoover or the Federal Bureau of Investigation in President Kennedy's assassination. One exception is Texas attorney Mark North, who wrote a book on the subject, Act of Treason: The Role of J. Edgar Hoover in the Assassination of President Kennedy, published in 1992 by Carroll & Graf.

High Treason

Book of Facts: Hosty, James

Hosty was an FBI agent in the Bureau's Dallas office. During the weeks prior to the assassination, he made several routine visits to the home of Ruth Paine, where Marina Oswald was living with her children. He said he wanted to speak with Lee Harvey Oswald, and asked how he could get in touch with him. He was given the address of the Texas School Book Depository Building, where Lee worked. When Oswald learned of the visits, he slipped into a dark mood and sought out Hosty at the FBI office. Upon learning that Hosty was not in, Oswald left a note for him in which he told the agent to stop bothering his wife or he would report the visits to "the proper authorities." Hosty thought little of the note and left it in his work tray. Soon after Oswald was murdered, Hosty claims his superior, Special Agent-in-Charge L. Gordon Shanklin of the Dallas office, ordered him to destroy the note, which he did. Although Shanklin denies this, few believe him. Hosty was later disciplined, perhaps for talking too much about Oswald.

Conspiracy; Plausible Denial

Book of Facts: House Select Committee on Assassinations

The Committee was established in 1976 to look into the assassinations of President Kennedy and civil rights leader Martin Luther King, Jr. From the beginning, the Committee was hampered by the fact that most of its appointed members were young congressmen who had little power on Capitol Hill. An effort to include investigations of the murder of Robert F. Kennedy and the attempted murder of Alabama governor George Wallace was rejected.

The Committee went through a series of changes and turmoil among its members and staff, but in the end actually accomplished more than the Warren Commission had done in seeking the truth. The Committee concluded that there was a conspiracy to kill the president. It placed the blame on organized crime, a favorite target of its second chief counsel, G. Robert Blakey (who replaced Richard Sprague). Many believe Blakey had ties too close to the CIA to permit an objective investigation of that agency's potential involvement in the assassination. The Committee concluded that four shots were fired at the president, not the three the Warren Commission claimed. At least one Committee member, Congressman Christopher Dodd, said he believed the evidence indicated that three gunmen fired at the president.

Many assassination researchers criticize the Committee's work. Its report, issued in January 1979, differed from the Warren Commission's findings. Without a doubt it left much undone, but it did take a small step toward finding the truth. Critics of both the Warren Commission and the House Select Committee wonder whether it is possible for a body representing the federal government to conduct an impartial investigation of an assassination in which agencies of that government appear to have played a role.

See also ACOUSTICAL EVIDENCE; GONZALEZ, HENRY.
High Treason

Book of Facts: Huber, Oscar

A Catholic priest from nearby Holy Trinity Church in Dallas, Father Huber administered the last rites to President Kennedy in the Parkland Memorial Hospital emergency room. He has been quoted as saying that he saw a "terrible wound" over Kennedy's left eye. See also JENKINS, DR. MARION; MCCLELLAND, DR. ROBERT N.; SHAW, DR. ROBERT; TEMPLE WOUND CONTROVERSY.
Best Evidence

Book of Facts: Hudkins, Lonnie

As early as January 1964, rumors surfaced that Lee Harvey Oswald had been connected in some way to a U.S. government intelligence agency. Lonnie Hudkins was the author of an article published in the Houston Post on New Year's Day containing information that Oswald had been an informant for the FBI. When confronted with this, the Warren Commission discussed the question of what to do about the allegations, but ultimately made no genuine effort to uncover the truth.

Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Hudson, Emmett J.

A member of the crew that maintained the grounds at Dealey Plaza, Hudson was seated on the steps leading to the top of the Grassy Knoll when the president was shot. He told a Warren Commission attorney that the shots came "from above and behind" him, which clearly indicates the wooden picket fence at the top of the knoll. Jim Marrs' reading of his testimony led Marrs to the conclusion that the Commission attorney who questioned Hudson swayed him from identifying the knoll as the source of the shots and led him to respond in the affirmative when asked if he thought they came from the Texas School Book Depository Building.
Crossfire

Book of Facts: Hughes, Robert

Hughes was standing at the southwest corner of Houston and Elm streets filming the motorcade as it turned from Houston onto Elm. His filming included scanning the front of the Texas School Book Depository Building. Several photographic experts who viewed the film believe it shows two people at the sixth-floor windows of the building as the motorcade passed. The Warren Commission asked the FBI to examine the film. The FBI report stated that the image some believed were two men was "probably a stack of boxes." The Warren Commission, evidently seeking to bolster its lone assassin theory, changed the word "probably" to a much more definitive "determined . . . to be the shadow from the cartons near the window." The Hughes film remains one of the more controversial pieces of evidence in the assassination investigation.

*See also BRONSON FILM; SELZER, ROBERT.
Rush to Judgment*

Description of the Film

It was nearly 12:30 on November 22, 1963 when Hughes heard the wave of shouting and applause ripple toward him down Main Street. As the pilot car driven by Police Chief Jesse Curry turned the corner, Hughes began filming. The motorcade turns onto Houston Street approximately 30 seconds before the fatal shots. Jacqueline Kennedy's left hand rises to steady her pillbox hat. The Record Building appears, then the Dal-Tex Building and finally the front of the Texas School Book Depository. As the Presidential limousine and the Secret Service follow-up car completed their turns onto Elm Street, Hughes stopped his camera. "About five seconds after I quit taking pictures," he later recalled, "we heard the shots." After the shots, Hughes filmed the scene. The crowd surges toward the grassy knoll.

Moments before the shots, the sixth floor window of the Depository is visible as the Presidential limousine passes below. Movement can be observed in the window. Apparently, the movement is of the gunman turning and raising his rifle into firing position.

Book of Facts: Humes, Dr. James J.

U.S. Navy pathologist Commander Humes conducted the autopsy on the president's body at Bethesda Naval Hospital. Humes has come under fire from every critic of the Warren Report. He admits burning the first draft of his autopsy report, which many consider highly unethical and indicative of serious differences between the original findings and certain vital points in the final report. Humes is the only doctor present at the autopsy who claims to have seen a bullet entry wound in the rear of the president's head.

See also AUTOPSY CONTROVERSY; HEAD WOUND CONTROVERSY; LUNDBERG, DR. GEORGE.
Best Evidence

Book of Facts: Hunt; E. Howard

A CIA agent, E. Howard Hunt gained national notoriety in 1973 for his role in the infamous Watergate scandal that ultimately brought down Richard M Nixon's presidency. In a 1985 libel trial that was virtually ignored by the media, Hunt sued the publication Spotlight over an article it published implicating him in the Kennedy assassination. The jury found for Spotlight, and the jury foreperson, Leslie Armstrong, offered the opinion that the evidence had convinced her that the CIA had killed Kennedy and that Hunt had played a role in the conspiracy. The trial was the centerpiece of defense attorney Mark Lane's 1991 best-seller, Plausible Denial, published by Thunder's Mouth Press.

Hunt was the agent in charge of the CIA station in Mexico City in September 1963, when Lee Harvey Oswald allegedly visited the Soviet and Cuban embassies there, ostensibly to arrange for his return to the Soviet Union.

Plausible Denial

Book of Facts: Hunt, H. L.

At the time of the assassination, H. L. Hunt was reputed to be the richest man in America, perhaps the world. He appeared to have close ties to both the FBI and the CIA, and was a strong supporter of right-wing causes. His son Nelson Bunker Hunt is said to have partially underwritten the cost of an anti-Kennedy newspaper advertisement that appeared in the Dallas Morning News the day of the assassination. Hunt's oil profits were said to be threatened by Kennedy's announced plans to end the oil depletion allowance. A note written by Lee Harvey Oswald addressed to "Mr. Hunt" has raised speculation as to whether it was intended for the oil tycoon, one of his sons, or the CIA agent E. Howard Hunt.

See also AMERICAN FACT-FINDING COMMITTEE.
High Treason; Texas Connection

Book of Facts: Hunt, Dr. Jackie

Dr. Hunt was in the emergency room at Parkland Memorial Hospital when the president was brought in after the shooting. She never saw the back of Kennedy's head because he was lying on his back while she looked at him. She stood directly over him. She rejected the veracity of the photograph from the autopsy showing a wound reaching across the top of the president's head because she said she would have seen that from where she stood. The wound described to her by doctors who had seen it was in the rear of the head only.

High Treason

Book of Facts: Hunt, Nelson Bunker

Son of H. L. Hunt, Nelson was one of a small group of people who paid to place a full-page anti-Kennedy advertisement in the Dallas Morning News the day of the assassination.

See also AMERICAN FACT-FINDING COMMITTEE.

Texas Connection

Book of Facts: Hutton, Patricia

Nurse Patricia Hutton (married name, Gustafson) was one of the first Parkland Memorial Hospital staff members to reach President Kennedy when his limousine arrived there. She attempted unsuccessfully to place a compress on the head wound. She described the wound as the size of a fist and at the back of the head, an account that does not agree with the autopsy report.

High Treason

Book of Facts: Ingram, Hiram

A deputy sheriff in Dallas, Ingram was a close friend of Deputy Sheriff Roger D. Craig's. Researchers Robert J. Groden and Harrison Edward Livingstone allege that Ingram died under mysterious circumstances following a fall that broke his hip and report that Ingram claimed he knew there had been a conspiracy to kill the president.

High Treason

Book of Facts: Irving Sports Shop

Located on Irving Boulevard in Irving, Texas, a Dallas suburb, the Irving Sports Shop was brought into the investigation when, at 6:30 P.M. on Sunday, November 24, 1963, an anonymous male caller told an FBI agent in the Bureau's Dallas office that Lee Harvey Oswald had had a rifle sighted, or prepared for the mounting of a sight, at the shop. Similar calls were received by the Dallas police and a local television station.

Acting on this information, FBI agents visited the shop the next day and found a repair tag indicating that a rifle had been sighted for a customer named "Oswald." The man who did the work, Dial D. Ryder, claimed he never worked on an Italian-manufactured rifle similar to the one allegedly found in the Texas School Book Depository Building. Further, the ticket indicated that three holes were drilled in the rifle to mount the sight, while the rifle alleged to be Oswald's required only two holes for the mount. Speculation has escalated that an impersonator using Oswald's name had a rifle sighted at the shop, then later tipped off the FBI and police to lead them to this "evidence" against Oswald.

Conspiracy; Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Itek Corporation

Itek is a company that processes and analyzes photographs and films. In 1966, United Press International was asked to examine a film of the assassination made by Orville Nix, who recorded the events from a section of Dealey Plaza facing the Grassy Knoll. Some investigators claim that the film, which shows the Grassy Knoll in the background at the moment Kennedy was shot, reveals light flashes and the image of a gunman. Scientists at Itek, who were consulted by UPI, concluded that the image was actually the shadow of a tree. Itek, through contractual agreements, has links to the CIA and other government agencies.

Crossfire

Book of Facts: Jacks, Hurchel

Texas state highway patrolman Jacks drove Vice President Lyndon B. Johnson's car in the motorcade and raced to the hospital behind Kennedy's limousine. Jacks claimed to have gotten a good look at the president's head wound before a Secret Service agent covered Kennedy's head with a jacket. In a state police report dated November 28, 1963, Jacks claimed it appeared to him that a bullet had hit Kennedy "above the right ear or near the temple." He also said the Secret Service assigned him to prevent anyone from taking pictures of the presidential limousine while it was parked outside Parkland Memorial Hospital.

See also NEWMAN FAMILY; SITZMAN, MARILYN.

Best Evidence; High Treason

Book of Facts: Jackson, Robert

A photographer for the Dallas Times-Herald, Jackson is reported to have claimed that immediately after the shots were fired, he saw a rifle barrel disappear into a window on an upper floor of the Texas School Book Depository Building. In an unusual departure from scientific method, the surgeon in charge of Kennedy's autopsy at Bethesda Naval Hospital, Dr. James J. Humes, referred to Jackson's report in his autopsy report (autopsy reports generally do not include such non-medical information).

Best Evidence

Book of Facts: Jagers Chiles Stovall

This Dallas graphic arts company did top-secret work for the military, including processing photographs taken by the U-2 spy planes that regularly flew surveillance missions over Soviet territory. Lee Harvey Oswald worked at this company for six months following his return from the Soviet Union. It has been alleged that the job was arranged by Oswald's friend George DeMohrenschildt, a CIA informant. When Oswald was arrested following the shooting of J. D. Tippit, he was said to be carrying a Dallas Public Library card that included his employer's name, Jagers-Chiles-Stovall, and the name Jack L. Bowen.

See also BOWEN, JOHN "JACK."

Conspiracy

Book of Facts: Jarman, James Jr.

An employee in the Texas School Book Depository Building, James Jarman, Jr., was one of three black men whom several people on the street below said they saw at the fifth-floor windows (directly below the so-called sniper's nest) either immediately before or during the shooting. When asked by Warren Commission member Gerald Ford where he thought the shots came from, Jarman answered, "from below," not from above.

See also CARTER, WILLIAM N.; NORMAN, HAROLD D.; WILLIAMS, BONNIE RAY.
Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Jaworski, Leon

Jaworski, who later gained national celebrity as the special prosecutor appointed by Richard M. Nixon in the Watergate scandal, was asked by the Warren Commission to investigate rumors that Lee Harvey Oswald had ties to either the Federal Bureau of investigation or the Central Intelligence Agency. Jaworski reported that his investigation had uncovered no such relationships.

High Treason

Book of Facts: Jenkins, James Curtis

James Curtis Jenkins was one of two technicians (the other was Paul K. O'Connor) who removed Kennedy's body from its coffin before the autopsy at Bethesda Naval Hospital. Jenkins has said that the official autopsy report does not describe what he saw. He reports that he was in the room during the entire procedure and recalls seeing damage to the president's head near his right ear, leading him to believe there might be a bullet entry wound in that location. According to some reports, he also claimed that the president's head was wrapped in towels when the body was removed from the coffin in which it had arrived. The nurses at Parkland Memorial Hospital claim no towels were placed inside the coffin before it was closed and taken away. The discrepancies between descriptions of the body, its wrapping, and the coffin when they left Parkland and when they arrived at Bethesda have led some investigators to conclude that the president's body was tampered with during the trip from Dallas to Washington or while the body lay in wait at Bethesda for the autopsy to be performed.

See also AMBULANCE CONTROVERSY; AUTOPSY CONTROVERSY; BODY BAG CONTROVERSY; X-RAY CONTROVERSY.

Best Evidence; High Treason 2

Book of Facts: Jenkins, Dr. Marion

Like the reactions and observations of many of the other doctors who worked on President Kennedy at Parkland Memorial Hospital, those of Dr. Jenkins immediately following the experience are of vital importance to anyone desiring the truth about Kennedy's wounds. Jenkins, an anesthesiologist, is reported as saying that while he was checking for the president's pulse, he felt the wound on Kennedy's left temple. This is probably the same wound that Father Oscar Huber alluded to.

See also HEAD WOUND CONTROVERSY; MCCLELLAND, DR. ROBERT N.; TEMPLE WOUND CONTROVERSY.
High Treason

Book of Facts: "JFK"

Directed by Oliver Stone, and starring Kevin Costner as New Orleans District Attorney Jim Garrison, this film was released in 1991. Even before it was completed, the film and its director came under heavy and intense attack by the establishment press. In a manner that mixes fact and fiction, the film follows the investigation of Garrison through the end of the trial of Clay Shaw. It is based on Garrison's book On the Trail of the Assassins (Warner, 1991), and on Jim Marrs' book, Crossfire: The Plot That Killed Kennedy (Carroll & Graf, 1989), as well as on other, uncredited sources.

Book of Facts: Johnsen, Richard_

Secret Service agent Johnsen was given a bullet allegedly found on a stretcher at Parkland Memorial Hospital by Darrel C. Tomlinson. This was at approximately 2:00 P.M. on the day of the assassination. Johnsen returned to Washington aboard Air Force One with the president's body and entourage. At 7:30 P.M., he turned the bullet over to Secret Service chief James J. Rowley, who sent it to the FBI laboratory. This became the famous magic bullet that allegedly wounded both Kennedy and Governor John Connally. Its origin is still a clouded issue. Best Evidence

Book of Facts: Johnson, Clemmon

A railroad worker, Johnson watched the presidential limousine make its way through Dealey Plaza from the railroad overpass directly in front of and above the motorcade. He reported seeing white smoke from the area of the Grassy Knoll just after the shots were fired.

See also HOLLAND, SAM; MILLER, AUSTIN; REILLY, FRANK; SIMMONS, JAMES.

Best Evidence

Book of Facts: Johnson, Lady Bird

Wife of Vice President Lyndon B. Johnson, Lady Bird (Claudia Alta Taylor Johnson) rode with her husband in the motorcade. At Parkland Memorial Hospital, she attempted to console Mrs. Kennedy while doctors worked to save the president's life. Mrs. Johnson witnessed her husband's swearing in as president aboard Air Force One, and returned with him to Washington.

Death of a President

Book of Facts: Johnson, Lyndon B.

Some assassination researchers identify Vice President Johnson as the man with the most to gain by Kennedy's death. He knew he was in jeopardy of being dumped from the Democratic party ticket by the president and reportedly had a strong personal hatred for Kennedy because he had beaten Johnson badly in the contest for the 1960 Democratic presidential nomination. According to Madeline Brown, a woman alleged to be Johnson's mistress at the time of the assassination, Johnson knew about the plot to kill Kennedy before it happened. Craig I. Zirbel's best-selling 1991 book, The Texas Connection: The Assassination of President John F. Kennedy, is devoted exclusively to the supposition "that Vice President Lyndon B. Johnson was involved" in the conspiracy to kill President Kennedy. During his years in the White House, Johnson is variously reported to have voiced the opinion that responsibility for the assassination belonged to Castro, the Central Intelligence Agency, or supporters of South Vietnam president Ngo Dinh Diem, who had been murdered three weeks earlier at what many believed were the orders of President Kennedy.

See also VIETNAM WAR.

Best Evidence; Conspiracy; High Treason

Book of Facts: Johnson, Priscilla

A journalist who interviewed Lee Harvey Oswald when he was in the Soviet Union in 1959, Johnson became Marina Oswald's biographer after the assassination. Johnson's relationship with Marina Oswald came to wide attention because she was with Marina when the latter discovered the bus ticket stubs that contributed to the belief, now in disrepute, that Oswald had traveled to Mexico City for meetings at the Soviet and/or Cuban embassies there. Johnson's husband, George McMillan, later wrote a book about the assassination of Martin Luther King, Jr. (The Making of an Assassin: The Life of James Earl Ray, Little, Brown, 1976), that Mark Lane asserts contains fabricated information fed to McMillan by the FBI.

Plausible Denial

Book of Facts: Jones, Milton R.

Sixteen-year-old Milton Jones was a passenger on a Dallas bus just after the time of the assassination on November 22, 1963. The Warren Commission reported that when Lee Harvey Oswald left the Texas School Book Depository Building, he boarded a westbound bus on Elm Street, asked the driver, Cecil J. McWatters, for a transfer, and got off a few blocks later. Investigators identified the driver based on a bus transfer allegedly found in Oswald's pocket when he was arrested. McWatters was asked about the passenger. He said a man did board his bus at Elm and Murphy streets, and when McWatters told him the president had been shot, the man smiled. This remark led to headlines about "The Smiling Assassin." McWatters later identified Oswald in a lineup as resembling a passenger on his bus, but not the man who asked for the transfer. The following day, when Milton Jones boarded McWatters's bus, the driver recognized him as the passenger who had asked for the transfer and had smiled at the news that Kennedy had been shot.

Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Jones, Robert

In 1963, Army Lieutenant Colonel Jones was the operations officer for the 112th Military Intelligence Group headquartered near San Antonio, Texas. It was not widely known at the time that military intelligence agents were on duty in Dallas the day of the assassination. Jones testified that when he heard news of the assassination, he contacted his agents in Dallas for information and was told that an A. J. Hidell had been arrested. Cross-checking military intelligence files, he identified the name Hidell as an alias used by Lee Harvey Oswald. He called the Dallas FBI office with this information and spoke to Agent-in-Charge L. Gordon Shanklin, who has been accused of giving the order to destroy a note written to one of his agents by Oswald. When investigators for the House Select Committee on Assassinations asked to see the files Jones referred to, they were told the files had been destroyed five years earlier as a matter of "routine."

*See also ALIASES USED BY OSWALD; Hosty, James.
Conspiracy*

Book of Facts: Jones, Dr. Ronald

A senior surgical resident at Parkland Memorial Hospital, Dr. Jones was among the first doctors to see Kennedy when he was brought into the emergency room. He testified that the wound in the president's throat was an entry wound, not an exit wound. If correct, this means Kennedy was shot from the front. Dr. Jones described the wound as "very small and relatively clean-cut as you would see in a bullet that is entering rather than exiting from a patient." Jones has been described as having worked on more than one hundred victims of gunshot wounds in the five years preceding President Kennedy's assassination.

See also THROAT WOUND CONTROVERSY;

TRACHEOTOMY.

Best Evidence; High Treason 2

Book of Facts: Kantor, Seth

The author of The Ruby Cover-up (Zebra Books, 2nd printing, 1992; originally titled Who Was Jack Ruby?), Kantor is a rarity among assassination writers because he was in the motorcade that day and was present later at Parkland Memorial Hospital while the president's body was still there. Formerly a reporter for the Dallas Times-Herald, Kantor had known Jack Ruby well as a source of information. He told the Warren Commission that he saw Ruby in Parkland Memorial Hospital just minutes before the announcement of the president's death. Kantor claims he not only saw Ruby but spoke briefly with him about what had happened. Ruby denied this, and the Commission chose to discount Kantor's testimony. Kantor was also on the scene when Ruby shot Lee Harvey Oswald.

See also RUBY AT PARKLAND; TICE, WILMA.
Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Karamessines, Tom

An assistant to CIA director Richard Helms, Karamessines allegedly wrote a memorandum in 1966 expressing concern that the presence of CIA man E. Howard Hunt in Dallas the day of the assassination would become known. Hunt denied rumors about this. He even filed suit against Michael L. Canfield and Alan J. Weberman, the authors of the book Coup d'Etat in America, who claimed Hunt was one of the hoboes who were detained by the Dallas police after the shooting.

High Treason

Book of Facts: Kellerman, Roy

Secret Service agent Kellerman rode in the front passenger seat of the presidential limousine as it crawled through Dealey Plaza at a pace much slower than the forty-four miles per hour Secret Service regulations required. Kellerman remained with the president at Parkland Memorial Hospital and was present during the autopsy at Bethesda Naval Hospital. He reportedly described the wound caused by the magic bullet, which supposedly entered the lower portion of Kennedy's neck, as "the hole that was in his shoulder."

Best Evidence

Book of Facts: Kennedy, Jacqueline Bouvier

President John F. Kennedy's attractive wife, "Jackie," as she is affectionately called by the press and the public, rode in the limousine seated next to her husband when he was shot. An extremely popular First Lady, she enjoyed a personal popularity that some say even eclipsed that of her husband. A sorrowing nation shared her bereavement, and the world admired her stately dignity during the president's funeral. Mother of John Kennedy, Jr., and Caroline Kennedy, she later married Greek shipping tycoon Aristotle Onassis and became an editor for the Doubleday Company.

Book of Facts: Kennedy, John F.

Thirty-fifth president of the United States, Kennedy was the first Roman Catholic and the youngest man to hold that office. He was also the fourth president to be murdered in office. The second son of a wealthy Boston family, John distinguished himself in the U.S. Navy in World War II aboard PT boats operating in the Pacific theater. Elected to the Senate as a conservative Democrat in 1952, he married Jacqueline Bouvier the following year. In 1957 he won a Pulitzer Prize for biography for his book Profiles in Courage. Defeated by the more liberal Adlai Stevenson forces in his bid for his party's vice-presidential nomination in 1956, he captured the presidential nomination in 1960 and went on to beat Vice President Richard M. Nixon in the general election by the closest margin in history.

Kennedy's administration was rocked by the failed invasion of Cuba by U.S.-supported Cuban exiles in 1961, known to history as the Bay of Pigs fiasco. A high point was the confrontation with the Soviet Union over the shipment of missiles to Cuba in 1962, in which Kennedy faced down Soviet dictator Nikita Khrushchev. When he was assassinated, Kennedy was on a tour of major Texas cities to win votes for his reelection campaign the following year among Texas Democrats, who had lost enthusiasm for his administration. Kennedy died at 1:00 P.M. central standard time on November 22, 1963, of a gunshot wound that caused massive damage to his head. He was pronounced dead at Parkland Memorial Hospital in Dallas, Texas, by Dr. Kemp Clark. His death was announced by Malcolm Kilduff.

Book of Facts: Kennedy, Regis

An FBI agent, Regis Kennedy allegedly confiscated a film of the assassination that later disappeared without, as far as is known, ever being viewed.

See also OLIVER, BETTY.

High Treason

Book of Facts: Kennedy, Robert F.

Younger brother of John, Robert Kennedy served as his attorney general and stayed on as Lyndon B. Johnson's attorney general until 1964. Robert made powerful enemies among the leaders of gangster organizations with his crusade to drive them out of business. Robert Kennedy was in Washington, D.C., on the day of the assassination; he met Air Force One as it arrived at Andrews Air Force Base that evening and accompanied Mrs. Kennedy in the ambulance to Bethesda Naval Hospital. Elected to the Senate from New York in 1965, he was assassinated on June 5, 1968, just after his victory in the California primary in his race for the Democratic presidential nomination.

Book of Facts: Kilduff, Malcolm

Assistant press secretary to President Kennedy, Kilduff was filling in for Press Secretary Pierre Salinger during Kennedy's trip to Texas. Kilduff had the task of announcing to the press and the nation that the president was dead. Kilduff said that when the shots were fired, he looked directly up at the Texas School Book Depository Building because that was the location from which he believed they had come.

High Treason 2

Book of Facts: Kilgallen, Dorothy

A nationally known syndicated newspaper columnist and panelist on the celebrated television program "What's My Line?," Kilgallen covered Jack Ruby's trial, interviewed Ruby, and traveled to both Dallas and New Orleans in quest of the truth about the Kennedy assassination. It was reliably reported that in November 1965 the columnist claimed she was going to blow the Kennedy assassination story "wide open." Within a week, she was found dead under what the New York City medical examiner called "circumstances undetermined." Her death was ultimately termed a suicide, although no real evidence supported this finding.

High Treason

Book of Facts: Kinney, Samuel

Secret Service agent Kinney was driving the "Queen Mary," the Secret Service follow-up car that was directly behind the presidential limousine. Kinney reportedly said he saw one shot hit the "right side of the head." In late 1991, Kinney wrote to St. Martin's Press, publisher of Bonar Menninger's 1992 book Mortal Error: The Shot That Killed JFK, in defense of Secret Service agent George Hickey, who the book claims accidentally fired the shot that hit Kennedy's head, the fatal shot. Hickey himself did not answer the publisher's request for a response to the book's allegations.

Best Evidence; Mortal Error

Book of Facts: Kirkwood, Pat

Kirkwood was the owner of a Fort Worth nightclub, The Cellar, reportedly visited by Secret Service agents the night before the assassination. Their drinking lasted until the early morning hours of the day the president was murdered. The consumption of alcohol while on assignment was in direct violation of Secret Service rules, yet no action was taken against these men.

High Treason

Book of Facts: Klein's Sporting Goods

A Chicago-based mail-order company, Klein's was asked by the FBI to check its files for an order from a person named Hidell after a coupon from one of the firm's ads in American Rifleman was discovered among Lee Harvey Oswald's possessions. Klein's reported that it had shipped a Mannlicher-Carcano rifle with the serial number C2766 to a customer named A. Hidell, at post office box 2915 in Dallas, Texas. The post office box was one rented by Oswald. The fact that Oswald chose to order the weapon through the mail, which required giving the seller a name and address for shipping purposes, instead of purchasing one from any of over a dozen stores in Dallas that carried the same rifle and required no identification, has prompted Warren Commission critics to question why such a paper trail leading directly to the alleged assassin was created.

High Treason; Reasonable Doubt

Book of Facts: Kostikov, Valeriy Vladimirovich

Kostikov was allegedly a KGB agent stationed in Mexico City in the early 1960s. Reportedly, one of his responsibilities was to initiate or approve assassination plans in the Western Hemisphere. The CIA provided the Warren Commission with evidence in the form of photos and tape-recorded phone conversations that Lee Harvey Oswald was one of Kostikov's agents. The implication was that Oswald killed Kennedy on the orders of the Soviet intelligence organization. Critics see the CIA's role in supplying this evidence as a way of covering its own part in the assassination.

Plausible Denial

Book of Facts: Kounas, Dolores A.

Dolores Kounas was employed by the McGraw-Hill book publishing company, which maintained offices on the third floor of the Texas School Book Depository Building. She testified that she was standing on Elm Street across from the building when the presidential motorcade passed. She said she did not look up at the building when the shots were fired at Kennedy because it was her impression that they had come from a location to the west of her position, somewhere near the overpass, which is in the general direction of the Grassy Knoll.

See also DEALEY PLAZA WITNESSES; GRASSY KNOLL WITNESSES.

Crossfire; Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Kramer, Monica

Monica Kramer was an American tourist who visited the Soviet Union during 1961 and met Lee Harvey Oswald there twice.

See also NAMAN, RITA.

Book of Facts: Kuzmuk, Walter

An officer of the Central Intelligence Agency, Kuzmuk testified on behalf of E. Howard Hunt in the latter's suit against the publication Spotlight, which published an article accusing Hunt of being in Dallas on November 22, 1963, and having a connection to the assassination. Kuzmuk claimed he lived near Hunt in the Washington suburbs and drove to work with him almost every day, and that his office was two doors away from Hunt's office. He said that on November 22, he saw Hunt drive past him as he left a Washington restaurant at the time the president was being shot in Dallas. Kuzmuk was unable to testify about Hunt's whereabouts during the last two weeks of November, but he did recall this chance sighting in Washington on that particular day.

Plausible Denial

Book of Facts: Landis, Paul

Secret Service agent Landis was riding in the car directly behind Kennedy's limousine when the shots were fired. He reported that his reaction to the shot that hit the president's head was that it was fired "from somewhere toward the front, right-hand side of the road."

Conspiracy; Crossfire

Book of Facts: Lane, Mark

Attorney Lane was a critic of the Warren Report even before it was published. He has spent almost thirty years pursuing the truth behind the assassination. His works on the subject include books, screenplays, and documentary films. His two most important books are Rush to Judgment (1966; reissued, 1992), a detailed critique of the Warren Commission's methods and findings, and Plausible Denial (1991), in which he asserts that the CIA was responsible for the assassination of John F. Kennedy. Both books are now published by Thunder's Mouth Press.

Lane represented Lee Harvey Oswald's mother, Marguerite Oswald, before the Warren Commission and attempted, unsuccessfully, to represent the interests of the dead Oswald. He complained that although the Commission had set up panels to investigate why Oswald had killed Kennedy, it did not assign anyone to investigate whether it was Oswald who actually shot him.

Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Lanz, Pedro Diaz

Lanz was a Cuban pilot who, according to Marita Lorenz, was among a group of men who transported arms to Dallas shortly before the assassination. She also claims she saw Lanz and several others looking over a street map of Dallas before the trip.

See also STURGIS, FRANK.

High Treason; Plausible Denial

Book of Facts: Latona, Sebastian Francis

Latona was a fingerprint expert who in 1963 had been employed by the FBI for thirty-two years. On November 23, 1963, he examined the Mannlicher-Carcano rifle that was sent to Washington, allegedly the assassination weapon. He reported that he was unable to find any prints on the rifle that were of any value in identifying the person who had used it. After the rifle was returned to Dallas, a palmpoint belonging to Lee Harvey Oswald was discovered on it by the Dallas police, a story that was accepted as true by the Warren Commission.

See also Day, J. Carl; DRAIN, VINCENT.

Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Lattimer, Dr. John

Dr. Lattimer was the first physician permitted to examine what were alleged to be the autopsy photographs and X rays of President Kennedy's skull. This was done at the National Archives in January 1972. Lattimer told a New York Times reporter that what he saw validated the findings of the Warren Commission. Lattimer was not a pathologist but a urologist (a specialist in the urinary system) and therefore a rather odd choice for the honor he was given. Lattimer's statements concerning the head wounds bothered many doctors, including Dr. Cyril H. Wecht, who at the time was the president of the American Academy of Forensic Sciences. Wecht called Lattimer "unbelievably unqualified" in the area of forensic pathology, and described him as "a guy who never moves above the belly button."

See also HEAD WOUND CONTROVERSY.
Best Evidence; High Treason 2

Book of Facts: Lawrence, Jack

Lawrence was employed by the Downtown Lincoln-Mercury dealership in Dallas, where Lee Harvey Oswald allegedly shopped for a car and went for a test drive. Lawrence's job began one month before the assassination, and ended the day following Kennedy's murder. The night before the president was killed, he borrowed a dealership car to drive home and did not report to work on time the next day. He stumbled into work thirty minutes after the shooting, pale, sweating, and with mud on his clothes. He ran into the men's room, where he vomited. When other dealership employees found the car in the parking lot behind the Grassy Knoll next to the Texas School Book Depository Building, they called the police. Lawrence was arrested and held for twenty-four hours, then released. It is alleged that Lawrence gave his employer fictitious references when he was hired.

High Treason

Book of Facts: Lawrence, Perdue

Dallas police captain Perdue Lawrence told the House Select Committee on Assassinations that the Secret Service altered his motorcycle escort pattern for the president's limousine. Lawrence claimed he wanted four motorcycles on each side and slightly to the rear of the car, but Secret Service agent Winston Lawson declared that that was too many and reduced the number to two on each side.

High Treason

Book of Facts: Lawson, Winston

Lawson was the Secret Service agent in charge of planning security for the president's trip to Dallas. In addition to Dallas police captain Perdue Lawrence's charge that Lawson changed the motorcycle escort, it was also alleged that Lawson prevented the Dallas police from putting a police car in the motorcade. Lawson denied that he had removed the car, claiming he "could not recall" who took the car out of the motorcade. The House Select Committee on Assassinations found the security precautions for the Dallas visit "uniquely insecure."

High Treason

Book of Facts: Leavelle, James R.

Dallas police detective Leavelle was one of the two men handcuffed to Lee Harvey Oswald when he was shot by Jack Ruby. It is reported that Leavelle objected to taking Oswald through the basement garage, which was the announced route to the police car he would ride in to the county jail. Leavelle suggested that a safer route was straight out the first floor of the building, which would have permitted Oswald and his guards to avoid the press and others who had gathered in the building's basement. His suggestion was ignored.

See also GRAVES, L. C.; MONTGOMERY, L. D.

Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Leemans, Fred

Fred Leemans was interviewed in June 1967 on the NBC television network broadcast of a "White Paper" program called "The Case of Jim Garrison". The show appeared to many to be an attempt to discredit New Orleans District Attorney Jim Garrison, who had brought charges against Clay Shaw for his alleged participation in a conspiracy to kill President Kennedy. Leemans, whom Garrison later identified as the proprietor of a "Turkish bath" in New Orleans, told a nationwide audience that the district attorney's office had offered him $2,500 to testify that Shaw had visited his Turkish bath in the company of Lee Harvey Oswald. Leemans said he decided not to testify because it would have been immoral. According to Garrison, the grand jury hearing evidence about the charges against Shaw decided Leemans' statements were so outlandish that they did not bother calling him to testify.

On the Trail of the Assassins

Book of Facts: Lester, Dick

According to news reports, Dallas night watchman Dick Lester discovered a bullet near the railroad tracks that pass over Dealey Plaza. A struggle reportedly ensued between the FBI and the House Select Committee on Assassinations over the Bureau's request to remove the assassination bullets from the National Archives to compare them with the bullet Lester found. The Committee forbade National Archives personnel to release the bullets.

See also NATIONAL ARCHIVES, DOCUMENTS MISSING FROM.

High Treason

Book of Facts: Lewis, L. J.

Lewis was an employee of the Reynolds Motor Company in the Oak Cliff section of Dallas. Along with several fellow employees, he witnessed a man running from the scene of Officer J. D. Tippit's murder. Lewis said the man was carrying either a pistol or a revolver, which he was attempting to hide behind his belt. The FBI interviewed Lewis on January 21, 1964. When Lewis read the report of that interview, he discovered factual errors, which he corrected and submitted in an affidavit to the Warren Commission. Lewis could not identify Lee Harvey Oswald as the man he saw running with a gun in his hand, despite the fact that he had obviously gotten a good look at the gun. See also PATTERSON, B. M.; REYNOLDS, WARREN.
Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Liberty Lobby

Liberty Lobby is the right-wing organization that publishes Spotlight magazine.

Book of Facts: Liebler, Wesley J.

An assistant counsel for the Warren Commission and a professor at UCLA Law School, Liebler is a primary character in David S. Lifton's investigation of the assassination, Best Evidence. His association with Lifton evidently helped Liebler change his mind about various aspects of the medical evidence contained in the Warren Report.
Best Evidence

Book of Facts: Lifton, David

David S. Lifton is an assassination researcher and the author of the 1980 best-selling book Best Evidence: Disguise and Deception in the Assassination of John F. Kennedy. Originally published by Macmillan, the book was reissued in 1988 by Carroll & Graf.

Book of Facts: Lipsey, Richard A.

Lipsey was the aide to General Philip C. Wehle. When questioned by researcher David S. Lifton, Lipsey said he was "absolutely" sure that a second, or "decoy," ambulance was used when the president's body was taken from Andrews Air Force Base to Bethesda Naval Hospital for the autopsy. According to Lifton, Lipsey claimed that the ambulance in which Jacqueline Kennedy and Attorney General Robert F. Kennedy rode contained an empty coffin. The president's body, he said, was in another ambulance that rode farther back in the motorcade.

See also AMBULANCE CONTROVERSY.

Best Evidence

Book of Facts: Livingstone, Harrison Edward

The author of four novels, Livingstone is the co-author, with Robert J. Groden, of High Treason: The Assassination of President John F. Kennedy and the New Evidence of Conspiracy (1989; reissued by Berkley Books, 1990). He is also the author of High Treason 2: the Great Cover-up: The Assassination of President John F. Kennedy (Carroll & Graf, 1992). Both books have been best sellers.

Book of Facts: Lone Assassin Theory

The Warren Commission, appointed by President Lyndon B. Johnson, concluded that one man killed President Kennedy. That man was Lee Harvey Oswald. The Commission "found no evidence that either Oswald or Jack Ruby was part of any conspiracy, domestic or foreign, to assassinate President Kennedy." In the years since the Commission's report was published, numerous independent researchers have uncovered connections or alleged connections that link both Oswald and Ruby to the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the Central Intelligence Agency, anti- and pro-Castro Cuban groups, and the Mafia.
See also MAGIC BULLET; SINGLE BULLET THEORY.

Book of Facts: Lopez, Edwin J.

Lopez was an attorney employed by the House Select Committee on Assassinations. He was assigned responsibility for investigating the charges that Lee Harvey Oswald had visited the Cuban and Soviet embassies in Mexico City. The Central Intelligence Agency supplied the Committee with a photograph that it claimed showed Oswald at the Soviet embassy, but Lopez concluded that the man in the photograph was not Oswald. Because all the so-called evidence came from the CIA, that agency has been accused of attempting to manufacture a link between Oswald and a communist country.

High Treason

Book of Facts: Lorenz, Marita

A former mistress of Cuban dictator Fidel Castro, Lorenz was a key witness at the trial that resulted from E. Howard Hunt's suit against the publication Spotlight. The case is the basis for Mark Lane's best-seller, Plausible Denial (Thunder's Mouth Press, 1991). Recruited by the CIA, Lorenz turned on Castro and eventually was employed by a number of American intelligence and police agencies. Lorenz claims she drove to Dallas a few days before the Kennedy assassination with a group of heavily armed men, including several exiled Cuban leaders and Frank Sturgis, a CIA operative. She said that in Dallas, the group met with CIA official E. Howard Hunt, and later, the night before the assassination, with Jack Ruby in a Dallas motel room. Hunt denied he was in Dallas at the time, but the jury ultimately dismissed Hunt's lawsuit against Spotlight.

See also LANZ, PEDRO DIAZ; OPERATION 40.

Plausible Denial

Book of Facts: Lovelady, Billy Nolan

A now-famous photograph taken by James W. Altgens seconds after the first shot was fired shows a man standing in the front entrance of the Texas School Book Depository Building whom many believe looked like Lee Harvey Oswald. Obviously, if it was Oswald, he could not have been on the sixth floor of the building at the same time, shooting at the president. For reasons that appear vague, the Warren Commission identified the man as Billy Nolan Lovelady, a building employee. No one on the Commission had ever seen Lovelady, yet they reached this conclusion. The man in the photo is wearing a white undershirt under a dark, heavy-textured shirt open halfway to the waist. Lovelady told the FBI he was wearing a red-and-white-striped sport shirt the day of the assassination. He also told the FBI he believed the shots came from "that knoll," and he "did not at any time believe the shots had come from the Texas School Book Depository Building."

See also SHELLEY, WILLIAM.

Best Evidence: Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Lundberg, Dr. George

___ Dr. Lundberg is the editor of the Journal of the American Medical Association. During the third week of May 1992, the same week Oliver Stone's film JFK was released on video for home viewing, a major news event was an article published in the AMA journal. The eleven-thousand-word article was based on an interview with Dr. James J. Humes and Dr. Thornton Boswell, both participants in the Kennedy autopsy conducted at Bethesda Naval Hospital. Both Humes and Boswell defended the conclusions reached in the autopsy report and denounced continuing speculation surrounding President Kennedy's assassination. Dr. Lundberg appeared on television network news programs and was a guest on the "Larry King Live" show on CNN to discuss the article. Critics of the autopsy, including noted forensic pathologist Dr. Cyril H. Wecht, were stunned that the comments of the two doctors were treated as revelations, because the article revealed nothing new but simply restated what was in the autopsy report and what the physicians had discussed before the Warren Commission.

On May 29, 1992, the Reuter wire service carried a report in which two men who were present in the autopsy room at Bethesda, technologist Jerrold F. Custer and autopsy photographer Floyd A. Riebe, charged that the autopsy X rays and photographs are forgeries and that the wounds they depict are not the same wounds they saw during the autopsy.

Book of Facts: Mabra, W. W.

Assassination researcher Jim Marrs reports that Mabra, who is identified as a Dallas County bailiff, was standing on the corner of Main and Houston streets when the shooting took place. Mabra is quoted as saying that he saw people run toward the Grassy Knoll, where he thought at first the shots may have originated.

See also DEALEY PLAZA WITNESSES.

Crossfire

Book of Facts: MacDonald, Betty Mooney

Betty MacDonald was the real name of a stripper who had worked at Jack Ruby's nightclub using several stage names and aliases. She provided an alibi for Darrell Wayne Garner, who was briefly accused of the attempted murder of Warren Reynolds, a witness to the shooting of J. D. Tippit. In February 1964, MacDonald was found dead in a Dallas jail cell, where she was being held on a misdemeanor charge.

High Treason

Book of Facts: Mafia

The "Mafia" is the name given to the organized criminal underworld whose members are primarily, but not exclusively, of Italian descent. Three leading Mafia figures have been connected to the assassination of President Kennedy: Sam Giancana, Carlos Marcello, and Santos Trafficante.

The hatred of mob leaders for the Kennedy brothers went back to the 1950s, when John was a member of the McClellan Committee, which investigated links between labor unions and racketeers, and Robert F. Kennedy was the committee's counsel. When John was elected president he appointed his brother attorney general. The new attorney general stepped up the campaign against organized crime. His task force dealing with Mafia leaders and activities caused a serious threat to the mob's financial empire. More than once, death threats against the lives of both Kennedys were made by mob and mob-related figures, including Jimmy Hoffa and Trafficante.

Ironically, many of the mob figures who were targets of federal investigations were also in an alliance with the Central Intelligence Agency during the early 1960s to plot the assassination of Cuban dictator Fidel Castro. The Mafia was smarting from the loss of its lucrative Havana gambling casinos and drug traffic and so had a vested interest in replacing Castro with someone more friendly to its business interests.

See also ALEMAN, JOSÉ; ROSELLI, JOHNNY.
Conspiracy; Mafia Kingfish

Book of Facts: Magic Bullet

The so-called magic bullet, officially known as Commission Exhibit #399, is at the heart of the Warren Commission's finding that Lee Harvey Oswald was the assassin of President Kennedy and that there was no conspiracy to kill the president. This bullet, which was allegedly found on a gurney in Parkland Memorial Hospital after Kennedy's body had left Dallas, supposedly entered Kennedy's back, exited his throat, entered Governor John Connally's back, broke a rib bone, exited his chest, entered his wrist, where it caused severe bone damage, and entered the fatty part of his thigh. The bullet allegedly discovered at Parkland is also called the "pristine bullet" because it was in near-perfect condition. Tests by several government agencies, including the U.S. Army, attempting to duplicate the tissue and bone damage the magic bullet caused to two men have consistently failed to yield a bullet in any condition other than badly mangled and flattened. Critics of the Warren Commission charge that a bullet doing the extensive damage this one allegedly did could not survive in almost perfect condition.

The magic bullet is at the crux of the dispute over whether one or more gunmen took part in the assassination. The so-called single bullet theory appears to have been formulated, despite the reported objections of three Commission members, to satisfy the finding that only three shots were fired and still accommodate testimony that a bystander, James T. Tague, was injured by a bullet that hit the pavement in front of him. To reject the single bullet theory can only result in recognizing that more than one person shot at the president.

See also BELL, AUDREY; BORING, FLOYD; GREGORY, DR. CHARLES; LONE ASSASSIN THEORY; OSBORNE, DR. DAVID; TOMLINSON, DARREL C.

High Treason

Book of Facts: Manchester, William

A noted author, William Manchester was commissioned by the Kennedy family to write an "authorized" history of the assassination. When the manuscript did not turn out as the Kennedys liked, they sued Manchester in an attempt to prevent the book's publication.

See also THE DEATH OF A PRESIDENT.

Book of Facts: Mannlicher-Carcano Rifle

A Mannlicher-Carcano 6.5-caliber Italian-made carbine is alleged to be the rifle that was used to kill the president. Of course, if more than one assassin was firing at Kennedy that day, then this would have been only one of several weapons used in the ambush - if it was used at all. Questions have been raised as to why Lee Harvey Oswald, using the alias A. Hidell, would go through the trouble of ordering a poor-quality rifle through the mail, leaving a paper trail that any law enforcement agency could trace, instead of simply purchasing a more sophisticated model over the counter using an assumed name at any of at least a dozen stores in Dallas. Added to this is the inability of FBI sharpshooters to fire this bolt-action rifle accurately in the time frame Oswald did. Finally, there is strong evidence to indicate that the rifle originally found on the sixth floor of the Texas School Book Depository Building was actually a German-made 7.65-caliber Mauser. Knowledgeable small-arms experts appear unanimous in their assessment of the Mannlicher-Carcano as a "poor" weapon, "crudely made," with "terrible" action. To a layman, such a rifle seems a poor selection for an assassination, where accuracy is vital.

See also ALBA, ADRIAN; AMERICAN RIFLEMAN ADVERTISEMENT; AMMUNITION CLIP; ANDERSON, EUGENE D.; BOONE, EUGENE L.; CRAIG, ROGER D.; FIRING SEQUENCE CONTROVERSY; MOONEY, LUKE; PALMPRINT ON RIFLE; WADE, HENRY W.; WEITZMAN, SEYMOUR.

Book of Facts: Marcello, Carlos

Born in Tunisia of Sicilian parents, Marcello was for decades the reputed head of the Mafia organization in the South. Marcello, who lived in New Orleans, has been linked to the assassination by many researchers because he had become a prime target in Attorney General Robert F. Kennedy's crusade against organized crime. He was hastily - and temporarily - deported from the United States under orders from the attorney general in 1961; for Marcello this was an extremely humiliating episode. He allegedly commented that Robert was the tail to his brother's dog, and the only way to stop the tail was to cut off the dog's head. It has also been reported that he repeatedly voiced death threats against the president.

See also ROSELLI, JOHNNY; TRAFFICANTE, SANTOS.
Conspiracy; Mafia Kingfish

Book of Facts: Marchetti, Victor

A former CIA official, Marchetti resigned in 1969 and became famous when his book The CIA and the Cult of Intelligence was published by Knopf in 1974. In 1978, Spotlight magazine published an article by Marchetti implying that E. Howard Hunt and Frank Sturgis of the Central Intelligence Agency were involved in the Kennedy assassination, and that the Agency was planning to hand them over to the House Select Committee on Assassinations as sacrificial lambs. This was, according to Marchetti, a way of exposing only limited information that would deter congressional and private investigators from looking too hard at the Agency. Because of the article, Hunt filed a lawsuit against Spotlight. The case went to a jury, which found for the publication. The foreperson of the jury, Leslie Armstrong, later told the press that Spotlight's attorney, Mark Lane, had convinced her that the CIA was behind the assassination.

Plausible Denial

Book of Facts: Markham, Helen Louise

Helen Louise Markham was allegedly a witness to the shooting death of Dallas Police Officer J. D. Tippit. The Warren Commission relied heavily on her testimony despite the fact that she appeared habitually to give varying accounts of the incident, even providing a description of the killer that could in no way fit Lee Harvey Oswald. A reading of her testimony before the Commission leads one to ask how the Commission used her statements to conclude that Oswald shot Tippit. The Commission lawyer asked her five times whether she had recognized any of the men in a lineup that took place less than three and a half hours after the shooting - and where she picked out Lee Harvey Oswald as Tippit's killer. Among Markham's more outlandish statements was that she talked to Tippit for a brief time before he died, even though the medical authorities said he died instantly. Other witnesses claim they did not see Markham anywhere near the dead officer in the minutes just after the shooting.

See also TIPPIT MURDER SCENE WITNESSES.

Crossfire: Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Marrs, Jim

A Dallas journalist, Marrs has spent years investigating the assassination, including interviewing hundreds of witnesses and experts. He is the author of Crossfire, The Plot That Killed Kennedy, published in 1990 by Carroll & Graf. This is one of the two books on which Oliver Stone's film JFK is based.

Book of Facts: Martin, B. J.

Martin was one of the two motorcycle officers who rode to the left of the president's limousine in the motorcade. He reported that his uniform, helmet, and windshield were splashed with blood, confirming that Kennedy's skull exploded to the rear and left.

See also HARGIS, BOBBY W.

Best Evidence

Book of Facts: Martin, Jack

Martin was an associate of Guy Banister's in New Orleans. The day of the assassination, Banister, who was known as a heavy drinker, got drunk and pistol-whipped Martin over a reference Martin made to the strange people who had been hanging around Banister's office during the previous summer. After the beating, Martin told police that he thought one of Banister's friends, David Ferrie, had driven to Texas to act as the getaway pilot for Lee Harvey Oswald. He later told New Orleans District Attorney Jim Garrison that he had seen Oswald in Banister's office several times.

On the Trail of the Assassins

Book of Facts: Martin, James H.

While she was being held in Secret Service custody in the months following the assassination, Marina Oswald signed a contract with Martin, who then acted as her business manager and literary agent. Because of the public's perception of her as the hapless wife of an evil assassin (who had also been a cruel husband), Marina received tens of thousands of dollars in donations from people around the country, and, according to Martin's testimony before the Warren Commission, Marina by 1964 had received nearly $135,000 in advances from publishers.

High Treason; Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Mattox Jim

On August 8, 1990, Texas attorney general Jim Mattox announced that he was going to open an investigation of the Kennedy assassination because he had received new evidence from two researchers. Mattox also said his mother had told him that she saw Jack Ruby and Lee Harvey Oswald eating dinner together in a restaurant where she had once worked as a waitress. Mattox was voted out of office, and nothing ever came of this investigation.

High Treason 2

Book of Facts: Mayfield, Douglas

Army Specialist Mayfield was a member of the Casket Team that handled the president's coffin in Washington.

See also AMBULANCE CONTROVERSY; BIRD, SAMUEL R.

Best Evidence

Book of Facts: McCamy, Calvin

McCamy was a photographic expert who was asked by the House Select Committee on Assassinations to examine the autopsy photos of President Kennedy. He told the Committee that it was "extremely unlikely" the photos had been tampered with, or that they showed a body other than the president's.

Best Evidence

Book of Facts: McClellan Committee

This Senate committee, whose official name was the Senate Select Committee on Improper Activities in the Labor or Management Field and which was chaired by Senator John McClellan, was formed in the 1950s to investigate links between unions and organized crime. Senator John F. Kennedy was a committee member, and his brother, Robert F. Kennedy, was its chief counsel. The committee marks the beginning of the war between the Kennedy brothers and union leaders with ties to the underworld, such as Teamsters boss Jimmy Hoffa.

Book of Facts: McClelland, Dr. Robert

Dr. McClelland stood at the head of the table on which President Kennedy was placed when he was brought into Parkland Memorial Hospital. He is quoted as saying that before the doctors had received any information about the location of the person or persons who had shot the president, it was their impression that one bullet had "entered through the front of the neck," coursed up the vertebrae and exited "the rear of the skull." McClelland prepared a hospital report at about 4:45 P.M. the day of the assassination. That report is part of Commission Exhibit #392 in the Warren Report. The second-to-last line of McClelland's report reads, "The cause of death was due to massive head and brain injury from a gunshot wound of the left temple."

See also HUBER, OSCAR; PARKLAND MEMORIAL HOSPITAL STAFF; SHAW, DR. ROBERT.
Best Evidence; Warren Report

Book of Facts: McCloy, John J.

McCloy was chairman of the board of Chase Manhattan Bank before he became an adviser to President Kennedy in 1961. In 1963, President Lyndon B. Johnson appointed McCloy to the Warren Commission. Twice during the Commission's proceedings, McCloy voiced confusion about the evidence presented. On the question of the magic bullet, he is recorded as saying, "This bullet business leaves me confused." When discussing the FBI report of the president's wounds, he said, "It left my mind muddy as to what really did happen."

Best Evidence

Book of Facts: McDonald Nick

Nick McDonald was the Dallas police officer whom Johnny Brewer, a shoe-store manager, supposedly led to Lee Harvey Oswald inside the Texas Theater. McDonald claimed that when he asked Oswald, who was seated near the rear of the Theater, to rise, Oswald punched him in the face and reached for a handgun that was hidden in his waistband. When Oswald was subdued, he allegedly blurted out, "Well, it's all over now."

Conspiracy

Book of Facts: McGuire, Dennis "Peanuts"

An employee of Oneal's Funeral Home, McGuire helped place the president's body inside the coffin at Parkland Memorial Hospital.

See also BODY BAG CONTROVERSY; ONEAL, VERNON; RIKE, AUBREY.

Best Evidence; High Treason 2

Book of Facts: McHugh, Godfrey

Brigadier General McHugh was President Kennedy's Air Force aide. He rode near the back of the motorcade in a car that was still on Main Street when the shooting took place. McHugh stayed in the back cabin of Air Force One, where Kennedy's coffin was, throughout the trip from Dallas to Andrews Air Force Base, and continued to accompany the coffin until it was delivered to Bethesda Naval Hospital.

See also O'BRIEN, LAWRENCE F.; O'DONNELL, KENNETH; POWERS, DAVE.

Best Evidence: Death of a President

Book of Facts: McLain, H. B.

A Dallas police motorcycle officer, McLain was riding about 150 feet behind the presidential limousine as it drove through Dealey Plaza. McLain reportedly admitted that the police radio transmitter mounted on his motorcycle had experienced many problems, and that the microphone sometimes became stuck in the open position. An acoustical examination of the Dallas police dispatch tape that recorded events at the assassination scene led experts to estimate that the open microphone that picked up the sound of the shots was about 154 feet behind the president when the third shot heard on the tape was fired.

See also ACOUSTICAL EVIDENCE.

High Treason

Book of Facts: McNamara, Robert

Secretary of Defense under presidents Kennedy and Johnson, McNamara is regarded by many assassination researchers as an integral part of the military-industrial complex that viewed Kennedy as a barrier to its planned all-out war in Southeast Asia. Within a month of Kennedy's death, McNamara told Lyndon B. Johnson that the United States had to have "major increases" in military personnel in Vietnam.

See also VIETNAM WAR.

High Treason

Book of Facts: McNeil, Cindy

A Houston, Texas, attorney, McNeil examined the autopsy photographs that were allegedly taken of President Kennedy. She reportedly concluded that the subject of the photos is a wax model, not a human body.

High Treason 2

Book of Facts: McVickar, John

McVickar was an official of the American embassy in Moscow when Lee Harvey Oswald arrived there on October 31, 1959, in an unsuccessful attempt to renounce his U.S. citizenship. McVickar told the Warren Commission he thought Oswald's behavior was that of someone who "had been tutored," that he seemed to be "using words he had learned, but did not fully understand," and that it seemed others had "guided him and encouraged him in his actions." While McVickar's observations would appear vital to understanding Oswald's motivation, they were not included in the Warren Report, even though several pages are devoted to the incident.

Conspiracy

Book of Facts: McWatters, Cecil J.

McWatters was a Dallas bus driver who was traced through a bus transfer ticket allegedly found in Lee Harvey Oswald's possession when he was arrested. The Warren Commission reported that Oswald boarded a westbound bus on Elm Street shortly after the assassination, requested a transfer, then got off a few blocks later. When questioned, McWatters said he recalled a young man who boarded his bus and smiled upon being told the president had been shot. This comment led to newspaper headlines about "The Smiling Assassin." Although McWatters identified Oswald during a lineup as one of his passengers, he did not identify him as the smiling young man; he later identified sixteen-year-old Milton R. Jones as the passenger who had smiled on learning of Kennedy's death.

Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: McWillie, Lewis

McWillie was a Dallas gambling associate and close friend of Jack Ruby's who ran the Tropicana nightclub in Havana before Fidel Castro's revolution succeeded. McWillie, who had close ties to Mafia boss Santos Trafficante, was a familiar sight to airport employees in both Dallas and New Orleans as one of Ruby's regular traveling companions. Jack Ruby's relationship with McWillie is just one of several links he had with Mafia bosses who had reasons to kill Kennedy.

Conspiracy

Book of Facts: Meagher, Sylvia

An early critic of the Warren Commission, Meagher indexed by subject the twenty-six volumes of assembled data, testimony, and evidence published by the Commission. This Subject Index to the Warren Commission Report and Hearings and Exhibits was later augmented with an index to the materials collected by the House Select Committee on Assassinations and published by Scarecrow Press in 1980 under the title Master Index to the JFK Assassination Investigation: The Reports and Supporting Volumes of the House Select Committee on Assassinations and the Warren Commission. (Meagher collaborated with Gary Owens on the latter volume.)

In September 1966, Meagher participated in a televised panel discussion of the assassination at the Theater of New Ideas in New York City. Pitting a group of critics against lawyers for the Warren Commission, the discussion was the first direct confrontation between the two sides about the contradictions concerning the autopsy report. Meagher further challenged the Commission in her book Accessories After the Fact (1967), a presentation of the view, which many support, that the Warren Commission deliberately concealed the truth.

Best Evidence

Book of Facts: Mendoza, Dr. Charles

Mendoza was a mysterious Dallas physician to whom George DeMohrenschildt, a CIA informant and friend of Lee Harvey Oswald's, was referred in June 1976, two months after Mendoza registered with the Dallas County Medical Association. In the fall of 1976 DeMohrenschildt, who had extensive and long-standing connections to the intelligence community, completed a manuscript naming FBI and CIA officials who were ostensibly involved in the assassination of President Kennedy. Shortly after he began receiving treatment from Mendoza, a therapy his wife says included intravenous injections of undetermined drugs, DeMohrenschildt began to suffer severe mental problems. He was admitted to Parkland Memorial Hospital and was administered electroshock therapy; he quickly deteriorated emotionally, and apparently ended his own life with a shotgun blast. Mendoza departed Dallas in December 1976, almost immediately after DeMohrenschildt was hospitalized. He left only a false forwarding address. According to researcher Jim Marrs, DeMohrenschildt's wife, Jeanne, believed her husband was programmed to take his own life on command through mind control and behavior modification techniques administered by Mendoza.

Crossfire; High Treason

Book of Facts: Mercer, Julia Ann

On November 22, 1963, Julia Ann Mercer signed an affidavit for the Dallas Sheriff's Department describing in detail an incident she witnessed in Dealey Plaza early in the morning of the day President Kennedy was assassinated. Driving west on Elm Street, Mercer encountered an illegally parked green Ford pickup truck with Texas tags. The truck was half on the curb, blocking her lane. As she waited for traffic in the lane to her left to clear so she could drive around the truck, she observed a "white male who appeared to be in his late 20s or early 30s, wearing a grey jacket, brown pants, and plaid shirt," remove what appeared to be a rifle case from the back of the truck. The case was about three and a half to four feet long, and tapered from about eight inches at its broadest to four inches at the narrowest point. The man carried the rifle case up the grassy incline that forms part of the overpass bordering Dealey Plaza.

Mercer claimed the entire incident took place in plain view of three Dallas police officers who stood talking nearby. When she was able to pull her car around the truck, she got a good look at the driver, whom she later recognized as Jack Ruby, both from a photo she claims to have been shown by police and again when his picture was broadcast on television as Lee Harvey Oswald's murderer. The Warren Commission, while accepting her affidavit describing the incident, never called Mercer as a witness. There is no evidence that either the Ford truck, which had the words "Air Conditioning" emblazoned in black letters on the driver's door, or the three police officers were ever identified or located.

Crossfire; Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Metzler, James E.

A Navy corpsman third class, Metzler was on duty at Bethesda Naval Hospital when the coffin allegedly containing the president's body was brought in through the receiving dock at the rear of the hospital. He watched the Casket Team bring in the coffin, and then helped remove the body and place it on an autopsy table.

Although he was in the room for only five or ten minutes before he was told to leave, Metzler was able to observe that the body was wrapped in a sheet. A second sheet was wrapped around the head. When Metzler left the room, he was stopped by a group of about ten men whom he took to be government agents. He showed them his Navy identification. Several days later, Metzler was summoned to the office of Admiral Calvin Galloway and was asked to sign a statement affirming that he would not talk about the events of that night under penalty of court-martial. In a 1979 interview with researcher David S. Lifton, Metzler described the coffin as "dark brown" with handles on the side.

See also AMBULANCE CONTROVERSY; BODY BAG CONTROVERSY.

Best Evidence

Book of Facts: Mexico City

Much has been made of an October 10, 1963, Central Intelligence Agency memo about Lee Harvey Oswald's alleged activities at the Soviet and Cuban embassies in Mexico City during September 1963. The purpose of this trip was ostensibly for Oswald to arrange his return to the Soviet Union. There is overwhelming evidence that the CIA manufactured the bogus photographs and tape recordings that were supposed to prove Oswald had made the trip to Mexico City. Silvia Duran, a Mexican national working at the embassy, is believed to have been pressured by the CIA, through its friends in the Mexico City police force, to testify that Oswald was there. E. Howard Hunt was allegedly the senior CIA man in Mexico City during August and September 1963.

Although a surveillance camera at the Mexican consulate in New Orleans, where Oswald allegedly requested a Mexican visitor's card, produced film that was sufficiently clear to identify a bystander, the image of the man said to be Oswald was not clear enough to confirm his identity. Months after the assassination, and long after Oswald's belongings had first been thoroughly examined by federal agents, Marina Oswald and Priscilla Johnson discovered bus-ticket stubs for a round-trip journey to Mexico City in a Spanish-language magazine that they claimed to have found among Oswald's things. The Warren Commission used this evidence to substantiate its conclusion that Oswald had traveled to Mexico City, but the belatedness of the discovery has led many researchers to question the ticket stubs' authenticity.

Many observers consider the entire story of Oswald's alleged Mexican trip an example of disinformation by the CIA.

See also ALVARADO, GILBERTO; BOWEN, JOHN "JACK"; GAUDET, WILLIAM GEORGE; LOPEZ, EDWIN J.; PHILLIPS, DAVID ATLEE; VECIANA, ANTONIO.

On the Trail of the Assassins

Book of Facts: Miller, Austin

According to researcher and author Mark Lane, Austin Miller, who was standing on the overpass when the assassination occurred, signed an affidavit on the day of the assassination claiming he saw smoke coming from a "group of trees north of Elm," near the railroad tracks. When Miller was questioned by lawyers from the Warren Commission, he was not asked about the smoke he saw.

See also OVERPASS WITNESSES; SMOKE FROM THE GRASSY KNOLL.
Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Millican, A. J.

Millican was part of a crew that was fabricating plumbing piping for a building under construction just north of the Texas School Book Depository Building. The crew members were on their lunch break, and were standing near the Depository Building on Elm Street to watch the motorcade. Millican told sheriff's deputies he had no doubt where the shots came from. He told them that, just as the president's limousine passed him, he heard three shots that sounded as if they came from the area of the Book Depository Building. These were immediately followed by two additional shots that came from the area on the Grassy Knoll where the concrete pergola was located. Finally, according to Millican, another three shots came from the same direction (i.e., the Grassy Knoll), except a little farther back. Millican thought the gunfire came from either a high-powered rifle or perhaps a .45 automatic. Despite the thoroughness of his report of the shooting, Millican was never interviewed by either the Warren Commission or the House Select Committee on Assassinations.

See also BRENNAN, HOWARD L.; SPEAKER, SANDY.

Crossfire

Book of Facts: Mills, Thomas

Mills was a hospital corpsman assigned to the office of President Kennedy's personal physician, Dr. George Burkley. Two Secret Service agents, Floyd Boring and Paul Paterni, asked Mills to help them inspect the presidential limousine after it was flown back to the White House from Dallas. Paterni allegedly found a "metallic fragment in the front seat," and Mills another such fragment. Some observers have expressed suspicion that the fragments were "planted" to support the single bullet theory.

See also MAGIC BULLET.

Best Evidence

Book of Facts: Milteer, Joseph

A wealthy right-wing activist, Milteer belonged to a number of groups with links to anti-Castro Cubans in Miami. He is alleged to have had advance knowledge of a plot to kill President Kennedy. A man resembling Milteer is said to appear in a photograph showing people standing in front of the Texas School Book Depository Building on November 22, 1963. Milteer supposedly told a police informant, in a conversation taped in Miami less than two weeks before the president was killed, that the assassination was "in the working." He even predicted it would be done with a high-powered rifle fired from an office building, although the venue for this assassination was supposed to be Miami (on November 18). After the assassination, Milteer told the informant that everything had gone according to plan, and then suggested that the informant had thought he was kidding. The informant, identified as William Somerset, asked Milteer whether he had been guessing when he made his prediction. Milteer's reply was that he didn't do any guessing. He then told Somerset he wasn't concerned about Lee Harvey Oswald's being caught, because Oswald did not know anything. When questioned by the FBI, Milteer denied making any statements or predictions about the assassination.

Conspiracy

Book of Facts: Minsk

Lee Harvey Oswald lived in the Soviet Union from late 1959 to June 1962, for the most part in the city of Minsk, where he met and married his Russian wife, Marina. The couple enjoyed an apartment that was comfortable by Soviet standards and given them practically rent-free. Oswald was provided with a better-than-average job in a radio and television factory, suggesting that he received special treatment of a sort that was generally available only from the KGB, the Soviet State Security Committee. This suggests that Oswald was either in the employ or under the control of the KGB, or that the KGB was keeping an extra-close watch on him because it suspected he had been sent to the Soviet Union by the CIA. The KGB predictably denied any connection with Oswald, and the Warren Commission found no such connection. Several photos taken of Oswald in Minsk by Ruth Naman were provided to the Commission.

See also NOSENKO, YURI; OSWALD, MARINA.
Best Evidence; Crossfire

Book of Facts: Mitchell, Willie

Mitchell was a prisoner at the Dallas County jail on Houston Street the day of the assassination. Mitchell's attorney claimed that his client saw nothing, but that other inmates witnessed the assassination.

See also POWELL, JOHN.

On the Trail of the Assassins

Book of Facts: Molina, Joe R.

Molina was the credit manager for the Texas School Book Depository. He was standing in front of the building with Buell Wesley Frazier when the shots were fired. When questioned by the Warren Commission, he said he thought the shots had come from the "west side" of the building, toward the Grassy Knoll and overpass. See also TEXAS SCHOOL BOOK DEPOSITORY BUILDING EMPLOYEES. Crossfire

Book of Facts: Montgomery, L. D.

Detective Montgomery was the man standing directly behind Lee Harvey Oswald when Jack Ruby shot him. Montgomery testified that he was not informed that the police and the FBI had received threats against Oswald's life. In fact, he said Captain Will Fritz told him to make sure that Oswald did not get away. It has been speculated that the detectives escorting Oswald might have taken steps to protect him had they been aware of such threats.

See also GRAVES, L. C.; LEAVELLE, JAMES R.

Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Mooney, Luke

Deputy Sheriff Mooney was on the sixth floor of the Texas School Book Depository Building when the alleged murder weapon was found. Considering the confusion about whether the rifle that was discovered was a Mannlicher-Carcano or a Mauser, it is surprising that the Warren Commission failed to ask Mooney what make rifle he saw.

See also BOONE, EUGENE L.; CRAIG, ROGER D.; WADE, HENRY W.; WEITZMAN, SEYMOUR.

Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Moorman, Mary

Mary Moorman and her friend Jean Hill had come to Dealey Plaza to see a motorcycle police officer whom Hill wanted to date. As the presidential limousine approached their position, Hill called out to Kennedy, wanting him to look their way so Moorman could take his picture with her Polaroid camera. Moorman snapped away as the shots rang out and the president was mortally wounded. After the shooting, Moorman was taken to the sheriff's office for questioning, where most of her photographs were confiscated by a man identifying himself as a federal officer. One photo has survived, and close examination of an enlargement revealed what many believe is a man behind the stockade fence atop the Grassy Knoll holding a rifle in the classic firing position.

See also "Badgeman."

Crossfire

Book of Facts: Morgan, Roger C.

Chief Warrant Officer Roger C. Morgan was allegedly the pilot who, according to former Marine navigator Larry Huff, flew a Marine investigation team to Japan immediately following the assassination to look into Lee Harvey Oswald's background. Although the Marine Corps denied Huff's story, Morgan responded to questions from the House Select Committee on Assassinations, verifying through his personal logbooks that he had commanded a flight to Japan on the dates Huff mentioned. Morgan explained that his personal record would not contain the names of crew members or passengers, but that this information should be in the official records. The congressional investigators were unable to locate Marine Corps records that would substantiate or refute Huff's allegations.

See also CAMP SMITH.

High Treason

Book of Facts: Morgan, Dr. Russell H.

Dr. Morgan, a professor of radiology at Johns Hopkins University, was a member of the medical panel convened by Attorney General Ramsey Clark to examine the Kennedy autopsy photographs and X rays.

See also CLARK PANEL.

Best Evidence

Book of Facts: Moritz, Dr. Alan R.

A former professor of forensic medicine at Harvard, Moritz was a member of the medical panel convened by Attorney General Ramsey Clark to examine the Kennedy autopsy photographs and X rays.

See also CLARK PANEL.

Best Evidence

Book of Facts: Morrow, Robert D.

A former CIA agent who had participated in actions against Fidel Castro, Morrow wrote a book titled Betrayal, published in 1976 by Regnery, in which he claims to have purchased for the Central Intelligence Agency three Mannlicher-Carcano rifles similar to the one Lee Harvey Oswald allegedly used to murder President Kennedy. Morrow places responsibility for the assassination on rogue elements in the Agency. He is also the author of a book on the assassination of Robert F. Kennedy, The Senator Must Die (1988), and of First Hand Knowledge: How I Participated in the CIA-Mafia Murder of JFK, published in 1992 by SPI Books.

Book of Facts: Moseley, Jack

At the time of the assassination, Moseley was a reporter for the Fort Worth Press. He reported that he saw federal agents enter the embalming room in the funeral home where Lee Harvey Oswald's body was stored. Moseley claimed the agents kept coming and going from the room, where they were alone with the body for an extended time, and that they had a crime lab kit for fingerprinting with them.

See also GROODY, PAUL; PALMPRINT ON RIFLE.

Best Evidence

Book of Facts: Motorcade Route

The presidential motorcade through Dallas, Texas, on November 22, 1963, was a great success until it reached Dealey Plaza. Critics of the Warren Commission have argued, with justification, that the motorcade could easily have continued west on Main Street instead of turning north on Houston Street and making a sharp left turn onto Elm Street, forcing the cars to slow down considerably from the Secret Service prescribed speed of forty-four miles per hour. The motorcade's destination was the Dallas Trade Mart, where the president was scheduled to give a luncheon speech. Anyone who has driven through Dealey Plaza will understand the questions raised about using Houston and Elm streets instead of continuing straight on Main Street. The only thing the turns accomplished was to put Kennedy in the sights of his assassin or assassins. According to the route published in the Dallas Morning News of November 22, 1963, the motorcade was originally scheduled to proceed straight through Dealey Plaza without turning or slowing down. No one in Dallas or Washington has accepted responsibility for altering the route.

High Treason; On the Trail of the Assassins

Book of Facts: Moyers, Bill

Before joining the Kennedy administration as deputy director of the Peace Corps, Moyers, a native Texan, worked on the staff of then-senator Lyndon B. Johnson. After Kennedy's assassination, he was named an aide to President Johnson. Moyers allegedly said that Kennedy did not want the protective bubble on his limousine during the Dallas trip, quoting Kennedy as saying, "Get that Goddamned bubble off unless it's pouring rain."

High Treason

Book of Facts: Muchmore, Marie

Marie Muchmore was filming the motorcade from the grassy area to the left of the president's limousine when the shots were fired. Some researchers believe her film confirms that the president was hit by a shot fired from in front of him. The Warren Commission disagreed.

See also NIX, ORVILLE.

High Treason

Description of the Film

Marie Muchmore was filming the motorcade from the grassy area to the left of the president's limousine when the shots were fired. Some researchers believe her film confirms that the president was hit by a shot fired from in front of him. The Warren Commission disagreed.

Book of Facts: Murphy, Thomas

Murphy was a railroad worker who watched the motorcade from the railroad overpass that borders Dealey Plaza. He allegedly told assassination researcher Stewart Galanor that the shots "came from a tree to the immediate right [of the President]." He also said he saw smoke coming from a tree on the embankment near the fence on the Grassy Knoll.

See also OVERPASS WITNESSES; SMOKE FROM THE GRASSY KNOLL.

Best Evidence

Book of Facts: Nagell Richard Case

According to New Orleans District Attorney Jim Garrison, Nagell's family arranged a secret meeting between Garrison and Nagell in New York City. At the time of their meeting, Nagell had just been released from a federal prison on charges related to his firing a gun into the ceiling of a bank in El Paso, Texas, a short time before the assassination of President Kennedy. Nagell claimed he did this to create an absolutely foolproof alibi for himself the day of the assassination. Nagell told Garrison that in the summer of 1963, he was an intelligence agent employed by a federal agency he refused to identify, and that he had been assigned to investigate a project involving a group of individuals that included Lee Harvey Oswald. In the course of his investigation, Nagell claimed he uncovered a "large" operation aimed at killing the president. When his superior was reassigned, and Nagell found himself frozen out of his own agency, Nagell wrote a registered letter to FBI director J. Edgar Hoover, but received no reply. Nagell said he understood what this meant, that he was now on his own. Fearing that his contacts with Oswald might implicate him in the assassination if Oswald was ever arrested or investigated, he decided on the relative safety of a federal prison. Nagell said that after firing his gun into the bank ceiling, he walked outside and waited for the guard to arrest him. He was convicted of armed robbery and sentenced to ten years, but was released after three. The conviction was later overturned for lack of evidence that he ever intended to rob the bank.

Nagell was the subject of a book written by Dick Russell and titled, The Man Who Knew Too Much, published by Carroll & Graf in 1992.

On the Trail of the Assassins

Book of Facts: Naman, Rita

In the summer of 1961, Naman and a friend, Monica Kramer, traveled through the Soviet Union by car, an extraordinary experience at a time when few Westerners ventured behind the iron curtain. Pictures taken by tourists while visiting communist countries were routinely reviewed by the CIA. In Naman's case, the Agency looked at 150 snapshots she had taken and appropriated five, including a photo of Lee Harvey Oswald she had snapped in a square in the city of Minsk. Naman and Kramer claimed they had encountered Oswald as casual strangers twice on their trip within a span of ten days, once in Moscow and again, four hundred miles away, in Minsk. While in Moscow, the two women were approached by another American tourist, Marie Hyde, who claimed she had been separated from her tour group and wanted to join Naman and Kramer. Many researchers find it unlikely that a tourist to the Soviet Union in the 1960s could become separated from a group, since at the time the activities of such groups were tightly controlled by KGB agents or informants employed as Intourist guides. These guides were to keep a close watch on all tourists in the groups; the loss of any member would have been a serious offense.

The puzzling story of these tourists' encounters with Oswald, combined with the fact that the CIA held onto a photograph that included Oswald, has deepened some researchers' questions concerning Oswald's possible relations with the CIA.

Conspiracy

Book of Facts: National Archives, Documents Missing from

The National Archives is the repository for many government documents of historic value. Despite excellent security arrangements, many documents and other items related to the assassination of President Kennedy have vanished from the archives over the years. These include a large number of letters to and from members and staff of the Warren Commission, some FBI laboratory reports, the Dallas police dispatch tape, and a stainless steel receptacle believed to contain the president's brain.

High Treason

Book of Facts: Nelson, Doris

Nursing supervisor Nelson was one of the first people at Parkland Memorial Hospital to learn that the president had been shot and was being brought to the hospital. Researcher Harrison Edward Livingstone says that when he gave Nelson an autopsy picture of the back of the president's head showing a bullet entry wound at the rear of the head, she responded that there was no bone where the bullet hole allegedly was, that the portion of the skull containing the bullet hole had been blown away. Obviously, if Nelson is correct and there was no bone at the alleged site of a bullet hole, there could be no bullet hole.

See also PARKLAND MEMORIAL HOSPITAL STAFF.
High Treason 2

Book of Facts: Newman, Jean

Jean Newman was a twenty-one-year-old Dallas resident who left her job to go to Dealey Plaza to see the presidential motorcade on November 22, 1963. When the shots were fired, she was standing along the sidewalk on Elm Street facing south. To her left was the Texas School Book Depository Building, and to her right was the Grassy Knoll and the railroad overpass. When questioned by sheriff's deputies, she told them that her impression was that the shots "came from my right." The Warren Commission did not call Newman to testify.

See also DEALEY PLAZA WITNESSES.

Crossfire

Book of Facts: Newman Family

Bill and Gayle Newman both dropped to the ground and covered their two children with their own bodies during the shooting of President Kennedy. The Newmans were standing in front of the Grassy Knoll along the curb on Elm Street watching the president pass when shots were fired from "directly behind me," as Bill Newman stated. Interviewed within an hour of the assassination, Newman said the president, of whom he had a clear view, was struck in the side of the temple by a bullet.

See also JACKS, HURCHEL; SITZMAN, MARILYN; TEMPLE WOUND CONTROVERSY.
Best Evidence

Book of Facts: Ngo Dinh Diem

President of South Vietnam, Ngo Dinh Diem and his brother and close adviser, Ngo Dinh Nhu, were assassinated on November 2, 1963, during a coup that had the support of the United States government. It had been no secret that the Kennedy administration wanted to get rid of Diem and find a more pliable president. Many supporters of the Diem administration have charged that President Kennedy himself was involved in the decision to kill Diem, although there is no evidence of this. When Kennedy was killed twenty days later, some people viewed it as retribution for Diem's death. One of those who voiced this opinion was the new American president, Lyndon B. Johnson, whom Hubert Humphrey quotes in his autobiography, The Education of a Public Man, as telling him a few days after assuming the presidency, "We had a hand in killing him [Diem]. Now it's happening here."

See also VIETNAM WAR.

High Treason

Book of Facts: Niell, James

James Niell was the Dallas attorney for Police Officer Roy Vaughn, who was guarding the Main Street entrance ramp to the lower-level parking garage of Police Headquarters when Jack Ruby allegedly walked past him on his way to kill Lee Harvey Oswald. Through Niell, Vaughn filed a suit to clear himself of charges of misconduct on duty and any involvement in a criminal conspiracy. Vaughn took three lie-detector tests that showed he was telling the truth when he stated Ruby did not enter the building through the ramp he was guarding. Napoleon J. Daniels, a retired police officer who claimed he saw Ruby walk past Vaughn as he entered the building, failed a similar test. Niell maintains that Daniels was pressured to lie in order to protect the person who allowed Ruby in, who many suspect was Assistant Police Chief Charles Batchelor.

High Treason

Book of Facts: Nitrate Test

Also known as a paraffin test, a nitrate test reveals minute deposits of nitrate on the skin, the result of burned gunpowder emitted by the firing of a gun. When Lee Harvey Oswald was given a nitrate test following his arrest, deposits were found on his hand, but not on either cheek, where traces generally would exist on someone who had recently fired a rifle, especially one with a scope sight requiring the shooter to hold the weapon against one cheek while taking aim and firing.

On the Trail of the Assassins; Texas Connection

Book of Facts: Nix, Orville

Nix was one of several people besides Abraham Zapruder who made a film that included frames taken at the moment when Kennedy was wounded. The Nix film, taken across the street from the Grassy Knoll, clearly shows the president being knocked backward by the impact of the shot to his head. In the background there appears to be what many people believe is a gunman aiming a rifle at Kennedy, and the wisp of smoke many other witnesses claimed to have seen.

See also SMOKE FROM THE GRASSY KNOLL; ZAPRUDER FILM.

Best Evidence; High Treason

Description of the Film

The Nix film shows the motorcade turn onto Houston street. The Presidential Limousine is followed by the Queen Mary, the car carrying the secret service. Next the limousine carrying Vice President Johnson passes. Senator Yarborough waves.

Just before the fatal head shot, the Presidential limousine slows. The red glow of the brake lights can be seen. After the shot, the limousine accelerates, racing to Parkland Hospital.

Some researchers claim that the background of the Nix film when greatly magnified may show a man on the top of a station wagon with what looks like a rifle. The station wagon is positioned behind the fence in the area of the Grassy Knoll. ITEK, a photographic laboratory, analyzed the film and concluded that the Nix film does not show a gunman.

Book of Facts: Nixon, Richard M.

Some researchers have posited a link between the former president and the Kennedy assassination for several reasons, among them the fact that Nixon was in Dallas on November 22, 1963, possibly meeting with large oil interests that hated Kennedy. Nixon himself, of course, disliked Kennedy for allegedly stealing the 1960 election through ballot-box stuffing in Texas and Chicago; Kennedy beat Nixon by the smallest margin in U.S. history. It is alleged that Nixon maintained ties with the Teamsters Union and with members of the Mafia, two groups that would benefit from Kennedy's death. Nixon is also said to have had ties with Jack Ruby going back as far as 1947, when as a congressman he is believed to have been instrumental in intervening on Ruby's behalf so Ruby would not have to testify before the House Committee on Un-American Activities. Marina Oswald testified before the Warren Commission that Lee Harvey Oswald threatened to shoot Nixon in April 1963. Contract on America; Fatal Hour; High Treason; Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: No Name Key Group

This group consisted of CIA contract agents who allegedly were training Cuban exiles for a second invasion of their homeland, until President Kennedy ordered FBI and other federal agents to raid their camps in Louisiana and Florida. The group was part of the CIA network investigated by New Orleans District Attorney Jim Garrison in his attempt to indict those responsible for Kennedy's assassination.

High Treason

Book of Facts: Norman, Harold D.

Harold Norman was one of three Texas School Book Depository Building employees who watched the presidential motorcade from the fifth floor of the building. A Secret Service report claims Norman said he heard the shots come from above him, that he also heard the expended shells fall to the floor, and could hear the bolt action of the rifle. The report was given great credibility by the Warren Commission, even though Norman's testimony differed significantly from the impressions reported by his companions. Norman later denied making the statements attributed to him by the Secret Service.

See also CARTER, WILLIAM N.; JARMAN, JAMES, JR.; WILLIAMS, BONNIE RAY.
Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Nosenko, Yuri

Nosenko was a lieutenant colonel in the KGB section responsible for keeping tabs on British and American visitors to the Soviet Union. Among the subjects of his surveillance was Lee Harvey Oswald during Oswald's stay in the U.S.S.R. (1959-1962). In 1962, Nosenko was recruited as an agent of the CIA. On January 20, 1964, while on a trip to Geneva, he contacted the CIA and said he wanted to defect. He allegedly told the American agent who met him that Oswald had no relations with Soviet intelligence, but that the KGB believed he was in the employ of an American intelligence agency. Richard Helms, at the time deputy director for planning at the CIA, reportedly rejected Nosenko's request for asylum and told him to stay in Europe. Afraid his Soviet masters were on to him, Nosenko defected anyway. In the United States, Nosenko was treated to more than three years of imprisonment and physical abuse by the CIA. His requests to testify before the Warren Commission were ignored. Nosenko was finally released, his silence allegedly purchased for an annual allowance of $30,000 and American citizenship.

See also ANGLETON, JAMES J.

Plausible Denial

Book of Facts: NSAM 273

National Security Action Memo 273, dated November 21, 1963, ordered a stepped-up program of U.S. covert activities against North Vietnam. NSAM 273 is considered by some observers as a reversal of President Kennedy's previously avowed decision to withdraw American troops from Vietnam. Kennedy never signed the document, and in fact never saw it, as he was killed the day after it was drafted by McGeorge Bundy, who was special assistant to the president. When Kennedy went to Texas, his order (NSAM 263) to reduce American military personnel in Vietnam by one thousand men before the end of the year was in effect. NSAM 273 would have reversed that policy. Some researchers and authors feel his efforts to wind down U.S. involvement in the war is the chief reason he was killed. A few days after Kennedy's death, his Vietnam policy was indeed reversed.

See also VIETNAM WAR.

High Treason 2

Book of Facts: O'Brien, Lawrence F.

A special assistant to the president, and a member of what the press called Kennedy's "Irish Mafia," O'Brien accompanied Kennedy to Texas and stayed with the coffin during the return trip to Washington aboard Air Force One.

See also MCHUGH, GODFREY; O'DONNELL, KENNETH; POWERS, DAVE.
Death of a President

Book of Facts: O'Conner, Paul K.

O'Connor was one of two laboratory technologists present during the autopsy of President Kennedy at Bethesda Naval Hospital. A number of assassination researchers have interviewed him; the statements they report conflict. In 1990, Harrison Edward Livingstone interviewed O'Connor twice. During these interviews, O'Connor described how he unzipped the body bag in which Kennedy's body was shipped; this conflicts with descriptions provided by medical personnel at Parkland Memorial Hospital who claim the body was wrapped in a sheet. O'Connor also insisted that the president's brain must have been blown out through the hole in his skull, because it was missing.

See also BODY BAG CONTROVERSY; BRAIN CONTROVERSY; JENKINS, JAMES C.
Best Evidence: High Treason 2

Book of Facts: Odio Incident

Sylvia Odio's father was a prominent, wealthy political prisoner in Cuba's infamous Isle of Pines. He had formerly supported Fidel Castro in the struggle to overthrow Batista, but denounced the Cuban leader when Castro admitted he was a communist. Sylvia and her younger sister, Annie, lived in Dallas, where Sylvia worked for the Junta Revolucionaria Cubana (JURE), an anti-Castro group that, while opposed to Castro, was decidedly left of center.

In testimony she gave to a Warren Commission attorney, Sylvia told of a visit to her Dallas apartment in late September 1963 by three men who said they were members of JURE. Odio said one of the three, an American who was introduced to her as Leon Oswald, had little to say during the visit. The two Latin-looking men with the man called Oswald sought her help in raising funds for anti-Castro operations. The trio's leader called himself "Leopoldo," while the other man was called either "Angel" or "Angelo." The leader seemed to have intimate knowledge of certain inside information about Odio's father that lent credence to his story, but Sylvia remained noncommittal. "Leopoldo" telephoned her the day after the visit, asking again for her help with fund raising. In the course of the conversation, he mentioned that the American who had been with him was an ex-Marine marksman who could be an asset to the cause, but that he was "loco." He then told her the American thought Cubans had no guts, that they should have shot Kennedy after the failure of the Bay of Pigs invasion, and that killing Kennedy would be "so easy to do."

After the Kennedy assassination, when Sylvia saw pictures of Lee Harvey Oswald, she recognized him as one of the three men who had visited her two months earlier. Fearing danger, the Odio sisters decided to say nothing. However, the story of Sylvia's visitors eventually became known to the FBI and the Warren Commission. In an effort to disprove Odio's story, the FBI produced a man named Loran Hall, who said he was one of the three men who visited Sylvia. Hall's account of the incident fell apart when his alleged companions - William Seymour and Lawrence Howard - called it untrue. When photos of these three men were shown to Sylvia, she said none of the individuals shown had visited her. A Warren Commission lawyer wrote that Sylvia "checked out thoroughly." He said the evidence of the visit was "unanimously favorable," and that she was the "most significant witness linking Oswald with the anti-Castro Cubans." Despite this opinion, the Commission chose to disregard Odio's story.

See also ANTI-CASTRO CUBANS.

See Conspiracy; Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Odom, Lee

The name Lee Odom was found among other names and addresses in an address book belonging to Clay Shaw, who had been arrested on charges brought by New Orleans District Attorney Jim Garrison of participating in the assassination of President Kennedy. Odom's address appeared in the book as P.O. Box 19106, Dallas, Texas. The same post office box number was found in Lee Harvey Oswald's address book, even though in 1963 post office boxes had not yet been assigned numbers that high. Garrison challenged Shaw about this. Several days later, Shaw's lawyers turned up a man named Lee Odom who had rented post office box 174 in Irving, Texas, a Dallas suburb. Odom said box 19106 had been used for several months by a barbecue company with which he had been associated. The relationship between Odom and Shaw was alleged to have concerned an idea for promoting a bullfight in New Orleans. Why Oswald had the same address in his book - and why he would have listed a post office box number that did not yet exist - are questions that remain unanswered.

On the Trail of the Assassins

Book of Facts: O'Donnell, Kenneth

A special assistant to the president, and a member of what the press called Kennedy's "Irish Mafia," O'Donnell accompanied Kennedy to Texas and stayed with the coffin during the return trip to Washington aboard Air Force One.

See also MCHUGH, GODFREY; O'BRIEN, LAWRENCE F.; POWERS, DAVE.
Death of a President

Book of Facts: Odum, Bardwell D.

Marguerite Oswald, Lee Harvey Oswald's mother, told the Warren Commission that FBI agent Bardwell Odum visited her on November 23, 1963, the day before Jack Ruby shot her son. During the visit, Agent Odum asked her to look at a photograph and identify the man pictured. Marguerite said she did not know the man. After her son was killed, she realized the man in the photo Odum had shown her was Ruby. The FBI claims the photograph originated with the CIA. According to the FBI, the CIA said it was a man they suspected of having ties with Oswald. The Agency denies that the subject of the photograph was Ruby.

Rush to Judgment; Warren Report

Book of Facts: Office of Naval Intelligence (ONI)

Although there is no evidence to substantiate the claim, some assassination researchers suspect that Lee Harvey Oswald was an agent for the Office of Naval Intelligence. ONI's headquarters in New Orleans was barely fifty feet from 544 Camp Street, the address of Oswald's phony Fair Play for Cuba Committee and the building that housed the offices of Guy Banister, who was a former FBI and ONI agent.

High Treason; On the Trail of the Assassins

Book of Facts: Office of Strategic Services (OSS)

The Office of Strategic Services, the forerunner of the Central Intelligence Agency, was dissolved after World War II by President Harry Truman. Truman feared the OSS was involved in clandestine operations that could lead the United States into trouble. When the Central Intelligence Group, as it was first called, was established, Truman expressly denied the new agency license to engage in clandestine activities. Following the assassination of Kennedy, Truman said he was "disturbed" by what the CIA had become.

High Treason

Book of Facts: Oglesby, Carl

Oglesby has spent years researching and writing about the assassination of President Kennedy. Instrumental in calling for a congressional investigation of the matter, he was highly critical of the House Select Committee on Assassinations. He called its treatment of Lee Harvey Oswald's motivation for killing Kennedy "confused and dogmatic," and said the Committee's treatment of medical and technical evidence was "shallow." Oglesby is the author of Who Killed JFK? and The JFK Assassination: The Facts and the Theories, both published by Signet in 1992.
High Treason

Book of Facts: O'Leary, Muggsey

O'Leary was one of only five Secret Service agents present at the president's autopsy, according to Warren Commission records. According to James Curtis Jenkins, a medical technologist who was also present, there were many unidentified civilians sitting in the gallery overlooking the autopsy room.

Best Evidence

Book of Facts: Oliver, Betty

Known to early researchers as the "Babushka Lady" because of the head covering she is seen wearing in photos of the assassination scene, Betty Oliver was filming the motorcade on her 8-millimeter movie camera when the shooting occurred. Her film was confiscated by an FBI agent she believes was Regis Kennedy. The film disappeared without, as far as is known, ever being viewed by anyone. Oliver was familiar with many of the players involved (and allegedly involved) in the assassination. In addition to having been at the scene, she worked at the Colony Club, which was next door to Jack Ruby's Carousel Club, and knew Ruby. She is alleged to have claimed that Ruby once introduced her to a man named Lee Oswald, who Ruby said was from the CIA. She also allegedly claimed she saw David Ferrie in Ruby's club so often she thought he managed the place.

High Treason

Book of Facts: Olivier, Dr. Alfred G.

A veterinarian described by the Warren Commission as "a doctor who had spent 7 years in wounds ballistics research with the U.S. Army," Olivier was one of the experts the Commission enlisted to conduct experiments designed to prove the single bullet theory. Olivier testified that he did not believe the president's head wound was caused by a copper-jacketed bullet. Olivier examined a goat carcass into which a bullet was fired from the Mannlicher-Carcano rifle alleged to be the murder weapon. He found the wounds "very similar" to the wound made in Governor John Connally's chest, but reported that the bullet recovered from the test was "quite flattened." A second bullet was fired into the wrist of a human cadaver, causing a wound closely resembling the one to Connally's wrist. That bullet suffered a "severely flattened" nose from striking the bone. These experiments were conducted in an attempt to replicate the injuries to Governor Connally by a bullet that allegedly first wounded President Kennedy. Yet this, the so-called magic bullet, was discovered in virtually perfect condition, not flattened as each of the test bullets was after causing only a portion of the damage the magic bullet is attributed with inflicting.

Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Oneal, Vernon

The proprietor of a funeral home in Dallas, Oneal provided the four-hundred-pound bronze casket in which President Kennedy's body was allegedly taken from Parkland Memorial Hospital and transported via Air Force One to Bethesda Naval Hospital. Two Oneal employees placed the body inside the casket, and Oneal closed it.

Rumors persist to this day that two large green oxygen tanks and a body bag were picked up at Oneal's Funeral Home, either by the hearse or by Secret Service men in another vehicle, and that the tanks were used to simulate the president's weight in the casket while his body was transferred to another coffin.

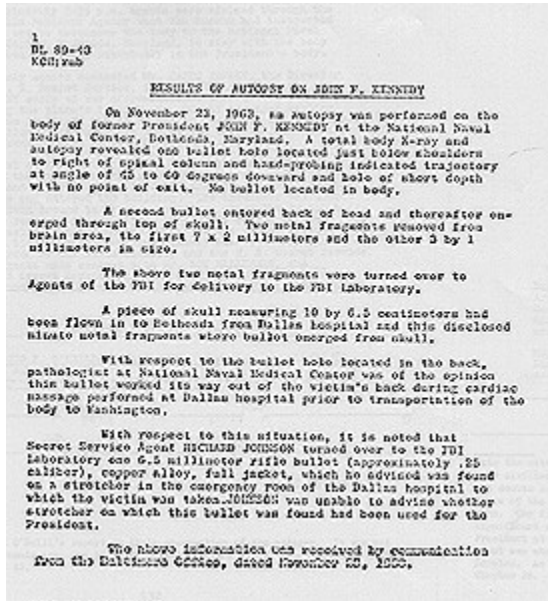

President Kennedy was not buried in the casket and it was eventually returned to Oneal, who also allegedly received in payment a check for $13,495, an exorbitant amount for a casket in 1963. This suggests to some researchers that there may have been a payoff to Oneal; the amount is alleged to be $10,000 more than the fee that had been agreed on.

The same sources responsible for reports of the missing oxygen tanks claim that when the casket was returned to Dallas, it had chips of green paint inside, but no bloodstains.

See also BODY BAG CONTROVERSY; COFFIN CONTROVERSY; MCGUIRE, DENNIS "PEANUTS"; RIKE, AUBREY.

Best Evidence; High Treason 2

Book of Facts: O'Neill and Sibert Report

FBI agent Francis X. O'Neill attended the president's autopsy with fellow FBI agent James Sibert. Although O'Neill and Sibert submitted a minutely detailed five-page report on which the official FBI summary of the autopsy appeared to be based, no mention of their role appears in the Warren Report, or in the accompanying twenty-six volumes of testimony and evidence.

Three significant items in the O'Neill and Sibert report provide impressive evidence that belies the single bullet theory. First, the report states that the bullet that entered the president's back did not travel through the body the way it was later described as doing when the wound was found to be caused by the magic bullet. Second, the FBI agents described the wound as low in the back, not in the neck as stated by subscribers to the magic bullet theory. Finally, the report states that on examination of the body at the start of the autopsy, it was discovered that there had been "surgery of the head area, namely, in the top of the skull." Sibert later claimed that the statement concerning surgery to the top of Kennedy's head had been a mistake. The questions raised by this report have never been dealt with adequately by an official investigative body.

See also AUTOPSY CONTROVERSY; THROAT WOUND CONTROVERSY.
Best Evidence; High Treason 2

Book of Facts: Operation 40

This was a CIA-organized and funded group of anti-Castro Cubans described by Marita Lorenz as an "assassination squad." CIA contract agent Frank Sturgis admitted to playing a leadership role in the group. Lorenz claimed the men she accompanied on a trip to Dallas just before the Kennedy assassination were all members of Operation 40, and that they brought a small arsenal of weapons with them to the city. Lorenz charged the group with plotting the murder of Fidel Castro as well as that of John F. Kennedy.

See also E. HOWARD HUNT.

High Treason; Plausible Denial

Book of Facts: Operation Zapata

Operation Zapata was the code name for the invasion of Cuba by Cuban exiles armed and trained by the CIA.

See also BAY OF PIGS.

Book of Facts: Orth, Herbert

The photo chief at Life magazine in 1963, Orth edited the Zapruder film for publication in the November 29, 1963, issue CIA documents describing the time intervals between shots coincide exactly with the intervals set down in the Life article. This has given rise to speculation about whether the CIA supplied Life with the information, or whether the Agency had a copy of the film later and got its information from the Life data.

Best Evidence

Book of Facts: Osborne, Dr. David

A Navy captain in 1963, and later an admiral, Osborne was present during the Kennedy autopsy in his role as chief of surgery at Bethesda Naval Hospital. Osborne reportedly told investigators from the House Select Committee on Assassinations that when the president's body was removed from the casket and placed on a table for the autopsy, a "reasonably clean" and "unmarred" bullet rolled out from under the body. Osborne insisted to researcher David S. Lifton that he actually picked the bullet up and held it in his hand. Lifton claims that Captain John Stover, the commanding officer of the U.S. Naval Medical School at the time, confirmed the presence in the autopsy room of a complete bullet, but that he thought it was the one found on a stretcher in Dallas. The only complete bullet in this case is the magic bullet that was found in Parkland Memorial Hospital. Records demonstrate that this bullet traveled from Dallas to the White House Secret Service chief to the FBI lab; it never went near Bethesda, and had no reason to be sent there.

See also CUSTER, JERROL F.; TOMLINSON, DARREL C.

Best Evidence

Book of Facts: Oswald, Backyard Photographs

This famous photograph, supposedly of Lee Harvey Oswald, was allegedly taken by Marina Oswald in the backyard of their home at 214 Neeley Street in Dallas. The photo, which shows "Oswald" holding copies of two militant communist newspapers - The Worker and The Militant - as well as a rifle resembling the Mannlicher-Carcano rifle purported to be the assassination weapon, appeared on the cover of Life magazine's February 24, 1964, issue - as the Warren Commission was still in the midst of its investigation. When questioned about the photograph by police while he was in custody after the assassination, Oswald said that it was a fake. Subsequent statements by photographic analysts, including John Pickard and Malcolm Thompson, have supported Oswald's claim. Analysts have pointed out, for example, that the photograph shows a man with a square chin, whereas Oswald's chin was somewhat pointed, and that the shadows cast by the facial features of the man in the photograph do not correspond, directionally, with other shadows in the photograph - leading to the supposition that the photo may represent a montage in which part of Oswald's face has been superimposed on a photograph of someone else. In February 1992, the Houston Post reported that the Dallas Police Department had released several copies of the backyard photo; the Post claimed that the photo "shows clear evidence of darkroom manipulation."

An interesting strand of the lore surrounding this photograph involves Roscoe White, who allegedly claimed to have been the actual assassin of President Kennedy. It has been reported that, in 1975, the home of White and his wife, Geneva, was burglarized; the thieves were apprehended, and among the Whites' belongings that were discovered in their possession was a theretofore unknown print of the backyard photograph. How the Whites came by the photograph has not been explained.

See also BOOKHOUT, JAMES W.

High Treason 2; Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Oswald, Lee Harvey

Twenty-four-year-old Lee Harvey Oswald was identified by the Warren Commission as the lone assassin of President Kennedy, despite the fact that no motive for the killing could be discovered. When Oswald was arrested, he cried out that he was a "patsy," a cry that is still heard today by researchers and writers who continue to challenge the Commission's findings.

For a young man, Oswald had a crowded and bizarre past. He served in the Marine Corps from 1956 to 1959, and there is evidence to support the contention that his Marine Corps assignments may have supplied him with knowledge concerning the secret missions of U-2 spy planes (see also ATSUGI AIR BASE). In 1959, Oswald defected to the Soviet Union, where he remained until 1962. While in the U.S.S.R. he lived mostly in the city of Minsk, where he met and married his Russian wife, Marina (see OSWALD, MARINA, below). Many researchers consider Oswald's defection a ruse cloaking an operation of U.S. intelligence agencies. It has been clearly demonstrated that Oswald had ties to the Central Intelligence Agency, and possibly to the Federal Bureau of Investigation and the Office of Naval Intelligence.

On returning to the United States in 1962, Oswald and his family lived first in Fort Worth, Texas, later moving to Dallas, where he took a job with the graphic arts firm of Jaggers-Chiles-Stovall. In the summer of 1963, leaving Marina behind in Dallas, Oswald moved to New Orleans, where he lived with relatives and worked for the William Reily Coffee Company. While in New Orleans, Oswald was closely involved with anti-Castro Cubans and Americans - even though he was photographed and arrested while distributing pro-Castro propaganda, ostensibly for the Fair Play for Cuba Committee, a phony branch of which he had established at 544 Camp Street.

Returning to Dallas in the early fall of 1963, Oswald continued to live separately from his wife and daughter (a second daughter was born in October), who were staying in the home of Ruth Paine in the Dallas suburb of Irving. Oswald lived in a series of rented rooms in Dallas. According to the Warren Commission, Oswald made a mysterious trip to Mexico City in late September and early October, apparently visiting the Soviet and Cuban embassies there in an effort to arrange passage back to the U.S.S.R. Many assassination researchers have doubted the veracity of this story, construing elements of it as CIA disinformation promulgated to cover up the Agency's role in the president's assassination.

Two weeks prior to the assassination, Oswald took a job as a warehouseman at the Texas School Book Depository Building. It was from a sniper's nest constructed of cardboard boxes behind a window on the sixth floor of that building that the Warren Commission concluded Oswald had fired three shots at the presidential motorcade passing through Dealey Plaza at 12:30 P.M. on November 22, 1963. According to the Commission's widely disputed determinations, one of these bullets struck the pavement, one delivered nonfatal wounds to both President Kennedy and Texas Governor John Connally, and a third struck the president in the head, killing him. The Commission also reached the equally disputed conclusion that, after leaving the assassination scene, Oswald shot and killed Dallas Police Officer J. D.

Tippit in the Oak Cliff section of Dallas at 1:15 P.M. According to the official version of events, it was for Tippit's murder that Oswald was first picked up by police, who discovered him hiding out in the Texas Theater.

In an incredibly dramatic event witnessed by millions watching on TV, Oswald was himself killed two days after the assassination, when he was shot by Jack Ruby in the basement garage of Dallas Police Headquarters.

Many researchers believe that Oswald had no direct part in the assassination of President Kennedy, while others suspect he was just one of the assassins in Dallas on November 22, 1963. See also ALIASES USED BY OSWALD.

Book of Facts: Oswald, Marguerite

Mother of Lee Harvey Oswald, Marguerite obtained the services of attorney Mark Lane to protect her son's rights before the Warren Commission. Lane also tried to represent the alleged assassin in the role of defense attorney, but was refused by the Commission. Marguerite, along with Oswald's wife, Marina, and their two children were taken into "protective custody" by the Secret Service on November 24, 1963, despite Marguerite's objections. When she finally forced her own release on November 28, she claimed the Secret Service would not release Marina and the children, and refused to allow her to see them to say goodbye. Marguerite Oswald never wavered from her conviction that her son was innocent of the charge of killing President Kennedy.

See also ODUM, BARDWELL D.

Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Oswald, Marina

Lee Harvey Oswald's young, Russian-born wife was considered a more reliable witness by the Warren Commission than his mother, despite Marina's often conflicting testimony. Perhaps this was because unlike Marguerite Oswald, who continued to believe in her son's innocence, Marina, evidently under the influence of Secret Service and FBI agents who held her in isolated "protective custody" for months, changed her mind about her husband and agreed with the federal officers that he was guilty. In addition to possibly influencing her story, federal officials found her an attorney and a business manager, James H. Martin, to look after her financial interests. Many suspect that the threat, stated or implied, that if she failed to cooperate, she might be deported back to the Soviet Union, was constantly hanging over her head.

Examples of her conflicting testimony include a statement to the Secret Service in December 1963 that she never saw Lee with a pistol; then, the following February, she identified the pistol allegedly used to kill Police Officer J. D. Tippit as her husband's. At first she called Lee a "good family man," but later claimed he beat her. The tone of her responses to questioning, and the alterations in her answers, have led many observers to suspect she was coached by federal authorities.

See also PAINE, RUTH.

Best Evidence; Plausible Denial; Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Oswald, Robert

Robert, Lee Harvey Oswald's brother, testified to the Warren Commission that Lee and Jack Ruby knew each other. After he visited his brother in jail, Robert reported that Lee told him not to be taken in by the "so-called evidence."

Best Evidence: High Treason

Book of Facts: O'Toole, George

Author of The Assassination Tapes (Penthouse Press, 1975), and a former CIA computer analysis specialist, O'Toole believes certain people in the Dallas Police Department could have helped frame Lee Harvey Oswald for both the Kennedy and J. D. Tippit murders. He charges, among other things, that the handgun allegedly taken from Oswald was never proven to be the Tippit murder weapon. He claims that tapes of Oswald's statement that he didn't shoot anybody were examined in a "psychological stress evaluator" test and showed he was telling the truth. O'Toole raises several questions about the veracity of statements made by various individuals involved in the assassination and its aftermath.

Book of Facts: Overpass Witnesses

In November 1963 work was being performed on the railroad tracks that pass over Commerce, Main, and Elm streets as they head west out of Dealey Plaza. Many of the workmen on the overpass stopped to watch the presidential motorcade move through the plaza and head directly under them. Only a few of these men were questioned by the FBI and the Warren Commission. Every one of them reported sounds or sights that led them to believe the shots were fired from the area of the Grassy Knoll. The testimony or statements of these men are included in individual entries for Richard C. Dodd; Sam Holland; Clemmon Johnson; Austin Miller; Thomas Murphy; Frank Reilly; James Simmons; Royce G. Skelton; and Walter Winborn. Also on the overpass were Dallas Police Officers J. W. Foster and J. C. White.

Book of Facts: Owens, Ernest Jay

According to Jim Marrs, Owens reported to the Dallas police that while driving on Wood Street, not far from the assassination scene, he saw a heavysset man in a dark suit carrying a "foreign-made rifle." After the arrest of Lee Harvey Oswald, the police seemed no longer interested in chasing down other leads.

Crossfire

Book of Facts: Oxford, J. L.

Oxford was a Dallas deputy sheriff who, when he heard the shots, ran across Dealey Plaza in the direction of the Grassy Knoll, apparently in the belief that that was where the shots originated. Oxford encountered a bystander who told him he had seen smoke near the wooden fence atop the Grassy Knoll.

See also CRAIG, ROGER, D.

Best Evidence: Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Paine, Ruth

Ruth Paine met Lee Harvey Oswald and Marina Oswald at a social gathering in Dallas in February 1963. Two months later, Oswald decided to go to New Orleans to seek work, and Ruth, who spoke some Russian, invited Marina, who spoke little English, to bring her small daughter and stay with her in her home in Irving, Texas, a Dallas suburb. Ruth and her husband, Michael, were separated at the time. Both Paines belonged to a local chapter of the American Civil Liberties Union, and Michael took Lee to at least one meeting of the organization.

In May 1963, Ruth drove Marina and her daughter to New Orleans to join Lee, who had found work there. In September Ruth once again drove to New Orleans, this time to pick up Marina, who was pregnant with the couple's second child, and her daughter, to take them back to Irving, where they again lived in the Paine home. Marina continued to live with Ruth Paine until after the assassination, even though Lee had moved back to Dallas prior to that. During this time Lee would visit his family at the Paine home only on weekends. The one exception was his stay there the night before the assassination.

According to a report by Dallas County sheriff's deputy Roger D. Craig, when Oswald was confronted with Craig's charge that he had seen Oswald run from the Texas School Book Depository Building and jump into a waiting station wagon, Oswald blurted out that the car belonged to Mrs. Paine, and that the cops should not try to get her involved in the assassination.

Conspiracy; Crossfire; Death of a President; Warren Report

Book of Facts: Palmprint on Rifle

The Mannlicher-Carcano rifle allegedly found on the sixth floor of the Texas School Book Depository Building was turned over to Dallas police lieutenant J. Carl Day, who examined it for fingerprints. Day claimed that he removed a palmprint from the underside of the barrel before he sent the weapon on to the FBI lab in Washington on the night of the assassination. According to Sebastian Francis Latona, head of the FBI's Latent Fingerprint Section, there were no prints of value on the rifle. The weapon was then returned to the Dallas police. Several days later, on November 26, Day acknowledged that he had taken a palmprint from the weapon. The print matched Lee Harvey Oswald's right hand.

According to reports by both Paul Groody, a funeral director at the Miller Funeral Home in Dallas, and Jack Moseley, a Fort Worth reporter, it seems probable that a group of men they believed were federal agents took fingerprints and palmprints from Oswald's body during the predawn hours of November 25 while the body lay in a room at the funeral home and before it was prepared for burial. Because this incident took place one day before it was announced that Oswald's palmprint had been found on the weapon, there has been much speculation about the real source of the palmprint.

According to Lieutenant Day, the palmprint was lifted from a section of the gun's barrel that is covered by the wood stock. He had to remove the stock to locate the print. All the palmprint establishes, provided its discovery was as reported, is that at some point Oswald held the weapon's barrel in his hand while the rifle was dismantled.

See also DRAIN, VINCENT.

Best Evidence: Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Parkland Memorial Hospital

In 1963, Parkland was one of the primary-care hospitals in Dallas, as it is today. It was the scene of the deaths of President John F. Kennedy, and Lee Harvey Oswald. The hospital is located approximately four miles from Dealey Plaza.

Book of Facts: Parkland Memorial Hospital Staff

When news reached the hospital via the police dispatcher that President Kennedy had been wounded and was being rushed to Parkland, nurses and doctors prepared for the most important patient the emergency room had ever admitted. Critics of the autopsy performed at Bethesda Naval Hospital rely on the statements of the Parkland medical staff because they were more spontaneous, less inclined to political influence, and less colored by the pressure of individuals who might not want certain information made public. The descriptions of the president's head wounds made by Parkland staff differ so strikingly from those made by the doctors at Bethesda who performed the autopsy that one might be led to believe the two teams were describing different patients.

Among the medical staff at Parkland who worked on President Kennedy and Governor John Connally were the following individuals, each of whom is discussed in an entry in this book under his or her name: Dr. Gene C. Akin; Dr. Fouad A. Bashour; Dr. Charles R. Baxter; Audrey Bell; Diana Bowron; Dr. Kemp Clark; Dr. Charles A. Crenshaw; Dr. Richard Dulaney; Dr. Adolph Giesecke; Dr. Charles Gregory; Dr. Robert Grossman; Margaret Henchcliffe; Dr. Jackie Hunt; Patricia Hutton; Dr. Marion Jenkins; Dr. Ronald Jones; Dr. Robert N. McClelland; Dr. Malcolm Perry; Dr. Paul Peters; and Dr. Philip Williams.

Best Evidence: High Treason 2

Book of Facts: Parkland Press Conference

In response to demands for information from reporters gathered in and around Parkland Memorial Hospital following the announcement of the president's death, a press conference was held at about 3:00 P.M. on November 22, 1963, at which Dr. Malcolm Perry and Dr. Kemp Clark presided. The information these two men conveyed to the press at this time is important because it was spontaneous and described exactly what they had seen. It was unmarred by the pressures that later seemed to influence testimony. For example, as the press conference transcript shows, Dr. Perry was unequivocal in his description of the president's throat wound as a bullet entry wound. Subsequently, in testifying before the Warren Commission, Perry wavered in his assessment of the wound after receiving an admonition about "false rumors" from Commission member and former CIA director Allen W. Dulles.

The following is an excerpt from the official transcript of the press conference:

QUESTION: Where was the entrance wound?

DR. PERRY: There was an entrance wound in the neck.

QUESTION: Which way was the bullet coming on the neck wound? At him?

DR. PERRY: It appeared to be coming at him? . . .

QUESTION: Doctor, describe the entrance wound. You think from the front in the throat?

DR. PERRY: The wound appeared to be an entrance wound in the front of the throat; yes, that is correct. . .

Critics find support for their skepticism toward the Warren Commission in these and other remarks by the medical team at Parkland.

Best Evidence

Book of Facts: Paterni, Paul

Paterni was one of the Secret Service agents who inspected the presidential limousine after it was returned to the White House. He reportedly found a metal fragment on the front seat of the car, which some believe to have come from the magic bullet. Another fragment was allegedly found in the rear seat by Thomas Mills.

Best Evidence

Book of Facts: Patterson, B.M.

Patterson was an employee of the Reynolds Motor Company on East Jefferson Boulevard in the Oak Cliff section of Dallas. He was one of three employees who claimed to have seen a man with a handgun running from the scene of the shooting of J. D. Tippit. Patterson was later questioned by the FBI. When he learned that the FBI report of his interview said that he had been shown a picture of Lee Harvey Oswald, he signed an affidavit requesting that the report be changed because he had never been shown a picture of Oswald. The original FBI report was included in the Warren Commission documents without the changes Patterson requested.

See also LEWIS, L. J.; REYNOLDS, WARREN.

Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Paul, Ralph

Ralph Paul was a Dallas restaurant owner and longtime friend and financial backer of Jack Ruby's. Paul held an interest in Ruby's Carousel Club. Paul and Ruby dined together the night before Kennedy was killed at a restaurant owned by their mutual friend Joseph Campisi. Campisi allegedly had ties with the Mafia organizations of Carlos Marcello and Santos Trafficante, both considered suspects in the assassination by many researchers.

The night before he killed Lee Harvey Oswald, Ruby made a series of telephone calls, including four to Paul. A waitress at Paul's restaurant, The Bull Pen, said she heard Paul say something about a gun during the first call he received from Ruby that evening. Paul also had an interest in another restaurant, Austin's Bar-B-Cue, where Police Officer J. D. Tippit moonlighted as a security guard.

Conspiracy

Book of Facts: Pellicano, Anthony

An assassination researcher, Pellicano criticized the acoustical work done by Dr. James Barger on the Dallas police dispatch tape. Pellicano believes there was a conspiracy to kill Kennedy and suspects that the disruption in police radio communications supposedly caused by an unintentionally open microphone on a policeman's motorcycle was actually someone's attempt to jam police communications during the assassination.

See also ACOUSTICAL EVIDENCE.

High Treason

Book of Facts: Pena, Orest

According to researcher and author Mark Lane, Pena requested that Lane represent him in a criminal case following his arrest by the New Orleans Police. In return for Lane's legal services, Pena promised to tell him all he knew about Lee Harvey Oswald's connections to the Federal Bureau of Investigation. Pena operated a bar and house of prostitution and allegedly provided temporary living quarters for Cuban exiles in the employ of the Central Intelligence Agency. Pena also claimed to be working for a local FBI agent, Warren DeBrueys.

According to Lane, Pena told him that Oswald worked for the FBI and reported to deBrueys, whom he met on a regular basis. DeBrueys is alleged to have introduced Oswald to local CIA contacts. When Texas attorney general Waggoner Carr informed the Warren Commission that he had learned Oswald was an "undercover agent" employed by the FBI, the Commission asked J. Edgar Hoover for a statement to the contrary. With that, the matter was dropped.

Plausible Denial

Book of Facts: Penn, Mrs. Lovell

Mrs. Penn is reported to have discovered three men firing a rifle illegally on her property in the Dallas area. This supposedly occurred in October 1963. After chasing them away, she found an empty cartridge case allegedly stamped with the name Mannlicher-Carcano, the brand of rifle Lee Harvey Oswald supposedly used to kill the president.

On the Trail of the Assassins

Book of Facts: Permindex

Permindex was a sister organization of the Centro Mondiale Commerciale in Italy, allegedly an organization of pro-Fascists through which the Central Intelligence Agency funneled funds to paramilitary and intelligence groups. Clay Shaw, who was charged with, but not convicted of, participation in the Kennedy assassination served on the boards of directors of both organizations. Jim Garrison was unaware of this when he failed to convince a New Orleans jury of Shaw's links to the CIA.

On the Trail of the Assassins

Book of Facts: Perry, Dr. Malcolm

Dr. Perry was an attending surgeon at Parkland Memorial Hospital when President Kennedy was brought in after the shooting. Perry was the second doctor to examine Kennedy, and he almost immediately performed a tracheotomy in an attempt to improve the patient's breathing. The tracheotomy cut was made over what Perry and virtually everyone else in the emergency room described as a bullet entry wound in the throat. After Kennedy died, Perry described the wound to reporters as an entry wound. This same wound was described by the Warren Commission as an exit wound.

See also PARKLAND MEMORIAL HOSPITAL STAFF; PARKLAND PRESS CONFERENCE.

Best Evidence

Book of Facts: Peters, Dr. Paul

A physician at Parkland Memorial Hospital, Dr. Peters arrived in the emergency room shortly after President Kennedy was brought in. He noticed what he called "the wound of entry in the throat." Later a professor and chairman of the Urology Department at Southwestern Medical School, Dr. Peters was shown the official autopsy pictures of the president's head wound. He is reported as saying, "I don't think it's consistent with what I saw." When he viewed the drawing of the wound made by another Parkland doctor, Robert N. McClelland, his reported response was, "It's not too far off." The controversy over what the doctors in Dallas report they saw and what the Bethesda autopsy pictures show continues.

See also AUTOPSY CONTROVERSY; HEAD WOUND CONTROVERSY; PARKLAND MEMORIAL HOSPITAL STAFF; THROAT WOUND CONTROVERSY.

Best Evidence; High Treason

Book of Facts: Petty, Dr. Charles

Dr. Petty was a member of the Forensic Pathology Panel created by the House Select Committee on Assassinations to review the Kennedy autopsy report, X rays, and photographs. On September 16, 1977, the panel met with the autopsy team of Dr. James J. Humes and Dr. Thornton Boswell. Dr. Petty's first question appeared to set the tone for this meeting. In view of the widely discussed reports that Kennedy had Addison's disease, which is a failure of the adrenal glands, and the fact that "normally we examine the adrenals in the general course [of an] autopsy," he asked Dr. Humes whether he had looked at the adrenals, because no mention of having done so appeared in the autopsy report. Humes's response was, "Since I don't think it bore directly on the death of the president, I'd prefer not to discuss it with you, Doctor."

Although five of the six panel members supported the Warren Report - the exception was Dr. Cyril H. Wecht - many observers regard the autopsy with suspicion, judging that at best it was ineptly performed.

*See also AUTOPSY CONTROVERSY.
Best Evidence*

Book of Facts: Phillips, David Atlee

Phillips's lengthy career with the Central Intelligence Agency culminated in his appointment in the 1960s as head of operations in the Western Hemisphere. He was a covert operative in Havana from 1958 to 1961 and bitterly blamed Kennedy for the Bay of Pigs failure. Phillips was working out of Mexico City at the time of Lee Harvey Oswald's alleged visits to the Cuban and Soviet embassies there. In 1977, he explained to the House Select Committee on Assassinations that no intelligence photos of Oswald's Mexico City trip were available because a photographic capability was not in operation on a twenty-four-hour-a-day basis and Oswald visited the embassies while the cameras were off.

Virtually everyone familiar with the claim that Oswald visited Mexico City in September 1963 finds it strange that not even one photograph of him during any of his alleged five visits to the embassies was captured by CIA surveillance cameras. Few researchers believe the person who made these visits was Oswald.

Phillips, who is believed by some researchers to have used the alias "Maurice Bishop," is suspected of having tried to foment a confrontation between the United States and the Soviet Union over Cuba. He also told the Assassinations Committee that when Lee Harvey Oswald was in Mexico City, his reason for visiting the Cuban and Soviet embassies was to try to arrange for his return to the Soviet Union.

Conspiracy; High Treason; Plausible Denial

Book of Facts: Pickard, John

Army major Pickard was the commanding officer of the Canadian Defense Department's photographic division. In 1977, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation asked him to study the famous photographs of a man alleged to be Lee Harvey Oswald holding a rifle and a newspaper while standing in the backyard of a home. Largely because of the inconsistencies of the shadows caused by the figure's nose and those of his body, Pickard decided the pictures had the "earmarks of being faked." Pickard claimed that the body in one photo is larger than that in the other, yet the heads match perfectly in size. The shadows of the nose and the torso fall in different directions, indicating that those portions of the body were photographed at different times of the day. This supports Oswald's charge, made while he was being questioned at Dallas Police Headquarters, that a picture of his head had been superimposed on the body of someone else who was holding the rifle. That the photos were faked is also supported by Malcolm Thompson.

*See also OSWALD, BACKYARD PHOTOGRAPH OF.
Conspiracy*

Book of Facts: Pitzer, William B.

A trained X-ray technician at Bethesda Naval Hospital, Navy commander Pitzer is believed to have filmed the Kennedy autopsy from the gallery overlooking the room. According to Dennis David, Pitzer had in his possession a movie of the autopsy and slides that were presumably made from the film. Pitzer's name, however, does not appear on the official list of those who attended the autopsy.

Commander Pitzer was found dead of a gunshot wound to the head in his Bethesda office on October 29, 1966. The death was ruled a suicide. After years of delay, the Navy finally released the report of Pitzer's autopsy, which revealed no gunpowder burns to the head, evidence that would be present had he held the gun in his own hand. The bullet that killed Pitzer was fired into the right side of his head, although friends claim he was left-handed. In addition, both his wife and David, who was a close friend, claim there was no reason for him to kill himself. They believe he was murdered to prevent his film - now vanished - from becoming public, and as a warning to anyone else who might possess evidence concerning the autopsy.

See also AUTOPSY CONTROVERSY.

High Treason; High Treason 2

Book of Facts: Pizzo, Frank

Pizzo was Albert G. Bogard's boss at Downtown Lincoln-Mercury in Dallas. While Bogard's memory of the man calling himself Lee Oswald was not that good, Pizzo's was much stronger. When shown photos of Lee Harvey Oswald by the Warren Commission, he described a man who looked similar to, but not exactly like, Oswald. When pressed to identify the man in the picture as the man who had visited the dealership on November 9, 1963, and had remarked that he would be coming into money soon to buy a new car, Pizzo responded, "I have to say that he is not the one."

On the Trail of the Assassins

Book of Facts: Plausible Denial

Written by Mark Lane and published in 1991 by Thunder's Mouth Press, Plausible Denial: Was the CIA Involved in the Assassination of JFK? tells the fascinating story surrounding a lawsuit brought by former CIA operative and Watergate conspirator E. Howard Hunt against the right-wing publication Spotlight. Lane acted as the attorney for the defendants in the suit, Spotlight and its publisher, Liberty Lobby, Inc.

Hunt's suit was based on his charge that he had been defamed in an article published by Spotlight in September 1978. Titled "CIA to Admit Hunt Involved in Kennedy Assassination," the article was written by another former CIA operative, Victor Marchetti. In the piece, Marchetti alleged that the Central Intelligence Agency was about to engage in what is known as a "limited hangout" - a strategy used when the Agency can no longer cover up some misdeed and so releases a small part of the truth to the public in an effort to satisfy people's demand to know without the Agency's having to reveal too much damaging information. In the "limited hangout" Marchetti wrote about, the CIA was going to provide the House Select Committee on Assassinations with evidence that Hunt's alibi concerning his whereabouts on the day of the assassination was a lie and that he was indeed in Dallas on November 22, 1963.

The case permitted Lane to submit a long list of CIA-related individuals to searching questions about their knowledge of or involvement in the assassination. When the trial concluded - with a decision in Spotlight's favor - the jury forewoman, Leslie Armstrong, told reporters that Lane had convinced her that the CIA had indeed killed President Kennedy.

See also HELMS, RICHARD; LORENZ, MARITA; STURGIS, FRANK.

Book of Facts: Poe, J. M.

At the scene of the murder of Police Officer J. D. Tippit, Officer Poe was handed two spent cartridges picked up by one of the witnesses, Domingo Benavides. Poe scratched his initials, JMP, into the cartridges as a way of later confirming their identity. When the Warren Commission showed him four cartridges allegedly from the bullets used to kill Tippit, Poe was unable to identify them because none bore his initials. Sergeant Willie E. Barnes, who also scratched his initials into cartridges found at the scene, had similar difficulty in precisely identifying them when the Warren Commission presented him with the cartridges it claimed had been found at the scene.

Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Pontchartrain, Lake

A large lake north of New Orleans, Lake Pontchartrain was the site of a CIA-supported training camp for Cuban exiles who were being prepared for an invasion of Cuba. When the Kennedy administration learned of the camp, the FBI was ordered to raid it and destroy all equipment found there. The raid was heavily publicized, as was Director J. Edgar Hoover's habit, but its actual results in breaking up the groups engaged in training were questionable. Among those connected to the camp were David Ferrie and Guy Banister.

On the Trail of the Assassins

Book of Facts: Post Office Box 2915

When he moved from Fort Worth to nearby Dallas, Lee Harvey Oswald rented post office box 2915 under the name Lee H. Oswald. This box is the one identified as the address of the recipient who ordered the Mannlicher-Carcano rifle allegedly found on the sixth floor of the Texas School Book Depository Building after the assassination. It was also the address of the recipient of the handgun allegedly used to kill Police Officer J. D. Tippit. The rifle was shipped to the name A. Hidell by Klein's Sporting Goods Company of Chicago.

See also ALIASES USED BY OSWALD; HOLMES, HARRY D.
Conspiracy

Book of Facts: Powell, James

James Powell, an Army intelligence officer, was locked inside the Dal-Tex Building overlooking Dealey Plaza when the building was sealed immediately after the assassination. Also inside the building was a Mafia courier named Eugene Hale Brading, who was using the alias Jim Braden. Powell's appearance at the scene, and the suspected presence of other Army intelligence agents, has led to speculation that military intelligence officials may have been responsible for the assassination and for setting up Lee Harvey Oswald as the scapegoat.

High Treason

Book of Facts: Powell, John

John Powell, jailed for a minor infraction, occupied a sixth-floor cell of the Dallas County Jail, which was across the street from the Texas School Book Depository Building. Years after the assassination, Powell said that he and many other prisoners saw two men in the "assassin's window" adjusting the telescopic sight on a rifle. According to Powell, one of the men he observed had dark-colored skin and appeared to be Latin.

See also DARK-COMPLEXIONED MAN (OR MEN); MITCHELL, WILLIE.
Conspiracy; High Treason

Book of Facts: Powers, Dave

Powers was an assistant to President Kennedy and had joined him on the Texas trip. Powers was riding in the car directly behind the presidential limousine and witnessed both Kennedy's and John Connally's reactions to the shots. He told the Warren Commission that although his first impression was that the shots came from overhead and to the right, he also had a "fleeting impression that the noise appeared to come from in front in the area of the Triple Underpass." Powers returned to Washington in the rear of Air Force One with Mrs. Kennedy and the casket. See also MCHUGH, GODFREY; O'BRIEN, LAWRENCE F.; O'DONNELL, KENNETH.
Best Evidence; Crossfire

Book of Facts: Powers, Jacquie

A staff correspondent for the Wilmington [Del.] Sunday News Journal, Powers and fellow correspondent Joe Trento wrote an article published in the August 20, 1978, issue of the paper exposing the existence of a 1966 CIA memo written by William Corson that definitely placed E. Howard Hunt in Dallas on the day of the assassination. The article offers speculation that some CIA investigators may have theorized that Hunt's purpose for being in Dallas was to murder Lee Harvey Oswald on orders from a KGB mole who had infiltrated a high-level CIA post.

See also MARCHETTI, VICTOR.

Plausible Denial

Book of Facts: Preyer, Richardson

A former federal judge, Preyer was a congressman from North Carolina when he was appointed to the House Select Committee on Assassinations. After a period of turmoil that saw the original chief counsel, Richard Sprague, forced out and Committee chairman Henry Gonzalez resign in disgust, Preyer and the new chief counsel, G. Robert Blakey, became de facto cochairmen. The new chairman, Louis Stokes, showed little inclination to assume firm control over the Committee and its staff. Preyer concurred with the Committee's finding that the president's murder was probably the result of a conspiracy.

High Treason

Book of Facts: Price, Jesse C.

Jesse Price was watching the presidential motorcade from the roof of the Terminal Annex Building located across Dealey Plaza from the Grassy Knoll. Within an hour of the assassination, he gave the Dallas sheriff's office an affidavit stating that he heard a "volley" of shots, and saw a man running behind the fence on the Grassy Knoll toward some passenger cars on the railroad siding. Despite his vivid eyewitness testimony, Price was never questioned by the Warren Commission. When author Mark Lane interviewed him in 1966, Price said the man was carrying something that "could have been a gun."

Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Price, Malcolm

Malcolm Price told the Warren Commission he had seen a man he believed was Lee Harvey Oswald practicing with a rifle at the Sports Drome Rifle Range in Dallas only weeks before the assassination. The other witnesses at the rifle range had mixed reactions to the identification; some of the patrons thought the man had been Oswald, while others did not.

See also SLACK, GARLAND G.

Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Prouty, L. Fletcher

Colonel Prouty was the liaison officer between the Air Force and the Central Intelligence Agency in their cooperative U-2 spy plane operation during the time Lee Harvey Oswald served in the Marines and during his subsequent defection to the Soviet Union. Prouty said Oswald was no ordinary Marine, and that he was probably on a cover assignment when he went to the Soviet Union.

Prouty is the author of The Secret Team: The CIA and Its Allies in Control of the United States and the World, published by Prentice-Hall in 1973, and JFK: The CIA, Vietnam and the Plot to Assassinate John F. Kennedy, published by Birch Lane in 1992. He is outspoken in his opinion that the assassination was a coup by what he terms the "secret team." He identifies this "secret team" as a powerful group of wealthy men who formed the military-industrial complex that wanted to keep the Vietnam War going for personal profit. Prouty has also said that Kennedy was indeed engaged in breaking up the CIA and was intent on ending U.S. involvement in Vietnam.

Conspiracy; High Treason

Book of Facts: Prusakova, Ilya

Ilya Prusakova was Marina Oswald's uncle, with whom she was living when Lee Harvey Oswald met her at a dance in Minsk. Prusakova was a colonel in the Soviet Ministry of Internal Affairs, which had a secret police component. When Oswald applied for the return of his U.S. passport (which he had relinquished when he had defected), J. Edgar Hoover objected, fearing that the KGB would substitute one of its agents for Oswald.

Crossfire; High Treason

Book of Facts: Purdy, D. Andrew

D. Andrew Purdy, an attorney, supervised the medical portion of the investigation of Kennedy's death by the House Select Committee on Assassinations. Purdy was involved in a controversy concerning whether or not he had shown autopsy pictures to the Parkland Memorial Hospital doctors to get their reactions. According to researcher Harrison Edward Livingstone, Purdy claimed he had, but none of the doctors remembered his doing so. Only one of the Dallas doctors could recall seeing any of the visual record of the autopsy: Dr. Malcolm Perry, who claims he was shown an autopsy drawing of the wound to the president's throat, but not an actual photograph. Livingstone claims that Purdy was not given access to the autopsy photographs, which were kept in the Committee's safe.

High Treason 2

Book of Facts: Puterbaugh, Jack

Assassination researcher Penn Jones claims that Secret Service agent Puterbaugh was responsible for ignoring Secret Service regulations that prescribe a minimum speed of forty-four miles per hour for the presidential limousine and for revising the motorcade route, forcing the car to make two turns in Dealey Plaza instead of going straight on Main Street. The circuitous route that took the car from Houston Street onto Elm Street required it to slow down to seven miles per hour.

High Treason

Book of Facts: Quigley, John

John Quigley worked in the Federal Bureau of Investigation's New Orleans office. When Lee Harvey Oswald was arrested in that city for creating a disturbance while distributing Fair Play for Cuba Committee literature, he demanded to see an FBI agent. His request granted, he met with Special Agent Quigley in a lengthy private interview. Later, Quigley claimed he destroyed his notes from that interview, an act that does not square with usual Bureau procedure.

Oswald has been suspected of being a paid informant for the FBI, a charge the Warren Commission decided to handle by requesting a statement from J. Edgar Hoover saying that Oswald had never worked for him.

See also CARR, WAGGONER; PENA, OREST.

On the Trail of the Assassins

Book of Facts: Quiroga, Carlos

Quiroga was a Cuban exile leader whom a New Orleans private investigator named David L. Lewis reportedly saw in the company of David Ferrie and a "Leon Oswald." Lewis later claimed that "Leon Oswald" was Lee Harvey Oswald. (Ferrie and Oswald were seen together at least twice in the offices of Guy Banister.)
High Treason 2

Book of Facts: Rachley, Virgie

By the time she testified before the Warren Commission, Miss Rachley had become Mrs. Donald Baker. Rachley was a bookkeeper in the Texas School Book Depository Building in 1963. On the day of the assassination, she was standing outside the building watching the motorcade pass. When the shots were fired, at first she thought they were firecrackers being set off by kids, because she saw something hit the pavement just behind the presidential limousine and throw up sparks as it struck. Rachley told an attorney from the Warren Commission that she thought the shots came from "close to the underpass."

See also BULLETS FIRED, NUMBER OF; TEXAS SCHOOL BOOK DEPOSITORY BUILDING EMPLOYEES.
Crossfire; Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Ragano, Frank

In the January 14, 1992, issue of the New York Post, Ragano, who claimed to have been Jimmy Hoffa's attorney and confidant, was reported as saying that he carried a message from Hoffa to mob bosses Carlos Marcello and Santos Trafficante asking them to kill President Kennedy. Ragano says he delivered the message in early 1963, with Hoffa's admonition, "This must be done." Ragano's statement created a furor among former Hoffa associates and detractors, who expressed doubt that Ragano was close enough to Hoffa for the Teamsters leader to trust him with such a confidential message. In the 1992 edition of their book Fatal Hour, authors G. Robert Blakey and Richard N. Billings report that Ragano claims to have had a deathbed talk with Trafficante in which Trafficante admitted involvement in the Kennedy assassination.

Contract on America; Fatal Hour

Book of Facts: Ramsey Report

Dr. Norman Ramsey, a Harvard physics professor, was asked by the National Academy of Sciences to study the Dallas police dispatch tape. The House Select Committee on Assassinations had asked the Justice Department to continue its investigation of the alleged four gunshots on the tape when the Committee's term expired, and Justice passed the request to the National Academy of Sciences. The result was the creation of the Committee on Ballistics Acoustics.

The ballistics committee's report, generally known as the Ramsey Report, concluded that the acoustics examinations done for the House Select Committee on Assassinations were incorrect, that the tape does not reveal that a shot was fired from the Grassy Knoll. Needless to say, this caused an uproar among assassination researchers, who charged that the Ramsey group had been given not the original police recording but a poor copy.

Final Disclosure; High Treason

Book of Facts: Randle, Linnie Mae

Randle was Buell Wesley Frazier's sister. Frazier drove Lee Harvey Oswald, his colleague at the Texas School Book Depository, to work the day of the assassination. Randle, who lived with Frazier in Irving, Texas, across the street from Ruth Paine's house, where Marina Oswald was living and where Lee had spent the previous night, told the Warren Commission she saw Lee place a package in her brother's car before they left for work. When Frazier asked what was inside the package, Oswald told him, "Curtain rods."

In each of two experiments conducted more than three months apart, FBI agents showed Randle a package whose length they asked her to fold to match the approximate length of the package she had seen Oswald carrying. The first time, she identified a package that was 27 inches long. The second time, she selected a package that was 28.5 inches long. Frazier measured the approximate length of the package as he remembered it resting on the rear seat of his car at 27 inches. When the Mannlicher-Carcano rifle, allegedly the murder weapon, was dismantled, the largest piece was 34.8 inches long. If the package Oswald carried that day contained the murder weapon, as claimed by the Warren Commission, it could not have been shorter than approximately 35 inches.

Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Rankin, J. Lee

A former solicitor general of the United States, Rankin was the general counsel for the Warren Commission. In that post, he set the tone for the work done by the attorneys working under him. Rankin is accused by assassination researchers of skillfully guiding the Commission's investigation toward its desired conclusion that Lee Harvey Oswald was guilty and that he worked alone; he is also accused of using a double standard in assessing evidence and statements by witnesses.

Best Evidence

Book of Facts: Rather, Dan

When television news anchor Rather discussed Oliver Stone's film JFK on the "CBS Evening News," he described it as mixing "fact, fiction, and theory." Rather himself was guilty of doing the same thing decades earlier when he told TV viewers that the Zapruder film showed the president's head moving forward as the fatal bullet hit it. Years later, Rather admitted this was wrong. As anyone who has seen the film can testify, the president's head snaps backward and his entire body falls back and to his left.

High Treason; High Treason 2

Book of Facts: Rebentisch, Donald

A Navy petty officer at Bethesda Naval Hospital in 1963, Rebentisch is quoted as saying that he and five other petty officers took the president's coffin from the ambulance to the room where the autopsy was to be performed. This conflicts with the Military District of Washington, D.C., Casket Team's report, which states that the team brought the coffin into the hospital. Rebentisch claims he was told by a chief petty officer that the ambulance parked in front of the hospital was carrying an empty coffin. Assassination researcher Harrison Edward Livingstone believes the casket Rebentisch carried into the hospital contained the remains of an Air Force major awaiting burial.

See also COFFIN CONTROVERSY.

High Treason 2

Book of Facts: Redlich, Norman

Norman Redlich, a Warren Commission attorney, was General Counsel J. Lee Rankin's special assistant. Redlich was a main contributor to the text of the Warren Report, which frequently ignored or even denied compelling facts that ran counter to the Commission's insistence on the single bullet theory and the lone assassin theory. Redlich summed up his unshakable support for the single bullet theory with words to this effect: to admit that Kennedy and Governor John Connally were hit with separate bullets is synonymous with saying there were two assassins.

Best Evidence

Book of Facts: Reed, Edward F.

An X-ray technician at Bethesda Naval Hospital, Reed was present during the Kennedy autopsy. According to author David S. Lifton, Reed assumed, based on the location of the head wound, that the president had been shot from the front. It was almost six months before it dawned on him that his opinion differed from the official autopsy report.

See also AUTOPSY CONTROVERSY; CUSTER, JERROL F.; HEAD WOUND CONTROVERSY.

Best Evidence

Book of Facts: Reid, Mrs. Robert A.

Mrs. Reid was a clerical supervisor at the Texas School Book Depository Building. She had joined Depository vice president Ochus V. Campbell and superintendent Roy Truly to watch the presidential motorcade from the sidewalk in front of the building. They heard what they thought were firecracker explosions, and Mrs. Reid turned to Campbell and said she thought they came from "our building." Campbell replied that they came from the direction of the Grassy Knoll. Mrs. Reid then encountered Lee Harvey Oswald, whom she said was drinking a Coke, on the second floor of the Book Depository, just two minutes after the assassination.

See also TEXAS SCHOOL BOOK DEPOSITORY BUILDING EMPLOYEES.
Crossfire

Book of Facts: Reilly, Frank

An electrician at Union Terminal, Reilly joined coworkers to watch the presidential motorcade pass through Dealey Plaza from the vantage point of the railroad overpass. He substantiated the testimony of others on the overpass that they had seen puffs of smoke rise above the Grassy Knoll moments after the shots were fired. Reilly testified that "the shots come [sic] out of the trees" near the top of the knoll.

See also OVERPASS WITNESSES.

Best Evidence

Book of Facts: Reily, William

Owner of the William Reily Coffee Company, where Lee Harvey Oswald was employed while he lived in New Orleans, Reily is said to have been an active supporter of anti-Castro Cuban groups.
On the Trail of the Assassins

Book of Facts: Revill, Jack

On the afternoon of the assassination, after Lee Harvey Oswald's arrest, Dallas police lieutenant Revill wrote a memorandum about Oswald that gave his address as 605 Elsbeth Street. Oswald had no identification with him that included an address, and the police claim they had no previous file on Oswald, so the question is, where did Revill get that address? In November 1963, Oswald did not live on Elsbeth Street, but he had lived at 602 Elsbeth Street until March of that year. Evidently an old file on Oswald existed and was given to the Dallas police immediately on his arrest.

According to researchers, the Texas state intelligence agency had a file on Oswald that was nothing more than several newspaper clippings. Many observers suspect that the address came from an unidentified U.S. Army intelligence officer who was allegedly riding in Revill's car soon after the assassination. If so, to produce the Oswald information so quickly, the man must have been carrying it with him prior to the assassination.

High Treason

Book of Facts: Reynolds, Warren

Reynolds heard the shots that killed Police Officer J. D. Tippit. He said that a man with a gun in his hand ran south on Patton Avenue and that he gave chase but lost the man after a block or so. Reynolds was not questioned about what he saw that day by any law enforcement agency until January 21, 1964, even though he had discussed what he witnessed previously on television and radio news programs. Reynolds was unable to identify the man he chased as Lee Harvey Oswald.

Things began going badly for Reynolds after his refusal to identify Oswald. He was shot in the head; Darrell Wayne Garner, the boyfriend of Betty Mooney MacDonald, one of Jack Ruby's strippers, was arrested for the attempted murder but released when MacDonald corroborated his alibi. Then someone attempted to abduct Reynolds's ten-year-old daughter, and someone purposely unscrewed the light that illuminated the front porch of his home. By July 1964, Reynolds had had enough, and he identified Oswald as the man he had chased. The Warren Commission could find no connection between Reynolds's original testimony and the events that followed it, or the reason he changed his testimony.

See also LEWIS, L. J.; PATTERSON, B. M.
High Treason; Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Rich, Nancy Perrin

Nancy Perrin Rich was a bartender at Jack Ruby's Carousel Club. Rich testified to the Warren Commission that Ruby had standing orders that any police officers who came to the club were to be served liquor at no charge. The Commission chose to ignore this testimony and claimed that Ruby offered only coffee and soft drinks to visiting cops. Rich claimed that when she first came to town, the Dallas police got her the job at Ruby's club.

Despite the fact that Rich told the Commission that Ruby knew virtually every cop in Dallas, and that every police officer on the Dallas force visited Ruby's club, with the exception of Captain Will Fritz, the Commission decided to rely on Police Chief Jesse E. Curry's guess that Ruby knew less than twenty-five cops.

Rich's testimony, which did not square with the Commission's image of Ruby as a friendly police groupie who knew more cops than the average citizen, does not even appear in the Warren Report. Also ignored were Rich's allegations that Ruby had been involved with anti-Castro elements and that he had helped run guns into Cuba for anti-Castro guerrillas.

Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Riebe, Floyd A.

A medical photographer at Bethesda Naval Hospital, Riebe was present during the autopsy performed on President Kennedy. As recently as May 1992, Riebe continued to insist that the official autopsy photographs could not be the ones he took because they show head wounds that are substantially different from the wounds he photographed. Riebe is also said to have claimed, along with others who were in the autopsy room, that some of the photographs appear to have been shot elsewhere, because certain walls and floors in the background do not resemble those at Bethesda.

See also AUTOPSY CONTROVERSY; AUTOPSY PARTICIPANTS; CUSTER, JERROL F.; HEAD WOUND CONTROVERSY.

Best Evidence; High Treason 2

Book of Facts: Rifle Identification

The Italian-made Mannlicher-Carcano rifle allegedly linked to Lee Harvey Oswald through the Chicago mail-order house Klein's Sporting Goods Company was eventually designated the weapon that was used to kill President Kennedy. It is allegedly the weapon discovered on the sixth floor of the Texas School Book Depository Building, although the four law enforcement officers connected with finding the rifle all state clearly that the one they found was a 7.65-caliber Mauser. These officers are Deputy Constable Seymour Weitzman, Deputy Sheriff Luke Mooney, Deputy Sheriff Roger D. Craig, and Deputy Sheriff Eugene L. Boone. The Mannlicher-Carcano has the following inscription clearly stamped on it: Made in Italy, Cal. 6.5.

When Army marksmen attempted to fire the Mannlicher-Carcano, they found that the sight was off so much they had to send it to an expert, who had to put shims under the scope to align it with the trajectory of the shots it fired. Rifle experts appear to agree virtually unanimously that this particular gun is a remarkably poor choice of weapon for an assassination.

On the Trail of the Assassins

Book of Facts: Right- Wing Extremists

Researchers Robert J. Groden and Harrison Edward Livingstone, among others, have raised the possibility that right-wing hate groups were involved in President Kennedy's assassination. On November 22, 1963, the Dallas Morning News carried an ad, paid for by the American Fact-Finding Committee, accusing Kennedy of being a "fellow traveler," i.e., a communist sympathizer. From the point of view of groups such as the Ku Klux Klan, the Minutemen, and the White Citizens' Council, Kennedy was anathema not only because he was soft on communism but also because he supported civil rights. These violent groups flourished in the South and did especially well in Texas.

Kennedy's policies were also despised by conservative businessmen. For example, in 1963, the oil business was threatened with a substantial loss of revenue because of Kennedy's proposed retraction of the oil-depletion allowance.

See also FERRIE, DAVID; HUNT, H.L.; MILTEER, JOSEPH.

Book of Facts: Rike, Aubrey

___ An employee of Oneal's Funeral Home, Aubrey ("Al") Rike supervised placing the president's body in the coffin at Parkland Memorial Hospital. Although some witnesses at Bethesda Naval Hospital claim Kennedy was inside a body bag, Rike says he lined the coffin with a plastic bed liner to prevent blood from spilling on the satin lining. He said he did not use a body bag.

See also BODY BAG CONTROVERSY.

Best Evidence; High Treason 2

Book of Facts: Roberts, Delphine

Roberts was Guy Banister's secretary in his office at 544 Camp Street in New Orleans. At first hesitant to discuss what she had seen there, she later confirmed that both Lee Harvey Oswald and David Ferrie were frequent visitors. She also confirmed that Banister, a leader among anti-Castro elements, was fully aware that Oswald was distributing pro-Castro literature on the streets of New Orleans.

Conspiracy

Book of Facts: Roberts, Emory

A Secret Service agent riding in the car following the president's, Roberts was one of two men seated in front of agent Glen Bennett, who reported seeing a bullet strike the president four inches below the right shoulder.

Best Evidence

Book of Facts: Roberts, Earlene

Earlene Roberts was the housekeeper at the rooming house where Lee Harvey Oswald was living at the time of the assassination. Roberts told the Warren Commission that Oswald returned home about 1:00 P.M., thirty minutes after the shooting in Dealey Plaza, put on a dark blue jacket, and left immediately. She said that several minutes later, observing him from the front window of the house, she saw Oswald standing at a bus stop. Roberts claimed that while Oswald was in his room, a police car with two men inside stopped in front of the house and sounded its horn twice, as if signaling someone, then pulled away. The identity of the car has never been established.

Roberts's testimony was not accepted by the Commission on two counts: First, the time frame in which she claims to have seen Oswald, especially her report that he was standing at a nearby bus stop, does not allow him to get to the scene of the J. D. Tippit shooting in time to be the murderer; and, second, she claims Oswald was wearing a dark blue jacket, while witnesses to the Tippit murder said the shooter wore a light-colored jacket and the police reported finding a white jacket that was allegedly discarded by the killer as he made his escape. Mark Lane has also pointed out that a bus stopping where Roberts saw Oswald standing would have taken him in a direction away from the place where Tippit was shot.

Conspiracy; Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Rose, Dr. Earl

Dr. Rose was the Dallas County medical examiner in 1963. When the Kennedy party decided to remove the president's body from Parkland Memorial Hospital, Dr. Rose told them they should not break "the chain of evidence." Rose insisted that the body not be taken from the hospital until an autopsy had been performed. He called on a local police officer, who stood next to him in an attempt to prevent the Secret Service and Kennedy's aides from taking the body. It was Rose's position that the president's death was a homicide and that under Texas law a homicide required a thorough autopsy before the body could leave the state.

When Justice of the Peace Theron Ward gave his approval to the Secret Service request to remove the body, Rose was pushed aside and the president's body taken away to Bethesda Naval Hospital outside Washington, where the autopsy, perhaps the most criticized in history, was performed. One cannot help but wonder whether all the tales of wound alterations, evidence tampering, body switching, and falsified autopsy photographs and X rays might have been avoided had Dr. Rose prevailed and performed the autopsy at Parkland instead.

Death of a President

Book of Facts: Rose, Gus

Dallas police detective Rose reportedly claimed that a Minox camera containing exposed film was found among Oswald's possessions following the assassination. The police property report lists the camera as item #375. When the property inventory was issued by the FBI, item #375 had become a Minox light meter. Rose reportedly said that the FBI attempted to get him to alter the police report so it would conform with the FBI report.

Conspiracy; High Treason

Book of Facts: Roselli, Johnny

Roselli was a Las Vegasbased Mafia figure and a link in the CIA-Mafia chain. He had close ties to three Mafia bosses associated with the Kennedy assassination: Sam Giancana of Chicago, Santos Trafficante of Florida, and Carlos Marcello of New Orleans.

According to columnist Jack Anderson, Roselli told him that mob leaders had ordered Jack Ruby to kill Lee Harvey Oswald because they were afraid he might crack and reveal their part in the conspiracy to kill President Kennedy.

In July 1976, shortly before Roselli was to be questioned by the Senate Intelligence Committee, his body was discovered floating in Dumfoundling Bay in Miami. He had been strangled and stabbed; his legs had been sawed off and stuffed into an empty oil drum along with the rest of his body. It is believed that Roselli was killed by someone working for Trafficante because he was talking too much about the Kennedy assassination.

Conspiracy

Book of Facts: Rowland, Mr. and Mrs. Arnold

Arnold Rowland and his wife and son were across from the Texas School Book Depository Building awaiting the arrival of the presidential motorcade. At approximately 12:15 P.M., Rowland noticed a man with a high-powered rifle standing a few feet back from the southwest corner window of the sixth floor of the building. He thought the man was a presidential security guard and pointed him out to his wife. Mrs. Rowland did not see the man, who her husband said had stepped back, but she was "very nearsighted" and did not have her glasses on. But what about the southeast corner, where Lee Harvey Oswald supposedly fired from? Rowland said he saw a black man lean out that window minutes before the shooting.

The Warren Commission treated Rowland as if he were a liar. Commission lawyers even got his wife to admit that he had once exaggerated his school grades. The problem was, the Commission had apparently already concluded that the assassination was carried out by one man. Thus, any testimony, like Rowland's, that supported the possibility of more than one shooter, was likely to be dismissed.

See also DARK-COMPLEXIONED MAN (OR MEN); DEALEY PLAZA WITNESSES.
Conspiracy; Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Rowley, James J.

Secret Service Chief Rowley was sent the magic bullet from Dallas and forwarded it to the FBI lab. He also called Bethesda Naval Hospital and told Agent Roy Kellerman, who was watching the autopsy, about the discovery of a bullet. Rowley reported to the Warren Commission that he had reviewed all materials from the local Dallas television and radio stations, as well as the three national television networks, but was unable to locate a transcript of the press conference in Dallas at which Dr. Malcolm Perry had described the president's throat wound as a bullet entry wound. A copy of that transcript had been made by the White House because it was considered a presidential press conference, and a copy was available to researchers who requested it.

See also PARKLAND PRESS CONFERENCE.

Best Evidence

Book of Facts: Ruby, Jack

To the horror of millions of Americans who watched the event on a live television broadcast, Jack Ruby shot and killed Lee Harvey Oswald at 11:21 A.M. (CST) on Sunday, November 24, 1963. Ruby shot Oswald as Oswald was being taken, under guard, through the basement garage of Dallas Police Headquarters en route to the Dallas County jail, to which he was being transferred. Ruby delivered one shot to Oswald's abdomen at point-blank range using a .38 snub-nosed revolver. Ruby had no business being in the garage, and it is widely suspected that his close police contacts gave him entree to the building.

Ruby, who in 1963 was the owner of a Dallas striptease club called the Carousel, had had close ties to underworld organizations, including the Mafia, for most of his life. Born Jacob Rubenstein in Chicago in 1911, Ruby had moved to Texas in 1947. There is ample evidence that Ruby participated in Mafia-backed gun-running schemes to Cuba in 1959 in an effort to help Fidel Castro overthrow the regime of Cuban dictator Batista - an episode that Ruby and others involved later regretted when Castro banished the mobsters, who were heavily invested in Havana's hotel and casino business, from the island.

Ruby's motive for killing Oswald remains obscure. There is evidence to suggest that he and Oswald were acquainted with one another, a conclusion discounted by both the Warren Commission and the House Select Committee on Assassinations. Some evidence also leads to the speculation that Ruby knew Dallas Police Officer J. D. Tippit, whom the Warren Commission concluded Oswald killed early in the afternoon on November 22, 1963, shortly after having presumably assassinated President Kennedy.

In statements shortly after Oswald's death, Ruby claimed not to have premeditated his act, but to have killed Oswald in high passion, wanting, he said, to spare Jacqueline Kennedy the pain of having to return to Dallas for Oswald's trial. Later, however, Ruby claimed to have been framed into committing Oswald's murder. In letters smuggled out of his prison cell, Ruby implicated Lyndon B. Johnson in the plot to kill Kennedy. And in one of his last public statements on the subject, Ruby said, "The world will never know the true facts of what occurred - my motive, in other words."

Ruby seems to have been present in a number of key places on the day of President Kennedy's assassination. Witnesses have alleged that Ruby was at Dealey Plaza both before and at the time of the assassination (see below), that he was at Parkland Memorial Hospital while doctors there were vainly attempting to save the president's life (see below), and that he elbowed his way into a news conference given by Oswald at police headquarters after midnight that night. All these reported appearances have led researchers to suppose that Ruby was somehow involved in the death of the president.

Ruby was indicted for Oswald's murder by a Dallas grand jury on November 27, 1963. His trial began on February 17, 1964, and lasted until March 3. The jury delivered its guilty verdict and sentenced him to death on March 14. Ruby's conviction, however, was reversed by the Texas Court of Appeals on October 5, 1966, because of irregularities in the murder trial, over which Judge Joe Brown had presided.

Before a new trial could occur, Ruby suddenly died of cancer on January 3, 1967. Some researchers remain unsatisfied that Ruby died of "natural" causes - raising suspicions that Ruby had been injected with cancer-producing cells or that he had been subjected to heavy doses of cancer-causing X rays.

Crossfire; Ruby Cover-up

Book of Facts: Ruby in Dealey Plaza

Jack Ruby claimed he was in the offices of the Dallas Morning News at the time of the assassination, a statement that was only partially corroborated by witnesses there. Several witnesses, however, claimed they saw Ruby near the Texas School Book Depository Building moments after the shooting; these witnesses include Victoria Adams, Philip L. Willis, and Wes Wise. Julia Ann Mercer claims that on the morning of the day of the assassination, she saw Ruby behind the wheel of an illegally parked truck on Elm Street near the railroad overpass.

Book of Facts: Ruby at Parkland Memorial Hospital

Jack Ruby denied that he was anywhere near Parkland Memorial Hospital during the time the president's body was there. The Warren Commission chose to believe him in spite of testimony from two witnesses who said they saw him inside the hospital at that time. Reporter Seth Kantor told the Commission that he not only saw Ruby, whom he had known for several years, but actually spoke to him briefly while the doctors were still working to save Kennedy's life in the emergency room. Wilma Tice told the Commission that she saw a man, who she later realized was Ruby when she saw his picture on television, in the hospital while the president was there. She said Ruby was talking to another man who was probably Kantor, based on the portions of their conversation she overheard.

Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Rudnicki, Jan Gail

Rudnicki was Dr. Thornton Boswell's lab assistant and was called to duty by Boswell to help with the president's autopsy. Researcher Harrison Edward Livingstone asked Rudnicki if he recalled whether a complete bullet was found in the sheets on which Kennedy's body had been lying. He explained that he was in the autopsy area for the entire procedure, but was going back and forth to the adjoining tissue room to prepare slides. He said he might have been in the tissue room at the time, "but I remember some conversation concerning" what he assumed was a "bullet."

See also OSBORNE, DR. DAVID.

High Treason 2

Book of Facts: Rush To Judgment

Published in 1966 by Holt, Rinehart & Winston and reissued (with two new sections) in 1991 by Thunder's Mouth Press, this book by attorney Mark Lane remains the landmark work on the assassination and the investigation conducted by the Warren Commission. Lane, who tried unsuccessfully to represent Lee Harvey Oswald before the Commission, examines the evidence provided by witnesses never questioned by Commission representatives and also reviews testimony taken but ignored. Rush to Judgment was a runaway best-seller that convinced many people that the Warren Commission investigation was incomplete and its conclusions wrong.

Book of Facts: Russell, Richard B.

A Democrat from Georgia, Russell was one of two senators appointed to the Warren Commission. According to Commission insiders, Russell objected to signing a report stating that one bullet - the magic bullet - struck both Kennedy and John Connally. Russell also raised questions about Lee Harvey Oswald's alleged trip to Mexico City in the fall of 1963.

Best Evidence: Plausible Denial

Book of Facts: Russo Perry

Russo was an acquaintance of David Ferrie's who testified before a New Orleans grand jury that he had been present at a meeting in which Ferrie, Clay Shaw (known to him as "Clay Bertrand") and another man, called Leon Oswald, discussed reasons for killing President Kennedy. According to Russo, Ferrie favored the idea because it would lead to war with Cuba if they could place the blame for the assassination on Fidel Castro.
On the Trail of the Assassins

Book of Facts: Sanders, David

Sanders was the orderly on duty in the emergency room at Parkland Memorial Hospital while the president was being treated. According to William Manchester's report of how Kennedy's body was placed in the coffin, Sanders was instructed by funeral director Vernon Oneal to line the inside of the coffin with a plastic sheet. This plastic sheet has become the focus of controversy because some technicians in the autopsy room at Bethesda Naval Hospital reported that the president's body arrived inside a zippered bag.

See also BODY BAG CONTROVERSY.

Death of a President

Book of Facts: Sawyer, Herbert J.

Police inspector Sawyer provided the initial description of the assassination suspect to the police dispatcher for broadcast: a white man about thirty years old, five feet ten inches in height, and weighing about 165 pounds. Yet witnesses who had seen a man or men at the sixth-floor window of the Texas School Book Depository Building gave descriptions that varied from a young white man to an elderly black man. Controversy rages around the speed with which the Dallas police identified the suspect as Lee Harvey Oswald. When the Warren Commission questioned Sawyer about the source of the information he gave the dispatcher, Sawyer couldn't identify the witness who had supplied it. He could only recall that the man was white and that "he wasn't young and he wasn't old." The Commission eventually concluded that Sawyer's source was Howard L. Brennan. However, the identity of the man who actually gave Sawyer Lee Harvey Oswald's description remains a mystery. Some critics suspect the unidentified man was part of a conspiracy to make Oswald the "patsy" for the assassination.

Best Evidence; Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Scheim, David E.

Scheim is the author of Contract on America: The Mafia Murder of President John F. Kennedy, published by Zebra Books in 1988. This book deals with Jack Ruby's ties to organized crime and connotes that the Mafia had the "motive, means, and opportunity" to kill the president.

Book of Facts: Scoggins, William

Scoggins was a taxi driver who was parked not far from the scene of the shooting death of Police Officer J. D. Tippit. He reported that he saw a man walk away from the scene, but he ducked down behind his cab so the man would not see him. In a lineup that another taxi driver, William Whaley, called unfair to the suspect, Scoggins selected Lee Harvey Oswald as the man he had seen. Later, when asked to pick the man out from a number of photographs shown him by an FBI or Secret Service agent, Scoggins chose someone other than Oswald.

Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Scott, Frank

Scott was responsible for preparing a report for the House Select Committee on Assassinations dealing with the question of the authenticity of the autopsy photographs. He concluded that the photos were authentic, but left ample room for debate when he added a disclaimer saying he assumed "that the object photographed is, indeed, the body of President Kennedy."

High Treason 2

Book of Facts: Secret Service

Charged with protecting the life of the president, the Secret Service failed to do a professional job during Kennedy's visit to Dallas. The Service made four major errors. First, it never made a thorough investigation of the motorcade route to identify and neutralize potential sniper locations. Second, there were no Secret Service agents on the ground in Dallas; they were all riding in the motorcade, where they could react only after an assassination attempt, not take preventive action to avert one. Third, there was no order mandating the closing of windows in buildings overlooking the motorcade route, such as the Texas School Book Depository Building; such an order could have reduced the risk of someone firing at the president through an open window. Finally, the president's car was permitted to slow down to only a few miles per hour as it passed through Dealey Plaza - in direct violation of Secret Service regulations requiring the car to maintain a speed of at least forty-four miles per hour.

Additionally, some researchers have charged that a group of Secret Service agents responsible for the president's protection spent the night before the assassination getting drunk at a Fort Worth, Texas, after-hours club, The Cellar.

The extremely poor performance of the president's bodyguards has led some people to suspect the Secret Service was somehow involved in a conspiracy to kill Kennedy, although there has never been any proof that this was so.

In 1992, St. Martin's Press published Mortal Error: The Shot That Killed JFK, whose author, Bonar Menninger, maintains that Kennedy's death resulted from a shot fired accidentally by Secret Service agent George Hickey, who was riding in the follow-up car following the presidential limousine. Hickey did not answer the publisher's request for a response to the charge, but another Secret Service agent, Samuel Kinney, denied that Hickey had fired a shot.

Crossfire

Book of Facts: Secret Service Agents Unknown

According to the Secret Service, no agents were assigned to the area around Dealey Plaza on November 22, 1963. Yet Police Officers D. V. Harkness and Joe M. Smith report having encountered men who identified themselves as Secret Service agents behind the Grassy Knoll and behind the Texas School Book Depository Building.

Book of Facts: Selzer, Robert

A photographic expert, Selzer was a member of a panel created by the House Select Committee on Assassinations to examine photographs and films made of the assassination. The panel members held varied opinions concerning what some believe was movement in more than one window of the sixth floor of the Texas School Book Depository Building. Selzer concluded that there was movement that could mean there was a person in more than one window.

See also BRONSON FILM; HUGHES, ROBERT.

Conspiracy

Book of Facts: Senator, George

Senator shared an apartment with Jack Ruby in Dallas. Senator told the Warren Commission that he was genuinely shocked when he learned that Ruby had shot and killed Oswald, because Ruby had not indicated to him that he had planned to take any steps against Kennedy's assassin.

Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Sewall, Fred

Sewall was a salesman at the Bolton Ford dealership in New Orleans. Jim Garrison reported Sewall as claiming that he was approached by two men who wanted the dealer to give them a bid on the price of ten Ford pickup trucks. The men said they were from a group called Friends of Democratic Cuba. One of the men was powerfully built and of Latin heritage. He identified himself as "Joseph Moore." The second man was a thin Anglo-Saxon who said his name was Oswald and explained that he was the one paying for the trucks. This incident took place on January 20, 1961, while Lee Harvey Oswald was in the Soviet Union and three months before the Bay of Pigs invasion. Garrison charges that this was just one of many instances when Oswald's name was used by intelligence agencies, and he suspects the trucks were intended for the Cuban forces engaged in the Bay of Pigs attack. Garrison claims that one of the persons named in the incorporation papers for the Friends of Democratic Cuba was Guy Banister.

On the Trail of the Assassins

Book of Facts: Shaneyfelt, Lyndal

A photographic analysis expert employed by the FBI, Shaneyfelt examined the Zapruder film. He testified that Secret Service agent Clinton Hill placed one foot on the rear step of the presidential limousine at frame 368, which, according to researcher David S. Lifton, would be approximately three seconds after the fatal shot was fired at Kennedy. Hill testified that the car did not accelerate until he had stepped on it, meaning that the car remained relatively still until after the head shot was fired. Lifton argues that this means that Kennedy's head could not have been thrown backward - a motion that is clearly visible in the Zapruder film - by the acceleration of the automobile. That the limousine did not immediately speed up lends credence to the claim that Kennedy's head was propelled backward by the impact of a bullet that had been shot from somewhere in front of the limousine.

Best Evidence

Book of Facts: Shanklin, L. Gordon

Agent-in-charge of the FBI office in Dallas during November 1963, Shanklin has come under fire from numerous quarters for allegedly ordering Agent James Hosty to destroy a note Lee Harvey Oswald wrote him. The House Select Committee on Assassinations called this act a "serious impeachment" of Shanklin's credibility.

Conspiracy

Book of Facts: Shaw, Clay

Clay Shaw was a well-known business leader in New Orleans during the 1960s. He was also a member of a small clique of gay men that included David Ferrie. Shaw used the alias Clay Bertrand when he spent his evenings in the seedier bars of the French Quarter, but many people there knew his real identity. Shaw had close ties to Guy Banister and his ring of anti-Castro Cubans, and knew Lee Harvey Oswald. In January 1969, New Orleans District Attorney Jim Garrison charged Shaw with conspiracy in the murder of President Kennedy. He also charged that Shaw was a secret Central Intelligence Agency operative, a charge Shaw denied, but that was later confirmed as true. Shaw was acquitted of the conspiracy charge, but in interviews following the trial, jurors conceded that Garrison had convinced them that a conspiracy was behind the assassination of President Kennedy. Shaw died on August 14, 1974, and was quickly buried. When the New Orleans coroner, Dr. Frank Minyard, wanted to exhume the body to perform an autopsy, he was assailed by the local press and decided to leave the issue alone. The trial of Clay Shaw is the major focus of Oliver Stone's film JFK.

See also PERMINDEX.

On the Trail of the Assassins

Book of Facts: Shaw, Gary

Shaw has spent years researching and writing about the assassination. He has interviewed hundreds of people with connections to Kennedy's death. He is the author of Cover-up: The Governmental Conspiracy to Conceal the Facts About the Public Execution of John Kennedy, which he self-published in 1976. He is also the co-author, with Dr. Charles A. Crenshaw, of JFK: Conspiracy of Silence, published by Signet in 1992.

Book of Facts: Shaw, Jack

Reverend Shaw was with alleged CIA hitman and former Dallas Police Officer Roscoe White when White died following a mysterious fire. Shaw claimed that White made a deathbed confession to a number of murders. In 1991, Shaw told researcher and author Harrison Edward Livingstone that he believed White told the truth when he said he killed Kennedy. White is also believed to have shot and killed J. D. Tippit.

High Treason 2

Book of Facts: Shaw, Robert

Dr. Shaw was a Parkland Memorial Hospital surgeon who worked on the chest wound Governor John Connally received during the assassination. Dr. Shaw told Warren Commission member John J. McCloy that when a bullet hits "a bony substance such as a rib, usually the reaction is quite prompt." This testimony damages the single bullet theory, because the Zapruder film shows that Connally's reaction to being shot occurs substantially later than Kennedy's reaction to his throat wound, indicating that both men were not shot with the same bullet. Shaw also testified that based on the amount of metal fragments in Connally's wrist, he found it "difficult to believe" that the so-called magic bullet inflicted the governor's wounds. He also said the Parkland doctors were confused when they were told that the assassin had been behind the president when they were under the impression the bullet had "entered at the front of his neck."

See also FINCK, DR. PIERRE; MCCLELLAND, DR. ROBERT N. Best Evidence

Book of Facts: Shelley, William

A Texas School Book Depository Building employee, Shelley was standing in front of the building when the motorcade passed by. He told the Warren Commission that the shots "came from the west." The Grassy Knoll is to the west of the Book Depository Building.

See also LOVELADY, BILLY NOLAN.

Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Sheridan, Walter

An employee of the National Broadcasting Corporation, Sheridan was instrumental in the development of an NBC "White Paper" program called "The Case of Jim Garrison", which the New Orleans district attorney viewed as an attack on his investigation of the Kennedy assassination. The show relied heavily on the testimony of convicted felons, among others, to smear Garrison's ethical practices. According to a report by an investigator on Garrison's staff, Perry Russo claimed that Sheridan had promised to move him to California and protect his job with the Equitable Life Insurance Company, as well as guarantee he would not be extradited to Louisiana if he helped "bust up the Garrison probe."

On the Trail of the Assassins

Book of Facts: Similas, Norman

Similas was a businessman from Toronto, Canada, visiting Dallas on the day of the assassination. He was standing on the left side of Elm Street taking photographs of the approaching motorcade when the shots were fired. In an article written for a Canadian magazine, Similas claimed that when he had the photos developed, he could clearly see a rifle sticking out of a sixth-floor window of the Texas School Book Depository Building, with two figures standing over it. He said that he sent the negatives to a Toronto newspaper, which paid him handsomely for them but did not publish the photos. According to Similas, the paper later said it had lost the negative of the photo that Similas says showed the two figures with the rifle. Similas is also quoted as saying that he was within ten feet of the President when he was shot and could clearly see a hole in Kennedy's left temple. By coincidence, Similas, who was in Dallas for a soft-drink bottlers' convention, spent part of the evening before the assassination at the Carousel Club, where he had a long chat with its owner, Jack Ruby.

See also TEMPLE WOUND CONTROVERSY.

Best Evidence: Crossfire

Book of Facts: Simmons, James

A railroad worker who watched the presidential motorcade from the overpass above Elm Street, Simmons is reported to have said the shots came from the "wooden fence" atop the Grassy Knoll. He saw a puff of smoke from the same area. Simmons also reported having seen hundreds of footprints in the muddy ground behind the wooden fence, where he and other railroad workers rushed in the minutes following the shooting.

See also FOSTER, J. W.; HOLLAND, SAM; JOHNSON, CLEMMON; MILLER, AUSTIN; REILLY, FRANK; SMOKE FROM THE GRASSY KNOLL.

Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Simmons, Ronald

Simmons was one of three "master" marksmen the Warren Commission used to test fire the Mannlicher-Carcano rifle allegedly found on the sixth floor of the Texas School Book Depository Building following the assassination. Simmons estimated that the tower from which he and his colleagues fired their test shots was about thirty feet off the ground, only half the estimated sixty-foot height of the Depository Building's sixth floor. He reported numerous complaints about the rifle's operation, including the difficulty one man had in operating the bolt during his firing exercise. Simmons also told the Commission that the stationary target they fired at was not as far from them nor at the same angle as it would have been for someone taking aim from the sixth floor of the Depository Building.

See also FIRING SEQUENCE CONTROVERSY.
Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts; Single Bullet Theory

Warren Commission Assistant Counsel Arlen Specter is credited with originating the single bullet theory. The theory is believed to have been devised as a result of evidence that the Commission could not ignore concerning one of the bullets fired at President Kennedy. This was the bullet that hit the pavement halfway across Dealey Plaza from the president's limousine, kicking up debris that injured a bystander named James T. Tague. That left two other bullets, according to the Commission's conviction that only three shots were fired, to cause all the wounds President Kennedy and Texas governor John Connally received. One of these hit Kennedy's head and fragmented, leaving the other to do the rest. According to the Commission, this one bullet hit the president in the back, exited through his throat, passed through Connally's body, breaking a rib, then shattered a bone in his wrist, and finally entered his left thigh. All of these injuries were attributed to a bullet in near-perfect condition allegedly found in Parkland Memorial Hospital - what became known as the magic bullet (Warren Commission exhibit #399). Virtually all Warren Commission critics charge that the single bullet theory requires the bullet in question to make several sharp turns during its travels through both men - a highly improbable, if not utterly impossible, route. Rejecting the single bullet theory means accepting that more than three bullets were fired, and therefore that more than one gunman took part in the assassination, since Lee Harvey Oswald - whom the Commission identified as the assassin - could not possibly have gotten off more than three rounds during the specified time.

See also BULLETS FIRED, NUMBER OF; LONE ASSASSIN THEORY.
Crossfire; High Treason 2

Book of Facts: Sitzman, Marilyn

Marilyn Sitzman was standing alongside Abraham Zapruder on the concrete pergola on the Grassy Knoll when the president was shot. She reportedly had an unobstructed view of Kennedy when he was hit, and is quoted as saying that the head shot struck him just above his ear. Despite her proximity to the scene, she was never questioned by either the police or the Warren Commission.

See also GRASSY KNOLL WITNESSES; ZAPRUDER FILM.

Best Evidence

Book of Facts: Skelton, Royce G.

Along with a group of others, Skelton watched the presidential motorcade and the assassination from the vantage of the railroad overpass that borders the west side of Dealey Plaza. Skelton told the Warren Commission that he thought there had been four shots fired and that either the third or fourth shot had struck the roadway near "the left front of the President's car." See also BULLETS FIRED, NUMBER OF; DECKER, J. E. (BILL); FOSTER, J. W.; OVERPASS WITNESSES.
Warren Report

Book of Facts: Slack, Garland G.

Slack told the Warren Commission that at some time during the weeks preceding the assassination, he had had an argument at the Sports Drome Rifle Range in Dallas with a man he later believed was Lee Harvey Oswald. Other patrons of the Sports Drome, including Malcolm Price, also testified that they had encountered someone calling himself Oswald there that day. The man Slack thought was Oswald fired at Slack's target, resulting in a confrontation between them. The Warren Commission decided that Oswald could not have been at the range on the day in question. It also never pursued the reason someone whose appearance was similar to Oswald's was demonstrating his marksmanship publicly and clearly calling attention to himself.

Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Slawson, David

Slawson was a lawyer with the Justice Department in 1966 when J. Lee Rankin, general counsel for the Warren Commission, received a letter from Wesley J. Liebeler, who had been an assistant counsel for the Commission. In the letter, Liebeler questioned some of the medical evidence the Commission had been given. Slawson allegedly wrote to Ramsey Clark, then acting attorney general, explaining that there was still a "chance of spiking" a full-scale investigation of the autopsy by conducting a limited investigation. This may have resulted in the creation of the Clark Panel.
Best Evidence

Book of Facts: Smith, Joe M.

Dallas Police Officer Smith was directing traffic at the intersection of Houston and Elm streets when he heard the shots that killed the president. He raced up the Grassy Knoll, where he thought the shots had originated, pulling his handgun from its holster as he ran. Behind the fence at the top of the knoll, he smelled gunpowder, and ran into a man who identified himself as a Secret Service agent by showing Smith his ID card and shield. This is but one of numerous instances in which an individual encountered a Secret Service agent behind the Grassy Knoll or the Texas School Book Depository Building, yet the Secret Service insisted that no agents were on foot in the area that day, that they were all riding in the motorcade.

See also SECRET SERVICE AGENTS, UNKNOWN Conspiracy; Crossfire; Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Smith L. C.

Deputy Sheriff Smith was standing in front of the Dallas County jail when he heard three shots ring out. He dashed to Elm Street, where a woman told him the president had been shot in the head by someone firing from the fence on the Grassy Knoll. Smith joined several other police officers and deputies racing up the grass slope to the wooden fence, but found no shooters there.

Crossfire

Book of Facts; Smoke from the Grassy Knoll

The kind of ammunition still manufactured in 1963 produced a puff of smoke that rose above the shooter's head when a rifle was fired. Several people in or around Dealey Plaza at the time of the assassination reported seeing smoke rising from the stockade fence near the top of the Grassy Knoll during the seconds after the shots were fired. These witnesses include Richard C. Dodd, Sam Holland, Clemmon Johnson, Austin Miller, Thomas Murphy, Frank Reilly, James Simmons, and Walter Winborn.

Book of Facts: Sniper's Nest

Some forty boxes were stacked around a sixth-floor window inside the Texas School Book Depository Building, effectively blocking the view from the remainder of the floor. Each box was full of books and weighed about fifty pounds. Three spent cartridges were allegedly found inside this protected area. The Warren Commission claimed that Lee Harvey Oswald built this protection around himself so other employees would not stumble across him while he was preparing the kill the president. The boxes were examined for fingerprints, but only three partial prints belonging to Oswald were found on them. Oswald was, however, employed in the building to handle such boxes. According to the time frame established by the Commission, Oswald had less than fifteen minutes to construct his nest, yet when a six-foot seven-inch former football tackle attempted to re-create the sniper's nest, the job took him twenty-one minutes and he was left exhausted.

Texas Connection

Book of Facts: Sorrels, Forrest V.

Sorrels was the agent-in-charge of the Dallas Secret Service office. He rode in the first car of the motorcade with Police Chief Jesse E. Curry and Sheriff J. E. (Bill) Decker. According to Orville Nix, who claims to be a friend of Sorrels's, the agent told him that at the time of the assassination, he thought the shots had come from the Grassy Knoll. Sorrels, who then traveled with the motorcade directly to Parkland Memorial Hospital, was the only Secret Service agent to return to Dealey Plaza after the shooting. He reported having walked in through the back door of the Texas School Book Depository Building without being stopped or questioned one hour after the assassination, by which time the building had supposedly been "secured." He denied Howard L. Brennan's claim of having given Sorrels an accurate description of Lee Harvey Oswald as the killer within ten minutes of the shooting. Sorrels claimed that Brennan never said any such thing, and that he couldn't have returned from Parkland Memorial Hospital in that short a time.

Best Evidence: Crossfire

Book of Facts: Souetre, Jean

A Frenchman who had once attempted the murder of French president Charles de Gaulle, Souetre was reportedly in the United States at the time of the Kennedy assassination. According to CIA documents uncovered in 1977 by assassination researcher Mary Ferrell, a French intelligence agency was searching for Souetre five months after the assassination and claimed that he had been picked up by U.S. authorities somewhere in Texas within two days of President Kennedy's death and then expelled from the country. Dr. Lawrence Alderson, a dentist and resident of Houston, Texas, who had known Souetre in the early 1950s, claimed to have been put under FBI surveillance during the month after the assassination and to have been subjected to FBI questioning in December 1963 concerning his relationship with Souetre.

Reasonable Doubt

Book of Facts: Speaker, Sandy

According to author Jim Marrs, Speaker, who was the construction foreman on a project near Dealey Plaza on November 22, 1963, reports hearing at least five shots coming from different directions. Speaker told Marrs that his experience as a combat Marine fighting behind enemy lines during World War II made him sure he had heard more than three shots.

See also BRENNAN, HOWARD L.; MILLICAN, A. J.
Crossfire

Book of Facts: Specter, Arlen

An assistant counsel to the Warren Commission, and later a United States Senator from Pennsylvania, Specter is said to have been responsible for developing the single bullet theory. Specter has often been attacked by Warren Commission critics for, among other things, attempting to get members of the Parkland Memorial Hospital medical staff to change their testimony regarding their initial belief that President Kennedy's throat wound was an entry wound, not an exit wound as the autopsy concluded.

Best Evidence

Book of Facts: "Spotlight " Magazine

The Liberty Lobby, which publishes Spotlight, was sued by CIA agent E. Howard Hunt over an article written by Victor Marchetti charging that Hunt was in Dallas the day of the assassination, and that he had ties to the president's murder. The suit was rejected by a jury whose foreperson, Leslie Armstrong, later told reporters that she had been convinced by the evidence presented during the trial that the CIA was behind the assassination. The trial is the basis of lawyer-author Mark Lane's best-seller Plausible Denial, (Thunder's Mouth Press, 1991).

Book of Facts: Sprague, Richard A.

Sprague was the first chief counsel for the House Select Committee on Assassinations. Sprague was practically given carte blanche by the Committee's first chairman, Congressman Thomas Downing. After fighting with the Committee's second chairman, Henry Gonzalez, over control of the investigation, Sprague ran what Gonzalez called a "put-up job" of an investigation. Sprague quickly came under fire from members of Congress and was finally forced out.

High Treason

Book of Facts: Stokes, Louis

The third chairman of the House Select Committee on Assassinations, Stokes is quoted by authors Robert J. Groden and Harrison Edward Livingstone as telling the Committee's staff, "We all know that the fatal head shot came from the front."

High Treason

Book of Facts: Stone, Oliver

Stone's 1991 film JFK (which he wrote, produced, and directed) came under fire from the establishment press in this country even before he began shooting it. Once the darling of the liberal/left media, the Oscar-winning movie maker was, thanks to JFK, turned into a pariah in virtually all quarters, except in the eyes of the millions of people who paid to see the film. While almost everyone who is familiar with the conflicting details of President Kennedy's assassination may argue this or that point with Stone, as many researchers do over what they see as Stone's deification of Jim Garrison, one fact is certain: His film brought the assassination back to the American consciousness.

Book of Facts: Stover, John

Captain Stover was the commanding officer of the U.S. Naval Medical School at Bethesda, Maryland, on November 22, 1963. Following the autopsy performed on President Kennedy, at which he was present, Stover issued a written order confirming the verbal instructions all military personnel in attendance had received: that, under threat of court-martial, nothing was to be said to anyone about what happened in the autopsy room.

See also AUTOPSY CONTROVERSY; HEAD WOUND CONTROVERSY.

Best Evidence

Book of Facts: Stringer, John

Stringer was a Navy medical photographer with twenty years' experience in photographing the human body during an autopsy. He photographed President Kennedy's body during the autopsy at Bethesda Naval Hospital. (The authenticity of the autopsy photographs as they now exist has been widely disputed.) Significantly, on November 1, 1966, Stringer went to the National Archives, where most of the available autopsy material is kept, and signed a statement affirming that the pictures on file were the ones he had taken. When researcher David S. Lifton asked what test he applied to the photos before he signed the statement, Stringer told him there was none, because he had never seen the pictures developed. He had simply shot them and handed the film holder to a Secret Service agent.

See also NATIONAL ARCHIVES, DOCUMENTS MISSING FROM; RIEBE, FLOYD A.
Best Evidence

Book of Facts: Stroud, Martha Jo

An assistant United States attorney in Dallas, Stroud wrote to Warren Commission General Counsel J. Lee Rankin about evidence concerning a bullet that went wild and struck a curb opposite the Grassy Knoll. Stroud's insistence that the Commission interview James T. Tague, who was struck in the face by a piece of the curb thrown up by the bullet, forced the Commission to conclude that only two of the three bullets it claimed Lee Harvey Oswald fired had caused all the wounds - fatal and nonfatal - to President Kennedy and Governor John Connally. The result was the Commission's creation of what has come to be called the magic bullet, or single bullet, theory.

See also FIRING SEQUENCE CONTROVERSY; SPECTER, ARLEN.
Crossfire

Book of Facts: Sturgis, Frank

Sturgis was a CIA contract employee who worked with the Agency's anti-Castro groups before and after the Bay of Pigs Invasion. He is closely linked with E. Howard Hunt, and with the Watergate burglary that brought down the presidency of Richard M. Nixon. Sturgis was identified by Marita Lorenz, whom he recruited into the service of the CIA, as one of a group of heavily armed men she accompanied on a trip to Dallas shortly before the assassination.

Plausible Denial

Book of Facts: Styles, Sandra

Styles was on the fourth floor of the Texas School Book Depository Building when the shooting took place. She was unable to judge where the shots came from, but told FBI agents she and Victoria Adams descended the back stairs to the street level moments after the shots were fired. Neither woman saw or heard anyone else while they were on the stairs; this would have been the same time Lee Harvey Oswald is alleged to have been running down the stairs from the sixth floor to the second-floor cafeteria, where he was seen minutes later by Police Officer Marrion L. Baker.

See also DORMAN, ELSIE; GARNER, DOROTHY ANN; HOBSON, MRS. ALVIN.
Crossfire

Book of Facts: Sullivan, William_

Sullivan was a top aide to FBI director J. Edgar Hoover, and led the FBI investigation into Kennedy's assassination. It is reported that within two weeks of the assassination, Sullivan wrote a memo in which he said there was no evidence that Lee Harvey Oswald was an agent for a foreign power, including Cuba. This was in direct conflict with the stories being circulated, allegedly by "rogue" elements in the CIA, that Oswald was either a Soviet or a Cuban agent. On July 16, 1978, shortly before he was to be questioned by the House Select Committee on Assassinations, Sullivan was shot to death in what was described as a hunting accident.

High Treason 2

Book of Facts: Sweatt, Allen

Head of the Dallas Sheriff's Criminal Division, Deputy Sweatt reportedly received from Deputy John Wiseman the missing Polaroid photograph snapped by Mary Moorman. Sweatt then turned it over to the Secret Service, and it has never been seen again. A second Moorman photo, taken within seconds of the missing one, shows what many believe is a rifleman behind the fence atop the Grassy Knoll.

See also Hill, Jean.

High Treason

Book of Facts: Szulc, Tad

Tad Szulc, a reporter for the New York Times, claims that during a 1961 interview with the president, Kennedy raised the subject of attempts on Fidel Castro's life. Szulc said the president expressed grave concern about pressure he was receiving from the intelligence community to have Castro killed, but that he was "violently opposed" to political assassinations. Sources that are believed to be connected to the Central Intelligence Agency have tried to link Lee Harvey Oswald with Castro's government. Oswald, they claim, killed Kennedy on orders from Castro because the president had ordered Castro's assassination. Szulc also maintained that E. Howard Hunt was in Mexico City at the time of Oswald's alleged visit there in the fall of 1963.

Conspiracy

Book of Facts: Tague, James T.

Tague was stopped in traffic on Commerce Street on the side of Dealey Plaza opposite the Grassy Knoll. He got out of his car and watched the presidential motorcade. When the shooting, which he believed came from the Grassy Knoll, started, a bullet struck the curb in front of him and a piece of concrete hit him in the cheek, causing a small wound. Deputy Sheriff Eddy Walthers saw the wound and immediately searched the area where Tague had been standing. He filed a report in which he stated that he found a place "where a bullet had splattered on the top edge of the curb," causing damage to the concrete. At first the Warren Commission ignored this information, probably because it did not correspond with its assessment that only three shots were fired, all by Lee Harvey Oswald, from the Texas School Book Depository Building. Under pressure apparently created by a letter from Assistant U.S. Attorney Martha Jo Stroud about a bullet mark on the curb, the Commission had a staffer interview Tague. The FBI removed the section of curb and reported that it contained metal smears of lead. Unable to ignore this evidence of a wild shot, the Commission nonetheless held to its belief that only three shots were fired at Kennedy and created the single bullet theory to account for the nonfatal throat wound of the president and the multiple wounds suffered by Governor John Connally.

See also FIRING SEQUENCE CONTROVERSY; HAYGOOD, CLYDE A.; MAGIC BULLET; SPECTER, ARLEN.
Crossfire; Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Tatum, Jack

Tatum, who was driving in the Oak Cliff section of Dallas on the afternoon of November 22, 1963, claims he saw a young white man near the police car of J. D. Tippit when he heard three shots fired. When Tatum looked toward the car, he saw the officer on the ground and the young man standing over him. He said the man ran toward the rear of the police car, stopped, and fired one more shot at the officer, who was lying in the street in front of the car. Tatum sped off when the gunman ran in his direction.

See also TIPPIT MURDER SCENE WITNESSES.

High Treason

Book of Facts: Temple Wound Controversy

According to the Warren Commission, President Kennedy was shot only from the rear. Critics of the Commission's conclusions, however, have maintained that shots were fired from other locations as well - including the Grassy Knoll and possibly the railroad overpass. Important evidence that Kennedy may have been shot from the front appears to have been ignored by the official investigators of the assassination. One piece of evidence involves the throat wound that members of the Parkland Memorial Hospital staff identified as a bullet entry wound (but which the Commission described as an exit wound). Another involves a hole in the front of the president's head that, if caused by a bullet, could only have resulted from a gun fired from in front of him.

Four people reported having seen a hole in the president's temple. Father Oscar Huber, who administered last rites to Kennedy minutes after his death, has been quoted as telling reporters that he saw a "terrible wound" over the president's left eye. Dr. Marion Jenkins told the Warren Commission that while attempting to take Kennedy's pulse he noticed what he thought was a wound in "the left temporal area, right in the hairline." Pages 526 and 527 of the Warren Report reproduce a written report prepared at 4:45 P.M. on November 22, 1963, by Dr. Robert McClelland. The report states, "The cause of death was due to massive head and brain injury from a gunshot wound of the left temple." A Dealey Plaza witness to the shooting, Norman Similas, who was about ten feet from the presidential limousine, reported he could clearly see a hole in Kennedy's left temple.

Best Evidence: Warren Report

Book of Facts: Terry, L. R.

According to an interview conducted by Jim Marrs, Terry claims he was standing across the street from the Texas School Book Depository Building. When the motorcade passed him, he noticed two men at an upper-floor window and then saw a rifle barrel appear from the same window. He said the man holding the rifle was not wearing a white shirt, as others have described him.

See also BRENNAN, HOWARD L.

Crossfire

Book of Facts: "The Texas Connection"

This best-selling 1992 book, written by Scottsdale, Arizona, attorney Craig I. Zirbel and self-published by the Texas Connection Company, is billed as "the criminal investigation . . . against Lyndon B. Johnson," who the author charges was involved in the assassination of President Kennedy. The book's thesis is founded on what Zirbel calls "The right-hand-man theory" of political assassinations.

Book of Facts: Texas School Book Depository (TSBD)

According to the Warren Commission, it was from a sixth-floor window of the Texas School Book Depository Building that Lee Harvey Oswald, on November 22, 1963, fired three shots at the presidential motorcade passing below, killing President Kennedy and wounding Governor John Connally. A nondescript, worn-looking tan brick building at the corner of Houston and Elm streets, at the northeast corner of Dealey Plaza, the Depository had seen better days by 1963. Originally built to house the offices of a railroad company, the seven-story building later was occupied by the John Deere Company. The next occupant was a grocery wholesaler. In the early 1960s, it became a warehouse for the Texas School Book Depository, a depot that distributed textbooks to schools throughout the state. Some of its offices were rented to publishers of textbooks that were purchased for the Texas school systems. During the 1980s, there was talk that Dallas County was going to sell the building, until it was learned that the prospective buyer planned to dismantle it and sell the bricks as souvenirs. Today it serves as an annex for the county. Open to the public on the sixth floor (which in 1963 was used as a textbook storeroom) is a re-creation of the so-called sniper's nest.

Book of Facts: Texas School Book Depository Employees

The Texas School Book Depository Building housed offices for several textbook publishers as well as the Depository. Some building employees were outside the building at the time of the assassination, while others were inside watching from office or warehouse windows. Still others were not watching the motorcade and therefore saw nothing of the assassination. Among employees were: Victoria Adams; Carolyn Arnold; Mrs. Avery Davis; Jack E. Dougherty; Buell Wesley Frazier; Dorothy Ann Garner; Mrs. Alvin Hobson; James Jarman, Jr.; Dolores A. Kounas; Billy Nolan Lovelady; Harold D. Norman; Lee Harvey Oswald; Virgie Rachley; Mrs. Robert A. Reid; Roy Truly; Bonnie Ray Williams; and Steven F. Wilson.

Book of Facts: Texas Theater

This movie house in the Oak Cliff section of Dallas was the scene of Lee Harvey Oswald's arrest shortly after the murder of Dallas Police Officer J. D. Tippit several blocks away. A patron, George J. Applin, later claimed that one of the other patrons at the time was Jack Ruby.
Crossfire

Book of Facts: Thompson, Malcolm

A retired Scotland Yard superintendent with extensive experience in photographic evidence analysis, Thompson examined a now-famous photograph of Lee Harvey Oswald that shows him standing near a fence holding a rifle and a newspaper. When Oswald was shown this photo by Police Captain Will Fritz, he commented that someone had put his face on the photograph of another man. Thompson is reported to have identified several areas of the photo that were retouched. Apparently agreeing with Oswald, Thompson said the photograph was a "fake," and that it was a composite of several pictures pieced together. He called it a "montage," noting that although Oswald had a pointed chin, the chin of the man in the photograph is square. The opinion that the photo was faked was shared by John Pickard.

See also OSWALD, BACKYARD PHOTOGRAPH OF.
Conspiracy

Book of Facts: Throat Wound Controversy

When President Kennedy, nearing death, was brought into Parkland Memorial Hospital, Dr. Malcolm Perry almost immediately performed a tracheotomy - a procedure in which a small opening is made in the patient's throat and a tube is inserted to improve breathing. The tracheotomy incision was made over a wound that Perry later described to reporters as a bullet entry wound (see PARKLAND PRESS CONFERENCE). In his account of the assassination, Dr. Charles A. Crenshaw, who was present in the emergency room, described the wound as "an entry bullet hole."

When the autopsy was performed on President Kennedy's body at Bethesda Naval Hospital, the doctors failed to realize that the tracheotomy had been performed over a bullet wound. They concluded that the bullet hole in the president's back was caused by a bullet that had failed to penetrate the body and that had fallen out while he was being moved. When they were later told about the throat wound, they concluded that the bullet that entered Kennedy's back had exited through his throat, although this would have required the bullet to have traveled along an incredibly convoluted path.

Virtually every member of the medical team that worked on the president at Parkland Memorial Hospital described the hole in his throat as an entry wound, yet the Warren Commission chose to identify it as an exit wound made by the so-called magic bullet that allegedly wounded both Kennedy and Texas Governor John Connally. Obviously, if the doctors and nurses in the Parkland emergency room were correct in their original assumption (and there is no reason to doubt they were, given their extensive experience in treating gunshot wounds), an entrance wound in the president's throat could only have been caused by a bullet fired at him from the front.

In addition to the debate regarding whether the wound represented a bullet's entry or exit point, another controversy swirls around the condition of the wound when the body left Parkland. According to those at the scene, the tracheotomy and bullet hole were not closed before Kennedy's body was removed by the Secret Service for the trip to Washington. Yet in March 1978, the Lancaster, Pennsylvania, Intelligencer-Journal, in an interview with Dr. John Ebersole, who had X-rayed the body at Bethesda, reported that Ebersole said that when examining the body he had discovered a "very neatly sutured" opening in the throat that was identified as a surgical incision for a tracheotomy. According to Dr. Kemp Clark, who was interviewed by researcher David S. Lifton, no suturing was performed before Kennedy's body left Parkland hospital. As with so many other controversies associated with the president's murder, this one remains unresolved.

See also HENCHCLIFFE, MARGARET.

Best Evidence: High Treason

Book of Facts: Tice, Wilma

Tice was at Parkland Memorial Hospital when the president's death was announced. She claimed that she saw Jack Ruby in the hospital at that time. She said Ruby was greeted by a man who said to him, "How are you doing, Jack?" Ruby turned and spoke to him, giving Tice a clear view of his face. Ruby denied he was at the hospital while the president was there. The transcript of Tice's testimony before the Warren Commission's counsel gives the impression that the lawyer did not want her to testify about Ruby's presence in the hospital. Tice insisted that the man she saw was either Ruby "or his twin brother." Tice was so upset by the way the Commission's lawyer treated her that she later called and visited Ruby's sister, Eva Grant, and confirmed her own identification of the clothing Ruby was wearing that day.

See also RUBY AT PARKLAND MEMORIAL HOSPITAL.

Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Tilson, John

Dallas Police Officer John Tilson was off duty when President Kennedy was assassinated. He was driving near the area with his daughter when, as he approached the railroad overpass that borders Dealey Plaza, he saw a man "slipping and sliding" down the railway embankment. The man threw something into a black car parked at the bottom of the embankment, ran around the car and jumped into the driver's seat, and sped off. Tilson, who had been a police officer for seventeen years, well understood that a man running from a scene to which everyone else he could see was drawn was suspicious, so he decided to give chase. Unable to overtake his quarry, Tilson noted the car's tag numbers. He later gave this information to the Dallas Police Homicide Division, but in the chaos of reports that flooded in, this vital piece appears to have been lost, and as far as is known, the license plate number was never checked.

Conspiracy

Book of Facts: Tippit, J. D.

Jefferson Davis Tippit, a Dallas police officer, was murdered in the Oak Cliff section of Dallas approximately forty-five minutes after President Kennedy was shot. According to witnesses, Tippit stopped his squad car along the curb and spoke briefly to a man who the Warren Commission concluded was Lee Harvey Oswald. Tippit then got out of his car and walked around the front of the car toward the man, who pulled out a handgun and fired. Tippit was shot four times and died instantly. Oswald was apprehended at the Texas Theater, a few blocks away, and charged with Tippit's murder but never stood trial because he, in turn, was murdered by Jack Ruby just two days later. Various assassination researchers have speculated that Tippit had connections with Oswald, Ruby, or both, as well as with Roscoe White, who is said to have claimed he was the actual assassin. It is possible that Tippit knew Ruby, since it was Ruby's habit to ingratiate himself with police officers. Tippit could also have known Oswald through innocent connections. It was never established why Tippit stopped to speak with Oswald (if his murderer really was Oswald); perhaps the encounter began as a friendly conversation. Or perhaps the connections between Tippit and Oswald and/or Ruby were more sinister than will ever be known. It is even possible that Tippit had no connection with Ruby or Oswald, that his murder was committed by an unknown person for reasons entirely unconnected with the president's assassination, and that the murder charge was pinned on Oswald. The meaning of Tippit's murder remains one of the important mysteries surrounding the assassination of President Kennedy.

Reasonable Doubt; Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Tippit Murder Scene Witnesses

Almost as much controversy rages around the scene of Dallas Police Officer J. D. Tippit's murder as around the scene of President Kennedy's assassination in Dealey Plaza. People who claim to have witnessed the death of officer Tippit or to have seen his killer run away include Domingo Benavides; Acquilla Clemons; Barbara Davis; Virginia R. Davis; Helen Louise Markham; B. M. Patterson; Warren Reynolds; and Frank and Mary Wright.

Book of Facts: Tomlinson, Darrel C.

Tomlinson was the senior engineer at Parkland Memorial Hospital in 1963. He is credited with discovering the one piece of evidence that allowed the Warren Commission to "prove" that a lone gunman shot President Kennedy and Governor John Connally: the magic bullet. During the afternoon of November 22, Tomlinson moved a gurney that was blocking an elevator door against a corridor wall. As it bumped against the wall, a bullet rolled out from under a mat. Tomlinson gave the bullet to the hospital's chief of security, former Dallas deputy police chief O. P. Wright, who turned it over to the Secret Service. Tomlinson reported that on the night following the assassination he received a telephone call from the FBI warning him not to talk about his discovery. After repeated questioning by Arlen Specter of the Warren Commission, Tomlinson was still unable to say whether the stretcher on which he found the bullet was the one used for Governor Connally. Wright reportedly told someone from Life magazine that the bullet he turned over to the Secret Service had a sharp, pointed nose, not the rounded nose of the magic bullet the Warren Commission claims Tomlinson found.

See also LONE ASSASSIN THEORY; OSBORNE, DR. DAVID; SINGLE BULLET THEORY.
Best Evidence; Reasonable Doubt

Book of Facts: Tonahill, Joe

Tonahill was Jack Ruby's defense lawyer when he was tried for the murder of Lee Harvey Oswald. Ruby's defense was based on the premise that his shooting of Oswald was not premeditated, but an impulsive act. Tonahill emphasized this point in his closing remarks to the jury, telling them that it was up to the state to prove that Ruby had conspired with someone in the Dallas Police Department to murder Oswald.

Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Torres, Miguel

A convicted burglar, Torres was confined to the state prison at Angola, Louisiana, when NBC television investigators questioned him about his knowledge of New Orleans District Attorney Jim Garrison's investigation of Clay Shaw. On an NBC "White Paper" program titled "The Case of Jim Garrison." Torres said Garrison's office had attempted to bribe him with a Florida vacation and a supply of heroin if he testified that Shaw was also known as Clay Bertrand. When a grand jury asked Torres to repeat under oath what he had said on television, he refused. Torres was found guilty of contempt and received additional prison time.

On the Trail of the Assassins

Book of Facts: Tracheotomy

When President Kennedy was brought into Parkland Memorial Hospital after the shooting, he was barely clinging to life. Dr. Charles Carrico inserted an endotracheal tube into Kennedy's mouth and down his throat in an effort to improve his breathing. This was removed when Dr. Malcolm Perry made a small incision in the patient's throat to insert a tracheotomy tube. He made his incision directly through a small, clean, round opening that those present described as a bullet entry wound. Questioned by researcher David S. Lifton about the size of the incision, Dr. Perry responded that it was 2 to 3 centimeters long. According to the autopsy report prepared by Dr. James J. Humes at Bethesda Naval Hospital, and published as part of the Warren Report, the incision Humes found in the president's throat was 6.5 centimeters, or more than twice and perhaps three times as long as the incision made by Dr. Perry. The autopsy doctors considered this opening to be the exit wound for the bullet entry wound they found in the president's back.

See also AUTOPSY CONTROVERSY; BAXTER, DR. CHARLES R.; CLARK, DR. KEMP; CRENSHAW, DR. CHARLES A.; DUDMAN, RICHARD; HENCHCLIFFE, MARGARET; JONES, DR. RONALD; THROAT WOUND CONTROVERSY.
Best Evidence

Book of Facts: Trafficante, Santos

This Florida Mafia boss is reported to have made several threats on President Kennedy's life. Trafficante was deeply involved with the Central Intelligence Agency in plans to assassinate Fidel Castro. The mobster reportedly told José Aleman that Kennedy would not survive to the next election, that he was going to be "hit" before then. Trafficante sought the protection of the Fifth Amendment clause against self-incrimination when asked by the House Select Committee on Assassinations whether he had ever discussed plans to kill the president and whether Jack Ruby had visited him after he was imprisoned by Castro along with other gangsters and gamblers.

See also MCWILLIE, LEWIS J; MARCELLO, CARLOS; ROSELLI, JOHNNY.
Conspiracy

Book of Facts: Triple Underpass (or Overpass)

In November 1963 work was being performed on the railroad tracks that pass over Commerce, Main, and Elm streets as they head west out of Dealey Plaza. Many of the workmen on the overpass stopped to watch the presidential motorcade move through the plaza and head directly under them. Only a few of these men were questioned by the FBI and the Warren Commission. Every one of them reported sounds or sights that led them to believe the shots were fired from the area of the Grassy Knoll. The testimony or statements of these men are included in individual entries for Richard C. Dodd; Sam Holland; Clemmon Johnson; Austin Miller; Thomas Murphy; Frank Reilly; James Simmons; Royce G. Skelton; and Walter Winborn. Also on the overpass were Dallas Police Officers J. W. Foster and J. C. White.

Book of Facts; Troon, Mrs.

Troon was a telephone operator on duty at Dallas Police Headquarters while Lee Harvey Oswald was being held there the night following the assassination. she allegedly reported that another operator, Mrs. Swinney, possibly under instructions from two Secret Service agents waiting in another room, prevented Oswald from placing a telephone call to someone named Hurt in Raleigh, North Carolina. According to Troon, Swinney told Oswald the number he called did not answer, even though she never attempted to put the call through.

Conspiracy

Book of Facts: Truly, Roy

Roy Truly was the superintendent of the Texas School Book Depository Building and the man who had hired Lee Harvey Oswald. He told the Warren Commission that the shots came from the "vicinity of the railroad or the WPA project." The "WPA project" to which Truly referred is the concrete pergola near the top of the Grassy Knoll. Truly assisted motorcycle patrolman Marrion L. Baker in his search of the building when they observed building employee Oswald in the second-floor cafeteria calmly drinking a Coke.

See also TEXAS SCHOOL BOOK DEPOSITORY BUILDING EMPLOYEES.

Crossfire; Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Tuteur, Werner

Werner Tuteur was Jack Ruby's prison psychiatrist. Shortly after he was granted a new trial, and before he died of cancer, Ruby allegedly told Tuteur that he knew who had ordered the assassination of President Kennedy, and that he had been "framed" to kill Lee Harvey Oswald.

High Treason

Book of Facts: "Umbrella Man"

The Zapruder film and several photographs taken at the time of the assassination show two mysterious men at the edge of the curb close to where the presidential limousine passed. One man had a light complexion and carried a black umbrella. The other was dark-skinned, possibly Hispanic. As the limousine entered Elm Street the man with the umbrella stood up, opened the umbrella, and held it over his head as if it were raining, which it wasn't. Just at the moment the shots were fired, he raised the umbrella almost two feet over his head, then lowered and closed it. He then sat back down on the curb. The second man appeared to be speaking into a hand-held radio unit. When the limousine sped away after the shooting, both men rose and walked away in opposite directions. Neither followed the large group of people heading toward the Grassy Knoll.

Following years of speculation about the "umbrella man," who many suspect used his umbrella to signal the assassin or assassins, a warehouse manager named Louis Steven Witt appeared before the House Select Committee on Assassinations claiming to be the man. He testified that he thought the open umbrella would somehow annoy Kennedy. His testimony about his actions at the assassination scene is inconsistent with the photographs, and critics consider Witt's story unconvincing.

Crossfire

Book of Facts: Underwood, James

Underwood was the assistant news director for the Dallas television station KRLD. He interviewed a fifteen-year-old black boy named Amos L. Euins, who had told a motorcycle police officer just minutes after the assassination that he had seen "a colored man lean out of the window upstairs and he had a rifle." Underwood then asked the witness if he was certain the man was black. Euins responded that the man he saw was "colored." When pressed by Underwood whether he was sure the man was "colored," Euins replied, "Yes, sir." After Euins reportedly received threatening telephone calls to his home, he changed his testimony and told the Warren Commission he wasn't sure whether the man was white or black.

Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Underwood, Marty

A Kennedy advance man, Marty Underwood was with the president during the entire Texas trip. In an interview with Harrison Edward Livingstone in 1991, Underwood was told that some people believed the autopsy photos of President Kennedy were fake. He replied, "Oh, I'm sure they were forged." He then explained that he was sure Lyndon B. Johnson knew who killed Kennedy, although he felt strongly that Johnson was not behind it.

High Treason 2

Book of Facts: U-2 Spy Plane

During the late 1950s the U.S. Air Force and the Central Intelligence Agency jointly conducted regular surveillance of military operations in the Soviet Union using the supersecret, high-flying U-2 spy plane. In May 1960 the Soviets shot down a U-2 aircraft piloted by Gary Powers, an incident that caused then-President Dwight D. Eisenhower serious embarrassment and that undermined his chances of success at an upcoming summit meeting with the U.S.S.R. Powers's plane, which should have been invulnerable to Soviet attack because of the altitude at which it flew, was shot down a few months after Lee Harvey Oswald defected to the U.S.S.R.

In a CIA-authorized book Powers wrote after his release from a Soviet prison, the pilot expressed the suspicion that Oswald might have given the Soviets new technical data that he could have acquired while stationed at Atsugi Air Base in Japan, where several U-2s were based. According to Soviet defector Yuri Nosenko, the KGB never had more than a passing interest in Oswald, which is remarkable considering his stint at Atsugi and the Soviet desire for information about the U-2s. If the CIA did suspect that Oswald was responsible for the downing of Powers's plane, it is also remarkable that the Agency never attempted to debrief Oswald on his return to the United States.

Conspiracy

Book of Facts: Vaughn, Roy

Dallas Police Officer Vaughn was stationed at the top of the Main Street car ramp leading to the garage level of Dallas Police Headquarters, where Jack Ruby shot and killed Lee Harvey Oswald. Despite Vaughn's testimony that Ruby did not enter the building by way of the ramp, as well as corroborating testimony by others who were there at the time, the Warren Commission chose to believe the testimony of Napoleon J. Daniels, who claimed he saw someone resembling Ruby pass Vaughn and enter the ramp. Vaughn later took three polygraph tests that indicated he was telling the truth. According to researcher Harrison Edward Livingstone, Vaughn's attorney professed that Police Officer Red Davis told Vaughn that Ruby was taken to the basement by Assistant Police Chief Charles Batchelor.

High Treason

Book of Facts: Veciana, Antonio

A founder of the anti-Castro group called Alpha 66, Veciana was backed by the Central Intelligence Agency. His contact was a man known to him only as "Maurice Bishop." Veciana claims that in either late August or early September 1963, he witnessed "Bishop" speaking to a man whose picture was broadcast around the world on November 22 of that year, Lee Harvey Oswald. Regarding Veciana's testimony, a House Select Committee on Assassinations report concluded that "There was absolutely no doubt in his mind that the man was Oswald. . . ." Veciana further stated that after the Kennedy assassination, "Bishop" asked him to persuade a cousin who worked in the Cuban Embassy in Mexico City to verify a fabricated report that Oswald had visited the embassy.

See also ALVARADO, GILBERTO; ANTI-CASTRO CUBANS; BOWEN, JOHN "JACK"; DURAN, SILVIA; GAUDET, WILLIAM GEORGE; PHILLIPS, DAVID ATLEE.

Conspiracy

Book of Facts: Vietnam War

Proponents of the theory that Kennedy was killed because of his alleged plans to pull out of Vietnam ignore very strong historical evidence that if Kennedy had lived, the war might well have continued just as it did under Lyndon B. Johnson. John Kennedy was not the "peacenik" many attempt to paint him as. Throughout his Senate career, he was always considered a hard-liner against the communist bloc. Many of the men who advised Johnson to expand the war were Kennedy's closest advisers while he was in the White House, and there is every reason to believe he would have followed their advice just as Johnson did.

On the other hand, many foreign policy experts believe that Kennedy genuinely intended to pull out of Southeast Asia after the 1964 election. In late 1961, tensions between hawks and doves in Washington were intensifying. In November, the president ordered a massive reorganization - later referred to as the "Thanksgiving Day Massacre" - of both the State Department and the Central Intelligence Agency. In 1963, Kennedy further angered interventionists in his own government by signing NSAM 263 on October 2. The measure called for the withdrawal of one thousand U.S. military advisers from Vietnam by the end of the year and also included a timetable for total withdrawal. That policy would have been reversed by NSAM 273, dated the day before Kennedy's assassination but never signed by him.

That members of the so-called military-industrial complex were dismayed over Kennedy's likely reduction of U.S. forces in Indochina is one of the prime motivations for the assassination explored in Oliver Stone's film JFK.

See also NGO DINH DIEM.

Book of Facts: Wade, Henry W.

Dallas County district attorney Wade held a formal press conference at midnight November 22, 1963, nearly eleven hours after the alleged assassination weapon was recovered on the sixth floor of the Texas School Book Depository Building. When asked about the identification of the weapon, Wade said it was a 7.65-caliber Mauser. The weapon sent to the FBI lab for examination as the official assassination weapon, however, was a 6.5-caliber Mannlicher-Carcano rifle. Despite the fact that the weapon remained in police custody, it continued for a time to be identified as a Mauser, not a Mannlicher-Carcano.

See also BOONE, EUGENE L.; MOONEY, LUKE; WEITZMAN, SEYMOUR.
Reasonable Doubt

Book of Facts: Walker, Edwin A.

General Walker was a highly controversial figure during the early 1960s. He had been relieved of command of the Twenty-fourth Division of the U.S. Army in 1961 for distributing right-wing materials to his troops. As a civilian living in Dallas, he was active in right-wing organizations, and a speaker at gatherings around the country. In April 1963, someone fired a shot through a window of his home, narrowly missing his head. The testimony of Marina Oswald to the Warren Commission as well as evidence found among Lee Harvey Oswald's possessions implied that Oswald was Walker's would-be assassin. The Commission concluded that Oswald was indeed the gunman.

Conspiracy

Book of Facts: Walter, William S.

A former employee at the New Orleans office of the FBI, Walter told assassination researcher and author Mark Lane that on November 17, 1963, his office received a telex message from FBI headquarters alerting him to a possible plot to kill the president while he was in Dallas. Walter claimed that after the assassination, the two office copies of the message vanished, though he made a handwritten copy of the message.

See also FBI TELEX MESSAGE.

On the Trail of the Assassins

Book of Facts: Walter Reed Army Medical Center

Judging from taped transcripts of radio conversations between Air Force One, as it returned to Washington from Dallas with President Kennedy's coffin aboard, and various military officers on the ground, the original intent of those in Washington was to transfer the president's body to Walter Reed Medical Center for the autopsy once the plane landed at Andrews Air Force Base. The destination of the body was changed to Bethesda Naval Hospital. Researcher David S. Lifton says that in 1980 he inquired into this decision, speaking with, among others, the president's naval aide, Captain Tazwell Shepherd, whom some believed was responsible for the change in plans. Lifton reported that Shepherd had no recollection of making arrangements for transporting the body or for the autopsy. Lifton theorizes that the change in venues to Bethesda required that the president's body be secretly removed from Air Force One and taken to Walter Reed, where it was possible to alter the wounds before sending the body to Bethesda, where the start of the autopsy was delayed for several hours.

See also AMBULANCE CONTROVERSY; COFFIN CONTROVERSY.

Best Evidence

Book of Facts: Walther, Carolyn

Carolyn Walther worked in a dress factory in the Dal-Tex Building on the east side of Dealey Plaza. She and another worker went to the street to watch the presidential motorcade. Moments before the president's limousine turned onto Elm Street, she noticed two men at an open upper-floor window of the Texas School Book Depository Building. One man was holding a rifle, which he pointed down toward the street. She assumed the men were guards stationed there to protect the president. Later, she also insisted that she had heard four shots fired.

See also ROWLAND, MR. AND MRS. ARNOLD.

Crossfire

Book of Facts: Walthers, Eddy

A Dallas County deputy sheriff, Walthers encountered James T. Tague, a bystander at the scene of the assassination who was hit by flying debris when a stray bullet struck the ground near where he was standing. Walthers reported that he "found where a bullet had splattered on the top edge of the curb on Main Street." The Warren Commission decided that only three bullets had been fired, all of them by Lee Harvey Oswald, so when it was forced to admit the existence of this bullet, it had to find a way to explain how only two bullets had caused all the wounds (fatal and nonfatal) to President Kennedy and Governor John Connally. This resulted in the creation of the magic bullet theory, which permitted the Commission to stand by its lone assassin theory.

See also FIRING SEQUENCE CONTROVERSY; HAYGOOD, CLYDE A.; SINGLE BULLET THEORY; SPECTER, ARLEN; STROUD, MARTHA JO.

Crossfire

Book of Facts: Ward, Theron

Ward, a local Dallas justice of the peace (justices of the peace are elected magistrates in Texas), was called to Parkland Memorial Hospital to mediate a dispute between the Secret Service and the presidential party, on one side, and Dallas medical examiner Dr. Earl Rose, on the other. Rose demanded that the president's body not be removed until an official autopsy was done. He insisted that the chain of evidence must be maintained and that Texas law required an autopsy before the deceased could be removed from the state. Under pressure from the representatives of the president and the federal government, and with the acquiescence of District Attorney Henry W. Wade, Ward gave his permission to remove the body. In view of the puzzle surrounding the ambulance and the autopsy controversies, one can't help but wonder what the result would have been had Dr. Rose been permitted to conduct his autopsy before the president's body was taken from Parkland.

Death of a President

Book of Facts: Warner, Roger C.

Author and assassination researcher David E. Scheim reports that Warner, a Secret Service agent, interviewed Karen Carlin on November 24, 1963. Carlin was a stripper at Jack Ruby's Carousel Club. Ruby sent Carlin a Western Union money order on the morning of November 24, just before going to Dallas Police Headquarters, where he shot Lee Harvey Oswald. Carlin allegedly told him that she feared she would be killed if she gave the authorities any information. But it was her impression that Ruby and Oswald were part of a plot to kill the president.

Contract on America

Book of Facts: Warren, Earl

Chief Justice of the United States Supreme Court, Warren at first refused President Lyndon B. Johnson's request that he serve on the commission to investigate President Kennedy's assassination. It was only after receiving a summons to the White House that he accepted the post as the commission's chairman. The leader of the "Warren Court" would from that time on have his name irrevocably linked with what many Americans regard as a cover-up of one of the worst crimes in history.

Warren was a purely political animal who, as governor of California and heavyweight at the 1952 Republican national convention, had been instrumental in winning the party's nomination for General Dwight D. Eisenhower. His reward was a promise of the next Supreme Court seat. As it turned out, the next seat was that of chief justice, but Eisenhower kept his promise and Warren was appointed.

Like many other politicians, Warren had his own dirty laundry to keep out of the public eye. This was revealed in that, at the same time the Kennedy brothers were part of a Senate investigation of labor union ties to organized crime, with special emphasis on the Teamsters, Warren often expressed his "admiration" for the Teamsters, calling the corrupt union "not only something great of itself, but splendidly representative of the entire labor movement."

Conspiracy; Plausible Denial

Book of Facts: Warren Commission

On November 29, 1963, President Lyndon B. Johnson issued Executive Order No. 11130, creating a commission to investigate the assassination of President Kennedy, the wounding of Governor John Connally, and the murder of Police Officer J. D. Tippit. Officially known as the President's Commission on the Assassination of President Kennedy, it quickly became referred to popularly as the Warren Commission, after its chairman, Earl Warren, chief justice of the United States Supreme Court. The Commission collected testimony from 552 individuals. Of these, 94 appeared before members of the Commission, 395 were questioned by Commission lawyers, and 63 supplied either affidavits or statements. Before the Commission's report, known as the Warren Report, was even published, critics charged that important witnesses whose information differed from the Commission's findings - that Lee Harvey Oswald alone killed Kennedy and that no conspiracy was involved in the assassination - were not called to testify, or their testimony was ignored or altered. Following publication of the Report, the Commission released twenty-six volumes containing the testimony, affidavits, and statements of witnesses as well as other related material. Many early Commission critics used the twenty-six volumes to build their cases against its findings.

Book of Facts; Warren Commission Members

The members of the Warren Commission, selected by President Lyndon B. Johnson, were its chairman, Earl Warren, chief justice of the United States Supreme Court; Hale Boggs, the Democratic representative from Louisiana, whose death Commission critics consider mysterious; Gerald Ford, the Republican representative from Michigan and future appointed president, who continues to defend the Commission; John Sherman Cooper, the Republican senator from Kentucky, who is said to have opposed the single bullet theory in the Commission's findings; Richard B. Russell, the Democratic senator from Georgia, who helped force the Commission staff to investigate the link between Lee Harvey Oswald and the Central Intelligence Agency; Allen W. Dulles, who was fired as CIAz director by President Kennedy following the Bay of Pigs invasion failure; and John J. McCloy, a former chairman of Chase Manhattan Bank.

It has been reported that with the exception of Allen Dulles, each member chosen to serve on the Commission initially refused the appointment, finally giving in to Johnson's plea for help in resolving a national emergency.

Plausible Denial

Book of Facts: Warren Report

On September 24, 1964, ten months after the murder of President Kennedy, the Warren Commission presented the results of its investigation to President Lyndon B. Johnson. Officially titled The Report of the President's Commission on the Assassination of President John F. Kennedy, the Report is an 888-page summary of the investigation and the conclusions reached by the Commission; it was presented to Johnson along with twenty-six volumes of exhibits and records of the Commission's hearings. The Report, first issued by the Government Printing Office, was reprinted by at least half a dozen publishers within a week of its release, and millions of copies of both the hardcover and paperback editions were sold. In 1992, twenty-nine years after the assassination, at least two publishers issued new editions of the Report.

Before the Warren Report was even released, the Commission's work had come under attack by critics. Since its release, the Report and the accompanying volumes of testimony and exhibits have been minutely examined in scores of books and hundreds of magazine articles. Most of these have been critical of the way the investigation was conducted and of the Commission's interpretation of the physical evidence and the testimony of various witnesses.

Warren Report

Book of Facts: Weatherford, Harry

A Dallas County deputy sheriff, Weatherford was standing in front of the sheriff's office on the east side of Dealey Plaza with approximately twenty other deputies when the shots were fired. In a report filed later that day, he said he thought the first shot was a railroad torpedo, because the sound came from the "railroad yard." When he recognized the shots that followed for what they were, he ran across the plaza toward the railroad yard behind the Grassy Knoll, "where the sound seemed to come from."

See also CRAIG, ROGER D.

Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Weberman, Alan J.

Alan Weberman is co-author, with Michael L. Canfield, of Coup d'Etat in America, published in 1975 by The Third Press. The book claims the CIA had assassination squads in Dallas the day Kennedy was killed.

Book of Facts: Wecht, Dr. Cyril H.

Dr. Wecht has been a critic since at least 1967 of the autopsy performed on President Kennedy at Bethesda Naval Hospital. He has condemned the autopsy report and the single bullet theory. Dr. Wecht, a forensic pathologist with extensive experience performing autopsies on victims of gunshot wounds, was the coroner of Allegheny County in Pennsylvania. He has also been president of the American Academy of Forensic Sciences.

Wecht was a member of the panel of nine pathologists asked by the House Select Committee on Assassinations to review the autopsy X rays and photographs. He was the only critic of the Warren Report to serve on the panel. In May 1992, Dr. Wecht appeared on television on the CNN program "Larry King Live" to discuss an article published in the May 1992 issue of the Journal of the American Medical Association that professed to reveal "new" evidence supporting the Warren Report, but was nothing more than a rehash of the autopsy report prepared by Dr. James J. Humes, who performed the procedure. Wecht is one of the most articulate and knowledgeable critics of the medical evidence produced by the autopsy.

See also BOSWELL, DR. THORNTON; CUSTER, JERROL F.; LUNDBERG, DR. GEORGE; RIEBE, FLOYD A. Best Evidence

Book of Facts: Wehle, Philip C.

Commanding officer of the Military District of Washington, D.C., General Wehle accompanied the Military District Casket Team to Bethesda Naval Hospital to ensure that the president's body had a proper honor guard at all times. In a 1967 interview reported by researcher David S. Lifton, General Wehle denied that he had been present in the autopsy room when the Dallas coffin was opened, as reported in William Manchester's book The Death of a President. Wehle confirmed the information supplied by members of the team that two Navy ambulances were used when the president's body was brought to Bethesda and that the team was sent in pursuit of the wrong ambulance. According to official records, there was no "decoy" ambulance, contrary to what team members claim. The alleged presence of a second ambulance has given rise to charges that the president's body was not in the ambulance bearing the Dallas coffin.

See also AMBULANCE CONTROVERSY.

Best Evidence

Book of Facts: Weigman, Dave

Weigman, an NBC television cameraman, was filming the motorcade from his position in the seventh car in line. After the shots were fired, with his camera rolling, he ran up the Grassy Knoll in pursuit of the many police officers who had done likewise. According to researcher Jim Marrs, one frame from Weigman's film clearly shows the remains of a puff of smoke hanging in the air near the top of the knoll. This is the same smoke reported by other witnesses.

See also OVERPASS WITNESSES; SMOKE FROM THE GRASSY KNOLL.

Crossfire

Book of Facts: Weisberg, Harold

Considered by many to be the "grandfather" of assassination researchers, Weisberg has spent years pressuring the federal government to release documents related to the murder of President Kennedy. The basement of Weisberg's home is filled with dozens of metal filing cabinets containing thousands of assassination documents. He is the author of several books on the subject, including the Whitewash series and Oswald in New Orleans (Canyon Books, 1967), as well as a book on the assassination of Martin Luther King, Jr.

Book of Facts: Weiss, Mark

An acoustics expert, Mark Weiss was called on by the House Select Committee on Assassinations to review earlier acoustics studies of the shooting, along with Dr. James Barger and Ernest Aschkenasy. These experts analyzed a recording of the sounds of what appeared to be four gunshots that were picked up by the open radio microphone of a police motorcycle near the scene of the shooting. They concluded that there was a 95 percent or better probability that the third shot was fired from the area of the Grassy Knoll.

See also ACOUSTICAL EVIDENCE; BELL LABORATORY; DALLAS POLICE DISPATCH TAPE; RAMSEY REPORT.
Fatal Hour; High Treason

Book of Facts: Weissman, Bernard

Bernard Weissman, in collaboration with Joseph P. Grinnan and Larrie H. Schmidt, placed an advertisement in the Dallas Morning News the day of the assassination attacking President Kennedy's policies.

See also AMERICAN FACT-FINDING COMMITTEE.

Book of Facts: Weitzman, Seymour

Deputy Constable Weitzman raced to the Grassy Knoll from his post at the corner of Main and Houston streets when he heard the shots fired at the president. One of the first officers to reach the fence atop the knoll, Weitzman climbed over it and searched for the source of the shots. He found a railroad yardman, who told Weitzman he had seen a man throw something into a bush and run off.

Later, Weitzman assisted other officers in recovering a rifle on the sixth floor of the Texas School Book Depository Building. On the following day, he signed an affidavit that appears on page 228 of volume 24 of the Warren Commission Hearings. In the affidavit, Weitzman said that at 1:22 P.M. he and Deputy Sheriff Eugene L. Boone found a rifle on the sixth floor of the Depository Building. "That rifle was a 7.65 Mauser bolt action rifle equipped with a 4/18 scope, a thick leather brownish-black sling on it." Weitzman had once been in the sporting-goods business and was extremely knowledgeable about rifles. The rifle the Warren Commission identified as the murder weapon is clearly stamped "Made in Italy" and "Cal. 6.5," distinguishing it unmistakably, even for someone with no more than a cursory knowledge of rifles, from a German-made 7.65 Mauser.

Deputy Boone told the Warren Commission that he thought the weapon he found was a 7.65 Mauser, and claimed that Captain Will Fritz had also given the rifle the same identification. When the Commission showed Boone the Mannlicher-Carcano rifle in its possession, Boone said he could not identify it as the rifle he had found.

Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: West, Joe

A private detective, West announced in May 1990 that there had been a gunman on the Grassy Knoll. He identified the gunman as Mafia figure Johnny Roselli, who in 1976 had been killed in a gangland-style execution.

High Treason 2

Book of Facts: West, Robert H.

West, A Dallas County surveyor, was standing on Main Street watching the president's limousine slowly head west on Elm when he heard what he thought was a motorcycle backfiring. He reports that he then heard three more of what now sounded like "rifle fire" noises. He claimed the shots originated in the "northwest quadrant" of Dealey Plaza, which is the location of the wooden fence on the Grassy Knoll.

See also DEALEY PLAZA WITNESSES.

Crossfire

Book of Facts: Whalen, Edward

According to former New Orleans District Attorney Jim Garrison, Whalen was a professional criminal whom David Ferrie and Clay Shaw attempted to hire to kill Garrison before he could begin his investigation of the Kennedy assassination. Shaw supposedly offered Whalen $25,000 plus expert medical care for his daughter, who had cancer, if Whalen would accept the job. Whalen decided he didn't want to kill a district attorney, so he turned down the offer.

On the Trail of the Assassins

Book of Facts: Whaley, William

Whaley was a Dallas cabdriver. The Warren Commission claimed that Lee Harvey Oswald used Whaley's cab to escape from the assassination scene, following a brief bus ride. Whaley provided the Commission with his trip log, which showed that he had picked up a passenger near the Greyhound Bus Station at 12:30 P.M. and dropped him off at 12:45. Since the president was shot at 12:30 P.M., the Commission decided that Whaley picked up Oswald at 12:47 or 12:48, but recorded the time as 12:30 because he kept his log in fifteen-minute intervals. The Commission did not explain why Whaley did not write 12:45 instead of 12:30, nor did it acknowledge that the trip log contained start and stop times in other than fifteen-minute intervals. Other times recorded in the log include 8:10, 10:50, and 9:40.

See also MCWATTERS, CECIL J.

Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: White, J. C.

On the day of the assassination, Dallas police officer White was assigned to the west side of the railroad overpass that borders the west end of Dealey Plaza. White claims he saw nothing of the assassination because a train crossed the overpass at the time of the shooting. He appears to be the only person who reported this train.

See also OVERPASS WITNESSES.

Crossfire

Book of Facts: White, Jack

White is an assassination researcher who attempted to convince the House Select Committee on Assassinations that the various photographs of the alleged murder weapon do not match one another. He claimed that after careful study, he found that the length of the weapon differed in at least two photos.

See also "BADGEMAN."

High Treason

Book of Facts: White, Roscoe

Roscoe White was a Dallas police officer who was close to Jack Ruby. In fact, White's wife, Geneva, was employed by Ruby as a B-girl. In August 1990, shortly before she died from lung cancer, Mrs. White claimed that her husband, who had died earlier in a mysterious fire, had been a professional hitman. She further said that at one time, she overheard Ruby and her husband discuss a plan to assassinate President Kennedy. She said that Roscoe and Lee Harvey Oswald had been friends and had used a nearby firing range together.

Ricky White, son of Roscoe and Geneva, claims he found a secret diary his father had kept containing evidence, including CIA cables, that the CIA had ordered his father to kill Kennedy. The diary and cables vanished soon after Ricky's revelation. There is no hard evidence to support Geneva and Ricky White's claims, although one interesting incident does point to the possibility that they were telling the truth. In 1975, a burglary occurred at the White's Texas home. When the burglars were arrested in Arizona, among the White possessions they had stolen was a never-before-seen version of the famous backyard photograph of Oswald. The FBI obtained the photo and turned it over to the Senate Intelligence Committee. It finally came into the possession of the House Select Committee on Assassinations, but it was never determined how the White family came to have the photograph in their home.

See also OSWALD, BACKYARD PHOTOGRAPH OF; SHAW, JACK.
High Treason 2

Book of Facts: Whitmeyer, George

Lieutenant Colonel Whitmeyer, commander of the Dallas area's Army Intelligence reserve unit, rode in the pilot car that traveled the motorcade route, but maintained a distance of about one-quarter of a mile in front of the car preceding the president's limousine.

Crossfire; High Treason

Book of Facts: Whitworth, Edna

Edna Whitworth operated the Furniture Mart in Irving, Texas. The store was less than two blocks from the Irving Sports Shop. She told the Warren Commission that a man she later identified as Lee Harvey Oswald, accompanied by a woman she identified as Marina Oswald and two small children, came into her store one day in November 1963. Oswald asked about a part for a gun, but Whitworth told him the gunsmith's shop was no longer located there, even though his sign was still outside the building. Whitworth's testimony appeared to lend credibility to the testimony of Dial D. Ryder concerning a repair tag at the Irving Sports Shop for work done on a rifle owned by someone named "Oswald." The Commission discounted Whitworth's testimony for trivial reasons, obviously wanting to discredit the implications of the rifle repair tag, because the work was not done on the Mannlicher-Carcano, which the Commission claimed was Oswald's only rifle.

Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Wilcott, James

In March 1978, Wilcott, who had been employed by the Central Intelligence Agency for several years, told the House Select Committee on Assassinations that shortly after the Kennedy assassination, a CIA case officer told him that Lee Harvey Oswald was an undercover CIA operative when he defected to the Soviet Union, but was brought home because the Soviets never believed in his defection. Wilcott claimed that the CIA had a hold over Oswald because of some major crime he had once committed, possibly a murder.

Conspiracy

Book of Facts; William Reily Coffee Company

Lee Harvey Oswald worked for a short period at this New Orleans company. It was next door to the Crescent City Garage, where several government agencies kept their cars parked. It is curious that Oswald, who was distributing pro-Castro literature in the streets, worked for William Reily, who was an outspoken supporter of the anti-Castro groups in New Orleans. An unusually high number of Reilly employees left the company to work at nearby aerospace companies and at the facilities of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration, raising questions about a possible preexisting - and continuing - link among the employees of the Reily Coffee Company.

On the Trail of the Assassins

Book of Facts: Williams, Bonnie Ray

An employee of the Texas School Book Depository Building, Williams ate lunch near a sixth-floor window on the day of the assassination. When he finished, he joined two coworkers on the fifth floor. He testified that he left the sixth floor about ten minutes before the shooting. He claimed he did not see Oswald or anyone else on the sixth floor while he was there. Williams and his coworkers, James Jarman, Jr., and Harold D. Norman, originally reported that they thought the shots came from the right side of the building, toward the Grassy Knoll. When they appeared before the Warren Commission, they said the shots came from above them.

Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Williams, Harold

Harold Williams is one of several people, including George Arnett, who said that Jack Ruby and J. D. Tippit knew one another. In April 1966, researcher and author Mark Lane interviewed Williams in Arlington, Texas, a Dallas suburb. Lane had heard that Williams knew from personal experience that Ruby knew Police Officer Tippit, which Ruby and the Warren Commission denied. Williams told Lane that in early November 1963, he had been arrested while working as a chef in an illegal after-hours club. He said that during the raid on the establishment, he was "roughed up" by a police officer who then placed him in the back seat of an unmarked car. Williams studied the faces of the two men who sat in the front seat of the car, because he considered complaining about the way he had been treated and wanted to be sure to remember who was involved. Williams told Lane that Tippit was the officer driving the car and that the man seated next to him was Jack Ruby, whom he recognized because Ruby had arranged for young women to work as entertainers at the after-hours club where Williams worked.

Williams explained that after the assassination, he began telling people about his experience with Tippit and Ruby. He said that as a result he was taken into police custody and threatened with arrest on a trumped-up charge if he did not keep his mouth shut.

Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Williams, Dr. Philip

Dr. Williams was a young intern at Parkland Memorial Hospital when the president was brought in after the shooting. After Kennedy died, Williams was sent to get something in which to wrap the body before it was placed in the coffin. He found a "whitish-gray plastic mattress cover," which he gave to the nursing supervisor, Audrey Bell. This story obviously conflicts with David S. Lifton's report that Paul K. O'Connor claimed to have removed the president's body from a zippered body bag when it arrived at Bethesda Naval Hospital.

See also BODY BAG CONTROVERSY.

High Treason 2

Book of Facts: Willis, Linda

Linda Willis accompanied her father, Philip L. Willis, to Dealey Plaza on November 22, 1963, to see the president and vice president of the United States. Linda and her younger sister, Rosemary, ran along Elm Street to keep up with the president's limousine. Interviewed by researcher and author Jim Marrs in 1978, Linda said that the "shots came from somewhere other than the Depository." She then charged that people who claimed they knew otherwise weren't even at the scene, but that she was, "that's what makes the difference."

Crossfire

Book of Facts: Willis, Philip L.

Willis, a retired Air Force major, took a dozen photographs of the Dealey Plaza area immediately before and after the assassination. Two of Willis's pictures are extremely important. Willis claims one of them was taken at the moment of the first bullet's impact to Kennedy's throat and shows the president reaching up to the spot where the bullet hit him.

A second photograph, identified by the Warren Commission as slide number eight, shows the front of the Texas School Book Depository Building. Clearly visible in Willis's original picture, but for some inexplicable reason cropped and only partially visible in the copy used by the Commission, is a man wearing dark glasses. Willis claims that FBI agents, when they first looked at the photo, seemed to think the man was Jack Ruby. When Willis saw Ruby in court, he was struck by his resemblance to the man in the picture. Willis said he pointed out Ruby's apparent presence at the assassination scene to Secret Service agents and Commission investigators, but "they weren't concerned." When asked about the single bullet theory, Willis called it "stupid."

Ruby claimed that at the time of the assassination, he was in the offices of the Dallas Morning News. Witnesses at the newspaper cannot account for the full duration of Ruby's presence there. As Willis pointed out, "it wouldn't take five minutes" for someone to walk from the News office to Dealey Plaza.

See also RUBY IN DEALEY PLAZA.

Crossfire; Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Wilson, Eugene

Wilson was a salesman at Downtown Lincoln-Mercury in Dallas when a man calling himself Lee Harvey Oswald took a vehicle for a test drive. Never called to testify before the Warren Commission, Wilson confirmed to the FBI that on November 9, 1963, after being told he was not eligible for credit, Oswald commented, "Maybe I'm going to have to go back to Russia to buy a car."

Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Wilson, Steven F.

In 1963, Wilson was vice president of the Southwest division of Allyn & Bacon, a publishing company with offices in the Texas School Book Depository Building. He was watching the presidential motorcade from a third-floor window when the assassination took place. On March 25, 1964, he told FBI agents that the shots sounded as if they came from the "west end of the building," the direction of the Grassy Knoll. He then said they "did not sound like they came from above my head." Frequent and annoying visits from the FBI failed to persuade Wilson to alter his statement. Despite the fact that he told the FBI he had no objection to testifying before the Warren Commission, he was never called.

Researcher Mark Lane writes that when he requested that Wilson take part in a filmed interview, Wilson declined because he feared the FBI agents would resume their regular visits to his office, and "my work would suffer and so might my health." We are left to wonder why, if the FBI believed Wilson's information was important enough to subject him to repeated questioning, he was never called before the Commission.

See also TEXAS SCHOOL BOOK DEPOSITORY BUILDING EMPLOYEES.

Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Wilson, Tom

In 1991, Wilson told a conference on the assassination that he had been able to break down the Kennedy autopsy photographs using a computer-based scanner that revealed the use of paint to alter areas of the photos. Wilson considered the result of his process evidence that the pictures released to the public were forgeries.

High Treason 2

Book of Facts: Winborn, Walter

Winborn was working along the railroad overpass when the president's motorcade entered Dealey Plaza. Along with fellow workers, he stopped to watch the president pass below, and thus became an eyewitness to the assassination. In 1966, Winborn told an assassination researcher that he saw smoke coming from the trees atop the Grassy Knoll after the shots were fired.

See also OVERPASS WITNESSES.

Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Windshield Damage

Questions have been raised about whether a bullet pierced the windshield of the president's limousine. Such damage would be proof of yet another shot fired at the president.

While the doctors at Parkland Memorial Hospital were attempting to save Kennedy's life, two Dallas Police Officers, Starvis Ellis and H. R. Freeman, were standing watch over the limousine. According to a report by David S. Lifton, Ellis said there was a bullet hole in the left side of the windshield large enough to "stick a standard writing pencil" through. Officer Freeman corroborated what Ellis found, calling it "a bullet hole. You can tell what it was."

Later accounts of the windshield's condition are contradictory. Secret Service agent Charles Taylor, Jr., is reported as describing a "small hole just left of center." Secret Service chief James J. Rowley wrote that other Secret Service agents found the windshield "smooth and unbroken." The FBI lab said the windshield it received for examination had damage on the front surface only. Lifton was left to wonder just how many windshields were examined to produce such contradictory results.

See also BULLETS FIRED, NUMBER OF.

Best Evidence

Book of Facts: Wise, Wes

A reporter for KRLD-TV, and later Mayor of Dallas, Wise was never called to testify before the Warren Commission, even though Malcolm Couch had told the Commission that Wise reported seeing Jack Ruby walking along the side of the Texas School Book Depository Building moments after the assassination.

See also RUBY IN DEALEY PLAZA.

High Treason; Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Woodward, Mary E.

A staff writer for the Dallas Morning News, Woodward had walked the few minutes from her office to Dealey Plaza to see the president during her lunch break. She found an advantageous spot near the Stemmons Freeway sign at the base of the Grassy Knoll. Just as the president passed by, she heard a "horrible, ear-shattering noise" that came from behind her and a little to her right. The Texas School Book Depository Building was to her left. Seconds later, the noise, which she thought might be a car backfiring, was followed by two more, and she saw Kennedy slump down.

See also DEALEY PLAZA WITNESSES; GRASSY KNOLL WITNESSES.

Crossfire

Book of Facts: Wright, Frank and Mary

The Wrights lived at 501 East 10th Street in Dallas, close to the spot where Officer J. D. Tippit was murdered. The gunshots brought the Wrights from their house. Frank Wright reportedly saw the police officer on the ground and a man standing over him. The man circled the police car, then jumped into an old gray car and sped off. This may be the second participant in the murder as seen by Acquilla Clemmons.

Despite the fact that the Wrights were so close to the scene when Tippit was gunned down, and that Mary Wright placed the telephone call for the ambulance that took Tippit's body away, the couple was never questioned by the FBI or the Warren Commission. New Orleans District Attorney Jim Garrison charged that FBI director J. Edgar Hoover ordered that none of his agents were to question either the Wrights or Clemmons.

See also TIPPIT MURDER SCENE WITNESSES.

On the Trail of the Assassins; Rush to Judgment

Book of Facts: Wright, O. P.

Wright, a former deputy Dallas police chief, was the director of security at Parkland Memorial Hospital in 1963. It was to Wright that Darrel C. Tomlinson gave the bullet he found on a stretcher - the so-called magic bullet, as it came to be known. Wright, in turn, gave the bullet to a Secret Service agent. When an FBI agent later showed him exhibit #399 (which the Warren Commission had identified as the bullet that wounded both President Kennedy and Governor John Connally), Wright could not identify it as the same bullet he had had in his possession at the hospital.

High Treason

Book of Facts: X-Ray Controversy

X rays of the president's body have caused considerable controversy, including allegations that some X rays were altered or replaced by forged ones. Differences exist between some of the head X rays and the descriptions of the head wounds reported by the doctors who examined Kennedy at Parkland Memorial Hospital. Included in these disputes is the possible presence of metal fragments that would indicate the head wound was caused by an unjacketed bullet, instead of the jacketed bullets the Warren Commission claimed Lee Harvey Oswald used. There are also differences in the location and size of missing portions of the skull. These differences have led to speculation that the head was surgically altered between the time the body left Parkland and the time the autopsy was performed at Bethesda Naval Hospital.

At a news conference held in New York City on May 28, 1992, and reported by Reuters the next day, Jerrold F. Custer, who took the X rays of the president's head, said that the official X rays released to the public were "wrong." He then compared the wounds he had seen to those shown on the X rays and insisted, "These are fake X rays."

See also AUTOPSY CONTROVERSY; HEAD WOUND CONTROVERSY.
Best Evidence; High Treason

Book of Facts: Yarborough, Ralph

Senator Ralph Yarborough of Texas was riding with Vice President and Mrs. Lyndon B. Johnson in the motorcade, two cars behind the presidential limousine. He reported that the first shot caused him to wonder whether someone had thrown a bomb. He also commented that he could smell a strong odor of gunpowder in Dealey Plaza, a perception others reported. The smell of gunpowder resulting from shots fired from six stories above street level would not be detectable on the ground; it would drift away in a breeze like the one blowing across the plaza that afternoon. It could, however, have resulted from a gunshot fired from the Grassy Knoll area.

Yarborough later expressed surprise at how slowly the Secret Service responded to the first sound. He said the agents responded "very slowly, with no more than a puzzled look."

Crossfire: High Treason

Book of Facts: Zapruder Film

Abraham Zapruder was standing on the concrete monument on the Grassy Knoll filming the presidential motorcade as it passed. He continued filming as the shots were fired. He testified that the shots "came from back of me," meaning the top portion of the Grassy Knoll where the stockade fence is located. Zapruder sold his film to Life magazine, although there are charges that the CIA had possession of the film for a time.

The Zapruder film shows the president reach to his throat at the moment of the first bullet's impact. It also shows his head snap back as the fatal bullet strikes, and the pieces of skull, blood, and tissue fly toward the rear of the car. Abraham Zapruder's film is probably the most closely studied and analyzed piece of film in history.

Best Evidence; Crossfire; High Treason

Descriptions of the Film:

(For "Little Girl Running" description, see "Case Closed Analysis", below)

Zapruder Warren Commission Analysis

The Warren Commission found that at Zapruder frame 166(Z166) the line of fire from a gunman located in the southeastern most window of the sixth floor of the Texas School Book Depository was obstructed by a large oak tree. The President came back into view for a fleeting instant at Z186. The Presidential limousine emerged from behind the tree at Z210.

Kennedy is seen waving until about Z205 when a road sign blocks Kennedy from Zapruder's view. When Kennedy emerged at Z225, he appeared to be reacting to his neck wound.

The Commission found that Kennedy was probably not hit before Z210 and was probably hit by Z225. The bullet hit Kennedy in the back and exited his throat. The bullet could not have missed both the automobile and its occupants, and since it did not hit the automobile it probably struck Governor Connally. The Commission found that the exact positions of the men could not be recreated though it was probable that the men were sufficiently aligned such that the bullet which exited Kennedy's throat could have caused all of Connally's wounds. This finding is known as the Single Bullet Theory.

A subsequent shot, at Z313, entered the back of Kennedy's head and exited through the upper right portion of his skull. The finding is evident from the explosion of the President's skull from the right side of his head.

The Warren Commission concluded that three shots were fired, all from the south eastern sixth floor window of the Texas School Book Depository by Lee Harvey Oswald. One shot, called the "Single Bullet", caused Kennedy's back and throat wound, and all of Connally's wounds. Another shot hit Kennedy in the head, and a third shot ricocheted, wounding a bystander, James Tague, on the cheek.

Zapruder House Select Committee on Assassinations Analysis

In 1978, The House Select Committee on Assassinations (HSCA), based primarily on sophisticated acoustical analysis, concluded that a second gunman fired from the grassy knoll, affirming the theory that Kennedy was assassinated as the result of a conspiracy.

The HSCA found that four shots were fired; three from the Depository and one from the grassy knoll. The HSCA found that the first shot was fired from the Depository at Z157-Z161 and missed, wounding James Tague. The second shot was fired at Z188-Z191 and hit both Kennedy and Connally, affirming the Single Bullet Theory. The third shot was fired from the grassy knoll at Z295-Z296 and missed. The fourth shot, fired from the Depository at Z312, hit Kennedy in the head. The HSCA did consider the theory that the third shot from the grassy knoll hit Kennedy in the head at Z312, though the theory was eventually discarded.

Zapruder Conspiracy Theory Analysis

There are many widely varying conspiracy theories, the foremost being the 1978 findings of the House Select Committee on Assassinations (HSCA). Conspiracy Theories include any theory which involves more than one gunman or more than three bullets. Even if Lee Harvey Oswald was the only gunman, the deduction that there was therefore no conspiracy may be invalid if Oswald was acting upon the orders of someone else. Conspiracy Theories include:

(i) the generally held theory based upon the movement of Kennedy's head at the moment of the head shot as seen in the Zapruder film that a shot was fired from the grassy knoll at Zapruder frame 312 (Z312);

(ii) a theory held by the HSCA and based upon acoustical analysis that a shot was fired from the grassy knoll at Z295-Z296 which missed;

(iii) a theory held by Robert Groden and based upon study of the Zapruder film that a shot was fired from the grassy knoll at Z189-Z191 which struck Kennedy in the throat and did not exit; (iv) a theory based upon the improbability of the Single Bullet Theory and the inability of one gunman to fire two shots in the time frame between Kennedy's hit and Connally's hit, that a shot was fired from the southeastern most window of the sixth floor of the Depository or from the southwestern most window of the sixth floor of the Depository which struck only Connally at Z2224-Z2240;

(v) a theory held by researchers Wallace Milam and David Lifton that Connally was not shot until Z327, after Kennedy's fatal head wound, based upon the reactions of Connally as seen in the Zapruder film;

(vi) a theory suggested by Harold Weisberg based upon a photograph taken by James Altgens which shows suspicious activity in the second floor window of the Dal-Tex Building, that a gunman fired from the second floor of the Dal-Tex building at an undetermined moment in the Zapruder film;

(vii) a theory held by researcher Robert Groden and based upon photographs of a bullet mark next to a manhole on the south side of Elm Street which traces back to the Dallas County Records Building that at an unidentified moment in the Zapruder film a gunman on the roof of the Records building fired at the Presidential limousine and missed; and (viii) a theory held by researcher Robert Cutler that there were in all nine shots: four were hits, one miss, and four intentional misses. The first shot was fired from the southeastern window of the sixth floor of the Depository at Z152, intentionally missed and struck the pavement of Main Street wounding bystander James Tague. The second shot was fired from the third floor of the Dal-Tex Building at Z160, unintentionally missed and struck Elm Street. The third shot was a poisoned flechette fired from the umbrella man positioned near the Stemmons Freeway sign at Z187, wounded the President in the throat. The fourth shot was fired from the third floor of the Dal-Tex building at Z220, wounded the President in the back. The fifth shot fired from the southwestern window of the sixth floor of the Depository at Z222, wounded Governor Connally. The sixth shot fired from the southeastern window of the sixth floor of the Depository at Z231.5, missed and dented the windshield frame of the Presidential limousine between the visors. The seventh shot fired from the grassy knoll at Z294 intentionally missed and hit the turf between Elm and Main Streets. The eighth shot fired from the southwestern window of the sixth floor of the Depository. At Z312.5, hit the President in the head and fragments from the head wound caused Connally's thigh wound. The ninth shot fired from the grassy knoll at Z326, intentionally missed and hit the turf between Elm and Main Streets.

Zapruder Case Closed Analysis

The Warren Commission's finding that the first shot was fired between Z210-Z225 and the last at Z313 presented a timing problem. The assassin if there was only had a minimum of 4.8 seconds and a maximum of 5.6 seconds to fire all three shots. Gerald Posner in "Case Closed" attempts to solve the timing issue by suggesting that the first shot was fired not at Z210-Z225 but before Z166, resulting in 8.0 to 8.4 seconds of firing time.

Posner suggests that the evidence for an early shot is found in the reactions of the following around Z160: (1) 10-year-old Rosemary Willis, who, dressed in a red skirt and is running along side the Presidential limousine; stops running; (2) Kennedy, who stops waving; (3) Mrs. Kennedy, who's head abruptly twisted from her left to the right, the general direction of the School Book Depository.

Posner suggests that the shot around Z160 missed because the bullet was deflected by the large oak tree obstructing the line of fire.

Posner claims that the second shot hit Kennedy at Z223-Z224 and that this same shot then hit Governor Connally, thereby affirming the most controversial finding of the Warren Commission - The Single Bullet Theory. The evidence to support this claim is based on the observation that at Z226-Z227 Kennedy has assumed the Thorburn position, whereby, after spinal injury, a victim's arms jerk up into a fixed position almost parallel with the chin, with hands gathered near the neck and elbows pushed out to the sides. Posner claims that Kennedy assumed the Torburn position 1.8 to 3.66 Zapruder frames after he was hit and that therefore Kennedy was hit at Z223-224.

Posner's claims that the moment the bullet strikes Connally has been determined by "one of the most important timing confirmations in the case..." that at Z224 the right lapel of the governor's suit flies away from his chest. This lapel flap indicates the precise moment the Connally was shot, at Z224.

Posner places the third shot at Z313, claiming that computer analysis confirms that the third shot was fired from the Depository.

Book of Facts: ZR/Rifle

This was the code name the Central Intelligence Agency used for an assassination program that was also called Executive Action. The program employed criminals who were useful "if you need[ed] somebody to carry out murder," as former CIA director Richard Helms said. Assassination investigators have used this fact to point out that the CIA had relations with, and even employed people who were, professional assassins. ZR/RIFLE is a link in the chain that appears to tie Lee Harvey Oswald, the CIA, and the Kennedy assassination together.

Conspiracy

Book of Facts: A Readers Guide to the Assassination

Someone recently estimated that more than six hundred books have been published that concern the assassination of President John F. Kennedy. Many of these books do not actually cover the assassination directly, but discuss issues that are, at best, peripheral to the subject. In some cases, discussion of the assassination is included in an attempt to boost a book's sales when the book's main subject might be of substantially less interest to those millions of people around the world who buy books on the assassination.

For the following Reader's Guide, we have decided to include only books and documentaries that are about the Kennedy assassination itself or that deal with subjects so closely related that they demand inclusion. We considered the possibility of separating the guide into specific subjects, but we found so many books and documentaries that would have neatly fit into more than one section that we fell back on the expedient course of making a standard bibliography, listing books and documentaries alphabetically by author. We have included books published in English in the United States or Great Britain. Our inclusion of a book or documentary on this list is no indication that we recommend it or support its thesis. We have for the most part excluded books that are self-published (a few do remain on the list) as well as many that are long out of print or otherwise difficult to find.

BOOKS

- Adler, Bill (pseud. Jay David). The Weight of the Evidence: The Warren Report and Its Critics. New York: Meredith, 1968.
- Anson, Robert Sam. "They've Killed the President!" The Search for the Murderers of John F. Kennedy. New York: Bantam, 1975.
- Ashman, Charles. The CIA-Mafia Link. New York: Manor Books, 1975.
- Belin, David W. November 22, 1963: You Are the Jury. New York: Quadrangle, 1973.
- Belin, David W. Final Disclosure: The Full Truth About the Assassination of President Kennedy. New York: Scribner's, 1988.
- Belli, Melvin, with Maurice Carroll. Dallas Justice. New York: David McKay, 1964.
- Blakey, G. Robert, and Richard N. Billings. Fatal Hour: The Assassination of President Kennedy by Organized Crime. New York: Berkley, 1992. Originally published as The Plot to Kill the President (New York: Times Books, 1981).
- Bloomgarden, Henry S. The Gun: A "Biography" of the Gun That Killed John F. Kennedy. New York: Grossman Publishers, 1975; Bantam, 1976.
- Brener, Milton E. The Garrison Case: A Study in the Abuse of Power. New York: Clarkson N. Potter, 1969.
- Bringuier, Carlos. Red Friday: Nov. 22, 1963. Chicago: Charles Hallberg & Co., 1969.
- Buchanan, Thomas G. Who Killed Kennedy? New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons, 1964.
- Canfield, Michael L., and Alan J. Weberman. Coup d'Etat in America The CIA and the Assassination of John F. Kennedy. New York: The Third Press, 1975.
- Center for the Analysis of Law Enforcement Practices, Citizens Research and Investigation Committee and Louis E. Tackwood. The Glass House Tapes. New York: Avon Books, 1973.
- Chapman, Gil, and Ann Chapman. Was Oswald Alone? San Diego: Publishers Export Co., 1967.
- Crawford, Curtis, et al. Critical Reactions to the Warren Report. New York: Marzani and Munsell, 1965 (?).
- Crenshaw, Dr. Charles A., with Jens Hansen and Gary Shaw. JFK Conspiracy of Silence. New York: Signet, 1992.
- Curry, Jesse E. JFK Assassination File: Retired Dallas Police Chief Jesse Curry. Reveals His Personal File. Dallas: American Poster and Printing Co., 1969.
- Davis, John H. Mafia Kingfish: Carlos Marcell and the Assassination of John F. Kennedy. New York: McGraw-Hill, 1989.
- Davis, Marc, and Jim Mathews, eds. Highlights of the Warren Report. Covina, Cal.: Collectors Publishers, 1967.
- Davis, William Hardy. Aiming for the Jugular in New Orleans. Port Washington, N.Y.: Ashley Books Co., 1976.
- Duffy, James R. Who Killed JFK? The Net: The Kennedy Assassination Cover-Up. New York: Shapolsky, 1989.
- Eddowes, Michael. The Oswald File. New York: Clarkson N. Potter, 1977.

Epstein, Edward J. Inquest: The Warren Commission and the Establishment of Truth. New York: Viking Press, 1966; Bantam, 1966.

Epstein, Edward Jay. Counterplot. New York: Viking Press, 1969.

Epstein, Edward Jay. Legend: The Secret World of Lee Harvey Oswald. New York: Reader's Digest Books, 1978.

Flammonde, Paris. The Kennedy Conspiracy: An Uncommissioned Report on the Jim Garrison Investigation. New York: Meredith, 1969.

Ford, Gerald R., with John Stiles. Portrait of the Assassin. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1965; Ballantine, 1966.

Fox, Sylvan. The Unanswered Questions About President Kennedy's Assassination. New York: 1965; Award Books, 1975.

Garrison, Jim. Heritage of Stone. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons, 1970; Berkley, 1972.

Garrison, Jim. On the Trail of the Assassins. New York: Sheridan Square Press, 1988; Warner, 1991.

Gauzer, Bernard, and Sid Moody. The Lingerin Shadow. Dallas: Dallas Times-Herald, 1967.

Groden, Robert J., and Harrison Edward Livingstone. High Treason: The Assassination of President Kennedy and the New Evidence of Conspiracy. New York: Conservatory Press, 1989; Berkley, 1990.

Hartogs, Rhenatus, and Lucy Freeman. The Two Assassins. New York: Crowell, 1965; Zebra Books, 1976.

Hinkle, Warren, and William Turner. Deadly Secrets: The CIA-Mafia War Against Castro and the Assassination of JFK. New York: Thunder's Mouth Press, 1992. Previously published as The Fish is Red: The Story of the Secret War Against Castro. New York: Harper & Row, 1981.

Hurt, Henry. Reasonable Doubt: An Investigation into the Assassination of John F. Kennedy. New York: Henry Holt, 1985.

Joesten, Joachim. Oswald: Assassin or Fall-guy? New York: Marzani and Munsell, 1964. Republished as The Gaps in the Warren Report, n.d.

Joesten, Joachim. Oswald: The Truth. London: Peter Dawney, 1967.

Jones, Penn, Jr. Forgive My Grief. Vols. 1, 2: Midlothian, Tex.: Midlothian Mirror. Vols. 3, 4: Midlothian, Tex.: Penn Jones, Jr. 1967-1978.

Kantor, Seth. The Ruby Cover-up. New York: Zebra Books, 1978; 2d. printing, 1992.

Lane, Mark. A Citizen's Dissent: Mark Lane Replies. New York: Holt, Rinehart & Winston, 1966; Fawcett Crest, 1967; Dell, 1975.

Lane, Mark. Plausible Denial: Was the CIA Involved in the Assassination of JFK? New York: Thunder's Mouth Press, 1991.

Lane, Mark. Rush to Judgment. New York: Holt, Rinehart & Winston, 1966; Fawcett, 1967; Dell, 1975; Thunder's Mouth Press, 1991.

Lewis, Richard Warren. The Scavengers and Critics of the Warren Report: The Endless Paradox. New York: Delacorte Press, 1967; Dell, 1967.

Lifton, David S. Best Evidence: Disguise and Deception in the Assassination of John F. Kennedy. New York: Macmillan, 1980; Carroll & Graf, 1988.

Livingstone, Harrison Edward. High Treason 2: The Great Cover-up: The Assassination of President John F. Kennedy. New York: Carroll & Graf, 1992.

McBirnne, William Stewart. What Was Behind Lee Harvey Oswald? Glendale, Cal.: Acare Publications, n.d.

Manchester, William. The Death of a President: November 20November 25, 1963. 25th anniversary ed. New York: Harper & Row, 1988.

Marcus, Raymond. The Bastard Bullet: A Search for Legitimacy for Commission Exhibit 39. Los Angeles: Randall Publications, 1966.

Marrs, Jim. Crossfire: The Plot That Killed Kennedy. New York: Carroll & Graf, 1989.

Meagher, Sylvia. Accessories After the Fact: The Warren Commission, the Authorities, and the Report. New York: Bobbs-Merrill, 1967; Vintage Books, 1976.

Meagher, Sylvia, in collaboration with Gary Owens. Master Index to the JFK Assassination Investigation: The Reports and Supporting Documents of the House Select Committee on Assassinations and the Warren Commission. Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow Press, 1980.

Menninger, Bonar. Mortal Error: The Shot That Killed JFK. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1992.

Meunier, Robert F. Shadows of Doubt: The Warren Commission Cover-Up. Hicksville, N.Y.:

Exposition Press, 1976.

Miller, Tom. The Assassination Please Almanac. Chicago: Henry Regnery Co., 1977.

Morrow, Robert D. Betrayal. Chicago: Henry Regnery Co., 1976.

Nash, H. C. Citizen's Arrest: The Dissent of Penn Jones, Jr., in the Assassination of JFK. Austin, Tex.: Latitudes Press, 1977.

Newman, Albert H. The Assassination of John F. Kennedy: The Reasons Why. New York: Clarkson N. Potter, 1970.

North, Mark. Act of Treason: The Role of J. Edgar Hoover in the Assassination of President Kennedy. New York: Carroll & Graf, 1991.

Oglesby, Carl. The JFK Assassination: The Facts and the Theories. New York: Signet, 1992.

Oglesby, Carl. The Yankee and Cowboy War: Conspiracies from Dallas to Watergate. Mission, Kan.: Sheed Andrews & McNeel, 1976.

O'Toole, George. The Assassination Tapes: An Electronic Probe into the Murder of John F. Kennedy and the Dallas Coverup. New York: Penthouse Press, 1975.

Popkin, Richard H. The Second Oswald. New York: Avon Books, 1966.

President's Commission on the Assassination of President John F. Kennedy (Warren Commission). Report of the President's Commission on the Assassination of President John F. Kennedy (Warren Report). Washington, D.C.: Government Printing Office, 1964. Reprinted by many publishers.

Prouty, Leroy Fletcher. The Secret Team: The CIA and Its Allies in Control of the United States and the World. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice-Hall, 1973.

Ringgold, Gene, and Roger La Manna. Assassin: The Lee Harvey Oswald Biography. Hollywood, Cal.: Associated Professional Services, 1964.

Roffman, Howard. Presumed Guilty. Cranbury, N.J.: Fairleigh Dickinson University Press, 1975; New York: A. S. Barnes, 1976.

Sauvage, Leo. The Oswald Affair: An Examination of the Contradictions and Omissions of the Warren Report. Cleveland: World Publishing, 1966.

Schein, David E. Contract on America : The Mafia Murder of President John F. Kennedy. New York: Zebra Books, 1988.

Scott, Peter Dale. Crime and Cover-up: The CIA, the Mafia, and the Dallas-Watergate Connection. Berkeley, Cal.: Westworks, 1977.

Scott, Peter Dale, Paul L. Hoch, and Russell Stetler, eds. The Assassinations: Dallas and Beyond: A Guide to Cover-ups and Investigations. New York: Random House, 1976.

Sites, Paul. Lee Harvey Oswald and the American Dream. Pageant Press, 1967.

Sparrow, John H. A. After the Assassination: A Positive Appraisal of the Warren Report. New York: Chilmark Press, 1967.

Summers, Anthony. Conspiracy. New York: McGraw-Hill, 1980; Paragon House, 1989.

Thompson, Josiah. Six Seconds in Dallas: A Microstudy of the Kennedy Assassination. New York: Bernard Geiss Associates, 1967; rev. ed., Berkley, 1976.

Thornley, Kerry Wendell. Oswald. Chicago: New Classics House, 1965.

Warren, Earl. The Memoirs of Earl Warren. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1977.

Weisberg, Harold. Whitewash. Vols 14. Hyattstown, Md.: self-published, 1965-1967. Vols. 1, 2 republished in New York by Dell, 1966-1967.

White, Stephen. Should We Now Believe the Warren Report? New York: Macmillan, 1968.

Wilber, Charles G. Medicolegal Investigation of the President John F. Kennedy Murder. Springfield, Ill.: Charles C. Thomas, Publisher, 1978.

Zirbel, Craig I. The Texas Connection: The Assassination of President John F. Kennedy. Scottsdale, Ariz.: The Texas Connection Co., 1991.

DOCUMENTARIES

Best Evidence (1970). Produced by David S. Lifton, this film is based on his book of the same title. Through interviews with witnesses, the film focuses on the differences in testimony concerning the president's wounds and regarding the coffin in which he was transferred from Dallas to Washington.

Declassified: The Plot to Kill Kennedy (1979). This one-hour documentary examines the possible conspiracies behind the assassination.

Executive Action (1973). Based on the novel of the same name, co-authored by Mark Lane, this 90-minute feature stars Robert Ryan and Burt Lancaster as leaders of a group of businessmen who plot to kill the president to protect their business interests.

The Fateful Trip to Texas: The Assassination of a President (1969). Produced by historian Arthur M. Schlesinger, Jr., and Fred Israel, the seven-minute documentary was released by Chelsea House Communications, New York.

Four Days in November (1964). This two-hour documentary was produced by Mel Stuart and released by United Artists.

JFK (1991). Oliver Stone's famous feature starring Kevin Costner as New Orleans District Attorney Jim Garrison was widely attacked by establishment press and television commentators for its distortions of history. The movie is based on Jim Marrs's Crossfire and Jim Garrison's On the Trail of the Assassins.

The Kennedy Assassination: What Do We Know Now That We Didn't Know Then? (1978). This film was produced by Witness Productions and released through Sundicast Services, Inc.

Ruby (1992). This feature film, starring Danny Aiello in the title role, is a fictionalized account of the underworld activities of Jack Ruby. In the film, Ruby is ordered to kill Lee Harvey Oswald to prevent him from talking about the assassination.

Ruby and Oswald (1978). This television film was based on the activities of Jack Ruby and Lee Harvey Oswald before and after the assassination; Frederic Forrest and Michael Lerner starred.

Rush to Judgment (1964). Co-produced by Mark Lane, this two-hour documentary is based on his book of the same title and focuses on the question, Where were the shots fired from? It was released by Impact Films.

The Trial of Lee Harvey Oswald (1977). This TV miniseries cleverly blended fact and fiction; Loran Greene and John Placate starred.

The Trial of Lee Harvey Oswald (1987). This 1987 miniseries created a trial for Lee Harvey Oswald - something he never had in reality. Working without a script and using no professional actors, Vincent Bugles attempted to convince a jury of Dallas residents (chosen from voter registration records) of Oswald's guilt. Gerry Spank, a famous trial lawyer, defended the absent accused assassin. The judge was a sitting Texas judge, and the action took place in a real courtroom and followed all the rules and procedures of an actual criminal trial. All the witnesses called to testify were actual witnesses to events surrounding the assassination. The film is a fascinating portrayal of what Oswald's trial might have been like, had he lived.

Two Men in Dallas (1977). Narrated by Mark Lane, this one-hour film focuses on the activities of one of the most important witnesses of the assassination, Deputy Sheriff Roger Craig. It was released by Alpha Productions.

Winter Kill. Jeff Bridges stars in this fictitious account of how the brother of a murdered president discovers that the killing was ordered by Mafia bosses.

Animation Menus

Analysis

Conspiracy Theory

Warren Commission

House Committee

Warren Commission

House Committee

Conspiracy Theory

```
{ewc MVMCI2, ViewerMCI, [device AVIVideo][buttons playpause scanl scanr menu][stepsize 84][mute][slider][caption 'Warren Commission: Close Up View'] [autostart]..WCD.AVI}
```

```
{ewc MVMCI2, ViewerMCI, [device AVIVideo][buttons playpause scanl scanr menu][stepsize 84][mute][slider][caption 'Warren Commission: Long View']
[autostart]..WC.AVI}
```

```
{ewc MVMCI2, ViewerMCI, [device AVIVideo][buttons playpause scanl scanr menu][stepsize 84][mute][slider][caption 'Zapruder View'][autostart]..F.AVI}
```

```
{ewc MVMCI2, ViewerMCI, [device AVIVideo][buttons playpause scanl scanr menu][stepsize 84][mute][slider][caption 'SniperNest View'][autostart]..D.AVI}
```

```
{ewc MVMCI2, ViewerMCI, [device AVIVideo][buttons playpause scanl scanr menu][stepsize 84][mute][slider][caption 'Western Window View']
[autostart]..D.AVI}
```

```
{ewc MVMCI2, ViewerMCI, [device AVIVideo][buttons playpause scanl scanr menu][stepsize 84][mute][slider][caption 'Grassy Knoll View'][autostart]..D.AVI}
```

```
{ewc MVMCI2, ViewerMCI, [device AVIVideo][buttons playpause scanl scanr menu][stepsize 84][mute][slider][caption 'Dal-Tex View'][autostart]..D.AVI}
```

```
{ewc MVMCI2, ViewerMCI, [device AVIVideo][buttons playpause scanl scanr menu][stepsize 84][mute][slider][caption 'County Records View']
[autostart]..D.AVI}
```

```
{ewc MVMCI2, ViewerMCI, [device AVIVideo][buttons playpause scanl scanr
menu][stepsize 126][mute][slider][caption 'Single Bullet: Frame 224']
[autostart].._WAR.AVI}
```

```
{ewc MVMCI2, ViewerMCI, [device AVIVideo][buttons playpause scanl scanr menu][stepsize 84][mute][slider][caption 'Close up View'][autostart]..HSD.AVI}
```

```
{ewc MVMCI2, ViewerMCI, [device AVIVideo][buttons playpause scanl scanr menu][stepsize 84][mute][slider][caption 'Long View'][autostart]..HS.AVI}
```

```
{ewc MVMCI2, ViewerMCI, [device AVIVideo][buttons playpause scanl scanr
menu][stepsize 126][mute][slider][caption 'Single Bullet: Frame 190']
[autostart].._HS.AVI}
```

```
{ewc MVMCI2, ViewerMCI, [device AVIVideo][buttons playpause scanl scanr menu][stepsize 84][mute][slider][caption 'Close up View'][autostart]..XTD.AVI}
```

```
{ewc MVMCI2, ViewerMCI, [device AVIVideo][buttons playpause scanl scanr menu][stepsize 84][mute][slider][caption 'Long View'][autostart]..XT.AVI}
```

```
{ewc MVMCI2, ViewerMCI, [device AVIVideo][buttons playpause scanl scanr
menu][stepsize 126][mute][slider][caption 'WC Magic Bullet: Frame 224']
[autostart].._X224.AVI}
```

```
{ewc MVMCI2, ViewerMCI, [device AVIVideo][buttons playpause scanl scanr
menu][stepsize 126][mute][slider][caption 'HSCA Magic Bullet: Frame 190']
[autostart].._X190.AVI}
```

```
{ewc MVMCI2, ViewerMCI, [device AVIVideo][buttons playpause scanl scanr
menu][stepsize 168][mute][slider][caption 'Knoll Head: Frame 313']
[autostart].._KHEAD.AVI}
```

Photo Library

Photo Library

JFK

Oswald

Evidence

Dealey Plaza

Funeral

Principals

Photographs: JFK, Football Player

John F. Kennedy, age 16, when he played football for the Choate School, in Connecticut.

Photographs: JFK, Family 1936

John F. Kennedy, far left, at age 17, with his family in 1936.

Photographs: JFK, 1941

John F. Kennedy around 1941.

Photographs: JFK, Navy

Lt. John F. Kennedy receives medal for extremely heroic conduct while commanding PT-109.

Photographs: JFK, Youthful Campaigner

JFK campaigning in 1946.

Photographs: JFK, Family in 1946

Standing outside St. Francis Xavier church, Hyannis, Massachusetts; l to r: Eunice Kennedy (sister), Joseph P. Kennedy (father), Bishop James Cassidy, Mrs. Joseph Kennedy (mother), John F. Kennedy, John F. Fitzgerald (grandfather), Edward Kennedy (brother) in 1946.

Photographs: JFK and Brothers 1958

Senator John F. Kennedy (D-Mass) and his two brothers, Edward, left, a student at the University of Virginia; and Robert, counsel of the Senate Rackets Investigating Subcommittee, on March 15, 1958.

Photographs: JFK and Brothers 1959

Senator John F. Kennedy conferring with brothers Edward and Robert in 1959.

Photographs: JFK and Lyndon B. Johnson

John F. Kennedy, democratic presidential candidate and Lyndon B. Johnson, vice presidential candidate, during the 1960 presidential campaign.

Photographs: JFK, Inauguration

JFK being sworn in as the 35th President of the United States by Chief Justice Earl Warren.

Photographs: JFK and Attorney General Robert Kennedy

President Kennedy with his brother, Attorney General Robert F. Kennedy, in October 1962.

Photographs: JFK at the White House

President Kennedy at the White House, October 1962, between meetings with government leaders.

Photographs: JFK and John, Jr.

John Jr., 18 months old and walking, takes a few steps in the chief executive's White House office.

Photographs: JFK, Vietnam

President Kennedy, in March 1961, illustrates pro-Communist infiltrations in southeast Asia.

Photographs: JFK, Houston

President Kennedy in Houston, Texas before the fateful journey to Dallas.

Photographs: JFK, Love Field Arrival

President and Mrs. Kennedy arrive at Love Field, Dallas, Texas on November 22, 1963.

Photographs: Dealey Plaza, Overhead

An overhead view of Dealey Plaza, the site of the assassination of President John F. Kennedy.

Photographs: Dealey Plaza, Grassy Knoll

A view of the Grassy Knoll from the roof of the Dallas County Records Building.

Photographs: Dealey Plaza, Crowds

Dallas crowds cheer President Kennedy.

Photographs: Dealey Plaza, Presidential Limousine Approaches

The motorcade approaches Dealey Plaza. Secret Service Agent Clint Hill rides on the left rear bumper.

Photographs: Dealey Plaza, Entering The Plaza

The Presidential limousine enters Dealey Plaza.

Photographs: Dealey Plaza, Kennedy Waves, Altgens 01

President Kennedy waves moments before the shots.

Photographs: Dealey Plaza, The First Shot, Altgens 02

The moment of the first shot which struck President Kennedy.

Photographs: Dealey Plaza, Secret Service Men

Secret Service agents riding directly behind the President at the moment of the assassination.

Photographs: Dealey Plaza, Open Window

At the moment of the assassination, two windows are open on the second floor of the Dal-Tex building. Some Conspiracy theorists believe that a gunman fired from the second floor of the Dal-Tex building.

Photographs: Dealey Plaza, Man in Doorway

At the moment of the assassination, a man resembling Lee Harvey Oswald stood in the doorway of the Texas School Book Depository. The Warren Commission concluded that the man was not Oswald, but Billy Lovelady, an employee of the Book Depository.

Photographs: Dealey Plaza, After the Shots, Altgens 03

This photograph, taken seconds after the shots, shows Secret Service agent Clint Hill clutching to the back of the Presidential limousine as Mrs. Kennedy reacts to the fatal wounds of the President.

Photographs: Dealey Plaza, Police

Police officers escort the Presidential motorcade at the moment the president is first struck by a bullet.

Photographs: Dealey Plaza, Babushka Lady

The Babushka Lady (brown coat, right side) in Dealey Plaza at the moment of the assassination.

Photographs: Dealey Plaza, Bullet Hits the President, Moorman

Mary Moorman took this well-known Polaroid picture just as Kennedy was struck in the head. Researchers examined the bushy area east from the corner of the fence and discovered what appeared to be two figures. The main figure has been dubbed the "badge man" because he appears to be wearing a dark shirt with a semi-circular patch on the left shoulder and a bright shiny object on his left chest.

Photographs: Dealey Plaza, Phil Willis 01

Phillip Willis, who took a series of pictures considered by many as the most important photos taken of the assassination. The Presidential limousine passes the Court House on Main and Houston, 25 seconds before the fatal shots.

Photographs: Dealey Plaza, Phil Willis 02

The Presidential limousine has turned onto Houston from Main.

Photographs: Dealey Plaza, Phil Willis 03

The motorcade approaches the final turn onto Elm.

Photographs: Dealey Plaza, Phil Willis 04

The Presidential limousine has turned onto Elm, just three seconds before the fatal shots.

Photographs: Dealey Plaza, Phil Willis 05

The black arrow points to the President the moment he was first struck by a bullet. A human figure known as the "black dog man" is visible at the top of the corner of the low retaining wall to the left of the Grassy Knoll pergola.

Photographs: Dealey Plaza, Phil Willis 06

Dealey Plaza moments after the fatal shots.

Photographs: Dealey Plaza, Phil Willis 07

The press bus, which was located at the end of the motorcade, passes the assassination site.

Photographs: Dealey Plaza, Phil Willis 08

The man with dark glasses at the far right may be Jack Ruby, placing him at the scene of the assassination.

Photographs: Dealey Plaza, Phil Willis 09

Police seal the Texas School Book Depository after the shooting.

Photographs: Dealey Plaza, Phil Willis 010

Police hold up the gun taken from the Texas School Book Depository.

Photographs: Dealey Plaza, Phil Willis 011

Police search for the assassin.

Photographs: Dealey Plaza, Phil Willis 012

The Texas School Book Depository one hour after the assassination.

Photographs: Dealey Plaza, Umbrella Man

The Umbrella man with the Dark Complexioned man moments after the assassination.

Photographs: Dealey Plaza, Race to Parkland

A wounded President Kennedy and Governor Connally race to Parkland Memorial Hospital.

Photographs: Dealey Plaza, Race to Parkland

Kennedy's foot is protruding over the side of the car as it speeds to Parkland.

Photographs: Dealey Plaza, Police Search for the Assassin

Police look toward the sixth floor window of the Book Depository after the assassination.

Photographs: Dealey Plaza, Acoustic Experts

A Texas police department sharpshooter fires a rifle from behind a fence on the grassy knoll in Dealey Plaza, as acoustics experts record the shots in an attempt to determine if more than three shots were fired from different positions in the assassination of President John F. Kennedy.

Photographs: Oswald, The Marine

Lee Harvey Oswald, the accused assassin of President Kennedy, in the Marines at age 19.

Photographs: Oswald, Soviet Union

Lee Harvey Oswald in the Soviet Union, posing with Pavel Golovachev (right) a KGB informant.

Photographs: Oswald, Captured

Lee Harvey Oswald is captured by Dallas Police less than two hours after the assassination.

Photographs: Oswald, Texas Theater

The Texas Theater, where Oswald was captured by Dallas Police.

Photographs: Oswald, Arrested

The suspected assassin, Lee Harvey Oswald, 24 years-old, as he was led through the Dallas police station. Oswald was charged with the murder of Dallas policeman J.D. Tippit, and later that evening with the murder of President Kennedy.

Photographs: Oswald, Arrested

Dallas Police identification photograph of Lee Harvey Oswald.

Photographs: Oswald, Reporters

Lee Harvey Oswald, surrounded by detectives, responds to reporter's questions.

Photographs: Oswald, Denies Charges

Lee Harvey Oswald, before news reporters, repeatedly denies that he assassinated the President.

Photographs: Oswald, Ambulance

Oswald is put into an ambulance after he is shot by Jack Ruby in the basement of the Dallas Jail.

Photographs: Oswald, Funeral

Marina Oswald, her daughter June Lee, Robert Oswald, and Marguerite Oswald holding Rachel, Marina's other daughter at the funeral of Lee Harvey Oswald.

Photographs: Oswald, Defection Letter

ГОСТИНИЦА „МЕТРОПОЛЬ“
г. МОСКВА

I to Hong Council be hereby request that my present citizenship in the United States of America, be revoked.
I have entered the Soviet Union for the express purpose of applying for citizenship in the Soviet Union, through the means of naturalization.
My request for citizenship is now pending before the Supreme Soviet of the USSR.
I take this step for political reasons.
My request for the revoking of my American citizenship is made only after the longest and most serious considerations.
I affirm that my allegiance is to the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

Lee Harvey Oswald

Letter from Lee Harvey Oswald, requesting that his American citizenship be revoked.

Photographs: Oswald, Identification Card

SELECTIVE SERVICE SYSTEM
NOTICE OF CLASSIFICATION

Approval not required

ALEK

JAMES

HIDELL

(First name)

(Middle name)

(Last name)

Selective Service No.

42 224 599 5521

has been classified in Class 1-A (Until 19.....) by Local Board Appeal Board,

by vote of _____ to _____ President

(Show vote on appeal board cases only)

_____, 19.....

(Date of mailing)

(Member or clerk of local board)

(Registrant must sign here)

The law requires you, subject to heavy penalty for violation, to carry this notice, in addition to your Registration Certificate on your person at all times—to exhibit it upon request to authorized officials—to surrender it to your commanding officer upon entering the armed forces.

The law requires you to notify your local board in writing (1) of every change in your address, physical condition, and occupational, marital, family, dependency, and military status, and (2) of any other fact which might change your classification.

FOR ADVICE, SEE YOUR GOVERNMENT APPEAL AGENT

A forged picture identification card found on Lee Harvey Oswald at the time of his arrest.

Photographs: Oswald, Letter to Mr. Hunt

Nov. 8, 1963

Dear Mr. Hunt,

I would like information concerning my position.

I am asking only for information
I am suggesting that we discuss the matter fully before any steps are taken by me or anyone else

Thank You,
Lee Harvey Oswald

A letter dated fourteen days before the assassination, possibly links Oswald to rogue CIA agents.

Photographs: Oswald, Edwin Walker - Home

General Edwin A. Walker's home, with the license plate of the car suspiciously blackened. The Warren Commission concluded that Lee Harvey Oswald attempted to kill General Walker at his home in April 1963.

Photographs: Funeral, Casket

Jacqueline and Robert Kennedy watch as the President's casket is placed in an ambulance.

Photographs: Funeral, Jacqueline Kennedy

Jacqueline Kennedy and her daughter kiss the casket of her husband in the rotunda of the U.S. Capital.

Photographs: Funeral, Kennedy Family Leaves the Capitol

The Kennedy family leaves the Capitol after the slain President's body was placed in the rotunda.

Photographs: Funeral, The Capitol

The flag draped coffin of President Kennedy pauses in front of the Capitol on route to burial at Arlington.

Photographs: Funeral, Procession

The funeral procession moves through the capitol.

Photographs: Funeral, Procession

The funeral procession crosses the Memorial Bridge leading to Arlington National Cemetery.

Photographs: Funeral, Arlington

The Kennedy family watches as a military team places the President's casket at the grave site.

Photographs: Evidence, Kennedy's Wound Positions

NO. 1 0022336
 NAME: _____
 SEX: _____ RACE: _____
 HEIGHT: _____ WEIGHT: _____
 HAIR: _____ EYES: _____ BIRTH: _____
 OCCUPATION: _____
 RESIDENCE: _____
 MARITAL STATUS: _____ RELIGION: _____
 EDUCATION: _____ SERVICE: _____
 LAST MEASUREMENTS: _____
 SIGNATURE: _____

Wound on back of neck
 Wound on back of neck 12 inches from base of neck
 George Burkley
 11/22/63

The autopsy face sheet signed by Admiral George Burkley verifying the location of President Kennedy's wounds. The report places the back wound well below the neck.

Photographs; Evidence, Connally's Wound Positions

Body diagram showing the positions of the wounds incurred by Governor Connally.

Photographs: Evidence, Connally's Chest Wound

Body diagram of Governor Connally's chest wound.

Photographs: Evidence, Autopsy - Back Wound

Autopsy photograph of the President's back, showing the location of his back wound. The Warren Commission found that the bullet which entered Kennedy's back exited his throat.

Photographs: Evidence, Back Wound - Diagram

Placement of the back wound according to the Warren Commission. The back wound is high and the throat wound is depicted as an exit wound.

Photographs: Evidence, Head - Autopsy

Autopsy photograph of the President's head, showing the back of the head intact. The picture disagrees with all accounts of the head wound by Parkland doctors and staff.

Photographs: Evidence, Head Diagram

Diagrams of the head wound suffered by President Kennedy, according to the Warren Commission. The representation of the head wound partially to the rear of the head does not correspond to autopsy photographs of the head.

Photographs: Evidence, Head - Diagram

The version of the head wound as determined by the House Select Committee on Assassinations.

Photographs: Evidence, JFK Head X-ray

X-ray of President Kennedy's skull, showing that the bone of the right front forehead is missing as far down as the right eye socket, however autopsy photographs of the President's face do not show any such damage, suggesting that either X-rays or the photographs are forged.

Photographs: Evidence, Head - Z335

Frame 335 from the Zapruder film showing the wound to the President's head. The back of the President's head appears to be missing, confirming Parkland Doctor's descriptions of the head wound and the probability that the President was hit from the front.

Photographs: Evidence, Kennedy's Coat

President Kennedy's coat showing the bullet's point of entry, measured at 5 3/8 inches below the collar.

Photographs: Evidence, Kennedy's Shirt

FBI lab photographs showing the damage to President Kennedy's shirt. The bullet entrance hole in the back of the shirt is measured at $5\frac{3}{4}$ inches below the top of the collar.

Photographs: Evidence, Connally's Shirt

Governor Connally's shirt showing the rear entry wound.

Photograph: Evidence, Magic Bullet

Commission Exhibit #399 which is alleged to have caused injuries to both President Kennedy and Governor Connally and to have emerged in near-perfect condition became known as the Magic Bullet.

Photographs: Evidence, Magic Bullet - Base

Damage to the base of the Magic Bullet, showing the distorted, flattened shape of the bullet.

Photographs: Evidence, Bullet Fragments

Bullet Fragments found in the Presidential limousine.

Photographs: Evidence, Oswald Backyard Photographs

Allegedly taken by Marina Oswald in the backyard of their home at 214 Neeley Street in Dallas, Lee Harvey Oswald holds two communist newspapers, "The Worker" and "The Militant," as well as a rifle resembling the assassination weapon. Oswald claimed that the photographs were faked.

Photographs: Evidence, Presidential Limousine

Within 48 hours, the Presidential limousine was shipped to the Ford Motor Company in Detroit and completely dismantled, thus destroying any important bloodstains, bullet holes or more bullet fragments which could have shed light on the assassination.

Photographs: Evidence, Presidential Limousine

PRESIDENTIAL CAR — NOVEMBER 22, 1963 — SCALE $\frac{3}{4}'' = 1'-0''$
DRAWN BY RONALD S. KNOWLES WHCA

Scaled Secret Service drawing of the Presidential limousine.

Photographs: Evidence, The Rifle

A detective holds the bolt action rifle allegedly used to assassinate President Kennedy. Originally identified as a German-made 7.65-caliber Mauser, the rifle is was later identified as a Mannlicher-Carcano 6.5-caliber Italian-made carbine.

Photographs: Evidence, Reenactment

Government reenactment of the assassination. The location of head entry is marked near the hair line, a position incompatible with autopsy conclusions. The back wound, as positioned in the reenactment, is not aligned with an exit wound at the level of the throat as the Warren Commission concluded.

Photographs: Evidence, Reenactment - Rifle Scope

View through the rifle scope from the sixth floor window of the Texas School Book Depository Building during the reenactment of Kennedy's assassination.

Photographs: Evidence, Reenactment Z210

Photographs taken from the perspective of Zapruder's position and the sniper's nest during the reenactment of the assassination correspond to Zapruder frame 210, possibly the moment of the first shot which struck the President.

Photographs: Evidence, Throat - Diagram

Diagram of the throat wound suffered by President Kennedy according to the Warren Commission. The back wound is high, compared to autopsy findings, and the throat wound is depicted as an exit wound.

Photographs: Evidence, Throat - Autopsy

Autopsy photograph of President Kennedy's throat wound. The wound is a result of a tracheotomy performed by Dr. Malcolm Perry at Parkland Memorial Hospital. The tracheotomy incision was made over a wound which Dr. Perry described as a bullet entry wound, based upon its size of 3 to 5 mm in diameter. Contrary to Dr. Perry's observation, the Warren Commission concluded that the throat wound was a wound of exit.

Photographs: Evidence, Sniper's Nest

Southeast corner of the sixth floor of the Texas School Book Depository, the location where the Warren Commission concluded that Lee Harvey Oswald fired three shots killing President Kennedy and wounding Governor Connally. The arrangement of cartons and the location of prints are shown.

Photographs: Evidence, Windshield Damage

Damage to the windshield of the Presidential limousine, possibly caused by a bullet not accounted for by the Warren Commission.

Photographs: Principals, Altgens, James

James Altgens was an Associated Press photographer who photographed the assassination.

Photographs: Principals, Fidel Castro

The Cuban dictator Fidel Castro has long been suspected of ordering Kennedys death.

Photographs: Principals, Judith Campbell Exner

Judith Campbell Exner, who was connected to mobster Sam Giancana, had an affair with JFK.

Photographs: Principals, David Ferrie

A CIA contract agent, David Ferrie was a suspect in the Garrison investigation but died before the trial.

Photographs: Principals, Captain Will Fritz

Dallas police captain Will Fritz interrogated Lee Harvey Oswald after his arrest.

Photographs: Principals, Jim Garrison

Jim Garrison, the New Orleans district attorney, conducted an investigation of the assassination.

Photographs: Principals, Sam Giancana

Sam Giancana was a Chicago mafia boss involved in CIA plots to kill Fidel Castro.

Photographs: Principals, William Greer

Secret Service agent William Greer was the driver of the limousine the day of the assassination.

Photographs: Principals, Jimmy Hoffa

Jimmy Hoffa, president of the National Teamsters Union, was a target of Robert F. Kennedy's investigations.

Photographs: Principals, J. Edgar Hoover

FBI director J. Edgar Hoover has been criticized because he consistently supported the idea that Lee Harvey Oswald was the sole assassin and not part of a larger conspiracy.

Photographs: Principals, E. Howard Hunt

CIA agent E. Howard Hunt was in charge of the CIA station in Mexico City, when Lee Harvey Oswald allegedly visited the Soviet and Cuban embassies, ostensibly to arrange for his return to the Soviet Union.

Photographs: Principals, Johnson is Sworn in Aboard Air Force One, Johnson is sworn in as the President of the United States.

Photographs: Principals, President Johnson

Lyndon B. Johnson make his first address to the nation as President.

Photographs: Principals, Meyer Lansky

By 1933, the Mob's financial wizard, Meyer Lansky, had obtained gambling concessions in Cuba.

Photographs: Principals, Charles "Lucky" Luciano

Lucky Luciano forged connections between the mafia and U.S. intelligence agencies.

Photographs: Principals, Carlos Marcello

Carlos Marcello was for decades the reputed head of the mafia organization in the South.

Photographs: Principals, Richard Nixon

Vice President Nixon during televised debates with Senator John F. Kennedy in October 1960.

Photographs: Principals, Marina Oswald

Marina Oswald, the wife of Lee Harvey Oswald, on the day of the assassination.

Photographs: Principals, Jack Ruby

Jack Ruby, the slayer of Lee Harvey Oswald, was a Dallas nightclub owner with ties to the mafia.

Photographs: Principals, Jack Ruby - Arrested

Jack Ruby under arrest after the shooting of Lee Harvey Oswald.

Photographs: Principals, Clay Shaw

New Orleans district attorney Jim Garrison charged Shaw with conspiracy to murder President Kennedy.

Photographs: Principals, Sinatra, Frank

Frank Sinatra introduced Judith Exner to John F. Kennedy. Exner was associated with the mafia.

Photographs: Principals, James Tague

James Tague, who is behind the car door in the upper right of this frame from the Zapruder film, was the third man wounded in Dealey Plaza.

Photographs: Principals, Tippit, J. D.

Policeman J.D. Tippit was murdered shortly after the assassination, possibly by Lee Harvey Oswald.

Photographs: Principals, Santos Trafficante

Santos Trafficante, a Florida mafia boss, is reported to have made several threats on President Kennedys life.

END OF PHOTO LIBRARY

J.F.K. Assassination

A Visual Investigation

Published by Macmillan Digital USA
A Viacom Company

Copyright © 1993 - 1995
By Wilbur Films Multimedia Inc.
All Rights Reserved

Warning: This program is protected by copyright law and international treaties.
Unauthorized reproduction or distribution of this program or any portion of it may result in severe criminal penalties and will be prosecuted to the maximum extent of permissible under law.

Credits

Book of Facts Table of Contents

Introduction

Guide to the Book of Facts

Key to Sources

The Book of Facts

A Reader's Guide to the Assassination

Copyright 1993 - 1995
By Wilbur Films Multimedia Inc.
New York, NY
All rights reserved. Manufactured in the United States of America.

Published by Macmillan Digital USA
A Viacom Company
1633 Broadway
New York, NY 10019-6785
Manufactured in the United States of America

Publisher: Kevin Howat
Producer: Edward Nothnagle
Design Director: Janet Tingey
Managing Editor: Kelly Ackley

ISBN: 1-57595-008-1

Quality Assurance by PCTest Corporation

Be sure to go online to JFK Assassination from the Macmillan Digital Home Page at <http://www.mcp.com/macdigital>

A Wilbur Films Multimedia Production.

Zapruder Film Copyright 1963 and 1967 by LMH Corp.
c/o James Lorin Silverberg, Esq.,
Washington DC, 202-332-7978
All Rights Reserved

Nix Film and stills Copyright 1963, 1964, and 1992 Nix
c/o Gayle Nix Jackson
Glenn Heights TX 214-223-1439
All Rights Reserved

JFK Animations
Copyright 1993 by Wilbur Films Multimedia Inc.
Produced by Forensic Technologies Inc.
San Francisco, CA

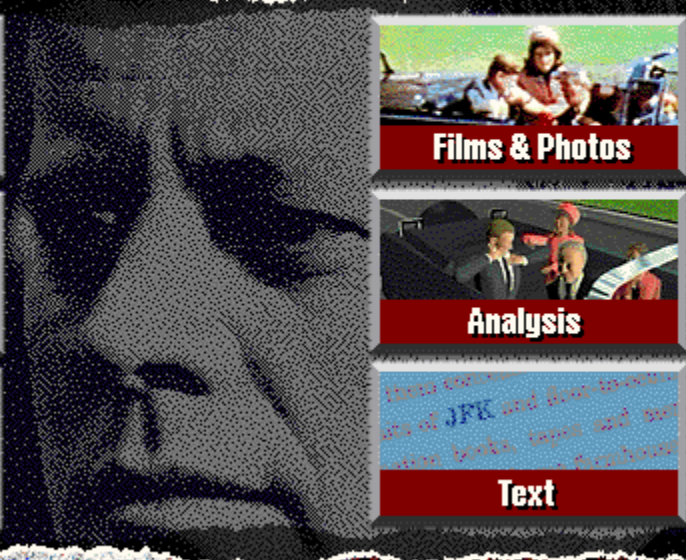

Crossfire: The Plot That Killed Kennedy
Copyright 1983 by Jim Marrs.

Narrated by Leslie Bennett and Greg Fensterman.

Multimedia Viewer, version 2.00
Copyright 1990-1993 Microsoft Corporation All rights reserved.
Microsoft® is a registered trademark and Windows® is a trademark of Microsoft Corporation.

J.F.K. Assassination

A Visual Investigation

```
{ewc MVMCI2, ViewerMCI, [device AVIVideo][buttons playpause scanl scanr menu][stepsize 1000][mute][slider][caption 'Introduction']][autostart].._CMP.AVI}
```

Text

Films & Photos

Nix Film

Zapruder Film

Muchmore Film

Hughes Film

Photo Library

Warren Commission Table of Contents

Full Table of Contents

Letter of Transmittal

Foreword

Chapter I. Summary & Conclusions

Chapter II. The Assassination

Chapter III. The Shots from the Texas Schoolbook Depository

Chapter IV. The Assassin

Chapter V. Detention & Death of Oswald

Chapter VI. Investigation of Possible Conspiracy

Chapter VII. Lee Harvey Oswald: Background & Possible Motives

Chapter VIII. The Protection of the President

Appendixes

Crossfire Table of Contents

INTRODUCTION

PREFACE

PART I: The Kill Zone

Dallas: The Stage is Set

Dealey Plaza: Nov. 22, 1963

The Motorcade

The Crowd

The Texas Schoolbook Depository

The Triple Underpass

The Grassy Knoll

PART II: Means Motives Opportunities

Lee Harvey Oswald

Russians

Cubans

Mobsters

Agents

G-Men

Rednecks & Oilmen

Soldiers

PART III: Aftermath

Dallas

Two Hospitals

Jack Ruby

The Evidence

The Warren Commission

The Garrison Investigation

The House Select Committee

Was Oswald Really Oswald

Convenient Deaths

PART IV: Conclusions

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

Overview

JFK

Conspiracy Theories

Aftermath

Dallas

Conclusions

Overview: JFK's Youth

Kennedy was born on May 29, 1917, in Brookline, Massachusetts, an unpretentious middle-class suburb of Boston.

He was the second oldest son of a family which began their American life with the immigration of Patrick Kennedy from Ireland in 1848. Both grandfathers were prominent Democratic Party ward bosses during the time when a group of Irish leaders ruled the local party.

While he grew to manhood, his father, Joseph P. Kennedy, amassed a considerable fortune. By age 25, Joe Kennedy had gained control of a bank in East Boston. By adroit investments in real estate, the stock market and the film industry - and perhaps some bootlegging money - Kennedy built an empire worth an estimated $250 million.

Jack, as the future President was called, attended only the best schools, beginning with the Choate School in Connecticut, where he won an award for best combining sports and scholastics. While he graduated near the bottom of his class, he nevertheless was selected as the man "most likely to succeed."

A bout with jaundice forced him to drop out of college, but upon recovery, he joined his older brother, Joseph Kennedy Jr., at Harvard.

Overview: PT-109

JFK joined the U.S. Navy two months before the December 7, 1941 attack on Pearl Harbor.

In the summer of 1943, Kennedy was in command of a Navy patrol boat, the PT-109. During a patrol in the Solomon Islands, the PT-109 was struck and broken in half by a Japanese destroyer, the only such incident during the war.

Although some negligence appeared to be involved, Kennedy went on to become a hero after saving the life of one of his men and helping to arrange their rescue.

He pulled his wounded chief engineer, Patrick McMahon, to a nearby island by swimming for four hours with the man on his back held in place by gripping a strap of the man's life jacket between his teeth. Later, Kennedy arranged for local natives to alert Navy officials of the group's location in enemy-held territory. Soon they were all rescued.

Overview: JFK - The Senator

The political aspirations of his father fell on Jack Kennedy after the death of the oldest brother, Joseph Kennedy Jr. After the war, a reluctant Kennedy ran for and won a House Seat from Massachusetts.

In later years, Joe Kennedy was quoted as saying:

"I told him Joe was dead and it was his responsibility to run for Congress. He didn't want to. But I told him he had to."

With the Kennedy name and Kennedy money behind him, Kennedy easily won two more elections to Congress. Then, in 1952, he defeated Henry Cabot Lodge to become junior senator from Massachusetts.

With an eye toward the 1960 Presidential election, Kennedy and his supporters went all out to ensure an impressive victory in his 1958 senate re-election campaign in Massachusetts. Indeed, he won by the largest margin in the state's history.

Overview: The 1960 Presidential Campaign

By 1960, Kennedy was ready for the Democratic presidential nomination. Entering the Democratic National Convention in Los Angeles, Kennedy was unsuccessfully challenged by conservative Texas Senator Lyndon B. Johnson. The pragmatic Kennedy immediately knew that conservative Democrats were needed to win against Republican Richard Nixon, so he forged a temporary coalition by selecting the defeated Johnson as his vice presidential running mate. Perhaps the real turning point in the 1960 election came in September when Kennedy and Nixon met in the first televised debates in American history. The four debates were viewed by nearly half the population of the nation and no one denies that Kennedy emerged the victor - although radio listeners judged Nixon the winner.

On Election Day, Kennedy won, but by one of the slimmest margins in American history. He polled 34,227,096 votes to Nixon's 34,108,546 - a margin of 49.9 percent to 49.6 percent.

On January 20, 1961, standing coatless in bristling 20-degree temperature in Washington, Kennedy took the oath of office from Chief Justice Earl Warren and announced:

"The torch has been passed to a new generation of Americans..."

Later in his speech, he issued his famous challenge:

"Ask not what your country can do for you, but what you can do for your country."

Overview: The 35th President

The 35th President, John Fitzgerald Kennedy was the first U.S. President born in the 20th century. At age 43, Kennedy became one of the youngest Presidents and, at the time of his death at age 46, he lived a shorter life than any other President.

His brief presidency - 1,026 days- stirred the emotions of nearly every American. Hardly anyone was neutral about Kennedy. They either loved him or hated him.

By the fall of 1963, polls showed Kennedy popularity had dropped to 59 percent, largely due to his stand on civil rights

Kennedy supporters were looking toward the 1964 election, hoping for a mandate which would give Kennedy's ambitious programs much needed popular support. It never happened.

In the fall of 1963, he went to Texas.

Kennedy had carried Texas by the slimmest of margins in 1960, largely through the efforts of Lyndon Johnson. He needed the state badly in 1964, particularly if his hopes of achieving a large mandate were to be realized. So, in an effort to enhance his image and to raise money, Kennedy, along with his wife, made the fateful journey to Texas in November 1963.

Overview: Dallas - Stronghold of Arch Conservatives

By 1963, Dallas was the most influential city in the Lone Star State next to oil-rich Houston, however, Dallas also had a reputation for being the stronghold of arch conservatives.

In early June plans for a trip to Texas were finalized during a meeting between Kennedy, Johnson and Governor Connally in El Paso. In October, a motorcade was added to the plans.

On November 22, the apprehension of the Kennedy entourage about the trip was evident, especially in light of a full-page newspaper ad which ran that morning in the "Dallas Morning News" suggesting the President was soft on Communism and guilty of traitorous activities. A leaflet handed out to some of the people lining the motorcade route was not as subtle as the newspaper ad. It pictured Kennedy under a headline reading "Wanted For Treason".

Overview: JFK Arrival Love Field

Fort Worth and Dallas are so close that even before reaching its full climb, Air Force One began its descent to Dallas. Looking out the plane's window, Kennedy commented to Governor Connally:

"Our luck is holding. It looks as if we'll get sunshine."

When Air Force One landed at Love Field the sky had cleared and a bright sun brought Indian Summer weather to North Central Texas.

"The Dallas Morning News" carried headlines that morning reading, "Love Field Braces for Thousands" and "Detailed Security Net Spread for Kennedy". That morning's edition had even run a small map of the President's motorcade route which would take him from Love Field to the new modern Trade Mart.

Overview: Map of the Motorcade Route

A map of the President's motorcade route was published in "The Dallas Morning News", but only indicated that the motorcade would travel west on Main Street through the downtown area, through the well-known Triple Underpass and on to Stemmons Freeway and the Trade Mart, where President John F. Kennedy was scheduled to attend a 12:30 p.m. luncheon.

It was the city's other daily paper, the "Dallas Times Herald", which had given a more detailed description of the route. A story published the previous Tuesday mentioned that the motorcade would "pass through downtown on Harwood then west on Main, turning back to Elm at Houston and then out Stemmons Freeway to the Trade Mart."

This was one of the only newspaper mentions of a zig-zag in the motorcade route, which would violate Secret Service procedures and place the President in a small park area surrounded by tall buildings on one side and shrubs and trees on the other.

Overview: The Motorcade

Leading the presidential motorcade on November 22, 1963 was a enclosed sedan driven by Dallas Police Chief Jesse Curry.

More than two car lengths behind this car was the presidential limousine, a specially-made long blue Lincoln Continental convertible sedan designated Secret Service Car No. 100-X. Driving the limousine was Secret Service Agent William Greer. Next to Greer sat Roy Kellerman, assistant special agent in charge of the Secret Service White House detail.

In the center of the car in fold-down jump seats were Governor Connally, on the right, and Mrs. Connally. In the rear, on a padded seat which could be raised or lowered mechanically sat Kennedy with Mrs. Kennedy on his left.

Behind the limousine was a follow-up car for Kennedy security guards. Following this security car was a 1964 Lincoln four-door convertible carrying Vice President Lyndon Johnson, Mrs. Johnson, and Sen. Ralph Yarborough. Their car was trailed by Johnson's Secret Service guards and the rest of the motorcade, consisting of five cars for local dignitaries, three cars for press photographers, one bus for White House staff and two press buses.

Overview: Dealey Plaza - November 22, 1963

With a phalanx of Dallas Police motorcycle officers clearing the way ahead, the presidential limousine carrying the Kennedys entered Dealey Plaza, making a 90-degree turn from Main onto Houston in front of the Dallas County Sheriff's Office.

In front of the Texas School Book Depository, the limousine slowed to a crawl to make a 120-degree turn onto Elm Street.

In the presidential limousine, Kennedy was waving to his right at a group of people standing near a sign reading "Stemmons Freeway". His right arm and hand were slightly over the side of the car. Mrs. Kennedy had been waving to her left, but her thoughts were on the Texas heat.

Mrs. Kennedy recalled seeing the Triple Underpass ahead:

"We could see a tunnel in front of us. Everything was really slow then. And I remember thinking it would be so cool under that tunnel."

Mrs. Connally had been wanting to mention the warm and enthusiastic welcome for some time, but she had held back. Now she could contain herself no longer. Turning to Kennedy, she said:

"Mr. President, you can't say that Dallas doesn't love you."

Overview: The Shots

Mrs. Connally heard a frightening noise off to her right. She looked in that direction and caught a glimpse of Kennedy raising both hands to his neck in her peripheral vision.

She heard no sound from the President, but noticed a blank, "nothing" expression on his face.

Although critically wounded, Connally was conscious of shots being fired other than the one which struck him. Realizing that he had been hit a second or so after hearing a shot, Connally told the Warren Commission:

"...there were either two or three people involved or more in this or someone was shooting with an automatic rifle."

Connally then heard a final boom and heard the bullet hit home. He later recalled:

"...it never entered my mind that it ever hit anyone but the President...He never uttered a sound that I heard."

During the initial phase of the shooting, Mrs. Kennedy did not realize what was happening. She was accustomed the sounds of motorcycle escorts backfiring and the motorcade had been a cacophony of sirens, racing motors, cheering and shouting.

She did hear Connally shout, "Oh, no, no, no!" She heard "terrible noises" to her right and turned to see Kennedy with his hand at his throat and a "quizzical look on his face". Then, the chief executive was struck in the head and fell into her lap.

All she could do was cradle him and say:

"Oh, my God, they've shot my husband...I love you, Jack."

It was the third and final shot, or volley of shots, which killed President John F. Kennedy. Until then, he had been immobile and quiet, only sagging slightly to his left.

Overview: Secret Service Reaction

The Secret Service agents assigned to Kennedy all acted with remarkable sluggishness when the firing began. Perhaps it was due to the visit they had paid to a "beatnik" nightspot in Fort Worth, where they stayed until early that morning. The club, "The Cellar," was owned by an acquaintance of Jack Ruby who had connections with both big-time gamblers and police officials.

The only agent to react with speed was Clint Hill. Hill had not been scheduled to make the Dallas trip, but came only after Mrs. Kennedy made a personal request.

Hill also thought the initial sound was a firecracker and began looking to his right for the source of the sound when he saw Kennedy grab at himself and lurch forward slightly. He then realized something was wrong and jumped off the follow-up car. He was racing the few feet to the limousine when he heard more shots. Hill had just secured a grip on a handhold when the car began accelerating. Looking into the back seat of the limousine, Hill saw the right rear portion of the President's head was missing.

Overview: Witnesses

The crowd of witnesses along the motorcade route through Dealey Plaza saw many things that differed from the later official version of the assassination published as the Report of the Warren Commission, for instance: (i) Many witnesses reported that shots were fired from the Grassy Knoll, not the Texas School Book Depository; (ii) Witnesses stated that a cloud of smoke was visible in the area of the Grassy Knoll; (iii) Even before the motorcade arrived, men with rifles were seen by people in downtown Dallas; and (iv) There were unexplained reports of witnesses' encountering mysterious Secret Service men in Dealey Plaza.

Overview: The Umbrella Man

About the time that Kennedy was first hit by a bullet, two men standing near each other on the north sidewalk of Elm Street acted most strangely - one began pumping a black umbrella while the other waved his right arm high in the air. The man's umbrella was only open during the shooting sequence. The second man - in photos he appears to be dark complected, perhaps a black man or Hispanic - raised his right hand into the air possibly making a fist.

Two main theories have emerged concerning the "Umbrella man" and his activities that day.

Assassination researcher Robert Cutler has long maintained that the umbrella may have been a sophisticated weapon which fired a dart or "flechette" filled with a paralyzing agent.

The alternative theory is that both of these suspicious men may have been providing visual signals to hidden gunmen.

Overview: The Babushka Lady

A woman seen in films taken the day of the assassination is known to researchers as "The Babushka Lady" because of a triangular kerchief she wore on her head that day. The Babushka Lady was filming the assassination sequence, however the "Babushka Lady" has never been identified with certainty and the film which she made has never been seen. Some researchers believe that the Babushka Lady is Beverly Oliver, a friend of Jack Ruby's. Oliver has stated that: (i) she is The Babushka Lady; (ii) her film was taken and never returned by FBI agents; and (iii) Jack Ruby once introduced her to "Lee Oswald of the CIA".

Overview: The Texas School Book Depository

According to the Warren Commission, it was from a sixth-floor window of the Texas School Book Depository Building (TSBD) that Lee Harvey Oswald, on November 22, 1963, fired three shots at the presidential motorcade passing below, killing President Kennedy and wounding Governor John Connally. Overlooking Dealey Plaza at its northeast corner, the TSBD is a seven-story red-brick building which in 1963 housed the Texas School Book Depository.

On November 22, 1963, Lee Harvey Oswald was employed at the Book Depository. Oswald was paid $1.25 an hour to fill book orders. Once he had been shown the procedures, he worked on his own. Roy Truly, Texas School Book Depository Superintendent, described Oswald as "a bit above average" as an employee. Co-workers said Oswald was pleasant enough, but kept mostly to himself.

Overview: The Sniper's Nest

Researchers refer to the southeastern most window of the sixth floor of the Texas School Book Depository as the Sniper's Nest. It is the location in which the Warren Commission determined that Lee Harvey Oswald fired three shots at President Kennedy. Pictures of this position taken immediately after the shooting show cardboard boxes stacked upon each other. The boxes were used both to camouflage the assassin and as support to steady the rifle. Witnesses who claim to have seen a gunman in the sixth floor window refer to the boxes. 15-year-old Amos Lee Fuins, a schoolboy, was standing near Howard Brennan south of the Depository when he heard a shot. He stated: "I started looking around and then I looked up in the red brick building. I saw a man in a window with a gun and I saw him shot twice. He then stepped back behind some boxes. I could tell the gun was a rifle and it sounded like an automatic rifle the way he was shooting."

Overview: Man in the Doorway

Associated Press photographer James Altgens snapped a picture seconds after Kennedy was first struck by a bullet. In the background of this photo a man can be seen standing in the west corner of the Texas School Book Depository's front doorway. Soon after the assassination, many people - including his mother - suggested the man in the doorway looked amazingly like Lee Harvey Oswald.

The Warren Commission, based primarily on testimony from Depository employees, concluded the man in the doorway was Billy Lovelady. After being interviewed at length by the FBI, Lovelady identified the man in the photo as himself.

Overview: Where was Oswald?

Despite the years of confident statements by federal authorities, no one has unquestionably placed Oswald on the sixth floor at the time of the shooting.

Dallas Police Chief Jesse Curry in later years admitted to newsmen:

"We don't have any proof that Oswald fired the rifle, and never did. Nobody's yet been able to put him in that building with a gun in his hand."

Oswald told Dallas Police he was eating lunch on the first floor of the Depository in what was called the "Domino Room" at the time of the assassination and there is some evidence to back up his statement.

Overview: The Triple Underpass

On the west side of Dealey Plaza is a large railroad bridge known as the Triple Underpass. This was the position of about a dozen men on November 22, 1963, as they stood along the eastern edge of the underpass to watch the Presidential motorcade approach and pass beneath them. One of these men was Dallas Policeman J. W. Foster. Foster said as the motorcade approached he was standing just behind the line of railway workers, about 10 or 11 of them, when he heard what sounded like a large firecracker. He moved up to the concrete railing to get a better view. He said he saw:

"...the President slump over in the car, and his head looked just like it blew up."

Overview: Smoke on Grassy Knoll

Despite immediate attempts to establish the Texas School Book Depository as the sole location from which shots were fired, public attention, both in 1963 and even today, continued to be drawn to the wooded area to the west of the Depository which has become known as the Grassy Knoll.

Sam M. Holland, a track and signal supervisor for the Union Terminal Railroad Company, told the Warren Commission that a "puff of smoke came out six or eight feet above the ground" in the area of the Grassy Knoll.

Due to Holland's credibility and clear description of what he saw, the Warren Commission Report accurately stated:

"According to S.M. Holland, there were four shots which sounded as though they came from the trees on the north side of Elm Street where he saw a puff of smoke."

Overview: The Third Wounded Man

James Thomas Tague was the third wounded man in Dealey Plaza. Tague stood by the Triple Underpass on a small concrete median separating Commerce and Main to watch the motorcade.

After the shots, Tague was approached by a police officer who noticed blood on Tague's face.

During late 1963 and early 1964, it was widely reported that the first shot struck Kennedy in the back, the second shot hit Connally and the third was the fatal head shot.

This was a consistent theory of three bullets. Tague's story of yet another bullet was totally inconsistent with the lone assassin-three shot theory being formulated by the Warren Commission.

The matter of the wounding of Tague was finally acknowledged and the Warren Commission was compelled to construct a scenario of the assassination which included the "Single-Bullet Theory", a theory which has not been accepted by a majority of Americans.

Overview: The Grassy Knoll

Probably no small section of land in the United States has been the object of more controversy than that small portion of Dealey Plaza known as the Grassy Knoll.

Located between the Texas School Book Depository and the Triple Underpass, the Grassy Knoll provided an ideal ambush site. Running along the top of the knoll was a wooden picket fence about five feet high. In front of this fence were shrubs and evergreen trees which, even in late November, provided a leafy canopy over the fence.

It was from a vantage point atop a low concrete wall on the south end of this pergola that the most famous home movie of all time was made - the Abraham Zapruder film.

Overview: The Zapruder Film

A 22-second, 8-mm film made on November 22, 1963, by Abraham Zapruder, became the cornerstone of investigations, both public and private, in the years after the Kennedy assassination. It has been regarded as the most objective, and thus most important, piece of evidence in the attempts to unravel what actually happened to President Kennedy.

The Zapruder film captures the entire assassination sequence from the perspective of the Grassy Knoll.

Overview: The Black Dog Man

A photograph of the Grassy Knoll area taken by Phil Willis reveals a figure resembling a black dog sitting on its haunches. With no known identity, this person was dubbed "the black dog man" by researchers and committee staffers. The House Select Committee on Assassinations had the photograph enhanced and concluded that it indeed was the figure of a person, who appeared to be holding a long object.

The federal investigations could provide an answer to the riddle of "the black dog man", so in the minds of many researchers, the "black dog man" joins "the umbrella man" as one of the more suspicious persons in Dealey Plaza.

Overview: The Badge Man

Mary Moorman took a now well-known Polaroid picture just as Kennedy was struck in the head

The photo was never examined nor printed by the Warren Commission, but was published widely in newspapers and magazines after the assassination.

For years, researchers pored over the Moorman picture looking for evidence of a Grassy Knoll gunman. In 1982, researchers studying the Moorman photo discovered what appeared to be two figures. When blown up, the figures are detectable by untrained observers. One police official even commented that one man seemed to be wearing "shooter's glasses".

The main figure has been dubbed the "badge man" because he appears to be wearing a dark shirt with a semi-circular patch on the left shoulder and a bright shiny object on his left chest - the exact configuration of a Dallas police uniform.

Overview: Lee Harvey Oswald - Assassin or Patsy?

Lee Harvey Oswald had a childhood which was no better nor worse than millions of other Americans. He was bright and eager to learn, despite a disrespect for educational systems and authorities.

At age 16, after joining the Civil Air Patrol and meeting Captain David Ferrie, he suddenly made some public posturings as a pro-Communist, despite the fact that he tried to join the Marine Corps at this same time. Once a Marine, several odd and troubling items filled his military record. Despite prior-service statements indicating interest in Communist activities, Oswald was granted a security clearance and stationed at the Japanese base where super-secret spy flights were being launched.

Later, the speed and ease of obtaining a hardship discharge and a United States passport raise questions regarding Oswald's possible relationship with U.S. intelligence.

Various discrepancies in Oswald's military records - notations made for the same date but different locations, unaccounted for periods of time - support the idea that Oswald was given secret intelligence training.

Oswald's military files were reported "routinely" destroyed and it may prove impossible to conclusively prove Oswald's intelligence connections.

Overview: Russians - Soviets and Solidarists

The fear of worldwide Communist revolution today has been discredited. However, this fear has been extremely strong among certain groups and cliques in America, particularly in the 1950s and 1960s. It was used to justify all sorts of intelligence skullduggery.

It appears obvious to most assassination researchers that Oswald's visit to Russia was a planned intelligence operation.

Oswald's suspicious manner of entering and leaving Russia reinforce the belief that he was an intelligence operative - as does the lavish lifestyle he enjoyed while living in Minsk.

Then there is tantalizing - though unproven - connections between Oswald and the ill-fated U-2 spy plane incident.

There is much to argue against Soviet intelligence involvement in the assassination. However, the same cannot be said for Oswald's involvement with non-Soviet intelligence work and the trail leads to the United States intelligence.

Overview: Cubans - Pro and Anti-Castro

After leading a successful revolution in Cuba, Fidel Castro angered many interests in the United States by freeing his island nation of Organized Crime and American business domination and turning to the Russians for help.

Responding to urgings from these factions, Vice President Richard Nixon initiated and encouraged action against Cuba - resulting in the ill-fated Bay of Pigs Invasion. President Kennedy would not use American military force against Castro. CIA officials planning the invasion ignored Kennedy and went ahead with their plans. The invasion was launched on April 17, 1961 - less than three months after Kennedy took office - and proved an utter disaster.

The invasion's failure was blamed on Kennedy's refusal to unleash military naval and air support. Everyone connected with the invasion - the anti-Castro Cubans, the CIA, the military and Organized Crime - was bitter toward the new President.

Into this world of passionate anti-Castro Cubans, adventurous CIA agents and Mafia soldiers was injected the odd ex-Marine Lee Harvey Oswald. Oswald, while maintaining a posture as a pro-Castro Marxist, nevertheless was in continuous contact with several anti-Castro elements. And while it may never be positively determined exactly who Oswald was working for, it is safe to assume that his employers represented the anti-Castro Cubans and their CIA and Mob allies.

Overview: Mobsters - Organized Crime

Since its inception in the 1930s, organized crime or the national crime syndicate has gained an ever-increasing chokehold on the United States.

Attorney General Robert Kennedy, backed by the President, waged war against Organized Crime. Every one of the major crime bosses - including the powerful Teamsters Union President Jimmy Hoffa - were reported to have issued threats against the Kennedys.

What the Kennedys may not have known were the connections between the Mob and U.S. intelligence agencies. These connections dated all the way back to Lucky Luciano and World War II. Hoover's FBI had always taken a laissez faire attitude toward the syndicate, while the CIA actually had worked with crime figures in assassination plots.

Many assassination researchers, including House Select Committee on Assassinations Chief Consul Blakey, today believe that organized crime was responsible for Kennedy's death.

Overview: Agents - The CIA and other intelligence agencies

There is little question that by the time of the Bay of Pigs invasion the Central Intelligence Agency was running out of control. It had gone far afield from the quiet, intelligence-gathering and coordinating agency envisioned when created in 1947 by President Truman. Documented CIA abuses included the overthrow of governments, secret mind-control experiments on unsuspecting victims and assassination plots.

It is entirely possible that Lee Harvey Oswald may have played some role in an Agency operation.

There can be little doubt that many persons in contact with Oswald also were in contact with the CIA. These contacts, plus the abundant evidence that Oswald was involved in intelligence work, raises serious questions about who may have been maneuvering Oswald in the fall of 1963.

For all this, it seems highly unlikely that the CIA, as an organization, initiated the assassination of Kennedy. This, however, does not preclude the possibility that rouge CIA agents may have played roles in an assassination conspiracy which later compelled their superiors and peers to cover up for fear that such connections might become public.

Overview: The G Men - J. Edgar Hoover's FBI and the Secret Service

Anyone making a serious study of the JFK assassination must take a long hard look at the FBI and the Secret Service. The former - as we now know - monopolized the investigation of the tragedy while the latter failed to prevent it.

The contacts between accused assassin Lee Harvey Oswald and the FBI are many and troubling. No less than seven FBI agents were associated with Lee Harvey Oswald during the year and a half between his return from Russia and the assassination.

In 1964, there was even the serious allegation that Oswald was working for the Bureau at the time of the assassination - a charge which the FBI emphatically denied.

While no unquestioned case for FBI involvement in the assassination can be made, there is now no doubt that the Bureau manipulated the subsequent investigation by suppressing and destroying evidence and by the intimidation of witnesses

Overview: Rednecks and Oilmen - Right-wing extremists and Texas Millionaires

Although his efforts were belated and timid, President Kennedy nevertheless did more to further the cause of civil rights in the United States than any of his predecessors. This human rights activity earned him the undying hatred of racist conservatives. One of the leaders of right-wing extremists in 1963 was Dallas-based Major General Edwin A. Walker.

It appears that some people, such as Miami States Rights Party member Joseph Milteer, had foreknowledge of Kennedy's assassination. Milteer was taped by a police undercover agent accurately predicting Kennedy's death more than two weeks before the assassination.

It is significant that one of the strongest allies of the Texas oilmen who loathed Kennedy was Vice President Lyndon Johnson. Johnson's ties with Herman Brown of Brown & Root Construction and with Texas oil interests are legend.

Several people close to the assassination - notably Jack Ruby and former New Orleans District Attorney Jim Garrison - have accused Johnson of some role in an assassination conspiracy.

As President and Commander-in-Chief, history will surely hold Lyndon Johnson responsible - if not for involvement in the assassination itself, at least for failing to uncover the conspiracy during his leadership.

Overview: The Soldiers - The Military

While the U.S. Military has attempted to keep a low profile in modern American life, there can be no question that the military-industrial complex is the preeminent force in the nation.

Vietnam may have been the straw that broke the generals' philosophic back. Much evidence exists that Kennedy would have disengaged this nation from Southeast Asia had he lived - in direct conflict with the wishes of the military-industrial complex.

Some generals - including Dallas Mayor Earl Cabell's brother, General Charles P. Cabell - even went so far as to brand Kennedy a "traitor".

The known connections between the military and the assassination - the military agents in Dealey Plaza and the Dallas Police Station, the agent who was with FBI man Hosty and the strange saga of Richard Case Nagell - are many and troubling.

All this - along with the mysterious disappearance of military files on Lee Harvey Oswald who had many opportunities to work with military intelligence - makes many assassination researchers believe that at least some members of the U.S. military may have played a role in an assassination conspiracy.

Overview: Two Hospitals

As the echo of shots died away in Dealey Plaza, Dallas Police Chief Jesse Curry, riding in the lead car of Kennedy's motorcade, radioed his police dispatcher:

"Looks like the President has been hit. Have Parkland stand by."

At Parkland Memorial Hospital, Kennedy was attended to by no less than 12 of Parkland's doctors - including four surgeons, the chief neurologist, an oral surgeon and a heart specialist, but to no avail.

President Kennedy was pronounced dead at 1 p.m. (C.S.T.) by Dr. Kemp Clark, Parkland's director of neurological surgery.

Johnson decided to return to Washington as soon as possible. However, Mrs. Kennedy refused to leave without her husband's body and Johnson refused to leave without Mrs. Kennedy. It was finally decided to leave immediately and to return on Air Force One.

The decision created one of the assassination's most enduring problems - with the President's autopsy performed at the National Naval Medical Center at Bethesda, Maryland, two sets of doctors viewed the body at different times and their descriptions of wounds differed so widely that controversy remains to this day.

Overview: Tippit Murder

Jefferson Davis Tippit, a Dallas police officer, was murdered in the Oak Cliff section of Dallas approximately forty-five minutes after President Kennedy was shot. According to witnesses, Tippit stopped his squad car along the curb and spoke briefly to a man who the Warren Commission concluded was Lee Harvey Oswald. Tippit then got out of his car and walked around the front of the car toward the man, who pulled out a handgun and fired. Tippit was shot four times and died instantly. Oswald was apprehended at the Texas Theatre, a few blocks away, and charged with Tippit's murder but never stood trial because he, in turn, was murdered by Jack Ruby just two days later. Various assassination researchers have speculated that Tippit had connections with Oswald, Ruby, or both. The meaning of Tippit's murder remains one of the important mysteries surrounding the assassination of President Kennedy.

Overview: Oswald Arrest

According to the official version of events, it was for the murder of Police Officer J. D. Tippit that Lee Harvey Oswald was first p arrested by police, who discovered him hiding out in the Texas Theater.

The arrested Oswald was taken from the Texas Theater shortly before 2 p.m. and driven downtown to police headquarters. The police suspected Oswald had assassinated the President, when only one employee of the Texas School Book Depository was unaccounted for - Lee Harvey Oswald.

With a suspect in custody, the entire complexion of the assassination investigation changed. Despite what was heralded as overwhelming proof of Oswald's guilt in both killings, it was not until late Friday, November 22, 1963, that he was charged with the murder of Officer Tippit. And it was well after midnight before he was reportedly charged with the murder of President Kennedy.

Dallas Police and federal authorities quickly lost interest in any information, evidence or detained suspects which did not fit in with the presumed activities of Lee Harvey Oswald.

In an incredibly dramatic event witnessed by millions watching on TV, Oswald was himself killed two days after the assassination, when he was shot by Jack Ruby in the basement garage of Dallas Police Headquarters

Overview: Oswald Shooting

Detective Jim Leavelle, one of the men handcuffed to Oswald when he was shot, recalled the shooting:

"Captain Fritz had been talking to some men with the FBI and Secret Service when he turned and said, "All clear, take him down." ...We went down the elevator to the basement. An unmarked car was supposed to be right there for us but it wasn't. It was a few feet from where it was supposed to be. There was a pack of newsmen right close to us. We were heading for the car, L.C. (Graves) and I, with Oswald between us. Out of the corner of my eye I saw Ruby step out from the crowd. He was crouched and he had a pistol. He took a couple of steps and pulled that trigger. Ruby was aiming dead center at Oswald. I had a grip on the top of Oswald's trousers. When I saw Ruby, I tried to jerk Oswald aside to get him out of the way. I succeeded in turning him. The bullet hit him in the side rather than straight into the stomach."

Ruby's one shot had been remarkably efficient. It traversed Oswald's lower abdomen, rupturing two main arteries carrying blood to the heart, torn through the spleen, pancreas, liver and the right kidney. Oswald was taken to Parkland Hospital where he was pronounced dead at 1:07 p.m.

Overview: Jack Ruby

The world was introduced to Jack Ruby as the man who killed Lee Harvey Oswald. Next to Oswald himself, Ruby became the man most closely associated with the assassination. The November 24, 1963, murder of Oswald in the basement of the Dallas Police Station for many people was the starting point for continued suspicions about the assassination.

It was said that his killing of Oswald was simply the spontaneous act of a man hoping to right the wrong of the President's death. Today there is evidence that Ruby, a fixture on the Dallas scene in 1963, was more closely connected with organized crime figures than earlier believed and that he, in fact, stalked Oswald throughout the assassination weekend. It also is now known that Ruby tried to tell what he knew about the plot to kill Kennedy but was shrugged off by both Government investigators and the news media.

To a radio news reporter, Ruby said:

"I know there is a terrible conspiracy going on in the world right now...I'm speaking the truth....the world has the right to hear the truth..."

Overview: The Evidence

There was never a lack of evidence in the assassination of President Kennedy. In addition to the several hundred witnesses in Dealey Plaza, there was an abundance of film and still pictures plus a great deal of physical evidence.

In the hours following the assassination, this pile of evidence grew to include a rifle, empty shell cases, a "sniper's nest" and even a convincing - if belated - palm print on the suspected murder weapon. The rapid accumulation of evidence prompted Dallas County District Attorney Henry Wade to proclaim to the media he had an open-and-shut case against Lee Harvey Oswald the day after the shooting.

The best evidence would have been the autopsy reports. However, the medical evidence in this case continues to be a source of controversy - filled with inconsistencies, errors, missing items and photographs of questionable origin. About all one can say of the medical evidence is that Kennedy was shot at least twice.

The "pristine" condition of the "Magic Bullet" is perhaps the most hotly contested evidentiary issue. The Commission attempted to duplicate the feat of CE 399 - passing through seven layers of skin and muscle, striking bones in two male adults and emerging in near-perfect condition - but with no success. Similar ammunition fired into goat carcasses, human bodies and gelatin blocks all showed more deformity than CE 399.

Overview: The Warren Commission

On November 29, 1963, President Lyndon B. Johnson issued executive order No. 11130, creating a commission to investigate the assassination of President Kennedy, the wounding of Governor John Connally, and the murder of Police Officer J. D. Tippit. Officially known as the President's Commission on the Assassination of President Kennedy, it quickly became referred to as the Warren Commission, after its chairman, Chief Justice Earl Warren.

According to the Commission's widely disputed determinations, published as the Warren Commission Report, Lee Harvey Oswald, alone, fired three shots at the presidential motorcade passing through Dealey Plaza at 12:30 P.M. on November 22, 1963. One of these bullets struck the pavement, one delivered nonfatal wounds to both President Kennedy and Texas governor John Connally, and a third struck the president in the head, killing him. The Commission also reached the equally disputed conclusion that, after leaving the assassination scene, Oswald shot and killed Dallas police officer J. D. Tippit

The Garrison Investigation

Jim Garrison, the New Orleans district attorney, suspicious after reading the Warren Commission Report, investigated Oswald's activities while in New Orleans in the spring and summer of 1963. He discovered odd and mostly unexplained relationships between Oswald and anti-Castro Cubans, Oswald and intelligence agents including the FBI, and Oswald and 544 Camp Street, the offices of Guy Bannister.

By late 1966, Garrison had two suspects in mind in the murder of President Kennedy - the strange David Ferrie and the socially-connected Clay Shaw, both with suspected CIA links. Ferrie even went to far as to claim he had helped set up the JFK assassination and that Lee Oswald was a CIA agent who had been well taken care of until he made some mistakes which necessitated his death. On February 22, 1967, less than a week after the newspapers broke the story of Garrison's investigation, David Ferrie - his chief suspect - was found dead in his cluttered apartment under suspicious circumstances.

Despite media attacks and missing witnesses, Garrison moved ahead with his prosecution of Clay Shaw.

Garrison convinced the jury that a conspiracy to assassinate President Kennedy had existed. However, the evidence of Shaw's involvement proved not as convincing. Just past midnight on March 1, 1969 - two years to the day that Shaw had first been arrested - the jury announced Clay Shaw's acquittal after less than a hour of deliberation.

Overview: House Select Committee on Assassinations

By the mid-1970s, national polls indicated that very few Americans still believed the "lone assassin" theory of the Warren Commission despite the assurances of the national media and Government spokesmen.

These doubts prompted Texas Congressman Henry Gonzalez to introduce a House Resolution in February, 1975, calling for a select committee to study not only the death of John F. Kennedy, but also the deaths of Robert Kennedy, Martin Luther King and the shooting of Gov. George Wallace.

Beginning in late July, 1978, the House Select Committee on Assassinations began a series of public hearings which lasted until September 28, 1978.

Based primarily on scientific studies of a Dallas Police radio recording which recorded the sounds of the shots, the House Select Committee on Assassinations concluded that more than one assassin was involved in Kennedy's death. This evidence, which prompted immediate controversy, destroyed the Warren Commission's theory of a lone gunman.

Overview: Was Oswald Really Oswald?

There is an abundance of evidence to suggest that one or more persons were impersonating Lee Harvey Oswald in the weeks and months prior to the assassination of President Kennedy.

A second impersonation issue suggests that the Oswald killed by Jack Ruby in Dallas was not the same man who was born to Marguerite Oswald in 1939. British author Michael Eddowes charged that a Soviet agent was substituted for Oswald while he was out of sight in Russia.

Even Oswald's mother and brothers noted how changed he appeared after his return from the Soviet Union. In 1967, his mother publicly raised questions over the identity of the body in Oswald's grave and asked to have his body exhumed.

When Oswald's grave was opened in the fall of 1981, a panel of four forensic pathologists declared the body that of Oswald.

However the two funeral directors who buried Oswald claim the man dug up in 1981 was not the same man they buried in 1963. They claim there was no sign of a craniotomy -- a standard autopsy procedure known to have been performed on Oswald's body - on the corpse when exhumed in 1981.

Overview: Convenient Deaths

In the three-year period which followed the murder of President Kennedy and Lee Harvey Oswald, 18 material witnesses died - six by gunfire, three in motor accidents, two by suicide, one from a cut throat, one from a karate chop to the neck, three from heart attacks and two from natural causes.

In the late 1970s, the House Select Committee on Assassinations felt compelled to look into the matter. However the Committee was unable to come to any conclusion regarding the growing number of deaths.

However, an objective look at both the number and the causes of death balanced against the importance of the person's connection to the case, raises concern.

Overview: Jim Marrs' Conclusions

In his best-selling book, Crossfire, author Jim Marrs concluded the following:

1. Lee Harvey Oswald was involved in intelligence activities. He was, or at least he believed he was, working on behalf of the United States.
2. It is entirely possible that Lee Harvey Oswald did not fire a gun on November 22, 1963, thus making him innocent in both the death of President Kennedy and Police Officer Tippit.
2. If Lee Harvey Oswald did participate in the actual assassination, and much evidence indicates he did not, he certainly did not act alone.
3. An abundance of evidence indicates that Lee Harvey Oswald was framed for the assassination of President Kennedy.
4. This framing, plus a wealth of information revealing an attempt to cover up vital evidence in the case, proves the existence of a conspiracy to kill Kennedy.
5. Because this coverup went far beyond simple face saving and was conducted at the federal level, it is apparent that people within the federal Government of the United States were both involved in and aware of such a conspiracy.
6. The two most powerful men in the federal government in 1963, next to the President and his brother, were Vice President Lyndon B. Johnson and FBI Director J. Edgar Hoover.

Overview: Jim Marrs' Assassination Scenario

In Crossfire, Jim Marrs constructed a scenario of the events that led to the assassination of President Kennedy:

By the beginning of 1963, serious talk against President Kennedy was circulating within many groups - organized crime, the anti-Castro Cubans, the CIA, business and banking, the oil industry and even the military. The decision was made at the highest levels of the American business, banking, politics, military, crime power structure - should anything happen to Kennedy, it would be viewed as a blessing for the nation.

Most assassinations are set in motion not so much by a specific plan to kill as by efforts to remove or relax the protection around as target. Once such a consensus was reached among the nation's top business-crime-military leadership, the assassination conspiracy went into action.

Operational orders most probably originated with organized crime chieftains such as Carlos Marcello and his associates Santos Trafficante and Sam Giancana - who already were involved with the CIA. But these Mob bosses were smart. They realized the consequences if their role in Kennedy's death should ever become known. Therefore a world-class assassin was recruited from the international crime syndicate - perhaps Michael Victor Mertz, the shadowy Frenchman with both crime and intelligence connections who may have been in Dallas on November 22, 1963, according to a CIA document.

Armed with a contract from the world crime syndicate, this premier assassin was given entree to the conspiring groups within U.S. intelligence, the anti-Castro Cubans, right-wing hate groups and the military.

But to keep public attention away from the real conspirators a scapegoat - or patsy - was needed. Enter Lee Harvey Oswald, a patriotic young man who followed the tradition of his father and brothers by voluntarily joining the U.S. Military.

After being sent to Atsugi Air Base in Japan - the CIA's largest Asian training center - Oswald's real activities become clouded. Apparently he was recruited into U.S. Intelligence, first through the Office of Naval Intelligence and then on to the CIA.

There is abundant evidence that author Michael Eddowes (a former member of British Intelligence) may be correct in charging that a duplicate Oswald returned to the United States. The question of Oswald's true identity - intriguing as it may be - is nevertheless only a side issue. The preponderance of evidence now clearly indicates that the Dallas Oswald did not kill Kennedy.

Real Oswald or impostor, this man was maneuvered about by the assassination conspirators who - knowing or suspecting him of being a Russian agent - had obtained him from U. S. Intelligence. Acting on orders, Oswald was put into contact with unsuspecting FBI and CIA agents, both pro and anti-Castro Cubans and others to confuse investigators after the crime.

Oswald was a perfect fall guy. His capture or death eliminated a possible Soviet agent and implicated Russia, Cuba and leftists - drawing attention away from the true right-wing perpetrators. Naming Oswald as the assassin also implicated the FBI and CIA as organizations, thus forcing uninvolved agency officials to help cover up incriminating evidence.

On Nov. 22, 1963, there were many people in Dealey Plaza who were not just innocent bystanders. There were cars roaming the area behind the famous Grassy Knoll with out-of-state license plates and extra radio antennas, men brandishing Secret Service identification when officially there were no agents in the vicinity and an odd assortment of people pumping umbrellas in the air, waving fists, speaking into walkie-talkies and even one man firing a rifle who apparently was wearing a uniform similar to that of the Dallas police.

Professional gunmen - the "mechanics" - quietly moved into position secure in the knowledge that security was minimal.

It was a textbook ambush and President Kennedy rode right into the middle of it in an open limousine which violated security regulations by making a 120-degree turn in front of the Texas School Book Depository and by slowing almost to a halt when shots first rang out. In fact, Kennedy's entire security force exhibited a startling lack of preparedness and response.

Three volleys of shots were fired - at least six and perhaps as many as 9 - most probably using fragmenting bullets or "sabot" slugs which could be traced to Oswald's 6.5-mm rifle.

Shots were fired from the Depository building to draw attention there while other gun teams were on the Grassy Knoll and perhaps even other locations, such as the Dallas County Records Building.

When the shooting started, confusion was rampant. No one except the conspirators knew what was happening and the Dallas Police radio channel used for the presidential motorcade security was blocked for more than eight minutes due to an open microphone. The true assassins simply strolled away, after dumping their rifles into a nearby car trunks or passing them to confederates.

Oswald most probably was exactly where he said he was during the shooting - safely out of sight in the lunchroom of the Depository. Perhaps he had been told to wait for a telephone call at that time by an intelligence superior.

Since there is evidence that Oswald may have been reporting to the Government on the activities of the assassination conspirators, he must have been shocked when he learned that Kennedy had been shot as planned. Shortly after his encounter with Officer Baker, Oswald may have begun to realize what was happening. He then left the Depository and made his way to his South Oak Cliff rooming house. Whatever plans Oswald had at this point, he most probably was slated to be killed by police for "resisting arrest" - a backup plan in the event he escaped Dealey Plaza alive.

The slaying of Dallas Officer J. D. Tippit may have played some part in this scheme to have Oswald killed, perhaps to eliminate co-conspirator Tippit or simply to anger Dallas Police and cause itchy trigger fingers.

There is an abundance of evidence to suggest that Tippit was killed by someone other than Oswald. However, if Oswald was responsible it may have been that he simply got the drop on Tippit, who - since his pistol was found lying near his body - was approaching his suspect with a drawn weapon.

When cornered in the Texas Theater, Oswald was given every opportunity to flee through a rear exit.

Whatever the plan, it backfired. Oswald was captured alive, creating a bad situation for the conspirators. Oswald could not be permitted to stand trial and reveal his true connections.

Jack Ruby - the Mob's "bag man" in Dallas and the man who apparently handled funds for the local activities of the assassination conspirators - received his orders to kill Oswald from organized crime leaders eager to protect the secret of their contract and there were no alternatives for a Mob directive.

The key to understanding the Oswald slaying is not that Ruby somehow knew when Oswald was to be transported from the police station, but rather, that the Oswald transfer was delayed until Ruby was in position.

One shot and Oswald was dead, leaving only his mother to question the official version of the assassination.

Films Section

Zapruder Film

- Normal
- Slow
- Frames
- Full Screen
- Full/Slow

Close-up Views

Little Girl Running

- Window
- Full

JFK

- Window
- Full

JFK/Frames

- Window
- Full

Facts

Facts

Normal

Slow

Frames

Full Screen

Full/Slow

Facts

Normal

Slow

Frames

Full Screen

Full/Slow

Facts

Normal

Full Screen

```
{ewc MVMCI2, ViewerMCI, [device AVIVideo][buttons playpause scanl scanr menu][stepsize 66.67][mute][slider][autostart] ...AVI}
```

Marie Muchmore Film

{ewr MVMCI2, ViewerMCI, [device AVIVideo][buttons playpause scanl scanr menu][stepsize 1000][mute][slider][autostart] ...AVI}Marie Muchmore was filming the motorcade from the grassy area to the left of the president's limousine when the shots were fired. Some researchers believe her film confirms that the president was hit by a shot fired from in front of him. The Warren Commission disagreed.

Robert Hughes Film

{ewr MVMCI2, ViewerMCI, [device AVIVideo][buttons playpause scanr menu][stepsize 200][mute] [slider][autostart] ...AVI} It was nearly 12:30 on November 22, 1963 when Hughes heard the wave of shouting and applause ripple toward him down Main Street. As the pilot car driven by Police Chief Jesse Curry turned the corner, Hughes began filming. The motorcade turns onto Houston Street approximately 30 seconds before the fatal shots. Jacqueline Kennedy's left hand rises to steady her pillbox hat. The Record Building appears, then the Dal-Tex Building and finally the front of the Texas School Book Depository. As the Presidential limousine and the Secret Service follow-up car completed their turns onto Elm Street, Hughes stopped his camera. "About five seconds after I quit taking pictures," he later recalled, "we heard the shots." After the shots, Hughes filmed the scene. The crowd surges toward the grassy knoll.

Moments before the shots, the sixth floor window of the Depository is visible as the Presidential limousine passes below. Movement can be observed in the window. Apparently, the movement is of the gunman turning and raising his rifle into firing position.

Orville Nix Film

{ewr MVMCI2, ViewerMCI, [device AVIVideo][buttons playpause scanl scanr menu][stepsize 200][mute][slider]
[autostart] ...AVI} The Nix film shows the motorcade turn onto Houston street. The Presidential Limousine is followed by the Queen Mary, the car carrying the secret service. Next the limousine carrying Vice President Johnson passes. Senator Yarborough waves.

Just before the fatal head shot, the Presidential limousine slows. The red glow of the brake lights can be seen. After the shot, the limousine accelerates, racing to Parkland Hospital.

Some researchers claim that the background of the Nix film when greatly magnified may show a man on the top of a station wagon with what looks like a rifle. The station wagon is positioned behind the fence in the area of the Grassy Knoll. ITEK, a photographic laboratory, analyzed the film and concluded that the Nix film does not show a gunman.

ZapruderFilm

{ewr MVMCI2, ViewerMCI, [device AVIVideo][buttons play pause stop scanl scanr][stepsize 66.67][slider] [autostart] ...AVI} The Zapruder film is used as the reference point for timing the assassination sequence. Though the film ran at varying speeds the FBI found that the average film speed was 18.3 frames per second. FBI tests on the assassination rifle required a minimum firing time of about 2.3 seconds for two successive shots. For one assassin to have fired three shots, 42 frames of Zapruder film must elapse between each shot.

The recently published book, "Case Closed," based upon the findings of the House Select Committee on Assassinations (HSCA), concludes that the first shot was fired between Zapruder frames 155(Z155) - Z160. The conclusion is based upon the reactions of Phil Willis' ten year old daughter (dressed in a red skirt), who stops running, possibly in reaction to the shot. "Case Closed" suggests that at Z160 the line of fire from the sniper's nest to the Presidential limousine was obstructed by a tree and that the bullet was deflected and missed the President.

The House Select Committee on Assassinations (HSCA) places a possible shot between Zapruder frames 188 - Z191. The shot was fired from the Depository, entered Kennedy's back, exited his throat and wounded Governor Connally.

Robert Groden, co-author of "High Treason," claims that a shot between Zapruder frames 189 - 191 hit the President in the throat. The shot may have been fired from the grassy knoll. By frame 220, Kennedy's hands are up to his throat. At frame 226, Kennedy is struck by another bullet and propelled forward. Groden states that Governor Connally is not hit until frame 237.

Other theories state that Kennedy's hand movements at Zapruder frame 224 are in reaction to a shot which hit Kennedy between frames 189 - 191. At frame 194, Kennedy's right hand, which had been waving to the crowd from eye level, suddenly shoots forward and upward, possibly in reaction to a shot.

At Zapruder frame 207, Kennedy disappears from view behind the Stemmons Freeway sign and does not emerge until frame 224. It is during this time that the Warren Commission places a shot. This shot is the basis for the single bullet theory, since it is supposed to have entered Kennedy's back, exited his throat, and caused all of Connally's wounds.

At Zapruder frame 224, Kennedy is visibly reacting to a shot, by frame 230 Kennedy's fists have reached the level of his neck.

Connally emerges from behind the sign at Zapruder frame 222.

Connally's lapel flips at Zapruder frame 224. The flip may be caused by a bullet striking Connally. However, another lapel flip has been observed, suggesting that the flip at frame 224 is not caused by a bullet.

At Zapruder frame 224, Connally's right hand moves toward his head.

Between Zapruder frames 228 - 230, Connally's Stetson hat flicks up and down.

By Zapruder frame 232 there is strong evidence that Connally is reacting to a shot. Connally's shoulder collapses, his hair is disheveled, his cheeks puff with air and his mouth opens.

Connally continues to turn in his seat until Zapruder frame 274, when he is looking directly to the rear.

The House Select Committee on Assassinations stated that a shot was fired from the grassy knoll between Zapruder frames 295 - 296. The shot missed.

Between Zapruder frames 312 - 313, Kennedy is struck in the head. At frame 312 Kennedy's head moves forward about 2.3 inches. At frame 314 Kennedy's head and body jerk backwards and to the left. The movement continues until frame 321.

The Warren Commission stated that the head shot at Zapruder frame 313 was fired from the Depository, entered the rear of Kennedy's head and exited from the right front. However, some Conspiracy Theorists maintain that the shot was fired from the grassy knoll, entered the top right front of the head and exited the back.

After Zapruder frame 313, the camera pans toward the triple underpass.

Some assassination researchers have suggested that Governor Connally was hit by a second bullet at Zapruder frame 328.

At Zapruder frame 335 Kennedy's head wound is visible. Robert Groden observes that this frame shows that the back of Kennedy's head is missing. If the assertion is true, then the autopsy photographs, which show the back of Kennedy's head intact, are forgeries. A large exit wound in the back of the head indicates that the head shot was fired from the vicinity of the Grassy Knoll and not the Book Depository.

Kennedy's back wound is visible at Zapruder frame 340.

Near Zapruder frame 414, a bush can be seen in which an object appears. The object resembles a man's head, and may be one of the bystanders seen in the Nix film.

At Zapruder frame 475 the corner of the stockade fence is visible. An undetermined shape appears near the top of the seventh picket.

Zapruder full speed/window

```
{ewc MVMCI2, ViewerMCI, [device AVIVideo][buttons playpause scanl scanr menu][stepsize 55][mute]
[slider][autostart] ...AVI}
```

Zapruder slow/window

```
{ewc MVMCI2, ViewerMCI, [device AVIVideo][buttons playpause scanl scanr menu][stepsize 167][mute]
[slider][autostart] ...AVI}
```

Zapruder Frame by Frame/Window

```
{ewc MVMCI2, ViewerMCI, [device AVIVideo][buttons playpause scanl scanr menu][stepsize 1000][mute]
[slider][autostart] ..C.AVI}
```

Zapruder. Little Girl running/Window

```
{ewc MVMCI2, ViewerMCI, [device AVIVideo][buttons playpause scanl scanr menu][stepsize 167][mute]
[slider][autostart] ...AVI}
```

Zapruder. JFK Closeup/Window

```
{ewc MVMCI2, ViewerMCI, [device AVIVideo][buttons playpause scanl scanr menu][stepsize 167][mute]
[slider][autostart] ...AVI}
```

Zapruder. JFK Closeup Frame By Frame/Window

```
{ewc MVMCI2, ViewerMCI, [device AVIVideo][buttons playpause scanl scanr menu][stepsize 1000][mute]
[slider][autostart] ...AVI}
```

Nix. Normal

```
{ewc MVMCI2, ViewerMCI, [device AVIVideo][buttons playpause scanl scanr menu][stepsize 67][mute]
[slider][autostart] ...AVI}
```

Nix. Slow

```
{ewc MVMCI2, ViewerMCI, [device AVIVideo][buttons playpause scanl scanr menu][stepsize 200][mute]
[slider][autostart] ...AVI}
```

Nix. Frame by Frame

```
{ewc MVMCI2, ViewerMCI, [device AVIVideo][buttons playpause scanl scanr menu][stepsize 1000][mute]
[slider][autostart] ...AVI}
```

Muchmore. Normal

```
{ewc MVMCI2, ViewerMCI, [device AVIVideo][buttons playpause scanl scanr menu][stepsize 67]
[mute][slider][autostart] ...AVI}
```

Muchmore. Slow

```
{ewc MVMCI2, ViewerMCI, [device AVIVideo][buttons playpause scanl scanr menu][stepsize
200][mute][slider][autostart] ...AVI}
```

Muchmore. Frame by Frame

```
{ewc MVMCI2, ViewerMCI, [device AVIVideo][buttons playpause scanl scanr menu][stepsize
1000][mute][slider][autostart] ...AVI}
```

```
{ewc MVMCI2, ViewerMCI, [device AVIVideo][buttons play pause stop scanl scanr][stepsize 66.67][slider]
[caption 'The Zapruder Film, (1/3 Speed)'][autostart] ...AVI}
```

The 22 second (at 18.3 frames per second) film shows the motorcade as it turns onto Elm Street. President Kennedy waves, before he is obscured by a freeway sign. When Kennedy emerges, he is reacting to a shot. He clenches his fists and brings both hands up to his throat. Connally turns to his right, his hair flies up and his mouth opens. He is obviously struck by a bullet. Mrs. Kennedy places her hand on her husband's arm as he continues to sag toward her. Seconds go by, Kennedy is bent slightly forward. Suddenly, after an almost imperceptible forward motion of his head, the entire right side of his skull explodes. Kennedy is slammed violently backwards to the left rear. Mrs. Kennedy climbs onto the trunk of the limousine while Secret Service Agent Clint Hill leaps onto the rear of the car, as it begins to accelerate.

Photos: Abraham Zapruder (Frame by Frame)

Photos: Abraham Zapruder (Enhanced)

{ewc MVMCI2, ViewerMCI, [device AVIVideo][buttons play pause stop scanl scanr][stepsize 66.67][slider]
[caption 'The Zapruder Film, enhanced'][autostart] ..E.I.AVI}

Zapruder full screen/Slow

Zapruder full screen

Zapruder Little Girl Running/Full

Zapruder JFK Closeup/Full

Zapruder JFK closeup frame by frame Full

Nix Full Screen

Nix Full Screen

Muchmore Full Screen

Muchmore Full Slow Screen

Hughes Full Screen

```
{ewc MVMCI2, ViewerMCI, [device AVIVideo][buttons playpause scanl scanr menu][stepsize 1000][mute]
[slider][caption 'Introduction'][autostart] .._CMP.avi}
```

Dealey Plaza: Hughes Film, The Depository

{ewr MVMCI2, ViewerMCI, [device AVIVideo][buttons play pause stop scanl scanr][stepsize 66.67][slider]
[autostart] ...avi}View of the Texas School Book Depository the moment the motorcade passes underneath.

Dealey Plaza: Hughes Film, Old County Court House

{ewr MVMCI2, ViewerMCI, [device AVIVideo][buttons play pause stop scanl scanr][stepsize 66.67][slider]
[autostart] ...avi}View of the Old County Court House.

```
{ewc MVMCI2, ViewerMCI, [device AVIVideo][buttons playpause scanl scanr][stepsize 66.67][slider]
[caption 'Hughes Film: Rush to the Knoll '][autostart] .._GN.avi}
```

```
{ewc MVMCI2, ViewerMCI, [device AVIVideo][buttons playpause scanl scanr][stepsize 66.67][slider]
[caption 'View from the SniperNest'][autostart] .._SN1.avi}
```

```
{ewc MVMCI2, ViewerMCI, [device AVIVideo][buttons playpause scanl scanr][stepsize 1000][slider]
[caption 'Hughes Film: Pan of Dealey Plaza'][autostart] .._DP.avi}
```

Dealey Plaza Menu Screens

Dealey Plaza

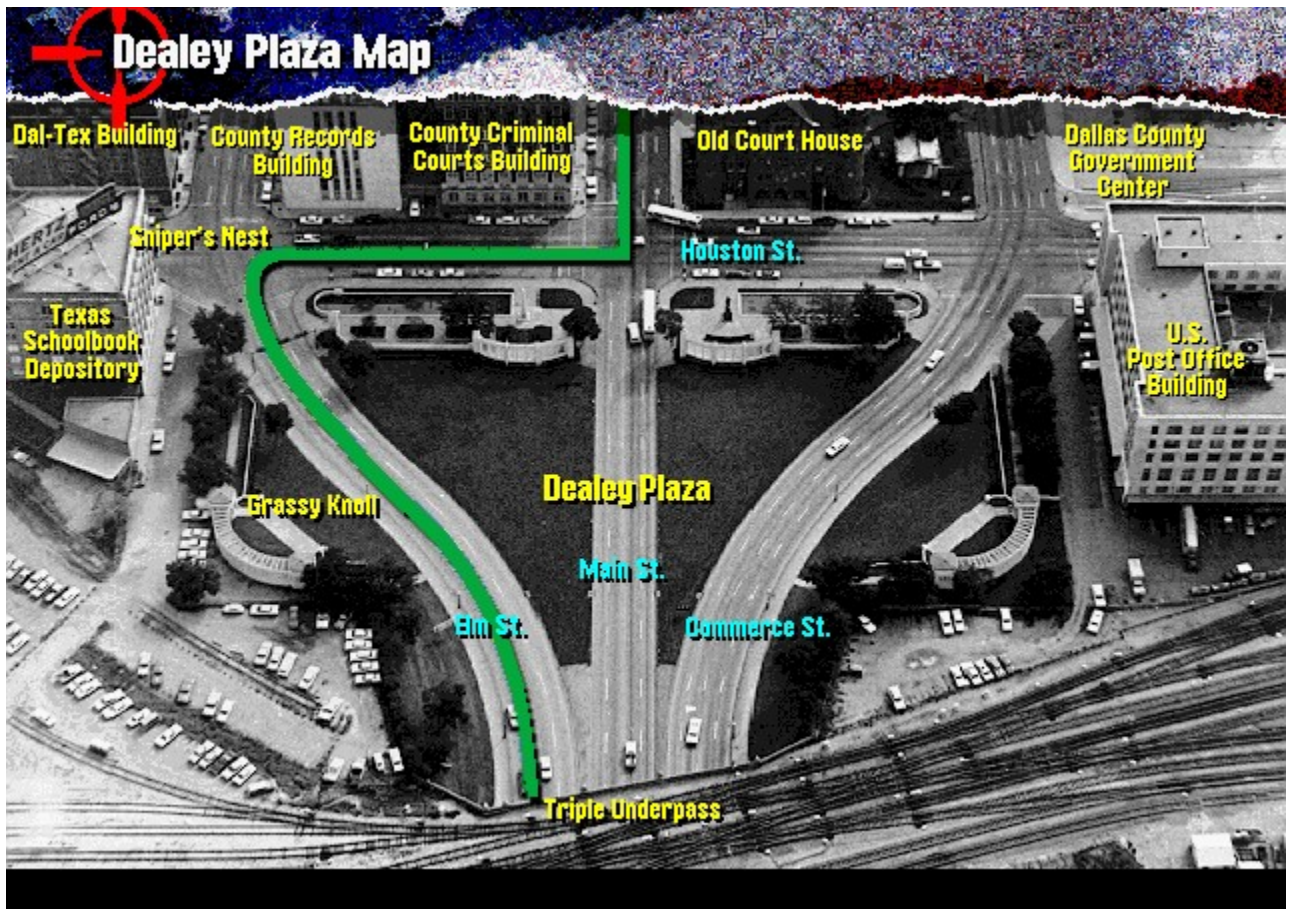

Dealey Plaza

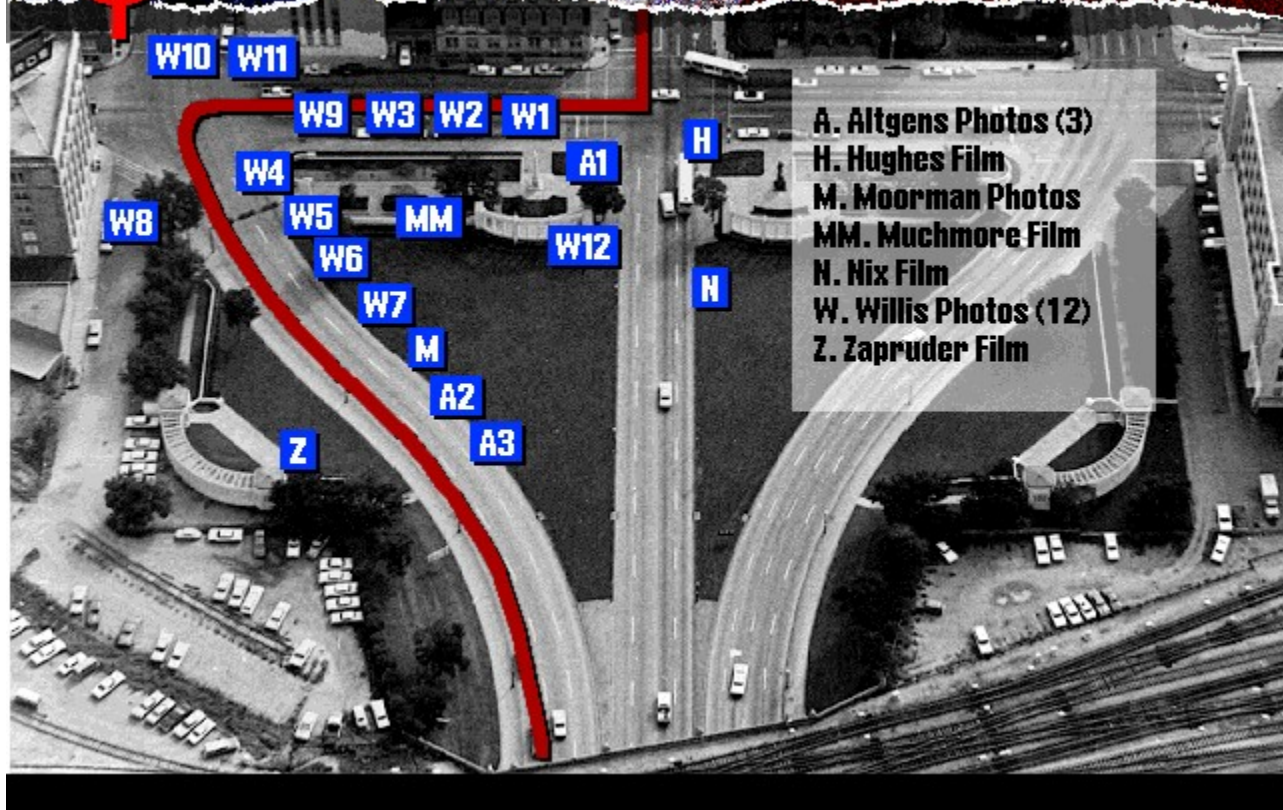

Witness Map

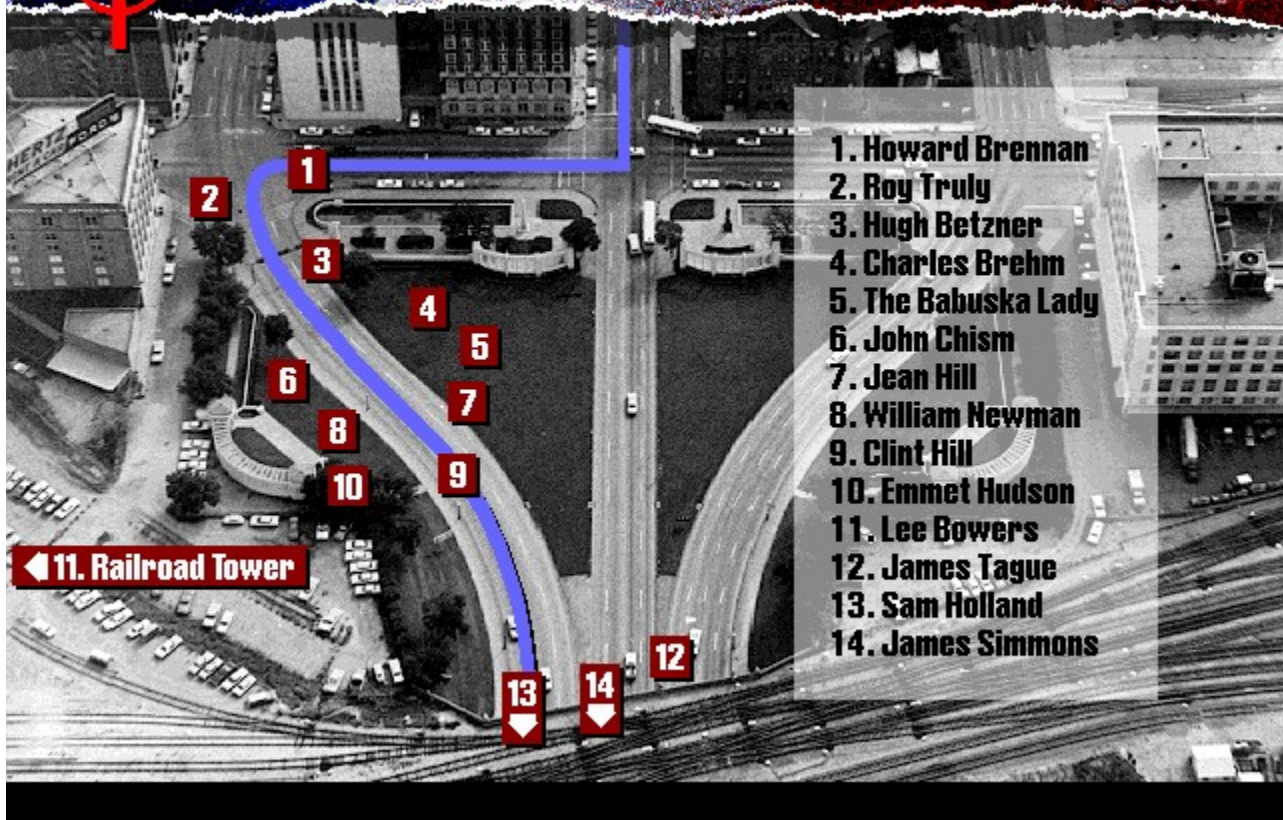

Film & Photo Map

Dealey Plaza Film & Photo Map

Dealey Plaza Witness Map

- 1. Howard Brennan
- 2. Roy Truly
- 3. Hugh Betzner
- 4. Charles Brehm
- 5. The Babuska Lady
- 6. John Chism
- 7. Jean Hill
- 8. William Newman
- 9. Clint Hill
- 10. Emmet Hudson
- 11. Lee Bowers
- 12. James Tague
- 13. Sam Holland
- 14. James Simmons

← 11. Railroad Tower

Popups for Dealey Plaza Photo Map Screen

Some conspiracy theorists claim that a gunman was positioned at an open second floor window of the Dal-Tex Building. A photograph taken at the moment of the assassination, shows an object projecting from the open window. It is claimed that a shot from this window is consistent with estimated Warren Commission trajectories. Curiously, the same photograph shows a man in distress on the fire escape.

Other conspiracy theorists have stated that as many as two shots were fired from the third floor of the Dal-Tex Building.

{ewc MVMCI2, ViewerMCI, [device WaveAudio][autostart] .._DAL.WAV}Some conspiracy theorists claim that a gunman was positioned at an open second floor window of the Dal-Tex Building. A photograph taken at the moment of the assassination, shows an object projecting from the open window. It is claimed that a shot from this window is consistent with estimated Warren Commission trajectories. Curiously, the same photograph shows a man in distress on the fire escape.

Other conspiracy theorists have stated that as many as two shots were fired from the third floor of the Dal-Tex Building.

According to the Warren Commission, it was from the sixth-floor window of the Texas School Book Depository that Lee Harvey Oswald, on November 22, 1963, fired three shots, killing President Kennedy and wounding Governor Connally.

Overlooking the northeast corner of Dealey Plaza, the Depository was originally built to house the offices of a railroad company. In the early 1960s, it became a warehouse for the Texas School Book Depository. During the 1980s, Dallas County planned to sell the building, until it was learned that the buyer intended to dismantle it and sell the bricks as souvenirs. Today on the sixth floor is a re-creation of the so-called Sniper's nest.

Some conspiracy theorists claim that a second gunman may have been positioned in the southwestern window of the sixth floor.

{ewc MVMCI2, ViewerMCI, [device WaveAudio][autostart] .._TSBD.WAV}According to the Warren Commission, it was from the sixth-floor window of the Texas School Book Depository that Lee Harvey Oswald, on November 22, 1963, fired three shots, killing President Kennedy and wounding Governor Connally.

Overlooking the northeast corner of Dealey Plaza, the Depository was originally built to house the offices of a railroad company. In the early 1960s, it became a warehouse for the Texas School Book Depository. During the 1980s, Dallas County planned to sell the building, until it was learned that the buyer intended to dismantle it and sell the bricks as souvenirs. Today on the sixth floor is a re-creation of the so-called Sniper's nest.

Some conspiracy theorists claim that a second gunman may have been positioned in the southwestern window of the sixth floor.

The Dallas County Records Building faces Houston Street. Some conspiracy theorists claim that a gunman may have been positioned on the roof of the Records Building. This claim is supported by a mark located in the concrete on the south side of Elm Street, which may have been made by a bullet. The mark traces back to the Records Building.

{ewc MVMCI2, ViewerMCI, [device WaveAudio][autostart] .._DCR.WAV}The Dallas County Records Building faces Houston Street. Some conspiracy theorists claim that a gunman may have been positioned on the roof of the Records Building. This claim is supported by a mark located in the concrete on the south side of Elm Street, which may have been made by a bullet. The mark traces back to the Records Building.

The Dallas County Criminal Courts Building bounds the eastern side of Dealey Plaza. On the day of the assassination, several prisoners watched the motorcade from their jail cell in the Criminal Courts Building. The prisoners saw two men, one with a rifle, in the sixth floor window of the Depository. Other witnesses located in the building also claim to have seen a man in the sixth floor window.

{ewc MVMCI2, ViewerMCI, [device WaveAudio][autostart] .._CC.WAV}The Dallas County Criminal Courts Building bounds the eastern side of Dealey Plaza. On the day of the assassination, several prisoners watched the motorcade from their jail cell in the Criminal Courts Building. The prisoners saw two men, one with a rifle, in the sixth floor window of the Depository. Other witnesses located in the building also claim to have seen a man in the sixth floor window.

The historic Old County Court House is on the southeast corner of Main and Houston Streets. On November 22, 1963, crowds lined Main to cheer the President as the motorcade turned onto Houston. Robert Hughes was positioned directly across the street from the Court House when he made his well-known film.

{ewc MVMCI2, ViewerMCI, [device WaveAudio][autostart] .._OC.WAV}The historic Old County Court House is on the southeast corner of Main and Houston Streets. On November 22, 1963, crowds lined Main to cheer the President as the motorcade turned onto Houston. Robert Hughes was positioned directly across the street from the Court House when he made his well-known film.

The Dallas County Government Center was under construction the day of the assassination. Steelworker Richard Randolph Carr was working on the seventh floor. Minutes before the motorcade arrived, Carr saw a heavy-set man in the sixth floor window of the Book Depository. After the shooting, Carr saw the same man walking on Commerce Street.

{ewc MVMCI2, ViewerMCI, [device WaveAudio][autostart] .._GC.WAV}The Dallas County Government Center was under construction the day of the assassination. Steelworker Richard Randolph Carr was working on the seventh floor. Minutes before the motorcade arrived, Carr saw a heavy-set man in the sixth floor window of the Book Depository. After the shooting, Carr saw the same man walking on Commerce Street.

The United States Post Office Building bounds the southern side of Dealey Plaza. There is no claim of a gunman located in the Post Office Building, however, some conspiracy theorists claim that a shot may have been fired from a manhole north of the Post Office.

{ewc MVMCI2, ViewerMCI, [device WaveAudio][autostart] .._POST.WAV}The United States Post Office Building bounds the southern side of Dealey Plaza. There is no claim of a gunman located in the Post Office Building, however, some conspiracy theorists claim that a shot may have been fired from a manhole north of the Post Office.

On November 22, 1963, Dealey Plaza was the site of the assassination of President John F. Kennedy. Named for George Dealey, founder of the Dallas Morning News and an early civic leader, the plaza was the site of the first home, store, and courthouse in Dallas.

{ewc MVMCI2, ViewerMCI, [device WaveAudio][autostart] .._DP.WAV}On November 22, 1963, Dealey Plaza was the site of the assassination of President John F. Kennedy. Named for George Dealey, founder of the Dallas Morning News and an early civic leader, the plaza was the site of the first home, store, and courthouse in Dallas.

Probably no small section of land in the United States has been the object of more controversy than the Grassy Knoll. The Grassy Knoll provided an ideal ambush site. Running along the top of the knoll was a wooden picket fence about five feet high. In front of this fence were shrubs and evergreen trees which, even in late November, provided a leafy canopy.

It was from a vantage point atop the Grassy Knoll that the Abraham Zapruder film was made.

In 1978, acoustical evidence led the House Select Committee on Assassinations to conclude that a gunman fired from the Grassy Knoll.

{ewc MVMCI2, ViewerMCI, [device WaveAudio][autostart] .._GN.WAV}Probably no small section of land in the United States has been the object of more controversy than the Grassy Knoll. The Grassy Knoll provided an ideal ambush site. Running along the top of the knoll was a wooden picket fence about five feet high. In front of this fence were shrubs and evergreen trees which, even in late November, provided a leafy canopy.

It was from a vantage point atop the Grassy Knoll that the Abraham Zapruder film was made. In 1978, acoustical evidence led the House Select Committee on Assassinations to conclude that a gunman fired from the Grassy Knoll.

On the west side of Dealey Plaza is a large railroad bridge which spans the three main traffic arteries of Commerce, Main and Elm Streets. Since all three streets converge under this concrete bridge, it quickly became known as the Triple Underpass. This was the position of about a dozen men on November 22, 1963, as they stood along the edge of the underpass to watch the Presidential motorcade approach and pass beneath them.

{ewc MVMCI2, ViewerMCI, [device WaveAudio][autostart] .._TU.WAV}On the west side of Dealey Plaza is a large railroad bridge which spans the three main traffic arteries of Commerce, Main and Elm Streets. Since all three streets converge under this concrete bridge, it quickly became known as the Triple Underpass. This was the position of about a dozen men on November 22, 1963, as they stood along the edge of the underpass to watch the Presidential motorcade approach and pass beneath them.

The sixth floor southeastern window of the Texas School Book Depository is referred to as the Sniper's Nest. According to the Warren Commission, it was from the Sniper's Nest that Lee Harvey Oswald fired three shots killing President Kennedy. Pictures of this position taken after the shooting show cardboard boxes stacked upon each other. The boxes were used both to camouflage the assassin and to support the assassination weapon.

{ewc MVMCI2, ViewerMCI, [device WaveAudio][autostart] .._SN.WAV}The sixth floor southeastern window of the Texas School Book Depository is referred to as the Sniper's Nest. According to the Warren Commission, it was from the Sniper's Nest that Lee Harvey Oswald fired three shots killing President Kennedy. Pictures of this position taken after the shooting show cardboard boxes stacked upon each other. The boxes were used both to camouflage the assassin and to support the assassination weapon.

Pop-ups for Dealey Plaza Photo Map Screen

Instructions

This is a map of the location of photographers who recorded the assassination of President Kennedy on November 22, 1963. To view a photograph or film, click on the location in Dealey Plaza where it was taken. For example, to see Willis Photograph number 1, click on W1.

Clicking on the binoculars  will enlarge the photograph.

Clicking on the film reel  will play a film.

Phillip Willis took a series of pictures considered by many as the most important photos of the assassination. The first photograph shows the Presidential limousine as it turns onto Houston from Main, 25 seconds before the fatal shots.

{ewc MVMCI2, ViewerMCI, [device WaveAudio][autostart] .._PW1.WAV}Phillip Willis took a series of pictures considered by many as the most important photos of the assassination. The first photograph shows the Presidential limousine as it turns onto Houston from Main, 25 seconds before the fatal shots.

The Presidential limousine has turned onto Houston Street.

{ewc MVMCI2, ViewerMCI, [device WaveAudio][autostart] .._PW2.WAV}. The Presidential limousine has turned onto Houston Street.

The motorcade approaches the final turn onto Elm Street.

{ewc MVMCI2, ViewerMCI, [device WaveAudio][autostart] .._PW3.WAV}The motorcade approaches the final turn onto Elm Street.

The Presidential limousine is on Elm, in front of the Texas School Book Depository, President Kennedy waves, three seconds before the fatal shots.

{ewc MVMCI2, ViewerMCI, [device WaveAudio][autostart] .._PW4.WAV}The Presidential limousine is on Elm, in front of the Texas School Book Depository, President Kennedy waves, three seconds before the fatal shots.

Taken the moment the President was first struck by a bullet, this photograph shows a human figure behind a wall to the south of the Grassy Knoll. The figure is referred to as "the black dog man," because it resembles a black dog sitting on its haunches.

{ewc MVMCI2, ViewerMCI, [device WaveAudio][autostart] .._PW5.WAV}Taken the moment the President was first struck by a bullet, this photograph shows a human figure behind a wall to the south of the Grassy Knoll. The figure is referred to as "the black dog man," because it resembles a black dog sitting on its haunches.

Taken moments after the fatal shots. The Presidential limousine has sped to Parkland Memorial Hospital.

{ewc MVMCI2, ViewerMCI, [device WaveAudio][autostart] .._PW6.WAV}Taken moments after the fatal shots. The Presidential limousine has sped to Parkland Memorial Hospital.

The press bus, which was positioned at the end of the motorcade, passes the site of the assassination. The woman in the red coat is Jean Hill. The woman in the gray coat is known as "The Babushka Lady."

{ewc MVMCI2, ViewerMCI, [device WaveAudio][autostart] .._PW7.WAV}The press bus, which was positioned at the end of the motorcade, passes the sight of the assassination. The woman in the red coat is Jean Hill. The woman in the gray coat is known as "The Babushka Lady."

A woman seen in films taken the day of the assassination is known to researchers as "The Babushka Lady" because of a triangular kerchief she wore on her head that day. The Babushka Lady was filming behind Charles Brehm and his son. Her vantage point would show the Grassy Knoll. Some researchers have identified the Babushka Lady as Beverly Oliver, a friend of Jack Ruby's. Oliver claims that she is The Babushka Lady, that her film was taken and never returned by FBI agents and that Ruby once introduced her to "Lee Oswald of the CIA".

{ewc MVMCI2, ViewerMCI, [device WaveAudio][autostart] .._BABU.WAV}

A woman seen in films taken the day of the assassination is known to researchers as "The Babushka Lady" because of a triangular kerchief she wore on her head that day. The Babushka Lady was filming behind Charles Brehm and his son. Her vantage point would show the Grassy Knoll. Some researchers have identified the Babushka Lady as Beverly Oliver, a friend of Jack Ruby's. Oliver claims that she is The Babushka Lady, that her film was taken and never returned by FBI agents and that Ruby once introduced her to "Lee Oswald of the CIA".

A man wearing dark glasses stands in front of the Depository Building. Some believe that this man is Jack Ruby, placing him at the scene of the assassination.

{ewc MVMCI2, ViewerMCI, [device WaveAudio][autostart] .._PW8.WAV}A man wearing dark glasses stands in front of the Depository Building. Some believe that this man is Jack Ruby, placing him at the scene of the assassination.

Police seal the Texas School Book Depository.

{ewc MVMCI2, ViewerMCI, [device WaveAudio][autostart] .._PW9.WAV}Police seal the Texas School Book Depository.

Police take the assassination weapon from the Texas School Book Depository.

{ewc MVMCI2, ViewerMCI, [device WaveAudio][autostart] .._PW10.WAV}Police take the assassination weapon from the Texas School Book Depository.

Police search for the assassin.

{ewc MVMCI2, ViewerMCI, [device WaveAudio][autostart] .._PW11.WAV}Police search for the assassin.

The Texas School Book Depository, taken about one hour after the assassination. The Sniper's Nest is located at the far right sixth floor window. The cardboard boxes used to hide the assassin are visible.

{ewc MVMCI2, ViewerMCI, [device WaveAudio][autostart] .._PW12.WAV}The Texas School Book Depository, taken about one hour after the assassination. The Sniper's Nest is located at the far right sixth floor window. The cardboard boxes used to hide the assassin are visible.

James Altgens a photographer for the Associated Press in Dallas, arrived in Dealey Plaza early. He had been assigned to get a picture of Kennedy as he passed through downtown Dallas. Altgens walked to the intersection of Main and Houston, where he took this photo as the President passed, moments before the shots.

{ewc MVMCI2, ViewerMCI, [device WaveAudio][autostart] .._ALT1.WAV}James Altgens a photographer for the Associated Press in Dallas, arrived in Dealey Plaza early. He had been assigned to get a picture of Kennedy as he passed through downtown Dallas. Altgens walked to the intersection of Main and Houston, where he took this photo as the President passed, moments before the shots.

James Altgens made this photograph from the south curb of Elm Street. Taken the moment President Kennedy is struck by an assassins bullet, this photograph shows a man standing in the doorway of the Texas School Book Depository. Soon after the assassination, many people, including his mother, suggested that the man in the doorway looked like Lee Harvey Oswald.

{ewc MVMCI2, ViewerMCI, [device WaveAudio][autostart] .._ALT2.WAV}James Altgens made this photograph from the south curb of Elm Street. Taken the moment President Kennedy is struck by an assassins bullet, this photograph shows a man standing in the doorway of the Texas School Book Depository. Soon after the assassination, many people, including his mother, suggested that the man in the doorway looked like Lee Harvey Oswald.

This photograph, taken seconds after the shots, shows Secret Service agent Clint Hill clutching to the back of the Presidential limousine as Mrs. Kennedy reacts to the fatal wounds of the President.

{ewc MVMCI2, ViewerMCI, [device WaveAudio][autostart] .._ALT3.WAV}This photograph, taken seconds after the shots, shows Secret Service agent Clint Hill clutching to the back of the Presidential limousine as Mrs. Kennedy reacts to the fatal wounds of the President.

Mary Moorman took this well-known Polaroid picture just as Kennedy was struck in the head. Researchers examined the bushy area near the corner of the fence and discovered what appeared to be two figures. The main figure has been dubbed the "badge man" because he appears to be wearing a dark shirt with a bright shiny object on his chest.

{ewc MVMCI2, ViewerMCI, [device WaveAudio][autostart] .._MORM.WAV}Mary Moorman took this well-known Polaroid picture just as Kennedy was struck in the head. Researchers examined the bushy area near the corner of the fence and discovered what appeared to be two figures. The main figure has been dubbed the "badge man" because he appears to be wearing a dark shirt with a bright shiny object on his chest.

Orville Nix captured the entire assassination sequence from an angle opposite the Zapruder film.

{ewc MVMCI2, ViewerMCI, [device WaveAudio][autostart] .._NIX.WAV}Orville Nix captured the entire assassination sequence from an angle opposite the Zapruder film.

An 8-mm home movie made by Robert Hughes, who was standing at the intersection of Main and Houston streets, shows the motorcade turn onto Main Street and proceed towards the Texas Schoolbook Depository.

{ewc MVMCI2, ViewerMCI, [device WaveAudio][autostart] .._HUGFS.WAV}An 8-mm home movie made by Robert Hughes, who was standing at the intersection of Main and Houston streets, shows the motorcade turn onto Main Street and proceed towards the Texas Schoolbook Depository.

Using a Bell and Howell 8mm camera with a telephoto lens, Abraham Zapruder captured one of the most shocking moments in history.

{ewc MVMCI2, ViewerMCI, [device WaveAudio][autostart] .._ZAP.WAV}Using a Bell and Howell 8mm camera with a telephoto lens, Abraham Zapruder captured one of the mostshocking moments in history.

The 8mm film made by Marie Muchmore from the grassy area between Elm and Main streets caught the final and fatal head shot to Kennedy.

{ewc MVMCI2, ViewerMCI, [device WaveAudio][autostart] .._MUCH.WAV}The 8mm film made by Marie Muchmore from the grassy area between Elm and Main streets caught the final and fatal head shot to Kennedy.

WITNESS MAP POPUPS

Instructions

This is a map of the location of certain witnesses to the assassination of President Kennedy. To see information about a witness, click on the location in Dealey Plaza where they were standing. For example, to learn what Howard Brennan saw, click on the 1.

Clicking on the binoculars will enlarge the photograph.

Clicking on the film reel will play a film.

Sitting on a concrete retaining wall across from the Depository was 44-year-old Howard Leslie Brennan, who was to become the star witness for the Warren Commission. Brennan was one of the few witnesses to have seen a gunman fire from the Depository. He described the man as a slender white male in his early 30's wearing "light-colored clothing."

Brennan stated: "...I heard what I thought was a backfire. It ran in my mind that it might be someone throwing firecrackers out of the window of the red brick building and I looked up at the building. I then saw this man I have described in the window and he was taking aim with a high-powered rifle. I could see all of the barrel of the gun. I do not know if it had a scope on it or not. I was looking at the man in this window at the time of the last explosion. Then this man let the gun down to his side and stepped out of sight. He did not seem to be in any hurry...I believe I could identify this man if I ever saw him again."

{ewc MVMCI2, ViewerMCI, [device WaveAudio][autostart] .._BREN.WAV}Sitting on a concrete retaining wall across from the Depository was 44-year-old Howard Leslie Brennan, who was to become the star witness for the Warren Commission. Brennan was one of the few witnesses to have seen a gunman fire from the Depository. He described the man as a slender white male in his early 30's wearing "light-colored clothing."

Brennan stated: "...I heard what I thought was a backfire. It ran in my mind that it might be someone throwing firecrackers out of the window of the red brick building and I looked up at the building. I then saw this man I have described in the window and he was taking aim with a high-powered rifle. I could see all of the barrel of the gun. I do not know if it had a scope on it or not. I was looking at the man in this window at the time of the last explosion. Then this man let the gun down to his side and stepped out of sight. He did not seem to be in any hurry...I believe I could identify this man if I ever saw him again."

Charles Brehm, an ex-serviceman with experience in bolt-action rifles, was probably the closest witness to the fatal head shot, though, he was not called to testify before the Warren Commission.

Brehm stated: "I very definitely saw the effect of the second bullet that struck the President. That which appeared to be a portion of the President's skull went flying slightly to the rear of the President's car and directly to its left. It did fly over toward the curb to the left and to the rear."

{ewc MVMCI2, ViewerMCI, [device WaveAudio][autostart] .._BREHM.WAV}Charles Brehm, an ex-serviceman with experience in bolt-action rifles, was probably the closest witness to the fatal head shot, though, he was not called to testify before the Warren Commission. Brehm stated: "I very definitely saw the effect of the second bullet that struck the President. That which appeared to be a portion of the President's skull went flying slightly to the rear of the President's car and directly to its left. It did fly over toward the curb to the left and to the rear."

Across the street from Howard Brennan was Roy Truly, Superintendent of the Texas School Book Depository. Just after the Presidential limousine had turned onto Elm, he heard an explosion from the Depository. He thought it was a firecracker or toy cannon and said that after the initial explosion, everything seemed frozen. Then, there were two more explosions and he realized that shots were being fired.

Roy Truly was the man responsible for hiring Lee Harvey Oswald to fill book orders at the Depository. Truly recalled: "Actually, it was the end of our fall rush, if it hadn't existed a week or two longer, or if we had not been using some of our regular boys putting down this plywood, we would not have had any need for Lee Oswald at that time, which is a tragic thing for me to think about."

{ewc MVMCI2, ViewerMCI, [device WaveAudio][autostart] .._TRULY.WAV}Across the street from Howard Brennan was Roy Truly, Superintendent of the Texas School Book Depository. Just after the Presidential limousine had turned onto Elm, he heard an explosion from the Depository. He thought it was a firecracker or toy cannon and said that after the initial explosion, everything seemed frozen. Then, there were two more explosions and he realized that shots were being fired. Roy Truly was the man responsible for hiring Lee Harvey Oswald to fill book orders at the Depository. Truly recalled: "Actually, it was the end of our fall rush, if it hadn't existed a week or two longer, or if we had not been using some of our regular boys putting down this plywood, we would not have had any need for Lee Oswald at that time, which is a tragic thing for me to think about."

Hugh Betzner Jr., who was 22 years old on November 22, 1963, said he heard at least three shots fired and saw the impact on the president. Betzner joined spectators running up the Grassy Knoll toward the wooden picket fence where he assumed the shots came from.

He stated: "I heard a loud noise. I thought this noise was either a firecracker or a car had backfired. I looked up and it seemed like there was another loud noise in a matter of a few seconds. I looked down the street and I could see the President's car and another one and they looked like the cars were stopped."

{ewc MVMCI2, ViewerMCI, [device WaveAudio][autostart] .._BETS.WAV}Hugh Betzner Jr., who was 22 years old on November 22, 1963, said he heard at least three shots fired and saw the impact on the president. Betzner joined spectators running up the Grassy Knoll toward the wooden picket fence where he assumed the shots came from.

He stated: "I heard a loud noise. I thought this noise was either a firecracker or a car had backfired. I looked up and it seemed like there was another loud noise in a matter of a few seconds. I looked down the street and I could see the President's car and another one and they looked like the cars were stopped."

John A. Chism, along with his wife and three-year-old son, were standing directly in front of the Stemmons Freeway sign. They said the first shots were fired just as the President passed in front of them. They saw Kennedy slump to his left and into his wife's arms.

That day Mrs. Chism told Dallas authorities: "there was a second shot that I heard, after the President's wife had pulled him down in the seat. It came from what I thought was behind us (the Grassy Knoll) and I looked but I couldn't see anything."

{ewc MVMCI2, ViewerMCI, [device WaveAudio][autostart] .._CHISM.WAV}John A. Chism, along with his wife and three-year-old son, were standing directly in front of the Stemmons Freeway sign. They said the first shots were fired just as the President passed in front of them. They saw Kennedy slump to his left and into his wife's arms.

That day Mrs. Chism told Dallas authorities: "there was a second shot that I heard, after the President's wife had pulled him down in the seat. It came from what I thought was behind us (the Grassy Knoll) and I looked but I couldn't see anything."

Jean Hill, who was standing next to her friend Mary Moorman, was one of the closest witnesses to the fatal head shot. She heard between four and six shots altogether and then ran across the street in an effort to locate the men she had seen.

Hill said: "I knew he'd never look our way because all the people were on the other side of the street, so I jumped out into the street and yelled, "Hey, Mr. President, look this way. We want to take your picture." As he began turning toward us, he was hit. Then a bullet hit his head and took the top off. I saw a puff of smoke and some sort of movement on the Grassy Knoll."

{ewc MVMCI2, ViewerMCI, [device WaveAudio][autostart] .._HILL.WAV}Jean Hill, who was standing next to her friend Mary Moorman, was one of the closest witnesses to the fatal head shot. She heard between four and six shots altogether and then ran across the street in an effort to locate the men she had seen. Hill said: "I knew he'd never look our way because all the people were on the other side of the street, so I jumped out into the street and yelled, "Hey, Mr. President, look this way. We want to take your picture." As he began turning toward us, he was hit. Then a bullet hit his head and took the top off. I saw a puff of smoke and some sort of movement on the Grassy Knoll."

Directly across Elm from Jean Hill was the Newman family. Bill Newman, his wife Gayle and their two small children were standing west of the Stemmons Freeway sign directly below the Grassy Knoll.

Newman told Sheriff's officers: "We were standing at the edge of the curb looking at the (President's) car as it was coming toward us and all of a sudden there was a noise, apparently a gunshot....By (the) time he was directly in front of us...he was hit in the side of the head...Then we fell down on the grass as it seemed that we were in direct path of fire....I thought the shot had come from the garden directly behind me, that was on an elevation from where I was as I was right on the curb. I do not recall looking toward the Texas School Book Depository. I looked back in the vicinity of the garden."

{ewc MVMCI2, ViewerMCI, [device WaveAudio][autostart] .._NEWM.WAV}Directly across Elm from Jean Hill was the Newman family. Bill Newman, his wife Gayle and their two small children were standing west of the Stemmons Freeway sign directly below the Grassy Knoll.

Newman told Sheriff's officers: "We were standing at the edge of the curb looking at the (President's) car as it was coming toward us and all of a sudden there was a noise, apparently a gunshot....By (the) time he was directly in front of us...he was hit in the side of the head...Then we fell down on the grass as it seemed that we were in direct path of fire....I thought the shot had come from the garden directly behind me, that was on an elevation from where I was as I was right on the curb. I do not recall looking toward the Texas School Book Depository. I looked back in the vicinity of the garden."

The only Secret Service agent to react with speed was Clint Hill. Hill had not been scheduled to make the Dallas trip, but came only after Mrs. Kennedy made a personal request. Hill thought the initial sound was a firecracker and began looking to his right for the source of the sound when he saw Kennedy grab at himself and lurch forward slightly. He then realized something was wrong and jumped off the follow-up car. He was racing the few feet to the limousine when he heard more shots.

Hill said: "the second noise that I heard had removed a portion of the President's head, and he slumped noticeably to his left. Mrs. Kennedy had jumped up from the seat and was, it appeared to me, reaching for something coming off the right rear bumper of the car, the right rear tail, when she noticed I was trying to climb on the car."

{ewc MVMCI2, ViewerMCI, [device WaveAudio][autostart] .._CLINT.WAV}The only Secret Service agent to react with speed was Clint Hill. Hill had not been scheduled to make the Dallas trip, but came only after Mrs. Kennedy made a personal request. Hill thought the initial sound was a firecracker and began looking to his right for the source of the sound when he saw Kennedy grab at himself and lurch forward slightly. He then realized something was wrong and jumped off the follow-up car. He was racing the few feet to the limousine when he heard more shots.

Hill said: "the second noise that I heard had removed a portion of the President's head, and he slumped noticeably to his left. Mrs. Kennedy had jumped up from the seat and was, it appeared to me, reaching for something coming off the right rear bumper of the car, the right rear tail, when she noticed I was trying to climb on the car."

Sitting on the steps leading to the top of the Grassy Knoll was Emmett J. Hudson, one of the grounds keepers of Dealey Plaza. In his testimony, Hudson told the Warren Commission: "the first shot rung out and, of course, I didn't realize it was a shot...the motorcade had done got further on down Elm...I happened to be looking right at him when that bullet hit him - the second shot...it looked like it hit him somewhere along about a little bit behind the ear and a little above the ear...this young fellow that was...standing there with me...he says, "Lay down, mister, somebody is shooting the President."

{ewc MVMCI2, ViewerMCI, [device WaveAudio][autostart] .._HUDSN.WAV}Sitting on the steps leading to the top of the Grassy Knoll was Emmett J. Hudson, one of the grounds keepers of Dealey Plaza. In his testimony, Hudson told the Warren Commission: "the first shot rung out and, of course, I didn't realize it was a shot...the motorcade had done got further on down Elm...I happened to be looking right at him when that bullet hit him - the second shot....it looked like it hit him somewhere along about a little bit behind the ear and a little above the ear...this young fellow that was...standing there with me...he says, "Lay down, mister, somebody is shooting the President."

One witness who was in a position to observe the area behind the picket fence was Lee Bowers, a railroad supervisor stationed in a tower just north of the Grassy Knoll. Bowers observed cars moving suspiciously in the sealed-off railroad yards minutes before the motorcade arrived.

Bowers told the Warren Commission: "...the area had been covered by police for some two hours. Since approximately 10 o'clock in the morning traffic had been cut off into the area so that anyone moving around could actually be observed...there were three cars that came in during the time from around noon until the time of the shooting...[the third car] spent a little more time in the area....he circled the area and probed one spot right at the tower...and was forced to back out some considerable distance, and slowly cruised down back towards the front of the School Depository Building....The last I saw of him, he was pausing just...above the assassination site."

{ewc MVMCI2, ViewerMCI, [device WaveAudio][autostart] .._BOWER.WAV}One witness who was in a position to observe the area behind the picket fence was Lee Bowers, a railroad supervisor stationed in a tower just north of the Grassy Knoll. Bowers observed cars moving suspiciously in the sealed-off railroad yards minutes before the motorcade arrived.

Bowers told the Warren Commission: "...the area had been covered by police for some two hours. Since approximately 10 o'clock in the morning traffic had been cut off into the area so that anyone moving around could actually be observed...there were three cars that came in during the time from around noon until the time of the shooting...[the third car] spent a little more time in the area....he circled the area and probed one spot right at the tower...and was forced to back out some considerable distance, and slowly cruised down back towards the front of the School Depository Building....The last I saw of him, he was pausing just...above the assassination site."

James Tague, was the third man wounded in Dealey Plaza. His cheek was bloodied by a cement fragment sent flying when a bullet struck the curb near him. The Warren Commission had originally concluded that all three shots had hit either President Kennedy or Governor Connally. Apparently, after reports of Tague's wounding, the Warren Commission revised their account of the assassination, adopting the "Single-Bullet Theory." According to this theory a single bullet struck both Kennedy and Connally, a second bullet fatally wounded President Kennedy and a third wounded bystander Tague.

{ewc MVMCI2, ViewerMCI, [device WaveAudio][autostart] .._TAGUE.WAV}James Tague, was the third man wounded in Dealey Plaza. His cheek was bloodied by a cement fragment sent flying when a bullet struck the curb near him. The Warren Commission had originally concluded that all three shots had hit either President Kennedy or Governor Connally. Apparently, after reports of Tague's wounding, the Warren Commission revised their account of the assassination, adopting the "Single-Bullet Theory." According to this theory a single bullet struck both Kennedy and Connally, a second bullet fatally wounded President Kennedy and a third wounded bystander Tague.

Sam Holland, a track and signal supervisor for the Union Terminal Railroad Company, was positioned on the Triple Underpass and saw smoke drift from the Grassy Knoll. He told the Warren Commission: "... the first report that I heard...was pretty loud...and the car traveled a few yards and Governor Connally turned...his hand out and...another report rang out and he slumped down in his seat...(then Kennedy) was hit again...it knocked him completely down on the floor...just slumped completely over...I heard a third report and I counted four shots...There was a shot, a report. I don't know whether it was a shot. I can't say that. And a puff of smoke came out about six or eight feet above the ground, right out from under those trees."

{ewc MVMCI2, ViewerMCI, [device WaveAudio][autostart] .._HOLL.WAV}Sam Holland, a track and signal supervisor for the Union Terminal Railroad Company, was positioned on the Triple Underpass and saw smoke drift from the Grassy Knoll. He told the Warren Commission: "... the first report that I heard...was pretty loud...and the car traveled a few yards and Governor Connally turned...his hand out and...another report rang out and he slumped down in his seat...(then Kennedy) was hit again...it knocked him completely down on the floor...just slumped completely over...I heard a third report and I counted four shots...There was a shot, a report. I don't know whether it was a shot. I can't say that. And a puff of smoke came out about six or eight feet above the ground, right out from under those trees."

James Simmons, a car inspector for the Union Terminal Railroad Company, was in the group on the Triple Underpass and saw a puff of smoke in the area of the Grassy Knoll.

Simmons stated: "As the President's limousine rounded the curve on Elm Street, there was a loud explosion...It sounded like it came from the left and in front of us, toward the wooden fence. And there was a puff of smoke that came from underneath the trees on the embankment directly in front of the wooden fence....I was talking to Patrolman Foster at the time and as soon as we heard the shots, we ran around to (behind) the picket fence...There was no one there but there were footprints in the mud around the fence and footprints on the two-by-four railing on the fence..."

{ewc MVMCI2, ViewerMCI, [device WaveAudio][autostart] .._SIMM.WAV}James Simmons, a car inspector for the Union Terminal Railroad Company, was in the group on the Triple Underpass and saw a puff of smoke in the area of the Grassy Knoll.

Simmons stated: "As the President's limousine rounded the curve on Elm Street, there was a loud explosion...It sounded like it came from the left and in front of us, toward the wooden fence. And there was a puff of smoke that came from underneath the trees on the embankment directly in front of the wooden fence....I was talking to Patrolman Foster at the time and as soon as we heard the shots, we ran around to (behind) the picket fence...There was no one there but there were footprints in the mud around the fence and footprints on the two-by-four railing on the fence..."

Crossfire: Table Of Contents

INTRODUCTION

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

PREFACE

PART I: "The Kill Zone"

A. DALLAS - The Stage is Set

B. DEALEY PLAZA - November 22, 1963

1. The Motorcade

2. The Crowd

3. The Texas School Book Depository

4. The Triple Underpass

5. The Grassy Knoll

PART II: "Means, Motives and Opportunities"

A. LEE HARVEY OSWALD (Assassin or Patsy?)

B. RUSSIANS (Soviets and Solidarists)

C. CUBANS (Pro and Anti-Castro Cubans)

D. MOBSTERS (Organized Crime)

E. AGENTS (The CIA and other intelligence agencies)

F. G MEN (J. Edgar Hoover's FBI and the Secret Service)

G. REDNECKS AND OILMEN (Right-wing extremists and Texas millionaires)

H. SOLDIERS (The military)

PART III: "Aftermath"

A. DALLAS

B. TWO HOSPITALS

C. JACK RUBY

D. THE EVIDENCE

E. THE WARREN COMMISSION

F. THE GARRISON INVESTIGATION

G. THE HOUSE SELECT COMMITTEE ON ASSASSINATIONS

H. WAS OSWALD REALLY OSWALD? (The Oswald exhumation)

I. CONVENIENT DEATHS

PART IV: "Conclusions"

Crossfire: Introduction

Dallas, Texas

Friday, November 22, 1963

Approximately 12:30 p.m. C.S.T.

In the early morning hours, storm clouds had brought drizzle to Dallas. But by 10 a.m., the skies had cleared and a warm sun brought Indian Summer weather to this North Central Texas city. By the noon hour, it was shirtsleeve weather. The sky was an immaculate blue, unbroken by a single cloud. The occasional gust of cool breeze out of the north was welcomed by Texans weary of the interminable summer heat which usually lasts well into the fall. It was the sort of fall day that stirs the blood, that makes people want to attend a football game or get out and work in the yard. This day there were other reasons for wanting to get outside. The President of the United States was coming to town. The media had been full of news about the event for days.

The motorcade had been scheduled to pass through the downtown business section during the noon hour so office workers could watch the parade during lunch. The strategy worked well. Literally thousands of Dallasites turned out in the balmy weather for a view of Kennedy, already acknowledged as one of this nation's most controversial presidents. A month earlier, U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations Adlai Stevenson had been pushed, spat upon and hit in the head with a picket sign while visiting in Dallas and, just the previous Tuesday, cashiered Army Maj. Gen. Edwin A. Walker had made the news by shoving a TV cameraman during a Dallas speech by Alabama Governor George Wallace. Yet, after landing at Love Field about 11:45 a.m., Kennedy's people found the Dallas crowds large, enthusiastic and friendly.

As the motorcade cruised through the packed streets of downtown Dallas, the earlier apprehensions seemed to dissipate as quickly as the morning's overcast. Even the cynical Washington press corps were awed by the tumultuous welcome. The awe of the reporters was reflected in the silence which prevailed in the long, dark-blue Lincoln Continental serving as the presidential limousine. With sirens wailing, horns honking, radios blaring and the shouts and cheers of the crowd ringing off the sides of the office buildings, the scene was chaotic, despite what had been hailed as one of the tightest security efforts in recent memory. Twice the motorcade had ground to a halt, as Kennedy acknowledged pleas to stop and shake hands with some school children and nuns. As the presidential limousine pulled into an open plaza on the west end of the downtown area, security men began to relax. They knew that after passing through the plaza and underneath a railroad bridge, they would be on Stemmons Freeway and only a few minutes from the Trade Mart. However, the abundance of bushes and fences and buildings prompted at least one Kennedy staffer, Presidential Assistant David Powers, to view the plaza as a perfect ambush site.

Then came a 120-degree turn in front of a red-brick building with the name "Texas School Book Depository" above the door. It was in an upper floor of this building that several people saw a man with a rifle only moments before the motorcade arrived. Several people, their observations later buttressed by photographic evidence, saw another man standing next to the rifleman. The limousine slowed almost to a standstill as the Secret Service driver tried to negotiate the tight curve. As it began to slowly glide down the street through a small park-like arcade, there came a popping sound. Many people thought it was a firecracker, while others thought it was just one of the escorting motorcycles backfiring.

Only a handful of those present believed the sound to be a gunshot. But this sound was immediately followed by explosive booms which sent echoes bouncing off the surrounding buildings and the eastern face of the Triple Underpass.

Several bystanders, including the Dallas County Sheriff, saw at least one bullet strike the pavement of Elm Street, ricocheting off the west and sending up a shower of dust and cement. Another bullet was seen by a Secret Service agent in the follow-up car to the rear of the limousine. He reported it struck Kennedy in the back about four inches below his right shoulder.

Everyone saw the President grasp at his throat with both hands. He appeared immobilized, only sagging slightly to his left. Every doctor at Parkland Hospital would later report a wound in Kennedy's throat at about the location of his Adam's apple. They all described the wound as one of entrance, yet Kennedy had never turned to the rear, the direction of the depository.

One bullet struck the earth near a manhole cover on the south side of Elm, where it was guarded for a time by a Dallas policeman and a deputy sheriff and photographed by a newspaperman. Yet another struck the curb of Elm Street down near the Triple Underpass, sending up chunks of cement which bloodied the cheek of a bystander. This shot was ignored by the official inquiry for several months and, by the time investigators came to test the bullet mark, it had been repaired. Some witnesses even thought a bullet struck a sign reading "Stemmons Freeway," which stood at a point almost perpendicular to where Kennedy was first hit. No one will ever know if the sign was hit as it disappeared later that afternoon and was never seen again.

More than a second after Kennedy was hit, Governor Connally was struck in the back with a bullet which pierced his chest and shattered his fifth rib. His right wrist bone also was broken by yet another bullet, although an official government commission concluded it was the same bullet which struck his back after passing through Kennedy. Later that afternoon, a single rifle slug - unmarked, undistorted and undamaged - was found in a public hallway at Parkland Hospital. This slug was to become an insult to the intelligence of the American people, for the government claimed that this "pristine" slug made an erratic trajectory through the bodies of both Kennedy and Connally, causing seven wounds and striking at least two bones. In later years, at least two bullet slugs were discovered by people digging around in the assassination area. Both were turned over the FBI, but were never investigated.

Most witnesses in or around the motorcade believed the first burst of fire came from the front, although several stated they also heard a noise to the rear. One policeman saw pigeons flutter off the depository roof and three depository workmen on the building's fifth floor heard a shot from above them and noticed plaster dust fall from the ceiling. Yet, even with that evidence, the trio ran to a west side window believing that other shots had come from the trees to the west of the depository. A few, including Governor Connally, recognized the sound of a high-powered rifle being fired during that opening volley. One combat veteran was standing with his family at the base of what was to become known as the Grassy Knoll. He reported that shots were coming in directly over their heads from atop the knoll. They fell to the ground and covered their children.

After the initial burst of fire, heralded by a faint popping sound, there was a pause. Time seemed to stand still for everyone in the plaza. It was during this brief span of time - probably about four seconds - that people began to realize that shots were being fired. A Secret Service agent leaped from the follow-up car and raced for the presidential limousine. His duty was to protect Mrs. Kennedy. In fact, he had not originally been scheduled to make the Dallas trip. Kennedy's security men were remarkably sluggish, perhaps because they had been up until early morning hours in a notorious Fort Worth nightclub owned by an associate of Jack Ruby.

Curiously, the brake lights on the presidential limousine remained on throughout this lull in the firing. In fact, many bystanders claimed the car came to a virtual halt with the driver looking back over his right shoulder in Kennedy's direction. Suddenly there came two loud explosions, one almost on top of the other. Critically wounded, Connally was conscious of the blasts and thought the firing must have come from an automatic rifle.

Kennedy's head flew forward about one-eighteenth of a second (as determined by analyzing films of the shooting) and then reversed direction, both his head and body thrown violently to the left and rear. His body bounced off the car's seat and he fell leftward into his wife's lap. Witnesses on the right side of the car heard shots coming in from the knoll, over their heads and saw the President's head open up on the right side. There was briefly a halo of crimson liquid and fleshy matter around his head, which then fell swiftly to the left and rear. A police motorcycle rider to Kennedy's left rear and witnesses on the south side of Elm saw fragments of his skull and brain fly in their direction and land in the grass. It was in this area that a student found a large piece of bone the next day. It was identified as a piece of the occipital bone, a large bone located at the back of the human skull. The two policemen riding to the left rear of the limousine were splattered with blood and tissue.

Filming the whole scene was a Dallas clothing manufacturer, who was standing on a four-foot-high pedestal of concrete next to a pergola on the Grassy Knoll. He said the final shot came from behind him in the direction of a wooden stockade fence which lined the top of the Grassy Knoll. A soldier, who was filming the motorcade about 15 feet to the right rear of the clothing manufacturer, heard the blast from behind him and felt a bullet whiz past his left ear. He threw himself on the ground. He was kicked to his feet moments later by a man in a uniform who took the film from his camera. The soldier fled and his film has never been seen. The man who took his film may have been the same man captured in a photograph made by a woman standing on the south side of Elm. She took a snapshot at the exact moment of the fatal head shot. Recently, when a section of this picture was blown up, it revealed a man in a uniform firing a rifle from behind the stockade fence. A woman standing nearby also had been taking pictures. She filmed the entire assassination sequence from a vantage point which had both the depository and the Grassy Knoll in the background. Her film was taken the next day by men identifying themselves as FBI agents and was never seen again.

The grounds keeper for that area of the plaza was sitting on some steps halfway between the fence and the street. He saw the President struck in the right side of the head and then heard another shot which seemed to come from above and behind him.

A Dallas policeman along with about a dozen railroad workers were lining the top of the Triple Underpass to get a look at the President as he passed beneath them. They all heard the first burst of fire, but some thought the sound came from back up near Elm and Houston, while others believed it came from their left, the direction of the Grassy Knoll. But, at the final booms, there was no doubt in their minds. They unanimously said at least one shot came from behind the wooden fence atop the knoll. Several saw a puff of white smoke drifting out from under the trees covering the fence. Moments later, they ran to that location and found evidence that several people may have been waiting behind the fence. This was corroborated by a railroad supervisor stationed in a tower overlooking the railroad yards just north of the wooden fence. After watching some strange cars with radios and out-of-state license plates prowl the area prior to the arrival of the motorcade, the man saw several people, including a man in some sort of uniform, behind the fence and a flash of light at the time of the shooting.

One woman, standing on the south side of Elm, saw a man running westward behind the picket fence atop the knoll. This man, wearing a dark suit and carrying a rifle, was also seen by a Dallas man standing by Stemmons Freeway. Later, when the man tried to tell the FBI what he had seen, he was told to keep quiet "or you might get killed."

As the sound of the final shots died away, the scene in the plaza became unfrozen. Women screamed, some wept and shouted, "They've shot the President!". People threw themselves on the ground to escape the bullets, which to many seemed to be flying in every direction. The Secret Service agent managed to reach the rear of the presidential limousine and secure a handhold just as the big car finally began accelerating out of the plaza. Mrs. Kennedy crawled onto the trunk of the limousine and retrieved a piece of her husband's head. She was still clutching it in her hand while sitting outside the trauma room at Parkland Hospital. Sirens were blaring and engines racing as the motorcade moved through the plaza and up onto Stemmons Freeway for a frantic race to the hospital.

The assassination of John F. Kennedy was over. It had all happened in less than six seconds.

Both Dallas police and sheriff's deputies began racing up the incline of the Grassy Knoll, believing that the source of the shots. They were joined by dozens of bystanders, some of whom had heard shots in that direction and some who were just following the action. In the Texas School Book Depository, a motorcycle officer ran into the lobby and was joined by the building superintendent. Moving toward the stairway, the policeman saw a man calmly drinking a Coke in the building's lunchroom. The superintendent identified the man as an employee. His name was Lee Harvey Oswald. The policeman continued his race to the roof. Outside, it was a scene of panic and confusion. The depository was not sealed off by police for several more minutes, although some witnesses were already reporting that shots came from the building. Within 15 minutes of the shooting, Dallas police got a description of the gunman from unidentified man. They broadcast an alert for a "slender white male about 30, 5', 10", 165, carrying what looked to be a 30-30 or some type of Winchester." Oswald would not actually be missed at the depository until after his arrest about an hour later.

At the time of Oswald's arrest, he was carrying two different sets of identification - one in the name of Lee Harvey Oswald and one in the name of A.J. Hidell. The police asked him whether he was Oswald or Hidell and he told them, "You're the police, you find out." Yet, at this same time, when Dallas police were not even certain of the identity of the man in custody, FBI director J. Edgar Hoover was telephoning Attorney General Robert Kennedy in Washington, D.C.

An FBI memo released in 1977, Hoover wrote, "I called the attorney general at his home and told him I thought we had the man who killed the President down in Dallas." Hoover identified Lee Harvey Oswald as the assassin and described him as a "mean-minded individual...in the category of a nut." Hoover went on to give a detailed background on Oswald, including his attempted defection to Russia and his Fair Play for Cuba Committee activities. He also told Kennedy's brother that Oswald had "communist leanings".

By Saturday, Nov. 23, an extraordinary amount of material had suddenly become available about the suspect. Newspapers both in the Dallas area and across the nation were filled with stories about this "pro-communist," although the FBI and Secret Service were maintaining they had no interest in the man nor any idea he was in the area prior to the assassination. Oswald maintained a calm attitude. When paraded in front of newsmen, he wore a small, smug smile, which many interpreted as arrogance. It may have been due to the fact that Oswald knew himself to be innocent of the crime. In fact, when his famous statement, "No sir, I didn't shoot anybody...I'm just a patsy," was subjected to voice stress analysis many years later, it showed virtually no stress in his voice indicating he was telling what he believed to be the truth.

Quickly, the evidence against Oswald piled up. A rifle and empty cartridges were found on the sixth floor of the depository. He was charged with the murder of Dallas Policeman J.D. Tippit. Dallas authorities were proclaiming an open-and-shut case.

Then, on Sunday morning, Nov. 24, Oswald was killed by one shot from a pistol carried by nightclub owner Jack Ruby while being escorted through the basement of the Dallas police station handcuffed to two officers. Oswald had been silenced. Dallas police claimed that although he had been in custody for nearly three days, no recordings or stenographic notes had been made of his statements. Every word attributed to Oswald has come second hand from police or federal officials.

Almost from the time the shots died away in Dealey Plaza, a troubling pattern began to take shape. The "Stemmons Freeway" sign was taken away and the bullet in the grass disappeared. Suspicious men arrested in the plaza were released after Oswald's capture with no official record of names or alibis taken. Film was confiscated from more than one person and there was evidence of intimidation being used to coerce witnesses to conform to the official story. Vital evidence disappeared or was forgotten. Other evidence was altered or suddenly appeared. Numerous people who tried to tell authorities that Ruby and Oswald knew each other were told to forget it.

Amid criticism of the Dallas Police handling of the case, Texas Attorney General Waggoner Carr promised to create a state board of inquiry to find the truth of the assassination. However, five days after the assassination, the newly-installed President, Lyndon Baines Johnson, ordered the FBI to take control of the investigation. Consequently, all of the Dallas Police investigative files were turned over to the bureau. Asked how Carr could get the necessary evidence to hold a board of inquiry, Dallas Police Chief Jesse Curry said, "I guess they'll just have to go to the FBI."

Then on Nov. 30, President Johnson announced he was creating a "blue ribbon" commission headed by Chief Justice Earl Warren to investigate both the death of Kennedy and Oswald and "satisfy itself that the truth is known." Carr called off the Texas inquiry on Dec. 7, conceding that it had been superseded by the federal investigation. Also, some federal agencies, the FBI and the Secret Service, had already made it known that they might not agree to have their agents testify in Carr's probe. The creation of Johnson's hand-picked commission also effectively halted attempts to start congressional inquiries into the assassination.

On Sept. 24, 1964, the Warren Commission announced its findings. Commission members concluded that Lee Harvey Oswald was the sole assassin of President Kennedy and that "no credible evidence" of any type of conspiracy could be found. They concluded that Oswald, who had a terrible marksmanship record, had used a $12.78 Italian war-surplus military carbine to fire from the southeast corner of the Texas School Book Depository's sixth floor at a moving target almost 150 feet away and score two hits out of three shots within the space of 5.6 seconds. Furthermore, the commission concluded the first shot struck both Kennedy and Connally, causing seven separate wounds and hitting at least two bones (the culprit of this devastation is the untouched slug still available for viewing in the National Archives). The second shot missed the limousine and struck near the Triple Underpass, wounding James Tague with bits of concrete. The third shot tore open the right side of Kennedy's head and was lost as tiny fragments of the slug flew in all directions. These conclusions were direct, plausible-sounding and backed by some of the most prestigious men on the national scene. But, the fact remains that not one single person in Dealey Plaza saw the assassination happen the way the Warren Commission said it did.

In 1979, the House Select Committee on Assassinations reversed this picture of Kennedy's death by reporting that there probably was a conspiracy to kill the President and that at least one more gunman was involved in the shooting, but that this second assassin remains unidentified and probably missed his target anyway. After more than two decades, the questions still remain - who killed Kennedy and why? The following pages will try to answer these questions.

Crossfire: Acknowledgments

When a final "truth" concerning the assassination of President John F. Kennedy is accepted by the general population of the United States, it will have to be acknowledged that this truth came not from the Government, the legal profession or the news media - rather that truth will have come from the legion of individual citizens who have refused to accept superficial explanations. No one person will be credited with such a final "truth" because the names of the people who have fought to learn what really happened to President Kennedy - often at the risk of public ridicule and worse - have grown too numerous to enumerate. However, most researchers would include the names of Penn Jones Jr., Mark Lane, Vincent Salandria and Harold Weisberg as leaders of that first generation of critics who raised serious questions about the government's official lone-assassin theory. Special recognition will go to the two leading female researchers, the late Sylvia Meagher, whose incisive dissection of the Warren Commission Report set the standard for assassination research and Dallas' Mary Ferrell, that indefatigable collector of assassination lore.

Acknowledgment also will have to be given to Judge Jim Garrison - regardless of history's final judgment on his performance as district attorney - for the abundance of assassination information gleaned through his ill-fated investigations in New Orleans.

Others who have contributed greatly to the advancement of assassination knowledge - in no particular order - include Josiah Thompson, Col. Fletcher Prouty, George O'Toole, Gary Shaw, Larry Harris, Richard E. Sprague, Carl Oglesby, Mort Sahl, Seth Kantor, Edgar Tatro, Fred Newcomb, Greg Lowrey, Jack White, Gary Mack, Earl Golz, Anthony Summers, David Lifton, Bernard Fensterwald, William Turner, Gaeton Fonzi, Mark Allen, Jeff Goldberg, Dick Russell, Alan Weberman, Paul Hoch, Peter Dale Scott, Robert Sam Anson, Jerry Rose, Robert Groden and Harry Livingstone. Other names eventually will be added to this distinguished list.

Every citizen who gave of his time, effort and resources to study, assimilate and disseminate assassination information will someday come to be regarded as an object lesson on how the individual citizen can indeed make an impact on a system which has proven either unable or unwilling to police itself. And on that day, all of the assassination researchers will receive the public acknowledgment they so richly deserve.

Crossfire: Preface

Do not trust this book. In fact, when it comes to the assassination of President John F. Kennedy, don't trust any one source or even the basic evidence and testimony. In the case of the JFK assassination, belief and trust have long been part of the problem. One's view of the events in Dallas in 1963 has depended upon whom one chooses to believe.

Do you believe Government experts who state that a man reputed to be a bad shot could take a bolt-action rifle which wholesaled for $3 and twice hit a man in a moving car at more than 200 yards with three shots in less than six seconds? Do you believe a commission hand-picked by Kennedy's successor which concluded that Kennedy was killed by a lone assassin firing from a building behind him and who was, in turn, killed by yet another lone assassin? Or do you believe witnesses who saw a rifle fired at Kennedy's right front and films that show the rearward fall of the wounded President indicating just such a shot? For far too many years a majority of the American public chose to believe their federal Government, which assured them that Kennedy's death was the result of a tragic meeting between a powerful national leader and a warped solitary young man wanting to be somebody. Today many people believe differently. A poll taken by the "Washington Post" in 1983 showed more than 80 percent of the respondents expressed the belief that Kennedy died as the result of a high-level conspiracy. However, beliefs are neither facts nor knowledge.

This book is an effort to break through the massive amounts of obfuscation regarding this topic and bring to the public a basic overview of this tragic event. It is a distillation of the numerous books, articles and documentaries which have been produced over the years.

Already the assassination of President John F. Kennedy is recognized as a turning point in American history. Beginning on November 22, 1963, American attitudes slowly changed from post-World War II optimism and idealism to cynicism and mistrust of government. This loss of faith in government accelerated in the wake of the Vietnam War, the Watergate and the Iran-Contra scandals. A significant portion of this cynicism has been prompted by the wide difference between the official government version of the Kennedy assassination and the beliefs of a majority of Americans. Beginning only a week after the Dallas tragedy, national polls showed a majority of Americans disbelieved the official "lone assassin" theory of the assassination. By the late 1980s, that number had risen to nearly 90 percent of the population. Like the attack on Pearl Harbor, November 22, 1963, has been etched into the memory of every American who was of age on that day. In this Information Age, more than half the population alive today followed the events of that sad day through both broadcast and print media. Who could forget the shock of the early announcements from Dallas, the horror of the slaying of the chief suspect or the tears as "John John" Kennedy saluted his father's casket? To those today who were not yet born or of age in 1963, their knowledge of the assassination comes from history books - which for the most part are strangely silent about the details of the tragedy - stories from older people and other public sources.

No event in American history had caused such an abiding interest on the part of the general public. The assassination has spawned a legion of independent researchers - of all ages and classes - who study the bits of information seeking to determine what really happened to our 35th President.

Crossfire for the first time pulls together the massive amount of available facts and information concerning that tragic day in 1963. Until now, this material has been available only by carefully studying a wide range of books - many now out of print - and by researching periodicals on a continuing basis. Crossfire has been designed to provide an abundance of material in a concise and readable manner, so that both the mildly interested and serious researcher alike may get the overview necessary to detect and understand the broad outlines of the conspiracy behind the assassination. Long-standing controversies - such as mysterious men photographed in Dealey Plaza and the Oswald lookalike standing in the doorway of the Texas School Book Depository at the time of the shooting - are examined as well as new issues - such as the acoustical evidence indicating the existence of a second gunman and some brand-new questions concerning the 1981 exhumation of Lee Harvey Oswald. This book takes a close look at the events in Dealey Plaza through the eyes of the witnesses - including many overlooked by the government investigations and some new witnesses whose stories have never before been made public. As in any good homicide investigation, a list of suspects has been drawn up with information detailing their means, motives and opportunities. Crossfire provides detailed background information on the men and organizations considered most-likely to have been involved in a plot against the President. Also covered in Crossfire are the various attempts by governmental bodies to investigate and resolve what happened in Dallas. Attention is paid to the people behind these investigations, how they arrived at their conclusions, the reliability of the information made available to them and the possibility of misdirection and deceit.

As an award-winning Texas journalist with more than 25 years of news gathering experience in the Dallas-Fort Worth Metroplex, I have been in a unique situation to learn the true story of the assassination. I have talked with many people closely connected to the assassination, including Dallas area government and law enforcement officials and newsmen. I spent many hours with Marguerite Oswald (mother of the accused assassin) and with Jeanne DeMohrenschildt (she and her husband, George DeMohrenschildt, were close friends of Oswald). I have interviewed assassination witnesses such as James Tague, Jean Hill, Bill Newman and many others. I have talked with witnesses never questioned by the official investigations, such as Ed Hoffman, Gordon Arnold, Ester Mash and Madeline Brown. And I have kept in contact with serious researchers of the assassination, collecting and correlating their work. Most importantly, I lived through the assassination time in the Dallas area. As a college student, I met Jack Ruby while visiting his Carousel Club in September, 1963. In the fall of 1964, I conducted an in-depth interview with Major-General Edwin A. Walker. Within five years of the assassination, I was working as a professional reporter in the Dallas-Fort Worth Metroplex. As a native Texan who grew up in this area, I understand its people, history and politics. Yet, as a journalist, I have maintained a professional objectivity. I have had time to study the JFK assassination both as a working newspaperman and a researcher. Since 1976 I have taught a course on the JFK assassination at the University of Texas at Arlington. I have been told that I was the first person in the United States to offer a university-level course on the assassination. Through this course, many new leads have been developed - such as a witness to gunmen on the Grassy Knoll and the intimidation of Dallas witnesses by Warren Commission staff members and FBI. My public presentations of assassination material - including talks to Texas police and medical examiner organizations - have always been well received.

To truly understand what happened in Dallas in 1963, one must get an overview of the event. Any one particular issue can be rationalized away as coincidence or happenstance. Only by gaining a broad view of the assassination can one begin to detect the outlines of the conspiracy which resulted in the deaths of Kennedy, policeman J.D. Tippit and the accused assassin, Lee Harvey Oswald. Always keep in mind that the United States in 1963 was an entirely different time and place from today. The public had a blind faith in Government which seems hard to believe by today's cynical standards. The news media uncritically accepted official pronouncements - a far cry from today's adversary relationship with officialdom. And police work was done in an unsophisticated manner which would shock the highly-trained and educated officers of today. Also know that many people were untruthful in their testimony to investigators while others had their statements misrepresented by investigating officials - for reasons both benign and otherwise. Many people tried to distance themselves from the accused assassin. Some - either due to ignorance, a desire to be helpful or on orders - lied about critical evidence in the case. Even Government agencies were deathly afraid of rumors linking Oswald to their organizations. Not one single matter of fact in this case can be accepted uncritically. Evidence of deceit, misrepresentation and manipulation is too plain to be ignored.

What then is the truth? One truth has become painfully obvious in recent years - the federal Government has not told the truth about the assassination to the American people. It has been left up to students, historians and private researchers to continue to dig out critical information. The reason for this book is to provide this information to a wider audience. While mistakes undoubtedly have slipped by, every effort has been taken to present the best account of assassination issues in this book. Statements have been checked and double-checked; facts reviewed and reviewed again.

So, who is to be believed when it comes to the JFK assassination? No one - not this author, not the various assassination researchers and certainly not the Government officials who have already been proven in error about so many aspects of this case. Only by studying ALL of the relevant information about the assassination and then applying common sense can one come to an understanding of the truth of the JFK assassination.

Why seek the truth of Kennedy's death? The answer is simple. Unless we, as a nation, come to a truthful understanding of what happened to our chief elected official in 1963, we obviously cannot begin to correctly understand the events which are affecting us today.

I seek not only the killers of President Kennedy, I seek the persons who killed Camelot - who killed the confidence and faith of the American people in their government and institutions. I seek elementary justice - for both the accused assassin and for the United States of America.

Jim Marrs

Crossfire: Notes on Sources

In a work such as this, extensive footnoting often can impede the flow of content and thus reduce comprehension. There is a further problem in the case of the JFK assassination. Too often official Government reports do not accurately reflect the actual evidence or statements of witnesses. This situation complicates effective documentation. Therefore it was decided to substitute the usual detailed footnoting procedure for simple attribution, in the manner of news reporting. Any statements of a controversial nature or ones that contradict the official version of the assassination have been attributed to its source, whether an individual, official report or publication. For example, the phrase "He told the Warren Commission" indicates that the particular quote may be found in the Warren Commission Report or its attendant 26 volumes; "They told Sheriff's deputies" indicates information found in Dallas County Sheriff's reports; "She told this author" is information gleaned during a personal interview; and so forth. Information or quotes taken from a newspaper, periodical or book are attributed to such.

Sometimes accounts of witnesses represent a synthesis of their words from more than one source. Any statements without attribution indicates historical fact or issues which are undisputed among the majority of credible assassination researchers. For example, it is unnecessary to document Richard Nixon's crucial role in initiating the Bay of Pigs invasion since historians already have documented that role and Nixon himself has written about it. In the case of controversies - such as the identity of a man photographed standing in the doorway of the Texas School Book Depository - every effort has been made to present both sides of the issue through the statements of both officials and participants. However, it should be noted that just because a statement is attributed to some source does not make that statement true. People's accounts can reflect mistakes as well as lies due to fear or intimidation.

It is significant to point out that while all assassination work - including this book - must rely heavily on official Government reports and publications, such reports often can be called into question. Therefore the burden of separating fact from fiction must unfortunately fall on the reader. This sad fact necessitates access to the broadest amount of information, often going beyond official sources. This book represents information collected from a wide variety of publications - most of which are listed in the Selected Bibliography -, newspaper accounts and personal interviews. Every effort has been made to authenticate the statements in this work.

Crossfire: Dallas - The Stage is Set

"Don't let it be forgot
That once there was a spot
For one brief shining moment
That was known as Camelot"
Alan Jay Learner

PART I

"The Kill Zone"

DALLAS - THE STAGE IS SET

Although one of the youngest cities in Texas, Dallas has recorded a meteoric rise to greatness and prosperity. Beginning in the days before Texas became a state, Dallas has grown from a small way station for pioneers to a center of corporate business, insurance, banking and oil and gas. By 1963, Dallas already was the most influential city in the Lone Star State next to oil-rich Houston. However, Dallas also had a reputation for being the stronghold of arch conservatives, if not outright right-wing extremists. It is well known in Texas police circles that during the 1940s and 1950s - and stretching into the early 1960s - if a man wanted a job as a Dallas policeman, he needed to be a member of the Ku Klux Klan or, at least, the John Birch Society. The city police and other governmental offices were filled with members of the Klan, the John Birch Society and other conservative groups. But Dallas was instrumental in carrying Texas in a national election. So in 1963, it was included on a quick political trip by President John F. Kennedy.

Crossfire: The 35th President

John Fitzgerald Kennedy was the first U.S. President born in the 20th century. At age 43, Kennedy became one of the youngest Presidents and, at the time of his death at age 46, he lived a shorter life than any other President. His brief presidency - 1,026 days - stirred the emotions of nearly every American. Hardly anyone was neutral about Kennedy. They either loved him or hated him. Yet Kennedy seemed oblivious to the controversies surrounding him. Perhaps due to his wealthy background, he appeared more concerned with great historical issues such as civil rights, war and peace rather than the parochial matters of business and politics.

Kennedy was born on May 29, 1917, in Brookline, Massachusetts, an unpretentious middle-class suburb of Boston. He was the second oldest son of a family which began their American life with the immigration of Patrick Kennedy from Ireland in 1848. Both grandfathers were prominent Democratic Party ward bosses during the time when a group of Irish leaders ruled the local party. While he grew to manhood, his father, Joseph P. Kennedy, amassed a considerable fortune. By age 25, Joe Kennedy had gained control of a bank in East Boston. By adroit investments in real estate, the stock market and the film industry - and perhaps some bootlegging money (See MOBSTERS) he built an empire worth an estimated $250 million.

Jack, as the future President was called, attended only the best schools, beginning with the Choate School in Connecticut, where he won an award for best combining sports and scholastics. While he graduated near the bottom of his class, he nevertheless was selected as the man "most likely to succeed." A bout with jaundice forced him to drop out of college, but upon recovery, he joined his older brother, Joseph Kennedy Jr., at Harvard. Maintaining only a "C" average, Kennedy concentrated on sports, particularly football.

A somewhat sickly child, Kennedy had continuing bouts with illness compounded by a football injury which aggravated an already-weakened spinal column. For the rest of his life, Kennedy suffered recurring back problems. In an effort to recuperate, Kennedy left school during his junior year to travel in Europe, where his father had been appointed U.S. Ambassador to Great Britain after generous contributions to Franklin Roosevelt's election campaign. After war broke out, Ambassador Kennedy was forced to resign because of his undisguised admiration for Germany's Nazi regime. As a result of this trip and the contact he made with major British political figures, young Kennedy returned to write a senior thesis about England's complacent attitudes just before World War II. This thesis was well received at Harvard and later was rewritten to become the best-selling book, "Why England Slept". He began to show interest in a writing career, but was interrupted by joining the U.S. Navy two months before the December 7, 1941 attack on Pearl Harbor by Japan.

Early in the war, Kennedy served as an intelligence officer in Washington, but was transferred to the South Pacific after J. Edgar Hoover told his father about young Kennedy's love affair with a suspected Nazi agent (See G MEN). In the summer of 1943, Kennedy was in command of a Navy patrol boat, the PT-109. During a patrol in the Solomon Islands, the PT-109 was struck and broken in half by a Japanese destroyer, the only such incident during the war. Although some negligence appeared to be involved, Kennedy went on to become a hero after saving the life of one of his men and helping to arrange their rescue. He pulled his wounded chief engineer, Patrick McMahon, to a nearby island by swimming for four hours with the man on his back held in place by gripping a strap of the man's life jacket between his teeth. Later, Kennedy arranged for local natives to alert Navy officials of the group's location in enemy-held territory. Soon they were all rescued. The story hit the front page of the New York Times and Kennedy's name became well known in Boston.

While recovering from his ordeal, Kennedy learned that his older brother had been killed while flying a secret mission over Europe. The political aspirations of his father now fell on Jack Kennedy. After the war, a reluctant Kennedy ran for and won a House Seat from Massachusetts. In later years, Joe Kennedy was quoted as saying:

"I told him Joe was dead and it was his responsibility to run for Congress. He didn't want to. But I told him he had to."

With the Kennedy name and Kennedy money behind him, Kennedy easily won two more elections to Congress. Then, in 1952, he defeated Henry Cabot Lodge to become junior senator from Massachusetts. In 1954, his back condition forced him to use crutches and Kennedy underwent dangerous and painful back surgery. While recuperating, he wrote "Profiles of Courage," a book detailing how past senators had defied public opinion. This book, actually written by associates such as Theodore Sorensen, helped identify Kennedy with political courage in the minds of voters. It was during this bedridden convalescence that Kennedy was conveniently absent during the stormy Senate debates on Joseph McCarthy's censure. In fact, Kennedy refused to take sides on the issue.

Despite an uninspiring senatorial career, by 1956, Kennedy's name was brought up as a possible running mate for Democratic Presidential hopeful Adlai Stevenson. Although edged out as vice presidential candidate by Estes Kefauver, a graceful concession speech caused Kennedy's political stock to rise to new heights. With an eye toward the 1960 election, Kennedy and his supporters went all out to ensure an impressive victory in his 1958 senate re-election campaign in Massachusetts. Indeed, he won by the largest margin in the state's history. By 1960, Kennedy was ready for the Democratic presidential nomination, but there were hurdles to overcome. One of these was the fact he was a Catholic and no Catholic had ever been elected President. He overcame this problem by entering - and winning - a series of state primary elections. In West Virginia, with 95 percent Protestant voters, Kennedy beat Senator Hubert Humphrey handily, thanks, according to FBI reports, to large organized crime donations made through Frank Sinatra.

Entering the Democratic National Convention in Los Angeles, Kennedy was challenged only by conservative Texas Senator Lyndon B. Johnson. Despite a late "draft Adlai Stevenson" movement, Kennedy won on the first ballot by 806 votes to Johnson's 409. The pragmatic Kennedy immediately knew that conservative Democrats were needed to win against Republican Richard Nixon, so he forged a temporary coalition by selecting the defeated Johnson as his vice presidential running mate, despite objections from labor and liberals. There was no thought of Johnson's qualifications as President should anything happen to Kennedy. It was sheer spur-of-the-moment political tactics. In his acceptance speech, Kennedy set the tone for his campaign and his Presidency:

"...we stand today on the edge of a new frontier - the frontier of the 1960s...Beyond that frontier are uncharted areas of science and space, unsolved problems of peace and war, unconquered pockets of ignorance and prejudice, unanswered questions of poverty and surplus. It would be easier to shrink back from that frontier, to look to the safe mediocrity of the past...But I believe the times demand invention, innovation, imagination, decision. I am asking each of you to be new pioneers on that new frontier."

Nixon, and his running mate Henry Cabot Lodge (whom Kennedy had defeated in the 1952 Massachusetts senate race), tried to raise the issue of experience during the ensuing 1960 election campaign. "Experience Counts" was their slogan, despite the fact that both Nixon and Kennedy had been elected Congress in 1946 and that Nixon was only four years older than JFK. The slogan mostly was to call attention to Nixon's role as vice president to the popular Ike Eisenhower. Again the issue of Kennedy's Catholicism came up. Fundamentalist preachers regaled their congregations with the specter of a Vatican-dominated White House. The issue prompted Kennedy to tell a meeting of Protestant ministers in Houston:

"Because I am a Catholic and no Catholic has ever been elected President, it is apparently necessary for me to state once again - not what kind of church I believe in, for that should be important only to me, but what kind of America I believe in. I believe in an America where separation of church and state is absolute - where no Catholic prelate would tell the President (should he be a Catholic) how to act and no Protestant minister would tell his parishioners for whom to vote."

Perhaps the real turning point in the 1960 election came in September when Kennedy and Nixon met in the first televised debates in American history. The four debates were viewed by nearly half the population of the nation and no one denies that Kennedy emerged the victor - although radio listeners judged Nixon the winner. It was all TV show business, the forerunner of the slickly-marketed candidates of today. It was all image - Kennedy with a good make-up job appeared robust and confident of himself while Nixon, suffering from little make-up and five-o'clock shadow, appeared uneasy and unsure of himself. The image differences aside, there was very little difference in the positions of the two candidates on most issues.

Ironically, when Kennedy called for support of the Cuban exiles in their attempts to regain Cuba from Castro, it was the very program which Nixon had been pushing for many months. However, Nixon felt compelled to attack Kennedy's suggestions as irresponsible since "the covert operation (the Bay of Pigs Invasion) had to be protected at all costs" and, thus, Nixon came out opposing his own plan. (See CUBANS)

On Election Day, Kennedy won, but by one of the slimmest margins in American history. He polled 34,227,096 votes to Nixon's 34,108,546 - a margin of 49.9 percent to 49.6 percent. Affluent whites, college graduates, women, Protestants, farmers, senior citizens, business and professional people mostly voted against this eastern liberal.

On January 20, 1961, standing coatless in bristling 20-degree temperature in Washington, Kennedy took the oath of office from Chief Justice Earl Warren (who would later head the commission looking into his death) and announced:

"The torch has been passed to a new generation of Americans..."

Later in his speech, he issued his famous challenge:

"Ask not what your country can do for you, but what you can do for your country."

His original text carried the word "will", but Kennedy had marked it out and substituted "can".

Oddly enough, Kennedy's highest ratings in the polls came just after the disastrous Bay of Pigs Invasion as Americans rallied to their President. About 82 percent of those polled expressed approval of his handling of the situation, which prompted Kennedy to remark:

"My God, it's as bad as Eisenhower. The worse I do, the more popular I get."

By the fall of 1963, polls showed Kennedy's popularity had dropped to 59 percent, largely due to his stand on civil rights. However, his desire to negotiate with the communist world, his attack on the tax havens of the wealthy corporations and his attempts to regain civilian control over the Pentagon and its intelligence agencies also engendered hatred and fear among the most powerful cliques of this country.

"Newsweek" magazine reported that no Democrat in the White House had ever been so disliked in the South. A theater marquee in Georgia advertised the movie "PT-109" with these words on its marquee:

"See how the Japs almost got Kennedy."

Kennedy supporters were looking toward the 1964 election, hoping for a mandate which would give Kennedy's ambitious programs much needed popular support. It never happened. In the fall of 1963, he went to Texas.

###

Crossfire: The Fateful Journey to Texas

Kennedy had carried Texas by the slimmest of margins in 1960, largely through the efforts of Lyndon Johnson. He needed the state badly in 1964, particularly if his hopes of achieving a large mandate were to be realized. According to Texas Governor John Connally, Kennedy first talked of coming to Texas in the summer of 1962. He again mentioned it in the summer of 1963. According to former Senator Ralph Yarborough, he was contacted by Kennedy aides in mid-1963 and was asked what could be done to help the President's image in Texas. Yarborough told this author:

"I told them the best thing he could do was to bring Jackie to Texas and let all those women see her. And that's what he did, although I thought it was premature. I didn't think he was going to do that until 1964."

So, in an effort to enhance his image and to raise money, Kennedy, along with his wife, made the fateful journey to Texas in November 1963. On November 21, they visited Houston and San Antonio, both cities with heavy defense and space industries. There, Kennedy came out strongly for defense and NASA expenditures. The crowds loved it. That evening, he flew to Fort Worth, landing at Carswell Air Force Base and driving to the historic Hotel Texas for the night. In his hotel suite, original paintings by Van Gogh and Monet had been hung on the walls in an effort to impress the Kennedys with Texas culture.

The morning of November 22, Kennedy spoke at a breakfast in the hotel sponsored by the Fort Worth Chamber of Commerce. Beforehand, more than 1,000 persons crowded in front of the hotel stood in light drizzling rain to hear Kennedy make brief remarks. As the presidential party prepared to leave the hotel, Vice President Lyndon Johnson arrived to introduce his sister, Lucia Alexander, to Kennedy. Reflecting on the surprisingly warm welcome he had received in Texas, Johnson later was to recall Kennedy as saying:

"We're going to carry two states next year if we don't carry any others: Massachusetts and Texas."

Johnson wrote in "The Vantage Point" that these were the last words spoken to him by Kennedy. As the rain clouds were breaking up, Kennedy drove back to Carswell for the 15-minute flight to Dallas. Fort Worth and Dallas are so close that even before reaching its full climb, Air Force One began its descent to Dallas. Looking out the plane's window, Kennedy commented to Governor Connally:

"Our luck is holding. It looks as if we'll get sunshine."

When Air Force One landed at Love Field, the sky had cleared and a bright sun brought Indian Summer weather to North Central Texas. By the noon hour, many people were in their shirtsleeves. The occasional cool breeze from the north was welcomed by Texans weary of the interminable summer heat which often lasts well into the fall. It was the sort of day that stirs the blood, causing people to seek action outdoors, whether it is working in yard or attending the local football game. This day there was another reason for wanting to get outside. The President was coming to town. The local media had been full of the news for days.

"The Dallas Morning News" carried headlines that morning reading, "Love Field Braces for Thousands" and "Detailed Security Net Spread for Kennedy". That morning's edition had even run a small map of the President's motorcade route which would take him from Love Field to the new modern Trade Mart. However this map only indicated the motorcade would travel west on Main Street through the downtown area, through the well-known Triple Underpass and on to Stemmons Freeway and the Trade Mart, where President John F. Kennedy was scheduled to attend a 12:30 p.m. luncheon. It was the city's other daily paper, the "Dallas Times Herald", which had given a more detailed description of the route. In a story published the previous Tuesday headlined "Yarborough Gets JFK Table Spot," it told how liberal Senator Ralph Yarborough had been invited to sit with Kennedy at the head table during Friday's luncheon. It also mentioned that the motorcade would "pass through downtown on Harwood then west on Main, turning back to Elm at Houston and then out Stemmons Freeway to the Trade Mart." This was one of the only newspaper mentions of a zig-zag in the motorcade route, which would violate Secret Service procedures and place the President in a small park area surrounded by tall buildings on one side and shrubs and trees on the other. The motorcade had been scheduled to pass through the downtown business section during the noon hour so office workers could watch the parade during lunch. This strategy worked well. Literally thousands of Dallasites turned out in the balmy 68-degree weather for a view of Kennedy, already acknowledged as one of this nation's most controversial presidents.

For his part, Kennedy really had no choice but to visit the Lone Star State. With the 1964 election year coming up, everyone - even his enemies - agreed he appeared to be unbeatable. However, a few states were still critical for Kennedy to acquire the broad mandate he was seeking. Texas was one of them. And Texas politics were in disarray. The Democratic Party, dominant in the state since Reconstruction, was split between conservatives, headed by Vice President Lyndon B. Johnson and Governor John B. Connally, and a small but noisy group of liberals, led by Senator Ralph Yarborough. To make matters worse, the Democratic Party had been aghast the previous year when a Republican, former school teacher and radio disc jockey John Tower, had been elected to fill Johnson's Senate seat. Tower was the first Republican to win a Texas Senate seat since Reconstruction following the Civil War. The Democratic rift was serious. Yarborough and Connally were hardly speaking to each other. And Texas conservatives were highly vocal against Kennedy's policies toward Cuba, civil rights, a nuclear test ban with Russia, not to mention Kennedy's plan to rescind the 27-1/2 percent oil depletion allowance, a mainstay of Texas oil wealth. Unity was needed badly as the 1964 election year approached. And a presidential visit to Texas seemed just the remedy.

Houston was the oil capital of the state while Fort Worth and San Antonio were big defense industry centers. It would be easy to tell those folks what they wanted to hear. Dallas was a problem. No visit to Texas could ignore Dallas, yet the city had earned a reputation for being both politically conservative and intolerant of any deviation from that position. A month earlier, U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations Adlai Stevenson had been pushed, spat upon and hit in the head with a picket sign while visiting in Dallas. Just the previous Tuesday, cashiered Army Maj. Gen. Edwin A. Walker had made the news by shoving a TV cameraman during a Dallas speech by Alabama Governor George Wallace. Stevenson, along with others close to Kennedy, warned the young President not to journey to Dallas. But Kennedy's Irish blood had never permitted him to back away from a challenge, especially in the political arena.

In early June plans for a trip to Texas were finalized during a meeting between Kennedy, Connally and Johnson in El Paso. In October, a motorcade was added to the plans. On November 22, the apprehension of the Kennedy entourage about the trip was still evident, especially in light of a full-page newspaper ad which ran that morning in the "Dallas Morning News" suggesting the President was soft on communism and guilty of traitorous activities. A leaflet handed out to some of the people lining the motorcade route was not as subtle as the newspaper ad. It pictured Kennedy under a headline reading "Wanted For Treason". Yet after landing at Love Field about 11:45 a.m., the Kennedy entourage found the Dallas crowds large, enthusiastic and friendly. With horns honking, radios blaring and the shouts and cheers of the crowd ringing off the sides of the office buildings, the scene was chaotic despite what had been hailed as one of the tightest security efforts in recent memory. As the motorcade swept toward the central business district, it reached speeds of almost 30 miles per hour. But once downtown, the crowds became larger, often spilling out into the street and the pace slowed considerably. The motorcade was the center of attention.

Crossfire: The Motorcade

"...we might have ridden into an ambush."

Kennedy Aide David Powers

DEALEY PLAZA - NOVEMBER 22, 1963

THE MOTORCADE

Leading the presidential motorcade on November 22, 1963 was an enclosed sedan driven by Dallas Police Chief Jesse Curry. Sitting to Curry's right was Secret Service advance man Winston G. Lawson. In the back seat, behind Curry, sat Dallas County Sheriff J.E. "Bill" Decker and, to his right was Secret Service special agent-in-charge Forrest Sorrels. More than two car lengths behind this car was the presidential limousine, a specially-made long blue Lincoln Continental convertible sedan designated Secret Service Car No. 100-X. Driving the limousine was Secret Service Agent William Greer, the oldest man in the White House detail (See G MEN). Next to Greer sat Roy Kellerman, assistant special agent in charge of the Secret Service White House detail. In the center of the car in fold-down jump seats were Governor Connally, on the right, and Mrs. Connally. In the rear, on a padded seat which could be raised or lowered mechanically sat Kennedy with Mrs. Kennedy on his left. Behind the limousine about a full car length was a follow-up car for Kennedy security guards, a 1956 Cadillac convertible touring sedan specially equipped for the Secret Service and designated "SS Car No. 679-X". Following this security car was a 1964 Lincoln four-door convertible carrying Vice President Lyndon Johnson, Mrs. Johnson, and Senator Ralph Yarborough. The driver was Texas state trooper Hurchel Jacks and Secret Service Agent Rufus W. Youngblood rode to the right of him. Their car was trailed by Johnson's Secret Service guards and the rest of the motorcade, consisting of five cars for local dignitaries, three cars for press photographers, one bus for White House staff and two press buses.

A pilot car which preceded the motorcade by a quarter of a mile checking for "motor vehicle accidents, fires and obstructions along the route," contained Dallas Deputy Police Chief G.L. Lumpkin, two Dallas homicide detectives and Lt. Col. George Whitmayer, commander of the local Army Intelligence reserve unit. Oddly, while a press pool station wagon had been designated to follow Kennedy's Secret Service follow-up car (it had the number "5" taped on its side), for some unexplained reason it was shoved farther back in the motorcade. This prevented the media photographers from witnessing the assassination or capturing it on film. No one, then or now, has explained why this media car was out of position.

Everyone in the presidential limousine appeared to be enjoying the open-air ride and the cheering admiration of the crowd, although Mrs. Kennedy was beginning to feel warm in her pink wool suit and pillbox hat. As the motorcade cruised into the downtown area, apprehensions of the Dallas visit seemed to dissipate as quickly as the morning's overcast. Bob Hollingsworth, veteran Washington correspondent for the "Times Herald" had accompanied the Washington press corps to Dallas. He noted:

"On into Harwood and then into Main the motorcade traveled and the amazement over the size of the crowd turned to awe. For those of us who had been with the President since he left the White House for Texas Thursday morning, this was the largest, the most enthusiastic and the best reception he had received in Texas."

The awe of the news reporters was reflected in the silence which prevailed within the long, dark-blue Lincoln Continental limousine of the President. Few words were spoken by the car's occupants as they basked in the tumultuous shouts and cheers of the dense crowd packed along Main Street. Up ahead clear blue sky could be seen as the Presidential car began entering a small triangular-shaped plaza at the end of the long, dark corridor of tall buildings.

The motorcade broke into the open space of Dealey Plaza, named after George Bannerman Dealey, a pioneer Dallas civic leader and founder of the "Dallas Morning News". The 3.07-acre plaza, the site of the first home in Dallas as well as the first courthouse, post office, store, fraternal lodge and hotel, has been called the "Birthplace of Dallas". It was acquired by the city for the construction of the Triple Underpass which allows railroad traffic to pass over Commerce, Main and Elm Streets. The property was christened "Dealey Plaza" in 1935 and placed under the authority of the city's Park Board in 1936 with the official opening of the underpass. Both incoming and outgoing traffic between downtown Dallas and the major freeway systems to the west is channeled through Dealey Plaza. It is bounded on the east by Houston Street. Facing onto Houston are the new County Court House (still under construction that day), the historic old County Court House, the Criminal Courts Building containing the County Jail and the Sheriff's Office, the Dallas County Records Building and the Dal-Tex office building. Just west of the Dal-Tex building, across Houston, is the red-brick building which in 1963 contained the Texas School Book Depository and publishers' offices. Bisecting Dealey Plaza is Main Street, with Commerce Street branching off to the south and Elm Street curving in on the north. These three main arteries converge on the west side of the plaza at the railroad bridge known as the Triple Underpass. Facing Houston Street on the west are fountains and monuments to Dealey. On the north and south sides of the plaza are two small arbors or pergolas, flanked on the east by a line of trees and shrubs and on the west by a wooden stockade fence about five feet high.

With a phalanx of Dallas police motorcycle officers clearing the way ahead, the big limousine carrying the Kennedys made a 90-degree turn from Main onto Houston in front of the Dallas County Sheriff's Office. Almost two dozen deputies and other lawmen stood on the sidewalk watching. All had been ordered not to take part in motorcade security. The bright sun began warming the car's occupants as they approached the Texas School Book Depository. Atop the building was a large Hertz Rent-A-Car sign containing a digital time and temperature display. In front of the Depository, the limousine slowed to a crawl to make a 120-degree turn onto Elm Street, although turns of more than 90-degrees were prohibited by the Secret Service. The turn was so tight that Greer almost ran the limousine up onto the north curb near the depository's front door, according to Depository Superintendent Roy Truly. The car continued a slow glide down the incline of Elm into Dealey Plaza, maintaining its position in the center lane of the three-lane street. The crowds thinned out as the Triple Underpass approached and security men began to relax.

About three car lengths ahead of the presidential limousine in the lead car, Agent Lawson, a former Army counterintelligence man now with the Secret Service White House detail, was sitting in the right front seat. He looked at his watch. It was 12:30 p.m. Picking up the car's microphone, he radioed the Trade Mart saying:

"We'll be there in about five minutes."

In the presidential limousine, Kennedy was waving to his right at a group of people standing near a sign reading "Stemmons Freeway". His right arm and hand were slightly over the side of the car. Mrs. Kennedy had been waving to her left, but her thoughts were on the Texas heat. Mrs. Kennedy later told the Warren Commission:

"And in the motorcade, you know, I usually would be waving mostly to the left side and he was waving mostly to the right, which is one reason you are not looking at each other very much. And it was terribly hot. Just blinding all of us."

Sensing her discomfort, Mrs. Connally turned and said:

"We'll soon be there."

Mrs. Kennedy recalled seeing the Triple Underpass ahead:

"We could see a tunnel in front of us. Everything was really slow then. And I remember thinking it would be so cool under that tunnel."

Mrs. Connally had been wanting to mention the warm and enthusiastic welcome for some time, but she had held back. Now she could contain herself no longer. Turning to Kennedy, she said:

"Mr. President, you can't say that Dallas doesn't love you."

According to Mrs. Kennedy, the President smiled and replied:

"No, you certainly can't."

Soon after his remark, Mrs. Connally heard a frightening noise off to her right. She looked in that direction and caught a glimpse of Kennedy raising both hands to his neck in her peripheral vision. She heard no sound from the President, but noticed a blank, "nothing" expression on his face.

Kellerman, sitting directly in front of Connally and Kennedy, noticed they had just passed a highway sign when he heard a "pop" to his right and immediately looked in that direction, surveying the easternmost slope of the Grassy Knoll. Kellerman told the Warren Commission:

"...as I turned my head to the right to view whatever it was...I heard a voice from the back seat and I firmly believe it was the President's (saying) "My God, I am hit," and I turned around and he has got his hands up here like this (indicating both hands up near the head)...(It) was enough for me to verify that the man was hit. So, in the same motion I come right back and grabbed the speaker and said to the driver, "Let's get out of here; we're hit," and grabbed the mike and I said, "Lawson, this is Kellerman...we are hit; get us to the hospital immediately." Now in the seconds that I talked just now, a flurry of shells come into the car..."

Mrs. Connally testified she heard Kellerman say:

"Pull out of the motorcade. Take us to the nearest hospital."

The limousine indeed pulled out of the motorcade and raced to Parkland Hospital. Driver Greer said he was busy looking ahead to the railroad overpass when he heard a noise he thought was a motorcycle backfire. Then he heard the noise again and caught a glimpse of Connally starting to slump over. He then heard two more noises which seemed to come one on top of the other. Greer said after the second noise and a glance over his right shoulder at Connally, he stepped on the accelerator. However, a film taken that day shows the limousine brake lights remained on until after the fatal head shot to Kennedy.

Mrs. Connally recalled that after the first sound "very soon there was the second shot which hit John (Connally)." Connally, in testimony consistent both with that of Mrs. Connally and with films made that day, confirmed he was not hit by the first shot. The governor said just after making the turn onto Elm he heard a noise he took to be a shot from a high-powered rifle. He turned to his right because the sound appeared to come from over his right shoulder, but he couldn't see anything. He began to turn to his left when he felt something strike him in the back. Although critically wounded, Connally was conscious of shots being fired other than the one which struck him. Realizing that he had been hit a second or so after hearing a shot, Connally told the Warren Commission:

"...there were either two or three people involved or more in this or someone was shooting with an automatic rifle."

Connally then heard a final boom and heard the bullet hit home. He later recalled:

"...it never entered my mind that it ever hit anyone but the President...He never uttered a sound that I heard."

Connally noticed blue brain tissue covering his suit and knew Kennedy was dead. He also noticed blood on the front of his shirt and realized he was hurt badly, perhaps fatally. Crumpling into the arms of his wife, Connally screamed out:

"My God, they're going to kill us all!"

Connally heard his wife saying over and over, "Be still, you're going to be all right," and he felt the car accelerate. He then lost consciousness.

During the initial phase of the shooting, Mrs. Kennedy did not realize what was happening. She was accustomed to the sounds of motorcycle escorts backfiring and the motorcade had been a cacophony of sirens, racing motors, cheering and shouting. She did hear Connally shout, "Oh, no, no, no!" She heard "terrible noises" to her right and turned to see Kennedy with his hand at his throat and a "quizzical look on his face". Then, the chief executive was struck in the head and fell into her lap. All she could do was cradle him and say:

"Oh, my God, they've shot my husband...I love you, Jack."

Over the years a great deal of misinformation has been presented about her next actions. Many persons have stated she tried to climb out of the car in panic or to help Secret Service Agent Hill. Actually, she crawled onto the trunk of the limousine and reaching out, picked up a piece of her husband's head. Mrs. Kennedy, when talking to the Warren Commission on June 5, 1964, did not even recall this activity. But her action was captured in the films taken that day and later, sitting in Parkland Hospital, she still had the piece of skull clutched in her hand, according to a nurse who relieved her of the gruesome fragment.

Also, there is the testimony of Clint Hill, who told the Warren Commission:

"Between the time I originally grabbed the handhold and until I was up on the car, Mrs. Kennedy - the second noise that I heard had removed a portion of the President's head, and he slumped noticeably to his left. Mrs. Kennedy had jumped up from the seat and was, it appeared to me, reaching for something coming off the right rear bumper of the car, the right rear tail, when she noticed that I was trying to climb on the car."

In the lead car, which was just about to enter the Triple Underpass when the firing began, Agent Lawson was trying to signal a policeman standing with a group of people on top of the underpass. He didn't like the idea of the President's car passing directly below these people, so he was trying to get the officer to move them to one side. The policeman never noticed him. Just then, Lawson heard a loud report to his rear. It sounded more like a bang instead of a crack and Lawson didn't think it was a rifle shot. His first impression was that it was a firecracker. This description was to be repeated by nearly everyone in Dealey Plaza, with some notable exceptions.

Forrest V. Sorrels, head of the Dallas office of the Secret Service, like Connally was certain the first sound was a gunshot. After a brief pause, Sorrels heard two more shots coming within close together. He shouted to Curry:

"Let's get out of here!"

On hearing the first burst of firing, Sheriff Decker glanced back and thought he saw a bullet bouncing off the street pavement. Another Dallas motorcycle officer, Starvis Ellis, in 1978 told the House Select Committee on Assassination that as he rode alongside the car in which Decker was riding he too saw a bullet hit the pavement. Neither Decker nor Ellis were ever questioned about this by the Warren Commission.

Curry saw a "commotion" in the presidential limousine. Then a motorcycle officer drew up alongside. "Anybody hurt?" asked Curry.

"Yes," replied the officer.

Stepping on the accelerator, Curry shouted:

"Lead us to the hospital."

Both Decker and Curry took the car's radio and ordered their men to rush to the top of the underpass and the railroad yards where they felt like the shots had come from.

Like the crowd of witnesses in the Dealey Plaza, those persons deep into the plaza believed shots were fired from the Grassy Knoll, while those further back in the motorcade - still on Houston and Main streets - believed shots came from the direction of the Depository.

Motorcycle Policeman Marrion L. Baker was riding near one of the press cars. He had just turned on to Houston and his cycle was about to tip over because of a gust of wind and the slow speed. He had just returned from deer hunting trip and recognized the first sound as a high-powered rifle shot. He thought the sound came from either the Depository or the Dal-Tex building.

Seeing pigeons fluttering off the Depository's roof, he gunned his motor and roared up to the entrance of the building. Within seconds, he and Depository Superintendent Roy Truly would encounter Lee Harvey Oswald calmly standing in the second-floor lunchroom of the Depository.

Secret Service Agent Paul Landis was riding in the right rear of the Secret Service follow-up car when he heard the report of a high-powered rifle. He saw Kennedy turn to look in the direction of the shot, which Landis believed came from "...somewhere towards the front, right-hand side of the road." With Landis was Secret Service Agent Glen Bennett, who thought the sound was a firecracker. But then he looked at the President. In notes he said were made later that day, Bennett wrote:

"(I) saw a shot that hit the Boss about four inches down from the right shoulder; a second shoot (sic) followed immediately and hit the right rear high (side?) of the Boss's head."

The Secret Service agents assigned to Kennedy all acted with remarkable sluggishness when the firing began. Perhaps it was due to the visit they had paid to a "beatnik" nightspot in Fort Worth, where they stayed until early that morning. The club, "The Cellar," was owned by an acquaintance of Jack Ruby who had connections with both big-time gamblers and police officials (See G MEN and REDNECKS AND OILMEN).

The only agent to react with speed was Clint Hill. Hill had not been scheduled to make the Dallas trip, but came only after Mrs. Kennedy made a personal request. Hill also thought the initial sound was a firecracker and began looking to his right for the source of the sound when he saw Kennedy grab at himself and lurch forward slightly. He then realized something was wrong and jumped off the follow-up car. He was racing the few feet to the limousine when he heard more shots. Hill had just secured a grip on a handhold when the car began accelerating. Looking into the back seat of the limousine, Hill saw the right rear portion of the President's head was missing.

Nearly everyone present recalled a pause of several seconds between the first burst of fire and the final two shots, these coming rapidly one after another. It was the third and final shot, or volley of shots, which killed President John F. Kennedy. Until then, he had been immobile and quiet, only sagging slightly to his left. Then his head pitched forward violently for a split second only to be pushed hard to the left and rear. A halo of crimson liquid and tissue surrounded his head momentarily and then fell to the rear. The head shot lifted him slightly then threw him against the car's back seat. He bounced forward and over into his wife's lap.

The two Dallas motorcycle officers riding to the left rear of the limousine, Bobby W. Hargis and B.J. Martin, were splattered by blood and brain matter. Martin, who had looked to his right after the first shots, later found blood stains on the left side of his helmet. Hargis, who was riding nearest the limousine about six to eight feet from the left rear fender, saw Kennedy's head explode and was hit by bits of flesh and bone with such impact that he told reporters he thought he had been shot.

Presidential assistant David Powers was riding with Secret Service agents in the car directly behind the President. From this vantage point, he described the entire assassination:

"...I commented to Ken O'Donnell that it was 12:30 and we would only be about five minutes late when we arrived at the Trade Mart. Shortly thereafter the first shot went off and it sounded to me as if it were a firecracker. I noticed then that the President moved quite far to his left after the shot from the extreme right-hand side where he had been sitting. There was a second shot and Governor Connally disappeared from sight and then there was a third shot which took off the top of the President's head and had the sickening sound of a grapefruit splattering against the side of a wall. The total time between the first and third shots was about five or six seconds. My first impression was that the shots came from the right and overhead but I also had a fleeting impression that the noise appeared to come from the front in the area of the Triple Underpass. This may have resulted from my feeling, when I looked forward toward the overpass, that we might have ridden into an ambush."

Several persons in the motorcade smelled gunpowder as the cars swept through the lower end of Dealey Plaza.

Mrs. Earle Cabell, wife of the Dallas mayor, was riding in an open convertible six cars back from the motorcade's lead car. At the opening shots, the car in which she was riding was passing the Depository building. She told the Warren Commission she jerked her head up on hearing the first shot because "I heard the direction from which the shot came..."

Looking up, she saw an object projecting from one of the top windows of the depository building. She said:

"...I jerked my head up and I saw something in that window and I turned around to say to Earle, "Earle, it is a shot," and before I got the words out...the second two shots rang out....I was acutely aware of the odor of gunpowder. I was aware that the motorcade stopped dead still. There was no question about that."

Mrs. Cabell was riding beside Congressman Ray Roberts. She said he acknowledged smelling gunpowder too.

Former Senator Ralph Yarborough also smelled gunpowder as the car carrying him and Lyndon Johnson drove through the plaza. Yarborough, a former Army infantry officer and an avid hunter, also failed to recognize the sound of the first shot. He told this author:

"I thought, "Was that a bomb thrown?" and then the other shots were fired. And the motorcade, which had slowed to a stop, took off. A second or two later, I smelled gunpowder. I always thought that was strange because, being familiar with firearms, I never could see how I could smell the powder from a rifle high in that building."

It does seem strange that people would smell powder from a shot fired more than 60 feet in the air and behind them. However, it's not so strange, if a shot were fired on top of the Grassy Knoll, less than 12 feet in elevation with a breeze from the north to carry smoke to street level.

One of the strangest omissions in the subsequent investigation by federal authorities concerns a Navy commander who was assigned to film President Kennedy. White House photographer Thomas Atkins was riding six cars behind Kennedy and filmed the motorcade as it moved through Dealey Plaza. In a 1977 article, Atkin's film was described as "terribly damaging to the Warren Commission finding that Lee Harvey Oswald was the lone assassin." Perhaps this explains why neither Atkin's testimony nor his film were studied by either of the federal panels investigating the assassination. In early 1963, Atkins was assigned as an official photographer for the Kennedy White House. As such, he traveled to Texas with Kennedy and was photographing the motorcade with a quality camera, a 16-mm Arriflex S. Atkins, in the 1977 article, said he was in a car which had just turned onto Houston Street and was facing the Texas School Book Depository. He stated:

"...Kennedy's car had just made the left turn heading toward the freeway entrance. Although I did not look up at the building, I could hear everything quite clearly....The shots came from below and off to the right side from where I was (the location of the Grassy Knoll)....I never thought the shots came from above. They did not sound like shots coming from anything higher than street level."

After returning to Washington on Air Force Two, Atkins assembled his film into a movie he entitled, "The Last Two Days". Incredibly, Atkins was never called to testify nor was his film ever viewed by the Warren Commission. Atkins said in 1977:

"It's something I've always wondered about. Why didn't they ask me what I knew? I not only was on the White House staff, I was then, and still am, a photographer with a pretty keen visual sense."

Obviously, the federal authorities didn't want to hear from a man with a "keen visual sense" and strong credentials who might have told them things they did not want to hear. But if the stories of the motorcade witnesses differed from the later official version of the assassination, it was nothing compared to the stories to come from the crowd of bystanders.

Crossfire: The Crowd

"I saw a man fire from behind the wooden fence."
Assassination witness Jean Hill

The crowd of witnesses along the motorcade route through Dealey Plaza saw many things that differed from the later official version. Even before the motorcade arrived, men with rifles were seen by people in downtown Dallas.

Shortly before noon, Philip B. Hathaway and co-worker John Lawrence were walking on Akard Street toward Main to get an observation spot for the motorcade when Hathaway saw a man carrying a rifle in a gun case. He described the man as very tall, 6'5" or more, weighing about 250 pounds and thick in the chest. The man was in his early 30s with "dirty blond hair worn in a crewcut" and was wearing a gray business suit. Hathaway said the case was made of leather and cloth and was not limp, but obviously contained a rifle. He remarked to Lawrence that it must be a Secret Service man. Lawrence also saw the big blond man, but did not see the rifle due to the growing crowd around them. Lawrence said the man gave him the impression of being "a professional football player". This same man may have been seen later that day by Ernest Jay Owens, who told Sheriff's officers the afternoon of the assassination that he was driving on Wood Street near Good-Lattimer Expressway when he saw a white male of "heavy build" carrying a "foreign-made rifle" out of a parking lot. Owens said the man was bare headed and wearing a dark-colored suit. Once Oswald was captured and proclaimed the assassination suspect, there was no effort to investigate these stories further.

A similar - and more ominous - incident involved Julia Ann Mercer. Mercer, then 23 years old, later told authorities that shortly before 11 a.m. the day of the assassination she was driving a rented white Valiant west on Elm Street just past the point where Kennedy was killed about two hours later. Just after passing through the Triple Underpass, she found her traffic lane blocked by a green Ford pickup truck. While waiting for the truck to move, she saw a young man get out of the truck, walked to a long tool compartment along the side and remove a long paper bag. She could see the outlines of a rifle in the bag. The man then walked up on the Grassy Knoll carrying the package and was lost to her sight. She described this man as in his late 20s or early 30s, wearing a gray jacket, brown pants, a plaid shirt and some sort of wool stocking cap with a tassel on it. Mercer said as she pulled alongside the truck, she locked eyes with the driver, whom she described as heavily-built with a round face and light brown hair. She said during this time, she saw three Dallas policemen standing by a motorcycle on the underpass talking. In Warren Commission Document 205, a policeman did tell of seeing the truck, but believed that it had broken down. When she was finally able to change lanes, Mercer drove on toward Fort Worth, stopping at the halfway point of the Dallas-Fort Worth Toll Road (now Interstate 30) to have breakfast. While eating, she told her experience to some policemen, commenting, "The Secret Service is not very secret."

Later, as she drove on to Fort Worth, she was stopped by the policemen, who informed her of the assassination and took her back to Dallas for questioning. She was held for several hours and questioned by both local and federal authorities, although no one showed her a badge or identified themselves. Early the next morning, FBI men came to her home and took her back to the Dallas Sheriff's office where she was shown some photographs of various men. She picked out two as the men she had seen in the truck the day before. Turning one photo over, she read the name, "Jack Ruby".

During the TV coverage of the Oswald shooting the next day, Mercer claims she again recognized Ruby as the man driving the truck and that Oswald resembled the man carrying the rifle. Oswald's mother also claimed to have been shown a picture of Ruby prior to the Sunday shooting of her son (See LEE HARVEY OSWALD). Mercer later claimed that her story concerning the truck and its occupants was twisted and changed by both the FBI and the Dallas Sheriff's Office.

Her experience may have been partly corroborated by another Dallasite, Julius Hardie, who told "The Dallas Morning News" years later that on the morning of November 22, he saw three men on top of the Triple Underpass carrying longarms, although he could not tell if they were rifles or shotguns. Hardie said he reported the incident to the FBI, but no such report has been made public.

As the motorcade arrived in Dealey Plaza, it passed almost 20 sheriff's deputies standing at the intersection of Main and Houston in front of the Sheriff's office. The deputies almost unanimously agreed they thought the shots came from the railroad yards located just behind the Grassy Knoll. They all began running in that direction even before Decker's radio order to "...saturate the area of the park, railroad and all buildings..." arrived.

Deputy L.C. Smith, in a report made that day, told a story which was typical of the deputies' experiences:

"...I was standing in front of the Sheriff's Office on Main Street and watched the President and his party drive by. Just a few seconds later, I heard the first shot, which I thought was a backfire, then the second shot and third shot rang out. I knew that this was gun shots and everyone else did also. I ran as fast as I could to Elm Street just west of Houston and I heard a woman unknown to me say the President was shot in the head and the shots came from the fence on the north side of Elm. I went at (once) behind the fence and searched also in the parking area. Then came...word the shot was thought to have come from the Texas School Book Depository..."

Supporting the deputies stories was W.W. Mabra, then a county bailiff. Mabra too was on the corner of Main and Houston:

"...so close to the President that I could almost have reached out and touched him. Then I heard the first shot. I thought it was a backfire. People ran toward the knoll. Some said they saw smoke there. I thought at first the shot may have come from there."

Across Main Street from the deputies and Mabra stood Dallas County surveyor Robert H. West, who watched the Presidential limousine move slowly toward the Triple Underpass. He heard one small report "similar to a motorcycle backfire" then three like "rifle fire". He said the shots came from the "northwest quadrant of Dealey Plaza (the area of the picket fence on the Grassy Knoll)". West later participated in reconstructions of the assassination for both "Life" magazine and the FBI which convinced him the crime could not have been the work of one man (See THE EVIDENCE).

Mr. and Mrs. Arnold Rowland were both high school students who had come to town to see the President. They were standing on Houston Street near Decker's office, the west side of which faces Dealey Plaza. Both of the Rowlands believed the shots came from down near the Triple Underpass despite the fact that 15 minutes before the motorcade arrived they had remarked about seeing two men, one with a rifle and telescopic sight, on the sixth floor of the Texas School Book Depository. Arnold Rowland had assumed the men were part of the Secret Service protection. He said the man with the rifle was in the far west window of the Depository's sixth floor while the other man, described as an elderly Negro with thin hair wearing a plaid shirt, was seen in the easternmost window (the so-called "Sniper's Nest" window). Rowland said he lost sight of the man with the rifle as the motorcade approached, but again saw the black man just before Kennedy arrived. During the excitement of the moment, Rowland said he neglected to mention the black man when he talked to authorities in the sheriff's office. However, he said the next day FBI agents came to his home and got him to sign a statement. He recalled:

"At that time I told them I did see the Negro man there and they told me it didn't have any bearing or such on the case right then. In fact, they just the same as told me to forget it now."

Although the agents "didn't seem interested" in Rowland's story of two men on the sixth floor, they did attempt to get an identification of the man with the gun by showing Rowland photos of Oswald. However, Rowland said:

"I just couldn't identify him...because I just didn't have a good enough look at his face."

Rowland's story of seeing two men was corroborated to the Warren Commission by Deputy Sheriff Roger D. Craig (See AFTERMATH - DALLAS). Craig said Rowland told him about seeing two men pacing in the Depository approximately 10 minutes after the assassination as Craig interviewed Rowland in Dealey Plaza.

The two men also were seen by Mrs. Carolyn Walther, who worked in a dress factory in the Dal-Tex Building. About noon, she and another employee joined the crowd on the east side of Houston just south of Elm to watch the motorcade. Years later she recalled:

"I had gone out on the street at about twenty after twelve to get a look at the President when he came by. While I waited, I glanced up at the Depository building. There were two men in the corner window on the fourth or fifth floor. One man was wearing a white shirt and had blond or light brown hair. This man had the window open. His hands were extended outside the window. He held a rifle with the barrel pointed downward. I thought he was some kind of guard. In the same window, right near him, was a man in a brown suit coat. Then the President's car came by. I heard a gunshot. People ran. Like a fool I just stood there. I saw people down. I walked toward them, with the thought they maybe were hurt and I could help them. People were running toward the Grassy Knoll. A woman cried out, "They shot him! In all, I heard four shots."

Steelworker Richard Randolph Carr, who was working on the seventh floor of the new Dallas Courthouse (then under construction at the intersection of Commerce and Houston), also reported seeing a man wearing a brown coat. Carr said minutes before the motorcade arrived he saw a heavy-set man wearing a hat, horn-rimmed glasses and tan sport coat standing in a sixth-floor window of the Depository. After the shooting, Carr saw the man walking on Commerce Street (See AFTERMATH - DALLAS).

Ruby Henderson, standing across the street from the Depository, also saw two men on an upper floor of the building. While she was uncertain if it was the sixth floor, she saw no one above the pair. She described the shorter of the men as having a dark complexion, possibly even a Negro, and wearing a white shirt. The shorter man was wearing a dark shirt.

The story of two men on the sixth floor of the Depository moments before the shooting has since been bolstered by two films made that day. One, an 8-mm home movie made by Robert Hughes who was standing at the intersection of Main and Houston, shows the front of the Depository just as Kennedy's limousine passes the building turning onto Elm. The Hughes film shows movement in both the corner window of the sixth floor and the window next to it. Deep within the Warren Commission exhibits is an FBI report acknowledging receipt of Hughes' film. In another FBI document, it is claimed that the figure in the second window from the corner was simply a stack of boxes. No reference is made to movement. In 1975, CBS television asked Itek Corporation to look again at the Hughes film. The company concluded that there were no moving images in the double window next to the sixth floor corner window, a conclusion which is still disputed by various photographic experts. And in late 1978, a second movie surfaced which supports the two-men allegation. This film, taken by Charles L. Bronson who was standing only a few feet west of Hughes, also shows the sixth-floor corner windows of the Depository just moments before the Kennedy motorcade passed. Bronson's film was viewed in 1963 by an FBI agent who reported that it "failed to show the building from which the shots were fired," thus relegating the film to obscurity. It was re-discovered in 1978 when the film was mentioned in de-classified FBI documents and was obtained by "The Dallas Morning News". The newspaper commissioned Robert Groden, who served as staff consultant on photographic evidence for the House Select Committee on Assassinations, to study the film. Groden told the newspaper:

"There is no question that there is movement. And, I'm sure, given time and money, a computer could probably clarify the images a bit more... You can actually see one figure walking back and forth hurriedly. I think what was happening there is the sniper's nest was actually being completed just prior to the shots being fired."

The House Assassinations Committee studied the Bronson film further and, while acknowledging movement in the second window, stated it was "more likely...a random photographic artifact than human movement". However, the committee did recommend that the film be analyzed further. There is no evidence such further study has been done.

Another witness to the pair of men in the Depository was an inmate of the Dallas County Jail, located just across the street to the east of the depository. Several prisoners were in a 6th-floor cell on a level with the sixth-floor Depository window. Oddly, none of the jail inmates were ever identified or sought by federal investigators despite their excellent vantage point. However, one of the inmates told the "Dallas Morning News" in 1978 that the prisoners saw two men, one with a rifle, in the Depository at the time of the assassination.

Confirmation of the presence of two men on the sixth floor might have come from Canadian journalist Norman Similas, who was in Dallas for a convention of carbonated beverage bottlers. It was a trip he would not soon forget. On November 21, Similas photographed and spoke with Vice President Lyndon Johnson, who had addressed the convention. Later that evening, Similas visited the Carousel Club and spent more than an hour talking with its owner, Jack Ruby. The next day, Similas strolled over to Dealey Plaza to photograph President Kennedy's motorcade. He stood on the south side of Elm not 10 feet from Kennedy's car at the time of the first shots. In a report published in the Canadian magazine "Liberty," Similas said:

"The Presidential limousine had passed me and slowed down slightly. My camera was directly angled toward the Texas School Book Depository in the background. The picture I took on the curb of Elm Street was trained momentarily on an open, sixth-floor window. The camera lens recorded what I could not possibly have seen at that moment - a rifle barrel extended over the windowsill. When the film was developed later, it showed two figures hovering over it."

Were there two people in Similas' photo? No one will ever know for sure. In that same article, he added:

"Upon my return to Toronto, I submitted my developed negatives to a daily newspaper. When they were not used on Monday, November 25, I phoned and asked that they be returned. Later I received a fat cheque in the mail, but the one negative which clearly showed what I believe to be two figures in the window of the assassin's nest was missing. When I pressed for it, I was told that this negative had somehow become lost. It has never been returned to me."

An advertising salesman for the "Dallas Morning News," Jim Willmon, was standing with the crowd along Houston Street. He recalled:

"The car turned down Elm Street. A car backfired, or so I thought. I said to my buddy, "The Secret Service is going to have a heart attack!" But it wasn't a backfire. It was shots. People ran toward the Grassy Knoll. No one seemed to look up at the Book Depository."

Ronald B. Fischer, an auditor for Dallas County, and another county worker, Robert E. Edwards, were standing on the southwest corner of Elm and Houston, directly across the street from the Depository. Less than 10 minutes before the motorcade arrived, Edwards commented:

"Look at that guy there in the window."

Looking up, Fischer saw the head and shoulders of a man wearing a white T-shirt or possibly a light sport shirt. The man was surrounded by boxes and was staring "transfixed" not toward the approaching motorcade, but in the direction of the Triple Underpass. Less than a minute later the motorcade passed their position and both Fischer and Edwards forgot the man in the window. Then Fischer heard what he thought was a firecracker followed by sounds he knew to be shots. They seemed to be coming from "...just west of the School Book Depository building (the location of the Grassy Knoll)."

Hugh W. Betzner Jr. was 22 years old on November 22, 1963 and was taking pictures with an old camera near the intersection of Houston and Elm. After taking Kennedy's picture as he turned in front of the Depository, Betzner ran west into Dealey Plaza following the presidential limousine. In a sheriff's report that day, Betzner stated:

"I started to wind my film again and I heard a loud noise. I thought this noise was either a firecracker or a car had backfired. I looked up and it seemed like there was another loud noise in a matter of a few seconds. I looked down the street and I could see the President's car and another one and they looked like the cars were stopped."

Betzner said he then heard at least two more shots fired and saw the impact in the limousine. The motorcade then sped up and Betzner joined spectators running up the Grassy Knoll toward the wooden picket fence where he assumed the shots came from. Minutes later, he looked across Elm Street and saw "...police officers and some men in plain clothes...digging around in the dirt as if they were looking for a bullet."

Near Betzner was another photographer, Philip Willis, who took a series of pictures considered by many as the most important photos taken of the assassination other than the Zapruder film. Willis, along with his wife and two young daughters, were in Dealey Plaza to get pictures of the President and Lyndon Johnson, whom Willis said was a personal friend. As the presidential limousine turned onto Elm in front of the Depository, Willis snapped a photo, then ran further west on Elm. He told the Warren Commission:

"...Then my next shot...in fact, the shot caused me to squeeze the camera shutter, and I got a picture of the President as he was hit with the first shot. So instantaneous, in fact, that the crowd hadn't had time to react."

Willis said he did not see the effects of the next shots because his two daughters, Linda and Rosemary, were running along Elm and he became concerned for their safety. As a retired Air Force major and World War II veteran, Willis said he had absolutely no doubt that the shots were from a high-powered rifle and were coming from the direction of the Texas School Book Depository. (An interesting note: Willis was in Hawaii during the attack on Pearl Harbor and captured the sole surviving member of a Japanese midget submarine, thus becoming the first American to take a Japanese prisoner during World War II.)

His youngest daughter, Rosemary, ran back to her father, saying:

"Oh, Daddy, they have shot our President. His whole head blew up and it looked like a red halo."

Willis said he took more photographs "knowing that the party had come to a temporary halt before proceeding on to the underpass..." In later years, this author interviewed Willis, who refuted two of the theories to come from federal investigations of the assassination.

One, the Single Bullet Theory of the Warren Commission, states that one shot (identified by the commission as the first shot) struck both President Kennedy and Governor Connally. Willis said: "There is no damn way that one bullet hit both men. That is the most stupid thing they ever stuck to - that one-bullet theory." (See THE WARREN COMMISSION) The House Select Committee on Assassinations, also attempting to deal with the wounds in Kennedy's back and throat which do not support a conclusion of one shot from the high rear (See THE EVIDENCE), theorized that Kennedy may have bent over momentarily while out of the Zapruder camera view and thus received a back wound lower than the throat wound. Willis retorted:

"That is not right. I got the nearest, best shot while JFK was behind the (Stemmons Freeway) sign. He was upright and waving to the crowd. A split second later, he was grabbing at his throat."

Willis also had a comment after telling of Kennedy falling to the left rear after the fatal head shot:

"As many deer as I have shot, I've never known one to fall towards me."

Although the Warren Commission quoted Willis as saying that he heard three shots, all from the Depository, Willis said:

"I always thought there had to be another shot from somewhere. I have always gone against the one-gunman theory. I always thought there had to have been some help. I saw blood going to the rear and left (of Kennedy). That doesn't happen if that bullet came from the Depository."

Willis further claimed:

"I also got a photo, taken immediately after (the shooting stopped) that shows Ruby standing in front of the Depository building. He was the only person there wearing dark glasses. He was identified by people who knew him and no one else has been able to say it was someone else. Ruby made a big effort to show he was in the "Dallas Morning News" at the time, but it wouldn't take five minutes to walk from the News (to Dealey Plaza)."

Interestingly, the Warren Commission cropped Willis' photograph right through the face of the man Willis claimed was Jack Ruby.

Linda Willis, who was running along Elm Street with Rosemary, told this author in 1978:

"I very much agree that shots came from somewhere other than the Depository. And where we were standing, we had a good view. So many of the people who have decided they know what happened there weren't even there. I was, and that's what makes the difference."

Neither Willis nor his daughters believed the Warren Commission or the House committee were serious in finding out the truth of the assassination (See THE WARREN COMMISSION and THE HOUSE SELECT COMMITTEE ON ASSASSINATIONS).

Behind Willis, sitting on concrete retaining wall across the street from the Depository was 44-year-old Howard Leslie Brennan, who was to become the star witness for the Warren Commission. Brennan, who had been working as a pipe fitter on a construction project behind the Depository, had eaten lunch and then taken this position to view the motorcade. It was determined that Brennan was 120 feet from the sixth-floor window. He said he saw a man in an upper floor of the Depository shortly before the motorcade arrived. He described the man as a slender white male in his early 30's wearing "light-colored clothing". Brennan stated:

"...I heard what I thought was a backfire. It ran in my mind that it might be someone throwing firecrackers out of the window of the red brick building (the Depository) and I looked up at the building. I then saw this man I have described in the window and he was taking aim with a high-powered rifle. I could see all of the barrel of the gun. I do not know if it had a scope on it or not. I was looking at the man in this window at the time of the last explosion. Then this man let the gun down to his side and stepped out of sight. He did not seem to be in any hurry....I believe I could identify this man if I ever saw him again."

Brennan, who immediately rushed into the Depository to tell a policeman what he saw, apparently was one of the only witnesses to have actually seen a gunman fire from the Depository. However, later that evening Brennan was unable to pick Lee Harvey Oswald out of a police lineup. Much later, it was determined that Brennan had poor eyesight and, in fact, a close examination of the Zapruder film shows that Brennan was not looking up at the time of the shooting. Furthermore, Brennan's job foreman, Sandy Speaker, told this author:

"They took him (Brennan) off for about three weeks. I don't know if they were Secret Service or FBI, but they were federal people. He came back a nervous wreck and within a year his hair had turned snow white. He wouldn't talk about (the assassination) after that. He was scared to death. They made him say what they wanted him to say."

Brennan's story of a man firing from the sixth floor window was supported by a statement to Sheriff's deputies that day by 15-year-old Amos Lee Euins. Euins, a schoolboy, was standing near Brennan south of the Depository across Elm when he heard a shot. He stated:

"I started looking around and then I looked up in the red brick building. I saw a man in a window with a gun and I saw him shoot twice. He then stepped back behind some boxes. I could tell the gun was a rifle and it sounded like an automatic rifle the way he was shooting."

Another witness who saw a gunman in the Depository was L.R. Terry, who was standing across Elm Street near Brennan and Euins. Terry told this author:

"I was right across from that book store when Kennedy was shot. I saw a gun come out of there just after I saw Kennedy and Connally go by. I could only see a hand, but I couldn't tell if (the man) was right-handed or left-handed. He did not have on a white shirt. The parade stopped right in front of the building. There was a man with him. They (investigators) could find out that the man who killed Kennedy had somebody with him. But I don't know who it is....I just saw the gun barrel and the hand."

Across the street from Brennan, Euins and Terry were Texas School Book Depository superintendent Roy Truly and Depository vice-president O.V. Campbell. They had started to go to lunch about 12:15 p.m. when they saw the crowds and decided to wait and see the presidential motorcade. As the motorcade approached, they were having difficulty seeing over the heads of the crowd, so the two men moved closer to Elm Street and a bit further west into the plaza. Here they were joined by Mrs. Robert A. Reid, the Depository's clerical supervisor. Just after the presidential limousine had turned onto Elm and started into the plaza, both men heard an "explosion...from west of the building (depository)". Truly thought it was a firecracker or toy cannon. When Mrs. Reid turned to Campbell and said, "Oh my goodness, I'm afraid those came from our building," he replied:

"Oh, Mrs. Reid, no, it came from the grassy area down this way."

Danny G. Arce, who had been working in the Depository, also was standing near Truly and Campbell. He told the Warren Commission shots "came from the railroad tracks to the west of the Texas School Book Depository."

Truly said after the initial explosion, everything seemed frozen. Then, there were two more explosions and he realized that shots were being fired. He saw the President's car come to a stop.

Another Depository employee saw a bullet hit the street at the time of the first shot. Virgie Rachley (by the time of her Warren Commission testimony she had married and was Mrs. Donald Baker) was a bookkeeper at the Depository. She and other workers were standing near Truly and Campbell in front of the Depository facing Elm Street. She told the Warren Commission:

"...after he passed us, then we heard a noise and I thought it was firecrackers because I saw a shot or something hit the pavement....It looked just like you could see the sparks from it and I just thought it was a firecracker and I was thinking that... somebody was fixing to get in a lot of trouble and we thought the kids or whoever threw it were down below or standing near the underpass or back up here by the sign."

Mrs. Baker told Commission Attorney Wesley Liebeler that the stray bullet struck the middle of the southern most lane on Elm Street just behind the Presidential limousine.

Truly said the crowd around him began to surge backward. Moments later, a motorcycle policeman pushed past him and ran into the Depository. Truly caught up with him in the lobby and they went to toward their encounter with a Depository employee - Lee Harvey Oswald (See THE TEXAS SCHOOL BOOK DEPOSITORY). Campbell ran with many others to where he believed the shots had come from, "...near the railroad tracks located over the viaduct on Elm Street."

Mary E. Woodward, a staff writer for the "Dallas Morning News", had gone to Dealey Plaza with four co-workers to get a look at the President while they ate lunch. As the limousine passed, she and another writer who had seen Kennedy during the final weeks of the 1960 campaign, commented on how relaxed and robust he appeared. Standing near the Stemmons Freeway sign located down the slope to the west of the Depository, Woodward heard a "horrible, ear-shattering noise" coming from behind them and to their right. She thought it was some sort of joke, a car backfiring perhaps. She saw both the President and Mrs. Kennedy look around as if they too had heard the sound. The presidential limousine came to a halt. Then Woodward heard two more shots, coming close together and the President slumped down in the car. A woman nearby began weeping and cried, "They've shot him!"

Mrs. Gloria Calvery and Karen Westbrook, both employees of a publishing firm with offices in the Texas School Book Depository, had gone out during lunch to see the President. They were standing almost halfway between the corner of Elm and Houston and the Triple Underpass. Both heard the first blast and saw Kennedy struck by a bullet just as the presidential limousine got directly in front of their position. Neither were questioned later as to the direction of the shots.

A.J. Millican, a coworker of Howard Brennan, had no difficulty in determining where the shots came from. Millican told authorities that day he was standing on the north side of Elm Street about halfway between Houston and the Triple Underpass. He said he noticed "a truck from Honest Joe's Pawn Shop" park near the Depository, then drive off about five or 10 minutes before the President arrived. He told Sheriff's deputies:

"Just after the President's car passed, I heard three shots from up toward Elm right by the Book Depository Building, and then immediately I heard two more shots come from the arcade between the Book Store and the Underpass, then three more shots came from the same direction only sounded further back. It sounded approximately like a .45 automatic, or a high-powered rifle."

Millican, who provided perhaps one of the clearest descriptions of the firing sequence and the location of the shots, was never interviewed by nor called to testify to the Warren Commission or the House Select Committee on Assassinations. He died in 1986, apparently having never been questioned by anyone. However, his supervisor, Sandy Speaker, said his entire work crew was there and they all corroborated Millican's story. In an interview with this author, Speaker said:

"I was the superintendent of construction for the Republic Bank project at the time. Millican and also Howard Brennan were working for me. We were fabricating plumbing piping for the Republic Bank Building under construction at the west end of Pacific Street (north of the Texas School Book Depository). Millican and the whole crew had knocked off for lunch and were by the Depository building to watch the parade. I hadn't gotten there when they (the motorcade) passed. I was less than a half-block away and heard the shots. I heard at least five shots and they came from different locations. I was a combat Marine with the First Marine Division in World War II, hand-to-hand combat, missions behind enemy lines, and I know what I am talking about. I've said for years there were more than three shots fired."

John A. Chism, along with his wife and three-year-old son, were near Millican, standing directly in front of the Stemmons Freeway sign. They said the first shots were fired just as the President got in front of them. They saw Kennedy slump to the left and into his wife's arms. Mrs. Chism told Dallas authorities that day:

"And then there was a second shot that I heard, after the President's wife had pulled him down in the seat. It came from what I thought was behind us (the Grassy Knoll) and I looked but I couldn't see anything."

Chism also looked behind him at the sound of the shots, then, as he again looked forward and saw "the motorcade beginning to speed up."

Jean Newman was a 21-year-old manufacturing company employee who came to view the motorcade in Dealey Plaza. She told Sheriff's deputies she was standing between the Stemmons Freeway sign and the book depository when the shots were fired. She stated:

"The first impression I had was that the shots came from my right."

To her right was the Grassy Knoll.

Also near the Stemmons Freeway sign were two of the most suspicious characters in Dealey Plaza that day. Despite their activities and the fact that both were captured in several photographs made at the time, this pair was never mentioned publicly until the House Select Committee on Assassinations investigation in the late 1970s.

Crossfire: Two Suspicious Men

About the time that Kennedy was first hit by a bullet, two men standing near each other on the north sidewalk of Elm Street acted most strangely - one began pumping a black umbrella while the other waved his right arm high in the air. These and subsequent actions by this pair aroused the suspicions of researchers over the years, yet the initial federal investigation ignored both men. Their activities are known only through analysis of assassination photographs.

As Kennedy's limousine began the gentle descent into Dealey Plaza, a man can be seen standing near the street-side edge of the Stemmons Freeway sign holding an open umbrella. He holds the umbrella in a normal fashion and the top of the umbrella almost reaches the bottom of the sign. In photos taken minutes before Kennedy's arrival, the umbrella is closed and, immediately after the shooting, pictures show the umbrella was closed again. The man's umbrella was only open during the shooting sequence. Furthermore, as seen in the Zapruder film, once Kennedy is exactly opposite the man with the umbrella, it was pumped almost two feet into the air and then lowered. At this same time, the second man - in photos he appears to be dark complected, perhaps a black man or Hispanic - raised his right hand into the air possibly making a fist. This man was located on the outer edge of the Elm Street sidewalk opposite the umbrella man, who was on the inner edge. The man with the open umbrella was the only person in Dealey Plaza with an open umbrella. Under the warm Texas sun, there was no reason for an open umbrella at that time.

Two main theories have emerged concerning the "Umbrella man" and his activities that day. Assassination researcher Robert Cutler has long maintained that the umbrella may have been a sophisticated weapon which fired a dart or "flechette" filled with a paralyzing agent. Cutler's theory is supported by the 1975 testimony of a CIA weapons developer who told the Senate Intelligence Committee that just such a umbrella weapon was in the hands of the spy agency in 1963. Charles Senseney, who developed weaponry for the CIA at Fort Detrick, described a dart-firing weapon he developed as looking like an umbrella. He said the dart gun was silent in operation and fired through the webbing when the umbrella was open. Senseney said the CIA had ordered about 50 such dart weapons and that they were operational in 1963. Cutler theorized that the umbrella was used to fire a paralyzing dart into Kennedy immobilizing him for marksmen with rifles. He claims this theory accounts for the small puncture wound in Kennedy's throat described by Dallas doctors, but which was altered by the time of the Bethesda autopsy (See TWO HOSPITALS). According to Cutler, this dart explains Kennedy's lack of motion during the shooting sequence. Since such a weapon existed and since both the actions of Kennedy and the "Umbrella man" are consistent with the operation of such a weapon, Cutler's theory cannot be completely dismissed.

However, most assassination researchers prefer the alternative theory that both of these suspicious men may have been providing visual signals to hidden gunmen. This theory suggests that Kennedy was killed by a crossfire coordinated by radiomen. The two men, who were among the closest bystanders to the President when he was first struck, gave signals indicating that he was not fatally hit and therefore more shots were needed. A fascinating twist on this latter theory came from researcher Gary Shaw who said the two men may have been providing Kennedy with a last-second sign of who was responsible for his death. Shaw recalled that throughout the planning of the Bay of Pigs invasion, CIA officers had promised an "umbrella" of air protection of the Cuban invaders. This "umbrella" failed to materialize because Kennedy refused to authorize U.S. military support for the invasion (See CUBANS). According to Shaw's theory, the man with the open umbrella symbolized the promise of an air-support "umbrella" while the dark-complected man may have been one of the anti-Castro Cuban leaders known to Kennedy. Thus, in the last seconds of his life, Kennedy may have seen the open umbrella and the face of a Cuban he knew was involved in the Bay of Pigs and realized who was participating in his death.

But this is all speculation. The existence of the "Umbrella man" and the dark-complected man is fact. Even their activities after the assassination bear study. While virtually everyone in Dealey Plaza was moved to action by the assassination - either falling to the ground for cover or moving toward the Grassy Knoll - these two men sat down beside each other on the north sidewalk of Elm Street. Here the dark-complected man appears to put a walkie-talkie to his mouth. In a photograph taken by Jim Towner, what seems to be an antenna can be seen jutting out from behind the man's head while his right hand holds some object to his face. Several photos taken in the seconds following the assassination show both of these men sitting together on the Elm Street sidewalk. Moments later, the man with the umbrella gets up, takes one last look toward the motorcade still passing under the Triple Underpass and begins walking east in the direction of the Depository. The dark-complected man saunters toward the Triple Underpass passing people rushing up the Grassy Knoll. He can be seen stuffing some object - the walkie-talkie?- into the back of his pants.

Despite the suspicious actions of these two men, there is no evidence that the FBI or the Warren Commission made any effort to identify or locate them. Officially, they did not exist. Yet over the years, this pair became the focal point of criticism by private researchers. Researchers claimed the lack of investigation of these men was indicative of the shallowness of the government's handling of the assassination. Once the House Select Committee on Assassinations was formed, researchers urged an investigation of both men. The Committee finally released a photograph of the "Umbrella man" to the news media and urged anyone with knowledge of the man to come forward.

Coincidentally - if it was a coincidence - the "Umbrella man" suddenly was identified in Dallas a few weeks after this national appeal. In August, 1978, an telephone caller told researcher Penn Jones Jr., that the man with the umbrella was a former Dallas insurance salesman named Louis Steven Witt. Jones contacted some local newsmen and together they confronted Witt, who then was working as a warehouse manager. Witt refused to talk with newsmen but acknowledged that he was in Dealey Plaza on the day Kennedy was killed. Jones later wrote:

"I felt the man had been coached. He would answer no questions and pointedly invited us to leave. His only positive statement, which seemed to come very quickly, was that he was willing to appear before the House Select Committee on Assassinations in Washington."

Witt indeed appeared before the Committee during its public testimony. His story was comic relief compared to the intense scrutiny of witnesses like Marina Oswald and Warren Commission critics. His story was facile and improbable and when the umbrella which Witt claimed was the same one he had in Dealey Plaza in 1963 was displayed, it suddenly turned wrong-side out prompting one Committee member to quip:

"I hope that's not a weapon."

Witt told the Committee that on the spur of the moment, he grabbed a large black umbrella and went to Dealey Plaza to heckle Kennedy. He claimed that someone had told him that an open umbrella would rile Kennedy. While Witt offered no further explanation of how his umbrella could heckle the President, Committee members theorized that the umbrella in some way referred to the pro-German sympathies of Kennedy's father while serving as U. S. ambassador to Britain just prior to World War II. They said the umbrella may have symbolized the appeasement policies of Britain's Prime Minister Neville Chamberlain who always carried an umbrella. According to Witt:

"I think I went sort of maybe halfway up the grassy area (on the north side of Elm Street), somewhere in that vicinity. I am pretty sure I sat down....(When the motorcade approached) I think I got up and started fiddling with that umbrella trying to get it open, and at the same time I was walking forward, walking toward the street....Whereas other people I understand saw the President shot and his movements; I did not see this because of this thing (the umbrella) in front of me....My view of the car during that length of time was blocked by the umbrella's being open."

Based on the available photographs made that day, none of Witt's statements were an accurate account of the actions of the "Umbrella man", who stood waiting for the motorcade with his umbrella in the normal over-the-head position and then pumped it in the air as Kennedy passed. Witt's bizarre story - unsubstantiated and totally at variance with the actions of the man in the photographs - resulted in few, if any, researchers accepting Louis Steven Witt as the "Umbrella man". And there continues to be no official accounting for the dark-complected man who appears to have been talking on a radio moments after the assassination. The House Committee failed to identify or locate this man and Witt claimed he had no recollection of such a person, despite photographs which seem to show the "Umbrella man" talking with the dark man. Witt claimed only to recall that a "Negro man" sat down near him and kept repeating:

"They done shot them folks."

Interestingly, one of the Committee attorneys asked Witt specifically if he recalled seeing the man with a walkie-talkie, although officially no one has ever admitted the possibility of radios in use in Dealey Plaza. These two men are still among the mystery people of Dealey Plaza.

Crossfire: Other Witnesses

Dolores Kounas was a clerk-typist with McGraw Hill Publishing Company which had offices on the third floor of the Depository building. She, along with two other McGraw-Hill employees, were standing just west of the Depository across Elm Street from Millican and the Chisms. She too thought the first shot was a firecracker, but after hearing a second shot and seeing people fall to the ground, she realized they were shots. She later told the FBI:

"Although I was across the street from the Depository building and was looking in the direction of the building as the motorcade passed and following the shots, I did not look up at the building as I had thought the shots came from a westernly direction in the vicinity of the viaduct."

James Altgens, 44, a photographer for the Associated Press in Dallas, arrived in Dealey Plaza early. He had been assigned to get a picture of Kennedy as he passed through downtown Dallas and decided the west end of Dealey Plaza would provide an excellent opportunity to catch the President with the downtown buildings in the background. However, when Altgens tried to station himself on the Triple Underpass, he was shooed away by a Dallas policeman, who told him it was railroad property and only railroad employees were allowed there. So Altgens walked around by the Depository, then on to the intersection of Main and Houston, where he took a photo as the President passed. He then ran further into the plaza, where he made several photographs as the motorcade approached from the south curb of Elm. Altgens told the Warren Commission:

"I made one picture at the time I heard a noise that sounded like a firecracker....I figured it was nothing more than a firecracker because from my position down here the sound was not of such volume that it would indicate to me it was a high-velocity rifle....it sounded like it was coming up from behind the car...who counts fireworks explosions? I wasn't keeping track of the number of pops that took place, but I could vouch for No. 1 and I can vouch for the last shot, but I cannot tell you how many shots were in between. There was not another shot fired after the President was struck in the head. That was the last shot - that much I will say with a great degree of certainty."

One of Altgens' photos was taken just seconds after the first shots were fired and showed a slender man standing in the doorway of the Depository. Many people have claimed the man was Lee Harvey Oswald (See THE TEXAS SCHOOL BOOK DEPOSITORY) In the May 24, 1964, issue of the "New York Herald Tribune" magazine section, there was an article regarding Altgens' photograph. This article raised the question:

"Isn't it odd that J. W. Altgens, a veteran Associated Press photographer in Dallas, who took a picture of the Kennedy assassination - one of the witnesses close enough to see the President shot and able to describe second-by-second what happened - has been questioned neither by the FBI nor the Warren Commission?"

On June 2, 1964, Altgen was interviewed by FBI agents. The agents reported:

"He recalled that at about the instant he snapped the picture, he heard a burst of noise which he thought was firecrackers...he then turned the film in his camera...when he heard another report which he recognized as a gunshot."

Near Altgens on the grassy triangle in the lower part of Dealey Plaza were a handful of people, all the closest witnesses to the actual assassination. Only a couple of these witnesses testified to the Warren Commission and one of the closest was never identified until years later when she was interviewed by an assassination researcher.

Charles Brehm, along with his five-year-old son, had watched the Presidential motorcade turn onto Houston from near the Depository building. Then, holding his son, Brehm ran across Elm and stationed himself halfway between Houston and the Triple Underpass on the grassy triangle south of Elm. In a 1966 film documentary, Brehm stated:

"I very definitely saw the effect of the second bullet that struck the President. That which appeared to be a portion of the President's skull went flying slightly to the rear of the President's car and directly to its left. It did fly over toward the curb to the left and to the rear."

Brehm said the piece of skull landed in the grass not far from his location. He told the FBI some days later that "it seemed quite apparent to him that the shots came from one of two buildings back at the corner of Elm and Houston Streets". Brehm also said "it seemed to him that the automobile almost came to a halt after the first shot," but he was not certain. Brehm, an ex-serviceman with experience in bolt-action rifles, was probably the closest witness to the fatal head shot. He was not called to testify to the Warren Commission.

Two significant home movies were made of the assassination other than the famous Zapruder film (See GRASSY KNOLL). One was made by Mrs. Marie Muchmore, who had moved from a position near Main and Houston to the center of the grassy triangle behind Brehm. She caught the final and fatal head shot to Kennedy and the disappearance of the limousine into the Triple Underpass on the frames of her film. Further behind Muchmore, across Main Street, Orville Nix captured the entire assassination sequence. It is the Nix's film which most clearly shows the Presidential limousine coming to a brief halt with its brake lights on prior to the fatal head shot. Also in the Nix film are suspicious flashes of light on the Grassy Knoll, which is in the background of the movie. Are these muzzle flashes from rifles? To date, no sophisticated analysis has been conducted. Nix was interviewed by an assassination researcher some years later and asked about the direction of the shots. He stated:

"I thought it (shots) came from a fence between the Book Depository and the railroad tracks."

He also said that he later talked about the assassination with a friend, Forrest V. Sorrels, then head of the Dallas Secret Service Office. He said at the time of the assassination, Sorrels too, believed shots had come from the picket fence on the Grassy Knoll.

The Warren Commission never called Nix to testify, although he indicated he was willing to do so to the FBI, nor did the commission have his film adequately analyzed. Only after some researchers claimed that photographs of a gunman on the Grassy Knoll were visible in the Nix film was it closely studied. In late 1966, Itek Corporation, which handles government contacts and is closely tied to the CIA, studied the film on the request of United Press International. Itek scientists concluded that the gunman figure was actually shadows from a tree branch. It might be noted that even this conclusion is not totally accepted by suspicious researchers since, moments later, Nix panned back over the same area and the "shadow" figure is no longer visible. If the figure was merely shadows, it would seem that they should still be there in the later frames.

Also taking films on the south side of Elm Street was Beverly Oliver, who stood filming right behind Brehm and his son. From her vantage point, Oliver's movie would show not only the Grassy Knoll in the background, but also the Texas School Book Depository at the time of the shooting. Despite the most intensive FBI investigation in history, federal authorities officially were unable to locate Oliver and, for years, she was known to researchers only as "The Babushka Lady" because of a triangular kerchief she wore on her head that day.

Crossfire: The Babushka Lady

Perhaps the reason that the federal authorities were unable to identify or locate "The Babushka Lady" is the explosive story she has to tell. Located only in recent years by assassination researchers, Beverly Oliver is now married to an evangelist, is a "re-born" Christian and claims:

- Her film was taken and never returned by FBI agents.
- She was a friend of Jack Ruby and many of his employees.
- Ruby once introduced her to "Lee Oswald of the CIA".
- She knows that Ruby, Oswald and David Ferrie were closely associated.
- She married a Dallas underworld character closely connected to Ruby and his associates who, in 1968, met briefly with Richard Nixon.

Oliver was 19 years old at the time of the assassination and worked for the Colony Club, a strip-show club located next door to Jack Ruby's Carousel Club. On November 22, she took a new Super-8 Yashica movie camera to Dealey Plaza and ended up just behind Charles Brehm on the grassy triangle just south of Elm Street. Photos taken that day show that Oliver filmed the entire assassination as the motorcade moved down Elm. Undoubtedly her film would have included the windows of the Texas School Book Depository as shots were fired, clear pictures of "The Umbrella Man" and "The Dark Complexioned Man" on the north side of Elm and the Grassy Knoll area at the time of the fatal head shot.

Oliver said on Monday following the assassination, she was approached by two men near the Colony Club. She believed they were either FBI or Secret Service agents. They said they knew she had taken film in Dealey Plaza and wanted to develop it for use as evidence. Oliver was told her film would be returned to her within 10 days. She complied. However she never saw her film again. There was no mention of either her or her film in the Warren Report. (Years later, when shown photographs of FBI agents involved in the assassination, Oliver identified Regis Kennedy as one of the men who took her film. Kennedy played a key role in the New Orleans aspect of the assassination investigation and came under suspicion in later years because of his insistence that reputed New Orleans Mafia Boss Carlos Marcello was merely a "tomato salesman".)

Not long after the assassination, Oliver married George McGann, a Dallas underworld character whose best man was R. D. Matthews. Matthews, a close friend of Jack Ruby, was described by the House Select Committee on Assassinations as "actively engaged in criminal activity since the 1940s." The committee also developed evidence connecting Matthews with associates of Florida Mafia chieftain Santos Trafficante (See MOBSTERS). Further, Matthews was a father figure to another Dallas thug, convicted murderer-for-hire Charles V. Harrelson (See Aftermath - DALLAS).

Oliver told researcher Gary Shaw that during the Presidential campaign of 1968, she and McGann had a two-hour conversation with candidate Richard Nixon in a Miami hotel. Why former President Nixon would meet with a well-known criminal is unclear, but in light of information which has been made public since the Watergate affair linking Nixon to organized crime figures, this story no longer seems so far-fetched (See REDNECKS AND OILMEN). In 1970, McGann was killed in a West Texas gangland-style slaying.

Oliver also said that two weeks prior to the Kennedy assassination, she was visiting in Ruby's club. There, she met a man whom Ruby introduced as "Lee Oswald of the CIA." She later recognized Oswald when his picture was broadcast following the assassination. She also said David Ferrie was in Ruby's club in late 1963, in fact, he was there so often, Oliver mistook Ferrie as an assistant manager of the Carousel Club. A friend of Oliver's also knew of Oswald being in Ruby's club and spoke openly about it. According to Oliver, her friend disappeared and she "decided it would be in her best interests not to say anything." She remained quiet until the mid-1970s when she was located and interviewed by Shaw and, later, by Texas newsmen.

Although Beverly Oliver was the object of a secret briefing by HSCA attorney Robert Tannenbaum on March 17, 1977 (a transcript of this briefing was accidentally leaked to the news media), there is no mention of her or her film in the Committee's report. Obviously, it is highly suspicious to researchers that one of the closest witnesses to the assassination and a witness who claimed to have been with both Ruby and Oswald prior to November 22, 1963, was never located or identified by federal authorities.

###

Crossfire: Moorman and Hill

A few feet to the west of Oliver were two women - Mary Moorman, who took a photograph at the moment of the fatal head shot which may have included the gunman on the Grassy Knoll, and her friend, Jean Hill, who, like Willis, claims to have seen Jack Ruby in front of the Texas School Book Depository at the time of the shooting.

Ironically, neither Moorman nor Hill, probably the closest witnesses to the fatal head shot other than Brehm, were there to see Kennedy. Both women had come to Dealey Plaza to take pictures of a Dallas police motorcycle officer escorting the President whom Hill wanted to date. Hill had just moved to Dallas from Oklahoma and Moorman was showing her the city, as well as trying to get her a date with a policeman. The women were stopped by a policeman at the corner of Elm and Houston and prevented from entering the grassy triangle area of the plaza. However, after some flirting, the officer allowed them through and they took up a position on the south side of Elm midway between Houston and the Triple Underpass. Hill, who said she was getting in a "cops and robbers frame of mind" hoping to date the policeman, noticed a van with writing on it saying, "Uncle Joe's Pawn Shop" was allowed through the police lines and drove in front of the Depository and behind the concrete pergola on top of the Grassy Knoll. She thought this was suspicious since no one else had been allowed into that short street in front of the Depository. She jokingly said to Moorman:

"Do you suppose there are murderers in that van?"

As the presidential motorcade turned onto Elm, Moorman began taking snapshots with a Polaroid camera and handing the photos to Hill, who applied fixative and put them in the pocket of her red-cloth raincoat. Hill said Kennedy was smiling and waving to a crowd of people on the north side of Elm. She told this author:

"I knew he'd never look our way because all the people were on the other side of the street, so I jumped out into the street and yelled, "Hey, Mr. President, look this way. We want to take your picture." As he began turning toward us, he was hit. Then a bullet hit his head and took the top off. Mary fell to the ground and shouted, "Get down, they're shooting!" But being young and dumb, I kept standing for a minute trying to see where the shots came from. It was eerie. Everything seemed frozen. I saw a man fire from behind the wooden fence. I saw a puff of smoke and some sort of movement on the Grassy Knoll where he was. (She later pinpointed this location as about 15 feet north of the eastern corner of the wooden picket fence -the exact location of the figure discovered in Moorman's photograph.) Then I saw a man walking briskly in front of the Texas School Book Depository. He was the only person moving. Everybody else seemed to be frozen with shock. Because of my earlier thoughts, I became suspicious of this man and thought he might be connected with that truck I saw."

Hill said she heard between four and six shots altogether and then ran across the street in an effort to locate the men she had seen. She didn't find them, but claimed that on the following Sunday morning, she recognized TV photos of Jack Ruby as the man she had seen in front of the depository. Minutes after the shooting, Hill said she was standing just west of the Depository when she was taken into custody by two men who identified themselves as Secret Service agents.

Meanwhile, a Dallas reporter had talked with Moorman and taken her to the sheriff's office. Here she was later joined by Hill who said their photographs had been taken by federal authorities (See AFTERMATH IN DALLAS).

Directly across Elm from Hill and Moorman was the Newman family. Bill Newman, his wife Gayle and their two small children were standing west of the Stemmons Freeway sign directly below the Grassy Knoll. Newman told Sheriff's officers:

"We were standing at the edge of the curb looking at the (President's) car as it was coming toward us and all of a sudden there was a noise, apparently a gunshot...By (the) time he was directly in front of us...he was hit in the side of the head...Then we fell down on the grass as it seemed that we were in direct path of fire....I thought the shot had come from the garden directly behind me, that was on an elevation from where I was as I was right on the curb. I do not recall looking toward the Texas School Book Depository. I looked back in the vicinity of the garden."

A bit later, during a television interview, Newman was apparently the first person to speak of the Grassy Knoll. When asked where the shots had come from, Newman responded:

"...back up on the, uh, knoll...what you call it."

Another witness was far above the crowd in Dealey Plaza. He had a bird's eye view of the assassination. Jesse C. Price was the building engineer for the Union Terminal Annex, which is the southern counterpart of the Texas School Book Depository. The building stands at the corner of Houston and Commerce. Price said he went up on the roof to get "a better view of the caravan." While sitting on the edge of the building's roof overlooking the plaza, Price heard shots "...from by the...Triple Underpass." In an affidavit signed that day, Price stated:

"There was a volley of shots, I think five and then much later...another one."

He said the shots seemed to come from "just behind the picket fence where it joins the underpass." Price also said he saw a man, described as young wearing a white dress shirt, no tie and khaki-colored pants running behind the wooden picket fence "towards the passenger cars on the railroad siding..." with something in his hand "which could have been a gun." Price was never called to testify to the Warren Commission.

Despite the contradictions of evidence and testimony of those in Dealey Plaza, one fact seems inescapable - most of the witnesses in the crowd believed shots came from the Grassy Knoll. However, it is certain that at least one or more shots were fired from the red-brick building at the northwest corner of Elm and Houston - the Texas School Book Depository.

Crossfire: The Texas School Book Depository

"I thought at the time the shots...came from a point to the west of the building"

Depository employee Dorothy Ann Garner

THE TEXAS SCHOOL BOOK DEPOSITORY

Overlooking Dealey Plaza at its northeast corner is the seven-story red-brick building which in 1963 housed the Texas School Book Depository - which had almost nothing to do with Texas public schools. The Depository was a private company which acted as an agent for a number of book publishers, furnishing office space and providing warehousing, inventorying and shipping. School systems would place orders with the publishers for text books and the publishers would send the orders along to the Depository, where about a half dozen young men acted as order fillers - locating and collecting the books as per each order. On November 22, 1963, one of these order fillers was Lee Harvey Oswald.

Oswald and his wife, Marina, had separated at the time he left for New Orleans in the spring of 1963. They reunited in that Louisiana city, but in September, it was decided that since Marina was about to have a baby, she would return to Texas with a friend, Ruth Paine, while Oswald continued his activities - reportedly a trip to Mexico City. When Oswald arrived back in Dallas on October 3, Marina was living in Irving, a suburban city west of Dallas. She was staying in the home of Michael and Ruth Paine - they too were separated at the time - and over the weekend of October 12-13, 1963, Oswald had arrived there to visit. During this weekend, Mrs. Paine said she gave Oswald, who had no driver's license, a driving lesson in her car.

On Monday, October 14, Mrs. Paine drove Oswald to Dallas, where he rented a room at 1026 N. Beckley Avenue from Mrs. A.C. Johnson for $8 a week. Oswald had filled out applications at the Texas Employment Commission and reportedly was looking for work. That same day, Mrs. Paine mentioned Oswald - and the fact that he needed work because his wife was about to have another baby - to neighbors, including Mrs. Linnie Mae Randle. Mrs. Randle mentioned that Wesley Frazier, a younger brother who lived with her, worked at the Texas School Book Depository and that a job might be available there. Marina Oswald, who was present at this gathering, reportedly urged Mrs. Paine to check into the job possibility. Mrs. Paine agreed and called Depository Superintendent Roy Truly that very day.

Before the Warren Commission, Truly recalled getting a call from a woman in Irving who said she knew a man whose wife was going to have a baby and needed a job. Truly agreed to talk with the man. Mrs. Paine mentioned her call to Oswald later that evening and the next day, October 15, Oswald interviewed with Truly for the job. Oswald began working as temporary help the next day. Truly said the fall was their busiest time of year. Truly told the commission:

"Actually, (it was) the end of our fall rush - if it hadn't existed a week or two longer (than usual), or if we had not been using some of our regular boys putting down this plywood, we would not have had any need for Lee Oswald at that time, which is a tragic thing for me to think about."

Oswald was paid $1.25 an hour to fill book orders. Once he had been shown the procedures, he worked on his own. Truly described Oswald as "a bit above average" as an employee. Co-workers said Oswald was pleasant enough, but kept mostly to himself.

During his first week at work, Oswald got acquainted with Frazier and soon asked Frazier to drive him to Irving to visit his family. Frazier, who had only started working at the Depository the month before, said he was eager to make friends in Dallas. So Frazier agreed and, in fact, gave Oswald a ride to Irving every weekend prior to the assassination - except one when Oswald told Frazier he was staying in Dallas to take a driving test.

On Sunday, November 17, Marina Oswald had Mrs. Paine call a Dallas telephone number Oswald had given her. When she asked for Lee Oswald, Mrs. Paine was told there was nobody there by that name. The next day, Oswald called the Paine home and angrily told Marina he was using a fictitious name at the Beckley Avenue address and not to call him there.

On Thursday morning, November 21, Oswald reportedly asked Frazier to drive him to Irving after work because he wanted to get some curtain rods to put in his Beckley Avenue apartment. According to this curtain rod story - only Frazier and his sister claimed to have seen Oswald with a package and their descriptions were inconsistent and vague - Frazier's sister saw Oswald the next morning place a paper-wrapped package in Frazier's car and Frazier noticed the packet as the pair drove to work. Frazier later said Oswald told him it was curtain rods. He also said he would not be riding to Irving as usual, but gave no explanation, according to Frazier. Frazier said once at the Depository, Oswald got out of the car and walked ahead into the building carrying his package with one end gripped in his right hand and the other tucked under his right arm, parallel to his body. Most researchers who have studied the Mannlicher-Carcano rifle claim that, even disassembled, the barrel is too long to carry in this position. When Frazier entered the building, he could not see Oswald and never knew what became of the "curtain rods". When questioned by the authorities about what he had taken into the Depository, Oswald denied the curtain rod story, saying he only carried his lunch to work.

Jack Dougherty, another Depository employee whose Warren Commission testimony appears somewhat incoherent, nevertheless said:

"Yes, I saw him (Oswald) when he first came in the door...(Commission Attorney Joseph Ball asked, "Did he have anything in his hands or arms?") Well, not that I could see of."

Many Depository employees saw Oswald that morning. He appeared to be carrying on normal work duties, particularly on the sixth floor where he was assigned that day. Frazier said he didn't notice Oswald after noon. He told the Warren Commission that as the Presidential motorcade approached, he joined other Depository employees who were standing on the steps of the building facing Elm. Minutes before the Presidential motorcade arrived an odd incident occurred which has puzzled researchers for years.

Crossfire: The Distracting Seizure

About 12:15 p.m., a young man described as wearing green Army fatigues collapsed at 100 N. Houston, near the front door of the Texas School Book Depository. He apparently suffered some sort of seizure. Dallas Policeman D.V. Harkness radioed the police dispatcher to send an ambulance to that location at 12:18 p.m. Radio logs showed that the ambulance, after picking up the victim, radioed, "We are enroute to Parkland". However, Parkland never recorded a patient registering at this time and the entire incident seemed forgotten.

Despite the timing and proximity to the assassination, there is no mention of this incident in the Warren Commission Report and the FBI didn't get around to investigating until May 1964. And this investigation took place only after a former employee of O'Neal Funeral Home called the Bureau's Dallas office to report the incident, adding the patient "disappeared" after arriving at Parkland. Apparently more curious about the incident than the FBI, this caller stated he "felt it possible that this incident may have been planned to distract attention from the shooting that was to follow". The FBI detailed their investigation of the matter in Commission Document 1245, which was not included in the Warren Report or its 26 volumes.

Agents contacted the ambulance driver, Aubrey Rike, who said he had picked up a man "who was conscious and only slightly injured with a facial laceration". Rike added that in the confusion at Parkland, this man had simply walked off. Rike also said a Secret Service agent at Parkland told him to remain there "because they might need it (his ambulance) to move the President to another location."

On May 26, Bureau agents located the "victim" after finding his name in O'Neal records. Jerry B. Belknap had paid his $12.50 ambulance charge back on December 2, 1963. Based on a later FBI report and an interview with Belknap by assassination researcher Jerry D. Rose, the following story came to light. Belknap said he suffered from seizures since being struck by a car while getting off a school bus as a child. He was standing near the Depository when he stepped back from the crowd and lost consciousness. He said the next thing he knew a policeman was standing over him. Once at Parkland, he was sitting on a small table and, after asking for attention, was told to lie down. He said a short time later, there was a great rush of people who went into a different section of the emergency room. He said a male attendant finally brought him some water and an aspirin, but that, after realizing that he was not going to get immediate treatment, he walked out without registering. Outside, Belknap caught a bus back downtown, where he first learned of the assassination. Intriguingly, Belknap told Rose that he had been interviewed by both Dallas Police and the FBI within days of the assassination, months before the FBI's reported investigation in May, 1964. He commented that the two police agencies apparently distrusted each other and both asked him the same questions. Asked about the June 1964 FBI report concerning him, Belknap offered the explanation that perhaps an agent had called him on the phone and simply confirmed the results of the earlier interview. Belknap also stated in 1983 that an investigator from "some committee in Washington" had contacted him within the past few years. However, if this investigator was with the House Select Committee on Assassinations, there is no reference to him in its report or attendant volumes. Belknap died in 1986.

The entire "seizure" episode is strange and full of contradictions and coincidence - Belknap even reported seeing Jack Ruby once "acting like a big shot" and he said he lost consciousness while the FBI report said he didn't. Researchers view the incident as either a strangely convenient coincidence or as some as-yet-undiscovered plot to distract police and bystanders while assassins moved into position just prior to Kennedy's arrival in Dealey Plaza. All agree that the incident deserves further investigation, particularly in light of the fact that the ambulance drivers who reportedly took Belknap to Parkland - Rike and Dennis McGuire - were the same ones who, while at Parkland Hospital, loaded Kennedy's body into their ambulance for the return trip to Love Field that fateful afternoon.

###

Crossfire: Witnesses in The Texas School Book Depository

At the time of the shooting, even persons within the Depository believed the shots came from elsewhere. Steven F. Wilson was vice president of a school text book publishing company and had an office on the third floor of the Depository. Wilson told the FBI he watched the motorcade go by from a closed third-floor window but lost sight of the President when he "became obscured by some trees which are on Elm Street." He further stated:

"In a matter of 10 seconds or less...I heard three shots...there was a greater space of time between the second and third shots than between the first and second. The three shots were fired within a matter of less than five seconds. The shots sounded to me like rifle shots. At that time, it seemed like the shots came from the west end of the building or from the colonnade located on Elm Street across from the west end of our building (the pergola on the Grassy Knoll). The shots really did not sound like they came from above me."

Mrs. Elsie Dorman, who worked for Scott-Foresman Co. in the Depository, was in her fourth-floor office filming the Presidential motorcade as it passed below. With her were fellow workers Dorothy Ann Garner, Victoria Adams and Sandra Styles. Garner told the FBI:

"I thought at the time the shots or reports came from a point to the west of the building."

Adams told the Warren Commission:

"...we heard a shot, and it was a pause, and then a second shot, and then a third shot. It sounded like a firecracker or a cannon at a football game, it seems as if it came from the right below (the area of the Grassy Knoll) rather than from the left above (the sixth-floor window)."

Styles told Bureau agents she could not tell where the shots came from, but that she and Adams "left the office at this time, went down the back stairs and left the building at the back door."

Neither she nor Adams remarked about hearing anyone on the stairs moments after the shooting, although it was these same stairs that Oswald would have had to descend in time for his meeting with a Dallas policeman.

Wesley Frazier, who had driven Oswald to work that morning, was on the front steps of the Depository. He told the Warren Commission of his experience:

"...right after he (Kennedy) went by...I heard a sound and if you have ever been around motorcycles you know how they backfire, and so I thought one of them motorcycles backfired because right before his car came down, now there were several of these motorcycle policemen, and they took off down toward the underpass down there...I heard two more of the same type of, you know, sounds, and by that time people were running everywhere and falling down and screaming...I figured it was somebody shooting at President Kennedy...and from where I was standing it sounded like it was coming from down (at the) railroad tracks there....So, we started back into the building and it wasn't but just a few minutes that there were a lot of police officers and so forth all over the building there."

Frazier said one of the Depository employees standing by him on the steps of the building as Kennedy passed by was Billy Lovelady who was to become well-known to researchers as "The Man in the Doorway".

Crossfire: Man in the Doorway

Associated Press photographer James Altgens (See THE CROWD) snapped a picture seconds after Kennedy was first struck by a bullet. In the background of this photo a man can be seen standing in the west corner of the Texas School Book Depository's front doorway. Soon after the assassination, many people - including his mother - suggested the man in the doorway looked amazingly like Lee Harvey Oswald.

Obviously, if the man in the photo was Oswald, he could not have been firing a rifle on the sixth floor. The Warren Commission, based primarily on testimony from Depository employees, concluded the man in the doorway was Billy Lovelady. After being interviewed at length by the FBI, Lovelady identified the man in the photo as himself.

Lovelady, who had worked at the Depository since 1961, was one of the men assigned to lay plywood flooring on the sixth floor that day. He said about 11:50 a.m. he and other employees stopped work so they could clean up before taking their lunch break. Lovelady said the workers took both of the Depository's two elevators and were racing each other down to ground level. He recalled hearing Oswald shout to them from the fifth floor to wait or to send an elevator back for him. After buying a soft drink, Lovelady told the Warren Commission, he went out the main door and sat on the steps of the Depository to eat his lunch with some co-workers. Lovelady said he remained there as the motorcade passed by, then heard some noises:

"I thought it was firecrackers or somebody celebrating the arrival of the President. It didn't occur to me at first what had happened until this Gloria (Calvary - See CROWD) came running up to us and told us the President had been shot."

Asked where he thought the shots came from, Lovelady replied:

"Right there around that concrete little deal on that knoll."

In fact, Lovelady, along with his supervisor, joined the throng of people rushing toward the Grassy Knoll, but a short time later returned to the Depository, entering through a back door unchallenged. William Shelley, Depository manager and Oswald's immediate supervisor, acknowledged that Lovelady was on the steps of the building when Kennedy passed by. He told the Warren Commission he heard "something sounded like it was a firecracker and a slight pause and then two more a little bit closer together." He said the shots sounded like they came from west of the Depository. Shelley said Gloria Calvary ran up after about a minute and told them the President had been shot. Shelley and Lovelady both ran across a small street in front of the Depository to the north curb of Elm, then trotted down toward the railroad yards where police were converging. However, after seeing nothing remarkable, Shelley returned to the Depository. Additionally, Wesley Frazier and a Depository clerk, Sarah Stanton, both signed statements stating they were with Shelley and Lovelady on the Depository steps at the time of the shooting.

That should have been the end of questions concerning the identity of the man in the doorway. However, on February 29, 1964, the FBI interviewed Lovelady and photographed him wearing a short-sleeve shirt with vertical stripes, totally unlike the dark, mottled long-sleeve shirt in the Altgens picture. Later Lovelady explained the discrepancies in the shirts by telling CBS News:

"Well, when the FBI took (my picture) in the shirt, I told them it wasn't the same shirt."

The shirt Lovelady was wearing that day - and subsequently tried to sell it for a large sum of money - was a broad plaid, which he said was buttoned at the neck. The man in the doorway photo appears to be wearing a dark shirt open to the naval with a white tee shirt underneath, exactly what Oswald had on when arrested less than an hour and a half later.

And even Dallas Police Chief Jesse Curry seemed to continue to question the identity of the man in the doorway. In his 1969 book, Curry compared photos of the doorway man with Oswald and wrote:

"The Warren Commission attempted to prove that the man was Billy N. Lovelady who worked at the depository."

The House Select Committee on Assassination considered this issue in depth. They had anthropologists study the features of the man in the photograph and were given photographic analyses of the man's shirt. The Committee concluded:

"...that it is highly improbable that the man in the doorway was Oswald and highly probable that he was Lovelady."

However, since Lovelady said he was sitting on the steps and the man in the photo is standing, peering around the edge of the front door alcove - and since the FBI did such a dismal job of proving it was Lovelady, some suspicion still lingers about the identity of the man in the doorway. Most researchers today are ready to concede that the man may have been Lovelady

Crossfire: Where was Oswald?

But if the man in the doorway was not Oswald, then where was he? Was he on the sixth floor firing the Mannlicher-Carcano just as two federal panels have concluded? Despite the years of confident statements by federal authorities, no one has unquestionably placed Oswald on the sixth floor at the time of the shooting. Dallas Police Chief Jesse Curry in later years admitted to newsmen:

"We don't have any proof that Oswald fired the rifle, and never did. Nobody's yet been able to put him in that building with a gun in his hand."

Oswald told Dallas police he was eating lunch on the first floor of the Depository in what was called the "Domino Room" at the time of the assassination and there is some evidence to back up his statement.

Bonnie Ray Williams was one of the Depository workers who were laying plywood flooring on the sixth floor that day. During the elevator race to the first floor a few minutes before noon, Williams said he heard Oswald call, "Guys, how about an elevator?" from either the fifth or sixth floor. Oswald also apparently asked them to send an elevator back up to him. Williams told the Warren Commission he thought the others planned to gather on the sixth floor to watch the motorcade, so he returned there with his lunch, consisting of chicken, bread and a bag of chips in a brown paper sack along with a soft drink. Williams said he sat on some boxes near a window facing out onto Elm street and ate his lunch. He said he saw no one else on the sixth floor, which was one large open area. However he noted stacks of book cartons here and there. Becoming impatient because no other workers had joined him, Williams threw down the remains of his lunch and left the sixth floor at "approximately 12:20". In a January 14, 1964, FBI report, agents quoted Williams as saying he left the sixth floor after about three minutes, however, Williams denied ever saying that and it is reasonable that he couldn't have eaten his lunch in only three minutes. At the time, the news media made a great deal of comment about the chicken bones and lunch sack found on the sixth floor. Many people thought this proved that a cold and calculating assassin had patiently eaten his lunch while waiting for Kennedy to arrive.

Going down one of the elevators, Williams saw two other workers, Harold Norman and James Jarman, on the fifth floor and joined them to watch the motorcade. Two of these men were captured in a photograph taken that day as they leaned out of the fifth-floor window directly below the famous sixth-floor "sniper's" window to view the President. Williams told the Warren Commission:

"After the President's car had passed my window...(there) was a loud shot - first I thought they were saluting the President, somebody - even maybe a motorcycle backfire. The first shot - (then) there was two shots rather close together. The second and the third shot was closer together than the first shot...Well, the first shot - I really did not pay any attention to it, because I did not know what was happening. The second shot, it sounded like it was right in the building...it even shook the building, the side we were on. Cement fell on my head....Harold was sitting next to me and he said it came from right over our head....My exact words were, "No bullshit?" And we jumped up....I think Jarman, he - I think he moved before any of us. He moved towards us, and he said, "Man, someone is shooting at the President." And I think I said again, "No bullshit?"...Then we all kind of got excited....But, we all decided we would run down to the west side of the building....We saw policemen and people running, scared, running - there are some tracks on the west side of the building, railroad tracks. They were running towards that way. And we thought...we know the shots came from practically over our head. But...we assumed maybe somebody was down there."

Norman said he and Jarman had eaten lunch in the Domino Room on the first floor, then walked out the front door where they saw other Depository employees, including Lovelady sitting on the steps. As the motorcade approached, they took an elevator to the fifth floor and got seated in a southeast corner window where they were joined by Williams moments later. Norman said he heard three loud shots and "I could also hear something sounded like shell hulls hitting the floor..." Later, he said he also had heard the sound of the bolt working on a rifle above them.

After the three men ran to the west window and saw police combing the railroad yards, Norman said he and Jarman tried to leave the Depository, but were turned back by police officers. Jarman told the same story but said he didn't hear the shells hit the floor or hear the sound of the rifle bolt. He did say that when the three men ran to the Depository's west window:

"...I saw policemen and the secret agents, the FBI men, searching the boxcar yard and the passenger train and things like that."

One thing which has always puzzled assassination researchers is Williams' statement of being on the sixth floor until "approximately 12:20" then Norman's claim of hearing ejecting shell casings and the working of the rifle bolt.

It has been established that the plywood floor in the Depository was thin and full of cracks, which accounts for the plaster dust which fell on Williams' head. It could also account for Norman hearing shell casings hit the floor and even the working of the rifle bolt - except that apparently none of the three men on the floor below heard anyone moving above them. How could they have heard shells dropping and a rifle bolt operating and not heard movement above them in the minutes before the shooting? As confirmed by photographs taken at the time and the testimony of witnesses below (See THE CROWD), someone constructed a "sniper's nest" of book cartons in the minutes preceding the shooting. Yet, Williams, Norman and Jarman heard nothing?

Obviously, there was someone on the sixth floor, but was it Oswald? Oswald told police he had followed the workers down to the first floor and had eaten lunch in a domino room on the Depository's first floor. Oswald told interrogators he recalled two black employees walking through the room while he was there. He said he thought one was named "Junior" and the other was short. Jarman's nickname was "Junior" and Norman was indeed short. Norman, in commission testimony, said he ate his lunch in the Domino Room, adding:

"I can't remember who ate in the...domino room with me...I think there was somebody else in there... "

Jarman tells of helping Oswald correct a book order earlier that morning, then talking with him again on the first floor. Then at lunch time, Jarman said he bought a soft drink and returned to where he had been sitting by a first-floor window "where Oswald and I was talking." His testimony is confusing and appears incomplete. It was not helped by any clarifying questions from the Warren Commission attorney.

But if Oswald was not in the first floor domino room as he said, how could he have noted the presence of two men and described Norman and Jarman?

Bill Shelley, Oswald's supervisor, told the commission he saw Oswald near a telephone on the first floor about 10 minutes till noon. Carolyn Arnold, secretary to the Depository's vice president, was quoted in an FBI report saying "she thought she caught a fleeting glimpse of Lee Harvey Oswald standing in the (first floor) hallway" as she left the building to watch the motorcade. In 1978, Arnold told the "Dallas Morning News" she had been misquoted by the FBI. After reading over her statements of 1963, she stated:

"That is completely foreign to me. (The FBI account) would have forced me to have been turning back around to the building when, in fact, I was trying to watch the parade. Why would I be looking back inside the building? That doesn't make any sense to me."

After telling how Oswald had come to her office often for change, she gave this account of the incident:

"About a quarter of an hour before the assassination...about 12:15, it may have been later...I went to the lunchroom on the second floor for a moment...Oswald was sitting in one of the booth seats on the right-hand side of the room as you go in. He was alone as usual and appeared to be having lunch. I did not speak to him but I recognized him clearly."

While it is still possible that Oswald could have raced upstairs in time to be in the "sniper's" window by 12:30 p.m., recall that the Arnold Rowlands saw two men in the sixth-floor window, one with a rifle, at 12:15. This time can be fixed with confidence because Rowland reported seeing the man with the gun just as a nearby police radio announced that the Presidential motorcade was approaching Cedar Springs Road. Police dispatcher's records showed the motorcade passed Cedar Springs between 12:15 and 12:16 p.m.

The Warren Commission concluded that Oswald stayed on the sixth floor after he was seen by the elevator racers about 11:55 a.m. and remained there to commit the assassination.

As can be seen, there is quite credible evidence that he was exactly where he said he was -in the first-floor break or domino room - at the time of the shooting. Oswald then apparently walked to the Depository's second-floor lunchroom to buy a soft drink. It was here that a Dallas policeman encountered Oswald less than 90 seconds after the final shot was fired in the assassination.

Crossfire: The Oswald Encounter

Since at 12:30 p.m. November 22, 1963, the Presidential motorcade was running approximately five minutes behind schedule - probably due to the two unscheduled stops along the way ordered by Kennedy - it is unbelievable that an assassin would leisurely wait in the Depository domino room until 12:15 to make his move to the sixth floor. It is equally unbelievable that, having committed the "crime of the century" an assassin could make his way down five flights of stairs and be standing calmly when a policeman rushed into the lunchroom. Understand that the first floor of the Texas School Book Depository is slightly above ground level. One entered the building by walking up a flight of outside steps, then an additional flight of stairs led to the second floor. It was here that an employee's lunchroom was located to the rear of the building away from Elm Street.

Dallas motorcycle patrolman Marrion Baker rushed to the Depository after seeing pigeons fly off the building's roof at the sound of the first shots (See MOTORCADE). In a later reenactment for the Warren Commission, it took Baker only 15 seconds to park his cycle and race up the front steps of the Depository.

Baker told the Warren Commission:

"I had it in mind that the shots came from the top of this building..."

He continued:

"As I entered this lobby there were people going in as I entered. And I asked ...where the stairs or elevator was, and this man, Mr. Truly, spoke up and says to me..."I'm the building manager. Follow me, officer, and I will show you." So we immediately went out through the second set of doors, and we ran into the swinging door."

Depository superintendent Roy Truly had followed Baker into the building. He quickly went to the building's elevators, but could not bring them down since someone had left them locked in position on an upper floor. Truly told the commission:

"...those elevators...were both on the fifth floor, they were both even. And I tried to get one of them...it would have been impossible for him (Oswald) to have come down either one of those elevators after the assassination. He had to use the stairway as his only way of getting down - since we did see the elevators in those positions."

Truly yelled, "Bring that elevator down here!" to no avail and Baker said, "Let's take the stairs."

Moving up the stairs trailing Truly, Baker said he noticed a man walking away from him through a glass window in a door near the rear second-floor landing. With drawn pistol, Baker confronted the man and ordered him to come to him.

In a handwritten report to the FBI on November 23, Baker stated:

"On the second floor where the lunchroom is located, I saw a man standing in the lunchroom drinking a Coke."

However, the words "drinking a Coke" were scratched out in this report and there was no reference to the Coke in his Warren Commission testimony. Truly said the man, whom he recognized as Oswald, "didn't seem to be excited or overly afraid." He told the Warren Commission he noticed nothing in Oswald's hands, but this was months later after many discussions with federal authorities. Baker turned to Truly and asked if the man was an employee and Truly replied he was. Baker then turned and continued his race for the roof. Oswald apparently simply sauntered down the steps and out the front door of the Depository.

Mrs. Robert Reid, clerical supervisor at the Depository, was standing with Depository officials in front of the building at the time shots were fired (See THE CROWD). She then turned and ran into the building to her second-floor office. She told the Warren Commission:

"...I looked up and Oswald was coming in the back door to the office. I met him by the time I passed my desk several feet and I told him, "Oh, the President's been shot, but maybe they didn't hit him." He mumbled something to me, I kept walking, he did too. I didn't pay any attention to what he said because I had no thoughts of anything of him having any connection with it at all because he was very calm. He had gotten a Coke and was holding it in his hands...The only time I had seen him in the office was to come and get change and he already had a Coke in his hand so he didn't come for change..."

Like Baker, Mrs. Reid reenacted her movements for the Warren Commission on March 20, 1964. She said it took approximately two minutes to move the distance from where she heard the final shot to the point she met Oswald. As can be seen, the issue of the Coke becomes critical here. It strains one's imagination to believe that anyone could fire on the President of the United States, then run to the opposite corner of the sixth floor - where the rifle was discovered a short time later - stash the weapon, race down five flights of stairs and show no sign of exertion or anxiety when confronted by a policeman with a drawn pistol. This scenario becomes absurd if the purchase of a Coke from a vending machine with its attendant fumbling for pocket change is thrown into the time frame.

Baker told the FBI the next day that Oswald was "drinking a Coke" when he saw him, but then deleted any reference to the drink in his Warren Commission testimony. Truly, months later, said he did not notice anything in Oswald's hands. But Reid said Oswald was holding a Coke when she saw him seconds after his encounter with Baker. Even the accused assassin had something to say about the soft drink. In Appendix XI of the Warren Report, an FBI report tells of Oswald statements to police while in custody. According to this report:

"Oswald stated that on November 22, 1963, at the time of the search of the Texas School Book Depository building by Dallas Police officers, he was on the second floor of said building, having just purchased a Coca-Cola from the soft drink machine, at which time a police officer came into the room with pistol drawn and asked him if he worked there."

This Coke issue is a small one, but one which is indicative of the loopholes riddling the official story of the assassination. The issue of Oswald's documented presence in the Depository's lunchroom, with or without Coke, is further complicated by the statements of a Dallas deputy district court clerk.

Lillian Mooneyham, clerk of the 95th District Court, told the FBI that she watched the motorcade move west on Main from windows in the Dallas Criminal Courts Building, then ran with two others to the west side of the building. She heard an initial shot which she took to be a firecracker followed by a "slight pause and then two more shots were discharged, the second and third shots sounding closer together." According to an FBI report of January 10, 1964, Mrs. Mooneyham said:

"I left Judge (Henry) King's courtroom and went to the office of Judge Julian C. Hyer...where I continued to observe the happenings from Judge Hyer's window....Mrs. Mooneyham estimated that it was about four and a half to five minutes following the shots fired by the assassin, that she looked up towards the sixth floor of the TSBD and observed the figure of a man standing in the sixth floor window behind some cardboard boxes. This man appeared to Mrs. Mooneyham to be looking out of the window, however, the man was not close up to the window but was standing slightly back from it, so that Mrs. Mooneyham could not make out his features...."

Adding support to Mrs. Mooneyham's account of a man standing in the "sniper's nest" window minutes after the shooting are photographs taken about that time by military intelligence agent James Powell (See SOLDIERS) and a news photographer Tom Dillard. Dillard, who was riding in the motorcade said he took a picture of the Depository facade seconds after the last shot was fired. Powell estimated his picture was made about 30 seconds after the final shot.

A comparison with photos taken just prior to the shooting led photographic experts of the House Select Committee on Assassinations to conclude:

"There is an apparent rearranging of boxes within two minutes after the last shot was fired at President Kennedy."

Obviously, Oswald could not have been in the Depository lunchroom meeting Baker and Truly while arranging boxes on the sixth floor at the same time. Needless to say, Mrs. Mooneyham was never called as a witness before the Warren Commission. Her credible testimony remains buried in the Commission's 26 volumes. A further point here is that several Depository employees, including Billy Lovelady and William Shelley, were on or about the back stairway of the building just after the assassination. No one heard footsteps or saw Oswald racing down the five flights of stairs for his encounter with Baker and Truly. Recall that Victoria Adams and Sandra Styles, who worked for Scott, Foresman and Company in the Depository, told the FBI they both ran from the building down the back stairway after viewing the assassination from their fourth-floor office window. They neither encountered Oswald on the stairway nor remarked of hearing footsteps.

Did Oswald indeed fire the fatal shots, then stop to rearrange his box supports, then race to the opposite end of the Depository's sixth floor where he reportedly stashed his rifle, then race silently down five flights of stairs to be discovered calmly standing by a soft drink machine by Baker and Truly less than two minutes later? Or was it someone else who fired, then arranged a "sniper's nest" before quietly slipping out the rear of the Depository about the time Oswald was encountering Baker and Truly?

###

Also on the steps of the Depository was Joe R. Molina, the company's credit manager. Like most everyone else, Molina thought the shots came from west of the building. In 1964, Molina specifically asked to testify to the Warren Commission because of what happened to him after the assassination. Molina said about 1:30 a.m. on the Saturday following the assassination, he and his family were awakened by Dallas Police, who began searching his home. Molina told the commission:

"...they were looking for something...they sort of wanted to tie me up with this case in some way or another and they thought that I was implicated."

He said he was questioned about his membership in G. I. Forum, a predominately Hispanic group actively working to help veterans, and was told to report to Dallas Police headquarters later that day. Molina was kept waiting at the police station most of the day, then learned that his name had been given to the news media by Chief Curry, who described Molina as someone associated with "persons of subversive background." Unable to get a retraction from the Dallas Police, Molina asked to testify to the Warren Commission in an attempt to clear his name. But the damage had already been done.

On December 13, 21 days after the assassination, Molina was told that the Depository's credit system was to be automated and that he was to be replaced. He said the action came as no real surprise because the company had been receiving hate mail and phone calls accusing it of hiring communists. Despite assurances from Depository officials that Molina's firing was not connected to the events of the assassination, it appears obvious that Joe Molina too became one of its victims.

Many Depository employees went outside to view the motorcade. Most of them signed reports to the FBI during March 1964. Oddly, the reports all begin to sound alike in that the agents apparently never asked critical questions such as "Where did shots come from?", "How many shots?" or "Did you see the effect of any shot?" As the evidence quickly piled up against Oswald and the Depository became the center of the investigation, the authorities, news media and public soon forgot the initial focus of attention in Dealey Plaza - the Triple Underpass.

Crossfire: The Triple Underpass

"I saw something hit the pavement to the left rear of the car."
Assassination witness Royce G. Skelton

On the west side of Dealey Plaza is a large railroad bridge which spans the three main downtown Dallas traffic arteries of Commerce, Main and Elm Streets. Since all three streets converge under this concrete bridge, it quickly became known as the Triple Underpass. To the east of the Underpass is Dealey Plaza and downtown Dallas, while on the west are several roads leading to freeway systems and an industrial area. Atop the east side of the Triple Underpass, one has a panoramic view of Dealey Plaza from a position about 15 feet in the air.

This was the position of about a dozen men on November 22, 1963, as they stood along the eastern edge of the underpass to watch the Presidential motorcade approach and pass beneath them. Dallas policeman J. W. Foster was one of two police officers assigned as a security guard atop the Triple Underpass. His orders were to prevent any "unauthorized" personnel from standing on the railroad bridge when Kennedy passed. Foster had allowed some railroad workers, who had been repairing rails, to remain on the underpass after checking their identity. Since the bridge actually was railroad property and it was railway workers who walked over to the eastern banister to view the motorcade, he did not believe they fell into the "unauthorized" category.

He told the Warren Commission he had earlier prevented some people from standing on the bridge - one of these was AP photographer James Altgens (See THE CROWD). Foster said as the motorcade approached he was standing just behind the line of railway workers, about 10 or 11 of them, when he heard what sounded like a large firecracker. He moved up to the concrete railing to get a better view. He said he saw:

"...the President slump over in the car, and his head looked just like it blew up."

From his vantage point - above and directly in front of the car - this trained and experienced police officer may have been one of the best witnesses to what actually happened at the time of the shooting. However, neither in his report of December 4, 1963, nor in his April 9, 1964, testimony to the Warren Commission was he asked to describe in detail what he saw.

Warren Commission lawyer Joseph Ball did ask Foster his opinion as to the source of the shots and Foster replied:

"It came from back in toward the corner of Elm and Houston Streets (the location of the Texas School Book Depository)."

Foster said he ran from the underpass toward the Depository building, where he watched the rear exits until a sergeant came and told him to check out railroad cars in the nearby switching yard. However, Foster said he went instead to the front of the Depository and told a supervisor where he was when shots were fired, then "moved to - down the roadway there, down to see if I could find where any of the shots hit." He was successful. Foster told the commission he "found where one shot had hit the turf..." Foster said he found where a bullet had struck the earth just beside a manhole cover on the south side of Elm Street. Foster remained at this location for a time until the evidence was taken away by an unidentified man (See AFTERMATH IN DALLAS).

The spot where Foster found a tear in the grass was near where witness Jean Hill (See THE CROWD) was standing at the time of the assassination. Shortly after the shooting, she was questioned by Secret Service agents, one of whom asked her if she saw a bullet land in the grass near her feet.

Foster's counterpart on the west side of the Triple Underpass was Officer J.C. White. White said he was approximately in the middle of the underpass when the motorcade passed below, but that he didn't see or hear anything because a "big long freight train" was moving north between him and Dealey Plaza. Oddly, close scrutiny of films and photographs taken that day show no such freight train moving at that time. But if the stories of the two Dallas policemen on top of the underpass seem strangely incomplete and sketchy, this was not the case of the railroad workers standing over the motorcade.

These workers not only heard shots from their left, the direction of the infamous Grassy Knoll, but also saw smoke drift out from under the trees lining the knoll.

Crossfire: Smoke from the Grassy Knoll

Sam M. Holland, a track and signal supervisor for the Union Terminal Railroad Company, told the Warren Commission he went to the top of the Triple Underpass about 11:45 a.m. that day. He said there were two Dallas policemen and "...a plainclothes detective, or FBI agent or something like that..." there and that he assisted in identifying the railroad employees. He said by the time the motorcade arrived, other people were lining the Triple Underpass, but that the police were checking identification and sending them away.

By the time the Presidential limousine was approaching the underpass, Holland was standing just in front of Officer Foster. He told the commission:

"And the motorcade was coming down in this fashion, and the President was waving to the people on this (north) side (of Elm)...the first report that I heard...was pretty loud...and the car traveled a few yards and Governor Connally turned in this fashion, like that, with his hand out and...another report rang out and he slumped down in his seat...(then Kennedy) was hit again along...in here....I observed it. It knocked him completely down on the floor...just slumped completely over...I heard a third report and I counted four shots...There was a shot, a report. I don't know whether it was a shot. I can't say that. And a puff of smoke came out about six or eight feet above the ground right out from under those trees."

Holland said the first two or three shots seemed to come from "the upper part of the street," followed by others of "different sounds, different reports." In a 1966 filmed interview, Holland was even more specific:

"I looked over to where I thought the shot came from and I saw a puff of smoke still lingering under the trees in front of the wooden fence. The report sounded like it came from behind the wooden fence....I know where the third shot came from - behind the picket fence. There's no doubt whatsoever in my mind."

Due to Holland's credibility and clear description of what he saw, the Warren Commission Report accurately stated:

"According to S.M. Holland, there were four shots which sounded as though they came from the trees on the north side of Elm Street where he saw a puff of smoke."

Having mentioned the smoke in the trees, the Report went on to conclude:

"In contrast to the testimony of the witnesses who heard and observed shots fired from the Depository, the Commission's investigation has disclosed no credible evidence that any shots were fired from anywhere else."

The clear implication by the Warren Report is that Holland was mistaken in believing shots came from behind the wooden picket fence. However, the testimony of the other railroad workers on the Triple Underpass - none of whom were asked to give testimony to the Warren Commission - corroborated Holland's version of the assassination. The only account of what they saw is in FBI reports made during March 1964. These reports are sketchy and seem very incomplete in view of the questions that these men should have been asked.

James L. Simmons, a Union Terminal car inspector, was in the group on the Triple Underpass. In his FBI report, it merely states:

"...when the President's car started down Elm Street he heard three shots ring out. President Kennedy slumped down in his seat and appeared to have been hit by a bullet....Simmons said he thought he saw exhaust fumes of smoke near the embankment in front of the Texas School Book Depository building."

During a 1966 filmed interview, Simmons' account is much clearer:

"As the President's limousine rounded the curve on Elm Street, there was a loud explosion...It sounded like it came from the left and in front of us, towards the wooden fence. And there was a puff of smoke that came from underneath the trees on the embankment directly in front of the wooden fence....I was talking to Patrolman Foster at the time and as soon as we heard the shots, we ran around to (behind) the picket fence...There was no one there but there were footprints in the mud around the fence and footprints on the two-by-four railing on the fence..."

Railroad workers who also saw smoke off to their left included Nolan H. Potter, Richard C. Dodd and Clemon E. Johnson.

In an FBI report, Simmons was quoted as seeing smoke near the Depository in his FBI report, yet he plainly stated later, it was in front of the Grassy Knoll fence. There is no mention of smoke in Dodd's FBI report, yet in a later filmed interview, he plainly stated:

"Smoke came from behind the hedge on the north side of the plaza."

In 1966 interviews in Dallas, both Walter L. Winborn and Thomas J. Murphy - who were among the railroad workers on the Triple Underpass - both confirmed seeing smoke in the trees on the Grassy Knoll. It would be most interesting to talk to the other people who stood on the Triple Underpass that day. Perhaps, they too saw the smoke but this sighting was left out of their reports, if any report was made.

Further corroboration of the smoke came well into the 1980s, when a frame from TV news film was analyzed by assassination researchers. NBC photographer Dave Weigman was riding in the seventh car in the motorcade. Hearing shots, Weigman started filming even before the firing stopped. He then jumped out of the convertible and ran up the Grassy Knoll with his camera still operating. Because of all this motion, his blurred and jerky film was overlooked as assassination evidence until recently. However, in one clear frame, which depicts the Presidential limousine just entering the Triple Underpass, a puff of smoke is clearly visible hanging in front of trees on the knoll - exactly where Holland and the other railroad workers claimed to have seen it.

It has been well established that there was no other natural source of smoke in that area that day, although the FBI reports attempted to show that it may have come from police motorcycles although none were on the knoll at the time. Warren Commission apologists for years have tried to argue that modern rifles do not smoke. This is an error, since a recently-oiled rifle or deficient ammunition certainly can cause white smoke during firing. This was made clear to this author in the summer of 1978 when the House Select Committee on Assassinations fired rifles in Dealey Plaza in connection with their acoustical studies. Visible puffs of smoke were common. And considering the slightly-gusting breeze from the north that day, the idea that smoke drifted over Elm Street from the knoll is most plausible. It is now obvious that many people that day saw this puff of smoke drifting down from the knoll - also recall those witnesses who said they smelled gunpowder in the lower end of Dealey Plaza. However, it is equally obvious that the authorities, particularly the FBI and the Warren Commission, did not want to hear about it.

Sam Holland also was supported in his testimony that shots came from the knoll by fellow railroad workers Richard Dodd, James Simmons and Thomas J. Murphy. Another railroad worker, Royce G. Skelton, supported the statements of Sheriff Decker and others who saw one of the first bullets strike the pavement near Kennedy's car.

In an affidavit signed the day of the assassination, Skelton stated:

"I was standing on top of the train trestle where it crosses Elm Street with Austin Miller. We saw the motorcade come around the corner and I heard something which I thought was fireworks. I saw something hit the pavement at the left rear of the (President's) car, then the car got in the right-hand lane and I heard two more shots. I heard a woman (say) "Oh no" or something and grab a man inside the car. I then heard another shot and saw the bullet hit the pavement. The concrete was knocked to the south away from the car. It hit the pavement in the left or center lane..."

Austin Miller, standing next to Skelton on the Triple Underpass, also mentioned this errant bullet in his affidavit that day. Miller stated:

"...I saw a convertible automobile turn west on Elm off Houston Street. It had (proceeded) about halfway from Houston Street to the Underpass when I heard what sounded like a shot (then in) a short second two more sharp reports...One shot apparently hit the street past the car. I saw something which I thought was smoke or steam coming from a group of trees north of Elm off the railroad tracks."

Dallas Policeman Earle Brown was standing on the catwalk of a railroad bridge crossing over Stemmons Freeway located just north of the Triple Underpass. Because of his location, Brown said he was unable to get a clear view of the motorcade. He told the Warren Commission:

"...actually, the first I noticed the car was when it stopped....after it made the turn (onto Elm Street) and when the shots were fired, it stopped."

Commission Attorney Joseph Ball asked, "Did it come to a complete stop?"

Brown replied:

"That I couldn't swear to."

"It appeared to be slowed down some," offered Ball, encouraging a subtle change in Brown's testimony. Brown responded:

"Yes, it slowed down."

Brown said the first indication to him that something was wrong was when a large flock of pigeons suddenly flew up from a grassy low area between him and the Underpass. he said:

"...they heard the shots before we did because I saw them flying up...then I heard these shots and then I smelled this gunpowder...It come on...maybe a couple of minutes later."

Brown said the gunpowder smell seemed to come from the direction of the Depository. However, the Grassy Knoll was almost in a direct line between the officer and the Depository.

But the one assassination witness who single-handedly caused more concern within the 1963-64 federal investigation than anyone else was Jim Tague, who was the third man wounded in Dealey Plaza on November 22, 1963.

Crossfire: The Third Wounded Man

James Thomas Tague, like Jean Hill and Mary Moorman, was not planning to see President Kennedy. Shortly after noon that day, he had driven downtown to take a girlfriend (later his wife) to lunch. As Tague drove his car east on Commerce Street, he found himself stopped in the traffic which was halted at Houston Street due to the arrival of the Presidential motorcade. The hood of his car was just poking out the east side of the Triple Underpass. Tague got out of his car and stood by the underpass on a small concrete median separating Commerce and Main to watch the motorcade.

In an interview with this author, Tague said when the shots were fired, he immediately thought, "Who's the nut throwing firecrackers?" However, after hearing more shots, he realized what was happening and ducked behind the corner of the underpass. He said the shots were coming from the area of the Grassy Knoll "behind the concrete monument".

Tague was watching a policeman run up the Grassy Knoll with a drawn pistol when another policeman came up to him asking, "What happened?" "I don't know," mumbled the shocked Tague.

Dallas motorcycle patrolman Clyde A. Haygood had been riding back in the motorcade on Main Street approaching Main when he heard a shot, then a pause followed by two shots close together. He gunned his three-wheeled motorcycle on up Houston and turned on Elm in time to see people pointing toward the Grassy Knoll and the railroad yards. Haygood said he got off his cycle on Elm Street just below the Grassy Knoll and went up into the railroad yards but saw nothing suspicious despite quite a number people in the area. He said he returned to his motorcycle after speaking to a man he believed to be a railroad detective. Haygood told the Warren Commission:

"At that time some people came up and started talking to me as to the shooting...one came up...and said he had gotten hit by a piece of concrete or something, and he did have a slight cut on his right cheek, upper portion of his cheek just to the right of his nose."

Haygood said just then another witness came up and told him the first shot had come from the Texas School Book Depository. Using the call number 142, Haygood radioed the police dispatcher and asked that the Depository be sealed off. He also mentioned a man who had been wounded by flying concrete.

Tague and the policeman walked into the plaza a bit and encountered a man, who was sobbing, "His head exploded!" This man apparently was Charles Brehm (See THE CROWD).

Moments later Deputy Sheriff Eddy Walthers arrived and, pointing to Tague, said, "You've got blood on your face." In his report that day, Walthers, who was standing with the other deputies in front of the Sheriff's Office, stated:

"...I immediately went to the Triple Underpass on Elm Street in an effort to locate possible marks left by stray bullets. While I was looking for possible marks, some unknown person stated to me that something had hit his face while he was parked on Main Street...Upon examining the curb and pavement in this vicinity I found where a bullet had splattered on the top edge of the curb on Main Street...Due to the fact that the projectile struck so near the underpass, it was, in my opinion, probably the last shot that was fired and had apparently went high and above the President's car."

Tague said he called the Dallas FBI office later that afternoon, to tell them about the bullet striking the curb, but "they didn't want my testimony about the stray bullet."

Apparently, no one else wanted to hear about the extraneous bullet either. There was no mention of the incident in the news accounts at the time nor was there any investigation of the bullet mark on the curb until the summer of 1964.

During late 1963 and early 1964, it was widely reported that the first shot struck Kennedy in the back, the second shot hit Governor Connally and the third was the fatal head shot. This was a consistent theory of three bullets. Tague's story of yet another bullet was totally inconsistent with the lone assassin three shot theory being formulated by the Warren Commission, who initially appears to have been prepared to ignore both Tague and the bullet mark on the curb.

In fact, there may have been an effort to eliminate the evidence. In late May 1964, about a month before the Warren Commission finally talked to Tague, the car salesman took a camera to Dealey Plaza to photograph the mark on the curb. He was surprised to find that it was not there. Only faint traces of the bullet mark were found. Tague said it looked as if someone had tried to repair the curb.

Apparently it was a letter from an assistant U.S. attorney in Dallas which finally prompted the Warren Commission to confront the Tague wounding. Martha Jo Stroud mailed a letter to Commission General Counsel J. Lee Rankin on June 9, 1964. In the letter was the comment:

"I am enclosing a photograph made by Tom Dillard of the Dallas Morning News. It is a shot of the curb which was taken shortly after the assassination on November 22, 1963. When I talked to Mr. Dillard yesterday he indicated he did not know whether the photograph was material. He did say, however, that he examined the curb when the photo was taken and that it looked like a piece of lead had struck it."

Faced with this official notification of the curb shot, the Commission was stirred to action. On July 7, 1964, the Warren Commission asked the FBI to look into the matter. In an FBI document dated July 17, the FBI stated:

"The area on the curb (where the bullet or fragment hit) was carefully checked and it was ascertained there was no nick in the curb in the checked area, nor was any mark observed."

The disappearance of a mark which had been plainly seen eight months earlier was explained in this document:

"It should be noted that, since this mark was observed on November 22, 1963, there have been numerous rains, which could have possibly washed away such a mark and also that the area is cleaned by a street cleaning machine about once a week, which could also wash away any such mark."

But if the FBI could ignore the mark, the Commission could not. Since both a Dallas policeman and a sheriff's deputy had mentioned Tague in their reports, although not by name, and after the arrival of Stroud's letter, his story could no longer be ignored.

On July 23, 1964, Tague finally was deposed in Dallas by Commission Attorney Wesley Liebeler. Following Tague's testimony, the Commission again asked the Bureau to investigate the matter. This time the FBI removed the piece of curb in question and took it to Washington for analysis. In an August 12, 1964, report signed by J. Edgar Hoover, it was stated:

"Small foreign metal smears were found adhering to the curbing section within the area of the mark. These metal smears were spectrographically determined to be essentially lead with a trace of antimony. No copper was found. The lead could have originated from the lead core of a mutilated metal-jacketed bullet such as the type of bullet loaded into 6.5 millimeter Mannlicher-Carcano cartridges or from some other source having the same composition...The absence of copper precludes the possibility that the mark on the curbing section was made by an unjacketed military-type full metal-jacketed bullet...Further, the damage to the curbing would have been much more extensive if a rifle bullet had struck the curbing without first having struck some other object. Therefore, this mark could not have been made by the first impact of a high velocity bullet."

So the FBI, which at first had stated no bullet hit the curb now said the mark had to have been made by a rifle bullet.

If the FBI is correct - and keep in mind the many instances of misinformation and omission by the Bureau regarding assassination evidence - the mark on the curb could only have been made by the lead fragment of a bullet. Yet the only one which could have lost such an amount of lead is the final head shot and that was at a location more than 270 feet away, a considerable distance for a small fragment to travel and still impact the curb as described. If the bullet mark on the curb was a miss, it was an incredible miss. If the shot which struck the Main Street curb came from the Texas School Book Depository's sixth floor, it must have missed Kennedy by 33 feet in the air and 21 feet to the right. Such a miss is hardly compatible with the claim that Oswald was able to hit home with two out of three shots from his inefficient rifle aiming at a target moving laterally and away from him at about 200 yards.

Another possibility, never considered by the Warren Commission, was that the mark was made by a lead bullet without copper jacketing. But of course, this would indicate different ammunition and perhaps a different rifle than the one allegedly used by Oswald. Or perhaps the curb was hit by a large fragment of bullet which had already struck the street (recall the witnesses who saw one do just that) and had separated from the copper jacket.

Whatever the truth of the curb bullet and despite the attempt to ignore this evidence, the matter of the wounding of Tague was finally acknowledged and the Warren Commission was compelled to construct a scenario of the assassination which included the "Single-Bullet Theory" (See THE WARREN COMMISSION), a theory which has not been accepted by a majority of Americans.

###

Despite immediate attempts to establish the Texas School Book Depository as the sole location from which shots were fired, public attention, both in 1963 and even today, continued to be drawn to the wooded area to the west of the Depository which has become known as the Grassy Knoll.

Crossfire: The Grassy Knoll

"(Policemen were) running right behind me...in the line of the shooting."

Assassination witness Abraham Zapruder

Probably no small section of land in the United States has been the object of more controversy than that small portion of Dealey Plaza known as the Grassy Knoll.

While Elm Street and two large grassy areas of Dealey Plaza dip down approximately 24 feet as one travels the 495 feet from Houston Street on the east, the Grassy Knoll remains at ground level. There actually are two grassy knolls on both the north and south sides of the west end of the plaza, but during the assassination of President John F. Kennedy, it was the north knoll which drew public attention.

Located between the Texas School Book Depository and the Triple Underpass, the Grassy Knoll provided an ideal ambush site. Running along the top of the knoll was a wooden picket fence about five feet high. In front of this fence were shrubs and evergreen trees which, even in late November, provided a leafy canopy over the fence. The fence ran east approximately 75 feet from the north edge of the Triple Underpass, then turned north for about 50 feet, ending in a parking area behind a concrete pergola located to the west of the Depository.

It was from a vantage point atop a low concrete wall on the south end of this pergola that the most famous home movie of all time was made - the Abraham Zapruder film.

Crossfire: The Zapruder Film

A 22-second, 8mm film made on November 22, 1963, became the cornerstone of investigations, both public and private, in the years after the Kennedy assassination. It has been regarded as the most objective, and thus most important, piece of evidence in the attempts to unravel what actually happened to President Kennedy. And it almost didn't happen. Abraham Zapruder, a ladies dress manufacturer with offices at 501 Elm Street in downtown Dallas near Jack Ruby's nightclub, had not intended to film that day. What with his work and the morning rains, Zapruder thought "I wouldn't have a chance even to see the President." But his secretary, Lillian Rogers, urged him to make use of his new camera - a Bell & Howell 8mm camera with a telephoto lens. So Zapruder made a 14-mile round-trip drive to his home to retrieve his camera. By the time he returned, crowds were already gathering to watch the motorcade. After trying several different locations - none of which proved suitable for viewing the President without obstructions - Zapruder finally climbed onto a 4-foot-high concrete block at the end of two steps leading to the pergola on the Grassy Knoll. He almost lost his balance while testing his camera on some nearby office workers, so he asked one of the group, his receptionist Marilyn Sitzman, to join him and provide steady support. From this excellent vantage spot, Zapruder and Sitzman watched the motorcade approach Elm Street. Having set the camera's speed control on "run" and his lens on "telephoto," Zapruder proceeded to film the entire assassination sequence.

The film must be seen run in its entirety for a viewer to actually receive its maximum impact. But, in synopsis, the film shows:

"The motorcade curves onto Elm and begins moving slowly toward the camera. President Kennedy and his wife are smiling and waving to opposite sides of the street. Then the presidential limousine disappears for a brief second behind a freeway sign and when it emerges, Kennedy is already reacting to a shot. He clenches his fists and brings both up to his throat. He does not appear to say anything, but only remains stiff and upright, sagging slightly to his left. Connally turns to his right, apparently trying to see behind him, then begins to turn back to his left when he freezes. His hair flies up and his mouth opens. He is obviously struck by a bullet. Mrs. Kennedy meanwhile has placed her hand on her husband's arm and is looking at him horrified as he continues to sag toward her. Seconds go by and, by now, Kennedy is bent slightly forward. Suddenly, after an almost imperceptible forward motion of his head, the entire right side of his skull explodes in a halo of blood and brain matter. Kennedy is slammed violently backwards to the left rear where he rebounds off the back of the seat and falls toward the car's floor. Mrs. Kennedy climbs onto the trunk of the limousine in an effort to grab something while a Secret Service agent leaps onto the rear of the car, which finally begins to accelerate."

On July 22, 1964, Zapruder told the Warren Commission:

"I heard the first shot and I saw the President lean over and grab himself like this (holding his left chest area)."

His testimony is very pertinent because the Warren Commission, in its attempt to prove a lone assassin fired from the sixth floor of the Depository, stated:

"...the evidence indicated that the President was not hit until at least frame 210 and that he was probably hit by frame 225. The possibility of variations in reaction time in addition to the obstruction of Zapruder's view by the sign precluded a more specific determination than that the President was probably shot through the neck between frames 210 and 225."

By placing the moment of the first shot at the point where Kennedy was out of Zapruder's sight behind the sign, the commission moved the shot closer to the visual effect of a strike on Connally, buttressing the "Single Bullet" theory. By moving the time of the shot forward, the Commission also abolished the worrisome problem of how an assassin in the sixth-floor window could have accurately fired through obscuring tree branches.

The problem with the Commission's scenario of a hit between frames 210 and 225, of course, is that Zapruder claims he saw Kennedy react to the first shot, which had to have happened before he disappeared from camera view.

Zapruder went on to tell the Commission that following the shooting, he saw some motorcycle policemen "running right behind me...in the line of the shooting." He said:

"I guess they thought it came from right behind me."

When asked where he thought the shots came from, Zapruder replied:

"...I also thought it came from back of me."

In fact, during his testimony, Zapruder indicates on four separate occasions that he thought shots came from behind him in the direction of the picket fence on the Grassy Knoll. But then Commission Attorney Wesley J. Liebeler asked Zapruder, "But you didn't form any opinion at that time as to what direction the shots did come from actually?" Zapruder - who by this time was fully familiar with the public position that Oswald had fired three shots from the Depository -replied, "No."

Zapruder, who was very shaken by the assassination, noted that there was considerable reverberation in Dealey Plaza at the time. He said he did not remember jumping down from the cement block and crouching for cover inside the white pergola with Sitzman (as determined by photographs taken at the time) nor going back to his office. He only recalled walking back up Elm Street in a daze, yelling:

"They shot him, they shot him, they shot him."

His secretary called authorities and soon men came to take his film for processing. By Monday, November 25, Zapruder's film had been sold to "Life" magazine. In charge of the sale was "Life's" Publisher C.D. Jackson, who later claimed he was so horrified by the film that he wanted to lock it away. However, in later years, Jackson was shown to have been closely associated with CIA officials. In one instance, when former CIA director Walter Bedell Smith wanted prominent Americans as members of the shadowy and elitist Bilderberger organization, he said he "turned the matter over to C.D. Jackson and things really got going."

Asked about this sale by Liebeler, Zapruder said:

"Well, I just wonder whether I should answer it or not because it involves a lot of things and it's not one price - it's a question of how they are going to use it, are they going to use it or are they not going to use it..."

He finally said:

"I received $25,000, as you know, and I have given that to the Firemen's and Policemen's Benevolence with a suggestion (to use the money) for Mrs. Tippit (The Dallas policeman slain the afternoon of the assassination - See AFTERMATH)."

Later in his testimony, Zapruder told of giving his camera to Bell & Howell for its archives. He said, in return, he asked the company to donate a sound projector to the "Golden Age Group". He told Liebeler:

"I didn't want anything for myself....I don't like to talk about it too much."

Like so much of the Warren Commission testimony, Zapruder's statement was less than truthful. A copy of his contract with "Life" reveals that his 18-second film brought him more than $150,000. Why so much for one film? Perhaps it has something to do with the fact that no member of the American public saw the Zapruder film run as a movie while it was in the sole possession of Time-Life Corp.

While few, if any, of the Warren Commission members viewed the film, single frames from this important piece of evidence were printed in Volume XVIII. But an odd thing happened. No one who has viewed the Zapruder film has been unaffected by the final, gory head shot followed instantaneously by Kennedy's violent fall rearward. Most researchers consider this moment in the film as obvious evidence of a shot from Kennedy's right front (the area of the Grassy Knoll).

Yet when published by the Warren Commission, the critical frames which depict the rearward motion of Kennedy's head were transposed to indicate a forward motion. In 1965 FBI director J. Edgar Hoover explained this reversing of the Zapruder frames as a "printing error".

Further twisting of what was depicted in the film came soon after the assassination. In its December 6, 1963, issue, "Life" magazine reported the fact that the Dallas doctors regarded a small wound in Kennedy's throat as an entrance wound, a real problem considering that the Texas School Book Depository was to his rear at all times. So a "Life" writer simply threw out the explanation:

"But (Zapruder's) 8mm film shows the President turning his body far around to the right as he waves to someone in the crowd. His throat is exposed - toward the sniper's nest - just before he clutches it."

This account is patently wrong, as anyone who has seen the film can verify. The reason for such wrongful information at such a critical time will probably never be known, as the author of this statement, Paul Mandel, died shortly afterward (See CONVENIENT DEATHS).

Then there is the story of Dan Rather, which has been known to assassination researchers for years. Rather, then a CBS newsman, was the only newsman present at a private screening of the Zapruder film the day after the assassination. He described what was in the film over nationwide radio and was fairly accurate until he described the fatal head shot. Rather stated Kennedy's head "went forward with considerable violence," the exact opposite of what is in the film. Several months later, Rather was promoted to White House correspondent for CBS and by the 1980s, he was chief news anchorman.

Another questionable statement by Rather involves his location at the time of the assassination. In his book, "The Camera Never Blinks," Rather wrote how he was waiting to pick up news film from CBS cameramen in the Presidential motorcade. He wrote he was standing on the west side of the Triple Underpass and missed witnessing the assassination by only a few yards.

However, recently discovered film footage of the west side of the underpass has now become public. This film plus some still photographs show the Kennedy limousine speeding through the underpass and on to Stemmons Freeway - but no sign of Dan Rather.

The American public finally got the opportunity to view the Zapruder film only because of the Clay Shaw trial in New Orleans during 1967-69. During that turbulent trial (See THE GARRISON INVESTIGATION), New Orleans District Attorney Jim Garrison attempted to prove there was a conspiracy to kill President Kennedy and that New Orleans Trade Mart director Clay Shaw was a member of that conspiracy.

As part of Garrison's attempt to prove the existence of a conspiracy, he subpoenaed the Zapruder film from Time-Life Corp. Time-Life fought this subpoena all the way to the Supreme Court, which finally ruled that the corporation had to comply with the legal subpoena. Time-Life grudgingly turned over to Garrison a somewhat blurry, copy of the film - but that was enough. Soon, thanks to the copying efforts of Garrison's staff, bootleg Zapruder films were in the hands of several assassination researchers. Finally in March 1975, a copy of the film was aired nationally about midnight on ABC's "Goodnight America". At long last, the American public was able to see for themselves the assassination of their 35th President.

Within a few years clearer copies of the Zapruder film became available to the public. From the beginning, researchers have used the Zapruder film as the cornerstone of assassination evidence - a virtual time clock of the events in Dealey Plaza based on the known average camera speed of 18.3 frames per second. However, today the Zapruder film itself has been called into question.

In 1971, author David Lifton was permitted to view an exceptionally good quality copy of the Zapruder in Time-Life Los Angeles office. He said the rear of Kennedy's head in the critical moments following the head shot appeared to have been "blackened out" and he discovered "splices on the film which had never been mentioned by Time-Life."

His suspicion that the film may have been tampered with by persons with access to sophisticated photographic equipment was heightened in 1976 with the release of CIA item 450. This group of documents, pried from the Agency by a Freedom of Information suit, indicated the Zapruder film was at the CIA's National Photo Interpretation Center (NPIC) possibly on the night of the assassination and "certainly within days of the assassination". One of the documents tells of the existence of either a negative or a master positive of the film and calls for the production of four prints - one "test print" and three duplicates. Interestingly, this number of prints is exactly what existed in Dallas the day after the assassination - one original and three copies.

Lifton wrote:

"In my view, previously unreported CIA possession of the Zapruder film compromised the film's value as evidence: (1) the forward motion of Kennedy's head, for one frame preceding frame 313 might be the result of an altered film, and if that was so, it made the theory of a forward high-angle shot...completely unnecessary; (2) an altered film might also explain why the occipital area (of Kennedy's head), where the Dallas doctors saw a wound, appears suspiciously dark, whereas a large wound appears on the forward, right-hand side of the head, where the Dallas doctors saw no wound at all."

Photographic analyst and researcher Jack White concurs with Lifton, stating he detected evidence of photographic retouching in some Zapruder frames.

If the CIA indeed tampered with the Zapruder film after the assassination, this piece of evidence - long considered one of the best pieces of evidence - becomes less credible. And like so much else in the assassination case, it is the suppression and deception involved with the Zapruder film which may eventually reveal more than the film itself.

####

Just down the slope of the Grassy Knoll from Zapruder was the Bill Newman family. They not only noticed Zapruder with his camera, but in later years, Newman told this author:

"At first I thought he shot the President."

Bill and Gayle Newman, along with their two young sons, had gone to Love Field to see Kennedy. But when they didn't get a good view, they rushed downtown and situated themselves on Elm Street just below the concrete cupola.

Newman recalled for this author:

"We hadn't been there five minutes when the President turned onto Elm Street. As he was coming straight toward us there was a boom, boom, real close together. I thought someone was throwing firecrackers. He got this bewildered look on his face and was sort of slowing moving back and forth. Then he got nearer to us and, bam, a shot took the right side of his head off. His ear flew off. I heard Mrs. Kennedy say, "Oh, my God, no, they shot Jack!" He was knocked violently back against the seat, almost as if he had been hit by a baseball bat. At that time I was looking right at the President and I thought the shots were coming from directly behind us. I said, "That's it! Get on the ground!" The car momentarily stopped and the driver seemed to have a radio or phone up to his ear and he seemed to be waiting on some word. Some Secret Service men reached into their car and came out with some sort of machine-gun. Then the cars roared off. Very soon after this a man asked us what happened and we told him and he took us to Channel 8 (WFAA-TV) studios."

Newman said some sheriff's deputies were waiting for them after the TV interview and took them to the Sheriff's office where they joined other Dealey Plaza witnesses, who were held for about six hours.

He said on Sunday, November 24, some FBI agents came to their home and "took down what we said."

That was the last contact the Newmans had with federal authorities. He said:

"I was a little disappointed that I didn't get called to testify to the Warren Commission. Someone told me that the reason I wasn't asked to testify was that I was talking about shots from someplace other than the Depository building....I've already been corrected several times that I was wrong about several things and that there are experts who know more about it than I do. But it's real hard for me to believe that it was the act of one lone individual. I've gotten the feeling over the years that people in Washington know what really happened but it's never been divulged. But then I have no evidence to that."

Near the Newmans was Cheryl McKinnon, who later became a reporter for the "San Diego Star News."

In 1983, she wrote of her experience:

"On Nov. 22, 1963, I stood, along with hundreds of others, on the Grassy Knoll in Dealey Plaza, waiting for just one thing - a chance to see, even just for a moment, that magical person, the President, John F. Kennedy....As a journalism major in school, my plans were to write about my experiences as a class project....As we stood watching the motorcade turn onto Elm Street, I tried to grasp every tiny detail of both President Kennedy and Mrs. Kennedy. "How happy they look," I thought. Suddenly three shots in rapid succession rang out. Myself and dozens of others standing nearby turned in horror toward the back of the Grassy Knoll where it seemed the sounds had originated. Puffs of white smoke still hung in the air in small patches. But no one was visible....I tried to maintain the faith with my Government. I have read the Warren Commission Report in its entirety and dozens of other books as well. I am sorry to say that the only thing I am absolutely sure of today is that at least two of the shots fired that day in Dealey Plaza came from behind where I stood on the Knoll, not from the book Depository....I have never quite had the same faith and trust in those that lead us as I did before."

Sitting on the steps leading to the top of the Grassy Knoll at the time of the assassination was Emmet J. Hudson, one of the grounds keepers of Dealey Plaza. With Hudson were two other men, neither apparently were ever identified by the federal investigations. In his Warren Commission testimony, Hudson recalled:

"Well, there was a young fellow, oh, I would judge his age about in his late twenties. He said he had been looking for a place to park...he finally (had) just taken a place over there in one of them parking lots, and he came on down there and said he worked over there on Industrial and me and him both just sat down there on those steps. When the motorcade turned off of Houston onto Elm, we got up and stood up, me and him both....and so the first shot rung out and, of course, I didn't realize it was a shot...the motorcade had done got further on down Elm...I happened to be looking right at him when that bullet hit him - the second shot....it looked like it hit him somewhere along about a little bit behind the ear and a little above the ear (on the right-hand side of his head)...this young fellow that was...standing there with me...he says, "Lay down, mister, somebody is shooting the President."...he kept on repeating, "Lay down", so he was already laying down one way on the sidewalk, so I just laid down over on the ground and resting my arm on the ground...when that third shot rung out...you could tell the shot was coming from above and kind of behind."

In his testimony, Hudson plainly tried to tell Commission attorney Liebeler that the shots came "from above and kind of behind" him, the location of the picket fence on the Grassy Knoll. Liebeler led Hudson, saying:

"And that would fit in with the Texas School Book Depository, wouldn't it?"

"Yes," replied an agreeable Hudson.

Liebeler then asked Hudson if he saw anyone standing in the area with a rifle "...on the grassy spot up there near where you were standing or on the overpass or any place else?"

Hudson replied:

"I never seen anyone with a gun up there except the patrols."

"The policemen?", asked Liebeler.

"Yes, sir," said Hudson.

In an affidavit signed the day of the assassination, Hudson was even more specific as to where shots came from. He stated:

"The shots that I heard definitely came from behind and above me."

Sitting near the mid-way point of the steps leading to the top of the Grassy Knoll, a location "behind and above" would be the exact position of the easternmost leg of the wooden picket fence.

Hudson said he did not know the young man who sat with him and, apparently, the federal authorities were never able to locate him. The third man appears behind Hudson in photographs taken in the seconds during which the head shot occurs. He too has been unidentified but, perhaps, is the explanation for one of the enduring assassination mysteries.

Crossfire: The Black Dog Man

In at least two photographs taken during the assassination by separate photographers, a human figure is visible behind a low retaining wall to the south of the Grassy Knoll pergola behind Zapruder's position. In photos made seconds later, this figure has disappeared, leading many assassination researchers to suspect that this figure may have been an assassin. This suspicion was heightened when the House Select Committee on Assassinations had photographs of the figure computer enhanced and concluded that it indeed was the figure of a person, who appeared to be holding a long object.

With no known identity, this person was dubbed "the black dog man" by researchers and committee staffers because in a photo taken by Phil Willis the figure resembles a black dog sitting on its haunches atop the wall. Closer examination of the photos, however, indicates the figure is most likely farther back from the retaining wall. And this may provide a partial answer to the figure's identity.

In photos of the assassination, a third man can be seen joining Hudson and his companion on the steps of the Grassy Knoll just as the Presidential limousine arrives opposite them on Elm Street. Within scant seconds of the fatal head shot, the third man lifts his left foot and within seconds has disappeared back up the steps.

"Life" magazine, in its November 24, 1967, issue, displays the photographs of Hugh Betzner and Phil Willis (See THE CROWD) and comments:

"A dark shape is seen in both pictures on the slope - which has become famous as the "grassy knoll" - to the left of the Stemmons Freeway sign and half hidden by a concrete wall. By photogrammetry Itek has verified it as the figure of a man.

Previously published photographs, taken at the moment of the fatal head shot, show that by then he had joined two men seen in Willis' picture standing behind a lamppost at left. There is no evidence to indicate he was anything more than an onlooker."

So the riddle of the "black dog man" appeared solved. It was the figure of a man seen from waist up as he stood or walked on the sidewalk behind the retaining wall approaching the top of the steps. Yet today many assassination researchers still deny it was the man who joined Hudson.

Seconds later - as determined in photographs - the unidentified man joined Hudson and companion, who were apparently unaware of the man behind them, then turned and ran back up the steps immediately after the head shot

However, this explanation does not exonerate the third man as simply an "onlooker".

Who was he? Where did he come from? What did he see both before and after he joined the two men on the steps? And, why did he turn and race back up the steps (he was gone within seconds) at a time when everyone else in Dealey Plaza was stationary with shock?

The federal investigations could provide no answers to these questions, so in the minds of many researchers, the "black dog man" joins "the umbrella man" and the "dark complected man" as one of the more suspicious persons in Dealey Plaza.

Crossfire: The Rush to the Grassy Knoll

Almost immediately after the final shot was fired, many people - including policemen, sheriff's deputies and spectators - began rushing toward the Grassy Knoll.

Dallas motorcycle officer Bobby Hargis (See THE MOTORCADE) thought the shots had come from the Triple Underpass because "...I had got splattered, with blood (and) I was just a little back and left of Mrs. Kennedy, but I didn't know."

Hargis stopped his motorcycle on the south side of Elm and ran up the Grassy Knoll to where the concrete wall of the Triple Underpass connected with the wooden picket fence on the Knoll. Peering over the wall, Hargis looked at the crowd standing on the Underpass. Asked if he saw anything out of the ordinary, Hargis told the Warren Commission:

"No, I didn't. That is what got me."

Hargis returned to his still-running motorcycle and rode through the Triple Underpass. He told the commission:

"...I couldn't see anything that was of a suspicious nature, so I came back to the Texas School Book Depository. At that time it seemed like the activity was centered around the...Depository."

Seymour Weitzman was a college graduate serving as a deputy constable of Dallas County. He had been standing with Deputy Constable Bill Hutton at the corner of Main and Houston when the motorcade passed. The pair had turned to walk to a nearby courthouse when Weitzman heard three shots, "first one, then ...a little period in between...(then) the second two seemed to be simultaneously."

Weitzman told the Warren Commission:

"I immediately ran toward the President's car. Of course, it was speeding away and somebody said the shots or firecrackers...we still didn't know the President was shot...came from the wall. I immediately scaled the wall...apparently, my hands grabbed steam pipes. I burned them. (In the railroad yards behind the picket fence) We noticed numerous kinds of footprints that did not make sense because they were going different directions...(with Weitzman at the time were) other officers, Secret Service as well..."

Behind Weitzman came Dallas policeman Joe M. Smith, who had been handling traffic at the intersection of Elm and Houston in front of the Depository. Smith had helped at the scene of a strange seizure incident minutes before the motorcade arrived (See THE TEXAS SCHOOL BOOK DEPOSITORY) and had returned to his position in the middle of Elm where barricades had been placed to halt traffic. Moments after the President's car passed him, he heard shots, but he couldn't tell from which direction they came. He told the Warren Commission an hysterical woman ran up to him, crying:

"They are shooting the President from the bushes!"

Smith said he immediately went up the short street that branches off of Elm in front of the Depository and entered the parking lot behind the wooden picket fence. He told the commission:

"I looked into all the cars and checked around the bushes. Of course, I wasn't alone. There was some deputy sheriff (Weitzman) with me, and I believe one Secret Service man when I got there. I got to make this statement, too. I felt awfully silly, but after the shot and this woman, (I) pulled my pistol from my holster, and I thought, this is silly, I don't know who I am looking for, and I put it back. Just as I did, he showed me that he was a Secret Service agent...he saw me coming with my pistol and right away he showed me who he was."

In 1978, Smith told author Anthony Summers that "around the hedges (lining the parking lot), there was the smell, the lingering smell of gunpowder."

Smith then moved on toward the Triple Underpass because "it sounded to me like they (shots) may have come from this vicinity here."

In his testimony, Smith said he saw "two other officers there," but it is unclear if he was speaking about behind the fence or the Triple Underpass. After 15 or 20 minutes, Smith said he returned to the front of the Depository where he helped other officers seal the building.

(For some unexplained reason, at the end of his testimony Commission attorney Wesley Liebeler suddenly asked Smith if there was any reason why the Presidential motorcade could not have gone straight down Main Street and turned onto Stemmons Freeway on its way to the Trade Mart. "As far as I know, there is no reason," replied Smith.)

One witness who was in a position to observe the area behind the picket fence was Lee Bowers, a railroad supervisor who was stationed in a tower located just north of the Grassy Knoll. Bowers told a fascinating story of suspicious cars moving in the sealed-off railroad yards minutes before the motorcade arrived and of seeing strange men behind the picket fence. Incredibly, his testimony takes less than six pages of the Warren Commission volumes.

Bowers, an ex-Navy man who had studied religion at Southern Methodist University in Dallas, was working for the Union Terminal Co. controlling the movement of trains in the railroad yards from a tower about 14 feet off the ground. The tower is located about 50 yards northwest of the back of the Texas School Book Depository. A block-long street breaks off from Elm and passes in front of the Depository, ending in a parking lot bordered on the south by the wooden picket fence atop the Grassy Knoll. It was the only paved artery in or out of the parking area.

Bowers told the Warren Commission:

"...the area had been covered by police for some two hours. Since approximately 10 o'clock in the morning (of the assassination), traffic had been cut off into the area so that anyone moving around could actually be observed. Since I had worked there for a number of years, I was familiar with most of the people who came in and out of the area....there were three cars that came in during the time from around noon until the time of the shooting. They came into the vicinity of the tower, which was at the extension of Elm Street...which there is no way out. It is not a through street to anywhere."

Bowers said he noticed the first car about 12:10 p.m. It was a blue and white 1959 Oldsmobile station wagon with out-of-state license plates and some bumper stickers, "one of which was a Goldwater sticker". The station wagon circled in front of the railroad tower "as if he was searching for a way out, or was checking the area, and then proceeded back through the only way he could, the same outlet he came into."

About 12:20 p.m., a black 1957 Ford with Texas license plates came into the area. Inside was "one male...that seemed to have a mike or telephone or something...He was holding something up to his mouth with one hand and he was driving with the other..." Bowers said this car left after three or four minutes driving back in front of the Depository. "He did probe a little further into the area than the first car," Bowers added.

Minutes before the assassination, Bowers said a third car - this one a white 1961 or 1962 Chevrolet four-door Impala - entered the area. Bowers said:

"(It) showed signs of being on the road...It was muddy up to the windows, bore a similar out-of-state license to the first car I observed (and was) also occupied by one white male. He spent a little more time in the area....he circled the area and probed one spot right at the tower...and was forced to back out some considerable distance, and slowly cruised down back towards the front of the School Depository Building....The last I saw of him, he was pausing just about in - just above the assassination site....Whether it continued on...or whether it pulled up only a short distance, I couldn't tell. I was busy."

Bowers said about eight minutes later, he caught sight of the Presidential limousine as it turned onto Elm Street. He stated:

"I heard three shots. One, then a slight pause, then two very close together. Also, reverberation from the shots....The sounds came either from up against the School Depository Building or near the mouth of the Triple Underpass."

Standing directly between Bowers' vantage point and the Triple Underpass, the tower operator said he saw two men, but they "gave no appearance of being together" although they were only 10 or 15 feet from each other.

Bowers described this pair:

"One man, middle-aged, or slightly older, fairly heavy-set, in a white shirt, fairly dark trousers. Another younger man, about mid-twenties, in either a plaid shirt or plaid coat or jacket....They were facing and looking up toward Main and Houston and following the caravan as it came down."

Bowers also saw the railroad employees and the two Dallas policemen standing on the Triple Underpass.

Toward the eastern end of the parking lot, Bowers saw two other men. He said:

"Each had uniforms similar to those custodians at the courthouse."

And speaking of the white Impala again. Bowers said:

"...at the moment of the first shot...the car was out of sight behind this decorative masonry wall in the area....at the moment of the shots...I do not think that it was in sight. It came in sight immediately following the last shot."

Bowers then described what he saw following the shots:

"At the time of the shooting there seemed to be some commotion, and immediately following there was a motorcycle policeman who shot nearly all of the way to the top of the incline....He was part of the motorcade and had left it for some reason, which I did not know....He came up into the area where there are some trees and where I had described the two men were in the general vicinity of this...one of them was (still there). The other one, I could not say. The darker dressed man was too hard to distinguish from the trees. The one in the white shirt, yes, I think he was."

Asked by Commission attorney Joseph Ball to describe the "commotion" which attracted his attention, Bowers said:

"I just am unable to describe rather than it was something out of the ordinary...but something occurred in this particular spot which was out of the ordinary, which attracted my eye for some reason, which I could not identify....Nothing that I could pinpoint as having happened that -"

Ball interrupted. "Afterwards did a good many people come up there on this high ground at the tower?" he asked, before Bowers could tell what caught his attention on the knoll.

In a later filmed interview, Bowers did describe what caught his eye. He stated:

"At the time of the shooting, in the vicinity of where the two men I have described were, there was a flash of light or ...something I could not identify...some unusual occurrence - a flash of light or smoke or something which caused me to feel that something out of the ordinary had occurred there."

Bowers said after the shooting, "a large number of people" converged on the parking lot behind the picket fence, including "between 50 and a hundred policemen within a maximum of five minutes." He added:

"(Police) sealed off the area and I held off the trains until they could be examined, and there were some transients taken (off) at least one train."

One witness who may have encountered one or more of the men Bowers saw behind the picket fence was Gordon Arnold, who never testified to either of the federal panels investigating the assassination.

On the day of the assassination, Arnold was a 22-year-old soldier who had just arrived back in Dallas after Army training. He went downtown to have lunch when he decided to take movies of the President. Parking his car near Bowers' railroad tower, Arnold took his movie camera and walked toward the Triple Underpass. He told this author:

"I was walking along behind this picket fence when a man in a light-colored suit came up to me and said I shouldn't be up there. I was young and cocky and I said, "Why not?" And he showed me a badge and said he was with the Secret Service and that he didn't want anyone up there. I said alright and started walking back along the fence. I could feel that he was following me and we had a few more words. I walked around to the front of the fence and found a little mound of dirt to stand on to see the motorcade....Just after the car turned onto Elm and started toward me, a shot went off from over my left shoulder. I felt the bullet, rather than heard it, and it went right past my left ear...I had just gotten out of basic training. In my mind live ammunition was being fired. It was being fired over my head. And I hit the dirt. I buried my head in the ground and I heard several other shots, but I couldn't see anything because I had my face in the dirt. (His prone position under the trees on the knoll may explain why Arnold did not appear in photographs taken of the knoll at that time.) I heard two shots and then there was a blend. For a single bolt action (rifle), he had to have been firing darn good because I don't think anybody could fire that rapid a bolt action....The next thing I knew, someone was kicking my butt and telling me to get up. It was a policeman. And I told him to go jump in the river. And then this other guy - a policeman - comes up with a gun. I don't recall if it was a shotgun or what. And he was crying and that thing was waving back and forth. I felt threatened. One of them asked me if I had taken any film and I said yes. He told me to give him my film, so I tossed him my camera. I said you can have everything, just point that gun somewhere else. He opened it, pulled out the film and then threw the camera back to me. All I wanted to do was get out of there. The gun and the guy crying was enough to unnerve me."

Arnold ran straight back to his car and drove out of the parking area unchallenged. Two days later, Arnold reported to duty at Fort Wainwright in Alaska and he did not return for several years. Arnold's presence on the Grassy Knoll has been questioned by some researchers because he doesn't appear in photographs taken that day. His position well under the overhanging trees on the Knoll left him in deep shadow. He was seen, however, by at least one person in the Presidential motorcade. Former Senator Ralph Yarborough, who was riding in the same car as Vice President Johnson (See THE MOTORCADE), confirmed Arnold's position in 1978 when he told "The Dallas Morning News":

"Immediately on the firing of the first shot I saw the man you interviewed (Arnold) throw himself on the ground. He was down within a second of the time the shot was fired and I thought to myself, "There's a combat veteran who knows how to act when weapons start firing."

Arnold, later an investigator for the Dallas Department of Consumer Affairs, did not give his name to authorities and was never questioned by either the Warren Commission or the House Select Committee on Assassinations, although his account of the assassination appeared in the July 27, 1978, edition of "The Dallas Morning News".

Corroboration of Arnold's story may have come in 1982 with discovery of a figure in the background of a snapshot made at the instant of the fatal head shot to President Kennedy by a woman standing on the south curb or Elm Street.

Crossfire: The Badge Man

Mary Moorman took a now well-known Polaroid picture just as President Kennedy was struck in the head (See THE CROWD). She sold her rights to the photo that day to the Associated Press and to United Press International for $600. The photo was never examined nor printed by the Warren Commission, but was published widely in newspapers and magazines after the assassination.

For years, researchers pored over the Moorman picture looking for evidence of a Grassy Knoll gunman. Despite some tantalizingly blurry objects discovered along the top of the west leg of the picket fence, no credible photo of a gunman was found.

The House Select Committee on Assassinations did study the picture, but found it had badly faded and "was of quite poor quality." However, because of acoustical evidence (See THE HOUSE SELECT COMMITTEE ON ASSASSINATIONS), the committee recommended "...this particular photograph should be re-examined..."

Then, in 1982, Texas researchers Gary Mack and Jack White began studying the Moorman photo in light of the experience of Gordon Arnold. After obtaining a clear slide made from an original, quality copy of Moorman's photo, Mack and White began studying the bushy area east from the corner of the fence. It was here they discovered what appeared to be two figures. Interestingly, the figures appear in the same general area that the House committee's acoustical tests indicated shots were fired, though the sound experts located a shot west of the corner of the fence, while the figures are north of the corner. When blown up, the figures are detectable by untrained observers. One police official even commented that one man seemed to be wearing "shooter's glasses". The main figure has been dubbed the "badge man" because he appears to be wearing a dark shirt with a semi-circular patch on the left shoulder and a bright shiny object on his left chest - the exact configuration of a Dallas police uniform.

Although the "badge man's" hairline, eyes, left ear and jaw are visible, his mouth and neck are obscured by a bright flash - apparently the muzzle blast of a rifle he is holding in the classic rifle-firing position.

After analyzing the photographic blowup as well as making reenactment photos in Dealey Plaza, Mack and White feel the "badge man" and perhaps even a companion are standing behind the wooden, picket fence about 15 feet north from the corner. This places the figure just to the left of Gordon Arnold's position and to the right and rear of Abraham Zapruder.

Mack and White tried unsuccessfully to interest a major news organization in financing a scientific analysis of the "badge man" photo. Finally in 1984, a national tabloid agreed to have the blowup studied. White and a representative from the news magazine flew to the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, where the photo was subjected to sophisticated computer enhancement. They were told that, without question, the photo showed a man firing a rifle. The next day, however, the chairman of the M.I.T. department involved suddenly gave all materials back to them and, with no explanation, told them the school would no longer participate in any study of the photo. Today, efforts continue to have the photo enlargement further enhanced by sophisticated means.

The "badge man" blowup was included in "The Men Who Killed Kennedy", a British television documentary produced in 1988. In this program, the "badge man" was identified as a professional Corsican assassin named Lucien Sarti (See AGENTS). This documentary, which was nominated for awards in Britain and shown to millions of people around the world, has yet to be aired in the United States.

Whatever the end result of a scientific study of the blowup may be, the collection of supporting evidence indicates that the "badge man" may indeed have been the Grassy Knoll gunman which the majority of witnesses in Dealey Plaza reported on November 22, 1963. The "badge man" fits the following accounts: - Gordon Arnold's story of hearing a shot come from his left rear. - Zapruder's testimony that shots came from his right rear. - Bowers' testimony that he saw a flash of light and smoke near two men wearing uniforms near the east end of the fence. He also saw a man in a white shirt behind the fence moments before Kennedy was shot. - The House Select Committee on Assassinations which placed at least one shot within 10 feet of the fence corner (although on the west leg). - Jean Hill, who said she saw smoke and movement north of the fence corner at the moment of the head shot.

- Sam Holland and others who told of finding muddy footprints, cigarette butts and mud on a car bumper behind the picket fence minutes after the shots were fired.

- Numerous witnesses who ran behind the fence but said they only saw railroad workers and policemen there.

- The testimony of Emmet Hudson, Constable Weitzman and Officer Smith, all of whom saw policemen on the knoll when there were none officially accounted for in that area.

All in all, the photographic blowup of these figures on the knoll may be the most important evidence yet confirming the existence of assassins on the Grassy Knoll.

Amazingly, however, no official Government agency or major news organization seems willing to either make a serious study of the Moorman photo or present it to the general public.

###

Further evidence of what went on behind the picket fence at the moment of the assassination can be found in the heretofore untold story of a crucial witness.

Crossfire: A Grassy Knoll Witness

It is strange irony that the one person who apparently witnessed men with guns behind the wooden picket fence on the Grassy Knoll at the time of the Kennedy assassination was unable to tell anyone what he saw. Ed Hoffman of Dallas has been deaf since birth and, as is common with that disability, he cannot speak. However, this did not prevent Hoffman from attempting to alert authorities to what he saw behind that fence.

Although he told his family and friends what he saw at the time and later reported it to the FBI, Hoffman's story has remained unpublicized over the years. Finally, in the summer of 1985, he told his story to this author. It was later substantially confirmed by FBI documents.

Hoffman was 26 years old on Nov. 22, 1963, and at noon time was driving toward downtown Dallas on Stemmons Expressway when he noticed numerous people lining the freeway. He suddenly realized that President Kennedy was to motorcade through the city that day, so he stopped his car just north of a railroad bridge across Stemmons and joined the spectators.

(Only someone who was there that day could have known that many people were lining Stemmons to get a glimpse of the President since all news coverage of the motorcade stopped after the shooting in Dealey Plaza.)

After waiting for a time, Hoffman decided to walk along the shoulder of the freeway to a point where it crossed over Elm Street in hopes of getting a view into Dealey Plaza. From this vantage point, Hoffman was approximately 200 yards west of the parking lot behind the picket fence at an elevation of about the height of the first floor of the Texas School Book Depository.

Being unable to hear, he was not aware that Kennedy's motorcade was passing through the plaza. However, he was aware of movement on the north side of the picket fence. He became aware of a man running west along the back side of the fence wearing a dark suit, tie and a overcoat. The man was carrying a rifle in his hands. As the man reached a metal pipe railing at the west end of the fence, he tossed the rifle to a second man standing on the west side of the pipe near the railroad tracks which went south over the Triple Overpass. The second man was wearing light coveralls and a railroad worker's hat.

The second man caught the rifle, ducked behind a large railroad switch box - one of two at that site - and knelt down. The man disassembled the rifle, placed it in a soft brown bag (His description matches that of the traditional railroad brakeman's tool bag.), then walked north into the rail yards in the general direction of the railroad tower containing Lee Bowers.

The man in the overcoat, meanwhile, had turned and run back along the picket fence until midway, when he stopped and began walking calmly toward the corner of the fence. Hoffman could not see the corner of the fence due to cars and overhanging tree branches. Unable to hear, Hoffman was at a loss to understand what was happening as he watched these men. However, moments later Kennedy's car came into sight out of the west side of the Triple Underpass. Hoffman saw the President lying on the seat, the blood-splattered car and realized something terrible had occurred. As the presidential limousine turned onto the Stemmons access ramp just below his position, Hoffman decided to try and alert the Secret Service agents to what he had witnessed.

He ran down the grassy incline waving his arms and trying to make them understand that he had seen something, when one of the agents in the President's follow-up car reached down and produced a machine-gun, which he leveled at him. Hoffman stopped and threw up his hands and could only watch helplessly as the motorcade rushed past him onto Stemmons in the mad rush to Parkland Hospital.

There was no mention at the time of any Secret Serviceman with a machine-gun, yet Hoffman was emphatic that it was an automatic weapon with a pistol grip and clip. It is now known that Secret Service Agent George W. Hickey Jr. in the follow-up car did display an AR-15, the civilian model of the M-16 machine gun, further corroborating Hoffman's story.

Upset over what he had seen, Hoffman looked around for help. He saw a Dallas policeman standing on the railroad bridge crossing Stemmons and he walked toward him waving his arms in an attempt to communicate what he had seen. However, the policeman, unable to understand, simply waved him off. (This part of Hoffman's story also is corroborated, since policeman Earle Brown filed a report stating that he was on the Stemmons railroad bridge at the time of the assassination. However, questioned recently about these events, Brown said he has no recollection of seeing Hoffman.)

Unable to get help, Hoffman walked back to his car, then drove behind the Texas School Book Depository for several minutes trying to locate the man with the rifle in the brown bag. He was unsuccessful. However, this is indicative of the total lack of security around the Depository in the chaotic minutes following the assassination. Hoffman was able to drive around in the rail yards behind the Depository for some time and then leave without being stopped or questioned by authorities.

He then drove to the Dallas FBI office but found no one there except a receptionist. He left his name and address with the FBI and then drove to the Dallas Police station. The FBI never responded.

At the time, Hoffman had a relative at the Dallas Police station and he drove there next, hoping to find some help. However, the station was sealed off and the officer on the door refused to allow him to enter. Thwarted in his attempts to tell authorities what he had seen, Hoffman finally went home where his parents, also deaf-mutes, urged him not become involved.

Hoffman remained silent until Thanksgiving, 1963, when he met his policeman relative at a family function. Despite his parents' warnings, he told his story to the policeman, who assured him that the federal authorities were investigating the case and that, in fact, the assassin had already been caught. Confident that the case was closed, Hoffman said he didn't consider telling his story to anyone else. However, as the years went by, he became more and more aware of the official version of the assassination and knew that one man firing from the sixth floor of the Depository did not agree with what he had seen.

Finally on June 28, 1967, at the urging of co-workers, Hoffman visited the Dallas FBI once again. Apparently Hoffman had difficulty in communicating with the agents or they purposely distorted his story because the FBI report of that day states:

"Hoffman said he observed two white males, clutching something dark to their chests with both hands, running from the rear of the Texas School Book Depository building. The men were running north on the railroad, then turned east, and Hoffman lost sight of both of the men."

The report added:

"Approximately two hours after the above interview with Hoffman, he returned to the Dallas Office of the FBI and advised he had just returned from the spot on Stemmons Freeway where he had parked his automobile and had decided he could not have seen the men running because of a fence west of the Texas School Book Depository building. He said it was possible that he saw these two men on the fence or something else (sic)."

Whether or not the FBI agents were able to understand Hoffman correctly, they did talk to his father and brother on July 5, 1967. Both said Hoffman loved President Kennedy and had told his story to them just after the assassination. However they also said Hoffman "has in the past distorted facts of events observed by him." (Of course, it was his father who had urged him not to become involved in the case at all, so there was motivation to downplay his son's story.)

Officially, this was the end of any investigation into Hoffman's story at that time. Unofficially, Hoffman said one FBI agent told him to keep quiet about what he had seen or "you might get killed".

Hoffman kept quiet until Oct. 3, 1975, when his interest was rekindled by talk of re-opening the investigation into Kennedy's death. This provoked him to write of his experiences to Senator Edward Kennedy. Experts in deafness who have seen the letter say it is typical of the writing of a deaf person who try to write as they sign. Although somewhat disjointed, the letter briefly mentioned what he had seen and added that his relatives said he could be in danger from the CIA or other persons if he told what he saw.

In a letter dated Nov. 19, 1975, Kennedy responded:

"My family has been aware of various theories concerning the death of President Kennedy, just as it has been aware of the many speculative accounts which have arisen from the death of Robert Kennedy. I am sure that it is understood that the continual speculation is painful for members of my family. We have always accepted the findings of the Warren Commission report and have no reason to question the quality and the effort of those who investigated the fatal shooting of Robert Kennedy."

Kennedy concluded that sufficient evidence to re-examine the two Kennedy deaths would have to come from "legal authorities responsible for such further investigation (and) I do not believe that their judgment should be influenced by any feelings or discomfort by any member of my family."

Despite this further, if more gentle, attempt to tell Hoffman to be quiet, he continued to tell his story to fellow workers at the Dallas electronics firm where he has been employed since before the assassination.

On March 25, 1977, one of Hoffman's supervisors who understood sign language, contacted the Dallas FBI office. He said he felt that the FBI did not fully understand what Hoffman was trying to tell them during the 1967 interview and that he felt Hoffman deserved to be heard.

At this urging, FBI agents again talked with Hoffman on March 28, 1977, and even accompanied him to the site on Stemmons Expressway. This time, with his supervisor acting as translator, Hoffman was able to give more details. He said he thought he saw a puff of smoke near where the men were standing and essentially his story was the same as the one he told in 1985 except he said he saw both men run north into the rail yards.

Although this time the FBI took photographs of the area based on Hoffman's testimony, they again showed little interest in pursuing his story.

On the cover sheet of their report to the FBI director, the Dallas agents wrote:

On Pages 71 - 76 of the 'Report of the President's Commission on the Assassination of President John F. Kennedy,' the witnesses at the Triple Underpass are discussed, but the Warren Commission's investigation has disclosed no credible evidence that any shots were fired from anywhere other than the Texas School Book Depository building. In view of the above, the Dallas Office is conducting no additional investigation...

In other words, since the federal government concluded Oswald was the lone assassin, Hoffman must have been mistaken. In fact, there was no mention of Hoffman or his testimony by the U.S. government until researchers obtained reports on him through the Freedom of Information Act in 1985.

Since Hoffman, despite his hearing disability, appears to be a most credible witness and since his story only reinforces others who told of gunmen on the knoll, his story deserves serious consideration. There are several interesting aspects of Hoffman's story. First, since many of the details have been independently corroborated - The crowds on Stemmons, the machine gun, the cop on the railroad bridge - his story may be the best version of what happened behind the picket fence to date. Hoffman's story also may have pinpointed the role of convicted Texas hitman Charles V. Harrelson, who has admitted participating in the JFK assassination (See Aftermath DALLAS). His story also serves as a vivid commentary on the FBI's failure to follow serious leads and its attempts to intimidate witnesses into silence.

Crossfire: Summary - The Kill Zone

In reviewing the experiences of the people in Dealey Plaza the day President Kennedy died, it is apparent that not one single person saw the assassination as it was described by the Warren Commission.

In the motorcade, Governor Connally's testimony - totally corroborated by the Zapruder film - indicated that both he and Kennedy could not have been struck by the same bullet.

Many people, including Sheriff Decker, Royce Skelton and Austin Miller, saw one bullet strike Elm Street. Others, like Policeman Foster, saw a bullet hit the grass on the south side of Elm.

Many people heard shots coming from at least two separate locations, while those on the Triple Underpass even saw smoke from a rifle drift out from under the trees on the Grassy Knoll.

The motorcade had difficulty negotiating the sharp turn onto Elm which the Secret Service advance men had failed to properly scrutinize. The Secret Service also refused additional security offered by Dallas police (See G MEN).

An unexplained change in the motorcade lineup moved press photographers far back in line preventing them from photographing the assassination.

Motorcade riders heard shots from separate locations, but the majority believed shots came from the direction of the Triple Underpass. Both Sheriff Decker and Police Chief Curry ordered their men to rush to the railroad yards behind the Grassy Knoll.

The only Secret Service agent to react quickly to the assassination was Clint Hill, who was not originally scheduled for the Dallas trip and was assigned to Mrs. Kennedy.

Mrs. Cabell and former Senator Yarborough, among others reported smelling gunpowder while passing through Dealey Plaza.

Some members of the crowd, such as Philip Hathaway, Julia Ann Mercer, Julius Hardie and the Arnold Rowlands, saw men with rifles in the area of Dealey Plaza long before the Kennedy motorcade arrived.

Several bystanders, their testimony supported by at least two films made that day, claimed to have seen more than one man on the sixth floor of the Texas School Book Depository moments before the assassination.

Some witnesses - Phil Willis, Jean Hill, Julia Mercer and Dallas Policeman Tom Tilson (See Aftermath - DALLAS) - even claim they saw Jack Ruby in Dealey Plaza at the time of the assassination.

People standing in front of the Depository thought shots came from down near the Triple Underpass. Others, such as A.J. Millican, the John Chisms and Jean Newman, who were standing between the Depository and the Underpass believed the shots came from the Grassy Knoll.

Two of the most suspicious men in Dealey Plaza - subsequently nicknamed the "Umbrella Man" and the "Dark-complected Man" - were never identified or even mentioned by the Warren Commission. Yet both men made visual signals just as Kennedy drew opposite to them. Moments later the dark man appeared to be talking into a radio. The House Select Committee on Assassinations claimed to have located the "Umbrella Man," however the man they found told a story totally inconsistent with the activities of the "Umbrella man" as recorded on film that day. And the Committee never bothered to mention the man with what appeared to be a walkie-talkie.

Neither could the Warren Commission seem to locate a woman filming the assassination who came to be known as the "Babushka Lady" to researchers. The House Committee took testimony from this woman after she was identified as Beverly Oliver by researchers, but never mentioned her in its report. Oliver, an acquaintance of Jack Ruby, has told researchers she was introduced by Ruby to "Lee Oswald of the CIA" prior to the assassination.

Jean Hill, who was standing beside Mary Moorman on the south side of Elm Street at the moment of the assassination, said she saw a man fire from behind the wooden picket fence on the Grassy Knoll and saw smoke drift from his location. Hill's story is supported by the testimony of railroad supervisor S.M. Holland, who told government investigators he too saw smoke drifting from the Knoll. Holland's account is corroborated by other men on the Triple Underpass, such as Richard Dodd, James Simmons, Austin Miller, Frank Reilly and Thomas Murphy - none of whom were asked to testify before the Warren Commission.

Even employees of the Depository, both inside and outside that building, stated shots came from the direction of the Grassy Knoll. Three employees - Bonnie Ray Williams, Harold Norman and James Jarman - were sitting just below the sixth-floor window later identified as the sniper's window. Despite their later testimony that they heard shots right above their heads, they all said they ran to the west side of the building because they believed that shots had come from west of the Depository.

Less than 60 seconds after shots were fired, Dallas Policeman Marrion Baker and Depository Superintendent Roy Truly encountered another Depository employee - Lee Harvey Oswald - in the building's second-floor lunchroom holding a Coke in his hand and appearing calm and unperturbed.

At least one Depository employee, Joe Molina, was intimidated by authorities and lost his job soon after the assassination.

One man, James Tague, was the third man wounded in Dealey Plaza when his cheek was bloodied by cement sent flying by a bullet striking the curb just east of the Triple Underpass. Apparently it was reports of Tague's wounding which forced the Warren Commission to revise their account of the assassination. Where they had originally concluded that one shot hit Kennedy in the upper back, another struck Governor Connally and a third struck Kennedy's head, they finally settled on the "single-bullet theory," which states that one bullet passed through both Kennedy and Connally, another missed altogether striking the curb near Tague and a third shot struck Kennedy fatally in the head.

Despite great efforts on the part of authorities to establish the Depository as the source of all shots, public attention - both in 1963 and today - kept returning to the infamous Grassy Knoll.

Photographer Abraham Zapruder clearly stated that the shots came from the Knoll behind him. His testimony is corroborated by Dealey Plaza groundskeeper Emmet Hudson, who reported that shots came from the Knoll above and behind him.

Lee Bowers, a railroad employee who was in a railroad tower overlooking the backside of the Knoll, told of seeing men with radios in strange cars cruising the area just prior to the assassination. He also reported seeing a flash of light and smoke from behind the fence on the Knoll at the time of the shooting.

Gordon Arnold, a young soldier, said he was chased from behind the wooden picket fences shortly before Kennedy arrived by a man showing Secret Service identification. He said he was in front of the fence on the Knoll filming the motorcade when a shot was fired from over his left shoulder from behind the fence. He said moments later two policemen took his film and he fled.

A gunman behind the picket fence may have been captured in a photograph taken by Mary Moorman. A recent enlargement of the Knoll area in her photo seems to reveal a man firing a rifle. The man is dressed in what appears to be a police uniform. The existence of this gunman is further confirmed by the acoustical studies commissioned by the House Select Committee on Assassinations in 1979. The results of these tests forced the Committee to reluctantly conclude that a second gunman fired on Kennedy from behind the Knoll fence.

The deaf-mute Ed Hoffman tried to inform the FBI after the assassination that he had witnessed a man with a rifle behind the picket fence on the Grassy Knoll. However Hoffman was warned to keep quiet or "you might get killed" by an FBI agent and reports of his sighting were hidden from the public for 22 years.

Conclusions to be drawn from the wide range of testimony by people in Dealey Plaza on November 22, 1963, include:

- There was much confusion and panic among the people watching the Presidential motorcade.
- The majority of witnesses originally believed the shots came from the area of the Grassy Knoll.
- The preponderance of evidence indicates shots came from two different directions - the Grassy Knoll and the direction of the Depository.
- There is nothing in the available evidence which rules out the possibility that more shots from other directions were fired.
- The activities of the federal authorities, especially the Secret Service and the FBI, both before, during and after the assassination, have raised serious suspicions in the minds of researchers.

Crossfire: Means, Motives and Opportunities

"I knew then what I know now: Oswald was on an assignment in Russia for American intelligence."

Oswald's Marine roommate James Botelho

The assassination of President John F. Kennedy was not an isolated event. It occurred within a complex matrix of national and international events and issues. Therefore, this event must be placed within a context of the times.

As President, John F. Kennedy daily was juggling a wide variety of responsibilities on many different fronts - foreign policy, civil rights, agriculture, finance, politics, crime-busting and defense considerations.

Likewise, Lee Harvey Oswald - the man identified by two government panels as Kennedy's assassin - did not live isolated from the world of his time. During his brief 24 years of life, Oswald came into contact with an incredible array of groups and individuals, all of whom had reason to wish the elimination of Kennedy. Beginning with an uncle connected to organized crime, young Oswald moved through a shadowy world of soldiers, intelligence agents, Russian communists and anti-communists, pro and anti-Castro Cubans, FBI men and right-wing anti-communists. To place the events of November 22, 1963 in proper perspective, it is necessary to become familiar with these groups and with their relationships to Oswald and each other.

After all, every good detective begins his murder investigation by determining who had the means, motive and opportunity to commit the act.

The obvious starting place is with the one man universally acknowledged as being the person most closely connected with the assassination - Lee Harvey Oswald. (See OSWALD)

Crossfire: Lee Harvey Oswald - Assassin or Patsy?

Prior to his enlistment in the Marines and with the exception of the death of his father, Lee Harvey Oswald's boyhood was little different from that of millions of other Americans.

Oswald was born in New Orleans, Louisiana, on October 18, 1939, two months after the death of his father, Robert E. Lee Oswald, a collector of insurance premiums. While this unfortunate event must have had some effect on young Oswald, it was a fate endured by many thousands of other young Americans, none of whom have felt compelled to murder national leaders. In 1945, Oswald's mother married for a third time but three years later it ended in divorce. From that point on, Oswald and his brother, Robert, were brought up by their mother, Marguerite. (See A MOTHER IN HISTORY)

Crossfire: A Mother in History

The House Select Committee on Assassinations in 1979 concluded that President Kennedy was "probably assassinated as the result of a conspiracy." However they maintained that Lee Harvey Oswald was the actual killer and that another gunman -whose presence was established by two separate scientific tests based on a Dallas police recording of the gunfire in Dealey Plaza - escaped and remains unidentified.

This finding was a milestone to the many Americans who had come to disbelieve the lone assassin theory of the Warren Commission.

Typically, however, this reversal of official American history was still not enough for the mother of the accused assassin, Marguerite Oswald. She told newsmen:

"The committee members have made a first step in the right direction. It's up to us to do the rest...I hope and know the future will vindicate my son entirely. It took us 15 years to come this far. It may take another 15 years or longer. I probably won't be around, but the world will know that Lee Harvey Oswald was innocent of the charges against him."

This was the statement of a woman who was much more than just a supportive mother. It came from a woman who faced more public hostility than most murderers...a woman who faced the autumn of her years alone and in poverty. And all because of a child she bore.

Marguerite Claverie was born in New Orleans in 1907. Her family was of French and German extraction. Her mother died a few years after her birth, leaving young Marguerite and her five siblings in the care of her father, a streetcar conductor. According to relatives, the Claverie family was poor but happy. Marguerite, at the age of 17, completed one year of high school. She then dropped out to become a law firm receptionist. In August 1929, she married Edward John Pic Jr., a clerk. However, the marriage was not successful and the couple divorced in 1931, several months before the birth of her first son, John Edward Pic.

In 1933, she married Robert Edward Lee Oswald, himself recently divorced. She described her marriage to Oswald as the "only happy part" of her life. Out of this union came a second son, Robert. Then her happiness came to an end. Two months before the birth of Lee Harvey Oswald in October 1939, her husband died of a sudden heart attack. Making her way alone, she saw an opportunity of establishing a family once again by remarrying in 1945. Sending the two elder sons off to boarding school, she and her new husband, Edwin A. Ekdahl, took six-year-old Lee and moved to Benbrook, Texas, a small town south of Fort Worth.

However, there were soon arguments over money and charges of infidelity against Ekdahl. A divorce was granted in 1948 and she was allowed to use her former name of Oswald. It is interesting to note that Ekdahl's divorce attorney was Fred Korth, who in the fall of 1963 was fired as Secretary of the Navy by President Kennedy amid charges that Korth may have been involved in a scandal over the General Dynamics TFX airplane (See SOLDIERS).

John Pic and Robert Oswald rejoined their mother, but both soon left home to join the military. Marguerite was left with only young Lee. Some accounts say Lee was overly mothered by her, while others claim she neglected the boy. However, the former seems to be closer to the truth in light of the fact that she became a practical nurse charged with keeping the children of prominent Texans such as the late Amon Carter Jr. and former Congressman Tom Vandergriff. Despite much conjecture, there is little evidence that Lee's childhood was any better or any worse than others.

In 1959, after serving three years in the Marines, Lee received a sudden discharge and came back to Fort Worth for a two-day visit with his mother. Lee said he was off to New Orleans to work for an import-export firm, but several weeks later, Mrs. Oswald read that her 20-year-old son had turned up in Russia where he told U.S. officials he wanted to defect.

Mrs. Oswald's statements to the press at that time were unpopular. Instead of branding her son a traitor, she said:

"I feel very strongly that as an individual, he has the right to make his own decision. Lee has definite ideas. I believe God gives us a conscience and the ability to know right and I feel he has the right to make his own decision."

Despite this motherly support, Lee seemed to make every effort to avoid Marguerite after his return from the Soviet Union in 1962. At one point, he moved his family from Fort Worth to Dallas without leaving his mother a forwarding address. Her family was reunited only briefly during those dark days of November 1963.

Mrs. Oswald was on her way to work on November 22, when she heard over the car radio that Kennedy had been shot while riding in a motorcade in downtown Dallas. She also learned that a young ex-Marine named Lee Harvey Oswald was being held by police as the suspected assassin.

Concerned by the broadcasts and apparently with no friends to turn to, she contacted the local newspaper, "The Fort Worth Star-Telegram," and asked if someone would take her to Dallas. She told the newspapermen who drove her to the Dallas Police Station:

"I want to hear him tell me that he did it."

Mrs. Oswald also told them that she had been persecuted since her son's journey to Russia and knew the meaning of suffering. She also told of being fired by her last employer, "Star-Telegram" Publisher Amon Carter Jr. She said she had been acting as a day nurse for the Carter's children until about two weeks prior to the Kennedy assassination. After a weekend trip to Las Vegas, the Carters suddenly let her go.

She once told this author:

"You don't know what it's like to have someone look at you and say, You've done a good job, but we no longer need your services."

In Dallas Mrs. Oswald was disappointed in her desire to hear a confession from her son. She was not allowed to talk with him. And Oswald steadfastly maintained his innocence. He shouted to newsmen gathered in the police station hallway:

"No, sir, I didn't kill anybody. I'm just a patsy!"

After the murder of Oswald by Jack Ruby two days later, his mother's tone changed to one of suspicion and accusation, blaming the Dallas Police and federal authorities for her son's death.

She asked bitterly:

"Why would (Jack Ruby) be allowed within a few feet of a prisoner - any prisoner - when I could not even see my own son?"

To compound her suspicions, she maintained until her death that the FBI had shown her a photo of Ruby the night before her son was slain. She said about 6:30 p.m. on November 23, the night after the assassination, an FBI agent and another man knocked on the door of the hotel where she and Lee's wife were staying. After being told that her daughter-in-law was tired and couldn't talk with the men, the FBI agent said he wanted to ask her a question. She recalled the incident to newsmen a week later:

"He had a picture coupled (sic) inside his hand and asked me if I had ever seen that man before. I told him, "No sir, believe me, I never have." Then he left. A few days later, I walked into the room where I was staying and, in front of my son Robert and lot of witnesses, I picked up a paper and when I turned it over I said, "This is the picture of the man that FBI agent showed me." I did not even know at the time he was the man who shot my son. I was told that the picture was (of) Mr. Jack Ruby."

FBI officials, when informed of her statement, speculated that she must have been confused as to the date she was shown the photograph.

On July 10, 1964, FBI Agent Bardwell D. Odum signed an affidavit with the Warren Commission stating that he had shown the picture to Mrs. Oswald. He said the photo was furnished by FBI superiors, who obtained it from the CIA. The photo was included in Warren Commission exhibits and depicts a man who is obviously not Oswald. This photo was reportedly supplied by the CIA, which was secretly photographing visitors to the Soviet Embassy in Mexico City (See AGENTS). This incident was the beginning of a life-long suspicion of federal authorities by Mrs. Oswald. To the end of her life, she maintained that Lee had been working as some sort of agent for the U. S. Government and that unnamed "high officials" were part of the plot to kill Kennedy and blame her son.

After Watergate, she told a local newspaper:

"If you called in all the FBI men involved in Lee Harvey Oswald's life and questioned them, one thing would lead to another and it would probably break the assassination case."

Just after the assassination, Mrs. Oswald said:

"They (the public) all turned their backs on me before (when Oswald appeared in Russia) and they will turn their backs on me again, but my faith will see me through."

And faith was truly about the only thing left for Mrs. Oswald. With the exception of a couple of mysterious "benefactors" who kept her supplied with publications concerning the assassination, she was forced to live through the next two decades on less than $500 a month in Social Security payments.

In the Bicentennial summer of 1976, she was without a refrigerator for almost two months because she could not afford to repair hers. The loneliness and poverty of her life, however, failed to crush her fighting spirit.

She continued to assail the official version of the assassination and to strike out at media presentations of the event.

In 1978, after viewing a CBS "docu-drama" entitled "Ruby and Oswald," she told the local newspaper:

"I have every right to be upset over that program as well as many other things because they are talking about my son and my family. They sit there and tell the gullible American public that their program is the truth and based on documentation. Well, I'm sitting here with things you've never heard of. I can tear that CBS program apart like I did the Warren Commission."

Her thoughts on the Warren Commission, whose conclusions were taken as gospel at the time but gradually lost the confidence of the majority of Americans (See THE WARREN COMMISSION), are summed up in a letter Mrs. Oswald wrote to several congressmen in 1973 at the height of the Watergate crisis:

"On Nov. 29, 1963, the then President of the United States, Lyndon B. Johnson, created a commission to evaluate all the facts and circumstances surrounding the assassination of President John F. Kennedy and the subsequent killing of the alleged assassin and to report its findings and conclusions to him....President Johnson selected Earl Warren, chief justice of the United States, as its chairman. Because I was critical of the commission, I was asked, "Mrs. Oswald, are you implying that the Chief Justice would whitewash evidence or hide information so that the American people, as well as the whole world, would never learn the truth?" I answered, yes, in the name of security, men of integrity and who are the most esteemed, most respected and honored, who have the welfare of the country at heart, would be most likely to do what the White House wanted and thought necessary. The Watergate affair has followed this pattern. Those we believe are above reproach, those who have reached the pinnacle or are near it, those who are guiding our nation's destiny are found to have manipulated events to accomplish certain things they think were for the good of the country. Those who have a deep sense of patriotism and loyalty are most likely to twist events to accomplish their purposes....The Watergate affair only strengthens my convictions and proves my theory. (In 1963) The suspect was my son and seven such respected men branded a dead man who was neither tried nor convicted, assassin."

Through the years, Mrs. Oswald, who always claimed to be a "mother in history," was quick to point out that her defense of her son went beyond simple motherly love.

She once told this author:

"If he was truly guilty, I can accept that. But whether it's my son or someone else's son, I want the proof and the proof is just not there."

In her last years, Mrs. Oswald was virtually a recluse in her modest, but well-kept, brick home on the west side of Fort Worth. An occasional visitor - usually a journalist - and her small dog, Fritz, were her only company.

Neither her other sons nor Lee's wife, Marina, ever spoke to her again after those days in November 1963. When money problems pressed too hard, she would sell a book or a letter from her mammoth collection of assassination materials. It was such money problems that helped create the belief that Mrs. Oswald would only talk for profit.

However, as several Fort Worth newsmen can confirm, she never hesitated to pick up her telephone and call the media when a particular news item rankled her. She once explained the charge of talk-for-cash this way:

"Well, here I am without money, wondering where my next meal is coming from and these writers come to my house wanting an interview. Then, they go out and write some piece - some of them don't even talk to me more than 15 minutes or so - and they get all this money for their work. That's not fair!"

Over the years, Mrs. Oswald made repeated attempts to publish a book based on her knowledge, memories and research of the assassination. Oddly enough, in light of the hundreds of books on the subject by authors ranging from the famous to crackpots, no one would publish a book by the mother of the accused assassin.

In January 1981, Mrs. Oswald quietly entered a Fort Worth hospital. Rumors circulated that she had cancer. By the end of that month, Marguerite Claverie Oswald was dead. Her memorial service was private. But her cause lives on. In one of her last letters to this author she wrote but one simple sentence:

"Again - The charges against my late son Lee Harvey Oswald are false."

Crossfire: Oswald's Early Life

Oswald's early life is shrouded in innuendo and misinformation, much of it stemming from the passionate attitudes following the assassination.

Anyone who had any contact with Oswald was hunted down and interviewed by newsmen and many were deposed by the Warren Commission. And no one, including some family members, had anything good to say about the man accused of killing one of this nation's most popular presidents.

Some examples of misinformation include the statement that his two older brothers, and eventually Lee himself, were placed in an orphanage by their mother. While true in one respect, a closer look shows that Mrs. Oswald had to work to earn a living for their fatherless family. Keep in mind there were no daycare centers in 1942.

Mrs. Oswald explained to newsmen years later that she placed the boys in the Bethlehem Children's Home, operated by the Lutheran Church. Admittedly it was also an orphanage, but more precisely, it was the forerunner of a daycare center. She saw the boys on weekends and holidays.

It was quite a different situation than that described in the Warren Commission Report:

"Reminding her sons that they were orphans and that the family's financial condition was poor, she placed (them) in an orphan's home."

Lee's oldest brother, John Pic, told the Warren Commission that Lee slept with his mother until almost 11 years old, thus supplying much fodder for later psychological speculation. Mrs. Oswald's version sounds more mundane:

"...(while) I was married ...Lee had his own bed, of course, all the while. After I divorced this man (Ekdahl), all I got from this divorce was $1,500 and I paid a $1,000 down on a home. Well, I had to buy furniture. I bought used furniture, and one of the boys slept on an army cot, and the other on a twin bed, and, because of the circumstances, Lee slept with me; which was a short time because then his brother joined the service and when he did, Lee took his bed. But it just implies that throughout his life he slept with his mother, which isn't the case, you see. It's quite a difference."

Robert Oswald supported his mother's version of this issue by writing:

"If this (sleeping arrangement) had a bad effect on Lee, I'm sure mother didn't realize it. She was simply making use of all the space she had."

Much was made of Oswald's truancy in New York during 1953-54, as well as the psychological testing resulting from this infraction.

In the summer of 1952, shortly before Lee's 13th birthday, he and his mother had gone to live with his half-brother John Pic and his wife in New York City, where Pic was stationed with the Coast Guard. There were reports of fights and divisions within the group and by the start of the school year, Lee and his mother had moved into their own apartment in the Bronx.

Teased at junior high school because he wore jeans and spoke with a Texas accent, Lee began staying away. However, unlike most truants who ended up in pool halls or street gangs, Lee continued his education on his own, frequenting the local library and the zoo. Finally caught, the youngster was handed over for psychiatric observation to an institution called Youth House. Here he stayed from April 16 until May 7, 1953. Mrs. Oswald said it was only after having both her gifts and her person searched for cigarettes and narcotics, that she realized Youth House was one step short of jail. She said her son implored her:

"Mother, I want to get out of here. There are children in here who have killed people and smoke. I want to get out."

While under the care of the state, Oswald was given psychiatric tests. The results were essentially inconclusive. They showed him to be a bright and inquisitive young man who was somewhat tense, withdrawn and hesitant to talk about himself or his feelings.

Even the Warren Report, which generally tried to depict Oswald in the worst possible light, conceded:

"Contrary to reports that appeared after the assassination, the psychiatric examination did not indicate that Lee Oswald was a potential assassin, potentially dangerous, that "his outlook on life had strongly paranoid overtones" or that he should be institutionalized."

After his experience in Youth House, there were no further truancy problems from young Lee. In January 1954, Lee and his mother returned to New Orleans where he finished the ninth grade and began the tenth.

Upon arriving in New Orleans, the Oswalds lived initially with Mrs. Oswald's sister and her husband, Lillian and Charles "Dutz" Murret (See MOBSTERS), before finding an apartment of their own.

Everyone who knew Oswald as a youth agrees that he was somewhat introverted and was what could be best described as a "bookworm." His interests ran to a wide variety, including animals, astronomy and classic literature...and, eventually, politics. Reading comic books and listening to radio and TV were also among his favorite pastimes.

Robert Oswald later recalled:

"One of his favorite (TV) programs was "I Led Three Lives," the story of Herbert Philbrick, the FBI informant who posed as a communist spy. In the early 1950s, Lee watched that show every week without fail. When I left home to join the Marines, he was still watching the reruns."

There can be little doubt that the well-read, but lonely young Oswald spent much of his time daydreaming, fantasizing about being an important person some day.

Oswald appears to have been drawn at an early age to the epic and intense ideological struggle between communism and democratic capitalism. He claimed his first contact with communist ideology came with a pamphlet handed to him on a New York street corner. In a Moscow interview shortly after arriving in Russia, Oswald told Associated Press reporter Aline Mosby:

"I'm a Marxist...I became interested about the age of 15. From an ideological viewpoint. An old lady handed me a pamphlet about saving the Rosenbergs...I looked at that paper and I still remember it for some reason, I don't know why."

Julius and Ethel Rosenberg had been convicted of passing atomic bomb secrets to the Russians in a celebrated - and still controversial - case beginning in 1950. They were executed on June 19, 1953.

However, this story of early interest in communism must be taken with a grain of salt. After all, this is simply what Oswald told a reporter at a time he was trying hard to prove he was a devout communist supporter.

His brother Robert also expressed puzzlement over this story, writing:

"If Lee was deeply interested in Marxism in the summer of 1955, he said nothing about it to me. During my brief visit with him in New Orleans, I never saw any books on the subject in the apartment on Exchange Place. Never, in my presence, did he read anything that I recognized as communist literature. I was totally surprised when the information about his interest in Marxism came out, at the time of his defection to Russia. I was amazed that he had kept to himself ideas and opinions that were evidently so important to him."

In New Orleans, Oswald's study of communism allegedly intensified. Strangely enough, at the same time he was making a patriotic move - joining the Civil Air Patrol (CAP).

It was at this point that Oswald made one of the most intriguing connections of his life. And it may have been in the Civil Air Patrol that Oswald the "communist" was truly born.

It has been established that Oswald's CAP leader was a strange and mysterious character named David W. Ferrie. Ferrie, an airline pilot, private investigator and outspoken right-winger, went on to have connections with reputed Mafia boss Carlos Marcello, anti-Castro Cuban groups, former FBI agent Guy Banister and his anti-Castro activities and the CIA. Ferrie will be discussed at length in other sections of this book. Could Ferrie, who reportedly used his CAP position to establish homosexual contacts with young boys, have influenced Oswald to begin making a pro-communist "cover" for himself with an eye toward becoming a U.S. agent? Did Ferrie seek to take advantage of the impressionable young Oswald with stories of using his intelligence contacts to help Oswald enter the exciting world of espionage? Considering Ferrie's known homosexuality and intelligence connections, this speculation is not as farfetched as it sounds.

We may never know, however, since in 1967 Ferrie was found dead in his New Orleans apartment the day after being released from protective custody by District Attorney Jim Garrison, who named Ferrie as his chief suspect in a plot to assassinate President Kennedy and described him as "one of history's most important individuals."

Crossfire: Ferrie and Oswald's Library Card

A puzzling, incident occurred involving David Ferrie and Oswald's library card which, while not proving ongoing links between the two men, provides tantalizing evidence that such a connection may have existed.

Within hours of the assassination of President Kennedy, an employee of former FBI agent Guy Banister contacted New Orleans authorities and said both Banister and Ferrie had been in touch with Oswald. (Oswald used the same address - 554 Camp Street - as Banister's office on some of his Fair Play For Cuba material - See CUBANS). Banister, a supporter of right-wing causes, had been assisting anti-Castro Cubans through his New Orleans private detective agency.

Authorities could not immediately locate Ferrie. Some time later, Ferrie told New Orleans Police he had driven to Texas the night of the assassination to go goose hunting. However, subsequent investigation of Ferrie's companions revealed that they had decided not to hunt geese but, instead, had gone to a Houston skating rink where Ferrie spent two hours at a pay telephone making and receiving calls.

One of Ferrie's friends told New Orleans police that shortly after Kennedy's assassination, an attorney named C. Wray Gill had come to Ferrie's home and mentioned that when Oswald was arrested in Dallas, he was carrying a library card with Ferrie's name on it.

Gill, an attorney for Carlos Marcello, promised to act on Ferrie's behalf upon his return to New Orleans. On the evening of the Sunday that Jack Ruby killed Oswald, Ferrie contacted Gill who then accompanied Ferrie to the authorities the next day. Ferrie denied knowing anything about Oswald or the assassination and was released. However, one of Oswald's former neighbors in New Orleans later recalled that Ferrie visited her after the assassination asking about a library card. And Oswald's former landlady said Ferrie came to her asking about the library card just hours after the assassination and BEFORE the bizarre Texas trip.

After all this furor over the library card, there is nothing in the official record indicating such a card was ever found in Oswald's possession. Yet the Secret Service, when they questioned Ferrie, reportedly asked if he had lent his library card to Oswald.

Could such a library card have disappeared from Oswald's belongings while in Dallas Police custody? It certainly would not be the only such incident - an incriminating photograph of Oswald was discovered after nearly 15 years among the possessions of a retired Dallas policeman (See THE EVIDENCE). And, if such a card existed, it would have been strong evidence that a relationship between Oswald and Ferrie continued long after young Oswald moved away.

####

In the fall of 1955, Oswald began the 10th grade at Warren Easton High School in New Orleans but dropped out soon after his birthday in October.

Oswald himself wrote to school authorities, stating:

"To who it may concern,

Because we are moving to San Diego in the middle of this month Lee must quit school now. Also, please send him any papers such as his birth certificate that you may have.

Thank You.

Sincerely,

Mrs. M. Oswald"

This note gave evidence of what young Oswald had in mind. He had his mother sign a false affidavit stating he was 17 and he tried to join the Marine Corps. Undoubtedly, he was looking forward to Marine training in San Diego. His brother Robert, who had joined the Marines three years earlier, had given Lee his training manual. His mother later recalled:

"He knew it by heart."

His desire to join the Marines was decidedly odd if we are supposed to believe, as the Warren Commission did, that he was a full-blown Marxist by this time. It makes more sense to believe that Oswald eagerly looked forward to serving in the military because he already knew that plans were being made for his service in intelligence. But his hopes were dashed when the recruiting authorities failed to believe the affidavit. Oswald had to wait another year for his chance at the Marines.

His mother noted:

Lee lived for the time that he would become 17 years old to join the Marines - that whole year.

During that time, he continued to build an identity as a communist sympathizer. During a meeting of the New Orleans Amateur Astronomy Association, he began expounding on the virtues of communism, saying communism was the only way of life for the workers and that he was looking for a communist cell to join but couldn't find one. Another time, he was kicked out of the home of a friend after the friend's father overheard him praising the communist system.

Some have interpreted this penchant for communism as sincere and as evidence of how deeply disturbed Oswald had become. However, when viewed from another side, there is the real possibility that - believing the promises of Captain Ferrie that the adventuresome world of spies lay ahead of him - Oswald was already concocting a pro-communist cover.

After all, up until his meeting with Ferrie his interest in politics and ideology had been no different than any other bright kid. And his family had a tradition of honorable military service. It is clear that Oswald couldn't wait to join the military, yet at the same time was going out of his way to offend nearly everyone with his pro-communist posturing. The question of the genuineness of his regard for communism only intensified after he entered the Marine Corps.(See THE MARINE)

Crossfire: Oswaldskovich the Marine

Six days after his 17th birthday, Oswald was sworn in as a U.S. Marine

On October 26, 1956, Oswald arrived at the Marine Corps Recruit Depot in San Diego, California. Here he completed basic training with no apparent problems, although his marksmanship on the rifle range was less than what was desired by his fellow Marines.

Former Marine, Sherman Cooley, recalled that Oswald was given the name "shitbird" because initially he couldn't qualify on the M-1 rifle. Cooley said:

"It was a disgrace not to qualify and we gave him holy hell."

Another Marine buddy, Nelson Delgado, also has publicly told of Oswald's ineptness with a rifle. However, when Delgado tried to tell this to the FBI after the assassination, he claimed:

"They attacked my competence to judge his character and shooting ability and criticized my efforts to teach him Spanish."

A hounded and fearful Delgado finally moved his family to England because "...the conspirators may think I know more than I do."

Oswald went on to qualify as a "sharpshooter" by only two points in December, "sharpshooter" being the second of three grades of marksmanship. He did not do nearly so well when he again fired for the record shortly before leaving the Marines.

On January 20, 1957, he completed basic and went on to Camp Pendleton, California, where he completed advanced combat training. While learning combat skills, Oswald reportedly continued to speak favorably of communism - an odd circumstance for the Marines in the 1950s unless he was still trying to establish a pro-communist "cover."

Odder still is the fact that at no time did any of Oswald's Marine superiors note for the record his displays of pro-communist sentiment.

In March, Oswald reported to the Naval Air Technical Training Center in Jacksonville, Florida. Here he studied to be a radar air controller, a job given only to men with higher-than-average intelligence. This job also required a security clearance of "Confidential" which Oswald obtained about the time he was promoted to private, first class.

Daniel Patrick Powers, who was with Oswald in Jacksonville, recalled that Oswald used almost all his weekend passes to go to New Orleans, presumably to visit his mother. However, Mrs. Oswald was in Texas at the time and relatives in New Orleans could only recall one phone call from Oswald. pro- Could he have been gaining more advice on how to concoct a pro-communist "cover" in preparation for becoming a spy from Captain Ferrie or someone else?

He graduated May 3 and was sent to Kessler Air Force Base in Mississippi, where he completed an Aircraft Control and Warning Operator Course. pro- During this time, Oswald apparently was liked well enough by his fellow Marines, who called him "Ozzie Rabbit" after a TV cartoon character "Oswald the Rabbit." (This cartoon, it has been claimed, was taken out of syndication after Kennedy's assassination.)

After finishing seventh in a class of 50, Oswald was given a Military Occupational Specialty (MOS) of Aviation Electronics Operator and, after a brief leave, was sent to the Marine Corps Air Station at El Toro, California. He stayed there until shipped to Japan aboard the U.S.S. Bexar on August 22.

Shipmates noticed that Oswald read "Leaves of Grass" by Walt Whitman, and other "good type of literature."

Upon arriving in Japan, the young Marine was sent about 25 miles southwest of Tokyo to the air base at Atsugi, home of the First Marine Aircraft Wing - and one of two bases where the then top-secret U-2 spy plane flights were originating. pro- Also at Atsugi was an innocuous group of buildings housing what was known only as the "Joint Technical Advisory Group." In reality, this was the CIA main operational base in the Far East and it was here that speculation has arisen that the young Oswald got into the real spy business.

During his duty hours, Oswald sat in a hot, crowded semicircular radar control room known as the bubble and intently watched his radarscope for signs of Russian or Chinese aircraft crossing into allied air space. pro- The job was mostly monotony, broken only by an occasional unidentified aircraft and the strange utility plane code-named "Race Car."

The radar operators would overhear "Race Car" asking for wind information at 90,000 feet. They at first thought this was some sort of joke, since the world altitude record at that time was only slightly more than 65,000 feet and the radar height-finding antenna read only up to 45,000 feet. pro- However, slowly the men of Oswald's unit, Marine Air Control Squadron No. 1 (MACS-1), realized that they were overhearing conversations from the strange-looking aircraft that they would soon see wheeled out of a large nearby hangar and then scream into the air. When asked about the craft, the officers would only say it was a "utility plane."pro- The men didn't know this utility plane, or U-2, was being used to penetrate Soviet and Chinese airspace for the purpose of photographing military and industrial targets.

Oswald seemed to show particular interest in the "secrets" of Atsugi. One Marine recalled seeing Oswald taking photographs of the base and he showed special interest during unit briefings on classified material.

Just as he had gone off alone to New Orleans, Oswald began making two-day visits to Tokyo. Years later, Oswald is reported to have confided that he made contact with a small group of Japanese communists in Tokyo while in the Marines. Even Warren Commission lawyers, W. David Slawson, and William T. Coleman Jr., stated in a report which was classified for a time:

"...there is the possibility that Oswald came into contact with communist agents at that time..."

Oswald told a friend at the time that he was having an affair with a Japanese girl who worked as a hostess in a Tokyo nightclub called the Queen Bee.pro- This was a strange connection indeed, for the Queen Bee at that time was one of the three most expensive nightspots in Tokyo. It catered especially to officers and pilots (including U-2 pilots, according to author Edward Jay Epstein). An evening at the Queen Bee could cost up to $100.

It was a decidedly odd meeting place for Oswald, who was making less than $85 a month with much of that being sent back to help support his mother.

It was believed that the hostesses of the Queen Bee, 100 of the most beautiful women in Tokyo, were using their charms to gain information from American servicemen.

Was the poor Marine, Private Oswald, being used to gather intelligence or was Oswald testing his intelligence abilities to infiltrate communist agents in the Queen Bee?

The answer to this question may have come when author/researcher Mark Lane interviewed one of Oswald former Marine pals from Atsugi.

David Bucknell, who was never interviewed by the Warren Commission, told of an incident in which he and Oswald went for beers at a bar near Santa Ana, California, where they were both stationed in 1959. While sitting there, the two Marines were approached by two women who engaged them in conversation.

Bucknell said later that day Oswald said this incident reminded him of a similar experience at Atsugi. According to Oswald's story, he was sitting alone in a Japanese bar when an attractive woman joined him and began asking questions regarding his work at Atsugi.

Since his work involved the highly-secret U-2 plane, Oswald reported this meeting to his superior officer. Soon this officer arranged a meeting between Oswald and a man in civilian clothes.

Oswald told Bucknell the man explained that Oswald could do his country a great service by giving false information to the woman, a known KGB agent. Oswald agreed and thus became an intelligence operative. Oswald said he had been encouraged to continue meeting the woman and was given money to spend at the Queen Bee.

While no U.S. intelligence agency has admitted it, there is evidence to suggest that Oswald was an agent. Sgt. Gerry Patrick Hemming, who served in Japan with Oswald and later went on to join anti-Castro Cubans, said he was recruited into the CIA while in the service and, while Oswald never admitted it, he believed the same thing happened to Oswald based on conversations between the two.

A former CIA finance officer, James Wilcott, testified to the House Select Committee on Assassinations that colleagues told him that Oswald was a secret operative for the spy agency in Japan.

Wilcott, who served in the CIA from 1957 through 1966, said after President Kennedy's assassination he had several conversations with CIA personnel involved in covert operations. He said, based on these conversations and his experience of paying CIA funds to secret operations through the use of code names, or "cryptos," he became convinced that Oswald was brought into the CIA while serving as a radar operator in Japan and later was sent to infiltrate Russia as a spy.

When CIA officials denied these charges - one went so far as to suggest that Oswald was actually recruited by the Soviet KGB while in Japan - the Committee decided not to believe Wilcott.

Another tantalizing piece of evidence that Oswald was involved in intelligence work while stationed in Japan comes from his Marine Corps medical records, which show that on September 16, 1958, Oswald was treated for "Urethritis, acute, due to gonococcus..." Gonorrhea is a venereal disease preached against loudly by the military. For servicemen, a case of gonorrhea often results in disciplinary measures.

However, Oswald's medical record goes on to state:

"Origin: In line of duty, not due to own misconduct."

The fact that Oswald was absolved of any responsibility in contacting gonorrhea astounds service veterans and is strong evidence that his extracurricular activities had the blessings of the military, if not the CIA.

Another small but eye-opening revelation came from secret meetings of the Warren Commission. General Counsel J. Lee Rankin - armed with initial reports from the military - told Commission members two months after the assassination:

"...we are trying to run that down, to find out what he studied at the Monterey School of the Army in the way of languages..."

The Monterey School, now called the Defense Language Institute, is one of the government schools for giving sophisticated and rapid language courses.

Rankin's remark, made public only after a Freedom of Information suit, seems to imply that the Commission had knowledge of Oswald attending courses at Monterey.

And it is certainly easier to believe that Oswald got a crash course in the Russian language in the military than to believe that this high school drop-out learned one of the world's hardest languages by reading books and listening to records as implied by the Warren Commission. (Incidentally, fellow Marines testified they could not recall Oswald listening to any language records.)

It is possible that undercover work was behind a strange shooting incident which took place just as his unit was scheduled to be transferred to the Philippines in late 1957.

On October 27, Oswald was gathering gear from his locker when reportedly a .22-caliber derringer fell onto the floor and discharged, grazing his left elbow.

As nearby Marines rushed into his room, all Oswald would say was:

"I believe I shot myself."

Before the incident, Oswald had told a friend, George Wilkins, that he had ordered the derringer from a mail-order firm in the United States.

At least two of the Marines present, Thomas Bagshaw and Pete Connor, now claim the bullet missed Oswald altogether. Others at the time had the impression that Oswald shot himself in an attempt to prevent being transferred to the Philippines.

If that was the case, it failed. Although absent almost three weeks for medical treatment, he was returned to duty just in time to ship out with his unit on November 20.

The maneuvers of Oswald's unit the Philippines and South China Sea were largely uneventful, although one companion recalled:

"He did a little growing up in that time...he started acting like a man."

Interestingly, while the unit was on Corregidor, actor John Wayne stopped in briefly and a photograph was taken of him. In a background doorway stands Marine Oswald, who was serving his third straight month on mess duty.

His hospital stay following the derringer incident and the amount of time he spent pulling KP (Kitchen Police) may be indicative of time away from his regular unit spent in intelligence training.

According to witnesses, his elbow wound was very minor, yet Oswald spent nearly three weeks in a hospital. More time gaps in his military career were to come.

Back at Atsugi, Oswald was court-martialed for possessing an unregistered weapon - the derringer. On April 11, 1958, he was found guilty and sentenced to 20 days at hard labor, forfeiture of $50 in pay and reduced to the rank of private. His confinement was suspended for six months on the condition that he stay out of trouble.

It was about this time that Oswald put in for a hardship discharge. As this application was being processed there apparently was a need for more time away from his unit for additional intelligence training.

This may have been accomplished by an incident which began in the Enlisted Man's Club at Atsugi.

Oswald, who heretofore had not been known as violent, tried to pick a fight with Technical Sgt. Miguel Rodriguez, allegedly the man who had assigned him to so much KP duty. Rodriguez failed to rise to the bait.

On June 20, Oswald sought out Rodriguez at the Bluebird Club in Yamato and again tried to fight with the sergeant. After pouring a drink on Rodriguez, military police intervened and the next day, Rodriguez signed a complaint against Oswald.

At the court-martial, Oswald acted as his own defense, claiming he was drunk and spilled the drink on Rodriguez accidentally.

Rodriguez said then - and after the assassination - that Oswald had not been drunk and had poured the drink on him deliberately.

The judge ruled that Oswald was guilty of using "provoking words" to a noncommissioned officer and sentenced him to 28 days in the brig and forfeiture of $55. Furthermore, his previous suspension of sentence was revoked and Oswald supposedly went to the brig until August 13, a period of more than 45 days.

Only one Marine who was in the Atsugi brig during this time recalled seeing Oswald and he said during this brief encounter Oswald was wearing civilian clothes.

After his release, several Marines commented that Oswald seemed different. Joseph D. Macedo said he found him "a completely changed person..." Others said that where "Ozzie Rabbit" had been extroverted and fun-filled, this new Oswald was cold and withdrawn.

It may well be right here that a new Oswald - an entirely different man - was substituted for the New Orleans-born Marine. (See WAS OSWALD REALLY OSWALD)

Meanwhile, a previously-granted extension of overseas duty was canceled and it appeared that Oswald would soon be on his way home.

However, on September 14, the Chinese communists began making moves against the Nationalist islands of Quemoy and Matsu and there was a general mobilization. Oswald accompanied his unit to Formosa (now Taiwan).

Not long after their arrival on the island, Oswald was assigned guard duty. About midnight, the officer of the guard, Lt. Charles R. Rhodes, heard several shots.

Running to the scene, Rhodes found Oswald slumped against a tree holding his M-1 rifle in his lap. Rhodes recalled:

"When I got to him, he was shaking and crying. He said he had seen men in the woods and that he challenged them and then started shooting...He kept saying he couldn't bear being on guard duty."

Almost immediately, Oswald was shipped back to Atsugi, arriving on Oct. 5, 1958, according to official reports. Years later, Rhodes said he still believed that Oswald planned the shooting incident as a ploy to get himself transferred back to Japan.

Rhodes was never given any explanation for the willingness of the Marine Corps to go along with this "ploy" except that Oswald was being returned for "medical treatment."

Recall the medical records concerning Oswald's gonorrhea contracted "in line of duty." However, this record is dated September 16, 1958, two days AFTER Oswald officially left with his unit for Formosa.

There has been no explanation for this, as well as several other discrepancies in Oswald's military service records. This has caused some assassination researchers to believe that more than one man was using the name Oswald during this time.

Or could it be that even more time was needed to prepare Oswald for upcoming intelligence missions?

Back at Atsugi and with his unit gone, Oswald was temporarily assigned to a Marine squadron at Iwakuni, an air base about 430 miles southwest of Tokyo.

Here, quite by accident, he came into contact with Owen Dejanovich, a Marine who had attended radar school with him. Dejanovich tried to renew the acquaintanceship but was rebuffed by Oswald, who made efforts to avoid the one man around who had known him previously.

Dejanovich also found Oswald changed. He said Oswald kept referring to the Marines as "you Americans" and raving about "American imperialism" and "exploitation." He also noticed that Oswald was keeping company with locals again, this time with a "...round-eyed Russian girlfriend."

On November 2, 1958, Oswald boarded the USS Barrett for the two-week trip to San Francisco. On November 19, he took a 30-day leave, traveling by bus to Fort Worth where he stayed with his mother, but spent most of his time with his brother Robert hunting squirrels and rabbits.

On December 22, he was assigned to Marine Air Control Squadron No.9 (MACS-9) at El Toro, California. Here he was one of seven enlisted men and three officers who formed a radar crew. According to the Warren Report:

"This work probably gave him access to certain kinds of classified material, some of which, such as aircraft call signs and radio frequencies, was changed after his (attempted) defection to Russia."

It was here that Oswald's public embracing of communism reached new heights.

He would answer questions with "Da" or "Nyet" and address fellow Marines as "Comrade." When playing chess, he always wanted the red playing pieces, which he referred to as the "victorious Red Army."

His Marine companions began calling him "Oswaldskovich."

One of his fellow Marines, Kerry Thornley, was so impressed by this "eightball" that he later wrote a novel using a character based on Oswald.

Here are some of his recollections:

"I have never personally known an individual more motivated by what appeared to be a genuine concern for the human race than Lee Harvey Oswald...His concern for other people, not as individuals but as a mass, was real. Oswald was unselfish. He was so unselfish that he couldn't seem to concentrate on his own affairs. He would rather be busily solving the problems of mankind...(Once) I explained that I was an atheist."

"So am I," said Oswald, glancing up from his notebook. "I think the best religion is communism."

"Yeah, Oswald's a Red," said one of the men, to me.

"No, I'm not a communist. I just think they have the best system."

"Why?" I wanted to know.

"Because they have a purpose. And the communist way of life is more scientific than ours. You don't have to believe in a bunch of fairy tales to accept it."

"...What causes me to have second thoughts about his commitment to communism is his enthusiasm for a book unpopular with the few self-admitted communists I have known, for obvious reasons. The book is George Orwell's "1984," a severe criticism in fiction form of socialist totalitarianism....I read "1984" and for a while decided Oswald was not truly in sympathy with Marxism. It had to be a joke, I concluded. That explained his tight little smile. He was laughing to himself, I was sure. He saw all the fallacies in socialism that George Orwell saw. And, on this final point, I am still not convinced I was wrong...And, the one thing I remember most about Lee is that he was a comedian...his wit got him into the most trouble...One of his favorite games was to compare the United States Marine Corps to the society in "1984." "Be careful, comrade, with Big Brother's equipment," he would say...

Thornley said he was greatly surprised when he read about Oswald going to Russia.

He was even more surprised to learn that Oswald was identified as Kennedy's assassin. Although he was convinced of Oswald's guilt by the time he put down his recollections, thanks to the barrage of damaging information offered by the authorities through the news media, he nevertheless wrote:

"From the moment I first heard of his arrest until after he was gunned down by Jack Ruby, I did not believe Oswald could be guilty. But, as the facts came in, as the evidence piled up, I decided there must have been more violence in him than I thought."

Another Marine, Nelson Delgado, also got along well with Oswald. Delgado, a Puerto Rican, said Oswald "treated him like an equal."

Oswald and Delgado talked at length about Cuba and Fidel Castro's coming to power. After a while, Oswald began asking Delgado how he could get in touch with some Cubans.

Delgado said one day he handed Oswald a note saying he should write the Cuban Embassy in Washington, D.C. Not long after that, Delgado noticed that Oswald, who previously received few letters, began receiving mail several times a week and that at least some of this mail came from the Cuban consulate.

Delgado also told investigators after the assassination that during this time, Oswald was often "gigged" for having a dirty rifle and that, when the unit went to the rifle range, Oswald got "Maggie's drawers," - a red flag signifying that he hadn't even hit the target.

If Oswald was a genuine Marine communist, it begs the imagination to think that his officers took no notice.

In fact, Thornley tells of an incident in which a young lieutenant did notice that Oswald was receiving a Russian newspaper in the mail. According to this story:

"...the lieutenant grew very excited over his discovery and possibly made an open issue of Oswald's probable sympathy to the communist cause. Most of the troops...were very much amused at the lieutenant's having "pushed the panic button." Oswald, of course, didn't think it was so funny. But apparently the lieutenant's warnings were ignored by the command..."

Were these warnings ignored or were higher-ups more knowledgeable about Oswald's communist activities?

Another hint as to Oswald's true allegiances may be found in an odd incident involving his friend Thornley, with whom Oswald spent many hours in ideological and philosophical discussions.

Thornley told the Warren Commission that one day while he and Oswald were preparing for a military parade and were remarking about the stupidity of the thing, Oswald said it made him angry. Thornley then said:

"Well, comes the revolution you will change all that."...at which time he (Oswald) looked at me like a betrayed Caesar and screamed, "Not you, too, Thornley!" And I remember his voiced cracked as he said this. He was definitely disturbed at what I had said and I didn't really think I had said that much....I never said anything to him again and he never said anything to me again."

This sounds more like a person deeply hurt that a good friend would seriously believe him to be a communist than a communist sympathizer angered over an innocuous jibe.

James Botelho, today a California judge, was a roommate of Oswald's during his stay at El Toro. Botelho even once took Oswald home to meet his parents. He has never bought the idea that Oswald turned communist.

In an interview with Mark Lane, Botelho stated:

"I'm very conservative now and I was at least as conservative at that time. Oswald was not a communist or a Marxist. If he was I would have taken violent action against him and so would many of the other Marines in the unit."

###

Whatever his true beliefs concerning communism, Oswald at this time knew bigger things were looming on his horizon.

In the spring of 1959, he had applied to study philosophy at the Albert Schweitzer College in Switzerland and had been accepted.

In a cryptic letter to his brother, he wrote:

"Pretty soon I'll be getting out of the Corps and I know what I want to be and how I'm going to be it..."

Years later, Marine Bucknell told Mark Lane that during 1959, both he, Oswald and other Marines at El Toro Base were ordered to report to the military Criminal Investigation Division (CID). There a civilian tried to recruit those present for an intelligence operation against "communists" in Cuba.

Oswald was selected to make several more trips to CID and later told Bucknell that the civilian was the same man who had been his intelligence contact at Atsugi. Some time later, Oswald confided to Bucknell that he was to be discharged from the Marines and go to Russia.

Oswald said he was being sent to Russia by American intelligence and that he would return to America in 1961 as a hero.

Judge Botelho, the former roommate of Oswald, told of his reaction to Oswald's trip to Russia:

"Well, when Oswald's presence in the Soviet Union was made public, it was the talk of everyone who knew him at the base. First of all, I was aware of the fact that the radio codes and other codes were not changed and that Oswald knew all of them. That made me suspicious. I knew Oswald was not a communist and was, in fact, anti-Soviet. Then, when no real investigation about Oswald occurred at the base, I was sure that Oswald was on an intelligence assignment in Russia....Two civilians dropped in (at El Toro), asked a few questions, took no written statements and recorded no interviews with witnesses. It was the most casual of investigations. It was a cover-investigation so that it could be said that there had been an investigation.... Oswald, it was said, was the only Marine ever to defect from his country to another country, a communist country, during peacetime. That was a major event. When the Marine Corps and American intelligence decided not to probe the reasons for the "defection," I knew then what I know now: Oswald was on an assignment in Russia for American intelligence."

Whether an intelligence agent or true defector, Oswald obviously had plans made and the Navy seemed oddly obliging.

On August 17, 1959, Oswald applied for a dependency discharge on the grounds that his mother needed his support. This application was accompanied by affidavits from his mother, an attorney, a doctor and two friends - all supplied by his mother - stating she had been injured at work in December 1958 and was unable to support herself.

Later investigation showed a candy box had fallen on her nose and that she had not even bothered to see a doctor until well after the incident.

Nevertheless, within two weeks, to the surprise of his fellow Marines, Oswald's request was approved and he was released from service on September 11.

On September 4, Oswald applied for a passport, plainly stating that he might travel to various countries including Russia and Cuba. This, of course, was in opposition to his claim that he was going home to care for his injured mother.

His passport was "routinely" issued six days later, just in time for his exit from the Marines.

After a brief stopover in Texas with his mother, Oswald withdrew $203 from his only-known bank account and continued on to New Orleans, where he purchased a ticket for Le Harve, France, on the freighter "Marion Lykes" for $220.75.

He had told his mother he was going to New Orleans to work for an import-export firm, but in a letter mailed just before he sailed, he wrote:

"I have booked passage on a ship to Europe. I would have had to sooner or later and I think it's best I go now. Just remember above all else that my values are different from Robert's or yours. It is difficult to tell you how I feel. Just remember, this is what I must do. I did not tell you about my plans because you could hardly be expected to understand."

On September 20, 1959, Oswald left on the first leg of a journey which would take him to his destiny - via Russia.

Crossfire: Oswald Summary

Lee Harvey Oswald had a childhood which was no better nor worse than millions of other Americans. He was bright and eager to learn, despite a disrespect for educational systems and authorities.

At age 16, after joining the Civil Air Patrol and meeting Captain David Ferrie, he suddenly made some public posturings as a pro-communist, despite the fact that he tried to join the Marine Corps at this same time.

Once a Marine, several odd and troubling items appeared in his military record.

Despite prior-service statements indicating interest in communist activities, Oswald was granted a security clearance and stationed at the Japanese base where super-secret spy flights were being launched.

Further evidence of Oswald's involvement with undercover work can be seen in his off-duty activities at the Queen Bee and his strange case of venereal disease "in line of duty."

Fellow Marines and even a former CIA clerk have stated publicly that Oswald was recruited into U.S. intelligence while stationed in Japan.

Various discrepancies in Oswald's military records - notations made for the same date but different locations, unaccounted for periods of time - support the idea that Oswald was given secret intelligence training.

And consider the circumstance of a Marine in 1959 who was vocally supportive of communism and Castro, yet was "ignored" by higher command - further evidence that Oswald was creating a cover story as a pro-communist on orders.

The speed and ease with which he obtained a hardship discharge and a United States passport raise questions regarding Oswald's possible relationship with U.S. intelligence.

Until the United States Government decides to divulge all it knows about Oswald's career -there are still numerous files locked away until the year 2039 and Oswald's military files were reported "routinely" destroyed - it may prove impossible to conclusively prove Oswald's intelligence connections.

Until the day she died, Oswald's mother maintained her son was an agent of the U.S. Government, and the evidence of Oswald's spy work is there for anyone to see.

Crossfire: The Russians

"... I believe he (Oswald) worked for the American Government."

Marina Oswald

Stretching from the Baltic to the Pacific, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, which many still refer to as Russia, covers the largest territory in the world. It contains a wide diversity of peoples, many with separate customs, traditions and even languages. Spreading from the duchies around Moscow and Kiev, Ivan the Great and his son ultimately brought areas from the Volga Steppes and the Caspian Sea under control during the 16th century.

Modern Russia was created by annexing or conquering a long string of small nations such as Ukraine, Belorussia, Georgia, Lithuania, Moldavia, Kazakh, Armenia, Uzbek, Turkmen, Latvia, Estonia and Azerbaijan. By World War I, this giant collection of peoples was held together by the czarist monarchy. Battered by world war, famine, public discontent, a shattered economy and political intrigues within the monarchy, Russia collapsed into revolution in February 1917. With the abdication of Czar Nicholas II and Czarina Alexandra, a provisional government was set up under Aleksandr Kerenski. Kerenski attempted to bring Western democratic ideals to his beleaguered nation, but the fury of the revolution continued unabated.

In the fall of 1917, hoping to pull Russia out of the war, the Germans instigated the return of the leader of the radical Bolsheviks, Vladimir Ilich Ulyanov, better known as Lenin, leader of the Bolsheviks. After the October Revolution instigated by Lenin, Russia fell under control of the Bolsheviks, who declared themselves dedicated to the ideals of communism.

In 1922, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics was established in Russia.

On January 21, 1924, after suffering three strokes, Lenin died. It has been rumored he may have been helped along by poison ordered by his successor, Joseph Stalin. Stalin, who may have murdered as many as 12 million people in his drive to power, held Russia in his dictatorial grip until his death in 1953.

In the five years following Stalin's death, there was a quiet, but deadly, struggle for power in the USSR, with former secretary of the communist Party Nikita Khrushchev coming out on top.

Khrushchev continued to take the offensive against Stalinist hard-liners, first by denouncing Stalin's purge of Secret Police Chief Lavrenti Beria in 1953 in return for Russian Army support and then by staging a series of impressive foreign visits during the late 1950s. Both Khrushchev and his western counterpart, U.S. President Dwight Eisenhower, both seemed sincere in wanting to ease the tensions between their two countries.

In the summer of 1959, Khrushchev visited the United States. Newsweek described the results:

"After two private days with Eisenhower at Camp David, Khrushchev lifted an ultimatum on Berlin, announced that the President had "captivated" him and praised (Eisenhower's) wisdom and love of peace in terms no cold-war Soviet leader has used either before or since. The stage was set for a full-fledged negotiation at the summit in Paris."

This summit, scheduled for mid-May 1960, might have produced a limited nuclear-test-ban treaty, already foreseen as the first major accord of the cold war.

But it was not to be.

On May 1, the traditional Russian celebration of May Day, CIA pilot Francis Gary Powers was captured alive after his U-2 spy plane crashed in the Soviet Union following an explosion. Khrushchev was furious, yet tried to give Eisenhower latitude in disclaiming any knowledge of the incident. He stated that the U-2 flight may have been the work of "American aggressive circles" trying to "torpedo the Paris summit or, at any rate, prevent an agreement for which the whole world is waiting."

After days of half-truths and evasions, Eisenhower finally admitted that the spy plane was acting on his orders and took responsibility for the fiasco, just as John Kennedy took the responsibility for the disastrous Bay of Pigs invasion a year later.

However, questions still surround the U-2 incident and some students of history such as David Wallechinsky and Irving Wallace in "The People's Almanac" note:

"It is possible that certain U.S. military leaders deployed Powers purposely to sabotage the peace talks which Eisenhower himself acutely desired."

Crossfire: Oswald and the U2

Francis Gary Powers and his ill-fated U-2 spy plane were brought down six months after a former Marine named Lee Harvey Oswald arrived in Moscow and told an American Embassy official he planned to give the Soviets classified information he had gained as a radar operator in the Marine Corps.

Richard E. Snyder, a CIA intelligence operative serving as senior consular officer at the Moscow embassy, recalled that Oswald went so far as to state that he knew something that would be of "special interest" to Soviet intelligence. What "special interest" information did Oswald have?

The Russians had known about the U-2 program for some time and their anti-aircraft missiles were capable of shooting down the high-flying craft. What the Soviets lacked was detailed altitude information on the U-2 which would have allowed them to accurately control their missiles at great altitudes.

Oswald, who served as a radar operator at Atsugi, Japan, one of the staging bases for the U-2 flights, had that information.

After being swapped for a Soviet spy, Powers returned to the U.S. and wrote a book about his ordeal entitled "Operation Overflight." He pointed out Oswald's claim that he had information for the Soviets and inferred that if indeed Oswald gave information pertaining to U-2 operational altitudes and radar techniques used during its flight, the Russians may have learned enough to enable them to shoot down the U-2. Powers also said his Soviet interrogators seemed to have special knowledge about the Atsugi base, although Powers maintained he had never been stationed there.

Files detailing Oswald's connection with the U-2 flights have been withheld from the American public for years by the Warren Commission.

Colonel Fletcher Prouty, who served as focal point officer between the CIA and the Air Force, was particularly concerned with the U-2 flights. He has stated that it is preposterous to assume that information Oswald might have given the Russians could have led to their shooting down the craft. Prouty told author Anthony Summers:

"The Russians simply had nothing that could touch a plane flying that high."

Prouty concluded that, based on his interpretation of U-2 technical evidence, Power's plane was flying below its operational altitude when brought down. Some people familiar with the U-2 incident believe it may have been downed due to sabotage. In 1977, Powers told a radio audience that he believed his U-2 had been brought down by a bomb placed on board. Shortly after making this statement, he was killed when his helicopter, used to report news for a Los Angeles television station, ran out of gas and crashed.

There are two tantalizing clues that Oswald may have indeed had some connection with the U-2 incident. In a letter to his brother, Oswald wrote regarding Powers:

"He seemed to be a nice bright American-type fellow when I saw him in Moscow."

There is no explanation as to how or when Oswald might have seen Powers, particularly when viewed from the standpoint that officially Oswald never returned to Moscow after being sent to Minsk in 1960.

Next, after his return to the United States, Oswald told Dennis Ofstein, a fellow employee of Jagers-Chiles-Stovall who had worked for Army security, that he had only seen Russian jets in Moscow on May Day. And of Oswald's three May Days spent in Russia, the only one unaccounted for is May 1, 1960 - the day the U-2 was captured.

Because of the U-2 flights during this time, Soviet intelligence was extremely interested in America defectors, both because of the knowledge they might have and the suspicion that most, if not all, were American spies. Apparently American intelligence was equally interested in learning about the Soviets. According to author Anthony Summers, who studied documents from both the State Department and the House Select Committee on Assassinations, there were only two U.S. enlisted men to defect to Russia between the years 1945 and 1959. Yet in the 18 months prior to January 1960, no fewer than nine defected, five of them U.S. Army men from West Germany and two Navy men. All these defectors, including at least three civilians, had backgrounds in the military or in sensitive defense work. It is known that, like Oswald, at least four of these returned to the United States after a few years.

Crossfire: Robert E. Webster - Another Oswald?

The case of Robert E. Webster, an American who told officials he was defecting to Russia less than two weeks before Oswald, is worth considering since there appears to be many similarities between the two.

Webster, a former Navy man, was a young plastics expert who simply failed to return home with colleagues after working at an American trade exhibition in Moscow. He had been an employee of the Rand Development Corp., one of the first U.S. companies to sell Russia technical products. Although Rand Development was thought to be separate from the more notorious Rand Corporation - the CIA "think-tank" front where Daniel Ellsberg copied the Pentagon Papers - there appears to be some evidence of connections between the two. The firms were at one time located across the street from each other in New York City; Rand Development did hold several CIA contracts and several top officials of Rand Development - President Henry Rand, George Bookbinder and Christopher Bird - were later connected with the CIA.

While in Russia, Webster took a Soviet girl as common-law wife (he was already married to a woman in the United States) and the couple had a child. Like Oswald, Webster claimed to have become disenchanted with Soviet life and he returned to the United States about the same time as Oswald.

The story becomes even stranger.

Although Webster is said to have told American officials he never had any contact with Lee Harvey Oswald, when Oswald was arranging his return to the United States in 1961, he "asked (U.S. Embassy officials) about the fate of a young man named Webster who had come to the Soviet Union shortly before he did..."

Furthermore, there are some intriguing connections between Webster and Oswald's wife, Marina. Years later in America, Marina told an acquaintance that her husband had defected after working at an American exhibition in Moscow. This, of course, reflects Webster's story, not Oswald's. After the assassination, when American intelligence was looking into Marina's background, they discovered an address in her address book matching that of Webster's Leningrad apartment. Were Webster and Oswald two of several fake defectors being sent into Russia during 1958 and 1959? The parallels of their stories are striking.

Author Summers talked with former CIA Officer Victor Marchetti, who analyzed the Soviet military during the time Oswald went to Russia, and was told:

"At the time, in 1959, the United States was having real difficulty in acquiring information out of the Soviet Union; the technical systems had, of course, not developed to the point that they are at today, and we were resorting to all sorts of activities. One of these activities was an ONI (Office of Naval Intelligence) program which involved three dozen, maybe 40, young men who were made to appear disenchanted, poor, American youths who had become turned off and wanted to see what communism was all about. They were sent into the Soviet Union or into eastern Europe, with the specific intention the Soviets would pick them up and "double" them if they suspected them of being U.S. agents, or recruit them as KGB agents. They were trained at various naval installations both here and abroad, but the operation was being run out of Nag's Head, North Carolina."

This is particularly interesting because this Navy program sounds exactly like Oswald's experience and because of an unexplained incident after Oswald was in Dallas Police custody.

The night of the assassination, Oswald attempted to place a call from the Dallas Police Station. According to one of the police telephone operators, Oswald was told his number didn't answer although the call was never put through. The operator retrieved a slip of paper with the number Oswald tried to call on it and learned that Oswald had tried to reach a man named "Hurt" in Raleigh, North Carolina.

One man whose 1963 telephone number matched the number on the Dallas operator's note was a John D. Hurt, who has disclaimed any knowledge of Oswald. Yet Hurt, it was learned, served with U.S. Military Intelligence during World War II. Further, Oswald had no known contacts in North Carolina.

During the years Oswald was in Russia, the State Department was engaged in a study of U.S. defectors to Russia. Otto Otepka, the official in charge of the study, said one of its goals was to determine which defectors were genuine and which may have been U.S. intelligence operatives.

In June 1963, five months prior to the assassination of President Kennedy, Otepka said he was ousted from his job and, in fact, barred from access to his study material on defectors, one of whom was Lee Harvey Oswald. Asked if Oswald was a real or fake defector by a researcher in 1971, Otepka replied:

"We had not made up our minds when...we were thrown out of the office."

This incident is especially troubling, for if the shut-down of the State Department investigation was because of Oswald, this is evidence of someone within the U. S. government having prior knowledge of the assassination.

Crossfire: Oswald's Defection

Oswald's attempted defection to Russia was as strange as many other aspects of his life.

The "Marion Lykes" arrived in Le Havre, France, on October 8, 1959. Oswald arrived in Southampton, England, October 9 and, according to the Warren Commission, set off for Helsinki, Finland, arriving and checking into the Tornio Hotel that same day. However, in Oswald's passport, the British immigration stamp reads, "Embarked 10 Oct. 1959." This presents a real problem, since the only direct flight from London to Helsinki that day did not arrive in time for Oswald to have checked into the Tornio Hotel at the hour shown in the hotel's register. The discrepancy in times has led some researchers to believe that Oswald got to Finland by some means other than public transportation - perhaps in U.S. military aircraft. But this possibility, of course, smacks of intelligence work and had been avoided by the official investigations.

Another oddity: throughout his life, Oswald exhibited a tightness with money, usually staying in cheap rooming houses and apartments. However, once in Helsinki, he registered in the Tornio Hotel, then moved the next day into the Klaus Kurki Hotel, two of the city's most expensive and luxurious lodgings. The Warren Commission claimed Oswald then visited the Soviet consulate in Helsinki and obtained a visa in two days, which must have been some sort of record, as the Commission also determined that the shortest normal time for obtaining a visa was one week.

Oswald's visa was issued October 14 and the Commission said Oswald left by train the next day for Moscow, arriving on October 16. However, the leading Swedish newspaper "Dagens Nyheter" reported three days after the assassination information - which since has been confirmed by Swedish Intelligence - that Oswald failed to get his Soviet visa in Helsinki. The paper said Oswald instead came to Stockholm, where he obtained a visa at the Russian Embassy after two days. Curiously, neither the Warren Commission nor the House Select Committee on Assassinations mentioned this side trip.

Whatever the facts, the speed and ease with which Oswald journeyed to Moscow leaves one with the impression that there was more motivating this young man than a lone American seeking to experience a communist state.

Arriving in Moscow by train, Oswald was taken in tow by a representative of Intourist, the official state tourist agency, who placed him in the Hotel Berlin where he registered as a student. The next day Oswald went sightseeing with his Intourist guide, a young woman named Rima Shirokova, and promptly told her he wanted to defect. Despite his proclamation that he was a "communist" desiring to live in Russia, after several contacts with Soviet authorities Oswald was informed on October 21 that his visa had expired and he had two hours to leave Moscow.

Faced with deportation, Oswald reportedly cut his left wrist in a suicide attempt. Conveniently, this was done just before a meeting with his Intourist guide. She found him in his hotel room and had him taken to a hospital. This act accomplished the same result of the Marine shooting incident - he was out of sight in the hospital for 11 days. He was released on October 28 and, accompanied by Rima Shirokova, he checked out of the Hotel Berlin and into the Metropole. The Warren Commission concluded:

"The government undoubtedly directed him to make the change."

Oswald had, in fact, been in touch with Soviet government officials from the "Pass and Registration Office."

He remained in his hotel room three days, apparently awaiting orders from someone. He told Shirokova he was impatient, but didn't say why.

By Saturday, October 31, 1959, Oswald was ready to make his move. Striding past the Marine guards at the U.S. Embassy, he plopped his passport down in front of a receptionist and declared he had come to "dissolve his American citizenship." He was directed to Richard E. Snyder, the second secretary and senior consular official, who tried dissuade the young ex-Marine from his planned course of action.

Oswald handed Snyder an undated, handwritten note that displayed a sophisticated knowledge of the legal subtleties concerning the revocation of citizenship. It reflected the same type of knowledge which had allowed Oswald to make his journey to Moscow in a most unorthodox manner.

The note stated:

"I, Lee Harvey Oswald, do hereby request that my present citizenship in the United States of America, be revoked....I take these steps for political reasons. My request for the revoking of my American citizenship is made only after the longest and most serious considerations. I affirm that my allegiance is to the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics."

Present with Snyder was John McVickar, another senior consular officer. In later years, McVickar said he felt Oswald:

"...was following a pattern of behavior in which he had been tutored by a person or persons unknown...seemed to be using words he had learned but did not fully understand...in short, it seemed to me there was the possibility that he had been in contact with others before or during his Marine Corps tour who had guided him and encouraged him in his actions?"

In later years Snyder himself came under suspicion of aiding Oswald in an intelligence mission when it was revealed that he had worked for the CIA - although the Agency claimed it was only for a brief time in 1949.

When the House Select Committee on Assassinations looked into the matter, investigators found that Snyder's CIA file was unavailable "... (as) a matter of cover." The committee found this revelation "extremely troubling."

According to the Warren Commission, Snyder did not permit Oswald to renounce his citizenship. Since it was a Saturday, Snyder explained that Oswald would have to return on a normal business day to fill out the necessary paperwork. Oswald never returned and, therefore, technically never renounced his citizenship.

Could the three-day wait in his hotel room have been because he had been coached not to defect unless it was on a Saturday? How could a lowly high school drop-out know all of these legalistic subtleties without being briefed by someone much more knowledgeable?

Even American newswoman, Priscilla Johnson, who interviewed Oswald a few days later in his hotel room, thought he "may have purposely not carried through his original intent to renounce (citizenship) in order to leave a crack open."

On November 3, Oswald sent the embassy a letter protesting its refusal to accept his renunciation of citizenship. However, he never showed up in person to pursue that act. And when embassy personnel attempted to contact Oswald, he refused to see them.

During this time, Oswald granted two newspaper interviews, one to Aline Mosby of UPI and the other to Johnson, who said she represented the North American Newspaper Alliance syndicate. Oswald harangued both reporters with his fervent support of Marxism and its ideals and both dutifully reported his comments in newspaper articles that appeared back in the United States.

Johnson (now Priscilla Johnson McMillan), interestingly, would later write the book "Marina and Lee," which supposedly "reveals the innermost secrets of (Marina's) life with the man who shot JFK."

She once was an assistant to Senator John F. Kennedy and went on to become an acknowledged expert on Soviet affairs. It is Mrs. McMillan who has been responsible for much of the information concerning Oswald's personal life shortly before the assassination. There has been much speculation over the years that Mrs. McMillan was operating for U. S. intelligence when she was in contact with Oswald. She has testified that she never worked for the CIA. However, the House Select Committee on Assassinations reported that she had applied to work for the CIA in 1952, had been "debriefed" by that agency after a trip to Russia in 1962 and, in fact, had provided the CIA with "cultural and literary" information.

Suspicion about Johnson grew in light of an FBI memorandum dated November 23, 1963, in which a State Department security officer informed the FBI:

"...one Priscilla Johnston (sic) and Mrs. G. Stanley Brown also had contact with Oswald in Russia. Both these women were formerly State Department employees at the American Embassy and their contact with Oswald was official business."

By December 1959, Oswald had dropped from sight in the Soviet Union and was not heard from again for more than a year. During that time, most of what is known about Oswald's activities come from his "Historic Diary," supposedly a day-to-day account of his life in Russia.

Even the Warren Commission had trouble with Oswald's diary, noting:

"...it is not an accurate guide to the details of Oswald's activities. Oswald seems not to have been concerned about the accuracy of dates and names and apparently made many of his entries subsequent to the date the events occurred."

For instance, Oswald notes in his entry for October 31, 1959 - the day he visited the American Embassy - that John McVickar had taken Richard Snyder's place as "head consul." This change did not take place until two years after that date, at a time Oswald was preparing to leave Russia.

In later years, experts hired by the House Select Committee on Assassinations concluded the "diary" was written entirely on the same paper and was most probably written in one or two sittings. In other words, it was intended as a chronicle of his time in Russia, but was by no means contemporary. This fact further fuels the charge that Oswald, even while in the Soviet Union, was acting on orders from someone else. This charge was even voiced by Warren Commission general counsel J. Lee Rankin, who told commission members in executive session:

"That entire period is just full of possibilities for training, for working with the Soviet(s), and its agents."

Aside from the "diary" there is precious little documentation about Oswald's stay in Russia.

In early 1964, the Soviet government provided the Warren Commission with 15 pages of documents, including copies of Oswald's passport, a job application form from a Minsk radio factory, some hospital records and a supervisor's report from the factory.

Crossfire: Comrade Oswald

Although much about Oswald's life in Russia is unknown, there are pieces of information tell a decidedly different story of his sojourn.

After spending New Year's Day 1960 in Moscow, Oswald reportedly was then sent to Minsk with 5,000 rubles. The money supposedly came from the "Red Cross," although Oswald himself wrote that the money actually came from the Soviet MVD (the Soviet secret police) after he "denounced" the United States. He reported that he was greeted in Minsk on January 8 by no less than the mayor of the city, who promised him a rent-free apartment. And what an apartment it was - a spacious flat with a separate living room, tile floors and modern furniture, accommodations far beyond the means of the average Russian worker. Two private balconies overlooked a picturesque bend in the Svisloch River. It was here that Oswald entertained his new-found Russian friends, such as Pavel Golovachev. Golovachev was pictured in some of the snapshots Oswald made in his Minsk home. Golovachev was the son of Hero of the Soviet Union General P.Y. Golovachev and a man who reportedly traveled in Minsk's highest social circles.

Oswald was assigned duties as a "metal worker" in the Belorussian Radio and Television factory. Here, between his wages and the continuing "Red Cross" allowance, Oswald reportedly was making more money than the factory's director.

In his "diary," Oswald wrote about affairs with at least five local girls, with whom he would take to nearby movies, theaters and opera. Oswald wrote in his "diary," that he was "living big."

On a darker side, it should be noted that Minsk, along with being a somewhat cosmopolitan city by Russian standards, also was the site of an espionage training school made known to the CIA as far back as 1947. In testimony to the Warren Commission on May 14, 1964, FBI director J. Edgar Hoover said:

"...just the day before yesterday information came to me indicating that there is an espionage training school outside of Minsk - I don't know whether it is true - and that he (Oswald) was trained at that school to come back to this country to become what they call a "sleeper," that is a man who will remain dormant for three or four years and in case of international hostilities rise up and be used."

Almost adjacent to this spy school is the Foreign Language Institute. Oswald in a manuscript about his life in Minsk wrote, "I was in the Foreign Language Institute," realizing his slip, Oswald edited this remark to read, "I was visiting friends in the Foreign Language Institute."

In addition to his money and lavish apartment, there is evidence to suggest that Oswald was living a privileged life with his Soviet hosts. Although officially, he never left Minsk - in his manuscript, Oswald pointed out how most Soviet citizens were prohibited from traveling far from their home - Oswald apparently traveled extensively in Russia.

Jeanne DeMohrenschildt, who along with her husband befriended Oswald after his return to the United States, said he was quite interested in photography. She said he had photographs of various locations in Russia which he showed her with great pride. He also told her about his enjoyable weekends hunting. And, found among his possessions was a Soviet hunting license showing he had been a member of the Belorussian Society of Hunters and Fishermen which carried with it the privilege of owning a 16-gauge shotgun, another feat impossible for the average Russian.

About the only fact that can be stated without question concerning Oswald's life in Russia is that he lived well beyond the means of the ordinary Soviet citizen. To most researchers, this abundant life was indicative of some sort of special relationship with Soviet officials. The exact nature of this relationship is still unknown, however many assassination students believe two things: one, that Oswald's fake "defection" to Russia may have had something to do with the downing of the U-2 spy plane on May 1, 1960 and, second, whatever the purposes of his intelligence mission to Russia, it had nothing to do with the subsequent assassination of President Kennedy except to paint the accused assassin as a communist operative.

Although Oswald was not heard from in Russia between December 1959 and February 1961, the wheels of the U.S. bureaucracy were turning. As early as November 10, 1959, the FBI, upon learning of Oswald's attempted defection, placed a "flash" notice on his fingerprint card. This would serve to alert Bureau officials should Oswald's fingerprints turn up in any FBI investigation. It also placed his name on a "watch" list used in monitoring overseas communications.

By the summer of 1960, the FBI was fully alert to Oswald and to the possibility that some sort of espionage game was being played out.

On June 3, 1960, FBI director Hoover wrote to the State Department's Office of Security, warning: "Since there is a possibility that an impostor is using Oswald's birth certificate, any current information the Department of State may have concerning subject will be appreciated."

About this same time, the Marine Corps, informed that Oswald had offered to tell military secrets to the Soviets, took action. After failing to reach Oswald with certified letters, the Marine Corps officially changed Oswald's "honorable discharge" to "dishonorable" on September 13, 1960.

But it was Oswald's mother who seemed to get the swiftest reaction from queries about her son. After phone calls to the FBI and letters to her congressmen failed to turn up information about her son, Mrs. Oswald spent her small savings on a train ticket to Washington. Arriving on January 28, 1961, she called the White House wanting to speak to President Kennedy, who had just been inaugurated eight days before. Failing to reach the President, she asked to speak to Secretary of State Dean Rusk. Instead, she was granted an immediate interview with Eugene Boster, White House Soviet affairs officer. Although she had not heard from her son in more than a year and his trip to Russia allegedly was done entirely on his own, Mrs. Oswald quoted Boster as saying, "Oh, yes, Mrs. Oswald, I'm familiar with the case." As before, she charged that her son was working for the government of the United States and demanded that the government locate him in Russia. Memos were routinely sent to Moscow.

On February 1, 1961, less than a week after Mrs. Oswald's Washington visit, the State Department sent a "Welfare-Whereabouts" memo to Moscow.

On February 13, 1961, the U.S. Embassy in Moscow received a letter from Oswald dated February 5, stating:

"I desire to return to the United States, that is if we could come to some agreement concerning the dropping of any legal proceedings against me."

Secretary Snyder was understandably astonished that Oswald should write to him just after he had been asked to locate the ex-Marine. Mrs. Oswald maintained that the rapidity of response from her son indicated that the U.S. government was in contact with Oswald while in Russia. The Warren Commission attributed his sudden reappearance to coincidence, in light of the fact that routine queries about Oswald had not yet been initiated by the American Embassy.

In his letter, Oswald showed unusual knowledge of the legalities of citizenship. He pointed out that he had never "taken Russian citizenship" and added:

"If I could show (the Soviets) my American passport, I am of the opinion they would give me an exit visa."

Perhaps recalling Hoover's memo of the previous summer, the State Department informed Snyder that Oswald's passport was to be delivered on "a personal basis only."

On May 16, 1961, after some written sparring with the Embassy, Oswald further complicated the entire matter by writing:

"Since my last letter I have gotten married...My wife is Russian, born in Leningrad, she has no parents living and is quite willing to leave the Soviet Union with me and live in the United States...I would not leave here without my wife so arrangements would have to be made for her to leave at the same time I do."

Oswald was ready to return to the United States, but only with his new bride, Marina Nikolaevna Prusakova.

Crossfire: A Whirlwind Romance

A little more than a month after telling the American Embassy that he wished to return home, Oswald met the Russian woman who would become his wife and a chief witness against him after the assassination.

Around March 17, 1961, - nobody seems to be certain of the date, including Marina Oswald attended a trade union dance at the Palace of Culture in Minsk. Here he met 19-year-old Marina Nikolaevna Prusakova, who was the hit of the party in a red brocade dress and hair style "a la Brigitte Bardot." Oswald was introduced to her as "Alik" and soon they were dancing. Marina said they spoke Russian and she believed "Alik" to be a Soviet citizen, but from the Baltic area - Estonia, Latvia or Lithuania. She was greatly surprised to learn this man was really an American named Lee Harvey Oswald. After the dance, Oswald and Marina visited in the home of friends, where Oswald spoke up in defense of the United States, saying that while there were defects such as unemployment and discrimination, there still was "...more democracy..."

According to Oswald's diary, the pair hit it off well and he obtained Marina's telephone number before going home. The following week they again met at a dance and this time Oswald was allowed to accompany Marina home, where he was introduced to the aunt with whom she lived. Marina then agreed to go out on a date with Oswald, but the appointment fell through on March 30, the day before his scheduled date with Marina, Oswald entered the Fourth Clinical Hospital for an adenoids operation. Although the hospital visiting hours were Sundays only, Marina was able to visit Oswald almost every day, perhaps because she wore the white uniform of a pharmacist. She felt sorry for Oswald and on Easter Sunday, the day after his operation, brought him a painted Easter egg. Oswald immediately asked her to become his fiancée and she agreed.

Oswald wrote in his diary: "We are going steady, and I decide I must have her, she puts me off, so on April 15 I propose, she accepts." They married on April 30, less than six weeks after first meeting.

In later years, Marina exhibited a strange memory loss about many aspects of their meeting, whirlwind romance and wedding. She told varying stories as to who first introduced her to Oswald, then finally stated she just couldn't remember. She also told the House Select Committee on Assassinations that Oswald had proposed to her "a month and a half" before their wedding. This would mean Oswald proposed the first night they met. However, this was by no means the only inconsistency in Marina's recollections.

Marina claimed to be born on July 17, 1941, in the northern seaside town of Molotovsk. A war baby, she never knew who her father was and took her mother's name. In the book "Marina and Lee," she suddenly revealed that she had found out that her real father was a Soviet traitor named Nikolai Didenko. This may be a small matter, but it was never revealed to the Warren Commission. Her mother left her as an infant with elderly relatives in Arkhangelsk, where she grew up until rejoining her mother at age seven. By then her mother had married an electrical worker named Alexander Medvedev and by 1952, the family was living in Leningrad, where Marina attended a pharmacist school. She was a young student when her mother died. She said life with her stepfather became intolerable after the death of her mother.

Upon graduation from school in June 1959, she was assigned a job in a pharmaceutical warehouse, but quit after only one day and spent the rest of the summer on vacation. At the end of the summer, she went to Minsk to live with her maternal uncle, Colonel Ilya Vasilyevich Prusakov, a ranking officer in the MVD (the Soviet Ministry of Internal Affairs, portions of which function as secret police), a leading citizen in Minsk and a communist Party member. It was at her uncle's urging that she attended the dance where she met Oswald. Marina's uncle apparently never protested her marriage, although his position could have allowed him to study Oswald's KGB file which must have shown that Oswald had written to the American Embassy about returning to the United States since it is now known that the KGB was keeping him under surveillance.

Within a matter of days after their marriage, Oswald informed Marina of his desire to return to the United States. Soon, Marina began to apply for the documents necessary to leave the Soviet Union. Her exit visas appeared to have been expedited despite the fact that there were several problems with her background information. She stated her name as "Marina Nikolaevna," which indicated her father's name was Nikolai. She insisted, however, that she never knew the name of her father. Her birth certificate identified her birthplace as Severodvinsk. This was the name given to Molotovsk, but not until 1957.

Furthermore, since being a member of the communist Party might cause problems in leaving Russia, she denied any membership. Actually, she was a member of the Komsomol, the communist Party's youth movement.

These discrepancies did not escape the notice of the CIA. Shortly after the assassination, a CIA memorandum noted:

"...at the time (the Agency) was becoming increasingly interested in watching develop a pattern that we had discovered in the course of our bio(graphical) and research work: the number of Soviet women marrying foreigners, being permitted to leave the USSR, then eventually divorcing their spouses and settling down abroad without returning "home". ...we eventually turned up something like two dozen similar cases."

Noting that the birth certificate Marina brought to the United States was issued July 19, 1961, and that she had to have one to obtain a marriage license, author Edward Epstein concluded:

"It thus seemed that new documents - and possibly a new identity - were furnished to Marina after it was decided that she would accompany Oswald to the United States."

On July 8, 1961, Oswald had flown to Moscow to retrieve his passport at the American Embassy. Since he had never technically defected, his passport was promptly returned, although the State Department cautioned the Embassy to proceed carefully in Oswald's "involved case" and to make sure "that the person in communication with the Embassy is...Lee Harvey Oswald." With all their applications made, the Oswalds settled down to wait for approval to leave Russia.

To further complicate the situation, a baby girl - June Lee Oswald - was born to Marina on February 15, 1962. On May 10, the Oswalds heard from the American Embassy that everything was in order and that they should come to Moscow to sign the final papers.

It was during this time that Marina noted a cooling in Oswald's attitude toward her. This coolness was to increase after they left Russia. It was almost as if he had made up the story of his love and instead was simply following some sort of orders in his courtship. Afterward, with his assignment completed, he didn't bother to act like his love was real.

Accounts of Oswald's time during this period also is filled with inconsistencies. For example, in his diary he claims to have returned to Minsk from Moscow on July 14. However, on August 1, Rita Naman and two other tourists reported meeting a young American in Moscow and snapping his picture. Two photos made by these tourists were displayed by the House Select Committee on Assassinations, which said the young American was Oswald.

On May 24, 1962, the Oswalds arrived in Moscow to attend to the final details of their departure from Russia. On June 1, Oswald signed a promissory note at the American Embassy for a repatriation loan of $435.71, the money needed for his return and the couple boarded a train that same evening. Interestingly, just before their departure, both Oswalds met with Captain Alex Davison, the American Embassy doctor. The address of Davison's Russian-speaking mother - who lived in Atlanta, Ga. - can be found in Oswald's address book. Some time later, Davison was revealed as the contact man for U.S. intelligence operations involving a Soviet colonel who spied for the CIA.

Their trip home also has nagging indications of intelligence handling. The Warren Commission said they crossed out of communist territory at Brest. Yet, Marina's passport was stamped at Helmstedt, one of the major checkpoints on the East German border. Intriguingly, Oswald's passport shows no Helmstedt stamp at all, raising the possibility that he somehow traveled a different route from Marina's.

Arriving in Amsterdam, the Oswalds stayed - not in a hotel - but in a private establishment recommended by someone in the American embassy in Moscow, according to Marina. She described this place variously as a "private apartment" and as a "boardinghouse". While the official record shows they stayed here only one night, after the assassination, Marina recalled a three-day stay and she reacted with confusion when questioned about this by the House Select Committee on Assassinations. She did note that advanced arrangements had been made at this place and that their hosts spoke English. Many researchers suspect that Oswald, and perhaps Marina, were "debriefed" by U.S. intelligence during their Dutch stopover. Even the chief counsel of the Warren Commission called the episode "unexplained." Furthermore, in a statement to the Secret Service just after the assassination, Marina gave a version of their trip from Russia that was totally different from that given in the Warren Report. She claimed they "then arrived in New York by air...stayed in some hotel in New York City for one day and then went by train to Texas."

The Warren Commission, backed by tickets, documents and Marina's later testimony, stated that the couple arrived in Hoboken, New Jersey, on June 13, 1962 aboard the ship SS Maasdam. There they were met by Spas T. Raikin, a representative of the Traveler's Aid Society, which had been notified of the Oswalds' arrival by the State Department. Raikin helped whisk the Oswalds through customs and then found them a place to stay in New York. He later arranged contact with Lee's brother, Robert, who sent the couple $200 to pay for plane fare to Fort Worth, Texas.

According to BBC researcher and author Anthony Summers, Raikin was also an official with an anti-communist émigré group with links to both the FBI and U.S. military intelligence as well as anti-communist groups in New Orleans "headquartered in the very building where, in months to come, Oswald's name was to be linked with CIA-backed anti-Castro activists."

The Department of Health, Education and Welfare (HEW) had approved the financial aid to Oswald upon urging from the State Department. In Dallas HEW records, it states that Oswald went to Russia "with State Department approval," an allegation later repeated by Oswald himself on a New Orleans radio program.

When the Oswalds arrived in New York, they had seven suitcases. When they left by plane, they only had five. Asked about the dwindling number, Oswald stated he had sent them ahead by rail. However, when the couple arrived in Fort Worth, Robert stated they had only two suitcases. The lost baggage may have something to do with their flight to Texas, which, although many direct flights were available, went by way of Atlanta. Atlanta was the home of Natasha Davison, the mother of Captain Davison, the U.S. attaché with intelligence connections who had met with the Oswalds in Moscow.

Yet, with all this evidence suggesting that Marina may have been part of some unrevealed intelligence program, she was accepted publicly by the Warren Commission as "a simple, devoted housewife..." Privately, commission members thought differently. At one point, they voiced the fear that she might be a KGB agent. Commission member Senator Richard Russell commented:

"That will blow the lid if she testifies to that."

One Warren Commission lawyer described Marina as "a very different person (from her public image)...cold, calculating, avaricious..."

Some believe that Marina lied in many instances during her testimony to the Warren Commission. And, keep in mind the fact that as Oswald's wife, her testimony would not have been admissible had Oswald come to trial.

Despite all this, Marina's testimony proved very damaging to Oswald. In the hours after the assassination, Marina was quoted as saying: "Lee good man. Lee not shoot anyone." But after being held for weeks by the federal authorities, her statements began to change. Instead of telling what a good husband Oswald had been, she began saying he was violent to her. After initially being unable to identify the Mannlicher-Carcano rifle as her husband's, she later described it as "the fateful rifle of Lee Harvey Oswald." She also began to tell stories of other attempts at assassination by Oswald - one against Richard Nixon and another against General Edwin Walker (See REDNECKS AND OILMEN).

Today Marina has reversed her statements of 1963-64 and publicly made several astounding admissions, including:

- How federal authorities forced her Warren Commission testimony by threatening deportation and ordered her not to read or listen to anything pertaining to the assassination.

- That today she believes a conspiracy resulted in President Kennedy's death. Lee Harvey Oswald was an agent who "worked for the American Government" and was "caught between two powers - the Government and organized crime."

- Oswald was "killed to keep his mouth shut."

That someone impersonated Oswald to incriminate him and "that's no joke." Lee Harvey Oswald "adored" President Kennedy.

In a 1988 interview published in the "Ladies' Home Journal," Marina said: "When I was questioned by the Warren Commission, I was a blind kitten. Their questioning left me only one way to go: guilty. I made Lee guilty. He never had a fair chance...But I was only 22 then, and I've matured since; I think differently."

By 1979, Marina - by then a mature woman with a good command of English - had begun to doubt the official explanation of the assassination and joined with British author Michael Eddowes in seeking to have Oswald's body exhumed (See WAS OSWALD REALLY OSWALD?).

###

Considering the background of both Lee and Marina and the length of time spent by Oswald in Russia, it seems inconceivable that they were not interrogated by U. S. intelligence after their return. Yet the official story is that no U.S. intelligence agency had any interest in this ex-Marine.

Considering the Marine career of Oswald and the military information available to him as a radar operator, it is equally unbelievable that the Soviets did not interrogate Oswald at great length, especially if they found out about his connections with the U-2 flights from Atsugi.

Yet, this is precisely what the Soviets claimed in what has to become one of the most bizarre aspects of the Kennedy assassination - an aspect kept from the American public by the Warren Commission.

Crossfire: A Soviet Defector's Story

The strange story of Yuri Nosenko began on January 20, 1964, just two months after the events in Dallas.

Nosenko, an officer in the American Division of the KGB (Soviet Intelligence), had contacted the CIA initially on June 3, 1962, just two days after Oswald left Russia for the United States. Nosenko offered to spy for the Americans. However, nothing further had been heard from him and U.S. analysts were highly suspicious of his offer. Then on January 20, 1964, Nosenko landed in Geneva as part of a Soviet disarmament delegation. He soon made his way to a telephone and renewed his offer to American intelligence, but with a difference - this time he wanted to defect.

The defection of Yuri Nosenko set in motion a chain of events which would lead to bitter divisions between the CIA and FBI as well as within the CIA itself.

Once he was in American hands, CIA officials were shocked to learn that Nosenko claimed to have been the KGB official who had personally handled the case of Lee Harvey Oswald during his stay in Russia. Nosenko said - based on two mental examinations made of Oswald - the KGB found the would-be defector not very bright and even "mentally unstable." Furthermore, the KGB never debriefed Oswald about his military background nor ever considered recruiting him as an agent, claimed Nosenko.

This was exactly what many people in the CIA and on the Warren Commission wanted to hear. However, there were others in the agency who were immediately suspicious of this man. After all, it appeared Nosenko had forever left a ranking position and his family simply to assure the U.S. government that the man accused of killing the President was not a Soviet agent.

CIA Chief of counterintelligence James Jesus Angleton was particularly wary of Nosenko. He observed that most of the information provided by Nosenko revealing Soviet agents and operations were already known to the CIA prior to his defection. Furthermore, shortly after bringing Nosenko to the United States, CIA interrogators began to find errors and gaps in his testimony. For example, there was the question of Nosenko's rank. He initially told the CIA he was a lieutenant colonel in the KGB. But another KGB defector, Major Anatoli Golitsin, stated he had been in close contact with the KGB departments described by Nosenko but had never run across the man. Under pressure, Nosenko admitted that he had exaggerated his rank to make himself more attractive to the CIA. However, detailed KGB documents provided by Nosenko refer to him as a lieutenant colonel, the senior rank he had repudiated. This caused CIA officials severe concern because it appeared that this defector was being aided in his cover story by the KGB.

To make matters worse, Nosenko's story was corroborated by one of the FBI's deepest secrets - their own Soviet KGB defector referred to only by his code name Fedora. Thus, if Nosenko was lying, then Fedora too became suspect.

In a remarkable attempt to resolve the issue, Nosenko underwent "hostile interrogation." He was kept in solitary confinement for 1,277 days under intense physical and psychological pressure. He was put on a diet of weak tea, macaroni and porridge, given nothing to read, a light was left burning in his unheated cell 24 hours a day, and his guards were forbidden to speak with him or even smile. His isolation was so complete that Nosenko eventually began to hallucinate, according to CIA testimony before the House Select Committee on Assassinations. Toward the end of this ordeal, Nosenko was given at least two lie detector tests by the CIA. He failed both. But Nosenko failed to crack.

The believers of Nosenko, headed by CIA's Richard Helms and J. Edgar Hoover, took his intransigence to mean that he was telling the truth about the KGB having no interest in Oswald. But doubts remained. So at the CIA's request, the Warren Commission obligingly made no reference to Nosenko.

Angleton retired from the CIA and later wrote:

"The...exoneration or official decision that Nosenko is/was bona fide is a travesty. It is an indictment of the CIA and, if the FBI subscribes to it, of that bureau too. The ramifications for the U.S. intelligence community, and specifically the CIA, are tragic."

The counterintelligence faction, led by Angleton, still believes that Nosenko's defection was contrived by the KGB for two purposes: to allay suspicions that the Soviets had anything to do with the JFK assassination and to cover for Soviet "moles," or agents deep within U. S. intelligence.

Today, Nosenko continues to be an advisor on Soviet intelligence to the CIA and the FBI at a salary of more than $35,000 a year. He has been given a new identity as well as more than $150,000 as payment for his ordeal. But questions remain. No researcher seriously believes the Soviets failed to question Oswald about his Marine background. When they learned that he served as a radar operator at the base where U-2 flights were launched, he must have undergone intense interrogation.

Crossfire: Oswald's Contact with the Soviets

Furthermore, there appears to be evidence that Oswald continued to keep in touch with Soviet officials almost up until the time of the assassination of President Kennedy. According to CIA documents, Oswald visited the Soviet Embassy in Mexico City on September 23, 1963, and met with Valeriy Vladimirovich Kostikov, who was described as "(functioning) overtly as a consul...." However, the CIA memorandum added: "(Kostikov)...is also known to be a staff officer of the KGB. He is connected with the Thirteenth, or 'liquid affairs' department, whose responsibilities include assassination and sabotage."

Of course, Oswald's contact with this man, who was operating as a normal member of the Soviet Embassy, may have been coincidental. However, it is significant that the Warren Commission, aware of the implication of this contact, failed to pursue the matter or include this information in their report.

Years later, FBI Agent James Hosty, who was connected to Oswald prior to the assassination (See G MEN), said he was unhappy with the revelation about Kostikov's KGB ties and that, had he been made aware of this connection by the CIA, he would have placed Oswald's name on the Bureau's "Security Index."

Two theories have emerged:

One, Oswald was recruited by the KGB while serving in Japan and encouraged to defect to Russia, then sent back to the U. S. to kill President Kennedy. This theory is rejected by most students of the subject, including author Edward Jay Epstein, whose book "Legend" studies the Oswald-Soviet connections in detail. Epstein reasons:

"I think that the fact that Oswald traces so clearly back to the Russians makes it extremely unlikely that they would have recruited him as an assassin."

Second, that Oswald was recruited into U.S. intelligence as a spy and sent to Russia. There, the KGB attempted to turn him into their agent and sent him back to the United States, unaware that he would be blamed for Kennedy's death. This would explain the extraordinary lengths taken by the Soviets to disavow any connection with Oswald.

In the overall view, it is probable that Oswald was mixed up in some sort of intelligence work. And, while it is likely that the Soviets would recruit this lowly Marine would-be defector, it is highly unlikely that they would consider using him in something so dangerous as assassinating the U.S. President. In murdering Kennedy, the Soviets would have been risking all. World War III would be the likely result should a Soviet assassination plot be uncovered. And what would they have gained by killing Kennedy? Virtually nothing except gaining Lyndon Johnson as president, a man with far better anti-communist credentials than Kennedy and a man with closer ties to the military-industrial complex most feared by the Soviets.

Testifying to the Warren Commission on June 10, 1964, Secretary of State Dean Rusk said:

"I have seen no evidence that would indicate to me that the Soviet Union considered that it had any interest in the removal of President Kennedy...I can't see how it would be to the interest of the Soviet Union to make any such effort."

In 1979, the House Select Committee on Assassinations, even after hearing the Nosenko story, concluded:

"The committee believes, on the basis of the evidence available to it, that the Soviet Government was not involved in the assassination of President Kennedy."

But perhaps the best argument against Soviet involvement comes from the memoirs of the highest-ranking Soviet official ever to defect to the west. In his book, "Breaking With Moscow," Arkady N. Shevchenko writes:

"In November 1963, President Kennedy was assassinated in Dallas. Everyone in the (Soviet) mission was stunned and confused, particularly when there were rumors that the murder had been Soviet-inspired....Our leaders would not have been so upset by the assassination if they had planned it and the KGB would not have taken upon itself to venture such a move without Politburo approval. More important, Khrushchev's view of Kennedy had changed. After Cuba, Moscow perceived Kennedy as the one who had accelerated improvement of relations between the two countries. Kennedy was seen as a man of strength and determination, the one thing that Kremlin truly understands and respects. In addition, Moscow firmly believed that Kennedy's assassination was a scheme by "reactionary forces" within the United States seeking to damage the new trend in relations. The Kremlin ridiculed the Warren Commission's conclusion that Oswald had acted on his own as the sole assassin. There was in fact widespread speculation among Soviet diplomats that Lyndon Johnson, along with the CIA and the Mafia, had masterminded the plot. Perhaps one of the most potent reasons why the U.S.S.R. wished Kennedy well was that Johnson was anathema to Khrushchev. Because he was a southerner, Moscow considered him a racist (the stereotype of any American politician from below the Mason-Dixon line), an Anti-Soviet and anti-communist to the core. Further, since Johnson was from Texas, a center of the most reactionary forces in the United States, according to the Soviets, he was associated with the big-time capitalism of the oil industry, also known to be anti-Soviet."

A final argument against Soviet involvement goes like this - While it is conceivable that the Russians somehow contrived Kennedy's death and that high-level U. S. government officials were forced to cover up this fact to prevent a devastating world war, it makes no sense that these facts would not have been leaked slowly to the American public in the late 1960s and early 1970s in an effort to gain support for the anti-communist war in Vietnam and blunt the growing anti-war movement.

The fact that this didn't happen goes far to prove that hard evidence of Soviet involvement in Kennedy's death is non-existent.

But if Russian communists had nothing to do with the assassination, the same could not be said for their protogOs on the island of Cuba. Cubans - both communist and anti-communist - would not have shed tears over the death of the American President.

Crossfire: Russians Summary

It appears obvious to most assassination researchers that Oswald's visit to Russia was a planned intelligence operation - perhaps he was one of the members of the Office of Naval Intelligence defection program. After all, the Marines are technically part of the Navy.

Oswald's suspicious manner of entering and leaving Russia reinforce the belief that he was an intelligence operative - as does the lavish lifestyle he enjoyed while living in Minsk.

His hurried romance and marriage to Marina is yet another aspect of his time in Russia which hints at intelligence undertones.

Then there is the tantalizing - though unproven - connections between Oswald, the ex-Marine radar operator and the ill-fated U-2 spy plane incident.

And consider the men with whom Oswald came in contact and their U.S. intelligence connections - U.S. embassy second secretary Snyder, Traveler's Aid Society representative Raikin and embassy doctor Captain Davison. Recall that both embassy personnel and news reporters voiced the belief that Oswald was acting under orders from someone.

All this is capped by the strange defection and interrogation of Yuri Nosenko, who apparently went to great lengths to assure U.S. Government officials that the Soviets were not responsible for Kennedy's death.

There is much to argue against Soviet intelligence involvement in the assassination.

However, the same cannot be said for Oswald's involvement with non-Soviet intelligence work and the trail always leads back to the United States.

Crossfire: The Cubans

"(Assassinating Kennedy) would have been to run the risk that our country would have been destroyed by the United States."

Cuban Prime Minister Fidel Castro

On October 28, 1492, Christopher Columbus stepped ashore from the long boat of his flagship "Santa Maria" in the Caribbean to become the first western European to land in the New World which would come to be known as America. This landing began a Spanish empire which included the island of Cuba, located on the northern edge of the Caribbean and 90 miles south of Key West, Florida.

During the centuries of Spanish rule, Cuba - the most westerly of the West Indies - suffered the same fate as most islands in that chain. There was an unrelenting search for gold and other precious minerals, exploitation of the land and resources, on-going raids by pirates and the importation of black slaves, natives were decimated. Of the approximately one million Ciboney Indians living on Cuba when Columbus arrived, all but a handful were dead by 1600.

On July 15, 1895, a group of Cubans in exile, encouraged by business interests in the United States, proclaimed Cuba a republic and a long-standing revolt against Spain was intensified. What followed was the Spanish-American War and in the summer of 1898 - while Commodore George Dewey was conquering Manila Bay in the Philippines - Col. Theodore Roosevelt led his Rough Riders up San Juan Hill as his part in subduing the island. A treaty was signed on Dec. 10, 1898, and Spain was expelled from the Western Hemisphere.

The United States established a military occupation government which finally relinquished power to an elected Cuban government headed by Tomas Estrada Palma on May 20, 1902. However, Cuba remained a trusteeship of the United States, which directly or indirectly remained dominant in the decision-making process of that country.

In 1952, former army sergeant Fulgencio Batista seized control in Cuba by means of a military coup. A dictator and a despot, Batista nevertheless worked closely with many American groups, especially organized criminals. By the late 1950s, Cuba was a mecca for American gamblers, tourists, investors and off-shore banking speculators. Only one man seemed determine to overthrow Batista - Fidel Castro.

Crossfire: Fidel Castro

Born the son of a Spanish-born plantation owner on Aug. 13, 1926, Fidel Castro had an active boyhood in rural eastern Cuba. He once threatened to burn the house down if his parents didn't send him to school. In 1945, Castro entered Havana University and began studying law. He also became involved in radical politics. In 1947, after buying a pistol, Castro joined an ill-fated attempt to overthrow Dominican dictator Rafael Trujillo and the next year, he joined a student uprising in Colombia. Castro received his doctoral degree in law in 1950 and, for a time, set up a practice dealing with political dissident and poverty cases.

In 1952, he ran for Parliament but was blocked when the dictator Batista canceled the elections.

From that time on, Castro devoted himself to ousting Batista. Gathering some followers, Castro's first assault on Batista took place on July 26, 1953, when they attacked Batista's Moncada Barracks.

The attack was a military disaster. About half of the rebels were caught, tortured and killed. Castro was put on trial. Conducting his own defense, the youthful Cuban lawyer stated: "Condemn me. It does not matter. History will absolve me."

Sentenced to 15 years in prison, Castro was released after 22 months. He then fled to Mexico where he began reorganizing his guerrilla fighters. He used the brutality displayed by Batista at the Moncada Barracks as a rallying point and named his revolution "the 26th of July Movement" after the disastrous attack. Since 1959, this date has been celebrated as Cuban Independence day.

In 1956, Castro swam the Rio Grande and entered the United States to arrange the purchase of a dilapidated yacht named the "Granma." Returning to Mexico, he began planning the next stage of his revolution - the invasion of his homeland. Confident that he would rapidly gain followers, Castro even made his invasion plans public.

On December 2, 1956, when he and 82 guerrillas waded ashore on the swampy coast of his native Oriente Province, Batista's soldiers were waiting in ambush. Only 12 guerrillas, including Castro, survived and escaped into the Sierra Maestra mountains. After Batista proclaimed his death, Castro invited a reporter for the "New York Times" to his camp to show he was very much alive and predicted that final victory would be his. After several years of basic survival in the mountains, - during this time, Castro grew his now-famous beard - Castro and his followers began to take the initiative. By the summer of 1958, his guerrilla band had grown to more than 800 and later that year, a detachment led by Ernesto "Che" Guevara captured the provincial capital of Santa Clara in Central Cuba.

Although backed by an army of some 30,000, Batista panicked and decided to quit the island. Taking bags of cash, Batista fled to the Dominican Republic in the first few hours of 1959. Castro's fantasy revolution had suddenly become a dream come true. For two weeks, Castro slowly moved toward Havana. The excitement and passions of the moment were almost overpowering. Veteran news correspondents could not recall a more jubilant scene since the liberation of Paris in World War II. For a period of weeks, the jubilation continued, but then became subdued in the wake of trials and executions of pre-revolution "war criminals."

Castro began the formidable task of restructuring Cuban society and despite many problems and opposition, he maintained his charisma with the Cuban people. After an economic blockade by the United States followed by an unsuccessful invasion of Cuba in 1961, Castro proclaimed himself a "Marxist-Leninist" and began dealing with the Russians. The honeymoon between Castro and the United States quickly ended and the tribulations of modern "Marxist-Leninist" Cuba began.

###

With the defeat of the dictator Batista, Castro became the undisputed leader of Cuba, even proclaiming himself "Jefe Maximo" (maximum leader). And he began making drastic changes in the island. After a period of weeks when the world - including most Cubans and Americans - welcomed his ascension to power, attitudes began to change. Castro closed down the gambling casinos and houses of prostitution which had been the source of an estimated $100 million a year for organized crime in the United States. He nationalized the sugar industry, the backbone of Cuba's economy, and by the summer of 1960, he had seized more than $700 million in U.S. property, including banks which had been accused of laundering money for American interests. Even his parents' plantation was nationalized, angering his own mother and prompting his younger sister, Juanita, to leave Cuba and become an anti-Castroite.

Some social gains were made on the island. Within a few years, illiteracy had been reduced from 24 percent to 4 percent. But Castro also proclaimed that he was the leader of socialist revolution in South America, although he strongly maintained that he was not a communist.

American interests were quick to respond. The U. S. government abruptly restricted sugar imports and began encouraging its allies not to trade with Castro. With his trade restricted and hearing rumors that the U.S. might invade the island at any time, Castro was forced to turn to the Soviet Union for support. He began selling sugar to Russia in 1960 and soon Soviet technicians and advisers began to arrive on the island. This confirmed the darkest suspicions of conservative American interests, who began to brand Castro a communist and a subversive to the status quo in Central and South America.

As Castro's social, economic and agricultural reforms continued, often with brutal effectiveness, Cubans began to split into two factions - the Fidelistas (supporters of Castro) and the Anti-Castroites, many of whom fled Cuba. By the end of the first year of Castro's takeover, more than 100,000 Cubans were living in the United States. Those who left the island were largely the wealthy, the powerful and the people who had gained so much by working closely with American interests. The Cuban revolution was in many respects reminiscent of the Russian revolution of 1917.

As the United States stepped up its program of isolating Cuba - first with cutting off the island's sugar markets and oil supplies, then through diplomatic maneuvers with other South American countries and finally by introducing arms and saboteurs into Cuba - Castro grew more and more fearful of an armed invasion by the United States. In November 1963, Castro was quoted as telling the United States: "Of course we engage in subversion, the training of guerrillas, propaganda! Why not? This is exactly what you are doing to us."

On January 3, 1961, the United States ended diplomatic relations with Cuba after Castro demanded the U.S. Embassy staff be cut to only 11 persons. Castro charged that 80 percent of the staff were "FBI and Pentagon spies." Two weeks later, the United States forbade its citizens to travel to Cuba.

In the same month, the month that John F. Kennedy took office as President, Castro had placed his militia on 24-hour alert, proclaiming that the "Yankee invasion" was imminent. In February, Soviet deputy prime minister Andrei Gromyko arrived in Cuba to arrange large-scale economic and military assistance to Castro. And on April 17, 1961, less than three months after Kennedy became president, Castro's fears were realized. A force of anti-Castro Cubans landed at the Bay of Pigs.

Crossfire: Disaster at the Bay of Pigs

The plans to destroy Castro and regain control of Cuba began more than a year before Kennedy became President. On January 18, 1960, a handful of CIA officers met in the office of the chief of the CIA's Western Hemisphere Division. It was decided to look into the possibility of staging a "typical Latin political upheaval" in Cuba, which would involve no more than 30 Cubans connected to the Agency as a "training cadre." By early 1960, thousands of Cuban refugees in the United States began forming small groups, dedicated to reclaiming their homeland and claiming to be the one true voice of the exiles. To bring order to this situation, the CIA in May 1960 assisted in the creation of a Cuban coalition which came to be known as the Cuban Revolutionary Council (CRC). Early on this task was handled by CIA officer E. Howard Hunt - later to be involved in the Watergate affair and to be accused of being in Dallas the day Kennedy was killed. Hunt's idea of what should be done in Cuba was summed up in his book, "Give Us This Day":

"Assassinate Castro before or coincident with the invasion (a task for Cuban patriots)..."

As the election year of 1960 moved on, so did the CIA's plans for an "upheaval" in Cuba. Once in the hands of CIA staffers and adventurous case officers, the plan seemed to take on a life of its own.

Secrecy was the prime concern of everyone involved. Even CIA director Allen Dulles did not know much of what was happening with the plan. He had simply turned the whole project over to his deputy director for plans, Richard M. Bissell Jr. Bissell, in turn, handed the project to the former CIA station chief in Caracas, who recruited various CIA personnel, such as Hunt, Tracy Barnes and propagandist David Atlee Phillips. It was intended to stage a low-key coup in Cuba similar to the CIA's successful overthrow of the popularly-elected government of Jacobo Arbenz in Guatemala in 1954. Many of the CIA officers involved in the Bay of Pigs had participated in the 1954 Guatemala action. Unknown to these CIA officers who began to create a Cuba refugee fighting force, Bissell was working on a concurrent project - the assassination of Fidel Castro.

Bissell's idea began to work its way through the CIA bureaucracy with unintended humorous results. Plans were conceived to poison Castro's cigar, to slip him a depilatory so his famous beard would fall out or give him an LSD-type chemical so that the Cuban leader would hallucinate. These schemes took on a more sinister aspect, however, with the suggestion that American gangsters be hired to do the job. Bissell put the director of the CIA's Office of Security, Colonel Sheffield Edwards, in charge. Edwards then assigned the mission to former FBI man James O'Connell, chief of his Operational Support Division. O'Connell turned to another former FBI man, Robert A. Maheu, to make contact with the Mafia.

Soon the CIA was up to its neck in murder plots involving some of this nation's top-ranking Mafia chieftains (See MOBSTERS). President Dwight Eisenhower knew none of this. All he knew was that on March 17, 1960, at the urging of a top-secret committee for covert operations - known as the 5412 Committee because it was authorized by National Security Council Directive 5412/2 - he had authorized a CIA plan entitled "A Program of Covert Action Against the Castro Regime." This plan offered a four-point program - 1) the creation of a Cuban government in exile, 2) a "powerful" propaganda offensive, 3) the creation of a "covert intelligence and action organization" inside Cuba and 4) "a paramilitary force outside of Cuba for future guerrilla action." The fourth point, the "paramilitary force," was to evolve into Brigade 2506, a Cuban-exile expeditionary force supported by air and sea power as well as U.S. military units.

One man who did understand what all this might mean was Eisenhower's vice president, White House action officer and the head of the 5412 Committee - Richard M. Nixon. Nixon had several reasons for supporting action against Castro. A year earlier, the anti-communist Nixon had met with Castro and concluded: "Castro is either incredibly naive about communism or is under communist discipline."

And, as one of the congressmen who passed the legislation creating the CIA, Nixon undoubtedly wanted to support the men who through the years had passed along information politically helpful to him. Then, too, the November election was approaching and Nixon was anxious to have the Republican administration get the credit for ending Castro's reign. There also might have been another reason for Nixon's interest in Cuba. Prior to his election as vice president, Nixon was a frequent visitor to Cuba. It has been widely alleged that Nixon had serious contacts within organized crime and, if that were true, it is certain they would have let him know of their displeasure at losing the profitable gambling operations in Havana. Whatever the reason, Nixon kept exhorting his executive assistant for national-security affairs, General Robert E. Cushman Jr., to press the CIA officers for action.

Meanwhile, Hunt and an associate, Bernard L. Barker (who later participated in the Watergate break-in under Hunt's guidance), were wheeling and dealing in the Miami Cuban exile community, sometimes carrying as much as $115,000 in a briefcase to secure agents. Training camps were located, arms secured and Cubans recruited. The plan was advancing into broader and grander stages and still it was the lower-level operators who were in charge.

By August 1960, security was already breaking down. Acting against orders, a CIA officer met a Cuban contact in Miami and was overheard by a woman who passed the information of a coming invasion of Cuba to the FBI. Worse yet, reporters for the "Miami Herald" were getting wind of the exile training operation and only a direct appeal from Allen Dulles preventing the story from breaking to the public.

Not long afterward, Hunt himself gave photographs of the exile training to Miami newspapers to "stimulate recruiting."

The whole scheme was running into trouble - the Cuban exiles were fighting among themselves over who would command, supplies and arms were not being delivered on schedule and the U.S. military was foot dragging on CIA requests for support (mostly because the military men were put off that such action was being taken by a "spy" agency).

Finally, the CIA prevailed upon Maj. General George R. Doster, commander of the Alabama Air National Guard, to assemble 80 American pilots who agreed to act as Cubans in the forthcoming action.

It was two years after the ill-fated invasion that Kennedy even learned that American pilots had been involved. As late as 1978, it was reported that the body of one of the American pilots remained in a Havana morgue waiting for the U.S. Government to claim it.

On July 23, 1960, presidential candidate John F. Kennedy was first briefed by Dulles about the Cuban operation. Since at that time only guerrilla infiltration and air drops were contemplated, Kennedy did not learn of the full invasion plan until after his election.

In an ironical twist, some of Kennedy's speech writers encouraged the Senator to speak out against Castro and urge U.S. support for Cuban exiles. Nixon was furious, believing that Kennedy had been told about the invasion and was compromising security by using this knowledge as a political weapon against him. Nixon, who encouraged the invasion, was forced to attack Kennedy's proposal as "wrong and irresponsible because it would violate our treaty commitments" to protect the covert operation.

Shortly after the election, Dulles - along with Bissell - again briefed Kennedy on the Cuban plan. Again the briefing was long on vague generalities and short on details.

It was not until near the end of 1960 that anyone outside of the CIA officers in charge was told that the plan had been expanded to include an invasion with air support. Even military brass, who were being asked for material assistance, were sworn to secrecy. Most of those ranking military officers brought into the plan thought it sounded "impractical." There were two main reasons for the impracticality of the invasion: one, it was predicated on a massive revolt against Castro by the Cuban people, a concept loudly advanced by the CIA analysts but doubted by most others involved, and two, it was apparent that to succeed, the invasion had to have the support of U.S. naval and air power, a contingency both Eisenhower and Kennedy had rejected.

By mid-March, 1961 - with the invasion only a month away - Kennedy was having second thoughts. The Trinidad Plan, an invasion proposal hastily put together by the Pentagon, was rejected by the new President as "too spectacular," with its amphibious assault, air strikes and landing of a provisional government. Kennedy wanted something quiet, something that would not involve the United States. Kennedy told the invasion planners:

"Remember, I reserve the right to cancel this right to the end."

But in the few days before the invasion, he found he could not stop the project. Too much planning and effort had gone into it. The previous administration had approved it, he was told. The Cuban exiles were armed and ready. What would happen to them?

The atmosphere was charged like that of the locker room before the big game. No one wanted to say, "We might lose." So the operation continued.

A week before the invasion, Kennedy left no doubt as to his position on using U.S. military forces to help the Cuban exiles. The "New York Times" carried a two-column headline reading: "President Bars Using U.S. Force to Oust Castro." The Cuban exiles were aghast, but their CIA officers quietly assured them that no one would stand by and watch them die. Miscommunication was rampant up and down the chain of command.

On Saturday, April 15, 1961, less than three months after Kennedy took office, a force of six B-26 bombers left a secret airfield in Nicaragua for Cuba. It was to have been 16, but Kennedy ordered a reduction to "minimum" scale. This weekend air strike was a partial success. Castro's tiny air force was caught on the ground. Only three T-33 jets - considered good only as trainers - along with two B-26 bombers and a few decrepit British Sea Furies escaped the bombing raid. But it was enough.

On Monday, April 17, the Cuban Brigade landed at Bahia de Cochinos, or Bay of Pigs (named after the wild boars which inhabited this desolate area of Cuba). Ironically, Castro knew the area intimately as it was his favorite hunting spot.

It was a good location for a landing, with only two main road arteries leading past swamps and dense undergrowth. But this same attribute also made it a formidable trap should Castro's forces arrive too soon.

A second air strike had been planned and, by most accounts, would have completed the destruction of Castro's air force. However, the CIA planners had failed to reckon with John F. Kennedy. Kennedy hesitated, growing more and more concerned that the entire world was realizing that the United States was supporting this invasion of another country.

A CIA B-26 bomber had landed in Miami with the cover story that it belonged to Cubans who had defected and were attempting to aid the exiles in freeing their homeland. This story immediately fell apart when newsmen noticed that bomber had a nose of solid metal, a U. S. Air Force modification. Castro's B-26s had plastic noses.

United Nations Ambassador Adlai Stevenson, who had been lied to by the CIA, was facing intense pressure after telling the General Assembly that the United States had nothing to do with the invasion.

Although the Cuban Brigade already was running into trouble on the beaches - one of their ships, the "Houston," was set afire by Castro planes - Secretary of State Dean Rusk was more concerned that the "international noise level" had risen to an intolerable degree. Rusk argued that no further air strikes be made until it could be made to look like the planes came from captured Cuban airfields.

Kennedy concurred and ordered a halt to any air strikes. It was the death knell for the Cuban Brigade. Castro's surviving planes were able to disrupt the landing and allow Castro's troops to bottle up the beaches. The Bay of Pigs had become a death trap.

Kennedy authorized U.S. Navy ships sitting offshore to help evacuate the Brigade, but the Cuban commanders didn't want evacuation. They wanted the ammunition, naval support and the "umbrella" of air cover which had been promised to them. It never came. As the remnants of the Brigade called for help from the beaches, U.S. military men could only stand silent by their weapons, some with tears in their eyes. As soldiers they had to stand by and watch the gallant Cuban Brigade torn to bits.

As news of the debacle spread, everybody concerned was furious.

Kennedy believed he had been led down a prim-rose path by optimistic CIA officials. He felt betrayed. The CIA planners felt betrayed in that the actual invasion had been scaled down on Kennedy's orders. The military felt betrayed because they had not been allowed to help in the planning of the invasion. And the Cuban exiles felt betrayed most of all because they had been led to believe they had the full support of the U.S. Government. In Guatemala City, staging area for the Brigade, the CIA officers were devastated. Many were getting drunk. CIA Station Chief Robert Davis described them this way: "If someone had gotten close to Kennedy, he'd have killed him. Oh, they hated him!"

Of the 1,600 men of the Cuban Brigade, 114 were killed, 1,189 were captured by Castro's forces and 150 either never landed or made their way back to safety. The captured Brigade was finally freed on December 23, 1962, after the United States agreed to exchange them for $53 million worth of food and drugs. Infuriated by this disastrous defeat, Kennedy nevertheless took the burden of blame. He told reporters:

"There's an old saying that victory has a hundred fathers and defeat is an orphan.

What mattered was only one fact: I am the responsible officer of government."

No one - especially in the CIA, the military, organized crime or in the Cuban exile community - was to forget this acceptance of responsibility.

###

Following a shake-up in U. S. intelligence over the Bay of Pigs disaster (See AGENTS), Attorney General Robert Kennedy took responsibility for overseeing Cuban affairs.

Soon another war - this one much more secret - was being waged against Castro under the code name "JM/WAVE." JM/WAVE operated on the campus of the University of Miami under the cover of an electronics firm called Zenith Technological Services. By mid-1962, this operation involved nearly 600 CIA case officers, as many as 3,000 contract agents and numerous fronts such as boat shops, detective and travel agencies and gun stores. With nearly 250,000 Cuban refugees living in the United States, it was easy to find those with a burning passion to liberate their island and return home.

The JM/WAVE operation seemed inconsistent from the start. President Kennedy stated "all actions should be kept at a low key," while his brother, Robert, told CIA officials "no time, money, effort - or manpower - be spared." The near-nightly raids on Cuba - landing saboteurs, dropping propaganda leaflets and occasional military-style raids - actually achieved very little except to confirm Castro's accusations that the United States was guilty of criminal aggression. Today, several of the military and intelligence officials who were dealing with President Kennedy during this period say they believed that the assassination of Castro was to be a part of this "Cuban crusade." However there is no documentation of this and, in fact, the only documentation available shows quite the opposite.

Early in 1962, Robert Kennedy was trying to prosecute a top Mafia boss named Sam Giancana, when he found the CIA interceding on Giancana's behalf. Pursuing the matter, Kennedy was finally told about the earlier deals between the CIA and Mafia to kill Castro. The younger Kennedy later told aides: "I stopped it...I found out that some people were going to try an attempt on Castro's life and I turned it off."

However, the lethal partnership between the Agency and the crime syndicate didn't stop until well after President Kennedy was assassinated, indicating the CIA continued to operate out of control even after the agency shake-up following the Bay of Pigs disaster.

One of the only instances of President Kennedy discussing Castro's assassination came during an interview with a "New York Times" reporter. Kennedy asked the reporter how he personally felt about the prospect of assassinating Castro and the newsman replied in the negative, saying it was a matter of principle. Whereupon Kennedy agreed, adding he was under "terrific pressure...to okay a Castro murder."

Whatever the Kennedy's role in Castro assassination plots, they got nowhere. Castro outlived both Kennedys and there is now some evidence to suggest that the CIA-Mafia plots may have been nothing more than a "scam" on the part of organized crime (See MOBSTERS).

The ongoing tension with Cuba took on a more serious and urgent tone when on October 22, 1962, Kennedy announced that U.S. reconnaissance aircraft - the same U-2 spy plane which had ended Eisenhower's hopes for the 1960 summit meeting - had photographed offensive missile sites with nuclear capability being constructed in Cuba. President Kennedy called for emergency meetings of the United Nations Security Council and the Organization of American States. He also ordered a "quarantine" of Cuba and vowed full retaliation against Russia if a nuclear warhead was launched from Cuba. As Soviet ships carrying missiles approached the U. S. naval blockade of Cuba, the world watched and trembled. Nuclear holocaust seemed imminent. Then, the Soviets blinked. Their freighters turned back and everyone breathed a sign of relief. Only much later did the American people learn of the deal which ended the Cuban missile crisis.

Khrushchev, in his memoirs, claimed he never believed he could keep missiles in Cuba. He said he made the attempt in an effort to prevent another Bay of Pigs-type invasion by the United States. He ended the threat to Cuba by offering Kennedy a deal. It was set forth in a message to the U.S. President on October 26, 1962:

"Let us therefore show statesmanlike wisdom. I propose; we, for our part, will declare that our ships, bound for Cuba, will not carry any kind of armaments. You would declare that the United States will not invade Cuba with its forces and will not support any sort of forces which might intend to carry out an invasion of Cuba. Then the necessity for the presence of our military specialists in Cuba would disappear."

The deal was cut and, although some have claimed that the pledge not to invade Cuba never actually took effect because Castro refused to allow U.N. inspection of the missile sites, it is apparent that Kennedy took it seriously. But even Kennedy's diplomacy which ended the missile crisis earned him further rebuke by military and CIA officers who believed the presence of missiles gave the United States every right to justify an invasion of Cuba and the elimination of the Castro regime.

Even Robert Kennedy voiced this view in an October 16 meeting, saying:

"...if you're going to get into it at all...(maybe) we should just get into it and get it over with."

Many CIA officers and Cuban exiles believed the missile crisis to be a hoax and that Soviet missiles were never really removed from Cuba. E. Howard Hunt told author Anthony Summers:

"It has never been established that any missiles were removed from the island....there have been no satellite scanners or aircraft cameras developed yet that can peer inside a wooden crate or through a tarpaulin."

These suspicions only made the military and intelligence officers, along with their Cuban protégés, more convinced that Kennedy was "soft on communism."

Following the missile crisis - which may have made Kennedy realize the serious consequences of trying to interfere with another country - the war against Castro's Cuba began winding down.

In Miami's Orange Bowl in late December 1962, Kennedy spoke to the recently-returned survivors of the Bay of Pigs invasion. Lashing out at communism in general and Castro in particular, Kennedy accepted the Brigade's flag and pledged:

"I can assure you that this flag will be returned to this brigade in a free Havana."

Most of those present believed this statement indicated a continued commitment to overthrow Castro. But future events dictated otherwise.

In 1976, Cuban Brigade veterans had to hire a lawyer to get their flag back from the Government, which had stored it away in the basement of a museum. Likewise, beginning in 1963, the Cubans found U. S. government support for their continuing efforts against Castro non-existent. In fact, moves were soon underway to stop exile action against Cuba.

In February 1963, the Kennedy administration withdrew support for Brigade 2506 and urged its members to join Cuban units being established within the U.S. armed forces. The State Department announced that efforts would be made to assure that raids were not "launched, manned or equipped from American soil."

By March 1963, the very government agencies which had been aiding the Cuban exiles now received orders to obstruct them. Along the Florida coast, the FBI, Coast Guard and Customs and Immigration authorities all began frustrating the Cubans' raids.

In April, a group of exiles were arrested in the Bahamas by British authorities on a tip from the U. S. government. And on July 31, the FBI raided a Louisiana camp where Cuban exiles had stored a large cache of arms - these arms later were said by Jim Garrison to be part of a New Orleans anti-Castro operation involving David Ferrie and Lee Harvey Oswald. Despite this obvious effort to shut down the secret war against Castro, hit-and-run raids continued through 1963 - either in defiance of orders or perhaps with an official turn of the head.

Controlling the Cuban exiles was easier said than done. As one Bay of Pigs veteran put it:

"We used the tactics we learned from the CIA because we were trained to do everything. We were trained to set off a bomb, we were trained to kill."

The clamp-down on exile activity - whether sincere or official window-dressing - marked the beginning of a new relationship with both Cuba and the Soviet Union.

Kennedy used Jean Daniel, a journalist with the French newspaper "L'Express" as an unofficial contact with Castro. On October 24, 1963, Kennedy met with Daniel and urged him to pass along his good intentions to the Cuban premier during a scheduled interview in Havana. Daniel did meet with Castro and reported the Cuban leader as saying:

"I believe Kennedy is sincere. I consider him responsible for everything, but I will say this...in the last analysis, I'm convinced that anyone else would be worse...You can tell him that I'm willing to declare (Senator Barry) Goldwater my friend if it will guarantee Kennedy's reelection!"

Ironically, Daniel was with Castro on November 22, when the Cuban leader received word of Kennedy's assassination. "Es una mala noticia ("This is bad news")," Castro said three times, adding:

"All will have to be rethought. I'll tell you one thing; at least Kennedy was an enemy to whom we had become accustomed. You watch and see...I know that they will try to put the blame on us for this thing."

Castro was correct. From the day of the assassination, there was an effort to lay the blame on Castro. But the attempt to reconcile relations with Castro was not strictly unofficial.

On September 17, 1963, Ambassador Seydou Diallo of Guinea in West Africa brought word to William Attwood, then a special adviser to the United States delegation to the United Nations and a former U.S. ambassador to Guinea, that Castro wanted to reach some sort of understanding with the Kennedy Administration. According to Diallo, Castro was unhappy at being forced to align closely with the Soviet Union and wanted to normalize relations with the U.S. Attwood reported Diallo's conversation to his superior, U.N. Ambassador Adlai Stevenson, who telephoned President Kennedy. Kennedy directed Stevenson to have Attwood meet with Cuban U.N. delegate Carlos Lechuga. This led to discreet meetings between Attwood and Lechuga, where it was decided that Attwood would travel to Cuba for direct meetings with Castro. Although these unprecedented approaches to Cuba were strictly secret, it is almost certain that people within U.S. Intelligence were aware of this rapprochement. Attorney General Robert Kennedy himself told Attwood the secret maneuvering was "bound to leak."

Three days after Kennedy's assassination, Attwood was formally notified that Havana was ready to proceed with a meeting. President Lyndon Johnson was briefed on the situation, but turned a cold shoulder. Attwood sadly told author Anthony Summers:

"The word came back that this was to be put on ice for the time being, and the time being has been ever since..."

Outside Miami, the next largest operational area for militant anti-Castro Cubans was the city of New Orleans, Lee Harvey Oswald's birthplace. It was in New Orleans that numerous leads have been developed linking the CIA, the FBI, anti-Castro Cubans and perhaps military intelligence with Oswald.

Oswald's interest in Cuba went back to his Marine days, when he and Marine buddy Nelson Delgado toyed with the idea of traveling to Cuba and assisting Castro in his war against Batista. There was nothing unusual here. That same idea had crossed the minds of thousands of day-dreaming American school boys. But in Oswald's case, this dream may have taken on some reality.

According to Delgado, the Marine Oswald began receiving letters plainly stamped with the seal of the Cuban Consulate in Los Angeles. Oswald once traveled to Los Angeles with Delgado, saying his purpose was to "visit the Cuban Consulate." There also were reports of Oswald meeting with mysterious strangers, who Delgado believed had to do with "the Cuban business." But whose side was Oswald really on?

Gerry Patrick Hemming, a Marine with Oswald who was recruited into the CIA, has told of meeting Oswald in the Cuban Consulate. Hemming, himself working for Naval Intelligence, said Oswald seemed to be "an informant or some type of agent working for somebody."

On April 24, 1963, less than a year after arriving back in Fort Worth from Russia, Oswald packed a bag and bought a bus ticket for New Orleans, telling Marina and friends that he couldn't find a job in Texas.

Shortly before leaving for New Orleans, he had written a letter to the Fair Play for Cuba Committee (FPCC), a pro-Castro organization headquartered in New York City and the object of intense scrutiny by various U. S. intelligence agencies, including the FBI and Army Intelligence. Oswald praised Castro and asked for FPCC pamphlets, membership applications and advice on tactics. He also mentioned that he "was thinking about renting a small office at my own expense." The FPCC director, V.T. Lee, promptly answered, saying the committee faced serious opposition and warned Oswald against provoking "unnecessary incidents which frighten away prospective supporters." It was advice which Oswald was to totally ignore.

Staying with relatives in New Orleans, Oswald managed to get a job at the William B. Reily Co. Inc., a coffee manufacturer. The company's owner, William Reily, was a financial backer of the Crusade to Free Cuba Committee, one of the many front groups raising money for the Cuban Revolutionary Council. Through the spring and summer of 1963, Oswald, an avid reader, checked out 27 books from the New Orleans Library. His reading ran from Ian Fleming's James Bond novels to Aldous Huxley and science fiction. Library records show Oswald also read two books about John F. Kennedy, "Profiles in Courage" and "Portrait of a President." Oswald read nothing about Cuba. In fact, it was during this time that a strange incident occurred which throws further doubt on Oswald's sincerity as a communist sympathizer. In July 1963, Oswald accompanied his uncle, Charles "Dutz" Murret (See MOBSTERS), to a Jesuit seminary in Mobile, Alabama, where a cousin was enrolled. Here Oswald made what audience members thought was a well-constructed speech against Soviet-style communism. It was the opposite position to his pro-communist public posturing over the past few months in New Orleans - further evidence that Oswald was living some sort of dual life. Back in New Orleans, this duplicity continued.

Although Oswald handed out leaflets for the FPCC and continued to write to the national organization, his New Orleans chapter was a complete fraud. He even had his wife sign the name "Hidell" as president of his New Orleans Chapter of the Fair Play for Cuba Committee.

While there has been no documented evidence that - letters aside - Oswald was in contact with any pro-Castro group, he definitely was in touch with anti-Castro Cubans.

On August 5, 1963, Oswald entered a store owned by Cuban militant Carlos Bringuier, a man with connections to both the CRC and the CIA. Oswald told Bringuier and friends that he was a Marine veteran with experience in guerrilla warfare and offered to train Cuban exiles. Pushing his point, Oswald returned the next day with a Marine training manual which he left with Bringuier. He again repeated his desire to join the fight against Castro. Bringuier already was on guard. In his Warren Commission testimony, he said that some time earlier he had been interviewed by FBI Agent Warren DeBrueys (See GMEN) and that DeBrueys had told him the Bureau might try and infiltrate his anti-Castro Organization. Three days later, Bringuier was shocked when a friend rushed into his store and said that the same man who had wanted to train exiles was on the New Orleans streets passing out pro-Castro literature. Bringuier and others sought out Oswald and confronted him. A crowd gathered as Bringuier railed against this "communist" who had tried to infiltrate the exiles. Displaying a loss of temper, Bringuier cursed Oswald, threw his leaflets into the air, then drew back his fist as if to strike. Oswald, who kept smiling throughout this episode, said:

"Okay, Carlos, if you want to hit me, hit me."

But there was no fight. Police arrived and took Oswald, Bringuier and two others into custody. All were charged with disturbing the peace. Oswald tried to contact his uncle for the $25 bail money but failed. His uncle's daughter, however, contacted a family friend, New Orleans gambler Emile Bruneau, who put up the money. However, before leaving the New Orleans police station, Oswald oddly asked to speak to an FBI agent. Despite being outside normal business hours, FBI Agent John Quigley soon arrived and spent more than an hour with Oswald (See G MEN). It is interesting to note the impression of Oswald by the New Orleans police. Speaking of the Bringuier episode, Lt. Francis Martello later said: "He seemed to have them set up to create an incident."

While Sgt. Horace Austin recalled:

"(Oswald) appeared as though he is being used by these people..."

After this brush with the law, Oswald's pro-Castro stance became even more public. He was soon on New Orleans radio and television telling his pro-Castro story to a wider audience. The radio interview is significant in that it was widely used after the assassination to "prove" his pro-communist credentials. One of these interviews may have provided an accidental peek at Oswald's real identity. Tipped off to Oswald by Bringuier, radio reporter William Stuckey allowed Oswald to expound about his thoughts on Cuba and South America.

A few days later, armed with information obtained from the FBI, Stuckey and right-wing broadcaster Ed Butler verbally ambushed Oswald in another radio interview. Oswald was suddenly confronted with his attempted defection to Russia. The pro-Castro Oswald, self-proclaimed secretary of the New Orleans Chapter of the Fair Play for Cuba Committee, was suddenly revealed to have been a communist sympathizer who had tried to renounce his American citizenship.

Caught off guard, Oswald stammered:

"I was under the protection of the...uh that is to say, I was not under the protection of the American government...but I was at all times considered an American citizen."

Could this slip of the tongue have revealed Oswald's true role as an agent of the U. S. Government while in Russia?

It is also interesting that the radio newsmen handily obtained this derogatory information on Oswald so quickly and from such sources as the FBI and, according to Butler, the House Un-American Activities Committee. It has been documented that both the CIA and the FBI at that time were making efforts not only to penetrate the FPCC but also to discredit the pro-Castro organization. Was this revelation of Oswald's Soviet life part of this program? But the most intriguing aspect of Oswald's stay in New Orleans centered around a meeting place for anti-Castro militants, CIA and FBI agents and organized crime figures - 544 Camp Street.

Crossfire: 544 Camp Street

It was at 544 Camp Street in an old, three-story office building that the paths of Lee Harvey Oswald, the FBI, the CIA, anti-Castro Cubans and organized crime figures all crossed.

Until a few months prior to Oswald's arrival in New Orleans, the aging building housed the offices of the Cuban Revolutionary Council (CRC), that umbrella anti-Castro organization which was created by CIA Officer E. Howard Hunt.

CRC members included Carlos Bringuier, the man who had the much-publicized street encounter with Oswald; Sergio Arcacha Smith, a CRC top official with close documented ties to CIA operative and adventurer David Ferrie; and Carlos Prio Socarras, former President of Cuba under Batista and one of the leading Cuban exiles close to CIA agents E. Howard Hunt, Bernard Barker and Frank Sturgis (all of later Watergate fame).

Prio - who had paid for the yacht "Granma" used by Castro to land his revolutionaries on Cuba - had turned on Castro and became one of the leading anti-Castroites. It is alleged that Prio was to become the new President of Cuba following after the ill-fated Bay of Pigs invasion. Prio once was arrested in a gun-running conspiracy along with a man named Robert McKeown. McKeown, according to evidence developed by the Warren Commission, had been involved in a deal "running jeeps to Cuba" and other smuggling operations with Jack Ruby, the man who killed Oswald (See JACK RUBY). In April 1977, before he was scheduled to testify for the House Select Committee on Assassinations, Prio was found shot in the chest in his Miami Beach garage. The wound was ruled self-inflicted.

Although the CRC had left 544 Camp Street by the time Oswald was seen there in the summer of 1963, there were still plenty of Cuban connections.

A side entrance to 544 Camp Street was 531 Lafayette Street, the address of Guy Banister Associates, a private detective agency (See AGENTS and G MEN). Banister, whom the "New Orleans States Item" in 1967 claimed helped supply munitions to the Bay of Pigs invaders, was a former FBI man with connections reaching into the Bureau, the CIA and organized crime as well as the Cuban exiles. His secretary, Delphine Roberts, in 1978 told the "Dallas Morning News" that Oswald had worked for Banister as "an undercover agent" in the summer of 1963. During that same time, another of Banister's employees was Oswald's former Civil Air Patrol leader, David Ferrie.

In the Warren Commission exhibits are some of Oswald's "Fair Play for Cuba Committee" leaflets. They are stamped:

FPCC
544 Camp Street
New Orleans, La.

Another intriguing contact point between Oswald, 544 Camp Street and the Cubans, was Ernesto Rodriguez. Recall that in the summer of 1963 Oswald wrote the Fair Play for Cuba Committee stating he was going to get a small office. During this same time period, the owner of the 544 Camp Street building, Sam Newman, said he was approached by a Latin man who asked about renting an office and said he was an electrician by day and wanted to teach Spanish at night. Shortly after the assassination and acting on a tip, authorities talked with Rodriguez who did teach Spanish and whose father was in the electrical business. Rodriguez, an anti-Castro militant, denied a rumor that he had tapes of Oswald speaking Spanish, but admitted that he had met Oswald, who apparently wanted to learn Spanish. Rodriguez also said that Oswald had offered to train anti-Castro exiles and, in fact, it was Rodriguez who had sent Oswald to meet Carlos Bringuier.

There was plenty of undercover activity going on at 544 Camp Street in the summer of 1963. The location may have had something to do with it. The building was located close to the New Orleans offices of both the FBI and the CIA, it was near the Crescent City Garage where Oswald was seen in the company of FBI agents and it was just around the corner from the William Riley Coffee Co., Oswald's employer. According to New Orleans District Attorney Jim Garrison, it was here - at 544 Camp Street - that plans were set in motion which culminated in Dealey Plaza.

###

It was reported to the Warren Commission by the CIA that Oswald's pro-Castro contacts included an attempt to secure a visa to visit Cuba during a trip to Mexico City in late September 1963. The Agency apparently went to great lengths to prove that Oswald was in Mexico City at this time but the effort was not entirely successful.

Photographs of a man entering the Soviet Embassy and a tape recording made at the time were shown to be of someone other than Oswald (See AGENTS). To document Oswald's visit to the Cuban Embassy, the CIA relied on the testimony of a Mexican who worked at the embassy, Silvia Tirado de Duran. Duran, however, is a dubious witness at best since it is now known that the 26-year-old woman was arrested twice following the assassination on orders from the CIA (See AGENTS) and may have been coerced into giving false testimony. But again, it is the connections between the assassination and anti-Castro groups which has always turned up the most intriguing evidence - evidence which has largely been ignored by U.S. authorities, particularly the Warren Commission.

Crossfire: Oswald and the Exiles

One of several incidents that tend to connect Lee Harvey Oswald with the anti-Castro Cubans involves one of the most violent of the exile groups, Alpha 66, and its founder, Antonio Veciana Blanch. Veciana, a former Cuban bank accountant who turned against Castro, was conducting raids against the island during the missile crisis and has consistently maintained that he was working for the CIA.

In the spring of 1963, Kennedy publicly criticized the hit-and-run raids of Alpha 66, to which Veciana replied publicly:

"We are going to attack again and again."

The militant Cuban leader has claimed to have worked for a CIA officer known to him as "Maurice Bishop." According to Veciana, he met with Bishop more than 100 times and the CIA officer helped guide the activities of Alpha 66, including plans to assassinate Castro. Veciana said his relationship with the Agency did not end until 1973, when Bishop paid him $253,000 as back pay for his services. But Veciana's most astounding claim is that, during a visit to Dallas in late August or early September 1963, he saw his CIA case officer in conversation with a man he later recognized as Lee Harvey Oswald.

Although the House Select Committee on Assassinations failed to "credit" Veciana's story of the Oswald-Bishop meeting, it nevertheless went to great lengths in an attempt to locate the mysterious Bishop, including sending an artist sketch of Bishop to U.S. newspapers. The committee also scoured CIA files in an effort to identify Bishop. The Agency, unsurprisingly, denied ever assigning a case officer to Veciana.

Veciana also told the committee that shortly after the assassination, Bishop contacted him and reminded him that he had a relative working for Cuban intelligence living in Mexico. According to Veciana, Bishop wanted Veciana to offer his relative a "large sum of money" to say that the relative and his wife met with Oswald during his Mexico City trip. Veciana said he agreed to this scheme, but was unable to contact his relative.

The House Committee later developed information that Bishop may have been none other than former chief of the CIA's Western Hemisphere Division's Directorate of Operations David Atlee Phillips. Phillips denied being Bishop and a fearful Veciana agreed. However, after arranging a meeting between Veciana and Phillips, the Committee staff reported it "suspected that Veciana was lying when he denied that the retired CIA officer was Bishop."

A prime example of interference with an investigation into links between anti-Castro Cubans and the assassination came just days after Kennedy was killed. The Chicago Field Office of the Secret Service reported to superiors that it had heard from an informant that a Chicago group "may have (had) a connection with the JFK assassination." The informant reported that on the day before the assassination, a Cuban militant named Homer S. Echevarria had stated that he had "plenty of money" for an illegal arms deal and would proceed with the plan "as soon as we take care of Kennedy."

The Secret Service checked on Echevarria and discovered he was an associate of the military director of the Cuban Student Directorate (the New Orleans chapter of the CSD was headed by Carlos Bringuier, who squabbled with Oswald on the streets of that city.) and that the munitions deal was financed by "hoodlum elements...not restricted to Chicago." Although the Secret Service wanted to pursue the matter, the FBI - which on November 29, 1963, was designated to control the assassination investigation by President Johnson - "made clear that it wanted the Secret Service to terminate its investigation" of the Echevarria report. The case was closed.

One anti-Castro Cuban-Oswald story which was not so easy to brush off is that of Cuban exile Siliva Odio. She and her sister, Annie, came from a distinguished and wealthy Cuban family. The sisters had been forced to flee Cuba after her parents were imprisoned by the Castro government. Their father, who initially had supported Castro's revolution, had turned against the bearded leader and was arrested for concealing a man named Reinaldo Gonzales, who was involved in a plot to kill Castro. Interestingly, Gonzales' co-conspirator was Antonio Veciana, the leader of Alpha 66 who operated under the instructions of Maurice Bishop.

Shortly before moving to Dallas, Sylvia Odio had joined with other anti-Castro Cubans in Puerto Rico and formed Junta Revolucionaria (the Cuban Revolutionary Junta) or JURE. One night in late September 1963 - they believe it was the 26th or 27th - three men came to Odio's Dallas apartment. There were two Latins and one Anglo, described as weary, unkempt and unshaved. The leader of the trio identified himself as "Leopoldo" and introduced the other Latin as "Angel" or "Angelo." He introduced the American as "Leon Oswald." The men said they had just arrived from New Orleans, were members of JURE and were working with the Cuban Revolutionary Council (CRC). They knew her father's underground name and also many details of anti-Castro activities in Cuba, including recent plots to kill Castro. They told Sylvia Odio that they were trying to raise funds for anti-Castro operations and wanted her help in translating solicitation letters to American businessmen. Something about the men, however, made Odio uneasy and she sent the men away after warning them that she did not want to be involved in a campaign of violence. During their brief stay, her sister Annie also got a good look at the trio. Within 48 hours, "Leopoldo" called Sylvia Odio and asked for her thoughts on their American companion. She said the man then made a series of comments, saying:

"Well, you know he's a Marine, an ex-Marine, and an expert marksman. He would be a tremendous asset to anyone, except that you never know how to take him...He's kind of loco, kind of nuts. He could go any way. He could do anything - like getting underground in Cuba, like killing Castro...The American says we Cubans don't have any guts. He says we should have shot President Kennedy after the Bay of Pigs. He says we should do something like that."

Apparently, that was all "Leopoldo" had to say for he quickly hung up and Odio was never to hear from him again. She later told author Anthony Summers:

"Immediately, I suspected there was some sort of scheme or plot..."

Although the Odio's wrote of the incident to their father and told the story to friends well BEFORE Kennedy's assassination, they did not tell authorities of the strange visitors.

Both sisters were shocked and frightened to see photographs of Lee Harvey Oswald since, then and now, they both believe him to be the same man who was introduced to them as "Leon Oswald."

After the assassination, word of the Odio visit reached the FBI, which investigated the matter for the Warren Commission. The Commission, having already accepted FBI and CIA evidence that Oswald was on his way to or in Mexico City at the time of the Odio visit, stated:

"While the FBI had not yet completed its investigation into this matter at the time the report went to press, the Commission has concluded that Lee Harvey Oswald was not at Mrs. Odio's apartment in September 1963."

Another factor which enabled the Commission to dismiss the Odio story was reports from the FBI concerning anti-Castro militant, Loran Eugene Hall. Although Warren Commission staff lawyers asked the FBI to prove or disprove the Odio story in August 1964, it was not until September 26 - just days before the report was finalized - that the Bureau reported on the matter. An FBI report stated that the Bureau had located Hall, who admitted traveling to Dallas with two other Cubans and that they had visited Odio. Hall said neither of his companions was Oswald. The matter was dropped.

Even before the Warren report was issued, FBI agents located Hall's two companions, Lawrence Howard and William Seymour. Both denied ever meeting Sylvia Odio. Confronted with their statements, Hall retracted his story. In fact, Hall denied he ever told the FBI any such thing. The Bureau failed to tell the Commission about this development.

Hall, who acknowledged being imprisoned in Cuba with Mafia leader Santos Trafficante, also was an associate of Frank Sturgis (Watergate burglar and CIA-Mafia-connected anti-Castroite) and was twice taken into custody for engaging in unauthorized exile activities.

The Odio story caused great problems with the Warren Commission Report. If Oswald was in Dallas, he couldn't have been traveling by bus to Mexico at the same time. And, if the Oswald in Odio's apartment was not the real Oswald, then it is clear that someone was impersonating him with an eye toward implicating Oswald in the assassination. Small wonder the Commission decided to let the matter rest.

There is even some evidence to suggest that Oswald was in contact with anti-Castro Cubans on the Sunday prior to the assassination. In 1979, "The Dallas Morning News" reported that a photographer in Abilene, Texas, recalled a Cuban friend receiving a note from "Lee Oswald" on Sunday, November 17, 1963. Harold Reynolds said he had been friends with a Pedro Valeriano Gonzales for some time and knew him to be active in anti-Castro activities. Gonzales was president of the Cuban Liberation Committee, an exile organization in Abilene, where Gonzales worked as a school system maintenance man. Reynolds said he was showing Gonzales some baby pictures that Sunday when the landlady knocked on the door and said she had noticed a note stuck in Gonzales' door for two or three days. Reynolds took the note. He recalled:

"In handwriting, it said something like "Call me immediately. Urgent" and had two Dallas phone numbers written on it. I noticed the name "Lee Oswald" and asked Gonzales who he was. Seems like he said, "Some attorney from Dallas." He looked nervous and sweat started appearing on his forehead. So, I left to go up the street and deliver some photos. As I was coming back, I noticed his car a few blocks from his house and him standing in a pay phone booth."

Reynolds said he thought this unusual as Gonzales had a telephone in his home.

The Warren Commission could not account for Oswald's presence on the Sunday prior to the assassination.

At an organizational meeting of the Abilene Cuban Liberation Committee, Gonzales had read a letter from his friend in Miami, Manuel A. de Varona, who expressed his desire to visit his friends in Abilene. Varona, the former Cuban prime minister under Carlos Prio Socarras, was involved in the CIA-Mafia plots to kill Castro (See MOBSTERS). Varona also was coordinator of the Cuban Revolutionary Council. In fact, "The Dallas Morning News" reported having obtained copies of letters from the owner of the building at 544 Camp Street in New Orleans to Varona asking for help in paying for the CRC's office space there. (Some of Oswald's FPCC material was stamped "544 Camp Street").

Reynold's wife said Gonzales came to her home just after the assassination and demanded all photos and negatives that Reynolds may have taken of him and his friends. Gonzales simply dropped from sight in Abilene a short time later. Reynolds said Gonzales never admitted knowing Oswald, but that on at least one occasion, he asked his friend about Kennedy. Gonzales told him:

"Somebody is going to kill him."

###

While many people, particularly those close to U.S. intelligence and military sources, claim that Kennedy may have been killed on orders from Castro as a reprisal for the CIA-Mafia-Cuban plots against him, the evidence seems to point more toward the anti-Castro Cubans.

One anti-Castro leader, John Martino, even spelled out the assassination plan to a Texas business friend in 1975. In a startling telephone conversation with Fred Claasen, repeated by author Summers, Martino admitted to serving as a CIA contract agent. He told Claasen:

"The anti-Castro people put Oswald together. Oswald didn't know who he was working for - he was just ignorant of who was really putting him together. Oswald was to meet his contact at the Texas Theater. They were to meet Oswald in the theater, and get him out of the country, then eliminate him. Oswald made a mistake.... There was no way we could get to him. They had Ruby kill him."

Others such as former Senator Robert Morgan, a member of the Senate Intelligence Committee which looked into CIA-Mafia plots, continued to maintain that Kennedy brought about his own death. Morgan, differing from the conclusions of his own committee, stated flatly:

"There is no doubt in my mind that John Fitzgerald Kennedy was assassinated by Fidel Castro, or someone under his influence, in retaliation for our efforts to assassinate him.

But most researchers today doubt seriously that Castro had a hand in Kennedy's death. Even the accused assassin couldn't buy it. During interrogation on the Sunday morning he was killed by Jack Ruby, Oswald was asked if his beliefs regarding Cuba played a role in the assassination. He replied:

"Will Cuba be better off with the President dead? Someone will take his place, Lyndon Johnson, no doubt, and he will probably follow the same policy."

Also, while Castro eventually did learn of the plots against him, there is no firm evidence that he knew of these schemes in time to have launched a retaliatory strike by November 1963.

And again, there seems no serious motive for Castro killing Kennedy - outside of simple revenge - and every motive against the idea. In a 1977 interview with Bill Moyers broadcast on CBS, Castro denied any thought of trying to kill the U.S. President:

"It would have been absolute insanity by Cuba...It would have been a provocation. Needless to say, it would have been to run the risk that our country would have been destroyed by the United States. Nobody who's not insane could have thought about (killing Kennedy in retaliation)."

But if the evidence of Castro's involvement in the assassination is meager, it is more than made up for by the abundance of evidence of anti-Castro Cuban involvement, as we have seen in this chapter. And behind the anti-Castro Cubans always lurked the shadowy hands of U.S. intelligence and the even darker specter of organized crime.

Crossfire: Cubans Summary

After leading a successful revolution in Cuba, Fidel Castro angered many interests in the United States by freeing his island nation of organized crime and American business domination. Castro chose to turn to the Russians for help after the United States initiated sanctions against Cuba. This Moscow-Havana connection further incensed conservative factions within the U.S. Responding to urgings from these factions, Vice President Richard Nixon encouraged action against Cuba - resulting in the ill-fated Bay of Pigs Invasion. This invasion was to be launched by a brigade of anti-Castro Cubans under the direction of the CIA and with the assistance of the U.S. military. But right from the start, President Kennedy let it be known that he would not use American military force against Castro. Despite this knowledge, the CIA officials behind the invasion went ahead with their plans. The invasion was launched on April 17, 1961 - less than three months after Kennedy took office - and proved an utter disaster.

The invasion's failure was blamed on Kennedy's refusal to unleash military naval and air support. Everyone connected with the invasion - the anti-Castro Cubans, the CIA, the military and organized crime - was bitter toward the new President. This acrimony only increased with Kennedy's attempts to bring tighter control over the CIA and with his decision not to order a second invasion of Cuba during the 1962 missile crisis.

More hatred toward Kennedy was generated as the secret war against Cuba was geared down after the missile crisis and with Kennedy's attempts at reconciliation with Castro.

Into this world of passionate anti-Castro Cubans, adventurous CIA agents and Mafia soldiers was injected the odd ex-Marine Lee Harvey Oswald. Oswald, while maintaining a posture as a pro-Castro Marxist, nevertheless was in continuous contact with several anti-Castro elements. During the summer of 1963, Oswald was loose in a deceptive world of undercover agents while living in New Orleans. And while it may never be positively determined exactly who Oswald was working for, it is safe to assume that his employers represented the anti-Castro Cubans and their CIA and mob allies. Oswald's activities during this period of time - and particularly the Sylvia Odio affair - point to a sinister manipulation of Oswald and others in laying a trail of incriminating evidence connecting the ex-Marine and vocal Castro supporter to Kennedy's assassination.

Crossfire: Mobsters

"Kennedy's not going to make it to the election. He's going to be hit."

Miami Mafia boss Santos Trafficante

During the late 1800s and early 1900s, immigrants arrived in the United States from all corners of the world seeking the golden American dream. What most found was an impoverished and bleak existence in one of the many big city ghettos, where immigrants were trapped by the inability to speak English, lack of education and training along with class and cultural differences. Just like the cities of today, these ghettos spawned a multitude of street gangs with names like the Whyos, the Dead Rabbits, the Bowery Boys, the Tenth Avenue Gang, the Village Gang, the Gas House Gang, the Midnight Terrors and the Growler Gang. Despite their colorful names, these gangs were anything but funny.

Young toughs would rob and beat their victims in broad daylight, with little to fear from the police - as long as they kept their illegal activities confined to the ghetto and its cowed population. Many an immigrant's son came to see the hypocrisy of American society. The elite of America gained their positions by wealth and its attendant power, not by adhering to the Puritan Work Ethic. The weight of a man's pocketbook meant more than blood lines. With enough money, all things were possible in America for, after all, wasn't this the land of opportunity?

Initially, the neighborhood gangs were undirected and largely unorganized. They often were a means of protection, with safety in numbers. But soon the more ambitious gangs devised ways of making their associations profitable. In the various ethnic communities there were those who had belonged to the secret societies of other countries - the Mafia of Sicily, the Camorra of Italy and the Tongs of China. They brought the learned terror and intimidation of these societies to their new home, where it found fertile soil.

The Mafia used a technique involving the Black Hand. The victim, usually a successful businessman, would receive a letter demanding money. It would be signed with the imprint of a black hand. Rumors were spread that the Black Hand was a secret society of assassins which operated with impunity. If the demands for money were not met, the recipient's business might burn down or a relative might be kidnapped or beaten. The Mafia offered protection from the Black Hand - its own invention. Even the famous Italian singer, Enrico Caruso, was shaken down in this early-day protection racket.

As America entered the 20th century, the city gangs were becoming more adept at their profession and expanding operations to include gambling, prostitution and lotteries. They also were the bankers for the poor, charging exorbitant interest rates from those who could borrow money nowhere else.

The Irish brought a new dimension of power to the gangs. Unhampered by a language barrier and experienced in politics in their homeland, the Irish gangs gained advantages by allying themselves with political figures. Initially, it was the politicians who used the gangsters. Ballot boxes were stuffed, voters intimidated and opposition rallies broken up. But as the gang leaders grew more wealthy, and thus more powerful, soon it was the politician who came seeking favors. Through the years that Tammany Hall controlled New York City, the Irish gangsters which provided the enforcement muscle. Another source of power for Tammany was the 1,200-member Eastman gang, run by a Jewish immigrant named Monk Eastman (real name: Edward Osterman). After a furious public gun battle in August 1903 between the Eastmans and a rival gang, the authorities stepped in - not to eliminate the gangs, but to arrange a truce.

As the fortunes of America soared between 1910 and 1929, so did those of the gangs, particularly those with far-sighted leadership. Another Jewish gangster from New York, Arnold Rothstein, became the example of the successful underworld leader. Nicknamed "The Brain," Rothstein moved from being a small-time gambler to one of the most powerful men in the city. He even reportedly fixed the 1919 World Series. Rothstein moved in the most respectable circles, rubbing elbows with city and state officials.

His success did not go unnoticed in other areas of the underworld. A small-time hood by the name of Johnny Torrio was unhappy with the peaceful climate of New York created by Rothstein's ability to use political corruption as part of his business plan. In 1909, after receiving a letter from a cousin, Torrio traveled to Chicago where he became a trusted lieutenant to the leader of that city's rackets, Big Jim Colosimo. Soon Torrio was managing Colosimo's criminal empire, slowly turning it toward accommodation with the authorities as had his former employer, Rothstein. In 1919, upon the urging of some associates back in New York, Torrio hired a young murderer as a bouncer at one of his brothels.

His name was Alphonse "Al" Capone. Under brutal, though often brilliant leadership, the gangs prospered during World War I, but it was nothing compared to what happened following the single most important event in the history of crime -Prohibition.

Crossfire; Bootleggers and Boozers

If there was ever a drug which genuinely could be classified as dangerous, it would have to be alcohol. Although the fermentation of grains and fruits goes back further than man's recorded history, the abuse of alcohol has remained one of the chief plagues of human society through the ages. Even today with the wide variety of recreational drugs publicized in the media, alcohol remains the chief culprit behind wife and child abuse, automobile fatalities and many types of crime.

For more than 50 years prior to 1920, American groups such as the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, the Anti-Saloon League and others had lobbied Congress and state legislatures to prohibit the manufacture and sale of distilled spirits. Finally, with many male voters off serving in the military and with the emotional exhaustion and moral primness following World War I, their dream became reality. In December 1917, Congress passed the 18th amendment to the Constitution prohibiting intoxicating beverages and by January 1919, the necessary 36 of the 48 states had ratified it.

In October 1919, - overriding the veto of President Woodrow Wilson - Congress passed the Volstead Act, which created the government bureaucracy needed to enforce the 18th amendment. On midnight January 16, 1920, prohibition became the law of the land. Less than an hour after midnight, six masked men drove a truck into a Chicago railroad switchyard, broke into two freight cars and made off with $100,000 worth of whiskey marked "For Medicinal Use Only."

It was just the beginning of an era which witnessed rapid decay of public morality, disrespect for law and the rise of a gigantic criminal empire which remains with us even today. Studying the Prohibition era, one is struck by the many similarities of today's drug prohibitions.

The catalyst for all this change was money - the immense profits to be made from the sale of illegal alcohol. Before Prohibition, a single shot of uncut Scotch sold for 15 cents. Quickly, the cost of that same shot of Scotch rose to 75 cents with the quality of the alcohol making a comparative drop. Bootleggers bought a quart of quality Scotch at sea for $4, then diluted the Scotch into three quarts selling for as much as $40 a bottle. Plus there was plenty of alcohol available at home. Homemade "hootch" was often the life of the party - provided it didn't blind or kill.

But - profits aside - the greatest impact of Prohibition was to make crime and criminals acceptable in the minds of the general public. City hoodlums who before would never have been allowed in genteel circles became the heroes of the hour. The enormous profits from selling illegal alcohol made respectable businessmen of men who months before had been thugs. Because of the unpopularity of Prohibition, buying protection from city and police officials became an easy chore. Chicago Police Chief Charles Fitzmorris once stated:

"Sixty percent of my policemen are in the bootleg business."

Many people thought his estimate was too low. Local governments, overwhelmed by the wealth and power of the gangs, increasingly turned to Washington for help. Federal authorities found their hands were tied since, at that time, crimes were the jurisdiction of the states. To counter the growing crime rate, more and more federal laws were passed, giving authority to federal agents. Now, in addition to the growing power of the criminal empire, Americans saw law enforcement powers slowly shift from local officials to the national government.

New power bases arose, such as the fledgling Federal Bureau of Investigation begun in 1909 and a variety of Prohibition agencies, which were to evolve into such modern forms as the Bureau of Narcotics and Dangerous Drugs (forerunner of the Drug Enforcement Agency) and the Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms agency.

Illegal booze was smuggled into the United States in every conceivable manner and from every conceivable point - across the Mexican and Canadian borders and off loaded from ships to small powerboats which moved out of remote bays almost at will. The profits were enough to turn even erstwhile honest businessmen to bootlegging. One such businessman would seem to be Joseph P. Kennedy, patriarch of the Kennedy clan. Although no conclusive evidence of Kennedy's bootlegging seems to be available, - his business papers are still kept locked away in Boston's John F. Kennedy Library - it has been widely rumored that the elder Kennedy got started on the road to riches by importing illegal booze.

Several of Kennedy's Harvard classmates claim he supplied all the liquor for class reunions held during Prohibition. Well-known gangsters such as Frank Costello, Meyer Lansky and Sam Giancana all have told of Joe Kennedy's bootlegging endeavors.

Rumors have it that Kennedy made a fortune bringing Canadian whiskey into Boston. This charge is supported by the fact that as soon as Prohibition ended, Kennedy immediately was in the Scotch, gin and rum business through a firm he founded called Somerset Importers.

Everyone fared well by flouting Prohibition. "I admit quite frankly that I made a fortune from bootlegging," Meyer Lansky was to tell biographers, adding:

"Everybody I knew treated Prohibition with contempt. The most important people in the country - respectable businessmen, politicians, senators, congressmen - they all bought illegal booze from me or from other men in the business."

After 13 years of Prohibition, even its most ardent supporters were forced to concede that it simply didn't work. If enough people want a commodity, others will find a way to get it to them - for a price. The price of prohibited alcohol - the massive corruption of the political and legal system, the enormous power wielded by the criminal gangs and the deaths and maimings from toxic hooch and gangland wars - was too steep.

On December 5, 1933, Prohibition was repealed. The parallels between the prohibition of alcohol and the present prohibition of other types of drugs should be so obvious that no further explanation need be given. Today the prohibition against certain drugs continues to promote official corruption on a massive scale. But it appears that the American people never seem to learn their lessons.

After national Prohibition ended, each state created its own liquor authority, opening up avenues of bribery and payoffs which hadn't existed before. Liquor and beer laws differed widely from state to state and even from city to city. Even today, liquor laws are a bewildering forest of statutes, regulations and directives which defy any pretense of rationality. And the gangsters didn't get out of the liquor business. Their illegal "speakeasies" simply became legitimate cocktail lounges and bars, often with frontmen to apply for the necessary licenses. By the early 1930s, a multitude of powerful criminal gangs existed in almost every large city. There remained only one more step - consolidation.

###

As the Prohibition era dawned, many gangsters recognized the opportunity which presented itself. In Chicago, Big Jim Colosimo was not one of them. Afraid of bringing federal lawmen down on him, Colosimo prevented his right-hand man, Johnny Torrio, from handling any alcohol other than what was needed for the gang's brothels and speakeasies. Torrio was frustrated. On orders from Torrio, an ambitious New York gangster named Frankie Yale came to Chicago and on May 11, 1920, put a bullet through the head of Colosimo. Colosimo's funeral lasted three days, with more than 5,000 mourners including two congressmen, three judges, one soon-to-be federal judge, ten aldermen, a state representative and many other community leaders. It became the prototype for subsequent gangster funerals. By now, every section of Chicago was ruled by a gang. The North Side was run by Irishman Dion O'Banion, the West Side by another Irish mob headed by the O'Donnell brothers and the famous South Side - which encompassed Little Italy - ruled by the notorious six Gennas brothers. Then there were the lesser gangs, like the Valley Gang, the Saltis-McErlane Gang and the Ragen Colts.

Torrio tried to make peace. Calling the gang leaders together, he argued persuasively that peaceful cooperation would lead to higher profits for all concerned. There was no argument.

During the early 1920s, the Chicago underworld prospered. Then, in 1923, another O'Donnell gang from the far South Side tried to muscled in on Torrio's bootlegging operation. This challenge was halted quickly with the deaths of eight of the O'Donnell gang members. But the bloodletting - along with a new reform-minded mayor - resulted in strong pressure on the gangs from the authorities. This prompted Torrio to move his entire headquarters to a suburb - Cicero, Illinois - where by bribery and threats, he became undisputed master of the town. This was the beginning of a movement out of the traditional cities into new and more controllable communities.

Opting for semi-retirement, Torrio traveled to his native Italy, where he was greeted like a conquering hero. He left the Chicago operation in the hands of an underling, Al Capone.

Where Torrio was quiet, debonair and opposed to unnecessary violence, Capone was the distinct opposite. A gambler, bully and womanizer, Capone's answer to every problem was to apply gangland muscle.

In 1924, in an effort to forestall election of officials opposed to the gangster in Cicero, Capone sent his hired guns to the polls, seizing ballot boxes and threatening voters. Pleas for help brought in Chicago police, who engaged in running gun battles with the thugs. Capone's brother, Frank Capone, was killed but Cicero was saved as the capital of the criminal empire.

However, inside Chicago, Torrio's fragile peace was coming to an end. The O'Banions were fighting with the Gennas over bootlegging operations. Having returned home, Torrio sought to smooth relations, but was arrested after police were tipped off by Dion O'Banion. This was too much.

On November 10, 1924, O'Banion was in his North Side flower shop when two Sicilian immigrants came in and shot him six times. O'Banion's successor, Hymie Weiss, vowed revenge on Capone and Torrio. In Mid-January 1925, Torrio was suddenly trapped by four men (one of them was O'Banion's chief killer, George "Bugs" Moran) and shot four times. He lived and not long after was sentenced to a prison term, taking him out of the city and turning the organization over to Capone once more.

In the summer of 1926, Weiss and some henchmen were attacked by a carload of Capone gunmen near the new Standard Oil Building. Bullets flew but only a bystander was injured. A month later, as Capone relaxed in a restaurant, a 10-car motorcade of Weiss killers passed out front, every car spitting machine-gun bullets. Capone was unhurt but three innocent bystanders were wounded. Capone paid their hospital bills.

The shooting wars now began in earnest. On October 11, 1926, Weiss was killed by two machine-gun-toting gunsels and Moran took over the gang. Over the next two years, there were periodic skirmishes between the gangsters of Capone and Moran, culminating on February 14, 1929. That day, six of Moran's men were waiting for a shipment of whiskey in a North Clark Street warehouse when a black car pulled up. Two men in uniform and two in civilian clothes went inside. Moran witnessed this from down the street and, thinking it was a police raid, turned and hurried away. Suddenly, there was the hammering of a machine-gun and within minutes the St. Valentine's Day Massacre had become history.

The movies of later years were to glorify the Chicago gangster with his pin-striped suit and holstered "heater," but at the time, it was a dirty, bloody business which eventually caused a backlash by citizens of conscience. The battles in Chicago were bringing official wrath down on the gangs everywhere.

In Mid-May, 1929, a meeting of the nation's underworld leaders was held in Atlantic City. It was decided that Capone had to go and that the gangs had to start looking for other avenues of profits since it appeared that Prohibition was on its way out. This was one of the first major meetings between gangsters, who only years before would have been blood enemies. But times were changing and so were the methods of the criminals.

On his way home from the meeting, Capone was arrested for carrying a concealed weapon and sentenced to one year in prison. After serving that sentence, he soon was convicted of income tax evasion and sentenced to federal prison for 11 years. "You won't see me for a long time," he said while being led away. Capone was released in 1939, but died soon afterwards, insane from the ravages of syphilis.

In New York, Arnold Rothstein, who initially had stayed aloof from bootlegging, took the plunge and soon was the largest supplier of illegal booze in the East. Soon Rothstein and his cohorts were solidifying their empire of gambling and other vices with the help of a young killer named Legs Diamond (real name: John T. Noland).

Gang wars erupted in New York too as ambitious newcomers tried take their share of Rothstein's operations. When Diamond's hijackings and killings became too noticeable, Rothstein told newcomers, William "Big Bill" Dwyer and Frank Costello that he wouldn't be upset if something happened to Diamond. It wasn't easy. It took them years to get rid of Legs Diamond. Rothstein went earlier, gunned down at the Park Central Hotel in November 1928.

Rothstein was considered a wealthy front man by New York's real Mafia leaders which by the late 1920s were two large families run by Giuseppe Masseria and Salvatore Maranzano. Both families were locked in a protracted blood feud known as the Castellammarese War (from Maranzano's Sicilian hometown of Castellammare del Golfo). Eventually, gangsters from both New York and Chicago were drawn into the war.

By 1931, the war was going against Masseria when one of his lieutenants, Charles "Lucky" Luciano (real name: Salvatore Lucania) decided to arrange a "peace." On April 15, 1931, Luciano, along with some Masseria men loyal to him, met with Masseria in a Coney Island restaurant. After lunch, everyone left except Luciano and Masseria. Moments later, after Luciano stepped out "to go to the washroom," three men entered and fired more than 20 rounds at Masseria. Six hit Masseria in the head and back.

Luciano immediately called a meeting with Maranzano ending the war. But, Maranzano declared himself "capo di tutti capi" (boss of all bosses) and announced a new family structure which remained in place into the 1960s. Soon Luciano and his underboss, Vito Genovese, learned that Maranzano was planning to eliminate them, so plans were set in motion to end Maranzano's rule. Maranzano had scheduled a meeting with Luciano and Genovese in his office on September 10, 1931, but before it could take place, four men posing as police officer came in and murdered Maranzano. Luciano was now the preeminent leader of the criminal mobs. Wisely, he declined the title of "boss of all bosses." Instead, Luciano created a commission of bosses and organized the old Mafia families into a national crime syndicate.

The murder of Maranzano was accompanied by the killing of several Maranzano henchmen -and, it has been alleged, as many as 40 other Mafia chieftains across the country - thus breaking the power of the old Mafia guard, called Mustache Petes.

It was Luciano who finally realized the dream of Torrio and Rothstein - the merging of the criminal gangs into a national crime syndicate. Backed by the deadly power of Murder, Inc. - a group of killers organized by Louis "Lepke" Buchalter in 1927 whose sole client was the Mafia - Luciano continued to gain absolute control of the syndicate he created.

During this time, Luciano began to move control of crime away from the traditional Italian and Sicilian families. New faces were beginning to show up at the crime syndicate. The Jewish math wizard, Meyer Lansky; Legs Diamond (real name: John T. Nolan); Dutch Schultz (real name: Arthur Flegenheimer) and Benjamin "Bugsy" Siegel were among those slowly being admitted to policy meetings.

But Luciano was still the man in charge. After extensive investigation, Senator Estes Kefauver wrote: "The Mafia is the cement that binds organized crime and the man who perfected the cement was Luciano."

(The name Mafia came from the slogan "Morte Alla Francia, Italia Anela" meaning "Death to the French is Italy's cry!" It originated during the French occupation of Sicily during the 19th century, but remained a rallying cry against Italian rule on the island.)

Next to Prohibition, one of the most far-reaching events in the history of organized crime came during World War II when Luciano became partners with the U.S. government.

Crossfire: Lucky Goes to War

Lucky Luciano, by the mid-1930s, was a wealthy crook with interests in a wide variety of legal and illegal activities. However, he never gave up his original means of making money - prostitution. It proved his undoing. In 1936, under special New York County prosecutor, Thomas E. Dewey, Luciano's phones were tapped and his prostitutes brought in for questioning. On April 1, Luciano, along with several associates, was indicted on 90 counts of compulsory prostitution. His trial was a sensation.

The public was entranced and appalled as one prostitute after another told tales of beatings, degradation and drug addiction. Luciano was convicted and sentenced to 30 to 50 years in prison. He was first taken to Sing Sing, but later transferred to Clinton State Prison at Dannemora near the Canadian border.

organized crime investigator and writer Hank Messick has claimed that Luciano issued this order to his Mafia subordinates - "Cooperate with Meyer." Thus, Meyer Lansky, the outsider, became head of the Crime Syndicate.

Dewey was exuberant. It was the first successful prosecution of a major racketeer in New York State. He issued a statement:

"This, of course, was not a vice trial. It was a racket prosecution. The control of organized prostitution in New York by the defendants was one of their lesser rackets. It was merely the vehicle by which these men were convicted."

It appeared Luciano was safely put away. But then came World War II. The war produced un-dreamed of wealth for the mobs wherever they were. The friendly bootlegger of yesterday became the friendly black marketers of today, supplying nylons, new cars, gasoline coupons, tires, food ration stamps and even military commissions and discharges.

It was even unnecessary to counterfeit ration coupons. Gangsters simply obtained real ones from corrupt officials within the Office of Price Administration, a semi-volunteer organization which counted among its young lawyers an aspiring politician from California, Richard M. Nixon. One man who dealt with the OPA and became rich in the automobile tire business during the war was Charles G. "Bebe" Rebozo, who remained close friends with Nixon through the years.

It was also during the war that gangsters found the profit - and legitimacy - of investing in the arms industry. Arms and munitions still remain the largest-selling commodity in the world today.

Toward the end of 1942, the first year of war for the United States, things were not going well for the U.S. Navy. In March of that year alone, 24 American ships had been sunk by German U-boats. Then on November 9, 1942, the former French liner "Normandie," caught fire and rolled over in her North River moorings in Manhattan while being refitted as a troop carrier. It was plainly an act of sabotage - and later was attributed to mobster Vito Genovese, who returned to Italy during the war and supported dictator Benito Mussolini. Furthermore, Naval intelligence was convinced that information about ship convoys was being transmitted to the Axis by longshoremen of German and Italian extraction.

In a desperate attempt to compensate for years of neglect in the intelligence field, U.S. military officers decided to contact the mob for help. Navy Secretary Frank Knox created a special intelligence unit for the Third Naval District, which included the Port of New York which handled nearly one-half of all U.S. foreign shipping. This unit was headed by Lt. Commander Charles Radcliffe Haffenden, who quickly opened an unobtrusive office in Manhattan's Astor Hotel where he met with mob figures.

The Navy appealed to Manhattan District Attorney Thomas E. Dewey to put them in touch with Mafia leaders. A Dewey investigator, Murray Gurfein, contacted Mafia boss Joseph "Socks" Lanza as a first step. Lanza immediately went to Meyer Lansky, who had helped guide Luciano in organizing the national crime syndicate. Lansky, sensing an opportunity to build his prestige with the syndicate, met with Commander Haffenden and promised to get the support of Luciano.

Years later, Lansky told biographers:

"Sure, I'm the one who put Lucky and Naval Intelligence together....The reason I cooperated was because of strong personal feelings. I wanted the Nazis beaten....I was a Jew and I felt for those Jews in Europe who were suffering. They were my brothers."

Although officially no deals were made with Lansky and Luciano - they supposedly cooperated out of sheer patriotism - soon, Luciano was transferred from the "Siberia" of Dannemora to the more genial surroundings of Great Meadow Prison near Comstock, New York.

Here, on a regular basis, Luciano was visited by Lansky, Frank Costello and attorney Moses Polakoff. Lansky became a frequent visitor at naval headquarters.

The partnership prospered. Lansky told biographers how it worked:

"One big problem was getting the cooperation of the International Longshoremen's Association. I got hold of Johnny "Cockeye" Dunn, who ran the West Side piers in Manhattan, and took him to meet Commander Haffenden. I mentioned Lucky's name and Cockeye came right along. I had to get him out of jail first, as it happened, but I told the Navy he was the man for the job and he came out on bail. The Navy saw to it - I know they went very high up to pull that one off. Cockeye didn't have any official position in the union and he'd been in prison a lot of times, for robbery and other crimes. But, he was the power over there no matter what anybody said."

Lansky even claimed that the FBI was able to round up a group of Nazi infiltrators after he passed along information from an Italian fisherman who had seen them land from a U-boat.

Even the arrest and conviction of Joe Lanza for extortion and conspiracy didn't hamper the cooperation between the U.S. Government and the Mafia. If Lanza didn't receive any preferential treatment at the hands of authorities, Luciano was a different story. Although in subsequent investigations into the Mafia-Navy partnership, the Government denied any deals were made, the alliance proved effective.

Union strikes and sabotage were practically non-existent on the New York docks during the war. And when U.S. forces landed in Sicily, there were Mafia men waiting to show them safe routes through minefields and the location of German positions.

During this final phase of the war, the Mafia-military cooperation - known as Operation Underworld - moved from the Navy to the Office of Strategic Services, forerunner of the CIA.

On January 3, 1946, Dewey - by then governor of New York - forwarded to the state legislature an executive clemency for Luciano which noted Luciano's "aid" to the war effort. Luciano was freed from prison, but promptly deported. He had never bothered to become a naturalized citizen. He sailed for Italy aboard the S.S. Laura Keane on February 3, 1946. Once ensconced in Italy, Luciano didn't accept retirement. He began to bring his formidable organizational abilities to worldwide crime. Later that year, he turned up in Havana, Cuba, where Lansky was busy consolidating the gambling and prostitution business. However, American authorities warned the Cubans that medical supplies would be shut off if Luciano was allowed to remain. He soon departed.

Returning to Italy, Luciano began to organize an international narcotics syndicate which remains with us today.

Veteran mob reporter David Hanna wrote:

"...narcotics (soon became) bigger than Luciano. The French Connection had started in Marseilles and its chairmen were not bumbling, Italo-American crooks, spawned in the gutters of New York's Little Italy. They were smooth, suave Corsican masters of commerce and shipping, big business men, tied to banks through directorships, to the police by being part of them, to politics by holding office. The Corsican mobs had earned the support of the French right wing and the CIA by smashing unions and beating up left-wing politicians, just as Giuliano had done in Sicily and the colonels had done in Greece. No one was going to bother them over a few kilos of heroin. They would become the Syndicate of tomorrow."

But the wartime alliance of U.S. Intelligence and the mob was to continue through the years - first by breaking communist unions in Marseilles and then by murder-for-hire assassination plots against Fidel Castro and others and finally to the CIA involvement with heroin traffickers in Vietnam and Panama.

###

The first national awareness of organized crime dates back to a conference of law enforcement officials called together by U.S. Attorney General J. Howard McGrath in 1950.

Officials from New Orleans, Dallas and other cities testified to the brutal takeover of crime in their areas of jurisdiction. One dissenter was Otto Kerner, the U.S. Attorney from Chicago, who maintained there was "no organized gambling in the city of Chicago..." In 1973, Kerner was convicted of accepting $150,000 in bribes from horse-racing interests.

One of the results of the 1950 conference was the creation of a Select Senate Committee to probe organized crime under the sponsorship of Senator Estes Kefauver of Tennessee. The Kefauver Committee hearings lasted well into 1951 and provided much more public knowledge about the national crime syndicate. While Attorney General McGrath - along with FBI director J. Edgar Hoover - had maintained that no crime syndicate existed, Kefauver and his committee provided the evidence that it did. The committee found that organized, professional gambling and bookmaking was widespread throughout the nation, that the narcotics industry was a "highly organized crime" and that the mobs had infiltrated legitimate businesses ranging from advertising to transportation. It also showed the amount of official corruption which was necessary for the syndicate to flourish. The committee's final report quoted a mobster named John Roselli, who later became embroiled in the CIA-Mafia assassination schemes:

"(T)he wire service, the handbooks, the slot machines, and the other rackets which have thrived in the city of Chicago cannot operate without local corruption; if the handbooks are open, the conclusion is inescapable that the police are being paid off."

The Kefauver Committee also found that organized crime had spread from the cities of New York and Chicago to new markets in places like Kansas City, New Orleans and Dallas.

After visiting New Orleans, the committee described it as "one of America's largest concentrations of gambling houses." One of these houses, the Beverly Club, was found to be owned by Phil Kastel, Frank Costello, Jake Lansky (Meyer's brother) and a local Mafia leader, Carlos Marcello.

Crossfire: Carlos Marcello

Carlos Marcello (real name: Calogero Minacore) was born in 1910, the child of Sicilian parents living in Tunisia. That same year, the family came to New Orleans. At that time, the leader of the Mafia in New Orleans was Charles Montranga, who had survived a mass lynching in 1891 following the murder of Police Chief David Hennessey.

In 1922, Montranga was succeeded by Sam Carolla, one of Montranga's lieutenants. Carolla became a bootlegger during Prohibition and consolidated the mob's control of New Orleans.

In 1932, Carolla was convicted of shooting a federal agent and was sent to prison, where he continued to run his crime organization. That same year, New York Mayor-elect Fiorello LaGuardia was clamping down on mob operations there, so Frank Costello moved his slot machine business to New Orleans with the permission of Carolla. Carolla even supplied a young associate to run the newly-arrived gambling operation - Carlos Marcello.

By 1947, Carolla and Marcello - with the aid of Costello and Meyer Lansky - had expanded their gambling operations to include a racetrack, wire service and several plush casinos. That year, Carolla was deported to Sicily and, despite two illegal trips back, his control over New Orleans passed to Marcello.

By 1963, Marcello's empire was estimated by the New Orleans Metropolitan Crime Commission to range into the hundreds of millions of dollars, although Marcello claimed he made only about $1,600 a month as a tomato salesman. Much of Marcello's ownings were put under the names of close relatives, thus hiding his true worth.

Marcello's national crime contacts included Costello, Joe Civello of Dallas, Sam Yaras of Chicago, Mickey Cohen of Los Angeles and the man in Tampa, Florida, identified by the Kefauver Committee as it's Mafia leader of more than 20 years, Santos Trafficante Sr.

From the time of the Kefauver Committee hearings, the U. S. Government has tried unsuccessfully to deport Marcello, who holds only a Guatemalan passport obtained allegedly by bribes.

In the spring of 1961, Marcello found he was facing a new, and much tougher government opponent than in the past. Entering the offices of the Immigration and Naturalization Services in New Orleans for his regular quarterly appointment to report as an alien, Marcello found himself handcuffed and driven to Moisant International Airport on direct orders from the new U.S. Attorney General, Robert F. Kennedy. He was flown 1,200 miles to Guatemala City, where he was dumped without luggage and with little cash. Forced to leave Guatemala because of the ensuing political uproar, Marcello somehow found his way back to Miami.

(House Select Committee on Assassinations Chief Counsel Robert Blakey claims wiretaps showed Marcello was flown back to the United States by a Dominican Republic Air Force plane, however, others claim he was flown back by pilot David Ferrie (See CUBANS and AGENTS).

Although still fighting deportation, Marcello managed to remain in the United States since that time. But his Sicilian pride must have been greatly injured at Kennedy's unceremonious actions in 1961. It was not long after this that Marcello reportedly made threats against the Attorney General. Edward Becker, a Las Vegas promoter and corporate "investigator," told the House Select Committee on Assassinations that he was present at a meeting in September 1962, at Marcello's estate just outside New Orleans, Churchill Farms. Becker said at the mention of Kennedy's name, Marcello became angry and stated:

"Don't worry about that little Bobby son-of-a-bitch. He's going to be taken care of."

According to Becker, Marcello then uttered a Sicilian curse:

"Livarsi na petra di la scarpa" (Take the stone out of my shoe).

Marcello described President Kennedy as a dog with Bobby Kennedy being the tail. He then gave a startlingly accurate prophesy of what was to come. He said the dog will keep biting you if you only cut off its tail, but cut off the head and the dog will die, tail and all. The analogy was clear - with John Kennedy out of the way, Bobby Kennedy and his war on crime would come to an end. Becker said Marcello even had a plan. Marcello said he would use a "nut" for the job, someone who could be manipulated so that the killing could not be traced back to him.

The House Select Committee on Assassinations determined that there were many connections between Marcello and the JFK assassination - Marcello's associate in Dallas, Joe Civello, was close with Jack Ruby; a Marcello employee, David Ferrie, was Lee Harvey Oswald's first Civil Air Patrol leader and said to have been in contact with Oswald during the summer of 1963; and that Oswald's uncle, Charles "Dutz" Murret was acquainted with Marcello's personal driver as well as other associates of Marcello. It was just a few months after Marcello's reported threat that Lee Harvey Oswald arrived in New Orleans.

###

In 1957, a conflict over who would lead the American crime syndicate was resolved on October 25, when two gunmen shot Albert Anastasia out of a barber's chair in New York. Earlier that year, Frank Costello, Luciano's successor, was shot while entering his Manhattan apartment. He lived, but was charged with tax evasion after a note was found on him listing receipts from the recently-built Tropicana Hotel in developing Las Vegas. Costello retired from the rackets. Three weeks after the Anastasia's death, a mob conference was called by Vito Genovese. It was held at the country estate of a Mafia lieutenant near the small town of Apalachin in upstate New York. On hand was a collection of almost every leader of the crime syndicate. The purpose of the meeting, according to later testimony of some of those present, was the demand that Genovese be named "boss of all bosses" after he justified the attacks on Costello and Anastasia. One argument presented was that Anastasia had tried to move in on the Cuban gambling operations of Santos Trafficante Jr. of Florida. But before business could be settled, the police arrived, tipped off by an alert New York State Police sergeant who had become suspicious of all the big black cars with out-of-state license plates. Police roadblocks and searches of surrounding woods netted 59 of the crime leaders, most of whom claimed that had come to visit a sick friend. They included Joe Bonanno, Joseph Magliocco, Carlo Gambino, Carmine Lombardozi, John Bonventre and Joseph Profaci from New York; Anthony Magaddino from Niagara Falls; Vito Genovese, Gerardo Catena, Joseph Ida and Frank Majuri from New Jersey; Frank DeSimone from California; Joe Civello from Dallas, Texas; and Trafficante. Carlos Marcello had wisely sent a surrogate while others, such as Sam Giancana of Chicago, escaped. It was the first public look at organized crime since the Kefauver Committee hearings in the early 1950s.

But some people were already aware of the serious threat posed by the mob's syndicate. One of these was young Robert Kennedy who, after making a nationwide fact-finding tour in 1956 and 1957, became most concerned with the mob's takeover of labor unions. On January 30, 1957, the U.S. Senate unanimously created the Senate Select Committee on Improper Activities in the Labor or Management Field - which became known as the McClellan Committee after its chairman, Senator John L. McClellan of Arkansas. The committee's chief counsel was Robert F. Kennedy. One of the senators on the McClellan Committee was a young man from Boston, John F. Kennedy. Kennedy later said his brother wanted him on the committee to keep it from being overloaded with conservative, anti-labor people. Both Kennedys were highly active in the committee's work, which first took on the corrupt leader of the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Dave Beck. Following the committee's investigation, Beck was convicted in a state court of larceny and then convicted of tax evasion in federal court. Beck went to prison in 1957. (He was granted a full pardon by President Gerald Ford in May 1975.) With Beck gone the presidency of the Teamsters Union went to Jimmy Hoffa. Even before Hoffa could be brought before the McClellan Committee, he was indicted for attempting to bribe commission attorney, John Cye Cheasty. At his trial, the FBI showed a film of the men conversing and Hoffa being arrested right after money was exchanged. However, the jury of eight blacks and four whites was more impressed with former World Heavyweight Champion boxer Joe Louis, who embraced Hoffa in court and Hoffa's defense attorney, Edward Bennett Williams (now owner of the Washington Redskins). Hoffa went free to testify before the McClellan Committee. But Hoffa said he had faulty memory when it came to most questions concerning his association with underworld characters, such as Paul Dorfman. Dorfman was described by the McClellan Committee as "an associate of Chicago mobsters and the head of a local of the Waste Material Handlers Union." Dorfman also was connected to Jack Ruby, the man who silenced Lee Harvey Oswald. Dorfman's step-son, Allen Dorfman, was to play a major role in Hoffa loans to the underworld using the Teamster's Central States Health and Welfare Fund. In 1951, shortly after setting up the Michigan Conference of Teamsters Welfare Fund, Hoffa persuaded the fund's two trustees - one of whom was Hoffa's successor, Frank Fitzsimmons - to place the fund with a newly-formed branch of Union Casualty Agency. Union Casualty was owned by Paul Dorfman's step-son, Allen, and the elder Dorfman's wife, Rose. Later Hoffa also sent the Central States fund to the Dorfman-controlled agency. These two funds made up 90 percent of the branch company's contracts, according to author Dan Moldea. There continues to be claims of the close ties between Hoffa and two of the underworld's most powerful men - Carlos Marcello and Santos Trafficante Jr.

Crossfire: Santos Trafficante and Cuba

During the mid-1950s, with gunfire punctuating internal mob leadership disputes in New York and the various government panels revealing the extent of organized crime in the United States, crime bosses began to look south for relief. As early as 1933, the mob's financial wizard, Meyer Lansky, had obtained gambling concessions in Cuba, located just 90 miles off the Florida coast (See CUBANS). He had originally visited Cuba seeking molasses to make rum but discovered a suitable climate for gambling operations. Befriending the self-proclaimed dictator of Cuba, former Army sergeant Fulgencio Batista, Lansky soon opened several gambling casinos. But World War II brought a halt to his plans for turning the island into a haven for gamblers. There simply weren't enough planes and boats available to make the project profitable. In 1944, the Cuban economy was sagging and Batista was forced to make concessions to his political opponents, which included pro-communists. According to investigative reporter Howard Kohn, the Office of Naval Intelligence - already in contact with Lucky Luciano through Lansky - asked Lansky to pressure Batista into stepping down. On Lansky's urging, Batista called an election, was defeated and left Cuba for an eight-year exile in Florida.

On March 10, 1952, Batista returned to Cuba and seized power in a bloodless military coup. Reportedly, it was large amounts of money placed in numbered Swiss bank accounts by Lansky which convinced Cuban President Carlos Prío Socarras not to resist Batista's comeback. Under Lansky's manipulation, Batista's government agreed to match investments in Cuba dollar for dollar and to grant a gambling license to any establishment worth more than $1 million. Soon the island's economy was booming as hotels and gambling casinos were quickly built. Lansky built the Hotel Nacional, whose pit boss was his brother, Jake.

He and other associates had interest in the Sevilla Biltmore and the Havana Hilton. Lansky himself built the $14 million Hotel Havana Riviera, which was run by Dino and Eddie Cellini, organized crime figures from Ohio. But Lansky, a Jew, was still not considered an official member of the Mafia-dominated American crime syndicate. organized crime authority G. Robert Blakey wrote:

"...the undisputed Mafia gambling boss in Havana was Santos Trafficante Jr."

Trafficante was born in Tampa, Florida, on November 14, 1914, the son of Santos Trafficante Sr., described by the Kefauver Committee as "a reputed (mob) leader in Tampa for more than 20 years." When Trafficante Sr. died in 1954, his family crime business - mostly narcotics trafficking and gambling - went to his namesake. By the late 1950s, Trafficante Jr. was well situated in Cuba, owning substantial interest in the Sans Souci, a renowned nightspot partly managed by a Trafficante associate, John Roselli, later a central figure in the CIA-Mafia plots against Castro. Both Trafficante and Lansky also were part owners of the Tropicana Casino in Havana, which was managed by former Dallas gambler Lewis McWillie, the "idol" of Jack Ruby (See JACK RUBY). To gain an insight into the opportunities for mob graft at the Cuban casinos, consider that in 1958 U.S. Customs inspectors in Miami caught Jake Lansky with $200,000 in cash and $50,000 in checks. Lansky claimed he was taking the money for deposit in the Bank of Miami.

In Cuba, Meyer Lansky and associate Bugsy Siegel used the same tactics they had used successfully in 1945 when they turned a dusty strip of Nevada desert into the Las Vegas strip - flying in high-rollers to stay at their hotel-casinos. In reviewing the Havana operations during those years, Blakey wrote:

"Havana, in short, was a full-service vice capital, owned and operated by the mob."

Others who had gambling interests in Cuba during this time were men connected to Teamster boss Jimmy Hoffa. Two New York underworld figures allied with the Tommy Lucchese family, Salvatore Granello and James Plumeri, were part owners of a Havana race track and a large gambling casino. Granello and Plumeri also helped Teamster officials get Miami Local 320 of the International Brotherhood of Teamsters started, according to "The Hoffa Wars" author, Dan Moldea. Moldea also wrote that Granello and Plumeri at the time were splitting kickbacks with Hoffa on loans made through the Central States Pension Fund.

One high-placed guest in Cuba at the time was Congressman Richard Nixon, who made frequent trips to the island, visiting both President Batista and the gambling casinos. According Nixon biographer Earl Mazo, Nixon visited Cuba as early as 1940 considering "the possibilities of establishing law or business connections in Havana." Less than a month after Batista took power, Nixon made a late-night stop at one of Havana's casinos, where a companion lost $4,200 gambling. Nixon's friend, Dana Smith - who later administered Nixon's famous secret "Checkers" slush fund - wrote a check to cover his losses, but stopped payment after returning to the United States. Legal action was begun by the casino, but charges were dropped after Nixon intervened with State Department officials.

The glamorous night life of Havana came to an abrupt end on New Year's Day, 1959, when Fidel Castro entered the city and proclaimed a new Cuban revolution (See CUBANS). Both Batista and Lansky fled Cuba that same day. Lansky later lamented that he caught one of the last planes leaving Havana and was forced to leave behind $17 million in cash which had been earmarked for his various partners via Swiss bank accounts. Jake Lansky, left behind to hold together his brother's gambling and narcotics operations, was jailed by Castro along with Santos Trafficante.

Castro loudly proclaimed:

"I'm going to run all these fascist mobsters, all these American gangsters, out of Cuba.

I'm going to nationalize everything. Cuba for Cubans!"

Jack Ruby, the Dallas nightclub owner who killed Lee Harvey Oswald, also was interested in Cuba at this time. He was involved in gun running activities just prior to Castro's revolution and he visited there at least twice to see his close friend Lewis McWillie. Ruby may have even met with Trafficante while in Cuba (See JACK RUBY).

By 1960, Castro had made good on his threat to expel organized crime. He had deported all syndicate members, closed the whorehouses and casinos and shut down the drug labs along with expropriating other American business interests. Both the crime syndicate and some government officials were appalled at this turn of events. The CIA particularly wanted something done since, according to Agency sources quoted by journalist Howard Kohn, the Agency had used the underworld's Havana casinos to hide payments to the crime figures it sometimes employed.

Thus the idea of an invasion of Cuba was born. It developed into a murky alliance between the CIA, the crime syndicate, the U.S. military and anti-Castro Cuban exiles. This alliance produced the ill-fated Bay of Pigs invasion (See CUBANS). Four ex-casino bosses - including Hoffa associates Salvatore Granello and James Plumeri - even supplied the CIA with intelligence reports gathered from trusted Cuban contacts. Trafficante, who had gained power in 1957 by alerting Lansky that Albert Anastasia planned to undercut Lansky's control of the Cuban operations, helped guide the Bay of Pigs activities through Frank Sturgis. Sturgis (real name: Frank Fiorini) was an American soldier of fortune who had fought with Castro and then served as Castro's supervisor of gambling before the casinos were all closed. Having attended the meeting in which Castro announced his plans to shut down mob operations in Cuba, Sturgis immediately reported this decision to Miami mob boss Santos Trafficante. After gambling was stopped, Sturgis came to the United States, saying that he had been working undercover against Castro all the time. He was quickly recruited by the CIA (See AGENTS).

Richard Whattley, another mercenary hired for the Cuban invasion, later reported:

"Trafficante would order Sturgis to move his men and he'd do it. Our ultimate conclusion was that Trafficante was our backer. He was our money man."

Along with the plans to invade Cuba, there were concurrent schemes to eliminate Castro by assassination. Involved in these plots were Trafficante, Sturgis, Robert Maheu (the ex-FBI man who was liaison between the CIA and the Mafia and later became manager of the Howard Hughes empire) and two Mafia chiefs, John Roselli and Sam "Momo" Giancana.

Teamster boss Jimmy Hoffa was the original liaison between the CIA and the mob, according to Charles Crimaldi, a Chicago killer turned government informer and considered reliable by Charles Siragusa, former deputy director of the Bureau of Narcotics.

During the disastrous Bay of Pigs invasion, it has been reported that some of Lansky's casino operators - escorted by a CIA man - waited in a boat offshore, ready to rush in and resume the Havana operations. With the failure of the invasion, the mob joined with the CIA, the military and the Cuban exiles in putting the blame squarely on President John F. Kennedy. Although mob gambling activity quickly shifted to Las Vegas and the Bahamas, crime leaders did not forget who cost them their Havana "vice capital."

Like Marcello, Trafficante began to feel the heat of Robert Kennedy's anti-crime crusade and said something was going to be done about it. According to evidence gathered by the House Select Committee on Assassinations, Trafficante was in touch with a wealthy Cuban exile living in Miami named Jose Aleman. Trafficante had offered to arrange a million-dollar loan for Aleman which was coming from the Teamsters Union and had "already been cleared by Jimmy Hoffa himself." Aleman said he met with Trafficante at Miami's Scott-Bryant Hotel in September 1962, and the talk turned to Hoffa. According to Aleman, Trafficante brought the conversation around to President Kennedy, saying:

"Have you seen how his brother is hitting Hoffa, a man who is a worker, who is not a millionaire, a friend of the blue collars? He doesn't know that this kind of encounter is very delicate...It is not right what they are doing to Hoffa...Hoffa is a hard-working man and does not deserve it...Mark my words, this man Kennedy is in trouble and he will get what is coming to him."

Aleman said when he disagreed, saying Kennedy was doing a good job and probably would be re-elected, Trafficante replied:

"You don't understand me. Kennedy's not going to make it to the election. He's going to be hit."

Later Aleman said Trafficante "made it clear" he was not guessing and even gave "the distinct impression that Hoffa was to be principally involved in the elimination of Kennedy." Unknown to Trafficante, Aleman was an informant for the FBI at the time of this alleged conversation. He promptly reported what he had heard to the Bureau, but said FBI officials would not listen nor take him seriously. In 1978, when Aleman testified before the House Select Committee on Assassinations, his story became vague. He said perhaps Trafficante meant Kennedy was going to be "hit" by a lot of Republicans votes in 1964. Aleman also admitted he was "very much concerned about my safety..."

###

Jimmy Hoffa survived the McClellan Committee hearings. But it was the start of a personal war between two of the nation's most powerful men - Bobby Kennedy and Teamster leader Jimmy Hoffa.

On January 20, 1961, John F. Kennedy was sworn in by Chief Justice Earl Warren as the 35th President of the United States. At the insistence of his father, Joseph P. Kennedy, and because he wanted someone in his cabinet completely trustworthy, Kennedy selected his younger brother, Robert F. Kennedy, as Attorney General. Just two months before, Robert Kennedy had turned 35. He was the one of the youngest attorney generals in the history of the United States. It was a decision roundly criticized by the news media and other politicians. Alexander Bickel, writing in the "New Republic," was blunt:

"On the record, Robert Kennedy is not fit for the office."

The younger Kennedy immediately let it be known that his primary target was organized crime. Well-informed about the national crime syndicate thanks to his tenure on the McClellan Committee, Kennedy said:

"Organized Crime has become big business."

Later he said he was appalled:

"(at the) private government of organized crime, resting on a base of human suffering and moral corrosion...(and that the modern gangster was no longer) someone dressed in a black shirt, white tie and diamond stickpin, whose activities affect only a remote underworld circle. He is more likely to be outfitted in a gray flannel suit and his influence is more likely to be as far-reaching as that of an important industrialist."

Packing his staff with some of the finest legal minds in the nation, Kennedy continually regaled reluctant Justice Department officials:

"Don't tell me what I can't do, tell me what I can do."

Soon even Kennedy's opponents were expressing admiration for the energy and talent exhibited by the new attorney general. Bickle later wrote:

"...It was the most brilliantly staffed department we had seen in a long, long time and that was very impressive. One immediately had a sense of a fellow...who had a vision of public service that would have done anyone proud."

Bucking the reluctance of J. Edgar Hoover and other veteran Justice officials, Kennedy began to achieve results. Between 1960 and 1964, the number of attorneys in the organized crime and Racketeering Section grew from 17 to 63. Criminal intelligence from various agencies was pooled. The statistics tell the story. In 1960, attorneys from the organized crime section spent 61 days in court, 660 days in the field and 100 days before a grand jury. In 1963, they spent 1,081 days in court, 6,177 days in the field and 1,353 days before a grand jury. Individual indictments rose from 121 in 1961 to 615 in 1963. Convictions increased from 73 in 1961 to 288 in 1963. In all, 116 members of the mob were indicted between 1960 and 1964. A list of syndicate members targeted for prosecution grew from 40 in 1960 to 2,300 by 1964, plus the organized crime section accumulated 175,000 cards in its master file of information on racketeers and their associates. Among these were the nation's top mobsters, including Marcello and Trafficante. But Kennedy's personal attention went to his old enemy, Jimmy Hoffa.

Crossfire: War on Hoffa

James Riddle Hoffa was born on February 14, 1913, in Brazil, Indiana. After the death of his father when he was seven, young Hoffa moved to Detroit with his mother, brother and two sisters. By 1932, Hoffa was already involved in the union movement. Angered over low pay and working conditions at the Kroger Food Company, Hoffa helped organize a work stoppage. After several days of negotiation, the company signed a one-page contract. It was the start of a one-company union and was affiliated with the American Federation of Labor. By the mid-1930s, Hoffa's fledgling union was absorbed by bigger organizations. After being fired by Kroger, he joined Detroit Teamsters Joint Council 43 as an organizer and negotiator.

In the early 1930s, Hoffa had a love affair with Sylvia Pigano, a woman with family connections to organized crime figures. This was Hoffa's introduction to the underworld, which over the years became an invaluable source of support. From that point on Hoffa's rise to the presidency of the International Brotherhood of Teamsters continued unabated. Hoffa walked a thin line, maintaining contacts with mobsters on one hand and presenting the image of a respectable labor leader on the other.

After World War II, two deported Detroit mobsters, Frank Coppola and Salvatore Vitale, became top lieutenants to Lucky Luciano. Both men were well acquainted with Hoffa. Hoffa, through organized crime figure Santo Perrone, also met Paul Dorfman, a former Al Capone henchman, union official and friend to Jack Ruby. Dorfman had become president of the mob-controlled Chicago Scrap Handlers Union following the murder of its founder, Leon Cooke. Ruby was one of those arrested for questioning in Cooke's death (See JACK RUBY).

In "The Enemy Within," a book describing organized crime growth in the United States, Robert Kennedy wrote that while Hoffa had consolidated his position within the Michigan Teamsters Union, he was largely unknown outside that state. Kennedy wrote:

"For him, the key to the entire Midwest was Chicago. He needed a powerful ally there - and he found his man in Paul Dorfman. Dorfman, (McClellan Committee) testimony showed, was a big operator - a major figure in the Chicago underworld who also knew his way around in certain labor and political circles."

Through Dorfman, Hoffa made connections with another Chicago mobster, Sam Giancana. Dorfman's step-son, Allen Dorfman, - with no insurance experience - opened the Chicago branch of Union Casualty Agency. By 1951, Hoffa had managed to bring Dorfman's Union Casualty office both the Michigan Conference of Teamsters Welfare Fund and the Central States Health and Welfare Fund. Hoffa also was working closely with underworld figures in maintaining Teamster control over strikes and other union activity. Vincent Piersante, head of the organized crime unit of the Michigan Attorney General's Office, told author Dan Moldea:

"There is little doubt about the fact that Hoffa, consciously and willingly, protected the rackets in Detroit by protecting their legitimate fronts with the Teamsters Union. And that included those gangsters who were deeply involved in the drug traffic."

In 1957, fresh from his victory in exposing Teamster President Dave Beck's embezzlement of union money, McClellan Committee Chief Counsel Robert Kennedy turned his sights on Beck's successor, Jimmy Hoffa. On March 13, 1957, Hoffa was arrested after passing $2,000 to a Committee attorney. But he was acquitted after a brilliant defense by Washington attorney Edward Bennett Williams, who had also defended Frank Costello and Dave Beck. After the committee hearings, Hoffa also was acquitted on charges of wiretapping and perjury. He was living a charmed life. but his hatred for Kennedy was increasing. The McClellan Committee, in its first interim report, stated:

"The power of the Teamsters Union president is so extraordinary that the committee finds the fact this power is now lodged in the hands of a man such as Hoffa tragic for the Teamsters Union and dangerous for the country at large."

Kennedy elaborated in his book:

"The Teamsters Union is the most powerful institution in this country -aside from the United States Government itself. In many Metropolitan areas the Teamsters control all transportation...between birth and burial the Teamsters drive the trucks that clothe and feed us and provide the vital necessities of life...Quite literally, your life - the life of every person in the United States - is in the hands of Hoffa and his Teamsters...But though the great majority of Teamsters officials and Teamster members are honest, the Teamsters Union under Hoffa is often not run as a bona fide union. As Mr. Hoffa operates it, this is a conspiracy of evil."

The major concern seems to have been the threat of mob blackmail. If organized crime so desired, it could have pressured Hoffa into calling a nationwide Teamsters strike which could have totally paralyzed the nation. For the Kennedys, this was an intolerable situation.

When the election year of 1960 arrived, Hoffa knew which side he had to be on. He and the Teamsters threw their support behind Richard Nixon.

In fact Edward Partin, a Louisiana Teamster official and later a government informant, has revealed that Hoffa met with Carlos Marcello. He related:

"I was right there, listening to the conversation. Marcello had a suitcase filled with $500,000 cash which was going to Nixon. It was a half-million-dollar contribution. (Another half million) was coming from the mob boys in New Jersey and Florida."

But money wasn't enough. Nixon lost and Robert Kennedy became Attorney General. After the election, Hoffa was quoted as saying:

"Nobody had to tell me that he was really going to go after my scalp now."

In 1958, U.S. Attorney General William P. Rogers formed a special group on organized crime to investigate the Alalachin meeting. Kennedy, following that precedent, organized a special unit within the organized crime and Racketeering Section to investigate the Teamsters Union. Headed by Walter Sheridan, who had been an investigator for the McClellan Committee, the unit became known as the "Get Hoffa Squad." The squad managed to bring 201 indictments and 126 convictions against Teamster officials. On May 18, 1962, Hoffa was indicted for receiving a million dollars in illegal payments through the Test Fleet Corporation, a trucking company set up under his wife's name. His trial ended in a hung jury. As a result of this trial, Hoffa was indicted along with five others for jury tampering on May 9, 1963. On June 4, 1963, Hoffa was indicted for fraudulently obtaining $20 million in loans from Teamsters' the Central States Pension Fund.

Earlier, in September 1962 - about the same time that Marcello and Trafficante had hinted that President Kennedy was going to be assassinated - Ed Partin, the Teamster official turned informant, went to Louisiana law enforcement officials to tell of a threat by Hoffa. Partin believed that Hoffa thought he was closely associated with Marcello since he lived in Louisiana. Visiting in Hoffa's Washington office in August 1962, Partin said Hoffa began talking about plans to kill Robert Kennedy. Thinking out loud, Hoffa discussed two schemes. One involved the firebombing of Hickory Hill, Kennedy's Virginia estate. The second plan involved shooting Kennedy with a rifle while he rode in an open car.

The "ideal setup," Hoffa reportedly told Partin, would be to catch Kennedy somewhere in the South, where "segregation people" might be blamed for the crime. The "ideal time" would be to hit Kennedy while he rode in a convertible, said Hoffa. Partin quoted Hoffa as saying:

"Somebody needs to bump that son of a bitch off. Bobby Kennedy (has) got to go."

Partin's story was passed along to Kennedy aides, who were highly skeptical until an FBI lie detector test indicated Partin was telling the truth. Further confirmation of the seriousness of the threat came when federal officials taped a conversation between Partin and Hoffa.

Partin said he had obtained some plastic explosives and Hoffa asked him to bring them to Nashville. The threat even reached the ear of President Kennedy, who confided to journalist Benjamin Bradlee in February 1963, that Hoffa's men intended to kill his brother with a "gun fitted with a silencer." Bradlee, in notes taken at the time, wrote he found the story "hard to believe, but the President was obviously serious."

It was in the middle of Hoffa's jury tampering case that President Kennedy was shot in Dallas. Hoffa, upon learning that flags were flying at half-mast at Teamster headquarters in Washington, regaled officials there, shouting:

"Why the hell did you do that for him? Who the hell is he?"

Two of Hoffa's top officials resigned over the incident.

On the day that Ruby murdered Oswald, Hoffa told a Nashville reporter:

"Bobby Kennedy is just another lawyer now."

Hoffa was convicted in both the jury tampering and the fraudulent loan cases and sentenced to both fine and imprisonment. He received executive clemency from President Richard Nixon on December 23, 1971, without the customary consultation with the sentencing judge. However, the clemency contained a provision prohibiting Hoffa from seeking office in the union. Hoffa filed suit to have the restriction nullified and began making overtures to Teamster rank and file. Ironically, he pledged that, if elected Teamster president in 1976, he would purge the union of all mob influence.

On July 30, 1975, Hoffa was to meet Anthony "Tony Pro" Provenzano, a New Jersey Teamster official and reputed member of the crime syndicate. He never returned and no one has been convicted in his disappearance. Hoffa's unsolved disappearance is grim evidence that neither Teamster officials, the crime syndicate nor the U.S. Government wanted him to regain control of this nation's mightiest union.

###

One of the biggest boosts to Robert Kennedy's anti-crime campaign began in June 1962, when an underworld tough serving a prison term in Atlanta for narcotics murdered a fellow inmate with an iron pipe. The convict's name was Joseph Valachi and he killed the man believing him to be an assassin sent from his long-time boss and cellmate, Vito Genovese. Genovese had slipped back into the United States after World War II to resume his narcotics operations. Imprisoned, Genovese heard rumors - apparently false - that Valachi was cooperating with authorities and had given his veteran soldier the "kiss of death." Soon after, there were three attempts on Valachi's life. Valachi didn't want to wait for the fourth. So believing a man in the prison courtyard was a Genovese killer, Valachi beat him to death. He picked the wrong man.

With both the Government and the mob seeking his life, Valachi decided he had nothing to lose by cooperating with authorities. Over the next year, he provided federal agents with a bonanza of information on the national crime organization which is known as the Mafia, La Cosa Nostra (Our Thing), the Outfit, the Arm, the Syndicate and other names. On September 25, 1963, Valachi took his story public, testifying before McClellan's Senate committee.

Valachi presented a wealth of detail about the organization of the mob, its codes, rules and regulations and its most important members, including those who sat on the "Commissione," the Syndicate's board of directors. Organized crime authority and former New York Police official Ralph Salerno evaluated Valachi's testimony:

"The Valachi confessions are ranked next to Apalachin as the single greatest (intelligence) blow ever delivered to organized crime in the United States. This evaluation came from the lips of those most affected by it: members of the criminal network whose comments were overheard through bug and wiretap....Many of the incidents Valachi described had...been known to the police, but...(Valachi) was able to fill in the gaps and connect one incident with another....The pattern that Valachi furnished made it possible for police intelligence men to begin to see the dimensions of syndicated crime and stop looking at it as a series of unconnected cases."

Valachi's relations were compared to those of Nicola Gentile, a self-exiled Sicilian "Mafioso" who had been high in the councils of crime during the 1920s and 1930s. Gentile had recounted the growth of organized crime to a special unit of the Justice Department during the Eisenhower Administration, but nothing had been done with the information. The accounts were generally the same and, for the first time, the American people got a glimpse of the scope and danger of organized crime.

The Valachi revelations were a great embarrassment to FBI director J. Edgar Hoover. They forced Hoover to grudgingly admit that such a thing as a crime syndicate must exist.

In his ever-increasing war against organized crime, Kennedy made use of the Treasury Department's Internal Revenue Service to go after mob members. Man-hours of IRS agents working on organized crime cases grew from 8,836 in 1960 to 96,182 in 1963. John H. Davis, a Kennedy relative and author of "The Kennedys," wrote:

"Given another five years in office, the Kennedys could conceivably have exterminated the Cosa Nostra entirely, or at least crippled it beyond repair."

But the mob wasn't about to sit back and wait for destruction, although at least one gangster was overheard by police bugs saying he was thinking of closing shop and leaving the country. Crime bosses wanted something done about the Kennedys, especially since they felt "double crossed" by the two brothers. After all, the connections between crime and the Kennedys reportedly went back a long way.

Back in 1927, a shipment of bootleg whiskey on its way from Ireland to Boston was hijacked in southern New England. Almost the entire guard was killed in the resulting shoot-out. The hijackers were part of the Luciano-Lansky mob, while it was rumored that Joseph P. Kennedy was involved in the shipment. Kennedy reputedly lost a fortune on the deal and was besieged by widows of the guards seeking financial assistance. Lansky later told biographers he was convinced that Kennedy held a grudge against him personally from that time on and, in fact, had passed the hostility on to his sons.

This unproven contact between the Kennedy family and Prohibition bootlegging might well be the basis for the younger Kennedy's war against organized crime. It well may be that both sons - having heard the rumors of their father's Prohibition activities - were determined to wipe away this stain on the family's honor. But the crime contacts didn't stop with Prohibition.

According to crime author Ovid Demaris, Kennedy would likely have lost the state of Illinois -and possibly the 1960 presidential election - except for overlarge voting in Cook County, home of Chicago Mayor Richard Daley.

Following the election, Illinois Republicans made an unofficial check of 699 paper ballot precincts in Cook County and turned up enough irregular votes to shift the victory to Richard Nixon. However, demands for an official recount were blocked by Daley's political machine. And behind that machine was the real power in Chicago at that time - Sam Giancana.

Crossfire: Momo and his Girlfriends

Sam Giancana (real name: Momo Salvatore Guingano) was born May 24, 1908, to poor Sicilian immigrants living in Chicago. He grew up in the ghettos and was street wise at an early age. A member of a gang called the "42's," Giancana was first convicted of car theft in 1925. Before he was 20, he was arrested in connection with three murders, including the slaying of Octavius Granady, a black who sought election as a committeeman. In 1932, he came to the attention of Paul "The Waiter" Ricca (real name: Felice DeLucia) who worked for the notorious Genna brothers. Giancana became the personal driver for Ricca, who took over the Chicago syndicate after the suicide of Frank Nitti in 1943. In 1944, Ricca went to prison for extortion and Anthony Accardo took over as Chicago's syndicate boss. Giancana became his chauffeur. Giancana helped Accardo consolidate the rackets and gambling operations in Chicago. In 1957, Giancana was one of those forced to flee from the ill-fated Apalachin meeting.

In 1960, when Accardo retired after an income tax evasion indictment, Giancana took over the syndicate. By 1963, Giancana had been arrested 60 times and had served time for burglary, auto theft and moonshining. He also was one of the wealthiest and most powerful men both in Chicago and in the syndicate. After the death of his wife Angeline in 1954, Giancana became well-known as a ladies man. He reportedly chased waitresses, dancers and secretaries.

While visiting Las Vegas in 1960, Giancana met Phyllis McGuire, the youngest of the McGuire Sisters singing group. According to Robert Blakey, chief counsel of the House Select Committee on Assassinations, McGuire had run up gambling debts of more than $100,000. Giancana - who along with Accardo secretly owned interests in the Desert Inn and the Stardust casinos although both were nominally owned by Morris "Moe" Dalitz - made good her debt. Soon afterwards, Giancana made his Las Vegas headquarters at the nearby Green Gables Ranch, which records showed had been leased by McGuire.

One story related in William Brashler's book "The Don" and repeated by Blakey tells of Giancana and McGuire being stopped by FBI agents during a stopover at Chicago in 1961. Angered when the agents tried to question McGuire, Giancana snapped:

"Whataya wanna know. I'll tell ya, I'll tell ya anything you wanna know."

"Tell us what you do for a living," said one agent.

Giancana replied:

"Easy, I own Chicago. I own Miami. I own Las Vegas."

When McGuire failed to return immediately from her separate interview, Giancana became enraged. He shouted at the agents:

"F-k you, F-k your boss, too. F-k your boss's boss. I'll get you for this. You lit a fire tonight that will never go out ... I'll get you!"

During the 1960 election, Giancana and other mob leaders apparently thought they had bought some relief from this growing government awareness and prosecution of the syndicate. In addition to meeting mob leader Joseph Bonanno in the winter of 1959, Kennedy reportedly received campaign contributions from the syndicate channeled to his father by singer Frank Sinatra. Yet another conduit for these funds may have been a beautiful woman with connections to both Kennedy and Giancana.

Ironically, evidence of these contributions to Kennedy was picked up by FBI phone taps which were part of an electronic surveillance program initiated by Attorney General Kennedy's war on crime.

But Giancana believed he had an even better hold on Kennedy - the beautiful dark-eye brunette named Judith Exner. Exner, going then as Judy Campbell, said she was introduced to John F. Kennedy on February 7, 1960, by Frank Sinatra, whom she had been dating. In her 1977 book, "My Story," she wrote that both John Kennedy and his brother, Edward, were sitting with Sinatra in the lounge of Las Vegas' Sands Hotel. She said she and John Kennedy met again a month later, this time alone and in the Plaza Hotel in New York where, according to Exner, they shared a bed. From that point on Kennedy was to see Exner on a regular basis. The pair exchanged telephone calls frequently, including some to the White House which were noted by the FBI.

Why the FBI? The Bureau had been monitoring the activities of Exner because of another man in her life - Chicago mob boss Sam Giancana. Exner claimed she was introduced to Giancana, again by Sinatra, a month after she had become Kennedy's lover. When Giancana discovered she was seeing the Democratic presidential candidate, he took an immediate and continuing interest in Exner. And soon Giancana - one of the top Mafia bosses in the nation - was bedding the paramour of the soon-to-be President.

In later years, Exner said:

"I feel like I was set up to be the courier. I was a perfect choice because I could come and go without notice, and if noticed, no one would've believed it anyway."

What passed between Kennedy and Giancana in this extraordinary triangle is not known, but in 1988, Exner revealed that she had acted as a courier carrying sealed envelopes for the two men on at least 10 occasions.

Given only a short time to live by her doctors, Exner said she wanted to set the record straight. She said she did not tell about the envelopes during 1975 testimony to the Senate Intelligence Committee because she feared for her life. She also claimed that she never opened the envelopes nor knew their contents. Most of her courier activities took place during the tough 1960 campaign and Exner speculated that her actions may have been connected with attempts to influence the critical West Virginia Democratic primary.

Once, after being questioned by FBI agents, Exner complained to Kennedy. She claimed Kennedy - by then President - assured her:

"Don't worry. They won't do anything to you. And don't worry about Sam. You know he works for us."

Kennedy continued to see Exner until a meeting with J. Edgar Hoover on March 22, 1962. It is now accepted that on that date Hoover revealed to the President the extent of Exner's ties with organized crime and the obvious fact the he knew about Kennedy's liaison with her. Shortly after Hoover left the White House, there was one more call sent to Judith Exner. No more were ever logged. Kennedy also broke off his friendship with Sinatra, perhaps suspecting that the singer had set him up.

But the worst was yet to come. Although still seeing Exner, Giancana became suspicious that Phyllis McGuire was seeing comedian Dan Rowan. Giancana asked his contact with the CIA, Robert Maheu, to place a wiretap on Rowan's telephone. This was done, using CIA personnel and equipment, but a maid discovered the tap and told Rowan, who brought it to the attention of the federal Government. The Justice Department initiated proceedings against Maheu for illegal wiretapping.

In May 1962, a month after the Kennedy-Hoover meeting apparently ended the President's relationship with Exner, Robert Kennedy was asked by CIA officials not to prosecute Maheu for fear that Giancana's role in the incident would become known. They reminded Kennedy that Giancana had played a role in the clandestine effort against Castro's government. Kennedy, thinking the plots against Castro had been stopped in 1961, was adamant about pressing the charges.

Then on May 7, CIA General Counsel Lawrence Houston finally told Kennedy the whole ugly truth - that the Agency had contracted with Giancana and John Roselli to murder Fidel Castro. According to Houston, Kennedy fixed him with a cold look and said:

"I trust that if you ever try to do business with organized crime again -with gangsters - you will let the attorney general know."

From that moment on, both Kennedys must have feared what Sam Giancana might reveal if he chose -the CIA-Mafia murder plots and Giancana's girl in bed with the President. However, this fear did not stop the younger Kennedy from going on with his war against targeted Mafia big shots, including Giancana.

The FBI haunted Giancana day and night, watching his home and trailing his car. It was most effective. Crime associates wouldn't come near and Giancana couldn't go where he pleased. He was effectively isolated.

In June 1963, Giancana caused chins to drop throughout the underworld by becoming the first mobster ever to go to court seeking an injunction against FBI surveillance. To gain the injunction required Giancana to swear in court that he was an honest businessman, which, in turn, would expose him to government cross-examination - an unprecedented hazard for a crime boss.

Giancana must have felt confident that the government would not question him too closely. And he was right. To a stunned courtroom, the U. S. Attorney announced that the government waived the right to cross-examination. The decision not to question Giancana had come straight from the attorney general. But while one effort against Giancana was deflected, the Kennedy Justice Department's all-out war against the underworld continued. The top crime bosses were incensed. Hadn't they contributed to Kennedy's election? Hadn't they help steal critical votes? Hadn't Kennedy dabbled with one of their women? It undoubtedly looked like double-cross to the mob chieftains. And in the underworld the only solution for a double-crosser is elimination - a "hit."

###

On November 22, 1963, Attorney General Kennedy met with about 40 of his organized crime and Racketeering Section staff. They had been meeting regularly for the past two and a half years. Interestingly enough, one of the young crime busters was G. Robert Blakey, who years later would become chief counsel of the House Select Committee on Assassinations created to investigate the murders of John and Robert Kennedy. Just before they broke for lunch, the last topic of discussion was Sam Giancana and political corruption in Chicago. The attorney general had just finished lunch at his McLean, Virginia, home when J. Edgar Hoover called to inform him:

"The President's been shot."

Kennedy never met with the organized crime and Racketeering Section again. With the death of John F. Kennedy, the war on crime was lost. Organized crime was ecstatic, but on FBI wiretaps, older and wiser mob leaders urged caution in speaking about the assassination. One was overheard explaining:

"...police spies will be watching carefully to see what we...think and say about this."

Such caution was certainly justified. In the years following the assassination, more and more attention has been drawn to the mob as one of the most likely suspects.

Beginning with Jack Ruby right on through to David Ferrie and Jim Braden (See AFTERMATH), crime figures keep cropping up throughout the assassination case. There now can be no question that organized crime had the means, motive and the opportunity to murder the President. But could the crime bosses have effectively covered their tracks without the help of highly-placed federal Government officials?

As powerful as organized crime had become, they could never have taken such momentous action as the assassination without assurance that the crime could not be traced back to them. They had to know that highly-placed protection existed. It now appears that the vocal wishes of the crime bosses to eliminate the Kennedys were echoed by certain powerful men in both government and big business.

G. Robert Blakey, chief counsel of the House Select Committee on Assassinations, pulled no punches on the cover of his book, "The Plot to Kill the President." The subtitle stated:

"Organized crime assassinated J.F.K."

Blakey once told this author:

"One reason no one realized organized crime's involvement (for many years) was that people never saw before...what was going on in Cuba. They failed to see the significance of men like Lewis McWillie and Russell Matthews (See JACK RUBY) (and) because they did not understand these men's connections."

Blakey said the House Committee's inability to prove the mob was not behind the assassination led him to conclude that it was involved. Asked if the fact that organized crime has been connected with the assassination only in recent years might suggest some control over the Government on the part of the mob, Blakey replied:

"That's conceivable...I would find that troubling, but no more so than the fact that they killed the man and got away with it."

Following his brother's death, Robert Kennedy appeared to lose interest in prosecuting the mob and the Justice Department staff seemed to follow suit.

By 1966, organized crime and Racketeering Section man-hour figures for days in court, in the field and before grand juries were half of those in 1963.

While there must have been the desire to maintain the loving-husband image of his dead brother, the cooling of the attorney general's passion for fighting the mob likely was due more to the revelations of CIA-Mafia assassination plots, an issue which affected national security. In fighting what the Kennedys had perceived as a great internal evil, they had once again found themselves confronted with a run-away intelligence agency - the CIA.

Crossfire: Mobsters Summary

Since its inception in the 1930s, organized crime or the national crime syndicate has gained an ever-increasing choke hold on the United States.

Attorney General Robert Kennedy, backed by his brother the President, waged war against organized crime as never before or since, causing great fear and hatred in the ranks of crime leaders. The simple statistics of the Kennedy Justice Department tell a story of a sincere, all-out war against "the enemy within." Every one of the major crime bosses - including the powerful Teamsters Union President Jimmy Hoffa - were reported to have issued threats against the Kennedys. What the Kennedys may not have known were the connections between the mob and U.S. intelligence agencies. These connections dated all the way back to Lucky Luciano and World War II.

Hoover's FBI had always taken a laissez faire attitude toward the syndicate, while the CIA actually had worked with crime figures in assassination plots. These CIA-Mafia assassination plots continued right up to Kennedy's assassination in Dallas. Considering the Kennedy war against the mob as well as its vital interests in Cuba lost to Castro and Kennedy's failure to militarily support the Bay of Pigs Invasion, mob bosses had more than enough motive to want the President dead.

If Judith Exner is to be believed, there were contacts between Kennedy and Sam Giancana during the 1960 campaign which may have led to Kennedy winning the Democratic nomination and the election. With Kennedy's support of Robert Kennedy's "war on crime" it must have looked like a double-cross to the mob.

There most certainly existed the opportunity to utilize intelligence contacts in an assassination plot.

Many assassination researchers, including House Select Committee on Assassinations Chief Consul Blakey, today believe that organized crime was responsible for Kennedy's death. But is the American public expected to believe that the mob could kill a President and the combine resources of the FBI, CIA, Secret Service, the military and the nation's police agencies could not discover that fact?

If American crime bosses ordered the assassination, they must have received some assurance of protection after the fact. And such assurance would have had to come from persons in high Government positions. Perhaps, in time, such connections between government leaders of the time and the mob will become more fully documented. Until such time, the American public is left with only tantalizing bits of information and common sense to suggest such complicity.

Crossfire: Agents

"(I will) splinter the CIA into a thousand pieces and scatter it to the winds."

President John F. Kennedy

Since the first conflicts of man, there has been a need for intelligence, or information on the activities and purposes of a perceived enemy. However, in modern America the growth of several intelligence organizations over the years has spawned an intelligence industry unparalleled in the history of the world. Going under acronyms such as CIA, DIA, NSA, ONI and others, these intelligence power bases have grown far beyond what their creators originally intended. The history of the Central Intelligence Agency - the most publicized of the spy agencies - reveals a government organization which quickly moved far beyond its intended purpose of merely collecting and interpreting intelligence.

In less than 10 years, this coordinating agency grew to include full-scale military operations, destabilization efforts in foreign countries and the assassination of national leaders - and an unholy alliance with organized crime. Today, it has become far removed from what was intended when the CIA was created in 1947.

At the end of World War II, President Harry S. Truman and others perceived a need for a coordinating intelligence unit. Information on a wide variety of issues and activities was then being handled by as many as a dozen various intelligence organizations, including those within the Army and the Navy.

This need was further reinforced by the Congressional Joint Committee on the Pearl Harbor Attack, which concluded that the fragmentation of U.S. intelligence prior to 1941 resulted in the Japanese taking this nation by surprise. The Committee recommended a unified intelligence service. This was not easy. None of the existing intelligence units wanted to relinquish power or authority.

During World War II, one of the organizations which proved most effective against the Axis powers was the Office of Strategic Services, headed by the colorful Gen. William "Wild Bill" Donovan. The OSS not only gathered a remarkable amount of information on the enemy, but also engaged in various covert activities. It was a rough and tumble wartime operation which provided the factual background for many a fictional spy novel or movie.

The OSS was closed down at the end of the war, and on January 22, 1946, just four months after the OSS closed shop, President Truman signed a directive creating the National Intelligence Authority (NIA) composed of the secretaries of state, war and navy as well as the president's personal representative. The operating arm of the NIA was the Central Intelligence Group (CIG), made up of veteran intelligence officers from the participating departments. These men were managed by a director appointed by the President. Since both personnel and funding came from the departments, this unit was nowhere near the autonomous intelligence organization originally recommended. To further limit the CIG, Truman specifically prohibited any clandestine or paramilitary activities. The CIG was to have "no police, law-enforcement or internal-security functions" nor conduct "investigations inside the...United States." The veteran spies and operatives of the old OSS were soon transferred to this new organization, operating under the designation of the Office of Special Operations (OSO). And these men of action were soon wanting more elbow room in their restricted world of intelligence gathering.

By 1947, the CIG's staff had grown to nearly 2,000, with about one third operating overseas. But it continued to be only one of several intelligence organizations. This was changed on September 15, 1947, when Truman signed the National Security Act, creating the National Security Council (NSC), the Air Force as a separate branch of the services and the Department of Defense uniting the Departments of the Army, Navy and Air Force. With little notice, this act also created the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA), giving the United States its first full-blown peacetime intelligence service.

In later years, Truman was to state:

"I never had any thought...when I set up the CIA, that it would be injected into peacetime cloak and dagger operations. Some of the complications and embarrassment that I think we have experienced are in a part attributable to the fact that this quiet intelligence arm of the President has been so removed from its intended role."

Under the National Security Act - passed in the heat of the growing anti-communist hysteria sweeping the United States - the CIA was responsible only to the National Security Council, which was headed by the President. This effectively gave the President absolute control over the new agency.

The CIA was given its own budget and the authority to hire and train its own personnel. Yet the same restrictions of the old CIG remained - no clandestine or paramilitary operations and no internal spying. However, a catch-all phrase had been included in the CIA's charter which stated the Agency could perform "such other functions and duties related to intelligence affecting the national security as the NSC may from time to time direct." Utilizing this phrase - and with the blessings of the National Security Council - the CIA in 1948 became active in suppressing communist influence in the national elections in Italy. It was the beginning of the Agency's career of meddling in the affairs of other nations.

In 1949, the Central Intelligence Act was passed, completing the Agency's secrecy. This act exempted the CIA from all laws requiring the disclosure of "functions, names, official titles, salaries and number of personnel employed by the Agency" and allowed the director to spend money from its secret budget simply by signing vouchers.

Now operating with secret funds and with the vague authority of "...other such functions and duties related to intelligence...", the CIA began to flex its muscles. Victor Marchetti, a former executive assistant to the CIA's deputy director, wrote:

"From those few innocuous words the CIA has been able, over the years, to develop a secret charter based on NSC directives and presidential executives orders, a charter almost completely at variance with the apparent intent of the law which established the Agency. This vague phrase has provided the CIA with freedom to engage in covert action, the right to intervene secretly in the internal affairs of other nations. It has done so usually with the express approval of the White House, but almost always without the consent of Congress, and virtually never with the knowledge of the American people."

By 1955, Allen Dulles was director of the CIA, now more than 15,000 strong not including thousands of foreign agents and contract employees. His brother, John Foster Dulles, was Eisenhower's secretary of state and together, the brothers set out to remake the world in the image they desired.

In addition to its enormous secret budget - often disguised as portions of other U.S. governments budgets - the CIA created a number of wholly or partly-owned properties, or "fronts," to provide cover for clandestine operations. These fronts included airlines, import-export companies, "high tech" firms, advertising agencies, foundations and many others. And these were not dummy businesses. In most ways they operated normally, generating additional money to fund Agency operations. Using such fronts, the CIA channeled money to academic, labor, youth, and cultural organizations. The Agency soon had agents or contacts in virtually every walk of American life.

Many foreign leaders - such as Jordan's King Hussein, Archbishop Makarios of Cyprus, Luis Echeverria of Mexico and Willy Brandt of West Germany - have been named as recipients of CIA funds over the years.

It has been charged that the CIA, whose leaders have been drawn from the highest circles of business and wealth in the United States, often has been more concerned with American big business investments than in true national security questions. For example, in 1953 the popularly-elected Prime Minister of Iran, Dr. Mohammed Mossadegh, whose government had nationalized the oil industry, was overthrown in a coup initiated by the CIA. The CIA man in charge of that operation was Kermit Roosevelt, who later became vice president of Gulf Oil. Gulf Oil benefitted greatly from the new Iranian political situation.

On June 18, 1954, a CIA-financed right-wing coup in Guatemala overthrew the popularly-elected government of Jacobo Arbenz, which had nationalized the property of United Fruit Company. Secretary of State John Foster Dulles' law firm had written the United Fruit contracts with Guatemala in the 1930s. Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs John Moors Cabot was a major United Fruit stockholder. And CIA director Allen Dulles had been president of United Fruit, while his predecessor as CIA director, Gen. Walter Bedell Smith, was soon to become a United Fruit vice president.

One reason for the CIA's success in becoming a world-class force was due to the relationship of its long-time director, Allen Dulles, with the Secretary of State, his brother John Foster Dulles. David Wise and Thomas B. Ross, authors of "The Invisible Government," wrote:

"Uniquely, they embodied the dualism - and indeed the moral dilemma - of United States foreign policy since World War II....Foster Dulles reflected the American ethic; the world as we would like it to be. While he took this position, his brother was free to deal with nastier realities, to overturn governments and engage in backstage political maneuvers all over the globe with the CIA's almost unlimited funds. He was, as Allen Dulles once put it, able to "fight fire with fire"...it was under Allen Dulles' stewardship that the CIA enjoyed its greatest expansion, particularly in the field of government-shaking secret operations overseas."

Activities at the CIA covered a wide range. Air Force Col. Edward Lansdale - whose activities on behalf of the CIA became so well known that a book and movie, "The Ugly American," were based on his experiences - once used the threat of vampires to break up guerrilla actions in the Philippines. After planting rumors that a vampire lived where the communist Huk was based, a CIA ambush team nabbed the last member of a Huk patrol and drained his body of blood after making two puncture marks in his neck. The superstitious Huk fled the area.

The creation of the U-2 spy plane, on the other hand, represented the awesome production and technical capability of the Agency. And during the time the Agency was expanding and initiating its activities across the globe, few Americans had even heard of the organization. This was certainly true at the time of the JFK assassination, which may explain why many people, in their Warren Commission testimony referred to "government agents" or "FBI men" when they may have meant CIA employees.

Texas researchers today have even located two witnesses at the Texas Theater who overheard plainclothes men identify themselves as CIA officers to Dallas police. Until recently, no one would believe their stories.

The Agency's anonymity was largely the product of a timid news media. Former CIA director William Colby wrote:

"The press, by and large, willingly accorded the CIA a privileged position among government agencies and refrained from inquiring into and reporting on its activities as a self-imposed act of patriotism."

"Patriotism" and "national security" were the watch words of the CIA and other intelligence organizations and were used effectively to keep secret a multitude of sins and questionable activities. Some CIA activities were clearly in violation of both the Agency's charter and United States laws. One Agency endeavor - the search for effective brain-washing and behavior-modification methods - is especially chilling.

Crossfire: Manchurian Candidates

It is well documented how Nazi rocket scientists were brought to the United States after World War II to become the leaders of the U.S. space program. Not so well known is how Nazi experimentation with mind control also was continued in America after the war. Although U. S. Judges at the Nuremberg War Crimes Trials sentenced seven German scientists to death for their part in human experimentation in the concentration camps, their research material was forwarded to the OSS and their work was continued.

With the creation of the CIA, this work became part of the Agency's behavior modification program, first called BLUEBIRD then later changed to ARTICHOKE. By 1954, the ARTICHOKE program was part of the CIA's Technical Services Staff (TSS), which also provided the Agency with weaponry, disguises, gadgets, forged documents and codes. ARTICHOKE teams usually consisted of a psychiatrist, a drug expert, a technician and a hypnotist, who sometimes posed as a polygraph operator.

The CIA was not alone in attempting to develop brain-washing techniques. The Navy in 1947 began a top secret program, named Project CHATTER, designed to develop a truly effective truth serum. Such programs to alter minds was the basis of a 1959 book by Richard Condon entitled, "The Manchurian Candidate." The book, later a movie which reportedly was one of John F. Kennedy's favorites, concerned an American soldier captured in Korea who is brainwashed into becoming a remote-controlled killer for the purpose of assassinating the President of the United States. On April 13, 1953, the CIA mind-control program - including "covert use of biological and chemical materials" proposed by Richard Helms and managed by Dr. Sidney Gottlieb - was authorized by director Dulles under the overall name MK-ULTRA. Under MK-ULTRA, the CIA went beyond mind-control experimentation to develop deadly toxins capable of killing without leaving a trace. One such toxin - botulinum - was later used in pills given by Agency officials to a mobster in the CIA-Mafia plots to assassinate Fidel Castro.

Also in 1953, the CIA, with Dulles' approval, spent $240,000 to purchase all of the LSD then available in the world. LSD (D-lysergic acid diethylamide) had been discovered by a Swiss doctor in 1943 and was believed to be a potential mind-control substance. Back in America, samples of LSD were later sent to various universities staffed by scientists on the CIA payroll. Some of these schools included the University of Minnesota, Harvard, University of Washington, Baylor University and the University of Maryland. Soon the "high" generated by the chemical was being experienced not only by the CIA-approved scientists, but by their assistants and their friends. It has since been acknowledged that the CIA initially was the catalyst behind the drug revolution which swept American college campuses in the 1960s. However, LSD did not accomplish what the Agency experts had hoped - a means to extract information and service from individuals. In fact, even staunch CIA officials who took the drug experimentally found their perceptions altered in unusual ways. Author John Marks, who made a major investigation into CIA mind-control experiments, quoted a CIA official who took LSD:

"...you tend to have a more global view of things. I found it awfully hard when stoned to maintain the notion: I am a U. S. citizen - my country right or wrong...You tend to have these good higher feelings. You are more open to the brotherhood-of-man idea and more susceptible to the seamy sides of your own society...I think this is exactly what happened during the 1960s, but it didn't make people more communistic. It just made them less inclined to identify with the U.S. They took a plague-on-both-your-houses position."

In one documented case, a CIA official named Frank Olson was given LSD without his knowledge by Gottlieb in 1953. Olson was driven psychotic by the drug and a few days later killed himself by crashing through a tenth-floor window of a Washington hotel. Olson's family was not told the truth about his death until 1975, when reports gathered by the Rockefeller Commission studying CIA abuses appeared in the news media.

Interestingly, one of the two CIA field stations which was involved in MK-ULTRA and had quantities of both LSD and other chemical mind-altering agents was Atsugi in Japan, the same station where Lee Harvey Oswald served as a Marine radar operator and apparently was mixed up in undercover operations.

Since the CIA has admitted that their most convenient source of mind-control guinea pigs were "individuals of dubious loyalty, suspected agents or plants, subjects having known reason for deception, etc.", the question has arisen if perhaps Oswald was part of the mind-altering program of the Agency.

In an article published in "Rolling Stone," the authors claim to have contacted a Marine from Oswald's unit who said he participated in some of the LSD experiments.

Furthermore, Judge Edward Gillin, then serving as an assistant district attorney in New Orleans, has told how a young man came to his office in the summer of 1963 and asked about a mind-altering drug. The young man wanted to know if use of the drug was legal. Surprised and puzzled, Gillin sent the man to the city chemist and thought no more about the incident. Then, on November 22, 1963, Gillin was shocked to learn that the man who asked about the drug was Lee Harvey Oswald. The exact nature of Oswald's relation to the CIA mind-control program - if there was one - will likely never be known. According to Marks, Gottlieb, upon his retirement from the Agency in 1973 and with the agreement of Helms, destroyed what they thought were the last remaining documents on MK-ULTRA. But some vestiges of the CIA's work survived, including one incident which suggests mind-control activity in connection with JFK's assassination.

In 1967, a 24-year-old Filipino named Luis Angel Castillo was arrested by Philippine authorities who believed he was conspiring to assassinate President Ferdinand Marcos. Under both drugs and hypnosis, Castillo revealed a more bizarre story which was detailed in author W. H. Bowart's book, "Operation Mind Control." Castillo claimed he was hypno-programmed to kill a man riding in an open car. He said he didn't know the man's identity but that the "hit" was to have taken place in Dallas, Texas, on November 22, 1963.

Under the treatment of a hypnotist, Castillo revealed many other things. He said that his real name was Manuel Angel Ramirez and that he was born in the Bronx, New York. He had no real memory of his childhood, except for a hazy memory of a father, whom he said was a high official of "the Agency."

Further, Castillo said he traveled under a variety of aliases and, at all times, had been under the control of a woman with a German accent named "Mrs. Kreps." At one point, Castillo said he had been a private in Castro's Cuban Militia and, at another, he claimed to be a sergeant assigned to the Strategic Air Command in South Vietnam. His hypnotist in the Philippines claimed to have discovered four levels of hypnosis-induced behavior in Castillo, which he termed "Zombie" states and came closer to the truth at each deeper level. In was in the fourth level that Castillo revealed his Ramirez identity and added that he had operated for the Special Operations Group of the CIA. Awakened, Castillo was dumfounded to learn of his "Zombie" identities. He grew agitated and said "Papa" didn't know about these "Zombie" states. Pressed for the identity of "Papa," Castillo said he was a real man who had a mustache and smoked a pipe. He said "Papa's" initials were A.D. and that his first name was Allen.

Castillo said in 1963, he had been taken to a tall building overlooking a street by his handlers, who gave him a rifle and told him to watch for a signal, then shoot a man riding in a motorcade.

However some time later, one of the men rushed into the room and said, "They got him already. Let's get out of here." As the men drove away, Castillo said he was given an injection and later woke up in a Chicago hotel room. Just after this Castillo said he learned that President Kennedy had been assassinated in Dallas.

After press accounts of Castillo's story appeared both in the Philippines and the United States, agents of the FBI arrived in Manila and a news blackout was dropped on the case. Later it was learned that Castillo had been spirited out of the Philippines following the hypnosis sessions.

According to some reports, Castillo was convicted of robbery and sentenced to six years in the Missouri Penitentiary in June 1971. He reportedly was released after serving 37 months and has since disappeared.

Neither the CIA nor the FBI has given any explanation of Castillo's remarkable story.

Since Oswald apparently voiced an interest in a mind-altering drug; since his killer, Jack Ruby, was to tell Dallas Police he had no recollection of shooting Oswald; since Sirhan Sirhan, the presumed assassin of Robert Kennedy still claims he can't remember what happened in the Ambassador Hotel and since a San Quentin psychologist, Dr. Eduard Simson, proclaimed that Sirhan had been "programmed" by drugs, hypnosis or both, the possibility of mind control in the JFK assassination - while admittedly unlikely - cannot be totally ruled out. But the techniques of using someone under mind control by drugs and hypnosis as an assassin or decoy in an assassination had not yet been perfected in 1963. It is more likely that conspirators at that time would have resorted to a less sophisticated method - they would simply have hired the mob.

###

For all the myths which have arisen about CIA prowess - communists and leftists throughout the world accuse the Agency of acting in the same way we have been told the Soviet KGB operates -the actual history of the CIA reveals as many glaring errors as victories. Agency analysts failed to foresee the 1967 Arab-Israeli War or the 1968 Tet Offensive in South Vietnam. They also failed miserably in appreciating the popular support enjoyed by Fidel Castro at the time of the ill-fated Bay of Pigs Invasion. Initiated by then-Vice President Richard Nixon and guided by CIA officers such as E. Howard Hunt, Tracy Barnes and David Phillips, the Bay of Pigs Invasion was to have been a crowning achievement of the Agency. Instead, the operation was a total fiasco, largely because President Kennedy maintained his long-standing position against the use of U. S. military support for the Cuban Brigade (See CUBANS). The failure at the Bay of Pigs caused many CIA officials to turn against Kennedy. Deputy CIA director Gen. Charles Cabell publicly branded Kennedy a "traitor."

Kennedy felt betrayed by the Agency for forcing the invasion on his fledgling administration -it occurred less than three months after he took office. He was quoted as threatening to "splinter the CIA into a thousand pieces and scatter it to the winds."

As late as November 1963, Kennedy aide Roger Hilsman quoted his boss as telling staff members:

"The CIA will have to be dealt with."

A pertinent point which arose in the heat of the Bay of Pigs debacle concerns the lack of control over the Agency and its operations. Against Kennedy's expressed orders, CIA officers landed on the beach with their Cuban protégés. Earlier, these CIA agents told the Cubans they should go ahead with the invasion even if Kennedy ordered it canceled at the last minute. This was "virtually treason," commented Robert Kennedy later.

One CIA officer deeply involved in the Cuban adventures, was William Harvey, who established and managed the CIA's now-famous "Executive Action" program - a program of calculated assassination code named ZR-RIFLE. Referring to Harvey's program, President Lyndon Johnson once commented:

"...we were running a damn Murder, Inc. in the Caribbean."

It is in this area - assassination plots - that the U.S. intelligence community in general, and the CIA in particular, have created serious suspicions in the minds of researchers regarding possible complicity in the death of President Kennedy.

Crossfire: CIA-Mafia Death Plots

On November 16, 1961, in an address to students of the University of Washington, President Kennedy said:

"We cannot, as a free nation, compete with our adversaries in tactics of terror, assassination, false promises, counterfeit mobs and crises."

However, even as Kennedy spoke, CIA officials were furthering assassination plans which involved an alliance with organized crime. These efforts began long before John Kennedy ever took office.

One aspect of the Bay of Pigs planning was to eliminate Fidel Castro prior to any invasion. This aspect, which was not mentioned when President Eisenhower approved a four-point Agency plan against Cuba on March 17, 1960, originated with the chief planner of the invasion, CIA Deputy Director for Plans Richard M. Bissell Jr. Bissell got the idea from Col. J.C. King, chief of the CIA's Western Hemisphere Division. In a memo to Allen Dulles which was passed along to Bissell, King had recommended "thorough consideration be given to the elimination of Fidel Castro." Both Dulles and Bissell approved the memo by initialing it. Later the claim was made that "elimination" did not necessarily mean assassination.

But King had no doubt what "elimination" meant. After being advised that a volunteer CIA agent in Cuba would soon be in personal contact with Castro's brother, Raul, the Agency sent a message to Havana stating:

"Possible removal top three leaders is receiving serious consideration at HQS."

So there wouldn't be any misunderstanding, the message went on to ask if the agent was willing to risk "arranging an accident" for Raul Castro and offered to pay $10,000 "after successful completion." The message was signed, "By direction, J.C. King."

A short time later, a second message came from CIA headquarters:

"Do not pursue. Would like to drop matter."

Apparently there was dissension within the Agency. But the matter was not dropped entirely. The Agency's Technical Services Division continued to devise exotic - and even laughable - ideas on eliminating Castro. Poison cigars, a depilatory to cause his famous beard to fall out and even a booby-trapped diving suit were considered. Finally it was Col. Sheffield Edwards, director of the CIA's Office of Security, who offered what seemed to be the most sensible plan - recruit members of the American underworld to kill Castro.

Bissell liked the idea. He reasoned the mob was sufficiently motivated by their lost revenues in Cuba to undertake such a mission and, by using organized crime, it would be difficult to trace the act back to the Agency. Bissell ordered Edwards to proceed and Edwards turned the job over to James O'Connell, the chief of his Operational Support Division and a former FBI man. O'Connell then contacted another former FBI man, Robert Maheu, who at this time headed Robert Maheu & Associates, a private investigation firm whose clients included recluse millionaire Howard Hughes. Another Maheu client was the CIA, which had been paying Maheu a $500-a-month retainer for jobs in which it "didn't want to have an agency person or a government person get caught."

According to Maheu, it was O'Connell who suggested contacting gangster Johnny Rosselli to ask "if Mr. Rosselli would be inclined to help in a program for removing Mr. Castro from the scene or eliminating him in connection with the invasion of Cuba." O'Connell also said to offer Rosselli $150,000. Maheu said he reluctantly agreed to the scheme because "we were involved in a just war."

After being contacted by Maheu, Rosselli was receptive to the scheme but agreed only after a face-to-face meeting with O'Connell to assure himself that "high government officials" indeed were behind the plan. Rosselli had started his crime career under Al Capone (See MOBSTERS) and had run the mob-owned Sans Souci casino in Havana prior to Castro's takeover. At this time, he was working for Chicago boss Sam Giancana (See MOBSTERS) running mob operations in Las Vegas and southern California.

By September 1960, there had been a number of top-level CIA conferences regarding Maheu's Mafia contacts - including at least one where Allen Dulles was present. Dulles never revealed these unsavory plots when he served as a Warren Commission member three years later.

On October 11, 1960, almost a month before Kennedy was elected President, Maheu and O'Connell met Rosselli in Miami's exclusive Fontainebleau Hotel, where the gangster introduced him to two associates, Sam Gold and Joe.

Only later did Maheu learn that Sam Gold was actually Rosselli's boss, Sam Giancana, while Joe was none other than Florida Mafia chieftain, Santos Trafficante Jr. (See MOBSTERS).

Rosselli, who was facing deportation by the U.S. government as well as being one of the Justice Department's organized crime targets, must have delighted in the overtures of the Agency. Sensing this partnership might ensure leverage with the federal Government, Rosselli had lost no time in bringing Giancana and Trafficante into the plot.

The FBI, which had begun eavesdropping on Giancana and Trafficante as part of Robert Kennedy's war on organized crime, now also was aware of CIA involvement with the gangsters.

Agency officials, particularly O'Connell, began to have second thoughts about hiring gangsters after they learned Giancana and Trafficante were involved. Plus, Giancana's personal use of a CIA wiretap backfired when it was discovered by a maid (See MOBSTERS). And in addition, Agency officials had learned of Judith Campbell Exner, who was dating both Giancana and Kennedy (See MOBSTERS). Nevertheless, the intrigues against Castro continued. Initially, Castro was to be shot down "gangland-style" by assassins hired by Rosselli and Giancana. But Giancana thought the idea too risky and asked for poison instead. O'Connell and the Technical Services Division obligingly provided him with pills containing a deadly toxin. However, the mob leaders failed to succeed in several attempts to place the pills in Castro's food. Rosselli and Giancana blamed their failure on their fearful and timid Cuban contacts. Others have suggested other reasons the plots failed.

In his memoirs, gangster Aladena "Jimmy the Weasel" Fratianno revealed that, from the mob's standpoint, the Castro plots may have been a hoax - a joke played out in an attempt to maintain favorable relations with a Government agency. According to Fratianno, he and Rosselli met three weeks after Kennedy's assassination. Asked if Castro may have been aware of the plots against him, Rosselli said no.

Fratianno asked:

"Why not? You've been at it three, four years. Something's got to leak in that time."

Fratianno claims Rosselli confided:

"Jimmy, I'm going to tell you something you won't believe. This whole thing has been a scam. Santos never did nothing but bullshit everybody. All these fucking wild schemes the CIA dreamed up never got further than Santos. He just sat on it, conned everybody into thinking that guys were risking their lives sneaking into Cuba, having boats shot out from under them, all bullshit."

Whether the assassination plans were real or a Mafia "scam," by the time of the Bay of Pigs Invasion Castro was still very much alive.

After the loss of the Cuban Brigade and the bureaucratic shake-up at CIA headquarters in Langley, Virginia, Bissell looked coldly at any continued activity with Rosselli and Giancana. Instead, he turned toward William Harvey and his internal "executive action" capability.

In the spring of 1962, Robert Kennedy, in the process of prosecuting Giancana, learned of the gangster's involvement with the CIA. He later told friends he had put a stop to such activities (See MOBSTERS). But such activities did not stop. After the failure of the Bay of Pigs, aggressive action against Castro's Cuban continued under the code-name MONGOOSE and the leadership of Robert Kennedy (See CUBANS). Even as late as January 1963, Harvey paid Rosselli $2,700 for expenses incurred by Rosselli's Cuban agents. While further attempts on Castro's life were planned within the Agency, this payment reportedly marked the end of the strange CIA-Mafia partnership.

###

In September 1963, CIA officers again tried to hatch an assassination plot against Castro -this time using a Cuban government official named Dr. Rolando Cubela. His CIA codename was AMLASH.

Some two years earlier, Cubela, a Cuban minister had contacted the CIA and offered to defect. The Agency had persuaded him to remain in place as a valuable means of inside information.

This time, meeting in a Sao Paulo, Brazil, safe house, Cubela startled his CIA contacts by offering to assassinate Castro if he had the support of the U.S. Government. This offer was sent to Desmond FitzGerald, a personal friend of Robert Kennedy and one of the CIA officials in charge of Operation MONGOOSE.

Despite cautions from CIA counterintelligence that Cubela might be a Castro agent testing U.S. Government intentions, FitzGerald ordered Cubela told that his offer to eliminate Castro was under consideration at the "highest levels." This strange story has been related in both "Legend: The Secret World of Lee Harvey Oswald" by Edward Jay Epstein and "The Kennedys" by John H. Davis.

Toward the end of October Cubela made an extraordinary demand. He wanted personal assurance that his plan to kill Castro was to be actively supported by the Kennedy administration. On October 29, again against the advice of counterintelligence, FitzGerald personally met with Cubela and assured him that once Castro was gone, the Kennedy administration would support a new Cuban government. But when Cubela asked for a rifle with telescopic sights and the means to deliver poison, FitzGerald declined to speak of such specifics. Another meeting with Cubela was set and on that day, the CIA case officer supplied Cubela with a poison ball-point pen. Cubela was told the rifle plus some explosives would be delivered to him soon. Cubela received his assassination tools from the CIA on November 22, 1963.

Although no documentation of the AM/LASH plot has survived, some senior CIA officials now claim that the plot did have the support of both Robert Kennedy and his brother. Since both are now dead, there's no real way to be sure.

It was the knowledge of AM/LASH, however, which caused consternation among CIA officials when Castro made certain public statements concerning assassination plots. While attending a reception in the Brazilian Embassy in Havana, Castro told an Associated Press reporter:

"Kennedy is the Bastista of our time and the most opportunistic President of all time."

Castro went on to warn against "terrorist plans to eliminate Cuban leaders" adding:

"United States leaders should think that if they assist in terrorist plans to eliminate Cuban leaders, they themselves will not be safe."

This warning has for years been used to support the theory that somehow Castro had learned of the CIA plots against him and, in retaliation, sent assassins after Kennedy.

But since Cubela was not caught by Castro until 1966, it is unlikely that AM/LASH was the impetus of his 1963 remarks.

While the CIA MONGOOSE program continued in Florida, similar operations were being conducted in New Orleans, long a hot bed of Cuban exile-CIA activity. One of the centers of this activity was the shabby, three-story office building at 544 Camp Street, a connecting point for the CIA, FBI, anti-Castro Cubans and Lee Harvey Oswald.

Crossfire: New Orleans

Within days of the assassination of Kennedy, the FBI questioned David Ferrie in New Orleans. Ferrie denied any knowledge of the assassination and the FBI agents let him go, apparently unaware of Ferrie's Civil Air Patrol connection to accused assassin, Lee Harvey Oswald (See OSWALD), or to New Orleans crime boss Carlos Marcello (See MOBSTERS). Neither apparently did the agents know that Ferrie had been working for Detective Guy Banister in the summer of 1963 (See G MEN).

Whatever information Ferrie gave the FBI will never be known, since the interview was classified and locked away on orders of J. Edgar Hoover. In 1976, the National Archives reported that the original statement of Ferrie was missing from its collection of assassination documents.

It was Ferrie's connections to Oswald which set New Orleans District Attorney Jim Garrison on the trail of an assassination conspiracy (See THE GARRISON INVESTIGATION). Both Banister and Ferrie were well-connected with the Cuban exiles living in New Orleans.

Ferrie, as a contract agent for the CIA, claimed to have flown hazardous missions into Cuba, including landing there on the night of the ill-fated Bay of Pigs Invasion. Ferrie's role as CIA agent was confirmed in 1975 when former executive assistant to the CIA's deputy director, Victor Marchetti, stated that during high-level CIA meetings in 1969, CIA director Richard Helms disclosed that Ferrie and other figures in the Garrison investigation had indeed worked for the Agency.

Garrison made it plain that he had found links to the CIA throughout his assassination investigation. At one point, Garrison stated:

"A number of the men who killed the President were former employees of the CIA involved in its anti-Castro underground activities in the New Orleans area...The CIA knows their identity. So do I."

One such man connected with Banister, Ferrie and the anti-Castro Cubans was Sergio Archaca Smith. Smith created the Crusade to Free Cuba, an organization to raise money in the Anglo community. Banister was one of this group's incorporators.

Another group formed by Smith was the Friends of Democratic Cuba (FDC). The FDC, according to Smith's public relations man Ronnie Caire, doubled as "an undercover operation in conjunction with the CIA and FBI which involved the shipment and transportation of individuals and supplies in and out of Cuba."

These Cuban groups were in contact - and likely received guidance from - the Cuban Revolutionary Council (CRC) which was created by CIA officer E. Howard Hunt as part of the Bay of Pigs operation. The CRC maintained offices at 544 Camp Street until the spring of 1963, shortly before the arrival of Lee Harvey Oswald.

After the Bay of Pigs, Smith wrote to Capt. Eddie Rickenbacker, then chairman of Eastern Airlines, Ferrie's employer. After praising Ferrie's work for the CRC, Smith asked that Ferrie be granted a leave of absence "so that the work at hand can be completed." This became unnecessary when Eastern fired Ferrie in 1963 for homosexual conduct, despite the objections of Carlos Marcello's top lawyer and two U.S. Congressmen.

Ferrie officed with Banister at 544 Camp Street - the same address used on some of the "Fair Play for Cuba Committee" material handed out in New Orleans by Oswald.

Banister's secretary, Delphin Roberts, told the House Select Committee on Assassinations in 1978 that her boss operated a network of agents with CIA funding. She claimed two of these agents were Oswald and Ferrie. Roberts recalled Ferrie vividly. She told author Anthony Summers:

"Many times when he came into the office he used the private office behind Banister's, and I was told he was doing private work. I believe his work was somehow connected with the CIA rather than the FBI..."

Banister investigator Jack Martin and others have told investigators through the years of contact between CIA contract agent Ferrie and Oswald during 1963. He said he suspected that Ferrie "had taught Oswald how to purchase a foreign-made firearm..."

According to Beverly Oliver, the "Babushka Lady" (See THE CROWD), Oswald and Ferrie were even seen together in Jack Ruby's Carousel Club shortly before the assassination.

Roberts also claims that Oswald and Ferrie were together. She said on one occasion, Ferrie even took Oswald to an anti-Castro guerrilla training camp outside New Orleans "to train with rifles."

Once, according to Roberts, she saw Oswald handing out pro-Castro literature on a New Orleans street. Reporting this to her boss, Banister reassured her, "He's with the office."

She later said:

"I knew there were such things as counterspies, spies and counterspies, and the importance of such things."

The day after Kennedy's assassination, Secret Service agents went to 544 Camp Street after seeing the address on some of Oswald's pamphlets. Guy Banister's office was closed. They learned that "Cuban revolutionaries" had officed there and that Sergio Archaca Smith signed their checks. But Smith had moved to Texas and the CRC office was closed.

The agents brushed the whole thing off by reporting that they hadn't found a trace of the Fair Play for Cuba Committee at 544 Camp Street.

###

Throughout 1963 the CIA continued to work with anti-Castro Cubans and others such as Ferrie and Banister, who were in contact with Lee Harvey Oswald.

Considering all this, as well as Oswald's bizarre military record and his trip to Russia, one must consider if the ex-Marine was working in intelligence.

Crossfire: Was Oswald a Spy?

After reviewing all available evidence, the answer to the above question seems to be a resounding "Yes."

The following is a quick look at some of the evidence pointing to Oswald's involvement with spy work:

- His childhood - a bright loner who read a wide range of books and was drawn to unpopular ideas, attracted by spy stories (The TV show "I Led Three Lives for the FBI" and Ian Fleming's James Bond novels were among his favorites) - perfectly fits the profile of persons most desired for intelligence work.
- His attempt to join the Marines while underage shows a patriotic streak, a highly desirable attribute in intelligence operatives.
- Oswald's Marine career is checkered with inconsistencies and unexplained events which suggest secret intelligence training (See OSWALD).
- His assignment to Atsugi base in Japan, which housed a large CIA facility.
- Oswald's incredible ability with the Russian language. Several Russians, including his wife, said he spoke like a native, yet this high-school dropout reportedly taught himself Russian from books.
- The fact that several persons - including a former CIA paymaster, Oswald's Marine roommate and fellow Marine Gerry Patrick Hemming - have stated that Oswald worked for U.S. intelligence.
- The manner in which Oswald traveled so easily in and out of Russia as well as the unaccounted-for funds he used suggests intelligence guidance.
- The ability of this American "defector" to leave the Soviet Union with his Russian-born wife at a time when most Russians were being denied exit permits.
- The ease with which this would-be defector obtained passports both in 1959 and 1963.
- The fact that Oswald wrote a lengthy report on his activities in Russia and, later, made a detailed report to the FBI concerning his Fair Play for Cuba activities in New Orleans.
- Oswald's notebook contained the word "microdots," a common spy technique of photographically reducing information to a small dot.
- Oswald's non-binding "defection" to Russia fit perfectly the profile of an Office of Naval Intelligence program to infiltrate American servicemen into the Soviet Union during the late 1950s.
- One of Oswald's closest contacts, George DeMohrenschildt, was himself an intelligence operative, first for the Nazis and later for the CIA (See REDNECKS AND OILMEN).
- There is evidence that Oswald may have had sources of income not accounted for by his sporadic employment record. His 1962 income tax form was classified for a number of years.

One of the strongest pieces of evidence for Oswald's involvement in spy work concerns a small Minox camera found among his effects by Dallas Police.

Information developed by the "Dallas Morning News" in 1978 revealed the camera was not available to the public in 1963. It may have been spy equipment issued to Oswald. This evidence was so explosive that the FBI tried to get Dallas detectives to change their reports regarding the camera and also kept photos taken by Oswald hidden for nearly 15 years.

Dallas Detectives Gus Rose and R.S. Stovall reported finding the Minox camera loaded with film in Oswald's Marine seabag in the home of Michael and Ruth Paine hours after the assassination. The three-inch-long German-made camera was famous for being used by spies on both sides during World War II. An inventory of Oswald's property taken from the Paine home was made on November 26, 1963. Listed under item 375 was "one Minox camera." This inventory list was witnessed by FBI Agent Warren DeBrueys, the FBI man in New Orleans who had been assigned to monitor Oswald during the spring and summer of 1963.

Later however, the FBI property inventory listed item 375 as a "Minox light meter."

Detective Rose told the "Dallas Morning News":

"They (the FBI) were calling it a light meter, I know that. But I know a camera when I see it...The thing we got at Irving out of Oswald's seabag was a Minox camera. No question about it. They tried to get me to change the records because it wasn't a light meter. I don't know why they wanted it changed, but they must have had some motive for it."

The motive may have been that the existence of the camera pointed to Oswald's intelligence connections.

"Dallas Morning News" reporter Earl Golz contacted Minox Corporation and spoke to Kurt Lohn, formerly in charge of Minox distribution in New York City. According to Lohn, the serial number of the camera found in Oswald's belongings - number 27259 - did not exist among any Minox cameras distributed for commercial sale in the United States. Lohn said all Minox cameras distributed in the U.S. carried six-digit serial numbers beginning with number 135000. Number 27259 was "not a registered number...not a valid number," said Lohn. Golz also determined that Minox did not sell a light meter in the U.S. in 1963.

A later FBI report stated that a Minox III camera was obtained on January 31, 1964, from Ruth Paine and that it belonged to her husband who worked for Bell Helicopter. However, Mrs. Paine told Golz she did not remember being asked to turn over such a camera.

Michael Paine reportedly also had a Minox camera but it was damaged and "unworkable."

The Dallas detectives both claimed to have found a Minox camera in Oswald's possessions. The FBI later claimed no such camera existed and that they had actually found a Minox light meter.

Yet in 1979, acting on a Freedom of Information Act request by an assassination researcher, the Bureau released about 25 photographs and stated they were taken with a Minox camera belonging to Oswald. Michael Paine was unable to recall taking any pictures such as the ones released by the FBI.

On Page 113 of a book published by Dallas Police Chief Jesse Curry in 1969 is a photograph of Oswald's property taken from the Paine home. Clearly pictured is various Minox camera equipment, included a binocular-type telephoto lens.

Where did Oswald get an unregistered Minox "spy" camera? More importantly, why did the FBI attempt to have Dallas police change their reports to indicate a light meter was found rather than a camera?

In 1976, a CIA document was released which showed that the Agency indeed considered Oswald for recruitment. This contradicted the sworn Warren Commission testimony of CIA official Richard Helms who stated the Agency never had "or even contemplated" any contact with Oswald. This document, written by an unidentified CIA officer three days after Kennedy's assassination states "we showed intelligence interest" in Oswald and "discussed...the laying on of interviews."

Then there are the questions concerning a CIA "201" file on Oswald discovered only in 1977. Many persons knowledgeable with the Agency equate a "201" file with a personnel file, implying Oswald had worked for the CIA.

In 1977 the issue of an Oswald "201" file came to light after a Freedom of Information Act request was pressed by assassination researchers. CIA officials told the House Select Committee on Assassinations that the Agency's file on Oswald was nothing unusual and merely reelected that Oswald had "potential intelligence or counterintelligence significance." However, at least three former CIA officers have stated publicly that the mere existence of a "201" file on Oswald indicated a relationship between the ex-Marine and the Agency. Victor Marchetti, formerly an executive assistant to the CIA's deputy director, said:

"Basically, if Oswald had a "201" file, he was an agent."

Bradley E. Agers, a CIA officer who trained anti-Castro Cubans:

"(A "201" file meant Oswald was)...either a contract agent, working for them full time, or he was on some kind of assignment for the CIA."

Former CIA agent Patrick McGarvey:

"If a guy has a "201" file, that means he's a professional staff employee of the organization."

The CIA went to great lengths to convince the House Committee that its having a "201" file on Oswald - and the fact that this information was kept secret for nearly 15 years - was in no way suspicious.

The Committee, however, found many problems with the Oswald "201" file. For example, Oswald's file reportedly was opened on December 9, 1960, yet a confidential State Department telegram reporting Oswald's attempted defection to Russia - cause enough to open a file on him - was sent to the CIA back on October 31, 1959.

Other problems with the Oswald file are that one CIA employee gave a reason for an "AG" code on the file which was at variance with the official Agency explanation; the "201" file was under the name "Lee Henry Oswald" leading the Committee to wonder if dual files were kept (a suspicion the CIA denied); and one CIA memo indicated as many as 37 documents were missing from the Oswald file although Agency officials later claimed they were only missing at the time the memo was written.

Further, a recently obtained CIA document states that Oswald's "201" file filled "two four-drawer safes," yet the House Committee was given a virtually empty folder.

The whole question of Oswald's connection to U.S. intelligence is so full of claims and counterclaims, deceit and misinformation, it is unlikely the whole truth of the matter will ever be known.

What is known - or at least believed by most people who have studied the issue at any depth - is that the weight of the evidence suggests that Oswald indeed was in some way connected with U. S. intelligence work.

###

Even the FBI apparently believed that Oswald may have been involved in spy work. In a report dealing with Oswald's possessions taken from the Paine home in Irving, FBI laboratory personnel listed the items - which included shoes, socks, a pair of cotton gloves, towels, shirts, soap, office supplies and toiletries - then stated:

"Nothing was noted...which would indicate that these specimens would be particularly useful in the field of espionage."

This report went on to state that all of the items were checked carefully, but unsuccessfully, for microdots, a common method of concealing spy information. There has been no explanation why the Bureau was so concerned about such spy methods at a time when its official position was that Oswald was only a malcontented loner.

While at the time of the JFK assassination, the official story was that no U.S. Government agency had been interested in Oswald or knew of his whereabouts, it is now known that both the CIA and the FBI were keeping a close watch on the ex-Marine's activities.

Oswald's alleged trip to Mexico City between September 26 and October 3, 1963, is a case in point. According to the Warren Commission, Oswald was in Mexico City for the purpose of visiting the Soviet and Cuban embassies. Proof of these visits were in the form of the statement of a Cuban Embassy employee, Silvia Duran, and from CIA operatives monitoring the Soviet Embassy.

On October 10, 1963, more than a month before the JFK assassination, the CIA sent a teletype to the State Department, the FBI, immigration authorities and the Department of the Navy regarding the "possible presence of Subject (Oswald) in Mexico City."

The teletype message stated:

"On October 1, 1963, a reliable and sensitive source in Mexico reported that an American male, who identified himself as Lee Oswald, contacted the Soviet Embassy in Mexico City...The American was described as approximately 35 years old, with an athletic build, about six feet tall, with a receding hairline...It is believed that Oswald may be identical to Lee Harvey Oswald, born on 18 October 1939 in New Orleans, Louisiana."

Obviously, this description did not match the 23-year-old, 5'- 9", slender-built Oswald in Dallas.

The Warren Commission, seriously concerned about the ties between Oswald and the Soviets and Cubans in Mexico City, asked the CIA for documentation of Oswald's activities. After months of foot-dragging, the Agency could only provide the unsupported statement of Duran as proof that Oswald was at the Cuban Embassy.

Then on January 22, 1964, the CIA leaked to Commission members that Oswald had contact with a KGB officer, Valeriy Kostikov, while in the Soviet Embassy. The Agency said Kostikov's responsibilities included "assassination and sabotage" (See RUSSIANS). This possible link between Oswald and a KGB assassination plot so frightened Commission members that they were content to take the CIA's word for Oswald's Mexico activities.

Not shown to the Warren Commission was a cable sent by the director of the CIA to its station in Mexico City urging the secret arrest of Silvia Duran on the day after the assassination. Duran, a 26-year-old Mexican national, had been employed at the Cuban Embassy only one month before Oswald allegedly arrived in Mexico. Her predecessor had been killed in an odd automobile accident.

The CIA cable regarding Duran's arrest, only declassified in recent years, stated:

"Arrest of Silvia Duran is extremely serious matter which could prejudice U.S. freedom of action on entire question of Cuban responsibility...With full regard for Mexican interests, request you ensure that her arrest is kept absolutely secret, that no information from her is published or leaked, that all such info is cabled to us, and that fact of her arrest and her statements are not spread to leftist or disloyal circles in the Mexican government."

In a 1978 article, Mark Lane concluded:

"This almost incredible cable reveals the extent of CIA control over Mexican police officials, many of whom had been trained by the CIA, and many of whom were engaged by the CIA while they ostensibly worked for the Mexican government. The CIA's willingness to order Mexican police officials to make false statements to their own superiors and to mislead the "circles in the Mexican government" provides an insight into the CIA's desperation to secure some evidence to prove...that Oswald had gone to the Cuban Embassy."

Apparently the statements which Duran gave to the Mexican authorities were not to their liking. She was not released for several days and only after she had identified Oswald as the man who visited the embassy.

Once free, Duran began to speak of her experience. This prompted yet another CIA cable, which ordered CIA personnel to have Duran rearrested, but to conceal who was behind the action. A portion of this cable stated:

"...to be certain that there is no misunderstanding between us, we want to insure that Silvia Duran gets no impression that Americans are behind her rearrest. In other words we want Mexican authorities to take responsibility for the whole affair."

Duran was rearrested and did not speak of her experiences afterward. She was never interviewed nor called as a witness by the Warren Commission, which never learned of her two arrests and seemed content to take the CIA's word for Oswald's Mexico activities.

Since the Oswald in the Cuban Embassy apparently made quite a scene when told he could not get a visa to Cuba in three days - he shouted and called the embassy personnel "bureaucrats" -he should have been well remembered by Duran and others there. But in 1978, Cuban Consul Eusebio Azcue told the House Select Committee on Assassinations that he was convinced the man who visited the embassy in 1963 was not the Oswald arrested in Dallas.

After viewing photos of Oswald, Azcue stated:

"My belief is that this gentleman was not, is not, the person or the individual who went to the consulate."

Duran - perhaps due to her experience in the hands of the police - has maintained over the years that the man was Oswald. However, in 1979, author Anthony Summers arranged for Duran to watch films of Lee Harvey Oswald.

Duran, who admitted that her identification of Oswald was more from the name than from the fuzzy newspaper photos printed at the time, watched the Oswald films and concluded:

"I was not sure if it was Oswald or not...the man on the film is not like the man I saw here in Mexico City."

To add to Duran's confusion, she recalled the man who visited the consulate was short, no more than 5'-6" in height - far shorter than the 5'-9" Dallas Oswald.

One story which surfaced in recent years had the Mexico City Oswald attending a party hosted by Duran's brother-in-law, Ruben Duran. This allegation came from Mexican author Elena Garro de Paz. Although Duran recalled such a party, she denied that Oswald was ever there. A State Department report in 1969 described Garro as "a professional anti-communist," while her associates in Mexico claimed she had connections with U.S. intelligence.

Could the CIA have arranged for Garro's story, much as CIA case officer "Maurice Bishop" tried to get Antonio Venciana to have relatives in Mexico claim they saw Oswald at the Cuban Embassy for money? (See CUBANS)

While the CIA stated that both the Cuban and Soviet embassies were under photographic surveillance during the Oswald's visits, they could offer no proof. Lamely, CIA officials explained to the Warren Commission that the camera at the Soviet Embassy was turned off on Saturdays (the day Oswald supposedly was there) and that the camera at the Cuban Embassy just happened to break down the day Oswald was there. However, the day of the assassination, CIA officials sent photos taken outside the Soviet Embassy in Mexico City to the FBI, claiming they were of Oswald. They are obviously of someone else. This someone does appear to be about 35 years old, six feet tall with an athletic build.

Questioning the photos, the FBI reportedly showed one of them to Oswald's mother who said she had never seen the man depicted before. Later she claimed the photo was that of Jack Ruby (See OSWALD).

CIA officials admitted there had been a "mix-up" on the photos, but never submitted photographs of the real Oswald nor explained the identity of the man they photographed as Oswald.

The House Select Committee on Assassinations noted that Oswald allegedly made at least five trips to the two embassies and found it hard to believe that he was not photographed even once. The committee expressed the belief that "photographs of Oswald might have been taken and subsequently lost or destroyed."

The absence of any photos of Oswald at the embassies raises even further suspicion that an impostor was posing as Oswald during these embassy visits. Further evidence of this comes from an episode involving tape recordings.

In 1976, at the onset of the House assassinations investigation, CIA officer David A. Phillips, one of the Bay of Pigs organizers (See CUBANS) who at the time of Oswald's alleged visit was stationed in Mexico City.

Phillips told the House committee's general counsel that the CIA had tape-recorded conversations between Oswald and the Soviet Embassy but had not informed the Warren Commission about this. When pressed on why the tapes, clear proof of Oswald's Mexican visits, had not been given to the Warren Commission, Phillips said they had been routinely destroyed about a week later since prior to the assassination Oswald was not considered important. However, long after Phillip's 1976 testimony, a five-page FBI document dated November 23, 1963, became public which throws doubt on Phillips' story. According to this report, which was kept from the Warren Commission, FBI agents who were questioning Oswald in Dallas were informed by CIA officers that Oswald had contacted the Soviet Embassy in Mexico City. It went on to state:

"Special agents of this Bureau, who have conversed with Oswald in Dallas, Texas, have observed photographs of the individual referred to above and have listened to a recording of his voice. These special agents are of the opinion that the above-referred-to individual was not Lee Harvey Oswald."

This FBI report, if correct, means the CIA wiretap tape of Oswald was not destroyed in October but was available to Bureau agents the day after the assassination. When then were the tapes destroyed and by whom?

It can now be seen why this FBI report was not shown to the Warren Commission or the American people for nearly 20 years. The FBI agents - and obviously the CIA - knew that the voice on the tape was not Oswald's.

One speculation for all this is that the CIA wanted the Warren Commission to believe that Oswald was in touch with the KGB assassination chief, Valeriy Kostikov, in Mexico City - the implications of this connection being so monstrous that commission members would be forced to keep quiet about Oswald's contacts in the interest of national security. To accomplish this, however, required positive proof that Oswald had visited the Soviet Embassy in Mexico City. The CIA had no such proof, since both the photographs and tape recordings indicated an impostor rather than the real Oswald.

So CIA agents fabricated such evidence, first by the arrest and intimidation of Silvia Duran and then by issuing the October report to the FBI and State Department.

The disturbing aspect of this is that either the CIA notified other agencies in October that Oswald was in Mexico City not knowing the man was an impostor, then failed to follow up on their mistake later. Or - more ominously - the Agency knowingly participated in a scheme to place Oswald in Mexico City at that time - nearly two months BEFORE the assassination!

It is equally disturbing that the House Select Committee on Assassinations made a 300-page report on these mysterious happenings in Mexico City, then failed to put it into its published report claiming it was withheld to protect "sensitive sources and methods" of the CIA.

Another Mexico incident, which has been misreported for years, concerns a note from Oswald to a "Mr. Hunt."

Crossfire: A Message from Oswald

In August 1975, JFK researcher Penn Jones Jr. received a typewritten letter in Spanish from Mexico City signed only with the initials "P.S." Translated, the letter reads:

"Dear Sir:

At the end of last year I gave Mr. (Clarence) Kelly, the director of the FBI, a letter from Lee Oswald. To my understanding it could have brought out the circumstances to the assassination of President Kennedy.

Since Mr. Kelly hasn't responded to that letter. I've got the right to believe something bad might happen to me, and that is why I see myself obligated to keep myself away for a short time.

Convinced of the importance of that letter mentioned and knowing that you have been doing some investigation independently of the assassination, I'm sending you a copy of the same letter."

Accompanying this typed letter was a copy of a handwritten note in English dated November 8, 1963 which reads:

"Dear Mr. Hunt,

I would like information concer(n)ing my position.

I am asking only for information. I am suggesting that we discuss the matter fully before any steps are taken by me or anyone else.

Thank you,

Lee Harvey Oswald"

Jones too sent this information to the FBI and he too received no reply.

Later, a reporter for the "Dallas Morning News" obtained a copy of the Oswald note from Jones. He had three handwriting experts in Dallas compare the note to known examples of Oswald's handwriting. The experts all agreed that the handwriting was the same.

The "Dallas Morning News" carried an accurate account of the strange note and raised the question if "Mr. Hunt" might refer to Dallas oilman H.L. Hunt. In 1983, it was learned that the FBI studied the note with the idea it may have been intended for Hunt's son, Nelson Bunker Hunt. The results of the FBI probe, however, have never been made public.

Jones, then and now, points out that note came from Mexico City and that allegedly CIA officer E. Howard Hunt, who was in charge of anti-Castro Cubans at the time (See CUBANS), was stationed there at the time of Oswald's reported visit.

Jones told this author:

"To me, knowing Hunt's background with the Cuban Revolutionary Committee and the CIA, it makes more sense that the note is addressed to E. Howard Hunt."

But since neither the FBI nor the House Select Committee on Assassinations appears to have taken an interest in the note, there the matter rests - except for some very strange news media handling of this story.

After the Oswald note story had been published in Texas media, "Newsweek" picked it up. In its March 7, 1977, Periscope section, "Newsweek" told the story in one paragraph containing no less than seven factual errors. "Newsweek" stated:

"A typewritten letter (it was handwritten), dated two weeks before the 1963 murder of John F. Kennedy and allegedly written by assassin Lee Harvey Oswald (since he never got a trial, he is only an ACCUSED assassin) to the late Texas oil baron H. L. Hunt (simply not true), has turned up as the focus of a new investigation by Justice Department and FBI experts (who have never publicly mentioned the note). It was given to the government by an assassination "buff" (Penn Jones was a respected publisher in the Dallas area for many years), but officials will divulge no other details of its origin. Ambiguously worded, it has Oswald referring to "marching orders" and suggests links between the two men, but Justice is "more than skeptical" about it. The fact that it has appeared only now, one source commented, prompts doubts that "it could be anything more than another example of the dementia that affects some people looking for a conspiracy." The FBI is reported to be checking to see whether the letter matches a typewriter that Oswald could have used (the note was handwritten)."

The misinformation contained in this one paragraph suggests more than just sloppy journalism. But then the media's deficiencies regarding the JFK assassination are legion.

The fact that the Oswald note and its accompanying letter came from Mexico City leads assassination researchers to believe that Oswald's brief visit to that Latin city could provide a key to understanding who was really behind the assassination.

####

Yet another contact with the CIA which has only become known in recent years involves a man who "coincidentally" obtained the Mexican travel permit number just before Oswald's - William George Gaudet.

When applying for a new passport in June 1963, Oswald did not try to hide his past nor his intentions. On the application, he acknowledged he might travel to Russia and other European countries later that year. He also noted that his previous passport had been canceled. Despite these admissions - coupled with the fact that the State Department, which lent him money to return from the Soviet Union, knew of his attempted defection and threat to give military secrets to the Soviets - Oswald received a new passport within 24 hours.

On September 17, a week after the alleged meeting between Oswald and CIA case officer "Maurice Bishop" (See CUBANS), Oswald visited the Mexican consulate in New Orleans and applied for a tourist card. He was issued card number 24085, which was valid for 15 days.

After the assassination, the FBI, with the help of Mexican authorities, identified every person who had applied for Mexican entry papers on September 17 - all but one. The FBI reported they could not locate the record of the card holder immediately preceding Oswald, NO. 24084.

However, in 1975 - apparently due to a bureaucratic mix-up in declassifying FBI documents - it was learned that card holder No. 24084 was Gaudet, who had worked for the CIA for more than 20 years.

In later years during a television interview, Gaudet said:

"The CIA may have felt that it would be better that any reference to my contact with Oswald be removed."

Gaudet claimed it was sheer coincidence which placed his name just ahead of Oswald on the Mexican tourist card application sheet.

Gaudet, who worked in the area of Latin American for the Agency, operated the "Latin American Newsletter" for a number of years.

Shortly after the assassination, Gaudet said he was interviewed by FBI agents, but only after obtaining approval of his CIA boss in New Orleans. No record of that interview has been made public.

In a 1978 interview with author Anthony Summers, Gaudet admitted he had "known" Oswald in New Orleans, but then qualified this by saying he had only observed Oswald handing out leaflets. However, then and in other interviews, Gaudet acted as though he had actually met with Oswald.

"He was strange man, an unusual man," was Gaudet's description of Oswald to TV newsmen.

Gaudet did firmly state that while in New Orleans, Oswald was in contact with known CIA and FBI agents. Gaudet told Summers:

"I do know that I saw him one time with a former FBI agent by the name of Guy Banister."

He also mentioned David Ferrie. "He was with Oswald..." said Gaudet.

Gaudet described Cuban exile leader Sergio Archaca Smith as "a vital person" and added:

"I know he knew Oswald and knows more about the Kennedy affair than he ever admitted."

Gaudet, angered by the revelation of his name being connected to Oswald, went on to say:

"I've given this a lot of thought. I am now convinced in my own mind that those who are truly behind the conspiracy to kill Mr. Kennedy have done things purposely to draw attention to me. There are too many coincidences that involve me, unless someone was behind all this."

Gaudet said he did not accompany Oswald on a bus to Mexico, but went by air. He now claims he cannot remember if his 1963 Mexican trip involved intelligence activity.

Gaudet said through his experience with the CIA, he is not surprised that little information concerning Oswald's intelligence activities has been forthcoming. He said:

"They (CIA officials) told me frankly when I did things for them that if something went awry they would never recognize me or admit who I was. If I made a mistake, that was just tough, and I knew it."

The former CIA operative went on to say he finds it "extremely possible" that Oswald was working for some American intelligence agency and added:

"I think he was a patsy...I think he was set up on purpose."

Gaudet also agreed with many assassination researchers who believe that the anti-Castro Cubans were involved in a plot to kill Kennedy. However, asked by newsmen if he thought the Cubans could have carried out an assassination alone, he replied:

"No, I don't think so."

But if Gaudet did not actually accompany Oswald to Mexico, one very strange and suspicious man did - Albert Osborne. Although the passenger list for Continental Trailways bus No. 5133 which allegedly carried Oswald to Mexico City is missing, the FBI managed to locate some of the travelers, including two Australian girls who told of a conversation with a man who told them of his experiences in the Marines and in Russia. These girls told the FBI that the man also had sat next to and talked at length with an older man.

FBI agents tried to locate a man named John Howard Bowen, who had been on Oswald's bus. However they only found Albert Osborne, but Osborne seemed to know a lot about Bowen. After three visits from the FBI, Osborne finally admitted that he was the man they were seeking, having used the alias "John Bowen" for many years. He denied ever having met Oswald. Even the gullible Warren Commission didn't buy that, stating "his denial cannot be credited."

Osborne claimed to be a missionary who traveled extensively all over the world, although he never said how these travels were financed. Also, no confirmation of his story could be found by checking border records in the countries he claimed to have visited.

Despite his lies to the FBI regarding his name, no charges were ever brought against Osborne.

In recent years, several assassination researchers have claimed that Osborne worked for the CIA, but no hard evidence of this has been established. It is interesting to note, however, that when Oswald ordered "Fair Play for Cuba Committee" materials printed in New Orleans, he used the name "Osborne."

Other intriguing connections between the CIA and the JFK assassination concern George DeMohrenschildt and the Mannlicher-Carcano rifle found in the Texas School Book Depository.

Crossfire: DeMohrenschildt and the Agency

George DeMohrenschildt, along with his wife, Jeanne, were identified by the Warren Commission as the people closest to Lee Harvey Oswald just before the assassination. If there was anyone guiding Oswald's activities during late 1962 and early 1963, it would have been DeMohrenschildt (See REDNECKS AND OILMEN). DeMohrenschildt's son-in-law, Gary Taylor, even told the Warren Commission:

"...if there was any assistance (to Oswald) or plotters in the assassination that it was, in my opinion, most probably the DeMohrenschildts."

DeMohrenschildt undoubtedly is one of the most colorful and suspicious of all the persons connected to Oswald. Based on CIA memos now available thanks to Freedom of Information Act suits, it is known that DeMohrenschildt had a relationship with the Agency dating back to OSS days. In one memo by former CIA director Richard Helms, it states that DeMohrenschildt applied to work for the government as early as 1942, but was rejected "because he was alleged to be a Nazi espionage agent." It was a charge which had some substance. After a trip to Yugoslavia with his wife in 1957 (They were shot at by guards of Marshal Tito), DeMohrenschildt provided the CIA with "foreign intelligence which was promptly disseminated to other federal agencies in 10 separate reports," according to the Helms memo. Another Agency memo indicted DeMohrenschildt also furnished lengthy reports on travels he made through Mexico and Panama at the time of the Bay of Pigs Invasion.

Asked by a Warren Commission attorney if he believed the DeMohrenschildts may have been spying on the invasion preparations, Taylor replied, "Yes."

In fact, at the time DeMohrenschildt was befriending Lee Harvey Oswald, one of his close friends in Dallas was J. Walter Moore. Moore just happened to have been an agent of the CIA's Domestic Contacts Division. DeMohrenschildt publicly stated that before becoming involved with Oswald, he had checked with Moore. Moore, according to DeMohrenschildt, said unhesitatingly:

"Yes, he's okay. He's just a harmless lunatic."

Privately, DeMohrenschildt indicated a closer relationship between both Moore and Oswald.

In a CIA memorandum written not long after Oswald returned from Russia, the CIA author wrote:

"Don't push too hard to get the information we need, because this individual (Oswald) looks odd."

Much later it was learned how the CIA was to "debrief" Oswald - by using the genial George DeMohrenschildt. Author Edward Epstein interviewed DeMohrenschildt on the morning of March 29, 1977. That same morning, an investigator from the House Select Committee on Assassinations had attempted to contact DeMohrenschildt. Three hours later DeMohrenschildt was dead due to a shotgun blast to the head. His death was ruled a suicide, but questions remain (See REDNECKS AND OILMEN).

According to Epstein, DeMohrenschildt said Moore encouraged him to see Oswald and that, in fact, he was to question Oswald "unwittingly" about his stay in Russia. DeMohrenschildt said, after his first meeting with the ex-Marine, Oswald gave him a lengthy memo covering his activities in Russia.

DeMohrenschildt, a petroleum engineer, and Moore officed in the same Dallas bank building and often ate lunch together, according to Jeanne DeMohrenschildt.

DeMohrenschildt also told the Warren Commission that he had cleared his contact to Oswald with Fort Worth attorney Max Clark. Clark, who had married a Russian princess during World War II, was connected with defense security at Fort Worth's General Dynamics plant in 1963.

The CIA memos, Moore's closeness and DeMohrenschildt's own testimony all confirm that a certain relationship existed between the CIA and the man closest to Oswald in early 1963. While this does not necessarily involve the Agency in a plot to kill Kennedy, it raises significant questions about what Agency officials might have known regarding such a plot.

In a related issue which belies the idea set forth in 1963 that the CIA was neither aware of Oswald nor interested in him, it is now known that the Agency was opening Oswald's mail while he was in Russia.

In letters to his mother, Marguerite Oswald, written in 1976 by former CIA legislative counsel George L. Cary, Cary admitted that the Agency had opened mail from her to her son while he was in Russia. Cary said the admission was a result of an investigation into the CIA's mail intercept program - known as HT-Lingual - by the government information and individual rights subcommittee of the House Government Operations Committee.

Another possible connection between the CIA and the JFK assassination concerns a former Agency operative named Robert D. Morrow. In his book, "Betrayal," former CIA operative Robert D. Morrow tells how he purchased four 6.5 mm Mannlicher-Carcano rifles on orders from a CIA superior. Morrow remains convinced that at least one of these rifles ended up in the hands of Dallas Police on November 22, 1963.

Morrow even presents a plausible, though unproven, account of the assassination:

"Oswald, who went to Russia for the CIA and was an FBI informant by the summer of 1963, was brought into an assassination plot led by CIA consultant Clay Shaw, using right-wing CIA operatives and anti-Castro Cubans headed by Jack Ruby in Dallas and Guy Banister in New Orleans. This group, operating outside Agency control, manipulated events to insure Oswald being named as the assassin. They also used an Oswald lookalike to incriminate the ex-Marine by firing shots from the Texas School Book Depository. Dallas Policeman J.D. Tippit was killed by this Oswald substitute when he failed to go along with the group's scheme to have Tippit kill the real Oswald in the Texas Theater. With the capture of Oswald, Ruby was compelled to stalk and finally kill the accused assassin."

The Mannlicher-Carcano ammunition also raises questions about CIA involvement. According to FBI documents, the 6.5 mm ammunition found in the Texas School Book Depository was part of a batch manufactured on a U.S. Government contract by Western Cartridge Corp. of East Alton, Illinois, which is now a part of Winchester-Western Division of Olin Industries.

In the mid-1950s, four million rounds of this ammunition was purchased by the Marine Corps, prompting the author of the FBI document to state:

"The interesting thing about this order is that it is for ammunition which does not fit and cannot be fired in any of the United States Marine Corps weapons. This gives rise to the obvious speculation that it is a contract for ammunition placed by the CIA with Western Cartridge Corporation under a USMC cover for concealment purposes."

It is well known that the CIA had used "sanitized" weapons - that is weapons which cannot be traced directly back to the Agency or the United States - in various missions around the world .

Obviously the Agency must have ammunition for the weapons it delivers to the various groups it supports. And while this whole issue is admittedly inference, it is based on knowledgeable information suggesting that the 6.5 mm ammunition used to kill Kennedy originally came from the CIA.

Most of the information available suggesting links between the assassination and the CIA is circumstantial - which is hardly surprising. After all, Agency officials could hardly be expected to reveal information connecting them to the death of the President. However, at this time there can be little doubt that many persons connected to Oswald also were connected to the CIA - David Ferrie, Guy Banister, Carlos Bringuier and other anti-Castro Cubans. Some knowledgeable persons - such as former CIA operative Morrow and others - claim these CIA people were operating outside of Agency control.

One strange incident involved an intelligence operative named Gary Underhill, who had served in World War II and was considered one of the top U.S. experts on limited warfare. At the time of the assassination, Underhill performed "special assignments" for the CIA and was on close terms with officials of both the Agency and the Pentagon. Several days after the assassination, Underhill visited friends in New Jersey. He was badly shaken and fearful. He said that President Kennedy had been killed by a small group within the CIA and that he believed his life was in danger. A short time later, reports have it that Underhill was found fatally shot in his Washington apartment. His death was ruled suicide although he was shot in the left side of the head and a pistol was found in his left hand - and it was well known that Underhill was right-handed.

There is some evidence - the suspicious activities of the Agency in Mexico City; Morrow's purchaser of Mannlicher-Carcano rifles and the ZR/RIFLE program which may have included the French criminal Christian David, for example - which suggests a foreknowledge of the assassination within the CIA.

Even Kennedy's successor once voiced suspicion of the spy agency. According to the "Washington Post," Marvin Watson of President Johnson's White House staff in 1967 confided to an FBI official who wrote that:

"(Johnson) was now convinced there was a plot in connection with the assassination.

Watson stated the President felt that the CIA had something to do with this plot."

Naturally, the CIA has long maintained innocence in the assassination and the House Select Committee on Assassinations concluded that, while the Agency was "deficient in its collection and sharing of information both prior to and subsequent to the assassination," the CIA was not involved. Many researchers today are not as certain as the House Committee. However most agree that the CIA - as a Government agency - most probably did not plan nor authorize Kennedy's death.

Crossfire; The French Connection to the Assassination

There is also a real possibility that the assassins who killed Kennedy may have had no direct link with Oswald and his Cuban contacts at all. This intriguing possibility - which could go far in explaining why none of the trails leading backward from Oswald seem to connect firmly with the shooting in Dealey Plaza - became apparent several years ago with the revelation of a French connection to the assassination.

The House Select Committee on Assassinations concluded in 1979 what most Dealey Plaza witnesses said in 1963 - that at least one gunman fired on Kennedy from the Grassy Knoll. While the committee said it could not identify the Grassy Knoll gunman, that second gunman may well have been a premier French assassin with close contacts to the CIA, organized crime and even an oblique connection with Jack Ruby. According to recently uncovered evidence by a California writer, more than one French assassin may have been operating in Dealey Plaza.

Central to this point is CIA Document No. 632-796, which was released by the Agency in 1977 along with more than 3,000 other documents. These documents were pried from the Agency by a Freedom of Information Act suit filed by Washington attorney and JFK assassination researcher Bernard Fensterwald. A poor quality reproduction with numerous blanked out spaces, the document was painstakingly deciphered by veteran Dallas researcher Mary Ferrell.

Dated April 1, 1964, the CIA document carries a handwritten title stating, "Jean Souetre's Expulsion from U.S."

The half-page document reads:

"8. Jean SOUETRE aka (also known as) Michel Roux aka Michael Mertz - On March 5, (1964) the FBI advised that the French had (withheld) the Legal Attache in Paris and also the (withheld) had queried the Bureau in New York City concerning subject, stating that he had been expelled from the U.S. at Fort Worth or Dallas 18 hours after the assassination. He was in Fort Worth on the morning of 22 November and in Dallas in the afternoon. The French believe that he was expelled to either Mexico or Canada. In January he received mail from a dentist named Alderson...Subject is believed to be identical with a Captain who is a deserter from the French Army and an activist in the OAS (a right-wing French militant group). The French are concerned because of DeGaulle's planned visit to Mexico. They would like to know the reason for his expulsion from the U.S. and his destination. Bureau files are negative and they are checking in Texas and with the INS (Immigration and Naturalization Service)..."

And the government did check - first with the dentist, who was still practicing in Houston, Texas, in the 1980s.

Dr. Lawrence M. Alderson told researchers that FBI agents began watching him in early 1964. He said finally agents contacted him and said they were trying to find the Frenchman "under any circumstances under any conditions."

Alderson said:

"They felt that Jean knew who, or he himself had, assassinated Kennedy. And they wanted to know who in Washington had had him flown out of the Dallas. And, to my knowledge, nobody ever found out or nobody knew."

Alderson said he had not seen the Frenchman since serving as a security officer with him shortly after World War II. He confided that he was working for the CIA at the time.

The dentist gave the following information about the Frenchman, Jean SOUETRE (pronounced Sweat-ra):

"He's a career soldier. From what I can gather, he was in the French underground movement in Algiers. I do know he left the French Air Force...I believe he was in the Fourth French Air Force Headquarters in France. He was a very prominent and upcoming French security officer. When I knew him, he was a lieutenant...I lived with him so I knew him quite well. He was very well educated, very outgoing, forward, dynamic. He came from a very poor family. In France, you don't have a thing if you're from a poor family unless you have a military career behind you. So, he was very interested in his career and this is why I never did really understand why he left it. But, he very definitely life, I presume, his wife. I have not heard from her in many years. She was a well-to-do, beautiful woman from a Southern France wine family. The last I heard from her, she was the one who told me that he had left the French Army and had gone underground trying to save Algeria. So, evidently, he was rather committed, or felt committed, to leave his career, which was the only career he had. The next time I heard of him, quite truthfully, was when the CIA, or the FBI rather, had me tailed for about two months following the assassination...The last contact I had with the CIA was in France when I was working for them. So, the only contact I had in this country was with the FBI."

Alderson, after providing a snapshot of his French friend, said Souetre in the early 1950s was about 25 years old and spoke English, Spanish and German without a trace of an accent. He was about 6'1" tall and weighed about 175 pounds. Souetre was a "sharp dresser," seldom seen in uniform and had the reputation of being a "ladies man," Alderson said.

In 1963, Houston was the only Texas city with flights outside the United States. A later FBI report stated there were no direct flights from Houston to Canada. However, at the end of the FBI report, it stated that three persons named John Mertz, Irma Rio Mertz and Sara Mertz flew from Houston to Mexico City on November 23, 1963, according to records of Pan American World Airways. The FBI report concluded:

These records contain no further identifying data regarding these individuals.

Although Souetre could have flown out of the country by private or even military aircraft, it is interesting to note the coincidental departure of the Mertzses at a time corresponding to that in the CIA document.

After all, even the FBI report noted that Souetre also was known as Michel Roux and Michael Mertz.

Today, it is known that Roux and Mertz are the names of two real individuals, both of whom were connected to the shadowy world of intelligence work.

The name "Mertz" crops up in the 1974 Pulitzer Prize winning investigative book, "The Heroin Trail," compiled by the staff of Newsday. According to this book, Michael Victor Mertz was a World War II French Resistance hero and a captain in the French secret service after the war. Mertz operated in Germany, Turkey and Morocco under the cover of his military title. In April 1961, Mertz was ordered to penetrate the terrorist group, Organization se Armie Secrete (OAS). Posing as an OAS sympathizer, Mertz was arrested later in 1961 for distributing pro-OAS leaflets and sent to an internment camp. There he worked his way into the highest levels of the OAS and was able to break up a bomb plot against Charles DeGaulle.

However, security work was not the only activity in which Mertz became involved. Even before saving DeGaulle, Mertz had become one of France's biggest heroin smugglers, according to Newsday, which cites numerous French police and court records.

It is known in intelligence circles that DeGaulle often turned his back on drug smuggling, particularly if it involved people he was indebted to for their work against either the Nazis or the OAS.

One of Mertz' contacts in both heroin smuggling and the French secret service was a man named Christian David, a petty hoodlum who had escaped a French prison and later was recruited into French intelligence for use against the OAS. According to Newsday and other knowledgeable sources, David was one of the men involved in the 1965 murder of Moroccan opposition leader MehdiBen Barka. Barka was opposing Moroccan strongman General Oufkir and French authorities wanted him out of the way.

In 1972, this murder - which is still officially unsolved - was brought up when David was arrested in Brazil and charged with being a member of a smuggling ring which had imported more than 1,000 pounds of heroin into the United States over a three-year period.

Breaking under torture by the Brazilian police, David said he had been paid $150,000 for his part in the Barka killing. He told how Barka had been lured to Paris by telling him a film company wanted to make a movie of his life. In Paris, Barka was arrested by two members of the French narcotics squad, then turned over to secret service agents including David. He was taken to a private home where he was killed, his body burned and then buried in lime.

After this arrest in Brazil, David was extradited to the United States and sentenced to 20 years in prison for heroin smuggling. He didn't stay there long.

In 1975, when the Senate Intelligence Committee began looking into the CIA's "Executive Action" program, David was suddenly ordered extradited back to France and was quietly taken out of the country.

Researchers believe this sudden move was due to what David might have told the Senate committee.

The committee was especially concerned with the Agency's "Executive Action" program because it was established for the purpose of committing assassinations. The program was part of the operational arm of the CIA's Technical Services Division and was code-named ZR/RIFLE. Former CIA director Richard Helms spoke at length about ZR/RIFLE to the committee. Two members of the ZR/RIFLE team were identified by Helms only by their CIA cryptonyms -WI/ROUGUE and QJ/WIN. According to evidence gathered by the committee, WI/ROUGUE was a French Corsican, a stateless soldier of fortune and a criminal. This man approached QJ/WIN and attempted to recruit him into the CIA's assassination program. Although it was never learned if this recruitment effort was successful, there is evidence that it was.

In declassified CIA notes concerning the ZR/RIFLE project, it states:

"4. Operational assets:

(1.) Personnel: QJ/WIN is under written contract as a principal agent, with the primary task of spotting agent candidates. QJ/WIN was first contacted in (deleted by CIA), in conjunction with an illegal narcotics operation into the United States. For a period of a year and a half, he was contacted sporadically by CIS Lucien Conien (who later became chief of foreign intelligence for the Drug Enforcement Agency) on behalf of the Bureau of Narcotics. Files of this bureau reflect an excellent performance by QJ/WIN."

Helms said this about QJ/WIN:

"If you needed somebody to carry out murder, I guess you had a man who might be prepared to carry it out."

Until the Senate hearings, the ZR/RIFLE program with its agents, WI/ROUGUE and QJ/WIN, were among the CIA's most closely-guarded secrets. Several separate sources familiar with both intelligence operations and drug smuggling, claim that WI/ROUGUE and Christian David are one and the same. This claim is further supported by David's own admission of intelligence associations and by his convenient extradition to France just as the Senate committee hearings got underway.

And based on the association of David and Mertz coupled with their descriptions and backgrounds which match those of the CIA agents, it is not mere speculation to suggest that QJ/WIN was Michael Victor Mertz, who also used the name Jean Souetre.

If this isn't complicated enough, QJ/WIN even had a tenuous connection with Jack Ruby - in the person of Thomas Eli Davis III.

Tom Howard, Ruby's first attorney (See CONVENIENT DEATHS), asked his client if there were any persons the prosecution might produce who could be damaging to Ruby's defense of momentary insanity. Ruby unhesitatingly came up with the name "Davis" (See JACK RUBY). Ruby said Davis had first approached him about using some of Ruby's strippers in pornographic movies, but that later the two had become involved in gunrunning activities. The FBI told the Warren Commission they could not locate such a person. However the CIA did - and still does - have a classified file on Thomas Eli Davis III.

Veteran newsman Seth Kantor details Ruby's connection to Davis in his book, "Who Was Jack Ruby?" Born to a respectable Texas rancher couple on August 27, 1936, Davis was discharged from the Army in 1958 and attended the University of Michigan until he was asked to leave for failing to make his grades. In June, 1958, Davis entered a Detroit bank and handed a teller a note which threatened her life if she didn't give him money. According to the teller, Davis then said, "I can't do it. I can't do it" then threw his $1,000 take on the floor. Davis fled from the bank only to be caught by police a block away. Because of his family's good reputation and no previous criminal record, Davis was given a five-year probated prison sentence. While on probation, Davis obtained passport No. D236764, issued by the State Department on January 31, 1963, in New Orleans, a feat almost impossible for a convicted felon without highly-placed and powerful help. Davis' ensuing activities took him into the murky world of anti-Castro gunrunning and it was here Davis met Ruby.

Ruby told his attorney that Davis had come to one of his nightclubs and that he had intended to go into the gun running business with Davis on a regular basis. However, apparently Davis' activities were not limited to dealing with Cuban gun runners.

At the time of the Kennedy assassination, Davis was in North Africa, allegedly setting up a deal to supply arms to the OAS.

Less than a month later, he was jailed in Tangiers in connection with the assassination.

His wife told authorities that her husband was a soldier of fortune, who had operated in such diverse countries as Indonesia, Algeria and Cuba and in the months prior to his arrest, they had traveled through London, Paris and Madrid.

According to correspondence between J. Edgar Hoover and the State Department, Moroccan security police detained Davis "because of a letter in his handwriting which referred in passing to Oswald and the Kennedy assassination."

Kantor wrote that evidence showed Davis was freed from jail through the efforts of QJ/WIN, "the code name given by the CIA to an unsavory foreign agent with a network of Mafia contacts." Here could be the connection, not only between Davis and the CIA, but between Davis and Mertz (if indeed Mertz was QJ/WIN).

Through early 1963, Davis had contact with the anti-Castro Cubans, as confirmed by his wife and family. And he not only was in New Orleans during the same time as Oswald in the summer of 1963, but once admitted to reporter George Carter that he had used the name Oswald while in North Africa.

Based on similar statures, ages, and features, many researchers today believe that Davis may have posed as Oswald in the months leading up to the assassination.

For example, recall the story of Sylvia Odio (See CUBANS), who told of a visit by three anti-Castro operatives shortly before the assassination. Her description of "Leon Oswald" varied from that of Oswald only in that the man she met had a faint mustache. As far as can be determined, Oswald had no such mustache at the time - but Davis did, according to an FBI report of an investigation four months prior to the Odio incident.

Neither the Warren Commission nor the House Select Committee on Assassinations chose to investigate the Davis story. Whatever information Davis had was carried to his grave.

Former Wise County, Texas, Sheriff Eldon Moyers said in September 1973, Davis was attempting to steal copper wire from a construction site when he cut into a 7,000-vote power line and was electrocuted.

Through his connection to QJ/WIN, Davis certainly was in the right circles to be involved in assassination attempts.

According to testimony given to the Senate Intelligence Committee, QJ/WIN's boss on the ZR/RIFLE team was the CIA's William Harvey. Harvey's specialty was anti-Castro activities in general and the attempts to assassinate Castro in particular (See AGENTS). Harvey, of course, was in contact with Johnny Roselli and Florida Mafia Chief Santos Trafficante (See MOBSTERS).

A reporter from Dallas once queried the FBI about Jean Souetre and his presence in Dallas in 1963 and was told that man was not Souetre, but another Frenchman named Michel Roux, whose name just happened to coincide with one of Souetre's aliases. However the Bureau, who could find nothing concerning Souetre/Mertz/Roux in 1964, could not offer any substantiating documents to support their story about the Souetre namesake.

At the heart of this labyrinth of intelligence and mob intrigue is QJ/WIN, who appears to have been Michael Victor Mertz.

Souetre today has been located, working as the public relations director for a French casino. He denied any inside knowledge of the assassination. However he also denied knowing Alderson, although Alderson had a photograph of himself and Souetre together. Souetre did suggest that Mertz, an old enemy, may have been in Dallas using his name.

Virgil Bailey, an inspector for the Immigration and Naturalization Service, has told Texas researchers he remembered being ordered to pick up a Frenchman in Dallas at the time of the assassination. Bailey complied, but today cannot recall the man's name. However, Bailey described the Frenchman to researcher Gary Shaw as a man about 45 years old with thin, graying hair.

In 1963, Souetre was about 35 years old and Roux was about 25. Mertz, the agent connected to both intelligence and worldwide organized crime, was about 45 years old.

The answers to questions raised by the French Connection to the Kennedy assassination lie in locked files in Washington. But some assassination researchers feel the other gunman in Dealey Plaza just might have been the Frenchman known to the FBI as Michel Roux, to the French authorities as Jean Souetre, to the CIA as QJ/WIN and to the international crime syndicate as Michael Victor Mertz.

Further evidence of the French Connection to the assassination came in 1988 when Los Angeles author Steve J. Rivele revealed that he had the names of the French assassins who participated in Kennedy's assassination. Rivele claimed that after several years of investigative work he had learned the names of three French gangsters who killed Kennedy. He cited one source for his information as the imprisoned Christian David. Rivele said David claimed to have been offered a contract to kill JFK by the chief of the Marseilles Mafia, Meme Guerini. The three hitmen were Sauveur Pironti, who today still lives in Marseilles; Lucien Sarti, who was killed in Mexico in 1972; and a man named Bocognoni, who is believed to be living in Central or South America.

According to Rivele's sources, Sarti wore a police uniform and fired from behind the wooden picket fence on the Grassy Knoll (See THE GRASSY KNOLL). Pironti and Bocognoni reportedly fired on Kennedy from a nearby building - either the old Dal-Tex Building or perhaps the Dallas County Records Building. Pironti, questioned by European newsmen after Rivele's book, "The Murderers of John F. Kennedy" was published in France in 1988, denied any involvement. His denial was supported by French military authorities who said Pironti was serving at a sea post at the time of the assassination. However, later investigation failed to substantiate this alibi.

According to Rivele, David and another mobster, Michel Nicoli, claimed that Lee Harvey Oswald played no part in the assassination.

Reportedly, the three assassins - Pironti, Sarti and Bocognoni - were hired to kill Kennedy by the French Union Corse - the European branch of the international crime syndicate - on orders from organized crime figures in America. The trio of hitmen flew to Mexico where they were met at the Texas border by some Chicago mobsters who drove them to Dallas. After the assassination, the trio remained in a "safe house" for more than a week and then were flown out of the country.

Interestingly enough, when Rivele approached U.S. Government officials with David's story, he was put in touch with Lucien Conein - the same man who was working with QJ/WIN, the shadowy CIA "asset." Conein, known in Vietnam as "Black Luigi," often bragged about his connections with the Union Corse. It seems Conein was made an honorary member of this branch of the Sicilian Mafia after serving with Corsican partisans as an officer in the OSS and the French Foreign Legion.

It was Conein who, at the urging of Nixon aide Charles Colson, implicated President Kennedy in the assassination of Vietnam's Diem by suggesting to newsmen that Kennedy knew in advance of the plot to overthrow Diem, a charge which today is considered fraudulent by most researchers and historians.

Asked to comment on the French Connection to Kennedy's death, James H. Lesar, vice president of the Assassination Archives and Research Center in Washington, D.C., said:

"I think that it's sufficiently serious that the Department of Justice and the U.S. Secret Service should investigate it further."

Today it appears that no such investigation has been forthcoming, the U.S. media has paid little attention to Christian David's admissions and Rivele reportedly has gone into hiding after receiving death threats.

Crossfire: Agents Summary

There is little question that by the time of the Bay of Pigs invasion the Central Intelligence Agency was running out of control. It had gone far afield from the quiet, intelligence-gathering and coordinating agency envisioned when created in 1947 by President Truman.

Documented CIA abuses included the overthrow of governments, secret mind-control experiments on unsuspecting victims and assassination plots - all wrapped in a blanket of "national security" secrecy with any information given out strictly on an individual "need-to-know" basis.

As evidenced by the Yuri Nosenko affair (See RUSSIANS) and the on-again, off-again anti-Castro MONGOOSE program, there appears to have been serious divisions within the CIA in the early 1960s.

While some factions undoubtedly supported President Kennedy and his programs, others did not disguise their hatred toward him.

The CIA had become highly compartmentalized. Often CIA employees working on one project would have no idea that people they came into contact with also were working for the Agency. And the Agency - for expediency - employed and used some very unsavory characters - such as David Ferrie.

Thus it is entirely possible that Lee Harvey Oswald may have played some role in an Agency operation - without the knowledge of both the Agency and himself.

There can be little doubt that many persons in contact with Oswald also were in contact with the CIA.

These contacts, plus the abundant evidence that Oswald was involved in intelligence work, raises serious questions about who may have been maneuvering Oswald in the fall of 1963.

However, it seems highly unlikely that the CIA, as an organization, initiated the assassination of Kennedy.

This, however, does not preclude the possibility that persons within the CIA may have played roles in an assassination conspiracy which later compelled their superiors and peers to cover up for fear that such connections might become public.

The possibility also exists that all of the Agency intrigues involving Oswald, Ferrie and the Cuban exiles were only so much window dressing to draw attention away from the real assassins - French "hitmen" hired by the American mob with money and promises of protection from highly-placed sources within the U.S. Government.

Crossfire: G-Men

"They (the FBI) have tried the case and reached a verdict on every aspect."

Warren Commissioner Senator Richard Russell

Anyone making a serious study of the JFK assassination must take a long hard look at the FBI and the Secret Service. The former - as we now know - monopolized the investigation of the tragedy while the latter failed to prevent it.

The contacts between accused assassin Lee Harvey Oswald and the FBI are many and troubling. No less than seven FBI agents were associated with Lee Harvey Oswald during the year and a half between his return from Russia and the assassination.

In 1964, there was even the serious allegation that Oswald was working for the Bureau at the time of the assassination - a charge which the FBI emphatically denied. While the Bureau has been especially sensitive when it comes to the JFK assassination, it also has been unintentionally helpful. During the past 20 years, nearly 100,000 pages of documents regarding the assassination have been released by the Bureau, often as the result of Freedom of Information Act suits. The occasional nuggets of information buried in the raw ore of these documents have helped piece together some of the more mysterious aspects of the case.

Increasingly, the Bureau has been called to task for its handling of the JFK assassination. At least two government panels have chided the Bureau for inadequacies in its assassination investigation.

The House Select Committee on Assassinations concluded that the Bureau:

"...failed to investigate the possibility of a conspiracy to assassinate the President."

Likewise the Senate Intelligence Committee chastised the Bureau for shoddy work in the assassination investigation.

Ironically, it was government corruption which prompted the creation of the FBI in the first place. Just after the turn of the century, there was a growing demand in Washington to combat the "public-be-damned" attitude of the giant trusts -later to become multinational corporations - and corruption within a number of federal agencies.

Such abuses were the province of the Department of Justice, which Congress had never seen fit to equip with investigators. It was most difficult to prosecute a legal case without investigators. When investigators were required, Treasury agents were called in on a temporary basis.

In 1907, Attorney General Charles J. Bonaparte, despite objections in Congress, went ahead with plans to create an investigative force, stating:

"...a Department of Justice with no force of permanent police in any form under its control is assuredly not fully equipped for its work."

With the approval of President Theodore Roosevelt, Bonaparte issued an order dated July 26, 1908, creating an investigative agency within the Justice Department.

Less than one year later, Bonaparte's successor, Attorney General George W. Wickersham, gave the new agency a permanent position and a name - the Bureau of Investigation. But the new Bureau could only enforce federal crimes and - outside of counterfeiting - there were hardly any federal crimes at that time. The Bureau had little to do.

But in 1910, Congress, pressured by a public which was shocked and outraged by press accounts of world-wide prostitution, or "White Slave" rings, unanimously passed the White Slave Traffic Act. This law became known as the Mann Act after its sponsor, Rep. James Robert Mann of Illinois.

The Mann Act gave federal agents authority in any case where a woman was taken across state or national boundaries for immoral purposes. The law was loosely written, applying to crime-minded women as well as innocent "slaves." In effect, it gave the fledgling Bureau an excuse to intervene in any case where a woman crossed state lines.

World War I boosted the Bureau into national prominence. During 1914 and 1915 there were explosions, fires and other acts of sabotage at several war plants. In the morning hours of July 10, 1916, some 2 million pounds of dynamite exploded and wrecked Black Tom island in New York Harbor, a major transfer point for supplies being shipped to Europe.

American public opinion slowly began shifting from neutrality to animosity toward Germany. The pace of this shift quickened in January 1917, when Germany resumed unrestricted submarine warfare on American shipping.

War against the Central Powers, led by Germany, was declared by Congress on April 6 and President Woodrow Wilson ordered the Bureau to begin wartime activities.

Wisely noting that all Americans of German descent could not be interred for the duration of the war, Wilson nevertheless required more than one million "enemy aliens" to register. The Bureau, which had only 300 agents by then, was expected to enforce this Presidential edict.

The nation suddenly became aware of the danger of spies and a full-blown spy scare swept across the land - much of the suspicion directed at labor unions and anarchists.

Badly undermanned, Bureau chief A. Bruce Bielaski was agreeable to a suggestion by a Chicago advertising man that a private volunteer organization be formed to aid federal agents in national defense work.

Thus was formed the American Protective League, which eventually numbered more than 250,000 persons. These vigilantes carried hidden badges which identified them as "American Protective League, Secret Service Division."

The words "Secret Service" were dropped after Treasury Secretary William McAdoo complained that league members were being confused with his Secret Service agents.

The league became the object of many complaints to Washington. Suspected enemy sympathizers were beaten, some were killed and many people charged that the league was being used to intimidate labor organizations.

Smarting under criticisms of its connection with the league, the Bureau came under further attack after leading a roundup of "slackers," men who failed to register for the draft. Responding to congressional calls for action against slackers, Bureau agents had joined with local police and army units to round up more than 50,000 men off the streets of New York and Brooklyn to check for draft registration papers in early September 1918.

The offensive was roundly criticized. Senator Hiram Johnson of California told his colleagues:

"...to humiliate 40,000 citizens, to shove them along with bayonets, to subject them to prison and summary military force, merely because they are "suspects," is a spectacle never before presented in the Republic."

The next year a bomb exploded at the home of the new Attorney General, A. Mitchell Palmer, killing the two bombers.

Palmer was incensed and immediately took action. He replaced Bureau director Bielaski with William J. Flynn, a former chief of the Secret Service. Palmer also created a General Intelligence Division under the command of his 24-year-old special assistant who had come to the Bureau fresh out of the George Washington University Law School two years before - J. Edgar Hoover.

Crossfire: The Top G-Man

No one man has held so much power so long in the history of the United States as John Edgar Hoover. In the naive 1950s, Hoover was an honors-encrusted hero, hailed as the foremost defender of American freedom and democracy. By the 1970s, he was being likened to Heinrich Himmler, Hitler's dreaded SS commander.

By the 1980s, knowledge of abuses under Hoover's leadership had become widespread although the major news media - perhaps recalling the veneration it had lavished on Hoover for so long - seemed reluctant to spotlight his darker activities.

The truth of Hoover's place in the still-untold history of modern-day America lies in the man's background and motivations, much of which is still an unknown area to most writers and researchers. Little detail is known about Hoover the man, or about his personal background, friends and associations. One reason for this is that for so long everything printed about Hoover was either a product of FBI public relations or, at least, was approved by Hoover or a subordinate. Newsmen, in order to get any cooperation from the Bureau - a necessity for obtaining any information involving a federal investigation - were forced to stay on Hoover's good side. Any story criticizing the director was an excuse to place the writer on the Bureau's list of people to be ignored.

John Edgar Hoover entered the world on January 1, 1895, five years before the 20th century began. He was the youngest of four children. Born in Washington, D.C., Hoover rarely left the city his entire life. Until her death in 1938, he lived with his mother in the family home at 413 Seward Square. Afterwards he continued living there with his constant companion and the FBI's associate director, Clyde Tolson. His father, Dickerson N. Hoover, was a minor bureaucrat who served as chief of the Coast and Geodetic Survey's printing division. His mother, Annie M. Scheitlin Hoover, was a plump housewife who faithfully instilled American middle-class virtues and Lutheran Christianity in her children.

As a schoolboy delivering groceries, young Hoover discovered the quicker he delivered, the more trips he could make which meant more money. He soon was given the nickname "Speed." Active in athletics, Hoover was once hit in the nose by a baseball - the basis of his bulldog-like appearance. After graduating from Washington's Central High School, Hoover got a job as a clerk in the Library of Congress. At night he began attending George Washington University Law School, where he obtained his law degree in 1916 and a Master of Law in 1917.

With the world at war, there was frantic activity in the Department of Justice. Jobs were opening up every day. On July 26, 1917, Hoover joined the department and was placed in the enemy alien registration section. Earning a reputation as a diligent and efficient worker, Hoover soon became an assistant to the Attorney General who placed him in charge of the General Intelligence Division.

Soon after taking charge of the division, Hoover was instructed by Attorney General A. Mitchell Palmer to make a study of subversive groups within the United States. Hoover went at it with zeal. As he studied the background of communism, Hoover came to a studied conclusion - the teaching of Karl Marx, Friedrich Engels and Nikolai Lenin encouraged a worldwide revolution by the workers.

If this was taken literally and since the American communist Party - actually there have been several - agreed to follow the dictates of the Soviet leadership in Russia, the communists were guilty of advocating the violent overthrow of the United States Government.

From that time onward Hoover fought an unyielding war against what he perceived as communist penetration of America, despite equal numbers of people who did not perceive the communists as a direct threat (See RUSSIANS).

In 1919, Hoover presented this argument with the aim of deporting several persons believed to be communists:

"America communists supported the Third International which was run by Soviet communists who advocated the violent overthrow of the U.S. Government. Therefore American communists were advocating the violent overthrow of the government and could be deported as "enemy aliens.""

Two of the "enemy aliens" rounded up by Hoover's men in 1919 were the famous anarchists Alexander Beckman and Emma Goldman. Beckman had shot steel magnate Henry C. Frick during the 1892 Homestead Steel strike, blaming the industrialist for the deaths of 10 workers. Goldman, a vibrant orator who is said to have influenced such notables as writer Henry Miller, George Orwell and Edna St. Vincent Millay, was Beckman's lover. Furthermore, Leon Czolgosz, the assassin of President William McKinley, stated he had been greatly influenced by Goldman's talks. Beckman and Goldman, along with many Russian immigrants who had not applied for citizenship, were shipped back to Russia aboard a ship dubbed "the Soviet Ark" in December 1919.

It was the beginning of the famous "Palmer Red Raids" in which the legal cases were prepared by Hoover.

Early in 1920, at the orders of Palmer, the Bureau launched a series of raids on communist meeting places in 33 cities, rounding up more than 2,500 aliens. These raids drew both praise and condemnation. U.S. District Court Judge George W. Anderson, hearing one of these cases, stated:

"...(the communist Party's) whole scheme is for propaganda by words, not by deeds. No weapons of the cutting or exploding kind, with which...revolutions are carried on, were found in this raid. There is therefore not a scintilla of evidence warranting a finding that the communists are committed to the "overthrow of the Government of the United States by violence"...it is notorious that political platforms generally adopt the language of exaggeration.... Here...freedom and a saving sense of humor and of proportion, have, until recently, saved us from being frightened by crusaders' rhetoric."

However in another federal court, U.S. District Judge John C. Knox saw things quite differently, stating:

"I am of the opinion that the manifesto and program of the communist Party, together with other exhibits in the case, are of such character as to easily lead a reasonable man to conclude that the purpose of the communist Party is to accomplish its end, namely, the capture and destruction of the State as now constituted by force and violence..."

These opposite views of two judges looking at the same evidence is indicative of the split in American opinion over the danger presented by communists. It is a divergence of opinion which persists today.

Whether there was a real danger or not, the Palmer raids drove the American communist Party underground and reduced its membership from an estimated 60,000 to a hard-core of about 10,000.

Through the years, Hoover continually used the communist threat to great personal advantage, even to putting his name on a popular book, "Masters of Deceit," which helped fan the fires of the 1950s communist scare.

Was there any real threat from American communists? In his resignation letter to Hoover, William C. Sullivan, at one time third-ranking official at the FBI, wrote:

"In the mid-Forties when the membership of the Party was about 80,000 and it had many front organizations, you publicized this widely month in and month out. In fact it was far too widely publicized to the point where you caused a communist scare in the nation which was entirely unwarranted...I am just as opposed to communism as you but I knew then and I know now that it was not the danger you claimed it was and that it never warranted the huge amounts of the taxpayer's dollars spent upon it...What happened when the communist Party went into a rapid decline? You kept the scare campaign going just the same for some years. However, when the membership figures kept dropping lower and lower you instructed us not to give them to the public any more and not even to the Justice Department...At the time of my leaving the Bureau (1971)...the membership figures of the communist Party are down to an amazing 2,800 in a nation of over 200 million people and you still conceal this from the people."

It has been said that of the small number of members of the communist Party in those days, almost half were FBI informers.

But Hoover never let the facts stand in the way of his campaign to eradicate communism, even if it meant neglecting one of the true menaces of America - organized crime.

In the 48 years that Hoover controlled the United States' only national police organization, he served eight Presidents and outlasted more than a dozen attorney generals.

Hoover's FBI kept files on an estimated 200 million persons, most of whom had never been charged with a crime.

With almost 20,000 active agents plus thousands of contract agents and informers, no facet of American life went undetected by the Bureau.

Yet Hoover never publicly admitted the growing cancer of organized crime.

Organized crime investigator Peter Maas has reported that prior to Robert Kennedy becoming attorney general, only four FBI agents in the New York office were assigned to organized crime and those were kept busy with in-office "bookkeeping" duties. Yet about 400 agents were on the streets of the city searching out communists.

As late as January 1962, Hoover was on record as saying:

"No single individual or coalition of racketeers dominates organized crime across the nation."

As with the communist threat, Hoover was not telling the truth.

Shortly after the aborted mob conference at Apalachin in 1957 (See MOBSTERS), Sullivan and other top FBI officials prepared a monograph on the Mafia which was sent to the top 25 government officials concerned with law enforcement. Learning of this, an angry Hoover recalled all 25 copies and had them destroyed. He denounced the monograph as "baloney" and this report on organized crime was never heard of again. It was not until Mafia thug Joe Valachi was brought to Washington by Attorney General Robert Kennedy's Justice Department for testimony before a Senate committee (See MOBSTERS), that Hoover was grudgingly forced to admit to the existence of an organized crime structure in this nation. Why did Hoover act like there was no such thing as the Mafia when there was so much evidence to the contrary? In his book, "The Bureau," Sullivan wrote:

"He (Hoover) didn't want to tackle organized crime. He preferred his agents to spend their time on quick, easy cases - he wanted results, predictable results which produced the statistics Hoover thrived on....Investigating the Mafia promised to be more difficult than rounding up juvenile auto thieves. Organized crime is far more complicated: the Mafia runs legitimate businesses as a front for their illegal operations. Mafiosos are rich and can afford the best lawyers, while we have to use government lawyers, some of whom are excellent, some of them aren't worth a damn. And the Mafia is powerful, so powerful that entire police forces and even a mayor's office can be under Mafia control. That's why Hoover was afraid to let us tackle it. He was afraid we'd show up poorly."

There were also other considerations. Hoover was well known for his ingratiating attitude toward Washington politicians. The more powerful the politician, the more Hoover tried to befriend him.

Considering the resources of the FBI, it is reasonable to assume that Hoover knew many of the politicians on Capitol Hill were under the control of organized crime. All the more reason to leave well enough alone.

Then there is the suggestion, backed by only vague circumstantial evidence, that Hoover, through the years may have reached some sort of tacit agreement with certain mob leaders.

According to an article in the December 22, 1975, issue of "Time" magazine:

"Hoover was reluctant to move against organized crime. Some FBI agents think they know why. They tell stories of Hoover sometimes traveling to Manhattan to meet one of the Mafia's top figures, Frank Costello (New York's "Boss of all Bosses"). The two would meet in Central Park. Costello apparently convinced Hoover that there was no organized Mafia - merely a loose collection of independent racketeers."

Once in the late 1930s, a government agent named John Cye Cheasty - assigned to survey crime figures - was shocked to see Costello and Hoover sitting at adjoining tables in the New Yorker Hotel's Manhattan Room. Cheasty told this story in a 1957 trial involving Costello.

There is also a tenuous connection between Hoover and Mafia Boss Meyer Lansky in the mutual friendship of Lewis S. Rosenstiel of Schenley Industries. According to evidence gathered by organized crime author Hank Messick, Rosenstiel - in addition to being close friends to both Hoover and Lansky - eventually employed former FBI assistant director Louis B. Nichols and in 1969 created the J. Edgar Hoover Foundation.

Other organized crime contacts may have come through Hoover's love for horse racing and gambling.

In "The Bureau," Sullivan wrote:

"He (Hoover) and (associate director Clyde) Tolson used to be driven from the courtyard of the Department of Justice to the track in a black bullet-proof car. Although Hoover always told people that he and Tolson were going off to work on a case, it was common knowledge that they were actually rushing to make the first race."

Once at the track, Hoover conducted a subterfuge in order to conceal his gambling. Sullivan wrote:

"Hoover did make a few bets at the two-dollar window, but that was just for show. He had agents assigned to accompany him to the track to place his real bets at the hundred-dollar window, and when he won he was a pleasure to work with for days."

While in California, Hoover delighted in visiting the Del Mar Racetrack, which had been bought in 1954 by his Texas oilmen buddies, Clint Murchinson - whose chief attorney was John Connally - and Sid Richardson. He usually stayed free of charge in the nearby Hotel del Charro at La Jolla, which had been bought by Murchinson in 1951. Hoover often was seen having breakfast with the oilman. This information came to light during a California Senate investigation in 1966.

The Del Mar Racetrack was owned by a state agency but leased to private management. Hoover and Tolson often timed their summer vacation to coincide with the Del Mar racing season. At one point, the track was managed by Boys Club Inc., which investigators discovered was not connected with the helpful youth organization, but instead was a front for Murchinson and Richardson. Murchinson had even attempted to get Hoover to head the tax-exempt organization built on track revenues, but the director declined.

But Hoover may have helped in other ways. Before further investigation could be conducted by the California Senate, Governor Edmund G. "Pat" Brown stepped in.

According to the "Journal of Commerce and Independent Review," a Los Angeles legal-notice newspaper:

"It developed that the Governor had been contacted by J. Edgar Hoover to put the quash on the Senate's probe or at least to keep concealed Hoover's involvement with horse racing and the Texans."

Apparently Hoover's desire to gain extra money did not end at the betting windows.

According to Sullivan, who helped author Hoover's best selling book, "Masters of Deceit," Hoover helped himself to the profits from this and other FBI-produced publications. Sullivan wrote:

"...Hoover...set it up so that all future royalties would go into the FBI Recreation Fund instead. Although agents were supposed to share the money in the Recreation Fund, it was actually nothing more than a tax dodge. The money in the fund was available to Hoover, at all times, and he used it."

And it was pressure from Hoover's friend oilman Clint Murchinson - a major stockholder in Holt Publishing Company - which got the director a lucrative contract for this anti-communist book.

That Hoover had ambitions greater than the FBI can be shown by his ill-fated attempt at the presidency.

By 1936, Hoover's name had become a household word and the director believed he could count on the support of the nation's law enforcement community. His plan was to win election as a Republican and drive the liberal Roosevelt from office.

However, when he had selected agents to tour the South and Southwest - the areas where he felt his support was strongest - he was chagrined to learn that not only did local lawmen not want him as President, many didn't want him to continue as FBI director. According to Sullivan, Hoover never mentioned running for President again.

After that Hoover dedicated himself to building the strength and power of the FBI - even to details on how agents should look and act.

Regarded as extremely Puritanical - gambling being the apparent exception - Hoover set strict rules and regulations within the Bureau. Agents were not to drink alcohol while on duty and were discouraged from drinking off duty. Any employee caught cheating on his wife or not paying his debts was fired immediately. Hoover even went so far as to institute a dress code - FBI men were expected to wear their hair short and well groomed (bald men need not even apply) and dress in dark, conservative suits. Sullivan tells the story of Hoover riding in his office elevator one day with an FBI clerk who happened to wear a red vest under his suit coat:

"And as if the red vest wasn't bad enough, the poor fellow's face was broken out. As soon as Hoover got to his office, the order went out to find the young man with pimples wearing a red vest, fire him, and discipline the man who recommended him for employment."

One undocumented story which circulated through the Bureau was retold in Sullivan's book, "The Bureau."

It seems that Hoover's omnipresent assistant, Clyde Tolson, came into the office one day and announced he was depressed. In an effort to cheer him up, Hoover gave Tolson a list of FBI supervisors. "Pick out one you don't like and fire him, then you'll feel better," Hoover reportedly told Tolson.

"With prejudice?" said Tolson with a smile.

"Dismissed with prejudice" was a term coined by Hoover to use against agents who especially angered him. It was a serious matter since an agent with this blot on his record would have difficulty in finding other work.

Whether or not the Tolson story is true, it is indicative of how Bureau employees saw the relationship between the two men.

A native of Laredo, Missouri, Tolson came to Washington at the age of 18 to work as a clerk in the War Department. Soon he was made confidential secretary to Secretary of War Newton D. Baker. For the next eight years, while serving two other war secretaries, Tolson attended night school at George Washington University, obtaining a law degree in 1927.

Tolson was known as "the man who came to dinner" at the FBI because when he applied to be an agent in 1928, instead of extolling the virtues of a lifetime Bureau career, he truthfully wrote that he was just looking to gain a little experience and make some money so he could open a law practice in Iowa. The unusual letter was brought to Hoover's attention, who hired him anyway.

Several months later, Tolson came to FBI headquarters as chief clerk. Working close to Hoover, he moved up fast, becoming assistant director in 1931. In 1947, Tolson became associate director, but his position in the Bureau was actually much more than number-two man. Tolson and Hoover, both described in FBI publicity as "bachelors," were constant companions. They rode to work together, lunched together and even vacationed together. Both were Masons - as were many of the Bureau's top officials. After the death of Hoover's mother, with whom he had lived for years, Tolson shared Hoover's Washington home. Bureau personnel took to calling the pair the "unipersonality" - two people who acted as one. Even after Tolson reached age 71 and had suffered more than one stroke leaving him partially paralyzed, Hoover bypassed the retirement laws by retiring him, then rehiring him under a legal loophole allowing the hiring of retired personnel on a temporary basis to complete projects in progress.

Just as Bureau agents were known to have regularly performed personal work for Hoover, Tolson too had his perquisites. Tolson, according to Sullivan, liked to think on himself as an inventor. He would come up with an idea but often he would ask FBI laboratory employees to work out the details. When patents resulting from this work were filed, they were in Tolson's name.

Tolson retired from the Bureau the day after Hoover's strange death on May 2, 1972, and soon died.

There can be little doubt that the relationship between Hoover and Tolson was a strange one. Rumors have circulated for years that the pair were homosexuals. However, no proof has been forthcoming. Hoover, it is known, had a penchant for detecting any signs of homosexual behavior in others. He took great delight in passing on such information to his close friends.

Of one thing there is certainty - by the time of World War II, the vast power of the FBI was centered solely in J. Edgar Hoover, considered by nearly all who knew him as a "strange" man. But if blame has to be laid for this situation, it may, as argued by Tom Wicker, associate editor of the "New York Times," be laid on the American public.

Wicker wrote:

"...the public - gulled, it is true by the Bureau's incessant propaganda - until recent years loved it all; and what considerable percentage of voters Washington believed were still devoted to J. Edgar Hoover at his death was suggested by the President's funeral oration and by Congress's decision that his body should lie in state, where Lincoln and Kennedy had lain. There was little or no outcry when the director, guardian of liberty, spoke up for Joe McCarthy, called Martin Luther King a liar and for years single-handedly held up congressional passage of a consular treaty with the Soviet Union. There was always a radio audience for "The FBI in Peace and War" and the G-Man movies to which the director invariably lent "technical assistance" and his seal of approval - as long as they pictured his men on the side of the angels. For decades, his turgid and moralistic articles appeared with the regularity of the seasons in "Reader's Digest" and "American" magazines, and publishers took turns presenting his self-aggrandizing books to the waiting public. If J. Edgar Hoover passed eventually beyond the normal restraints of office, the American public seemed to view this process happily, and with a sense of gratitude."

###

But if Hoover's reputation grew overlarge in later years, it certainly had no such problem back in the 1920s. In late 1920 the scene in Washington was like that at the height of the anti-war crusades of the 1960s.

Public criticism had arisen over Palmer's "Red Raids." Federal agents were charged with unconstitutional searches and seizures, individual rights violations and even using "agents provocateurs."

One federal judge, after hearing testimony of warrantless arrests and prisoners being held incommunicado, declared:

"It may...be observed that a mob is a mob, whether made up of government officials acting under instructions from the Department of Justice, or of criminals, loafers, and the vicious classes."

Later a Senate committee looked into the raids, but divided on its views of the operation and no consensus was reached. It was the first - and last - Congressional investigation of the FBI.

During this time, Warren G. Harding was sworn in as President and he named his close friend, Henry Daugherty, as attorney general.

Harding, who once said, "I am not fit for this office and never should have been here," headed one of the most scandal-ridden administrations in U.S. history.

His secretary of interior, Albert B. Fall, was convicted of bribery and became the first cabinet officer in U.S. history to go to jail.

In August 1921, in an effort to clean house, Daugherty replaced Flynn as Bureau director with a famous detective who happened to also be a childhood chum, William J. Burns.

Burns was a colorful character with a flair for gaining favorable publicity. It was a trait not lost on his new assistant director. J. Edgar Hoover.

Fresh from the complaints over the Red Raids, morale in the Justice Department went from bad to worse.

Daugherty was accused of influence peddling and, in 1923, a top aide - allegedly holding evidence against Daugherty - committed suicide under strange circumstances in Daugherty's apartment. Daugherty was indicted in connection with the death but went free after two successive hung juries.

Then the famous "Teapot Dome" scandal broke, revealing that Harding and other officials had shifted public oil property into private hands amid bribery and favoritism.

On August 2, 1923, Harding himself died under sudden circumstances still not fully understood - Some researchers have claimed he may have been poisoned by his wife to protect him from the disgrace of his probable impeachment.

In an effort to demonstrate leadership in this moral crisis, newly-elected President Calvin Coolidge demanded and received Daugherty's resignation as attorney general. He was replaced by Harlan Fiske Stone, a former dean of the Columbia University Law School.

Soon after taking control of what had become known as the "Department of Easy Virtue," Stone removed Burns as head of the Bureau and named 29-year-old Hoover acting director. Hoover moved rapidly to restore respect for the Bureau, which was in real danger of being disbanded due to the years of problems and criticism. His actions produced immediate results. Asked if one of his agents would investigate the activities of a senator's son, Hoover replied:

"This Bureau cannot be used for partisan purposes."

Backed solidly by Stone, Hoover completely rebuilt the image of the Bureau of Investigation. And on December 10, 1924, Stone made Hoover director. Stone later told a friend:

"I took the responsibility of appointing Mr. Hoover...although many people thought that Mr. Hoover was too young a man and had been in too close contact with the Burns regime to be given the post. I thought I knew my man and the event has proved that I was right....Mr. Hoover has steadily built up the Bureau..."

Over the next 15 years, Hoover was to move the Bureau from a few hundred unarmed investigators to a full-fledged national police agency. And all the while, Hoover kept an eye open for favorable public relations opportunities.

By the early 1930s, Prohibition had propelled crime into the national spotlight and Hoover was there to share the glory. During the heyday of Bonnie and Clyde and the Ma Barker Gang, hardly a day passed that Hoover wasn't being quoted in the nation's press. His legend grew.

Incomplete as they are, statistics indicate that crime actually decreased during the Depression years, but the sensational media accounts of crime celebrities led the public to perceive an upswing in criminal activities.

In 1934, a loser with a perpetual grin named George Kelly was trapped by federal agents in his Memphis hideout. Hoover later claimed that "Machine Gun" Kelly - who never killed anyone nor even fired his machine gun in anger - cried, "Don't shoot, G-men, don't shoot!" However, Memphis police who were along on the raid heard Kelly say nothing of the kind. Undaunted by this fact, Hoover sensed great propaganda value at hand and used the term "G man" to boost the image of his force, despite the fact that government employees had long been called "G men." This story became part of FBI folklore - just like the killing of John Dillinger. The official story of Dillinger's death is well known - Anna Sage, the famous "Lady in Red," led a man called James Lawrence into an FBI trap outside Chicago's Biograph Theater where the man was killed by a volley of gunfire on July 27, 1934. "Lawrence" was later identified as Dillinger and the Bureau got credit for eliminating Public Enemy No. 1. The only problem is that Lawrence was not Dillinger. An autopsy of the man shot outside the Biograph turned up missing within days. Three decades later a copy was uncovered which showed the man killed had brown eyes (Dillinger had blue), had a congenital heart condition (Dillinger had none) and that the dead man was shorter and heavier than Dillinger and lacked all of Dillinger's known scars, wounds and birthmarks. The whole story, made public in a book by journalist Jay Robert Nash, suggests that Lawrence was set up by criminal associates of Dillinger, who reportedly watched the entire Biograph shooting from a nearby alleyway before escaping in a car.

The FBI, particularly famed G-Man Melvin Purvis, was duped into killing the wrong man and announcing their feat. Later some Bureau officials apparently became aware of the deception but covered the story up in an effort to protect the Bureau. Under pressure from Hoover, Purvis quit the FBI less than a year after the Biograph shooting. He committed suicide in 1960.

It might be well to remember this 1934 experience of Hoover's when considering the 1963 assassination. The use of doubles, decoys, dupes and the ability to force the FBI to cover up embarrassing issues for the self-protection were not unknown to Hoover in 1963. Another example of Hoover's penchant for good publicity at the expense of truth came with the arrest of another Public Enemy No. 1 - Alvin "Creepy" Karpis. Less than a month before the arrest of Karpis, Hoover had been taken to task by Senator K.D. Mckeller of Tennessee of the Senate Appropriations Subcommittee. Mckeller had chided Hoover for never personally having made an arrest.

So when Karpis - kidnapper, bank robber and associate of Ma Barker - finally was located by the FBI in New Orleans in May 1936, Hoover personally flew in to make the collar.

Karpis was Hoover's first arrest and the news of his courage and daring was distributed widely. However, after his release from prison in 1969, Karpis declared:

"Hoover waited until the coast was clear. Then he came out to reap the glory...(and gain) a reputation he didn't deserve."

In the early 1930s Hoover, a staunch Republican, was very cautious about his moves within Franklin Roosevelt's Democratic administration.

By 1933, kidnapping was added to the list of crimes under the jurisdiction of the FBI due to the famous abduction of Charles Lindbergh's infant son. This list grew longer the next year, with the addition of killing or assaulting a federal officer, fleeing across state lines and extortion involving interstate commerce.

By 1935, Bureau agents were given the power to go beyond investigation. They were allowed to serve warrants and subpoenas, to make seizures and arrests, and to carry arms. The Bureau had become the very thing that Hoover had often spoken against - a national police force.

Also that year, the word "Federal" was added to the Bureau's name and soon, the initials "FBI" were well-known all over the world.

By the beginning of World War II, the FBI boasted an Identification Division with thousands of fingerprint records, a complete and up-to-date laboratory, and a National Police Academy for training state and local law enforcement officers.

Even today, it is considered the peak of a lawman's career to be selected for training at the FBI Academy at Quantico, Virginia. And, Hoover made use of this too.

According to former Assistant director Sullivan:

"...Hoover felt that the alumni of the FBI training course were his men. Thanks to this network of FBI-trained police officers, we had a private and frequently helpful line to most city and state police organizations throughout the country."

Hoover also used the FBI Academy against perceived enemies.

On the day of the JFK assassination, a shocked Dallas FBI Agent named James Hosty told Dallas Police Lieutenant Jack Revill that Lee Harvey Oswald was a communist known to the FBI, and that the Bureau had information that Oswald was capable of committing the assassination. Since all government agencies were saying they had no knowledge of Oswald, this story was a bombshell.

As a result of this conversation, Dallas Police Chief Jesse Curry told TV newsmen that the FBI was aware of Oswald but had not informed the Dallas Police.

When challenged to prove his charge by the head of the Dallas FBI office, Curry qualified his statement by saying he had no personal knowledge of the issue. But the damage had been done.

Until Curry's retirement in 1966, Hoover conducted a vendetta against the Dallas police, according to FBI documents released in 1980.

The documents show that under orders from Hoover, FBI officials were prohibited from conducting training courses for Dallas Police and policemen from that city were not invited to attend the FBI Academy.

Furthermore, Curry resigned as chief in February of 1966, less than a month after Dallas Mayor Erik Jonsson had visited Hoover in Washington. After hearing Hoover's complaints against Curry, Jonsson told the petulant director he would "immediately instruct the city manager to have a stern talk" with the police chief.

Hoover did not gain such immense power overnight. After turning his Bureau into an anti-crime force, he began look into other areas.

Beginning with secret meetings between President Roosevelt and Hoover in the summer of 1936, the Bureau began moving quietly into the areas of intelligence gathering.

It was all explained in a "Strictly Confidential" staff memorandum written by Hoover:

"In talking with the Attorney General today concerning the radical situation, I informed him of the conference I had with the President on September 1, 1936, at which time the Secretary of State (Cordell Hull) was present, and at which time the Secretary of State, at the President's suggestion, requested of me, the representative of the Department of Justice, to have investigation made of the subversive activities in this country, including communism and fascism. I transmitted this request to the Attorney General, and the Attorney General verbally directed me to proceed with the investigation and to coordinate, as the President suggested, information upon these matters in the possession of the Military Intelligence Division, the Naval Intelligence Division, and the State Department.

This, therefore, is the authority upon which to proceed in the conduct of this investigation, which should, of course, be handled in a most discreet and confidential manner."

It was the beginning of this nation's multi-agency intelligence establishment and marked a period of extraordinary growth for the Bureau. The FBI, which boasted only 391 agents in 1933, counted nearly 5,000 by the end of the war.

In 1939, on the eve of World War II, the Bureau was directed to investigate espionage, sabotage and violations of neutrality regulations. It also handled draft evaders and the apprehension of enemy aliens.

It should be noted that Hoover was one of the few government officials that opposed the relocation and incarceration of Japanese Americans as a violation of their civil rights. He probably recalled the criticism which arose over his very first job of deporting aliens.

However, it also should be noted that, prior to the war, Hoover never felt the same sense of danger from fascists that he did from the communists. In fact, during 1939 Hoover served as vice president of the International Police Organization (Interpol), then headquartered in Berlin. The president of Interpol was the German dictator, Adolf Hitler.

During the war, the FBI was called upon to gather intelligence on activities detrimental to the American interests in South America. And while this activity was ordered terminated with the creation of the Central Intelligence Agency in 1947, the FBI still retains a large office in Mexico City.

Also during the war, Hoover's path crossed that of a young Naval intelligence officer with unexpected and long-term repercussions.

The FBI had been snooping after a suspected Nazi agent, a beautiful woman named Inga Arvad who had attended the wedding of Germany's Field Marshal Hermann Goering and met with Adolf Hitler. A former Miss Denmark, she had no trouble attracting young men in wartime Washington. One of these men was Naval Ensign John F. Kennedy. Hoover's FBI wiretapped an apartment shared by Kennedy and "Inga Binga," as he called his paramour, and picked up the sounds of sexual play. They also picked up a few remarks by Kennedy concerning sensitive security matters. After both the Navy and his father had been alerted to the danger presented by Kennedy's involvement with a suspected agent, young Kennedy was quickly transferred to the South Pacific. It was here, of course, where Kennedy led the survivors of PT-109 back to safety, thus becoming a war hero which helped launch his political career leading to the White House - all thanks to the diligent J. Edgar Hoover. Thus it could be argued - with great irony - that it was Hoover who actually set young Kennedy on the course which ended in Dallas.

After World War II, FBI intelligence activities actually increased, thanks to the anti-communism hysteria of the Cold War years. In fact it was the FBI which launched Senator Joseph McCarthy on his ill-fated anti-communist crusade. In 1950, a 100 page FBI document alleging communist infiltration of the U.S. Government was leaked to a military intelligence officer with instructions to pass it along to the Jewish American League Against communism. The League offered the document to McCarthy, who was further encouraged to fight communism by Father Edmund A. Walsh, vice president of Georgetown University and an anti-communist author. A top McCarthy assistant, Roy Cohn, later said:

"Joe McCarthy bought communism in much the same way other people purchase a new automobile."

Assistant FBI director Sullivan wrote:

"We gave McCarthy all we had, but all we had were fragments, nothing could prove his allegations."

While Hoover always claimed that information collected by the Bureau was never to be released to unauthorized persons, it was a rule which he bent for friends.

In 1948, when New York Governor Thomas Dewey - Nixon's political mentor - ran for President, Hoover secretly agreed to put the resources of the Bureau at his disposal hoping that he would be made attorney general upon Dewey's election.

Attorney General Herbert Brownell, in 1954, used FBI material to chide the Truman administration about a questionable employee. That same year Vice President Richard Nixon was able to obtain information in FBI files to use in his attack against Rep. Robert L. Condon of California.

It is well known now that Hoover deliberately leaked derogatory material on Dr. Martin Luther King during the 1960s as a part of his secret counterintelligence (COINTELPRO) program.

It was this ability, first to gather information and then to control it, which gave Hoover his extraordinary power.

Former Assistant FBI director Sullivan wrote:

"Hoover was always gathering damaging material on Jack Kennedy, which the President, with his active social life, seemed more than willing to provide. We never put any technical surveillance on JFK, but whatever came up was automatically funneled directly to Hoover. I was sure he was saving everything he had on Kennedy, and on Martin Luther King, Jr., too, until he could unload it all and destroy them both. He kept this kind of explosive material in his personal files, which filled four rooms on the fifth floor of headquarters."

Perhaps the presence of these files, which still held information on Kennedy and Inga Arvad, explains why the reappointment of Hoover was one of JFK's first actions on becoming President.

It has been reported that Hoover's Personal and Confidential files were destroyed soon after his death by Tolson and Hoover's faithful secretary Helen Gandy.

Hoover's reappointment by Kennedy certainly wasn't due to Hoover's politics. A Republican who liked to boast that he had never voted, Hoover had quietly helped Nixon as much as possible during the 1960 campaign.

According to Sullivan, Hoover did his best to keep the news media supplied with anti-Kennedy stories.

It has been well documented how Hoover ingratiated himself both to the Presidents and Attorney Generals he served. He would send them letters marked "Top Secret, Eyes Only" filled with juicy tidbits of gossip about Congressmen and political enemies.

Most Presidents disdained this practice, but two - Lyndon B. Johnson and Richard Nixon -seemed to enjoy this unusual channel of information.

Nixon and Hoover were GOP Allies from the days that Nixon was representative from California. Sullivan wrote:

"I spent many days preparing material based on research taken from FBI files that I knew was going straight from Hoover to Congressman Nixon, material which Nixon used in speeches, articles and investigations."

Nixon had been rejected as an FBI agent in 1937 - Nixon was told later by Hoover that the Bureau wasn't hiring at the time, but the agent who rejected him reported that Nixon was "lacking in aggression." Despite this, Nixon and Hoover remained close friends. Hoover was a regular dinner guest at the Nixon White House in later years. In White House tapes transcripts made during the Watergate era, Nixon said:

"Edgar Hoover...I have seen socially at least a hundred times. He and I were very close friends...(expletive deleted) - Hoover was my crony. He was closer to me than (Lyndon) Johnson actually, although Johnson used him more."

Later in the same conversation, Nixon laments that Hoover's 1972 death prevented the director from aiding his Watergate defense. He said:

"Well, Hoover performed. He would have fought. That was the point. He would have defied a few people. He would have scared them to death. He has a file on everybody."

Lyndon Johnson had no such problem. With Hoover very much alive during his presidency, Johnson had a strong right-hand man.

According to Sullivan, Johnson - worried that Robert Kennedy might make a grab for the Democratic presidential nomination in 1964 - asked Hoover for a special security team of FBI men, headed by Cartha D. DeLoach. Sullivan wrote:

"Ostensibly, the agents would be there to guard against threats to the President, but this security force was actually a surveillance team, a continuation of the FBI's surveillance on Martin Luther King in Atlantic City. By keeping track of King, LBJ could also keep track of RFK."

Johnson and Hoover had much in common, according to Sullivan. He wrote:

"Johnson and Hoover had their mutual fear and hatred of the Kennedys in common - and more. As neighbors in Washington since the days when Johnson was a senator from Texas, they had been frequent dinner guests in each other's homes."

The Hoover-Johnson friendship dated back to 1945 when young Senator Johnson and his family moved onto the same block of Washington's Thirtieth Place where Hoover lived.

In later years Hoover relished in telling how he helped raise the two Johnson daughters and how he would help Johnson hunt for the family dog.

The nearly two decades of closeness between Johnson and Hoover led Johnson's last attorney general, Ramsey Clark, to comment that their friendship "almost disqualified" Johnson from being able to properly supervise the dour Bureau director.

Hoover made several trips to Texas, both to visit his oilmen friends, Murchinson and Richardson, and to help his friend Johnson politically.

Hoover biographer Richard Gid Powers said Johnson would telephone his friend Hoover regularly to chat about the issues of the day and noted that Johnson's diary listed some 60 such conversations during the Johnson administration.

Johnson cemented his friendship - and perhaps his power - over Hoover in January 1964, less than two months after Kennedy's assassination. In a ceremony conducted in the White House Rose Garden, Johnson praised his friend Hoover as "a hero to millions of decent citizens, and an anathema to evil men."

After noting Hoover's accomplishments through the years, Johnson said:

"Edgar, the law says that you must retire next January when you reach your 70th birthday, and I know you wouldn't want to break the law. But the nation cannot afford to lose you. Therefore, by virtue of and pursuant to the authority vested in the President, I have today signed an Executive Order exempting you from compulsory retirement for an indefinite period of time."

It was tantamount to installing Hoover as FBI director for life since it would have required a subsequent Executive Order to rescind this action. This extraordinary action coupled with the timing - with both the Warren Commission and the FBI's assassination investigation just getting into full swing - has led more suspicious assassination researchers to suspect that this Presidential exemption was a partial payment to Hoover for his lack of a penetrating probe of Kennedy's death. Shortly after this event, Hoover replaced Courtney Evans as the Bureau's White House liaison man with Cartha DeLoach, an FBI official who had been quite intimate with Johnson since his early days in the Senate. It was DeLoach who figured prominently in the assassination investigation and it was DeLoach who revealed in the 1970s that Johnson had begun to suspect that the CIA may have had something to do with Kennedy's death. According to Sullivan, once Johnson assumed the powers of the Presidency, his relationship with the trusty Hoover began to change. He wrote:

"They remained close when Johnson served as vice President, but there was a change in their relationship when Johnson became President. The director was over 65 by that time, past retirement age for federal employees, and he stayed in office only because of a special waiver which required the President's signature each year. That waiver put Hoover right in Johnson's pocket. With that leverage, Johnson began to take advantage of Hoover, using the Bureau as his personal investigative arm. His never-ending requests were usually political, and sometimes illegal...And Hoover hot-footed it to Johnson's demands...he found himself very much in the back seat, almost a captive of the President ..."

There is also the possibility that Hoover actually liked and respected the lanky Texas politician. Speaking to newspaper editors in 1965, Hoover said:

"Texans (like Johnson) don't like to be told what to do. This is characteristic of Texans. They are a separate breed of man. I admire the intelligence and fearlessness of a man of that kind."

In addressing the relationship between Hoover and Johnson, author Richard Gid Powers stated:

"Because of the extraordinary rapport between them, there was no service Hoover would refuse Johnson, no matter how far removed it might be from his law enforcement or domestic intelligence responsibilities."

Some researchers have darkly hinted that LBJ may have had more leverage on Hoover than simply securing his job as director - that it may have had something to do with the JFK assassination. There can be no doubt that Hoover had an abiding and intense hatred for both John and Robert Kennedy, because of their politics, their associates, their personal lives and their style. Sullivan recalled hearing Clyde Tolson, Hoover's associate director, confidant and roommate, once say:

"Goddamn the Kennedys. First there was Jack, now there is Bobby, and then Teddy. We'll have them on our necks until the year 2000."

Hoover reportedly nodded in agreement.

This hatred for the Kennedys makes the Bureau's numerous contacts with Lee Harvey Oswald all the more suspicious.

The FBI was involved with Oswald from the time he went to Russia. Recall Hoover's 1960 memo to the State Department warning "...there is a possibility that an impostor is using Oswald's birth certificate." Very much aware of Oswald and even suspecting that someone may have been posing as the ex-Marine, the FBI attempted to keep tabs on Oswald after his attempted defection to Russia.

On April 27, 1960, John W. Fain, a resident FBI agent in Fort Worth, interviewed Robert Oswald concerning his brother's activities in the Soviet Union. The older Oswald said his whole family was shocked at his brother's behavior and that Lee had never had any sympathy for or connection with communism before his trip to Russia. Fain also interviewed Marguerite Oswald the next day concerning a $25 money order she tried to send her son.

Apparently the FBI was not the only U.S. agency to have an active interest in Oswald. On July 3, 1961, more than a year before Oswald arrived back home from Russia, Fain prepared another report on Oswald. This report is rich in detail of Oswald's life history as well as his activities in the Soviet Union. According to this document, much of the information on Oswald came from the district office of the Office of Naval Intelligence in New Orleans.

Armed with this Naval Intelligence information, Fain and FBI Special Agent Tom Carter requested a meeting with Oswald at the Fort Worth FBI office on June 25, 1962, less than two weeks after the Oswalds arrived back in Fort Worth from Russia. According to their report, Oswald told of flying home with Marina and their child, but failed to mention the stopover in Atlanta (See OSWALD). He also told of borrowing $435 to get home, but declined to talk about why he went to Russia, saying only that he didn't want to relive the past. The agents said during this interview, Oswald "exhibited an impatient and arrogant attitude." He also denied that he had attempted to renounce his American citizenship nor had he offered the Russians any military information.

Interestingly, Oswald did tell the FBI agents that "in the event he is contacted by Soviet Intelligence under suspicious circumstances or otherwise, he will promptly communicate with the FBI." Could this agreement have been the beginning of a special relationship between Oswald and the Bureau?

Oswald's next recorded contact the Bureau was on August 16, 1962, when Fain and Special Agent Arnold Brown approached Oswald near his home at 2703 Mercedes St. in Fort Worth, where he and Marina had lived for about a month. Believing that Oswald had been "evasive" during his first interview, Fain had decided to contact him again, only this time the agents sat with Oswald in a parked car near his home. Fain explained that they didn't want to embarrass Oswald in front of his wife, so they declined his offer to come into the house. The more suspicious researchers view this unusual meeting in a car as a time when the FBI may have begun to recruit Oswald as an informant. But according to the agents, Oswald once again denied any misconduct in Russia, denied that he tried to defect and denied that any Soviet Intelligence personnel had ever tried to contact him or offer any "deals." Once again, Oswald agreed to contact the FBI if anyone connected with Soviet Intelligence tried to meet with him.

After satisfying themselves that Oswald was not a member of the American communist Party, Fain and Brown marked the Oswald file "closed." Fain retired from the Bureau on October 29, 1962.

However, it was not the last contact between Oswald and the Bureau. After arriving in New Orleans in the spring of 1963, Oswald became the object of yet another security investigation by the FBI, this time the Special Agent in charge of Oswald's file was Milton R. Kaack, who prepared a detailed report dated October 31, 1963, on Oswald, his background and his New Orleans activities. But the strangest contact between Oswald and the Bureau came on August 10, 1963, the day after his arrest for disturbing the peace while handing out Fair Play for Cuba Committee (FPCC) leaflets on a New Orleans street corner (See CUBANS). It seems utterly outlandish that a man who tried to defect to Russia and was a self-confessed pro-Marxist should request to see an FBI agent after being arrested in connection with pro-Castro activities - but that is exactly what Oswald did. This contact with the FBI, initiated by Oswald, has caused many people - not the least of which were Warren Commission members - to speculate on whether Oswald might indeed have been acting as an informant for the FBI.

Crossfire: Did Oswald Work for the FBI?

As can be seen in the activities of Lee Harvey Oswald while in the Marines and in Russia, there appear to be traces of intelligence work. If Oswald had participated in spy work, particularly for the United States, it is most likely that this information would become known to the FBI. And what better prospect to recruit as an informant than an experienced American agent with a pro-communist background or "cover." The day after his arrest in New Orleans for disturbing the peace was a Saturday, hardly a time for a quick FBI response to the request of a police prisoner jailed for a minor infraction. Yet Special Agent John Quigley soon arrived at the New Orleans police station and met with Oswald for an hour and a half.

The five-page report of that meeting written by Quigley reads like a comprehensive report on the Fair Play for Cuba Committee. Oswald gave the agent background information on himself, then detailed his activities since coming to New Orleans, including his attempt to form a Fair Play for Cuba Committee chapter and the squabble between Oswald and anti-Castro Cubans.

Quigley, who told the Warren Commission he had never heard of Oswald until that Saturday, had a faulty memory. He later admitted that on April 18, 1961, he had reviewed Oswald's Navy file at the nearby U.S. Naval Air Station in Algiers, Louisiana, at the request of the Dallas FBI office. Quigley could give the commission no reason why Oswald had wanted to see an FBI agent in 1963, but an FBI document released in 1977 may give a clue. In that document, Quigley reports being contacted by a New Orleans police intelligence officer who "said that Oswald was desirous of seeing an agent and supplying to him information with regard to his activities with the FPCC in New Orleans." Again this statement, along with the detailed description Oswald gave of his activities, seems to indicate that Oswald was trying to make some sort of report.

In this "report," Oswald continually mentions the fictitious head of the New Orleans FPCC, A.J. Hidell, saying that he had talked with him several times by telephone but had never met him. Asked for Hidell's number, Oswald said he couldn't remember it.

In all, at least 10 FBI agents all filed affidavits with the Warren Commission stating unequivocally that Lee Harvey Oswald was never an informant for the Bureau.

Could they have said the same for "Harvey Lee Oswald," or "A.J. Hidell?" During his Warren Commission testimony, Quigley made an odd slip of the tongue, referring to Oswald as "Harvey Lee Oswald" until corrected by Assistant Counsel Samuel Stern. It is well known that FBI informants, and even agents themselves, often used code, or cover names. For example, Henry Wade, the powerful district attorney of Dallas who played such a prominent role in post-assassination investigations and Jack Ruby's prosecution, served as an FBI agent during World War II. While operating undercover in Ecuador in 1942, he assumed the code name "James" and was listed in Bureau reports as "Confidential Informant Number 6."

It is interesting to note that L. Gordon Shanklin and Kyle G. Clark, the FBI supervisors in the Dallas office, only mention the fact that no payment was made to Oswald for information in their affidavits. They do not specifically deny knowledge of Oswald as an informant as in the other agents' affidavits.

Other circumstances of Oswald's New Orleans stay also indicate the possibility of a relationship with the FBI.

In 1975, a New Orleans bar owner, Orest Pena, claimed to have seen Oswald in his Habana Bar in the company of both Cubans and FBI Agent Warren DeBrueys. Pena, himself an FBI informant and a Cuban exile associated with the CIA-backed Cuban Revolutionary Council, said he remembered Oswald as a man who came into his bar with a Cuban and ordered a lemonade, then vomited it up. He said he saw Oswald together with DeBrueys and other "government agents" on several occasions. The bar owner also stated the DeBrueys had been active in the Cuban Revolutionary Council, along with himself, Sergia Arcacha Smith, and Smith's close associate, David Ferrie. He said DeBrueys had participated in CRC meetings on his own and that everyone knew he was an FBI agent. Pena also said he was certain that DeBrueys was transferred to the Dallas FBI office at the same time Oswald was "transferred" there. And indeed, DeBrueys did end up in Dallas working on the FBI investigation of the JFK assassination. Pena also said about 10 days before he was to testify before the Warren Commission, DeBrueys threatened him, saying:

"If you ever talk anything about me, I will get rid - I'll get rid of your ass."

Pena added that Commission staff counsel Wesley J. Liebeler did not let him speak freely, so he decided to keep his mouth shut.

Agent DeBrueys denied both allegations and the House Select Committee on Assassinations chose to believe him.

Interestingly enough, despite the allegations of a DeBrueys-Oswald link plus the fact that it was Agent DeBrueys who brought pertinent pieces of assassination evidence to FBI headquarters from Dallas, Agent DeBrueys himself was never questioned by the Warren Commission.

Then there is the strange story of William S. Walter, who served as a security clerk for the New Orleans FBI office in 1963. Like CIA paymaster James Wilcott, Walter was a minor functionary who claims to have seen the wrong things. When he tried to tell what he knew, he found himself facing an official stone wall. Testifying to the House Select Committee on Assassinations, Walter said he was on duty the day that Quigley interviewed Oswald in the New Orleans police station. He said, in response to Quigley's request for a file check on Oswald that day, he found that the New Orleans FBI office maintained both a security and an informant file on Oswald. Quigley told the Committee that there was no informant file on Oswald, only the security file. Walter's story apparently was echoed by Dallas FBI Agent Will Hayden Griffin. According to a 1964 FBI memorandum, Griffin reportedly told people that Oswald was definitely an FBI informant and that files in Washington would prove it. Griffin later denied making any such comment. But Walter had other information for the committee. He claimed that while serving night duty in the FBI office on November 17, 1963, the New Orleans FBI office received a teletype from FBI headquarters warning against a possible assassination attempt on Kennedy during the coming trip to Dallas on November 22. Walter said he was alone in the New Orleans FBI office in the early morning hours when the teletype came through. He said it was headed "urgent," marked to the attention of all Special Agents and signed "director."

The thrust of the teletype was that the Bureau had received information that a "militant revolutionary group" might attempt to assassinate Kennedy on his proposed trip to Dallas. It went on to say that all receiving offices should "immediately contact all CI's (Criminal Informants), PCI's (Potential Criminal Informants), local racial and hate group informants and determine if any basis for threat. Bureau should be kept advised of all developments by teletype ."

Walter said he telephoned special agent in charge Harry Maynard, who ordered Walter to call Special Agents with CI's and PCI's. Walter said he did this, writing the names of five agents contacted on the face of the teletype. By 8 a.m., Maynard had arrived for work and Walter went home.

Five days later, on November 22, 1963, Walter said he was in a barber shop when he heard about Kennedy's assassination. Rushing back to the FBI office, he showed the teletype to various agents and asked:

"How could this have happened? We had five days notice!"

Later that day, Walter said he typed a copy of the teletype, writing the five agents' names on the copy which he took home.

Walter said soon after the assassination, director Hoover ordered all agents in the New Orleans office who had written reports dealing with the case to review those reports. The object was to make sure there was nothing in them which might "embarrass the Bureau." Originals of the reports were to be destroyed. Checking the relevant file later, Walter discovered the teletype was missing.

In 1975, Walter told his story and showed his copy of the teletype to Senator Richard Schweiker. Later the House Select Committee on Assassinations looked into the matter.

The Committee checked with New Orleans agents, supervisor Maynard and even Walter's ex-wife, who also worked for the FBI. All claimed to know nothing about a teletype.

The Committee, declaring that it "declined to believe that many employees of the FBI would have remained silent for such a long time," concluded that Walter's story was "unfounded."

Unfounded or not, there were other stories in New Orleans which were even harder to dismiss -take, for example, Adrian Thomas Alba, operator of the Crescent City Garage. The Crescent City Garage was located next door to the William Reilly Coffee Company, Oswald's employer while in New Orleans. Alba, a quiet man who has not sought publicity, was both operator and part owner of the garage. Alba said the garage had a contract to maintain a number of cars for the nearby Secret Service and FBI offices. Alba said Oswald made frequent visits to his garage during the summer of 1963 and he got to know the ex-Marine quite well. They talked about firearms and whether Alba would loan Oswald his gun magazines. He claimed to have helped Oswald fix a sling on his Mannlicher-Carcano rifle.

But Alba's best story concerns a visit in early summer 1963. He said a man he believed to be an "FBI agent visiting New Orleans from Washington" came to his garage and took a green Studebaker from the car pool, after showing his credentials. The next day Alba said he saw the same car parked by Oswald's work place about 30 yards away. According to Alba:

"Lee Oswald went across the sidewalk. He bent down as if to look in the window and was handed what appeared to be a good-sized white envelope. He turned and bent as if to hold the envelope to his abdomen, and I think he put it under his shirt. Oswald went back into the building and the car drove off."

Years later, Alba said he saw the same thing happen the next day, but was farther away and could not see what was passed to Oswald. He said he did not tell the Warren Commission about these incidents because he did not recall them until 1970 when he was reminded of this by a TV commercial depicting a man running to and from a taxi.

The House Select Committee on Assassinations checked garage records and found that two Studebakers had been signed out during that time in 1963, but by Secret Service agents.

Alba recalled seeing Oswald after he was fired from the coffee company allegedly for malingering. Alba said Oswald seemed pleased with the turn of events and said he expected to soon be working at the National Aeronautics and Space Administration (NASA) plant near New Orleans.

Alba quoted Oswald as saying:

"I have found my pot of gold at the end of the rainbow."

Of course, this was not to be. Oswald's destiny lay in Dallas. But oddly enough, five Reilly Coffee employees, all of whom were in contact with Oswald, did join the NASA facility shortly after Oswald's departure. Former New Orleans District Attorney Jim Garrison came across these intriguing employment shifts during his ill-fated JFK assassination probe. Oswald left the coffee company on July 19, 1963, just a few weeks before he began his public show of handing out FPCC material. According to Garrison, Alfred Claude, the man who hired Oswald at Reilly, went to work for Chrysler Aerospace Division located at NASA's New Orleans facility. Emmet Barbee, Oswald's immediate superior at Reilly followed Claude to the NASA center in a few days. And within a few weeks they were joined by John D. Branyon and Dante Marachini, both of whom worked with Oswald. Branyon and Marachini also began aerospace careers at the New Orleans NASA center. Marachini, who had gone to work for Reilly the same day as Oswald, also was a friend of CIA-Mafia agent, David Ferrie.

To compound these oddities, Garrison found that two of Ferrie's friends also went to work for the NASA center about this same time. James Lewallen, a friend of Ferrie who lived in the same apartment house as Marachini, went to work for Boeing, located in the NASA complex. Melvin Coffee, who had accompanied Ferrie on his strange Texas odyssey the night of the assassination, was hired by NASA at Cape Kennedy.

Was all this coincidence or was there some connecting link between these occurrences? Garrison claimed these men were lured into government-connected jobs so as to make them unavailable during the subsequent assassination investigation. And in fact, none of these men were called to testify before the Warren Commission.

Garrison wrote in "Heritage of Stone":

"The fact that these transfers were being made not in direct support of the assassination, but looking far beyond that, in order to complicate further investigations, which might afterward occur, serves to give some idea of the scope and professional nature of the entire operation."

Other Dallas FBI agents swore under oath that Oswald was never an FBI informant. However, the truthfulness of their statements has come under severe question in light of the saga of FBI Agent James P. Hosty, Jr. Hosty, who worked in the Dallas FBI office, was assigned to check on Oswald prior to the assassination. Although Hosty claims to never have met Oswald in person, his name, address, telephone number and car license number appeared in Oswald's personal notebook - a fact omitted from a December 23, 1963, FBI report to the Warren Commission. In testimony to the Commission, director Hoover explained that the omission was due to the fact that the report was not originally intended for the Commission. He said that the information on Hosty in Oswald's notebook was presented to the Commission in a February 11, 1964 report. Of course, by that time, the Commission was already very much aware of the connection between Hosty and Oswald. Hoover also explained that it was not unusual for agents to leave their name, address and telephone number for persons they were attempting to contact. He said Oswald's wife Marina probably jotted down Hosty's license number for her husband. Hosty, however, claimed he had parked his car some distance from the house where Marina was staying to avoid drawing attention to his visit.

Despite FBI assurances that Oswald had not worked for the Bureau, Warren Commission members remained suspicious. These suspicions were aggravated by news stories appearing early in 1964 suggesting a relationship between Oswald and the Bureau.

Things came to a head on January 22, 1964, when Texas Attorney General Waggoner Carr called Warren Commission General Counsel J. Lee Rankin to report that he had information that Oswald had been recruited as an informant for the FBI in September 1962. He further stated that Oswald was being paid $200 a month and assigned Informant Number S-179. Carr cited Dallas District Attorney Henry Wade, a former FBI man, as the source of this information. Carr's call prompted a special executive session of the Warren Commission that same day (See THE WARREN COMMISSION). The minutes of that meeting were classified "Top Secret" until March 1975.

At this meeting Commissioners were tense. What could they do with this report that Oswald, already designated as JFK's assassin, was working for the FBI?

Commission General Counsel J. Lee Rankin said:

"...When the Chief Justice and I were just briefly reflecting on this (the Oswald-FBI informant rumor), we said if that was true and it ever came out, could be established, then you would have people think that there was a conspiracy to accomplish this assassination that nothing the Commission did or anybody could dissipate."

Representative Hale Boggs mused:

"Its implications are... fantastic..."

Referring to the fact that the Commission had no independent investigators and was forced to rely on the FBI for its information, Rankin said:

"They (the FBI) would like us to fold up and quit...They found the man. There is nothing more to do. The Commission supports their conclusions, and we can go on home and that is the end of it." Boggs remarked: "...I don't even like to see this being taken down." Former CIA director and Commission member Allen Dulles agreed:

"Yes, I think this record ought to be destroyed. Do you think we need a record of this?" Two days later, at the request of the Commission, Carr flew to Washington along with Henry Wade and one of his assistants, William Alexander. Also with Carr was a Texas attorney who had been designated as the state liaison with the Warren Commission, Leon Jaworski, who would later come to fame as the Watergate Special Prosecutor.

(Assassination researchers are intrigued by the fact that Wade, Jaworski and John Connally were classmates and friends at the University of Texas Law School in the late 1930s.)

Carr reiterated his story of Oswald as an FBI informer and said this information came from Wade. Wade then said he heard it from Alexander and Alexander claimed he got it from "Houston Post" reporter Alonzo Hudkins. Wade even said he had heard that Oswald also was an informant for the CIA with the number 110669.

On January 27, the Commissioners met again to consider this information. It is obvious from the transcripts that they feared approaching Hoover with the matter. Turning to the former CIA director Allen Dulles, Boggs asked how the FBI could disprove that Oswald was an informant.

Dulles replied:

"That is a hard thing to disprove, you know...I never knew how to disprove it...The record may not be on paper. But on paper you would have hieroglyphics that only two people know what they meant, and nobody outside of the agency would know; and you could say this meant the agent and somebody else could say it meant another agent."

"...The man who recruited (the agent) would know, wouldn't he?" asked Boggs.

"Yes, but he wouldn't tell," replied Dulles.

"Wouldn't tell under oath?" asked an incredulous Earl Warren.

Dulles replied:

"I wouldn't think he would tell under oath, no...He ought not tell it under oath...What I was getting at, I think, under any circumstances. I think Mr. Hoover would say certainly he didn't have anything to do with this fellow."

Exasperated, Boggs said:

"...What you do is...make our problem utterly impossible because you say this rumor can't be dissipated under any circumstances."

During this same meeting Rankin revealed that he had received the same Oswald-informant information from yet another source - the Secret Service. He said the Secret Service named a Dallas deputy sheriff, Allen Sweatt, as its source of information.

It was here that the Commissioners decided to just drop the entire matter. The FBI was informing them that Oswald was never an informant, and they could never prove or disprove it. Furthermore, although it would be several weeks before the Commission began hearing witnesses and taking testimony, it now appears the verdict already was in. In the same Commission minutes, Senator Richard Russell commented:

"They (the FBI) have tried the case and reached a verdict on every aspect."

The entire Oswald-FBI story is strange. Initially, officials in Texas seemed certain of their information. But soon they were backtracking, laying the story on newsman Hudkins. Hudkins claimed to have gotten the information from Allen Sweatt, who said he got it from Assistant DA Alexander. Interestingly, Alexander was never asked to explain where he got the story. And there the matter rested.

If Oswald was working for the FBI, it could explain many things. It could explain his mysterious movements and associations in New Orleans, where he tried to join both pro and anti-Castro groups. It could explain why he asked for Agent Quigley after his arrest. It could explain his light sentence after being found guilty of disturbing the peace. It could explain the remarks - later denied - by Agent Hosty in Dallas that the FBI knew about Oswald. It also could explain why the FBI did not pass along its security file on Oswald to the Dallas Police and it could explain why Dallas FBI chief Shanklin demanded that Hosty be allowed to question Oswald while in police custody. It also might explain a well-documented instance of the FBI destroying evidence after the assassination.

In August 1975, the "Dallas Times Herald" reported it had recently learned that two weeks before the JFK assassination, Oswald had delivered a note to the Dallas FBI office and that the note had been destroyed after the assassination. This story prompted an investigation by the Justice Department and eventually became the center of hearings before a subcommittee of the House Judiciary Committee.

It is now certain that two to three weeks prior to the assassination, Oswald came to the Dallas FBI office and asked a receptionist to see Agent Hosty. When told Hosty was not in, Oswald left a note. The receptionist, Nancy Fenner, noted that Oswald asked for "S.A. (Special Agent) Hosty...(in) exactly those words." It's surprising that Oswald would be so familiar with Bureau jargon.

Years later Fenner recalled the note said something like:

"Let this be a warning. I will blow up the FBI and the Dallas Police Department if you don't stop bothering my wife - Lee Harvey Oswald."

Hosty, who said he was told not to mention the note at the time of the assassination, said the note was not violent in tone and that it said something more like:

"If you have anything you want to learn about me, come talk to me directly. If you don't cease bothering my wife, I will take appropriate action and report this to the proper authorities."

Hosty also said the note was folded and expressed doubts that Fenner had read it properly. He said that within hours of the assassination, he was called into the office of Special Agent in Charge L. Gordon Shanklin. Hosty said Shanklin was visibly "agitated and upset" and wanted to know about the Oswald note.

After Oswald had been killed, Shanklin again called in Hosty. Hosty said Shanklin produced the Oswald note from his desk drawer and said:

"Oswald's dead now. There can be no trial. Here, get rid of this."

As Hosty tore up the note, Shanklin cried:

"No? Get it out of here. I don't even want it in this office. Get rid of it!"

Hosty said he took the pieces of note to a nearby restroom and "flushed it down the drain." Before the House subcommittee, Shanklin denied any knowledge of the Oswald note. But Assistant FBI director William Sullivan said Shanklin had discussed an "internal problem" concerning a message from Oswald with him and that the presence of the note was common knowledge at FBI headquarters.

Another Dallas agent, Kenneth Howe, also testified he showed Shanklin the Oswald note the weekend of the assassination. Existence of the note also was talked about among some members of the Dallas Police Department, suggesting they had heard about it from Bureau personnel.

Mrs. Ruth Paine even mentioned that Oswald had dropped off a note to the FBI in her testimony to the Warren Commission in 1964. She told the Commission:

"He (Oswald) told me he had stopped at the downtown office of the FBI and tried to see the agents and left a note..."

Why then did the Bureau only acknowledge the existence of the note after media reports in 1975? The House Select Committee on Assassinations said the incident concerning the note was a "serious impeachment of Shanklin's and Hosty's credibility," and that with the note's destruction," it was not possible to establish with confidence what its contents were."

It seems unbelievable, however, that the FBI would knowingly destroy evidence, especially if it would have proven Oswald prone to violence. Some researchers say a more plausible explanation is that Oswald, as an FBI informant, tried to warn the Bureau about the coming assassination. This could explain the receptionist's insistence that the note contained threatening words. It also could explain why the FBI was so concerned and fearful of the note that it was ordered destroyed.

Hosty, incidentally, was one of 17 FBI agents reprimanded for the way they handled the assassination case. He was suspended for 30 days without pay and transferred to Kansas City. However, after the Oswald note matter was investigated by the House Select Committee on Assassinations and despite the contradictions between Hosty's testimony and that of his superior, Shanklin, Hosty was given more than $1,000 in repayment for the Hoover-imposed suspension.

"Rather than come out and admit (that I was wronged in 1963)...they (the FBI) just gave me my money back," commented Hosty.

In light of the FBI's meticulously-worded denials that Oswald had never been paid as an FBI informant, it should be noted that all informants don't work for money. It is common practice for the FBI to gain information from people who have something to fear from the Bureau, perhaps the possibility of being charged with a past crime or even possible deportation. Oswald's wife, Marina, had never become a U.S. citizen and therefore was subject to deportation at the government's pleasure. She even mentioned this to the Warren Commission, saying:

"Sometimes the FBI agents asked me questions which had no bearing or relationship (to the assassination), and if I didn't want to answer, they told me that if I wanted to live in this country, I would have to help in this matter..."

According to Dallas Police Capt. Will Fritz, Oswald became angry when FBI Agent Hosty confronted him. According to Fritz, Oswald "beat on the desk and went into a kind of tantrum," telling Hosty:

"I know you. You accosted my wife on two occasions."

Asked by Fritz what he meant by "accosted," Oswald replied:

"Well, he threatened her...he practically told her she would have to go back to Russia."

Perhaps Oswald was not recruited by the promise of money, but by the threat of Marina's deportation.

Finally, while it cannot be established with any certainty that Oswald was working for the FBI, it is now known that his killer definitely was.

In early 1959, at a time when Jack Ruby may have been involved in smuggling activities with Cubans, he contacted the FBI and said he wanted to provide the Bureau with information(See JACK RUBY). Accordingly, Agent Charles W. Flynn opened a Potential Criminal Informant (PCI) file on Ruby. This relationship between Ruby and the Bureau was mentioned in a letter from Hoover to the Warren Commission dated June 9, 1964. However, this information was kept classified until 1975.

In the 1964 letter, Hoover stated that Ruby "furnished no information whatsoever and further contacts with him were discontinued." This disclaimer is difficult to swallow, since records show that agents met with Ruby on at least eight occasions between April and October 1959. Since Ruby was an FBI informant, and considering the massive circumstantial evidence now available concerning Oswald's relationship to the Bureau, the possibility of Lee Harvey Oswald having worked for the Bureau cannot be ruled out.

###

And if by the spring of 1963, when Oswald arrived in New Orleans, he was indeed working with the FBI, it could explain his contacts with the strange characters at 544 Camp Street.

Crossfire: 544 Camp Street

By the spring of 1963 the faded, three-story Newman Building at the corner of Camp and Lafayette Streets in New Orleans had become known as the "Cuban Grand Central Station." Housed in this building was the CIA-backed Cuban Revolutionary Council, as well as Sergio Archaca Smith's Crusade to Free Cuba, both virulently anti-Castro groups. Also, in the same building was the private detective firm of Guy Banister. In the summer of 1963, Banister's employees included Jack Martin and David Ferrie, Oswald's former Civil Air Patrol leader, and perhaps Oswald himself.

During the 1940's Banister was the Special Agent in Charge of the FBI office in Chicago, Jack Ruby's hometown. One of his FBI associates at that time was Robert Maheu, who left the Bureau in the 1950's and later became the chief go-between in the CIA-Mafia assassination plots against Castro (See MOBSTERS and AGENTS).

According to Banister's family, he was also involved with Naval Intelligence during the war and maintained contacts with that intelligence group throughout his life. Banister left the Bureau and came to New Orleans in the 1950's at the request of the mayor to become chief of police. However, in 1957 he was forced to retire after an incident in the Old Absinthe House, where Banister allegedly threatened a waiter with a gun.

After this incident, he formed Guy Banister Associates which occupied a ground floor office in the Newman Building with the address of 531 Lafayette Street, the side entrance to 544 Camp Street. This office was within walking distance of the New Orleans FBI office, Naval Intelligence offices and other Government agencies. It was here that Banister became embroiled in right-wing causes. A member of the John Birch Society, Banister also was a member of the Minutemen, the Louisiana Committee on Un-American Activities and the publisher of a racist publication entitled "Louisiana Intelligence Digest."

Reportedly an alcoholic, Banister was later described as "a tragic case" by a member of the New Orleans Crime Commission.

With the advent of Fidel Castro, Banister threw himself into the anti-Castro Cuban activity in New Orleans. He helped organize such anti-Castro groups as the Cuban Revolutionary Democratic Front and Friends of a Democratic Cuba. According to an April 25, 1967, story in the "New Orleans States Item," Banister even served as a munitions supplier during the planning stages of the Bay of Pigs invasion. In fact, Banister employees have said that as late as 1963, guns of every type littered Banister's office.

It was shortly before the Bay of Pigs invasion that a strange incident happened in New Orleans which tied the name of Oswald to Banister's Friends of a Democratic Cuba group.

After the assassination, Oscar Deslatte, in 1961 the assistant manager of a Ford dealership in New Orleans, told authorities that a man approached him in January 1961 wanting to buy 10 Ford trucks for an Anti-Castro organization called Friends for a Democratic Cuba. Deslatte said the man gave the name Oswald as the man who would pay for the trucks (See WAS OSWALD REALLY OSWALD?).

Lee Oswald, of course, was still in Russia at that time, but the coincidence of an "Oswald" connected to Banister's anti-Castro group is intriguing.

Banister also ran a network of young informants on the campuses of Tulane and Louisiana State Universities, collecting what he hailed as the largest file of anti-communist intelligence in the South. Jerry Milton Brooks, a former Minuteman who worked for Banister, said he would regularly take Banister's updated files to the New Orleans FBI office where they were integrated into the Bureau's files. Brooks also said Maurice B. Gatlin, another Banister employee who regarded the younger Brooks as a protégé, once said:

"Stick with me - I'll give you a license to kill."

Although Banister's files were scattered after his sudden death in 1964 - he reportedly died of a heart attack before authorities could question him about his contacts with Oswald and the assassination - some idea of their scope can be found in indexed titles made public by Louisiana lawmen. "Central Intelligence Agency," "Ammunition and Arms," "Civil Rights Program of JFK," and significantly, "Fair Play for Cuba Committee" and "International Trade Mart" are just a few of these titles. Banister's operation was right in the thick of New Orleans intelligence activities, located near Government offices and just around the corner from the Reilly Coffee Company, Oswald's employer and a supporter of anti-Castro Cuban exiles.

On at least two separate occasions, Banister employees saw Oswald handing out pro-Castro literature and reported it to their boss. In one instance Banister simply laughed, and on the other, he told his secretary Delphine Roberts:

"Don't worry about him...He's with us. He's associated with the office."

Roberts also said she saw Oswald at 544 Camp Street, and that he filled out one of Banister's "agent" application forms. She later told author Anthony Summers:

"Oswald came back a number of times. He seemed to be on familiar terms with Banister and with the office."

Roberts' daughter had a photography studio at 544 Camp Street and she too recalled Oswald:

"I knew he had his pamphlets and books and everything in a room along from where we were with our photographic equipment. He was quiet and mostly kept to himself, didn't associate with too many people. He would just tell us "hello" or "good-bye" when we saw him. I never saw him talking to Guy Banister, but I knew he worked in his office. I knew they were associated. I saw some other men who looked like Americans coming and going occasionally from the room Oswald used....I got the impression Oswald was doing something to make people believe he was something he wasn't. I am sure Guy Banister knew what Oswald was doing..."

One of the things that Oswald and Banister might have been doing involves the small town of Clinton, Louisiana. Located about 90 miles northwest of New Orleans, Clinton was a small community of about 1,500 people in 1963. Like most small towns, it was difficult to keep the townspeople from knowing just about everything that went on there - especially if it involved strangers.

In 1963, the civil rights program was gaining strength throughout the South. That summer would become known as "civil rights summer" and tiny Clinton was one of the communities targeted for a black voter registration drive by the Congress of Racial Equality (CORE). Tension in Clinton was high. Earlier in the summer, several blacks were arrested there simply for writing appeals to the mayor and district attorney. One morning, between August 22 and September 17 - a time when Oswald's whereabouts remain officially unaccounted for - a long line of blacks waited to undergo the then-tedious process of registering to vote. Local police stood nearby, watchful for any breach of the peace. The incident that morning - pieced together from several witnesses - began with the arrival of a large, black Cadillac carrying three men. After parking near the registrar's office, one of the men - a slightly-built white man - got out and joined the line of blacks. Later, witnesses were unanimous in identifying the man as Lee Harvey Oswald.

The registrar, Henry Palmer, had more to go on than just looks. He later recounted:

"I asked him for his identification and he pulled out a U.S. Navy I.D. card...I looked at the name on it and it was Lee H. Oswald with a New Orleans address."

Palmer said Oswald told him he wanted to get a job at a nearby East Louisiana State Hospital and thought he would have a better chance if he was a registered voter. Oswald was told he had not lived in the area long enough to qualify as a voter and, after thanking Palmer, he returned to the Cadillac. Meanwhile, Town Marshal John Manchester had approached the car, but left after speaking to the driver, whom he later described as "a big man, grey-haired, with ruddy complexion."

Other witnesses, including the local CORE chairman, had no trouble recalling the third man. They said he had hair and eyebrows which didn't appear real. Recalling Ferrie's use of false eyebrows and wigs, it is almost a certainty that the third man in the Cadillac was David Ferrie.

New Orleans District Attorney Jim Garrison later tried to prove that the driver was Clay Shaw, the defendant in Garrison's JFK assassination plot trial in 1967 (See THE GARRISON INVESTIGATION).

Today many researchers believe the driver might well have been Guy Banister. But what would Banister (or Shaw), Ferrie and Oswald be doing in Clinton? One suggestion - that fits the facts - is that the trio were somehow involved in the FBI's Counterintelligence Program (COINTELPRO). It is now well established that COINTELPRO was a ruthless long-term Bureau program designed by Hoover to disrupt and discredit political groups he opposed. The notorious wire-tapping of Dr. Martin Luther King is just one example of this program.

It appears that part of the purpose of the Clinton incident was to link Oswald - the self-professed Marxist - with the CORE voter registration program. Any other purposes remain unclear. But it is certain that by late summer 1963, Oswald was playing a dangerous game - caught up in a mixture of CIA and FBI-related agents who were operating largely on their own and in touch with both anti-Castro Cubans and organized crime.

###

Despite the contacts between Oswald and both current and former FBI agents - plus the evidence of advance warnings of the assassination to the Bureau - the Dallas tragedy still occurred.

While no unquestioned case for FBI involvement in the assassination can be made, there is now no doubt that the Bureau manipulated the subsequent investigation. In fact, FBI activities after the assassination fall into the realm of criminal behavior. Consider:

SUPPRESSION OF EVIDENCE - Examples include the loss of Beverly Oliver's assassination film which she claimed was taken by FBI agents; the disappearance of an assassination bullet taken from under the noses of a police guard by an FBI agent; the suppression of testimony, such as Ed Hoffman who which failed to support the lone assassin theory; and the failure of the Bureau to follow important leads, even when requested to do so by the Warren Commission.

DESTRUCTION OF EVIDENCE - Examples include the destruction of the Oswald note by FBI Agent Hosty; the destruction of a license plate number on a photograph of General Edwin Walker's home found intact among Oswald's possessions; and the immediate cleaning of the Presidential limousine which effectively destroyed vital ballistic evidence.

INTIMIDATION OF WITNESSES - Examples include Richard Carr who saw two men run from the Texas School Book Depository but later was told by FBI agents, "If you didn't see Lee Harvey Oswald in the School Book Depository with a rifle, you didn't witness it."; Ed Hoffman who was told by a Bureau agent, "You'd better keep quiet, you could get killed"; and Jean Hill who said she was hounded by Bureau agents until she stopped giving media interviews.

In any normal criminal case, such behavior would constitute a jailable offense, but this was not an ordinary case, and the culprits were not ordinary citizens but FBI agents. If a local police agency proves to be corrupt, the FBI can be brought in to investigate. But in the case of the Bureau - who watches the watchers?

Also consider the documented matter of warnings that Oswald would be shot while being transferred from Dallas police headquarters. An anonymous telephone call was received at the Dallas FBI office at 2:15 a.m. Sunday, November 24, 1963. The caller warned that Oswald would be killed during the transfer to the county jail later that morning. The police were in charge of the transfer and apparently the Bureau decided not to step in. There were no significant change of plans and by that afternoon, Oswald was dead.

Since there can be no question that in 1963 the FBI was personified by J. Edgar Hoover, the questions of means, motives and opportunities must fall on his shoulders. Did Hoover have the means of committing the assassination? Surrounded by countless informers, agents and former employees - many of whom were in contact with Lee Harvey Oswald - Hoover's means were limitless. Hoover's motives are obvious. First, his hatred of the Kennedys was notorious, and second, he was justly fearful that upon re-election John Kennedy would not allow him to continue as FBI director.

This fear was well founded. Rumors in Washington were plentiful that Hoover would be eased out as FBI director after Kennedy's re-election in 1964.

William Hundley, former head of the Justice Department's organized crime section, is quoted in "The director" as saying the thing which finally destroyed the fragile relationship between Hoover and Attorney General Robert Kennedy was:

"...that Bobby mentioned to too many people who complained to him about Hoover that, "Look, just wait," and we all got the message that they were going to retire him after Jack got re-elected and Hoover hit seventy. And it got back to him."

Presidential aide David Powers stated he believes that the question of Hoover's retirement was the subject of one of the very few private meetings between Kennedy and the Bureau chief:

"He (Hoover) had a long lunch with the President and Bobby (on October 31, 1963,) and, as you know, three weeks later we went to Dallas."

But did Hoover have the opportunity? Hoover built his immense power base by currying favor with men more powerful than himself. It is extremely unlikely that Hoover - the ultimate bureaucrat - would have assumed the responsibility for initiating the assassination. However it is certainly plausible that Hoover - once having discovered the assassination plot through his network of agents and informers - caused it to happen simply by not preventing it. Of course this is tantamount to criminal complicity and would have required substantial manipulation of testimony and evidence to prevent the Bureau's role from being discovered.

Hoover would have required help. And help he had - in the form of the new President, his former neighbor and dinner friend Lyndon B. Johnson - another man about to lose his job thanks to the Kennedys, as well as Johnson's powerful friends in oil and business.

However, the question of the protection of the President must be taken into account. Could this protection be circumvented? Could a plot to assassinate a U.S. President succeed without in some way neutralizing or involving the Secret Service?

Crossfire: The Secret Service

On the day of his inauguration, Thomas Jefferson walked from the Washington boarding house where he was staying to the Capitol without the benefit of any protection. It was symptomatic of the young Republic that presidents had not yet acquired the mantle of royalty and thus, did not require protection.

This naiveté began to change after an assassination attempt on President Andrew Jackson on January 10, 1835. An English-born house painter named Richard Lawrence aimed two pistols at Jackson as he walked out of the Capitol. However, both weapons misfired. Lawrence was determined to have been insane and was incarcerated for the remainder of his life. But America had become aware of the possibility of assassination.

In August 1842, a drunken painter threw some rocks at President John Tyler, who was walking on the White House grounds. Congress soon passed an act creating an auxiliary watch of the Washington Metropolitan Police for the protection of public and private property consisting of a captain and 15 men. Although the act was primarily aimed at protecting property - particularly the White House - it was the crude beginning of presidential protection.

Protection was more pronounced for Abraham Lincoln, who guided the nation through the emotional years of the American Civil War. From the moment of his election in 1860, Lincoln was the object of hate mail and threats. During his inauguration, unprecedented protective measures were taken - especially in light of a threat to kill Lincoln as he passed through the city of Baltimore. Union soldiers guarded strategic points all along his way to Washington and the inauguration platform.

Even after Lincoln was fatally shot by actor John Wilkes Booth in Ford's Theater on April 14, 1865, there was no clamor to create official protection for the President. Americans thought his death was just a freak accident of the war.

The Secret Service, which was organized as a division of the Treasury Department the year Lincoln was killed, was to only pursue counterfeiters. It was not until after the assassination of President James A. Garfield in 1881 that serious attempts at presidential protection were taken. While the number of White House policemen was increased to 27 after mail threats increased against President Grover Cleveland, it was not until 1894 that Secret Service agents were informally assigned to the President. Throughout the Spanish-American War, a small detail of Secret Service men were stationed at the White House. However, Secret Service protection of President William McKinley did not prevent his assassination on September 6, 1901.

McKinley was attending a public reception at the Pan American Exposition in Buffalo, N.Y., when self-professed anarchist Leon F. Czolgosz fired two bullets into him despite the proximity of four Buffalo detectives, four soldiers and three Secret Service agents. McKinley died eight days later and Czolgosz was executed.

The McKinley assassination finally provoked a response from Congress, which in 1902 ordered the Secret Service to assume full-time protection of the President. Two agents were permanently assigned to the White House. This onset of around-the-clock presidential protection prompted President Theodore Roosevelt to write:

"The Secret Service men are a very small but very necessary thorn in the flesh."

Slowly over the years, the power and funding of the Secret Service was increased. Their jurisdiction eventually covered threats against the President and even security for presidential candidates.

By World War II, the White House detail of the Secret Service had grown to 37 men. Following an unsuccessful attack on President Harry S. Truman by Puerto Rican nationalists in 1951, legislation was passed permanently authorizing the Secret Service to protect not only the President, but also his immediate family, the president-elect and the vice president. By 1963, the Secret Service remained a small and specialized group restricted by law, funding and rivalry by the largest of the governmental investigative agencies - the FBI. Nevertheless, the Secret Service had an average strength of more than 500 and 65 field offices throughout the country.

Protecting President John F. Kennedy was no easy matter, as Kennedy had an active personal life which included the desire to meet and be with people.

Kennedy assistant, Kenneth O'Donnell, was in charge of the White House staff and, as such, had control over the Secret Service. However, O'Donnell left security measures up to the Special Agent-in-Charge of the White House Detail, Gerald Behn. Sizing up the problems of protecting an active President such as Kennedy, O'Donnell once told Behn:

"Politics and protection don't mix."

During his fateful trip to Texas, Kennedy was assigned no less than 70 Secret Service agents plus eight clerks. This was about 14 percent of the entire Secret Service force. Yet glaring deficiencies with the President's protection are now known. First, although apparently there were at least three assassination attempts planned against Kennedy in the fall of 1963, information on this was not forwarded to either the agent in charge of Kennedy's protection or the special agent-in-charge of the Dallas Secret Service office.

An ex-Marine named Thomas Arthur Vallee, who was a member of the right-wing John Birch Society and a vocal Kennedy critic, was arrested by the Secret Service in Chicago. Vallee was discovered to have an M-1 rifle, a handgun and 3,000 rounds of ammunition in his car. It was also learned that Vallee had asked for time off from his job on November 2, the date Kennedy was to visit Chicago. Despite the weapons found, Vallee was released from custody on the evening of November 2 and was still considered a threat. Yet no word of the Vallee matter was transmitted to Dallas.

One of the strangest stories to come out of the Secret Service at this time, however, concerned the first black man to serve on the Service's White House Detail. Abraham Bolden was personally selected by Kennedy, apparently in an attempt to integrate the previously all-white Secret Service detail. Born in poverty, Bolden had been a police officer with an outstanding record before joining the Service. However, Bolden criticized the White House Detail for laxity and was transferred to the Chicago office and assigned to routine counterfeiting duties. According to Bolden, the Chicago Secret Service office received a teletype from the FBI shortly before Kennedy's November 2 visit warning that an assassination attempt would be carried out in that city by a four-man Cuban hit squad armed with high-powered rifles. Bolden said the entire office was involved in this matter, but that it was kept top secret. Bolden, years later, could not identify Vallee as a participant in this threat and the belief among researchers is that Vallee played no part in this second assassination plan.

Regardless, Kennedy's trip to Chicago was canceled, although the House Select Committee on Assassinations could not determine the cause of the cancellation. Three weeks after Kennedy's death, Bolden discovered that information on the Chicago threat was to be kept from the Warren Commission and he made a trip to Washington to tell what he knew. However, he was quickly taken back to Chicago, where he was later charged with discussing a bribe with two known counterfeiters. Brought to trial, Bolden was convicted of accepting a bribe - even after one of the two counterfeiters admitted perjury - and was sentenced to a lengthy prison term after his motion for a retrial was denied.

While the Secret Service had admitted the Chicago threat occurred, it has repeatedly refused to clarify the matter.

Bolden, who had since been released from prison, claimed he was framed and convicted to silence him regarding the Kennedy threat.

Whether the Chicago threat was real or not, the information again was not passed along to Dallas. Likewise, the Service failed to follow up on another threat, this time from the volatile Miami area. Here a wealthy right-wing extremist named Joseph A. Milteer accurately predicted what was to happen to Kennedy in Dallas almost three weeks before the event (See REDNECKS AND OILMEN). Again, while this information was forwarded to the Service's Protective Research Section (PRS) in Washington, it was never relayed to Winston G. Lawson, the advance agent in Dallas, or Forrest V. Sorrels, the special agent-in-charge in Dallas.

And, in Dallas, neither Lawson nor Sorrels got a preview of the zig-zag turn which placed Kennedy under the Texas School Book Depository on November 22.

On Monday, November 18, Lawson and Sorrels drove the motorcade route with Dallas Police Chief Jesse Curry. The trio noted potential security problem areas and estimated the entire motorcade trip would last about 45 minutes. However, during this dry run, the agents did not get a chance to observe the Z-shaped turns in Dealey Plaza. According to the Warren Commission testimony of Sorrels, after driving from Dallas' Love Field to the downtown area:

"We came up on Houston Street from Union Station (entering Dealey Plaza from the south), turned right on Main Street, right on Main Street, through the very heart of the town." The agents apparently never made the 90-degree turn from Main onto Houston, then the 120-degree turn from Houston onto Elm Street, which would have taken them through Dealey Plaza. By missing the turn in front of the Texas School Book Depository, perhaps the agents didn't realize that it violated Secret Service regulations, which stated that when a Presidential motorcade must slow down for a turn, "...the entire intersection must be examined in advance, searched and inspected from top to bottom." It would appear from Sorrels' testimony that the Secret Service officials were unaware of the torturous turn in front of the Depository. However, before the Warren Commission, Dallas Police Chief Curry stated:

"...we left the parade route up to the host committee. They chose the route, asking that we go down Main Street, and then we would go on to what is known as the...Triple Underpass onto Stemmons Expressway. It was necessary to get on this expressway to get to the Trade Mart, the building where the dinner, or luncheon, would be held. But, had we proceeded on down Main Street, we could not have gotten onto Stemmons Expressway unless we had public works to come in and remove some curbing and build some barricades over it. (NOTE: Elm is one-way westward. To enter Stemmons from Main would have required the Presidential limousine to jump a curb, make a 100-degree turn and cross the three lanes of Elm in order to reach the northbound Stemmons entrance ramp.) So, in talking with the Secret Service people they suggested we come to Main Street to (Houston) Street, turn one block north and turn back west and go through the triple underpass on the Elm Street side...So that was the reason that it was necessary to take this motorcade one block north and then turn west again in order in order that we could get...through the triple underpass onto Stemmons Expressway without coming down and removing some curbing or building over the curbing and disturbing the regular flow of traffic."

Curry's argument appears rational enough - after all this was the normal flow of traffic. Yet in hindsight, it would not have been that difficult to simply place some 2-by-4 lumber in the Main Street curbing to allow the presidential limousine to cross to the Stemmons entrance (This author has made u-turns at that same location and it's not that difficult since the curb there is quite low.)

By this simple method the deadly zig-zag through Dealey Plaza could have been avoided.

The journey through Dealey Plaza itself was made necessary because of the selection of the Dallas Trade Mart as the site of the noon luncheon for the Kennedy entourage. And according to White House aide and advance man Jerry Bruno, this decision was made by Texas Governor John Connally after some questionable manipulations. After reviewing possible luncheon sites, the Secret Service and White House advance men settled on two locations - the new Dallas Trade Mart on Stemmons Expressway and the Women's Building in Fair Park, home of the Texas State Fair located south of the downtown area.

The Secret Service and the Kennedy people decided the Women's Building would be a preferable location because of fewer security problems plus it could accommodate more people. However, Democrats headed by Lyndon Johnson and John Connally wanted the Trade Mart because it was more modern and would be more acceptable to Dallas' wealthy elite.

Bruno wrote:

"There was another point about the Women's Building site that didn't seem important to anyone at the time. If Kennedy had been going there instead of to the Trade Mart, he would have been traveling two blocks farther away from the Texas School Book Depository - and at a much faster rate of speed."

The struggle over the luncheon site continued until November 18, when Bruno got a call from White House Aide Kenneth O'Donnell. Bruno quoted O'Donnell as saying:

"We're going to let Dallas go, Jerry. We're going to let Connally have the Trade Mart site."

Bruno was flabbergasted. Despite the recommendations of the Secret Service, the Kennedy White House and himself, Connally had managed to swing the decision to the Trade Mart. Bruno said he later learned that Johnson-Connally people had held up selling tickets to the fund-raising luncheon in an effort to force the site location selection their way. Bruno wrote that upon learning of Kennedy's death:

"...I was angry, furious, at Connally and his demands to control the trip, where Kennedy should go, and now the President had been shot because we went here instead of there."

But if the Secret Service had no control over the luncheon site, they certainly were in control of the motorcade. And several strange things happened there. Police Chief Curry originally had asked that the presidential limousine be flanked by eight motorcycle policemen, four on each side of the car. However, Curry told the Warren Commission that Secret Service Agent Lawson ordered the number of cycles reduced to four, two on each side, and that the cycles were told to stay by the rear fender of the limousine. This order seems unusual to persons familiar with motorcade security, since the purpose of motorcycle outriders is to form a screen for the President in the event of trouble.

Curry too was puzzled over this apparent lack of concern for security as well as the fact that Dallas authorities were kept in the dark about Oswald. Years later, he wrote:

"In retrospect the physical security arrangements provided by the Dallas Police Force for the Secret Service were carried out exactly as they had requested. In my opinion all police officers involved gave their complete and whole-hearted cooperation. Yet the Dallas Police Department was never given any information or asked to cooperate with the FBI or Secret Service in any attempt to locate possible conspirators. The Dallas Police Department was never informed of the presence of Lee Harvey Oswald in Dallas, of his connections with the communist Party, or the fact that he "was capable of committing the assassination of President Kennedy." The enclosed sworn statement of Jack Revill, Lieutenant of the Criminal Intelligence Section revealed later that FBI agents were aware of Oswald and his movements but made no attempt to communicate this to the Dallas Police Department."

Curry also had planned to have a car containing Police Captain Will Fritz and other Dallas detectives immediately following the Presidential Limousine, a traditional practice during similar motorcades in the past. However, again Lawson vetoed this plan, "...so Fritz and his men were not in the motorcade."

Curry said Fritz later told him:

"I believe that had we been there we might possibly have got that man before he got out of that building or we would have maybe had the opportunity of firing at him while he was still firing."

And certainly the Dallas detectives could not have moved any slower than Kennedy's Secret Service protectors when the shots were fired in Dealey Plaza. Photos taken several seconds after the first shots show almost a total lack of response by the agents riding in a back-up car behind the Presidential limousine. While Kennedy is clutching at his throat, two of his guards have begun looking toward the rear while the others are looking directly at the President. The only agent to react with speed was Clint Hill, who was not even supposed to be on the Dallas trip. Assigned to protect Jackie Kennedy, Hill had been brought along at the last minute due to a specific request by the First Lady.

But the one aspect of the Secret Service protection which raises the disturbing possibility of complicity concerns the actions of Presidential limousine driver William Greer. At age 54, Greer was one of the oldest members of the White House detail. He had driven both Presidents Harry Truman and Dwight Eisenhower. On the evening of November 22, 1963, Greer drove Kennedy's body from Air Force One to Bethesda Naval Hospital for autopsy. Greer testified to the Warren Commission that as the limousine cruised down the incline of Elm Street through Dealey Plaza, he heard a noise which he thought was a motorcycle backfire. Shortly, he heard a second similar noise and glanced over his right shoulder long enough to see Governor Connally begin to slump to his left. Greer said he never caught sight of Kennedy.

Greer testified that he turned back forward and began to accelerate the limousine at the same time that Agent Roy Kellerman, riding to Greer's right, yelled, "Get out of here fast!" Then he claimed to have heard a third shot fired.

He said the Presidential limousine was moving at between 12 and 15 miles per hour the entire time. However, based on films made during the assassination and eyewitness testimony, it is now known that immediately after the first shot, the brake lights on the limousine came on and the big Lincoln slowed to almost a standstill, causing the Secret Service follow-up car to move up and almost touch the rear bumper. Contrary to his testimony, films show Greer looking over his right shoulder in Kennedy's direction for several seconds - in fact, until after the fatal head shot is delivered. Only then does Greer face forward and the limousine begin to accelerate. This discrepancy between Greer's testimony and reality has caused the more suspicious-minded researchers to suspect that some individuals within the Secret Service may have played a role in placing an under-protected President under the guns in Dealey Plaza. Greer's testimony, like that of all government officials presented to the Warren Commission, was taken at face value and there was no real attempt at cross examination. Likewise, testimony which indicated why the reaction of the Secret Service agents that day was so sluggish was not examined closely by the Warren Commission.

Crossfire: A Few Drinks at the Cellar

Within days of the assassination, it was common knowledge in the Fort Worth-Dallas area that Kennedy's Secret Service agents were drinking well into the morning hours of November 22 at a notorious Fort Worth club, the Cellar. The story eventually spread nationwide when columnist Drew Pearson wrote about the incident, adding editorially:

"Obviously men who have been drinking until nearly 3 a.m. are in no condition to be trigger-alert or in the best physical shape to protect anyone."

The stories set off an investigation within the Secret Service. Secret Service Chief James J. Rowley, a former FBI man who had been with the Service since 1938, obtained statements from the 10 agents involved, plus some Fort Worth news reporters and Pat Kirkwood, the club's owner and an acquaintance of Jack Ruby (See REDNECKS AND OILMEN).

Several Secret Service agents denied having any alcoholic drinks and the remainder stated they only had one or two drinks, including beers. Everyone, including Kirkwood, stressed that The Cellar had no license to sell alcoholic drinks. Rowley told the Warren Commission:

"This is a place that does not serve alcoholic beverages."

Why the concern about alcohol?

The Warren Commission cited Section 10 of the Secret Service Manual:

"10. Liquor, use of -a. Employees are strictly enjoined to refrain from the use of intoxicating liquor during the hours they are officially employed at their post of duty, or when they may reasonable expect that they may be called upon to perform an official duty. DURING ENTIRE PERIODS OF TRAVEL STATUS, THE SPECIAL AGENT IS OFFICIALLY EMPLOYED AND SHOULD NOT USE LIQUOR, UNTIL THE COMPLETION OF ALL OF HIS OFFICIAL DUTIES FOR THE DAY...HOWEVER, ALL MEMBERS OF THE WHITE HOUSE DETAIL AND SPECIAL AGENTS COOPERATING WITH THEM ON PRESIDENTIAL AND SIMILAR PROTECTIVE ASSIGNMENTS ARE CONSIDERED TO BE SUBJECT TO CALL FOR OFFICIAL DUTY AT ANY TIME WHILE IN TRAVEL STATUS. THEREFORE, THE USE OF INTOXICATING LIQUOR OF ANY KIND, INCLUDING BEER AND WINE, BY MEMBERS OF THE WHITE HOUSE DETAIL...WHILE THEY ARE IN TRAVEL STATUS, IS PROHIBITED (Emphasis added)."

Paragraph "c" of this regulation states:

"Violation or slight disregard of the above paragraphs...will be cause for removal from the Service."

Several of the agents involved, including four who were riding in the Secret Service follow-up car behind Kennedy, admitted drinking, but only two beers at the most. Of those who went to the Cellar, most said they had one or two drinks called a "salty dick" described as grapefruit juice and soda. Again, everyone concerned stressed that the Cellar did not sell alcohol, although alcohol brought in by a patron was allowed.

At least three agents guarding Kennedy's hotel suite took their "coffee break" at the Cellar, leaving two Fort Worth firemen behind to guard the President.

Since all the agents turned out at 7 a.m. that morning "sober, alert and ready for the performance of their duties," Rowley told the Warren Commission he did not punish them for the violation of regulations.

According to the Warren Commission:

"Chief Rowley testified that under ordinary circumstances he would have taken disciplinary action against those agents who had been drinking in clear violation of the regulation. However, he felt that any disciplinary action might have given rise to an inference that the violation of the regulation had contributed to the tragic events of November 22. Since he was convinced that this was not the case, he believed that it would be unfair to the agents and their families to take explicit disciplinary measures."

Obviously, Rowley and others in the government were very much concerned that the public might recall that President Lincoln was killed when his guard left his post to have a drink next door and might attach some significance to the fact that Kennedy's agents were keeping late hours in a "beatnik" club owned by an associate of Jack Ruby. The entire affair was toned down and quietly forgotten - except by Cellar owner Kirkwood. During the intervening years, Kirkwood has admitted that, while the Cellar had no license to sell liquor, nothing prevented him from giving it away. And give it away he did. In a 1984 article in the "Fort Worth Star-Telegram" recalling the wild days of The Cellar, Kirkwood said:

"We had strange rules. We'd give drinks to doctors, lawyers, politicians, stag girls, policemen, anybody we thought we might need if something broke out..."

Kirkwood's mother recalled that sometimes her son would "give away $500 worth of whiskey in a month."

In the newspaper article, Kirkwood mentioned the Secret Service incident:

"After midnight the night before (the assassination), some reporters called me from the Press Club (of Fort Worth), which didn't have a license to sell drinks after midnight. (They) said they had about 17 members of the Secret Service and asked if they could bring them to my place. I said sure. About 3:30 (a.m.), these Secret Service men were sitting around giggling about how the firemen were guarding the President over at the Hotel Texas. That night got the Cellar mentioned in The Warren Report."

Jimmy Hill, who managed the Cellar for 11 years, was even more to the point in that same article:

"After the agents were there, we got a call from the White House asking us not to say anything about them drinking because their image had suffered enough as it was. We didn't say anything, but those guys were bombed. They were drinking pure Everclear (alcohol)."

It might be noted that no one saw the agents in a drunken revelry - although at least one unmarried female reporter tagged along with them for company. In fact, according to most present, the agents sat by themselves talking and drinking. However, the fatigue of the multi-stop Texas trip coupled with the alcohol and lack of sleep obviously left the agents in less-than-optimum condition to perform their duties.

During the wild ride to Parkland Hospital, Presidential Aide Kenneth O'Donnell thought about the interval between the final shots. Years later, he wrote:

"...if there was an interval of at least five seconds between the second and third shots, as it seemed, that was long enough for a man to run 50 yards. If the Secret Service men in the front had reacted quicker to the first two shots at the President's car, if the driver had stepped on the gas before instead of after the fatal third shot was fired, would President Kennedy be alive today?"

Former Senator Ralph Yarborough echoed O'Donnell's concern when he wrote the Warren Commission:

"...All of the Secret Service men seemed to me to respond very slowly, with no more than a puzzled look. Knowing something of the training that combat infantrymen and Marines receive, I am amazed at the lack of instantaneous response by the Secret Service when the rifle fire began."

The reaction impairment issue aside, conspiracy-minded researchers, noting that throughout history a great man's bodyguards usually are the key to a successful coup d'etat, have suggested that Kennedy's guards may have been aware of the coming events in Dealey Plaza and were too full of stress for a quiet night's sleep.

Interestingly, none of Vice President Johnson's Secret Service guards were in the entourage which drank at the Press Club and then moved on the Cellar.

###

Aside from the sluggish reaction of the Secret Service agents in Dealey Plaza, other oddities occurred in the motorcade during the assassination. One agent, John D. Ready, did start to react by jumping off the follow-up car (a 1956 Cadillac touring sedan convertible). However, he was recalled by Special Agent-in-Charge Emory Roberts.

Then there is the well-publicized story of Agent Rufus Youngblood, who reportedly threw himself on top of Vice President Johnson after the shooting began in Dealey Plaza. Youngblood was considered the hero of the hour. In his report of that day, Youngblood wrote that upon hearing the first shot:

"I quickly looked all around again and could see nothing to shoot at, so I stepped over into the back seat and sat on top of the Vice President."

Johnson, in a statement to the Warren Commission, mentioned the incident:

"I was startled by the sharp report or explosion, but I had no time to speculate as to its origin because Agent Youngblood turned in a flash, immediately after the first explosion, hitting me on the shoulder, and shouted to all of us in the back seat to get down. I was pushed down by Agent Youngblood. Almost in the same moment in which he hit or pushed me, he vaulted over the back seat and sat on me. I was bent over under the weight of Agent Youngblood's body, toward Mrs. Johnson and Senator Yarborough."

Years later in his book, "The Vantage Point," Johnson elaborated:

"...it is apparent that there were many reactions to the first shot...I did not know what it was. Agent Youngblood spun around, shoved me on the shoulder to push me down and shouted to all of us, "Get down!" Almost in the same movement, he vaulted over the seat, pushed me to the floor, and sat on my right shoulder to keep me down and to protect me. Agent Youngblood's quick reaction was as brave an act as I have ever seen anyone perform. When a man, without a moment's thought or hesitation, places himself between you and a possible assassin's bullet, you know you have seen courage. And you never forget it."

However, former Texas Senator Ralph Yarborough, who was sitting beside Johnson that day, told this author:

"It just didn't happen....It was a small car, Johnson was a big man, tall. His knees were up against his chin as it was. There was no room for that to happen."

Yarborough recalled that both Johnson and Youngblood ducked down as the shooting began and that Youngblood never left the front seat. Yarborough said Youngblood held a small walkie-talkie over the back of the car's seat and that he and Johnson both put their ears to the device. He added:

"They had it turned down real low. I couldn't hear what they were listening to."

It would be most interesting to learn what the men listened to, since Dallas Police radio channel 1 designated for the Presidential party was blocked from radio traffic for about eight minutes beginning at 12:26 p.m., about four minutes before the shooting, by a transmitter stuck open. It may have been that Johnson and Youngblood were listening to a channel reserved for inter-vehicle radio traffic, but no transcripts of this channel have been made public.

The fact that Yarborough witnessed Johnson's reactions may explain his treatment at the hands of federal authorities during the ensuing assassination investigation. Yarborough told of his experience on ABC's "Goodnight America" in March 1975:

"...a couple of fellows (from the Warren Commission came) to see me sometime after that and they walked in like they were a couple of deputy sheriffs and I was a bank robber. Caught me walking out. "What have you got to say about this?" I didn't like the attitude. As a Senator I felt insulted, and they went off and wrote up something and brought it back for me to sign that I refused to sign. I threw it in the drawer and let it lie there for weeks. And they had on the last sentence on there to swear to it, "This is all I know about the assassination." They wanted me to sign this thing, then say this is all I know. Of course, I would never have signed it. Finally, after weeks went by, they began to bug me, "You're holding this up, you're holding this up," and demanding I sign the report. So, I typed one up myself and put basically what I told you about how the cars didn't take off and I said in there, "I don't want to hurt anyone's feelings, but for the protection of future presidents, they (Secret Service) should be trained to take off when there's a shot fired," and I sent that over. That's dated July 10, 1964, after the assassination. To my surprise, when the (Warren Commission) volumes were finally printed and came out, I was surprised at how many people down at the White House didn't file their affidavits til after the date, after that of mine the 10th of July, waiting to see what I was going to say before they'd filed theirs. I began to lose confidence then that's been further eroded with time. About two weeks ago in Texas, I stated I thought there should be another investigation, not reopen the same commission, but another investigation.'

Obviously, either Yarborough or Johnson and his Secret Service agents did not tell the truth of what happened in the motorcade.

Viewed in light of the Cellar incident among others, it would appear that Yarborough's credibility is more acceptable.

In reviewing the Secret Service activity in the course of Kennedy's Dallas trip, even the gullible Warren Commission concluded that, while "the detailed security measures taken at Love Field and the Trade Mart were thorough and well-executed, In other respects...the advance preparations for the President's trip were deficient."

The House Select Committee on Assassinations was even harsher, stating:

"In summary, the committee concluded that the Secret Service did in fact possess information that was not properly analyzed and put to use with respect to a protective investigation in advance of President Kennedy's trip to Dallas. Further, it was the committee's opinion that Secret Service agents in the Presidential motorcade in Dallas were not adequately prepared for an attack by a concealed sniper. Finally, the committee found that the investigation by the Secret Service of a possible assassination conspiracy was terminated prematurely when President Johnson ordered that the FBI assume primary investigative responsibility."

Lastly, there is the mystery of men encountered by several people in Dealey Plaza - including at least one policeman - who claimed to be Secret Service agents and even displayed credentials (See AFTERMATH). No Government panel has ever adequately investigated this matter to determine if these men were bogus or were they real agents? As has been demonstrated, there is ample cause for suspicion that the Secret Service was somehow involved in the assassination of John Kennedy.

While the President's guards certainly had the opportunity to achieve Kennedy's death -either through direct action or through inaction - there has been no motive established which would compel such moves. And since the Service is a small agency within the federal Government with relatively little power or influence, no one seriously believes that the Secret Service initiated or orchestrated the assassination.

However, the possibility remains that certain individuals within the Service may have been working for someone other than John Kennedy on November 22, 1963.

Crossfire: G-Men Summary

By 1963, the Federal Bureau of Investigation was tightly controlled by one man - the strange and officious bureaucrat J. Edgar Hoover. Even the Secret Service had become but a small and relatively powerless agency compared to the Bureau, although the Service was much older than the FBI. No one but Hoover has ever held so much power for so long in the history of the United States. And with the death of Kennedy, the power of the Presidency fell to Hoover's long-time friend, Lyndon B. Johnson. Between Hoover, the tyrant of the FBI, and Johnson, who as commander-in-chief controlled the military, these men had the power to manipulate any investigation into the assassination.

The many and varied contacts between the FBI and the accused assassin causes great suspicion among assassination researchers. These suspicions are heightened in light of the numerous and well-documented instances of FBI mismanagement of the post-assassination investigations. It can now be demonstrated that the Bureau suppressed evidence, destroyed evidence, fabricated evidence and intimidated witnesses. Any of these acts committed by a private citizen in the course of a criminal investigation would result in severe penalties. Both the FBI and the Secret Service were chided for inadequately protecting Kennedy by both the Warren Commission and the House Select Committee on Assassinations.

Due to the many connections between the Bureau and Lee Harvey Oswald coupled with a wealth of circumstantial and anecdotal evidence, it appears almost certain to most researchers that Oswald was working as an informant for the FBI in the months preceding the assassination - an allegation which even the Warren Commission took seriously. However, since it was the FBI that furnished most of the investigative evidence to the Commission, the question of Oswald's involvement with the Bureau could not be resolved.

Considering the Bureau's ability to substitute records, alter documents, lose important evidence and intimidate witnesses, it would be most surprising if any concrete evidence of Oswald's connection to the FBI should surface at this late date. Regardless of the nature of Oswald's relationship with the Bureau, the fact remains that both the FBI and the Secret Service failed to respond to several warnings, concerning both the assassination and the subsequent slaying of Oswald. And while evidence suggesting that elements within both the Bureau and the Secret Service may have played some role in the actual assassination can be disputed, there is no question that serious and suspicious manipulation of evidence occurred after the event. This fact, coupled with the unresolved connections between Oswald and the Bureau and the well-known hatred of the Kennedys by both Hoover and Johnson, causes most researchers today to regard certain agents within both the FBI and the Secret Service as prime suspects in the plot to kill Kennedy.

Crossfire: Rednecks and Oilmen

"(Who is) the one man who has profited most from the assassination - your friendly President, Lyndon Johnson."
Jim Garrison

By the fall of 1963, President John F. Kennedy had acquired more domestic enemies than just irate Anti-Castro Cubans, fearful mob bosses and disgruntled intelligence operatives. Both big business and supporters of States' Rights felt threatened by the new Kennedy brand of federalism - the wielding of total power from Washington. Hatred of Kennedy also was being fomented among those people opposed to the growing Civil Rights movement, particularly in the old Confederate states which included Texas.

By the early 1960s, desegregation was an idea whose time had come. The movement -initially unaided by Kennedy and other white national leaders and vehemently opposed by others -began to take on a life of its own. Although slavery have been abolished at the end of the Civil War, blacks had continued to live under the most discriminatory conditions, particularly in the South. Desegregation of the Federal Government only dated back to the term of Franklin Roosevelt, when he doubled the number of black Government employees between 1932 and 1937.

World War II hastened the process as blacks found acceptance in a military hungry for manpower. On June 25, 1941, Roosevelt outlawed racial discrimination in defense industries. In Korea, military considerations prompted the total disappearance of segregation in the U.S. Army.

Then in 1954, came the landmark decision of the Supreme Court outlawing segregation in public schools. This decision was extended to include public transportation and related facilities two years later.

In 1957, Congress passed the Civil Rights Act which was meant to end voting discrimination based on race. Literacy tests and the poll tax, longtime foundations of controlling votes in the South, were on the way out. But while such legislative activities indicated progress and encouraged black activists, the idea of true desegregation proved elusive in many areas of both the North and the South. Local authorities, both reflecting and yielding to the prejudices of the white population, dragged their feet in adopting desegregation policies and, in some instances, openly defied desegregation laws.

Into this cauldron of centuries-old passions stepped Kennedy the politician, hoping to find middle ground between the radical activists - both black and white. Kennedy friend Theodore Sorensen wrote:
"Jack Kennedy ... knew comparatively little and cared little about the problems of civil rights and civil liberties."

However, during the presidential campaign of 1960, Kennedy found it expedient to chastise the Eisenhower Administration for not doing more to end segregation, despite the fact that two civil rights bills were passed during that time, the first such major legislation since the Emancipation Proclamation.

In his 1961 inaugural address, Kennedy spurred on the expectations of millions of black Americans when he said:

"Let the word go forth from this time and place, to friend and foe alike, that the torch has been passed to a new generation of Americans ... one unwilling to witness or permit the slow undoing of those human rights to which this nation has always been committed and to which we are committed today at home and around the world."

Such rhetoric was effective for Kennedy. During the 1960 election, blacks responded to the support of Kennedy by Dr. Martin Luther King. They turned out a hefty 78 percent vote for the Massachusetts Senator.

By 1962, polls showed Kennedy ranked only behind King himself in popularity among black Americans despite the fact that immediate action by Kennedy on civil rights was limited.

Although Kennedy had promised to end segregation in federal housing, it was nearly two years after taking office, with violent racial incidents increasing across the nation, before he took action.

Kennedy dawdled until June, 1963, before sending his own civil rights bill to Congress and even this did not pass until after his death when the measure was adroitly maneuvered through Congress by President Lyndon Johnson.

Furthermore, in an attempt to appease the anti-civil rights forces, Kennedy made several appointments which greatly angered his black supporters. For example, he named William H. Cox to a federal judgeship. Cox, a close friend to conservative Mississippi Senator James Eastland, immediately attempted to block a Justice Department-sponsored voter registration drive in Mississippi.

In May 1961, one month after the ill-fated Bay of Pigs Invasion and at a time when Kennedy was preparing to journey to Europe for an historic meeting with Soviet Premier Khrushchev, King and 12 other "Freedom Riders" left Washington, D.C. for New Orleans to test the desegregation of public facilities along the way.

According to Kennedy biographer John H. Davis, the President asked the activists not to go ahead with the ride for fear it might cause him embarrassment during his European trip. To which the black leaders replied:

"But we have been embarrassed all our lives."

By the end of May, the riders had grown to fill two buses which left behind a trail of violence. In Aniston, Alabama, one bus was firebombed while in Birmingham, the other was met by a gang of whites who beat the occupants with pipes for more than 10 minutes before police arrived. After entering Montgomery, the riders were attacked by a mob of 1,000 while a local police official looked on stating:

"We have no intention of standing guard for a bunch of troublemakers coming into our city."

Both in Birmingham and Montgomery, FBI agents were on hand jotting down notes while the passengers were beaten and clubbed. Even when one of Attorney General Kennedy's top aides, John Seigenthaler, was knocked unconscious by the angry Montgomery mob, the agents were not moved to action.

Angered and moved by the bloodshed, Robert Kennedy - with the reluctant approval of the President - ordered out several hundred Federal marshals to protect the riders as interstate travelers.

On May 21, the National Guard was ordered into Montgomery after a black church meeting was besieged by an angry white mob.

By May 23, the freedom ride had resumed with the addition of marshals, but ended in Jackson, Mississippi, where all of the riders were arrested and jailed for entering a "white" restroom and failing to obey local police officers. This historic "ride" was soon followed by "Freedom Flights" and "Freedom Trains" and the civil rights movement continued to gain momentum.

By September 1961, acting on a request by President Kennedy, the Interstate Commerce Commission adopted rules banning segregation on buses and in terminals.

While the Kennedys certainly did not invent the problem and, in fact, joined the push for civil rights belatedly and reluctantly, they nevertheless were the first major American leaders to fully address the problem and appeal for wisdom and restraint from both blacks and whites.

And despite its faint beginnings, some of the most dramatic accomplishments of the Kennedy Administration were in the area of civil rights. Blacks for the first time were appointed to major government jobs as well as judgeships; civil rights laws aimed at ending voter discrimination and public segregation were vigorously enforced by the Kennedy Justice Department despite a recalcitrant J. Edgar Hoover and an executive order was issued creating a Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity headed by Vice President Johnson.

But racial problems continued. One of those persons who may have been moved to action by John Kennedy's political rhetoric was a black Air Force veteran named James Meredith. The day after Kennedy's inaugural address, Meredith applied for enrollment to the segregated University of Mississippi but was rejected.

Meredith continued to be denied admittance to the school despite federal court orders ordering his enrollment. Finally in September 1962, Supreme Court Justice Hugo Black ordered no further interference with federal attempts to ensure Meredith's enrollment.

In his fourth attempt to enroll, Meredith arrived in Oxford, Mississippi, on September 30 accompanied by 300 U.S. marshals. He was met by a crowd of about 2,500 segregationists and students who turned Meredith and his supporters away with bricks and bottles. The marshals responded with tear gas and a bloody night-long riot ensued leaving two people dead and more than 375 injured including 166 federal officers.

The violence was quelled by the arrival of 3,000 Army and National Guard troops and Meredith was enrolled on October 1 under the protection of marshals who remained with him until his graduation in August 1963.

One of those involved in that bloody incident was a former Army general named Edwin A. Walker who was to later be connected with Lee Harvey Oswald.

Crossfire: A Bullet for the General

About 9:10 p.m. on April 10, 1963, Major General Edwin A. Walker was narrowly missed by a rifle bullet which crashed through a first-floor window and slammed into a wall of his fashionable Dallas home.

Seventeen months later the Warren Commission concluded that Walker's assailant was none other than Kennedy's alleged assassin, Lee Harvey Oswald. This conclusion has increasingly been called into question as more information about this event has become known.

By the fall of 1963, Walker was quite notorious in Dallas, a city known for the conservatism of its leadership. A native Texan born in 1909, Major General Walker was commander of the U.S. Army's 24th Division stationed in West Germany, where he used his position to indoctrinate his troops with right-wing propaganda, including the assertion that both the U.S. Government and the military had come under "communist control". .

The Korean War hero once declared:

"We must throw out the traitors, and if that's not possible, we must organize armed resistance to defeat the designs of the usurpers and contribute to the return of a constitutional government."

Ordered to stop this practice, Walker instead resigned from the Army in 1961 and returned to the United States where he began making political speaking tours.

Walker even made an unsuccessful bid for governor of Texas in 1962, losing to John Connally.

On September 30, 1962, Walker was in Oxford, Mississippi, aligned with those who were trying to prevent the university enrollment of James Meredith.

Charged with being a ringleader of the violent Oxford mob, Walker was ordered held temporarily in a mental institution by Attorney General Robert Kennedy.

By 1963, Walker was back in Dallas and had become a prominent figure in right-wing political activity there, particularly the John Birch Society.

In a 1964 interview with this author, Walker outlined his beliefs:

"The United Nations charter, which is only eight pages, should have been placed before (the American public) to study. Very few...have even seen the Fulbright Memorandum or the Walter Reuther Memorandum submitted to Attorney General Kennedy upon his request. ...very few had even seen these papers or the U.N. declaration on racial discrimination, the U.N. term for integration. This paper declares that the whole world will integrate. I do not know where such authority comes from or who it represents. I can realistically predict that no one living today will see 600 million Chinese integrated with 100 million Japanese, Turks integrated with Greeks, or Mohammedans with Israelis....A cause for America first and last and always is essential to our existence. All organizations which are implementing such a cause are in the best interest of the country and are needed. The Birch Society is doing a great job in educating people and exposing such memoranda as I have referred to previously."

Walker's connections in the months preceding the assassination are both convoluted and intriguing. A driver and aide to Walker in the fall of 1963 was the brother of Larrie Schmidt, who along with Bernard Weissman, authored the infamous "Welcome Mr. Kennedy To Dallas..." ad which ran in the "Dallas Morning News" the morning of November 22. The ad, which carried a heavy black border, asked 12 loaded questions to Kennedy ending with "Why have you scrapped the Monroe Doctrine in favor of the `Spirit of Moscow'?" Financial contributors to this anti-Kennedy ad included oilman H.L. Hunt's son, Nelson Bunker Hunt; Joseph Grinnan, volunteer coordinator for the local John Birch Society, and H.R. "Bum" Bright, former owner of the Dallas Cowboys. The ad was signed "The American Fact-Finding Committee," but Weissman admitted to the Warren Commission that the group was "formed strictly for the purpose of having a name to put in the paper."

It is interesting to note that Nelson Hunt's interests apparently ran to violent extremes. A former Hunt family security man, ex-FBI agent Paul Rothermeil, has claimed he was approached by Nelson Bunker Hunt while working for his father, oilman H.L. Hunt. Rothermeil said the younger Hunt wanted help in forming a paramilitary organization which would eliminate opponents with a "gas gun" imported from Europe. This exotic weapon reportedly leaves victims appearing as if they have suffered a heart attack. Rothermeil said Hunt planned to recruit this private army from General Walker's Dallas Birch Society group. Hunt has denied Rothermeil's allegation, claiming, "I think you'll find he's CIA."

Another Walker aide, Robert Allan Surrey, produced the "Wanted for Treason" leaflets which were distributed along the Kennedy motorcade route.

Surrey later revealed to researcher Penn Jones that one of his close bridge-playing friends was none other than James Hosty, the FBI agent who, on orders, destroyed a note to the Bureau from Lee Harvey Oswald after the assassination (See G MEN).

But perhaps the most significant connection between Walker and other assassination-connected characters was his contacts with anti-Castro Cubans and New Orleans.

Carlos Bringuier, the anti-Castro Cuban who was arrested with Lee Harvey Oswald in New Orleans (See CUBANS), was with Walker on the faculty of Christian Crusade Anti-communist Youth University. According to researcher Gary Shaw, Walker was retained by the CIA to arm and train Cuban exiles some time after the Bay of Pigs Invasion.

One member of the militant Cuban exile group Alpha 66 was Filipe Vidal Santiago, who was frequently seen with Walker. Santiago was known to drive a 1957 Chevrolet. Such a car figured prominently in several aspects of the assassination case.

About an hour after the slaying of Dallas Patrolman J.D. Tippit, police dispatchers broadcast a pick-up order for a 1957 Chevrolet last seen at the intersection where Tippit was killed. The charge was investigation of carrying a concealed weapon. The license number given by police registered to a Dallas man who told researchers he sold the car prior to September 1963, indicating the license plate reported on November 22 may have been stolen.

This - and other instances of cars with illegitimate license plates around the Tippit slaying and Oswald's rooming house - were never adequately investigated.

One of the items of evidence which led the Warren Commission to conclude that it was Oswald who shot at General Walker were three photographs made of Walker's Dallas home found in Oswald's belongings. Commission photo experts said backgrounds of the pictures indicated they were made no later than March 10, one month before the attack on Walker and two days before mail orders were sent off for Oswald's pistol and the Mannlicher-Carcano rifle.

In one of the photographs is a 1957 Chevrolet in Walker's driveway. This photo - as shown in Warren Commission Exhibit 5 - has a hole in it obliterating the car's license number.

In FBI reports, R.B. Stovall, one of the Dallas detectives who confiscated Oswald's belongings from the Paine home in Irving is quoted as saying:

"...at the time he observed this photograph, he (the detective) surmised that Oswald had evidently taken the license plate number area out of the photograph to keep anyone from identifying the owner of that automobile. He advised he is positive the photograph was mutilated as shown in Commission Exhibit 5 at the time they recovered it at the Paine residence."

According to the Bureau, Stovall's partner, Guy Rose, commented:

"...he had noted that someone had torn out a section on the automobile, which area contains the license plate for the 1957 Chevrolet....He stated...that it had been mutilated at the time they had recovered the box containing the photographs."

However, during her Warren Commission testimony, Marina Oswald made it clear that the hole was not there when she was shown the photo by the FBI.

She told Commission Attorney Wesley Liebeler:

"When the FBI first showed me this photograph, I remember that the license plate, the number of the license plate was on this car, on this photograph. It had the white and black numbers. There was no black spot that I see on it now. When Lee showed me this photograph there was the number on the license plate on this picture....This black spot is so striking I would have remembered it if it were on the photograph that Lee showed me or the FBI....There was no hole in the original when they showed it to me - I'm positive of it."

Someone is lying. If the license number was obliterated while in the hands of the FBI, as stated by Marina Oswald, this is firm evidence of official destruction of evidence.

The truth of the matter came in 1969 with the publication of Dallas Police Chief Jesse Curry's "JFK Assassination File." On page 113 is a police photograph of Oswald's belongings and in the foreground is the Walker photograph with the Chevrolet's license plate number intact.

This piece of evidence was altered while in the hands of the authorities.

Apparently this criminal action disturbed as least one Warren Commission staff member.

In 1966, two years after the Warren Commission had concluded its work, Commission Attorney Wesley J. Liebeler wrote a letter to Charles Klihr, a volunteer worker for General Walker, stating:

"The (Oswald) picture was mutilated by someone in such a manner that the license plate is no longer visible. When we noticed this during the investigation, we asked the FBI to determine whose car it was. They asked (Walker aide) Surrey about it and he told them he thought it was your car. I find no indication that FBI agents talked with you about the matter, however....I would appreciate it very much if you would let me know whether or not the FBI did interview you about this and if you were able to identify the car as your own.

There is no record as to Klihr's responses to Liebeler's letter."

All of these strange connections take on more sinister tones when viewed with the possibility that General Walker may have even been in contact with Oswald, his assassin Jack Ruby, or both.

A tenuous tie may be a St. Paul, Minnesota, man named John Martin, who was an acquaintance of General Walker and filmed him in his Dallas home in the late summer of 1963. Incredibly, Martin journeyed on to New Orleans where, on September 9, he photographed Lee Harvey Oswald handing out Fair Play for Cuba material on the same roll of film.

Walker's connections in New Orleans were many and substantial, ranging from anti-Castro Cubans in touch with David Ferrie and Guy Banister (See AGENTS) to Louisiana political leaders. According to Louisiana State Police files, Walker was involved in several hurried and secret meetings in New Orleans during the two days prior to the assassination, including a conference with Judge Leander Perez, one of the state's most powerful men.

In fact, Walker was on a Braniff flight from New Orleans at the time of Kennedy's assassination. He reportedly became upset when word of the assassination was broadcast over the plane's loudspeaker and roamed up and down the aisle telling fellow passengers to remember that he was on that flight at the time of Kennedy's death.

According to "Farewell America," a book authored by French intelligence agents, Walker later joined oilman H.L. Hunt in a secret hideaway in Mexico where "they remained for a month, protected by personal guards, under the impassive eyes of the FBI."

Also in this book, the authors state that Oswald was introduced to both General Walker and Clay Shaw, the director of the International Trade Mart tried by District Attorney Jim Garrison (See THE GARRISON INVESTIGATION), in late summer of 1963 by David Ferrie.

Author Anthony Summers has reported that Walker gave a talk in Dallas which may have been attended by Lee Harvey Oswald. He quotes another member of the audience who claimed Oswald sat at the back of the room during a meeting of the Directorio Revolucionario Estudiantil (DRE), an anti-Castro Cuban group. Oswald reportedly said nothing during the fund-raising meeting.

Then there are disconcerting reports that Walker knew Oswald's killer, Dallas nightclub owner Jack Ruby. Researcher Penn Jones has stated that Ruby made no secret of his admiration for the resigned general and that he once stated that Walker was "100 percent right" in his belief that Cuba should be taken back from Castro. More significant are the statements of former Walker employee William McEwan Duff. According to Warren Commission Document 1316-B, Duff claimed that Ruby visited Walker's home on a monthly basis between December 1962, and March 1963, shortly before Walker was fired upon.

Many researchers feel it is also significant that General Walker's name and telephone number were found in Oswald's address book. They believe this may indicate a possible connection between the two. However, Walker still maintains he never met Oswald and the Warren Commission concluded:

"Although Oswald's notebook contained Walker's name and telephone number there is no evidence that they knew each other. It is probable that this information was inserted at the time Oswald was planning his attack on Walker."

Yet another odd connection between Walker and the assassination involved car salesman Warren Reynolds. Reynolds chased the murderer of Patrolman Tippit but initially was unable to identify Oswald as the killer. Two months later, Reynolds was shot from ambush and after recovering, was befriended by General Walker. After consulting with Walker, Reynolds was able to identify Oswald to the Warren Commission in July 1964. (See AFTERMATH).

As can be seen, the sniper attack on Walker must be viewed in context of the strange and convoluted connections of both the general and Oswald.

The Warren Commission concluded, without even bothering to talk to Walker, that his assailant had been Oswald. The evidence used to reach this conclusion was the testimony of Marina Oswald including a strange and incriminating note left her, photographs reportedly taken by Oswald of the Walker home and identification of a bullet found at the crime scene.

Marina Oswald's testimony has been called into question in a number of matters (See THE WARREN COMMISSION) and her stories of murder attempts by Oswald on Walker and Richard Nixon are fraught with inconsistencies and omissions. It is also curious that her first statement that Oswald tried to kill Walker came on December 3, 1963, about a week after a West German newspaper reported there might be a connection between the Walker shooting and the assassination. The Warren Commission reported that the German news story was "fabricated by the editor," but then advanced the same allegation.

The note in question turned up only after the Kennedy assassination, when Secret Service agents showed the note to Mrs. Ruth Paine and ask her to identify it. The undated note reportedly fell out of a book found among Oswald's belongings.

Government handwriting experts declared that Oswald wrote the message and Marina conveniently told investigators she thought she saw it shortly after the Walker shooting.

Federal investigators concluded that Oswald had written the note, which was in Russian, and that it had been left in a Russian volume entitled "Book of Useful Advice" and was only discovered nearly two weeks after the assassination when it fell out of the book's pages.

However, Mrs. Ruth Paine told the Warren Commission about the Dallas Police search of her home mentioning:

"Before I left they were leafing through books to see if anything fell out but that is all I saw."

Mrs. Paine's testimony fuels the suspicion that the note may have been planted by authorities.

In the note, Oswald detailed instructions to his wife on what to do in his absence. He told her where the mailbox key could be found, that the current bills had been paid and even said she could "throw out or give my clothing, etc. away."

Two notable passages state:

"Send the information as to what has happened to me to the Embassy (undoubtedly the Russian Embassy which Oswald had been contacting periodically) and include newspaper clippings - should there be anything about me in the newspapers. I believe that the Embassy will come quickly to your assistance on learning everything."

"If I am alive and taken prisoner, the city jail is located at the end of the bridge through which we always passed on going to the city (right in the beginning of the city after crossing the bridge)."

These two sections raise troublesome questions for the official version of the Walker shooting.

Since Marina reportedly knew nothing of her husband's attack on Walker in advance, how could she be expected to watch for stories on Oswald in the newspapers since any such account would only report that an unknown sniper fired on the general? Also, why would a supposed American defector to Russia who returned home expect assistance for his family from the Soviet Embassy if he were charged with the attempted murder of a prominent right-wing Dallasite?

Warren Commission critic Sylvia Meagher wrote:

"I suggest that Oswald wrote the undated letter in relation to a project other than the attack on General Walker - one that also involved risk of arrest or death - and that Marina was informed about her husband's plans in advance."

As noted by the Warren Commission, Oswald letter "appeared to be the work of a man expecting to be killed, or imprisoned, or to disappear." Yet at the time of the Walker incident, he had no money, no passport and no reasonable expectation of escape.

The Walker home photographs already discussed also pose a time problem. If they were made prior to March 10, 1963, as believed by the Warren Commission, then it must be believed that Oswald was actively reconnoitering a sniper position at the Walker home even before ordering his weapons.

Finally, the bullet found in Walker's home also presents problems. Contemporary news stories of the April 10 incident quote Dallas police as saying the recovered bullet was "identified as a 30.06," not a 6.5 millimeter Mannlicher Carcano.

In 1975, researcher George Michael Evica received FBI spectrographic analyses of a bullet (CE 399) and bullet fragments reportedly recovered in the assassination investigation. According to Evica, these scientific reports, termed "inconclusive" by director Hoover when reporting to the Warren Commission, revealed:

"...the bullet recovered in the assassination attempt on General Walker does not match either CE 399 or two fragments recovered from President Kennedy's limousine; the Warren Commission's linking of Lee Harvey Oswald to the General Walker assassination attempt is seriously weakened."

Further confusion over the bullet has been raised by Walker himself who today claims the bullet exhibited by the House Select Committee on Assassinations is not the same bullet recovered from his home in 1963. He said the original slug was so mangled as to be hardly recognizable as a bullet.

After studying the government's evidence carefully, author Sylvia Meagher concluded:

"Despite the (Warren) Commission's reliance on the testimony of Marina Oswald, compelling evidence virtually excludes the use of the Carcano rifle in the attempt on the life of General Walker."

And even if Oswald was responsible for the Walker shooting, there is evidence that he did not act alone.

Walter Kirk Coleman, who in 1963 was a 14-year-old neighbor to Walker, told police he heard the shot and, peeking over a fence, saw some men speeding down the alley in a light green or light blue Ford, either a 1959 or 1960 model.

Coleman also said he saw another car, a 1958 Chevrolet black with white down the side in a church parking lot adjacent to Walker's house. The car door was open and a man was bending over the back seat as though he was placing something on the floor of the car.

At the time of the Warren Commission, Coleman was not called to testify and, in fact, told Walker he had been ordered not to discuss the incident by authorities.

Just prior to the Walker shooting, two of the general's aides saw suspicious activity around the general's home. Walker aide Robert Surrey said on April 6, he saw two men prowling around the house, peeking in windows. Surrey said the pair were driving a 1963 dark purple or brown Ford with no license plates.

Max Claunch told researcher Gary Shaw that a few nights before the shooting incident he noticed a "Cuban or dark-complected man in a 1957 Chevrolet" cruise around Walker's home several times.

The problems with the official version of the Walker shooting as well as the many unfollowed leads in this area are troubling to assassination researchers.

One of the reasons that no significant investigation has occurred here is that the names of many prominent Dallasites would be dragged in. Hence, it seems to have been expedite to simply say Oswald fired the shot with the same rifle he used on Kennedy.

###

On January 14, 1963, George Wallace was sworn in as governor of Alabama, pledging:

"Segregation now, segregation tomorrow and segregation forever."

By late spring, a voter registration drive in Greenwood, Mississippi, had grown into full-blown civil rights demonstrations through much of the South. Thousands of arrests were made and police brutality became an issue. The volatile situation, inflamed by shooting and bombing incidents, reach a climax in August when Dr. Martin Luther King led some 250,000 people in a march on Washington. Here he proclaimed:

"There will be neither rest nor tranquillity in America until the Negro is granted his citizenship rights."

The Freedom March took place less than three months after President Kennedy had finally submitted his own civil rights bill in Congress. Resistance to Kennedy's plans was widespread although a June 1963, Gallop poll indicated 59 percent of the population approved of the President and his programs.

On June 12, 1963, Georgia Senator Richard B. Russell promised other Southern senators:

"To me, the President's legislative proposals are clearly destructive of the American system and the constitutional rights of American citizens. I shall oppose them with every means and resource at my command...."

Within six months, Russell was sitting as a member of the Warren Commission charged with finding the truth of Kennedy's death.

One Government employee who watched the famous Washington monuments become surrounded by demonstrators was FBI director J. Edgar Hoover. The strange and obsessed Hoover (See G MEN) was particularly anxious over King and his civil rights movement. The aging director not only saw his essentially Southern way of life threatened but was convinced that King's organization was being directed by communists.

William Sullivan, at the time Hoover's man in charge of intelligence operations for the Bureau, wrote:

"Hoover told me that he felt that King was, or could become, a serious threat to the security of the country. He pointed out that King was an instrument of the communist party, and he wanted it proved that King had a relationship with the Soviet bloc. Hoover also made it clear that he wanted evidence developed that would prove that King was embezzling or misusing large sums of money contributed to him and his organization."

According to Sullivan, FBI agents jumped to please the director. He wrote:

"We gave him what he wanted - under the threat of being out on the street if we didn't agree."

Hoover's vendetta continued against King until the black leader was himself cut down by an assassin's bullet in 1968. Behind this vendetta was Hoover's secret counterintelligence program called COINTELPRO, one of whose purposes was "to expose, disrupt, misdirect, or otherwise neutralize" King and his Southern Christian Leadership Conference.

Also secretly targeted for careful scrutiny under this program was President Kennedy and Hoover's own boss, Attorney General Kennedy.

According to Sullivan:

"Hoover was desperately trying to catch Bobby red-handed at anything...and was always gathering damaging material on Jack Kennedy, which the President, with his active social life, seemed more than willing to provide."

One of Hoover's chief fears was being fired by the Kennedy's, a fear with some substance. The Kennedys both hated and feared the powerful Hoover and made little effort to conceal the fact that he was to be replaced after Kennedy won the 1964 election. Robert Kennedy even told interviewer John Bartlow Martin:

"(Hoover) is rather a psycho...I think it (the FBI) is a very dangerous organization....He's senile and frightening."

Both Kennedy brothers eventually supported King and the civil rights program as they came to realize that it's adoption as official policy was inevitable.

As Kennedy family chronicler John H. Davis pointed out:

"But the most potentially dangerous enemy to emerge from Kennedy's civil rights policy was the FBI and its director."

The prejudiced passions of the segregationists also appeared to have produced a man with a prophetic vision of Kennedy's death.

Crossfire: The Miami Prophet

On November 9, 1963, a Miami police informant met with Joseph A. Milteer, a wealthy Miami right-winger, who promptly began to outline the assassination of President Kennedy.

Milteer was a leader of the arch-conservative National States Rights Party as well as a member of other anti-civil rights groups such as the Congress of Freedom and the White Citizens' Council of Atlanta.

The police agent had infiltrated the States Rights Party and befriended Milteer. He secretly recorded his conversation with the extremist, which went like this:

"INFORMANT - ...I think Kennedy is coming here on the 18th, or something like that to make some kind of speech...

MILTEER - You can bet your bottom dollar he is going to have a lot to say about the Cubans, there are so many of them here.

INFORMANT - Yeah, well he will have a thousand body guards, don't worry about that.

MILTEER - The more bodyguards he has, the easier it is to get him.

INFORMANT - ...Well how in the hell do you figure would be the best way to get him?

MILTEER - From an office building with a high-powered rifle...he knows he's a marked man.

INFORMANT - You think he knows he's a marked man?

MILTEER - Sure he does.

INFORMANT - They are really going to try to kill him?

MILTEER - Oh yeah, it's in the works....

(Some conversation omitted)

INFORMANT - Boy, if that Kennedy gets shot, we have got to know where we are at. Because you know that will be a real shake, if they do that.

MILTEER - They wouldn't leave any stone unturned there no way. They will pick up somebody within hours afterwards, if anything like that would happen, just to throw the public off."

Captain Charles Sapp, head of Miami's Police Intelligence Bureau, was concerned enough with Milteer's remarks to alert both the FBI and the Secret Service. Sapp even recalled in later years that a planned motorcade for Kennedy was scrapped and the President instead was flown to his Miami speech by helicopter. Reportedly, none of the Secret Service agents involved in Kennedy's Dallas trip were informed of Milteer's forecast.

About 10:30 a.m. on November 22, Milteer telephoned the Miami police informant to say he was in Dallas and that Kennedy was due there later in the day. Milteer commented that Kennedy probably would never be seen in Miami again. While the House Select Committee on Assassinations was unable to confirm Milteer's presence in Dallas during the assassination, it also failed to prove he was elsewhere.

Researcher Jack White claims to have located the photograph of a man standing with the crowd on Houston Street watching the Kennedy motorcade approach the Texas School Book Depository. White said the man bears a striking resemblance to Milteer.

Back in Miami after the assassination, Milteer again met with the police agent, saying:

"Everything ran true to form. I guess you thought I was kidding you when I said he would be killed from a window with a high-powered rifle....I don't do any guessing."

Milteer said not to worry about the capture of Lee Harvey Oswald, "because he doesn't know anything."

He added:

"The right wing is in the clear...the patriots have outsmarted the communist group in order that the communists would carry out the plan without the right wing becoming involved."

The FBI questioned Milteer on November 27 and he denied making any such remarks. Although information on Milteer was belatedly turned over to the Warren Commission, there is no mention of him in its Report or 26 volumes. The Milteer story only became public after an account of the incident appeared in a Miami newspaper. Before Milteer could be questioned further about his surprising foreknowledge of the assassination, he died after receiving burns when a heater exploded in a vacation cabin (See CONVENIENT DEATHS). The Milteer matter raises a number of questions - not the least of which is why his specific warning was not passed along to FBI and Secret Service personnel in Dallas?

Crossfire: Big Business

But the racial unrest which rocked the United States in the 1960s was not President Kennedy's only domestic problem. He was being verbally attacked not only by poor minorities with rising expectations, but also by wealthy businessmen who felt threatened by Kennedy's announced social reforms.

Big business was already leery of Kennedy who as a Senator had opposed the Taft-Hartley law aimed at curbing the power of labor unions and who as President had failed to consult the business world before making certain appointments. The fears of big business increased in the spring of 1962 when Kennedy used the power of the Presidency to force U.S. steel manufacturers to roll back recent price increases.

Kennedy already had served notice on the giant steel companies in September 1961, when he sent a letter to industry leaders warning them against any price increases. In his letter, Kennedy rationalized:

"The steel industry, in short, can look forward to good profits without an increase in prices. Since 1947, iron and steel common stocks prices have risen 397 percent; this is a much better performance than common stock prices in general."

On April 6, 1962, at the request of the federal government, the Steelworkers Union agreed to limit its wage demands to an 10-cents-an-hour increase beginning that summer. Then on April 11, U.S. Steel and five other major steel companies announced a 3.5 percent hike in the cost of steel.

Incensed, Kennedy told the news media:

"The American people will find it hard, as I do, to accept a situation in which a tiny handful of steel executives, whose pursuit of private power and profit exceeds their sense of public responsibility, can show such utter contempt for the interest of 185 million Americans."

Administration officials suggested an FBI investigation and on April 13, the Defense Department awarded a $5 million contract to a smaller steel firm which had not raised prices. The next day, the six major firms announced their price increase had been rescinded.

The denunciation of the steel executives by Kennedy sent shock waves through the business community. A "U.S. News and World Report" editor wrote:

"What happened is frightening not only to steel people but to industry generally....President Kennedy had the public interest at heart in acting as he did, but the results may not in the long run be what he intended them to be."

Other results of the Kennedy Administration were infuriating corporate executives. Mergers were becoming widespread in the business world and Attorney General Kennedy and his trust-busters were taking a dim view of them.

During 1963, the Justice Department's Antitrust Division won 45 of 46 cases; asked a federal court to force General Motors Corporation to dispose of its locomotive business while charging the firm with monopolizing the manufacture and sale of intercity buses; and ordered General Dynamics to drop a division dealing with industrial gases.

Business and political leaders began to regret that the winner of the 1960 Presidential election had not been Richard M. Nixon.

Crossfire: Nixon and the JFK Assassination

Most Americans remember Richard Milhous Nixon as the only U.S. President to resign his office under the threat of certain impeachment.

Few know or recall Nixon's connection with the Kennedy assassination, including the fact that Nixon was in Dallas the day Kennedy died but couldn't recall that fact three months later when interviewed by the FBI.

Born January 9, 1913, in Yorba Linda, California, Nixon was a self-made man who reached the pinnacles of power after struggling up from a background of meager financial circumstances.

Nixon wanted to attend Harvard like young Kennedy, but was forced to settle for California's Whittier College, where he honed his skills as a debater. He went on to graduate from Duke University Law School in Durham, North Carolina, then unsuccessfully tried to join the FBI (See G MEN).

Back in California, Nixon joined a law firm. "The People's Almanac" tells of his first court case, a foretaste of Nixon's career:

"In Nixon's very first case as a trial lawyer in 1937, 10 days after he had been admitted to the California Bar, he represented a Los Angeles woman to execute a judgment in recovering a bad debt. During the case, Nixon was accused by the judge of unethical behavior, threatened with disbarment, and was also sued by his client for mishandling her case."

Shortly after Pearl Harbor, Nixon was in Washington having accepted a job with the tire-rationing department of the Office of Price Administration.

It is interesting to note that Nixon's life-long friend, Florida entrepreneur Charles "Bebe" Rebozo, began his profitable career selling re-capped tires. Although, Nixon has claimed he did not meet Rebozo until 1948 while vacationing in Florida after the Hiss case, some researchers say the pair were in contact during the war.

Later in the war, Nixon enlisted in the Navy and served in the South Pacific, where on one island he built a small shack used for high-stakes gambling and drinking.

In 1946, Nixon successfully ran for Congress after labeling his opponent, incumbent Congressman Jerry Voorhis, a "friend of the communists." With his anti-communist credentials, Nixon was immediately named to the House Un-American Activities Committee where his name became nationally known in light of the Alger Hiss case.

Whittaker Chambers, a former communist, accused Hiss, a State Department official, of being involved with communist agents. Nixon, through persistent manipulation of the news media and the evidence - and aided with information supplied by grateful CIA agents (Nixon was one of the Congressmen who helped establish the Agency) - managed to discredit Hiss. In fact, enough evidence was finally gathered to send Hiss to prison, although the facts of the case are still the subject of debate.

By 1950, the ambitious Nixon was ready to run for a Senate seat. His opponent was a liberal former Hollywood actress named Helen Douglas. Nixon painted Douglas a friend of communism and dubbed her the "pink lady." He accused her of voting with a "notorious communist-line congressman" from New York, failing to mention that Nixon himself had voted with this same congressman 112 times. Such campaign tactics earned Nixon the epithet "Tricky Dick." But they also proved effective. Nixon beat Douglas by nearly 700,000 votes.

The man most responsible for Nixon's smear tactics was his close friend and campaign manager Murray Chotiner, a lawyer who represented ranking mobsters and who had connections leading back to reputed New Orleans Mafia chief Carlos Marcello and Teamsters leader Jimmy Hoffa (See MOBSTERS).

In 1952, after only six years in politics, Nixon became vice president under Dwight Eisenhower, thanks to the support of his political mentor, former New York Governor Thomas Dewey, and his undermining of the favorite-son candidacy of fellow Californian, Earl Warren (See THE WARREN COMMISSION).

Nixon's political future seemed assured. Then, during the campaign, the news media learned of a secret slush fund for Nixon and calls for his resignation from the Republican ticket began.

When Eisenhower appeared ready to drop Nixon, the vice presidential candidate persuaded the Republican National Committee to purchase $75,000 worth of television time to explain the $18,000 fund.

Following the top-rated Milton Berle show, Nixon told a nationwide audience that he used the money to further his campaign, not for his personal use. He ended his talk by telling how someone had given him a black and white spotted dog. Nixon said:

"And our little girl Tricia, the six year old, named it Checkers. And you know, the kids love that dog, and I just want to say this right now, that regardless of what they say about it, we're gonna keep it!"

Although Eisenhower reportedly was disgusted with Nixon's blatant appeal to sentiment, the tactic gained favorable public response and Nixon remained on the ticket which went on to victory in November.

Throughout the Eisenhower years, the war hero President snubbed Nixon both politically and socially. In 1960, when Eisenhower was asked what major decisions Nixon had participated in, he caustically replied:

"If you give me a week, I might think of one."

But Nixon was busy building up his own power base with men of dubious backgrounds.

In his memoirs, mobster Mickey Cohen wrote that he gave Chotiner $5,000 for Nixon's 1946 Congressional campaign and raised $75,000 from Las Vegas gamblers for Nixon's 1950 Senate race.

Furthermore, Ed Partin, a former aide to Jimmy Hoffa turned government informant, detailed a meeting between Hoffa and New Orleans mob boss Carlos Marcello (See MOBSTERS) at the height of the 1960 Presidential campaign:

"I was right there, listening to the conversation. Marcello had a suitcase filled with $500,000 cash which was going to Nixon. It was a half-million-dollar contribution. The other half (of a promised $1 million) was coming from the mob boys in New Jersey and Florida."

Nixon's organized crime contacts apparently continued even after he resigned the Presidency in disgrace. During a 1975 golf tournament at La Costa Country Club in California, Nixon's golfing companions included Allen Dorfman, a mob-Teamster financial coordinator, and Tony Provenzano, a former Teamster official and convicted Mafia killer.

It has been revealed by investigative authors Carl Oglesby, Howard Kohn, David Scheim and others that Nixon was a frequent visitor to Cuba during the early 1950s and was in contact with confederates of organized crime financial wizard Meyer Lansky (See MOBSTERS).

Lansky also curried favor with Florida Senator George Smathers, a close friend of Nixon, and his efforts apparently paid off. In 1953, the Justice Department declined to prosecute Lansky although the IRS Intelligence Division had found him evading taxes. In 1957, immigration authorities tried to deport Lansky but again the Justice Department failed to follow through. In March 1952, Fulgencio Batista returned from exile in Florida and resumed dictatorial power in Cuba, reportedly financed by Lansky and other gambling operators.

An avowed anti-communist, Batista was fully supported by Nixon and Smathers, who lobbied so vigorously for aid to Batista he became known as the "senator from Cuba." Interestingly enough, Smathers also was quite chummy with John F. Kennedy.

When Fidel Castro gained power in Cuba (See CUBANS), Lansky undoubtedly was one of those mob chieftains which wanted immediate counteraction. This was forthcoming with CIA officers planning an invasion of Cuba, initiated by Eisenhower's White House Political Action Officer, Richard Nixon (See AGENTS).

In his book "Six Crises," Nixon wrote:

"The covert training of Cuban exiles by the CIA was due in substantial part, at least, to my efforts. This had been adopted as a policy as a result of my direct support."

Before the invasion could be launched, a serious snag occurred for Nixon and his backers -he lost the election of 1960 to John F. Kennedy. While heavily favored going into the race, Nixon's lackluster campaigning reached the pits during the television debates between the candidates in the fall of 1960. The young and dynamic Kennedy was able to swing the popular vote, edging out Nixon by the slenderest of margins - 49.9 percent to 49.6 percent of the total votes. Rather than bide his time waiting for the next Presidential election, Nixon ran against Pat Brown for the governorship of California in 1962. He was handily defeated, especially after news broke of a secret $200,000 loan from billionaire Howard Hughes to Nixon's brother.

A distraught Nixon, complete with nervous giggles and compulsive gestures, told a news conference:

"Now that all the members of the press are so delighted that I have lost...all I can say is this: For 16 years, ever since the Hiss case, you've had a lot of fun - a lot of fun - that you've had an opportunity to attack me....Just think about how much you're going to be missing - you won't have Nixon to kick around any more because, gentlemen, this is my last press conference."

Within two years, Nixon was back on the political stage, campaigning for Republican candidates. GOP stalwarts repaid this activity by again nominating Richard Nixon for President in August 1968. By then, of course, both John and Robert Kennedy were dead.

During the Nixon years, his friends in organized crime were not forgotten. The Nixon Administration intervened in at least 20 trials of crime figures, ostensibly to protect "intelligence sources and methods."

In 1973, Nixon's Attorney General, Richard Kleindienst, denied an FBI request to continue an electronic surveillance operation which was beginning to penetrate connections between the Mafia and the Teamsters.

Nixon also did not forget his friend Jimmy Hoffa, whom he pardoned in 1971 despite recommendations against such action. Before leaving office, Nixon pardon an inordinate number of mobsters, including Angelo "Gyp" DeCarlo, imprisoned for extortion and implicated in the murder of Louis D. Saperstein.

But of all Nixon's possible crime connections, the most intriguing involves Jack Ruby, the killer of Lee Harvey Oswald. In 1975, a political science associate professor at College of the Holy Cross in Worcester, Massachusetts, was poring over a stack of recently-released FBI documents. Trowbridge Ford was astonished to discover a memorandum written by a Bureau staff assistant to a government panel looking into organized crime activity in 1947. The memo stated:

"It is my sworn statement that one Jack Rubenstein of Chicago, noted as a potential witness for hearings of the House Committee on Un-American Activities, is performing information functions for the staff of Congressman Richard Nixon, Republican of California. It is requested Rubenstein not be called for open testimony in the aforementioned hearings."

Later in 1947, Chicago's Rubenstein moved to Dallas and shortened his name to Jack Ruby.

The idea that Jack Ruby had worked for Nixon should have set off the national news media. Instead, FBI officials told Ford that the document he discovered was a fake and the story was quickly dropped. Of course, in accepting the Bureau's explanation of the memo, one must wonder why a "fake" document was contained in FBI files and how many other such fakes are yet residing with the Bureau?

By the early 1980s, Ford told this author he had studied literally thousands of genuine FBI documents and had slowly come to the conclusion that the Nixon-Ruby memo was probably legitimate. Legitimate or not, the matter raises even more suspicion when viewed with Nixon's presence in Dallas the day Kennedy died.

On November 20, 1963, Nixon arrived in Dallas, where a Carbonated Bottlers convention was being held. A newsman from the "Dallas Time Herald" interviewed Nixon and wrote:

"The former Vice President arrived in Dallas Wednesday night to attend a board meeting of Pepsi-Cola Company, which is represented by his New York law partnership. He plans to leave Dallas Friday morning a few hours before the arrival of President Kennedy. Mr. Nixon said that although he planned to talk by telephone to several Dallas Republican leaders, he had no plans for a formal meeting with them."

Interestingly, researcher Richard Sprague examined Pepsi-Cola corporate records and found no board meeting was held in Dallas in 1963. The connections and politics of Pepsi-Cola deserve serious attention from assassination researchers. The soft drink company's advertising was handled by J. Walter Thompson, the giant public relations firm which also worked to sell the Pentagon's brand of "peace." Nixon was longtime friends with Pepsi-Cola President Don Kendall and, as President, it was Nixon who opened the lucrative Soviet soft drink market to Pepsi. A Justice Department investigation into this transaction revealed that a "high government official had all the red tape done away with so Pepsico could obtain the Soviet franchise without any competition." Pepsi went on to help those who had helped the company. In 1973, President Kendall formed the Save the Presidency Committee, which sought to protect Nixon from the wrath of Watergate investigations. It is especially interesting to note that Cartha De Loach, the FBI official who was chief liaison between director Hoover and President Lyndon Johnson (See G MEN), later joined Pepsi-Cola.

With Nixon in Dallas was Pepsi-Cola heiress and actress Joan Crawford. Both Nixon and Crawford made comments in the Dallas newspapers to the effect that they didn't need Secret Service protection like the President, intimating that the nation was upset with Kennedy's policies. It has been suggested that this taunting may have been responsible for Kennedy's critical decision not to order the plex-glass top placed on his limousine on November 22.

Nixon also caused a stir in Dallas when he suggested that Lyndon Johnson would be dropped from the 1964 Democratic national ticket. Quoted in the November 22, 1963, "Dallas Morning News," Nixon said:

"...we must remember that President Kennedy and his advisers are practical politicians....Lyndon was chosen in 1960 because he could help the ticket in the South. Now he is becoming a political liability in the South, just as he is in the North."

On the morning of November 22, Nixon was driven to Dallas' Love Field where he boarded American Airlines Flight 82 for New York. Less than two hours after Nixon left, Air Force One landed at Love Field with the doomed Kennedy.

Three months later, the Warren Commission asked the FBI to investigate Marina Oswald's allegation that her husband had tried to kill Nixon during a visit to Dallas. The FBI report dealing with Nixon's interview stated:

"On February 28, 1964, the Honorable Richard M. Nixon, former Vice President of the U.S., was contacted by Assistant director in Charge of the New York Office, John F. Malone, and furnished the following information:

Mr. Nixon advised that the only time he was in Dallas, Texas, during 1963 was two days prior to the assassination of President John F. Kennedy."

The question of whether Nixon was merely forgetful or dissembling in his comment to the FBI might have been cleared up by yet another Bureau report entitled "Letter of FBI of June 29, 1964, concerning Richard Nixon". However, this document was reported missing from the National Archives in 1976.

Nixon's recollection improved during a 1967 interview with journalist Jules Witcover. Speaking about the assassination, Nixon said:

"I was in a taxicab when I got the news. I had been in Dallas attending a meeting. I flew back to New York the next morning. It must have happened just as my plane was landing. My cab stopped for a light in Queens and a guy ran over and said, "Have you got a radio? The President's been wounded." I thought, "Oh, my God, it must have been one of the nuts." A half hour later I got to my apartment and the doorman told me he was dead. I called J. Edgar Hoover and asked him, "What happened? Was it one of the nuts?" Hoover said, "No, it was a communist."

The supposed attack on Nixon by Oswald undoubtedly is one of the more ludicrous incidents of the Warren Commission investigation - and it is a prime example of the unreliability of Marina Oswald's testimony.

In early February, 1964, when Marina Oswald first testified to the Commission, she failed to mention the incident when asked if her husband had expressed any hostility toward any official of the United States. In June, her memory jogged by an FBI report from Oswald's brother, Robert, she said that just a few days before Oswald left for New Orleans on April 24, 1963, he put on a good suit after reading a morning newspaper. She told the Commission:

"I saw that he took a pistol. I asked him where he was going and why he was getting dressed. He answered, "Nixon is coming. I want to go and have a look."...I called him into the bathroom and I closed the door and I wanted to prevent him and then I started to cry. And I told him that he shouldn't do this, and that he had promised me."

She told the Commission she locked him in the bathroom to prevent him trying to shoot Nixon. However, as confirmed by an FBI investigation, the bathroom - like most others - locked from the inside. Accordingly, in a subsequent interview with the Commission, Marina amended her story by saying she held the bathroom door for hours to prevent Oswald from leaving.

The Commission, upon learning that Nixon was not even in Dallas at any time near this incident, decided that Marina may have been mistaken and that the target of Oswald's pistol may have been Vice President Johnson, who had visited Dallas on April 23.

This amusing anecdote, which the Commission found to have "no probative value," is nevertheless fascinating for the introduction of Nixon's name into the assassination investigation.

While there is no evidence beyond his connections to mobsters and teamsters that Nixon may have known of what was to happen to President Kennedy, his words as recorded on White House tapes have intrigued assassination researchers for years.

In an Oval Office meeting on June 23, 1972 - just five days after the Nixon-connected burglars were caught in the Watergate office complex - Nixon spoke with his chief of staff, H.R. Halderman, saying:

"Of course, this Hunt (Watergate burglar and CIA liaison man with the anti-Castro Cubans E. Howard Hunt), that will uncover a lot of things. You open that scab, there's a hell of a lot of things, and we feel that it would be very detrimental to have this thing go any further....the President believes that it is going to open the whole Bay of Pigs thing up again."

Later that same day, Nixon spoke with Halderman again, saying:

"...very bad to have this fellow Hunt, ah, he knows too damned much, if he was involved - you happen to know that? (Hunt was not with the Watergate burglars, but was in radio contact with them from across the street.) If it gets out that this is all involved, the Cuba thing would be a fiasco. It would make the CIA look bad, it's going to make Hunt look bad, and it's likely to blow the whole Bay of Pigs thing, which we think would be very unfortunate - both for the CIA, and for the country, at this time, and for American foreign policy. Just tell him to lay off..."

After telling Nixon that the FBI was aware of CIA operatives involvement in the Watergate affair, Halderman tells his chief:

"...the problem is it tracks back to the Bay of Pigs and it tracks back to some other, the leads run out to people who had no involvement in this, except by contracts and connection, but it gets into areas that are liable to be realized."

What could Nixon and Halderman have been talking about? The "whole Bay of Pigs thing" had been over for more than 10 years. Nixon was out of office when the actual invasion began and the assault's disastrous consequences were a matter of historical record. Could they have been circuitously referring to the interlocking connections between CIA agents, anti-Castro Cubans and mobsters which likely resulted in the Kennedy assassination? Did they themselves have some sort of insider knowledge of this event?

Researchers are left guessing. However, it is significant to recall that when Hunt later demanded $2 million to keep quiet about what he knew, Nixon agreed and the money was raised.

It may also be significant to consider the number of people connected with the Warren Commission that were hired or considered for employment by Nixon's circle during Watergate.

John Dean's lawyer was Commission Administrative Aide Charles N. Shaffer; John Ehrlichman hired Commission Senior Counsel Joseph Ball as his lawyer; Nixon initially wanted Commission General Counsel J. Lee Rankin as Watergate Prosecutor then wanted Commission Member John McCloy but later accepted Commission Special Counsel Leon Jaworski (who represented Texas Attorney General Waggoner Carr); Nixon named Rankin to "edit" White House tapes; Nixon accepted Commission Senior Counsel Albert E. Jenner as chief minority counsel for the House Judiciary Committee considering Nixon's impeachment and Nixon asked Commission Counsel Arlen Specter to help with his defense.

Specter, now Senator from Pennsylvania, was the chief architect of the controversial "single-bullet theory" for the Warren Commission. He was a protégé of Nixon's attorney general, John Mitchell, and had served as co-chairman of the Pennsylvania division of the Committee to Re-Elect the President (CREEP) in 1972.

Commission attorney David Belin - still its most ardent supporter - headed Lawyers for Nixon.

By 1973, Nixon was missing one of his close powerful friends who might have helped him out of the Watergate mess. In a February 28 meeting with counsel John Dean, Nixon said:

"(Expletive deleted) Hoover was my crony. He was closer to me than Johnson, actually, although Johnson used him more."

Dean replied:

"While it might have been a lot of blue chips to the late director (Hoover died under strange circumstances May 2, 1972.), I think we would have been a lot better off during this whole Watergate thing if he had been alive. Because he knew how to handle that Bureau - knew how to keep them in bounds."

Nixon concurred:

"Well, Hoover performed. he would have fought. That was the point. He would have defied a few people. He would have scared them to death. He has a file on everybody."

In the final days of Watergate, organized crime investigator Dan E. Moldea revealed that military authorities, including Nixon's Chief of Staff, General Alexander Haig, began to connect their chief with several mobsters, including Florida's Santos Trafficante, believed responsible for setting up heroin routes from Vietnam and making payoffs to Nixon associates.

Moldea quoted a Justice Department official as saying:

"The whole goddamn thing is too frightening to think about. We're talking about the President of the United States...a man who pardoned organized crime figures after millions were spent by the government putting them away, a guy who's had these connections since he was a congressman in the 1940s. I guess the real shame is that we'll never know the whole story, it'll never come out."

In a final nose thumbing to the American people, Nixon appointed former Warren Commission member Gerald R. Ford (See THE WARREN COMMISSION) as vice president after the resignation of Spiro Agnew.

One of Ford's first public actions was to pardon Nixon of any crimes.

###

While members of the corporate community were angered and upset with President Kennedy and his policies toward business, it appears there were those of took great advantage of his death.

The question has been raised - if there was a plot to assassinate Kennedy, surely someone would have been aware of it?

There are many indications that this was the case in the fall of 1963.

We already have learned of many incidents of people with foreknowledge of Kennedy's death - including racist J.A. Milteer, Rose Cherami (See JACK RUBY) and Richard Case Nagell (See SOLDIERS).

It also appears that some corporate leaders may have been aware of Kennedy's pending fate.

Crossfire: A Killing on Wall Street

In the 30 minutes following Kennedy's assassination in Dallas, the Dow Jones average fell more than 21.16 points. An estimated 6 million shares of stock changed hands, wiping out about $15 billion in paper values on the New York Stock Exchange alone. It was the greatest Stock Market panic since 1929. The panic and confusion was such that the Securities and Exchange Commission closed the Stock Exchange shortly after 2 p.m., more than 80 minutes before normal closing time. It was the first emergency shutdown of the Stock Market since August 1933.

A few sharp investors - or perhaps individuals with a knowledge of what was to come - had taken "short" positions in scattered areas of the market. That is, some stocks unaccountably were sold before the market dropped, indicating some people may have had advanced word that something momentous was about to happen.

Then when the Stock Market reopened on November 26, 1963, - just four days after the assassination - the New York Stock Exchange made a record $21 billion advance, more than regaining the losses incurred the day Kennedy died. It was the biggest single-day rise in the history of the Stock Market. More huge profits were made. No one has publicly identified the men who made their own private killing in the Stock Market, but it has been estimated that the profits made just on November 22 alone totaled more than $500 million.

It has been suggested by at least one author that the immense amount of money which changed hands on November 22, 1963, was the motivation behind Kennedy's death. And while most researchers reject this idea, many do believe that certain individuals - using insider information on the pending assassination - could not resist the temptation to profit from their knowledge.

Crossfire: Bankers

Another overlooked aspect of Kennedy's attempt to reform American society involves money.

Kennedy apparently reasoned that by returning to the Constitution, which states that only Congress shall coin and regulate money, the soaring national debt could be reduced by not paying interest to the bankers of the Federal Reserve System, who print paper money then lend it to the Government at interest.

He moved in this area on June 4, 1963, by signing Executive Order 11,110 which called for the issuance of $4,292,893,815 in United States Notes through the U.S. Treasury rather than the traditional Federal Reserve System. That same day, Kennedy signed a bill changing the backing of $1 and $2 bills from silver to gold, adding strength to the weakened U.S. currency.

Kennedy's comptroller of the currency, James J. Saxon, had been at odds with the powerful Federal Reserve Board for some time, encouraging broader investment and lending powers for banks that were not part of the Federal Reserve system. Saxon also had decided that non-Reserve banks could underwrite state and local general obligation bonds, again weakening the dominate Federal Reserve banks.

A number of "Kennedy bills" were indeed issued - the author has a $5 bill in his possession with the heading "United States Note" - but were quickly withdrawn after Kennedy's death.

According to information from the Library of the Comptroller of the Currency, Executive Order 11,110 remains in effect today although successive administrations beginning with that of President Lyndon Johnson apparently have simply ignored it and instead returned to the practice of paying interest on Federal Reserve notes.

Today we continue to use Federal Reserve Notes and the deficit is at an all time high.

Considering that the battle over U.S. monetary control by a monolithic central bank is an issue which dates back to the founding of the Republic, some assassination researchers believe Kennedy's little-noted efforts to reform the money supply and curtail the Federal Reserve System may have cost him much more than just the enmity of the all-powerful international bankers.

President Kennedy inched farther out on a limb with big business on January 17, 1963, when he presented both his administration's budget and proposals for tax reform which included a tax cut.

Kennedy's tax proposals included relieving the tax burden of low-income and elderly persons, revising tax treatment of capital gains for a better flow of capital funds, broadening the base of individual and corporate income taxes to remove special privileges and loopholes and even to do away with the oil depletion allowance.

This action brought the beleaguered President into direct confrontation with one of the most powerful and single-minded groups in America - wealthy oilmen.

Crossfire: Kennedy and Oilmen

To get some idea of the power and wealth of the petroleum industry, consider that the yearly budget of the oil industry far exceeds that of the United States Government.

The history of oil is replete with stories of unbounded greed, business chicanery and even violence.

It all began when Colonel Edwin Drake drilled the first U.S. oil well in Titusville, Pennsylvania, in August 1859.

Within 10 years, most of this nation's oil production had come under the control of one of the greatest monopolist of all time - John D. Rockefeller. By 1891, Standard Oil Company -Rockefeller's trust - was in direct control of 70 percent of the world petroleum market, although his monopoly was already cracking due to oil production by the Russian-Swedish Nobel interests.

With encouragement from President Theodore "Teddy" Roosevelt, the U.S. Government began attempts to break Rockefeller's choke hold on oil. However, it was not until 1911 in an historic Supreme Court decision that Standard Oil was dissolved. Even then, the Rockefeller family continued to own controlling stock in the 27 separate companies left after the Standard Oil breakup.

The entire 20th century has witnessed effort after effort to shatter the powerful oil monopoly. Today, with "integrated" oil companies controlling production, refining and distribution all over the world, the hope for government control appears dim.

The demand for oil skyrocketed in the early 1900s along with the demand for more automobiles. In 1911, the year Standard Oil broke up, there were 619,000 cars in the United States. By 1914, that number rose to 2 million and, by 1924, there were 18 million vehicles on the roads.

Lack of oil was a major factor in bringing a German defeat in World War I.

During 1923, the first major oil scandal occurred when it was discovered that President Warren G. Harding's Secretary of the Interior, Albert B. Fall, had accepted money from oilmen in exchange for secretly leasing drilling rights on government land in Wyoming known as the Teapot Dome.

In the late 1920s, the "red line" and the "as is" agreements between the major oil companies created an international oil cartel, which became known as the Seven Sisters - Exxon, mobil, SoCal, Texaco, Gulf, Royal Dutch Shell and British Petroleum.

By 1933, there were calls for making the vital oil industry a public utility with governmental controls. One of the men supporting this move was President Franklin Roosevelt's Secretary of the Interior, Harold Ickes. However, FDR was finally turned against the plan by Texas Congressman Sam Rayburn, Lyndon Johnson's mentor who faithfully represented Texas oil interests in Washington.

After the major oil companies shut off supplies to Japan in 1941, the Japanese Navy attacked Pearl Harbor and the United States entered World War II.

Despite scandals showing that executives of Exxon and Texaco were secretly aiding the Axis war effort, our dependence on oil produced even closer cooperation between the oil companies and the Government.

After the war, the Marshall Plan began turning recovering European nations away from coal to oil. Refining capacity in Europe tripled in just a few years.

In 1950, a secret agreement was reached between the State Department and major oil companies which allowed all royalties paid to Arab nations to be applied as tax credits. Following this action, taxes from Exxon, Texaco, SoCal and mobil, which were $50 million that year, dropped to $6 million in 1951.

Dwight Eisenhower was elected with strong support from the oil industry and, early in 1953, in one of his first actions, he stopped a grand jury investigation into the "international Petroleum Cartel" citing reasons of "national security."

That same year, a CIA-backed coup reinstated the Shah of Iran and new oil arrangements with that nation began. Ironically, the Iranian coup was masterminded by Kermit Roosevelt, Teddy's grandson, who went on to become a vice president of Gulf Oil.

The Suez Crisis in 1956 signaled the end of British and French colonialism in the Middle East and the major oil companies moved to consolidate their power.

Sensing the opportunity to gain advantage around the world, a group of business leaders headed by Nelson Rockefeller sent a report to President Eisenhower which urged armed intervention to stop nationalist movements in the Middle East, Africa, Latin America and Southeast Asia. However, by 1960 there was an oil surplus coupled with declining demand which prompted Exxon to suddenly cut the posted price of oil by 14 cents per barrel. This caused angry oil-rich nations to retaliate by forming the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries (OPEC), a first step in self-determination.

When John F. Kennedy became President in 1961, the oil industry felt secure behind the CIA, which it considered its private security force. Long-time CIA director Allen Dulles, after all, had been a Rockefeller attorney.

When Fidel Castro took power in Cuba, the oil companies put pressure on both transport firms and other nations alike not to trade with the bearded leader. When Castro began dealing with the Soviet Union, the CIA began working with the Mafia to eliminate him (See MOBSTERS and AGENTS), with the acquiescence of big business and the oil companies.

In 1962, after Kennedy fired Dulles as head of the CIA, the new director was John McCone, a million-dollar stockholder in SoCal.

But President Kennedy then began to assault the power of the oil giants directly, first with a law known as "The Kennedy Act" and later by attacking the oil depletion allowance. The Kennedy Act, passed on October 16, 1962, removed the distinction between repatriated profits and profits re-invested abroad. Both were now subject to U.S. taxation. The measure also was aimed at preventing taxable income from being hidden away in foreign subsidiaries and other tax havens. While this law included industry as a whole, it particularly affected the oil companies, which were greatly diversified with large overseas operations. By the end of 1962, oilmen estimated their earnings on foreign invested capital would fall to 15 percent, compared with 30 percent in 1955. One of the most sacred of provisions in the eyes of oilmen was the oil depletion allowance, which permitted oil producers to treat up to 27.5 percent of their income as tax exempt. In theory this was to compensate for the depletion of fixed oil reserves but, in effect, it gave the oil industry a lower tax rate.

Under this allowance, an oilman with a good deal of venture capital could become rich with virtually no risk. For example, a speculator could drill 10 wells. If nine were dry holes and only the tenth struck oil, he would still make money because of tax breaks and the depletion allowance.

It was estimated at the time that oilmen might lose nearly $300 million a year if the depletion allowance was diminished.

Attempts to eliminate or reduce the depletion allowance were rebuffed year after year by Congressmen, many of whom were the happy recipients of oil industry contributions.

Speaking of his tax reform act of 1963, President Kennedy pointed the finger at the oil companies, saying:

"...no one industry should be permitted to obtain an undue tax advantage over all others."

Including in Kennedy's tax package were provisions for closing a number of corporate tax loopholes, including the depletion allowance.

Needless to say, oilmen both in Texas and elsewhere felt threatened by Kennedy and his policies. Kennedy's use of his personal power against the steel manufacturers had shown them that the young President meant to enforce his will in these matters.

John W. Curington, who for 12 years was special assistant to Dallas oil billionaire H.L. Hunt, reported in 1977:

"Hunt was often heard by top aides and followers to say that America would be much better off without Kennedy."

Curington, whose statements were assessed truthful by Psychological Stress Evaluator (PSE) analysis, also said the oilman sent him to check on Oswald's police security while in custody and was "elated" to find it was lax. Curington also is convinced that he saw Marina Oswald coming from Hunt's private offices several weeks after the assassination.

Hunt's former assistant said he believes that the wealthy oilman unwittingly influenced right-wing followers to participate in a conspiracy to kill Kennedy. He added that in later years, Hunt admitted that he knew an assassination conspiracy existed.

Angry talk in the corporate boardrooms may have grown into deadly plots on golf courses and at private parties. But oilmen, despite their unparalleled wealth and power, could not have moved against Kennedy on their own. They needed allies within Government and within the intelligence community. Such allies were there - among the anti-Castro Cubans, in the CIA, organized crime and within the federal Government - and all were most receptive to the idea of a change of leadership.

###

One man with connections into both government, intelligence and the oil industry was George DeMohrenschildt, identified by the Warren Commission as the last-known close friend to Lee Harvey Oswald.

Crossfire: Oswald's Friends

Perhaps the most intriguing person in the entire cast of characters connected with the Kennedy assassination was oil geologist George S. DeMohrenschildt - a man who was friends with both Jackie Kennedy's family and the alleged assassin of her husband, Lee Harvey Oswald.

Despite this fascinating connection, little was said about DeMohrenschildt at the time of the assassination. Both he and his wife, Jeanne, were in Haiti during the events in Dallas.

A close study of DeMohrenschildt's life shows a string of intelligence connections, raising the possibility that DeMohrenschildt may have played a role - perhaps unwittingly - in furthering plans for the assassination. This was a possibility which came to haunt DeMohrenschildt in the days just prior to his suspicious death in 1977.

DeMohrenschildt - his family, originally named Mohrenskuld, was of Swedish extraction - was born April 17, 1911, in Mozyr, a small Baltic town in Czarist Russia near the Polish border. His father, Sergis Alexander Von Mohrenschildt, was an elected representative of the landowning nobility to the Czarist government.

During the Russian Revolution, the family was forced to flee the Baltic area - which was taken over by the communists - finally settling in Minsk, the Russian city where years later Oswald was to take up residence (See RUSSIANS). Here he resigned his government position and became a director of the Nobel oil interests in the Baku oil fields. Eventually, the family was forced to move again, this time to Wilno, Poland, to escape a communist order sentencing the elder Von Mohrenschildt to lifetime servitude in Siberia for his support of the Czarist monarchy.

In Poland, young George completed high school and attended a military academy in Grudziadz. Uninterested in a military career, he traveled to Belgium where he enrolled and graduated from the Institute of Higher Commercial Studies in Antwerp. He then received a doctorate degree in international Commerce from the University of Liege. His doctoral paper was on the economic influence of the United States on Latin America. It was the beginning of a life-long interest in that area. Meanwhile, his older brother, Dimitri, had come to the United States, earning degrees from Columbia and Yale, where he was roommates with singer Rudy Vallee. In the spring of 1938, at the urging of Dimitri, DeMohrenschildt came to the United States. An educated, sophisticated young man, DeMohrenschildt was introduced to many wealthy and influential Americans in the Northeast. He later told the Warren Commission:

"(I met) lots of people, but especially Mrs. (Janet) Bouvier...Mrs. Bouvier is Jacqueline Kennedy's mother, also (I met) her father and her whole family. She (Mrs. Bouvier) was in the process of getting a divorce from her husband (Jackie's father, John V. "Jack" Bouvier). I met him, also. We were very close friends. We saw each other every day. I met Jackie then, when she was a little girl. (And) Her sister, who was still in the cradle practically."

In the summer of 1938, DeMohrenschildt had taken an interest in Jack Bouvier's sister, Michelle, and was a frequent guest at Lasata, the Bouvier summer home in East Hampton.

After failing to succeed selling insurance and perfume, DeMohrenschildt recalled his father's oil business. Traveling by bus to Texas, he got a job with Humble Oil Company in Houston, thanks to family connections. Despite being friends with the chairman of the board of Humble, young DeMohrenschildt was confined to working as a "roughneck" in Louisiana oil fields. He quit after being injured and contracting amoebic dysentery.

Returning to New York, DeMohrenschildt was called for service in both the United States and Poland. Poland was overrun by the Nazis before he could report, however, and he eventually was declared "4F" in the U.S. Reportedly he tried to join the fledgling Office of Strategic Services (forerunner of the CIA) but was "security disapproved" due to his suspected links with both German and Polish intelligence.

Although for years, he claimed to have worked for French intelligence during the early years of World War II - he said he was never an official agent but had helped a good friend, Pierre Freyss, the head of French counterintelligence - in later years he confessed to his wife that he had briefly worked for the Germans.

DeMohrenschildt also became closely connected with many exiled Russians who joined with the General Vlassov movement, anti-communist Russians who fought with the Nazis in hope of recovering their homeland. Springing up in cities where there were large Russian exile communities, these people referred to themselves as "solidarists," indicating the solidarity of their purpose. One of these groups existed in Dallas during the early 1960s, although DeMohrenschildt disclaimed being a member. The Vlassov organization was eventually absorbed by the Nazi spy system under General Reinhard Gehlen, which at the end of the war became a part of U.S. intelligence. Many members of this apparatus ended up working for the CIA.

When Poland was partitioned in 1939, the Von Mohrenschildt home fell into the Russian zone, so the family fled to Germany, where George's father reportedly was killed in an allied bombing raid late in the war. One of DeMohrenschildt's Nazi spy contacts was a distant cousin, Baron Konstantin Maydell. DeMohrenschildt aided Maydell in making a "documentary": film about German activities in Poland. Both Maydell and DeMohrenschildt were accused of being German agents. Maydell was arrested as a "dangerous alien" in September 1942, and imprisoned in North Dakota. In DeMohrenschildt's case, he and a female companion were arrested by the FBI in 1941 while passing through Aransas Pass near Corpus Christi, Texas. The couple had been making photographs and sketches of Padre Island, which the Bureau thought might include military installations. However, while the agents found no incriminating photographs, they did find letters of introduction to Nelson Rockefeller, and the pair were released.

DeMohrenschildt recalled receiving letters from his father in Germany. He told the Warren Commission:

"...I remember we exchanged letters with him during the war through some friends in Argentina and Japan, before Japan got into the war. My father wrote me a letter in which he said, "George, the Nazis are no good and Germany is going to lose the war, but I prefer to be in Germany than in Soviet Russia."

He told his wife he quickly stopped his work for the Germans.

In 1942, DeMohrenschildt married Dorothy Pierson, the young daughter of a well-to-do Florida family. The next year a daughter, Alexandra, was born, shortly before the DeMohrenschildts divorced.

DeMohrenschildt returned to Texas in 1944 and obtained a master's degree in petroleum geology from the University of Texas by the end of World War II. He then worked as a field engineer for Pantepec Oil in Venezuela before joining a petroleum consulting group in Colorado.

While vacationing in New York, he met, and later married, Phyllis Washington, the daughter of a ranking State Department official. DeMohrenschildt returned to Colorado with his new bride, but they too divorced quickly.

A thorough investigation of the Washington family may have revealed some of DeMohrenschildt's government connections, however there is evidence that such investigation was blocked at the time of the Warren Commission.

In January 1964, Phyllis was placed in a psychiatric hospital and later, in a strongly worded letter, FBI director J. Edgar Hoover urged Commission General Counsel J. Lee Rankin not to talk to her. A March 5, 1964, FBI report on the woman remains classified.

While in Colorado, DeMohrenschildt became an American citizen on July 11, 1949, and changed "Von Mohrenschildt" to the French "DeMohrenschildt."

Tiring of the statistical end of his Colorado work, DeMohrenschildt resigned and soon was in partnership with his nephew by marriage, Eddie Hooker, promoting oil deals. While visiting Hooker in New York in 1951, DeMohrenschildt met a pretty medical school graduate named Winifred "Didi" Sharples. A prominent Philadelphia family, the Sharples also were involved in the oil business. Married the next year, George and Didi had a son, Sergei, born in 1953 and a daughter, Nadya, born in 1954. Both children suffered from cystic fibrosis and Sergei died in 1960. Interestingly, DeMohrenschildt claims he and Didi founded the National Foundation for Cystic Fibrosis in Dallas and that Jackie Kennedy was honorary chairman. By the end of 1956, both his partnership with Hooker and his marriage to Didi had ended and DeMohrenschildt found himself more and more involved in foreign work.

His oil-related travels took him to France, Nigeria, Ghana and Togoland.

In 1957, he journeyed to Yugoslavia for the International Cooperation Administration, a branch of the U.S. government's Agency for International Development, despite an unflattering background check by the CIA. By this time, DeMohrenschildt apparently had some sort of relationship with the Agency according to documents which became public in the late 1970s.

Researcher Michael Levy obtained one CIA memo from former Agency Deputy director Richard Helms which states that DeMohrenschildt's trip to Yugoslavia provided "foreign intelligence which was promptly disseminated to other federal agencies in 10 separate reports." Another CIA memo indicated that DeMohrenschildt also furnished lengthy reports on his later travels through Mexico and Central America.

Shortly before leaving for Yugoslavia, DeMohrenschildt met another Russian exile who lived in the same Dallas hotel with him. Jeanne Fromenke LeGon had already established a career as a dancer and clothing designer. Her family too had strong political and defense-related connections. Her Russian father had built the first railroads in China and was connected with Nationalist politics there while her brother, Sergio, had worked on the super-secret Manhattan atomic bomb project. Her former husband, Robert LeGon, was connected to security work for Douglas Aircraft and their daughter, Christiana, was married to a vice president of Lockheed Aircraft Corporation.

She and the outgoing DeMohrenschildt hit it off right away and she joined him in Yugoslavia. In a curious incident there, the couple were boating when they were shot at by communist guards who became anxious when they came too close to Marshal Tito's summer home. Again, DeMohrenschildt claimed to have been simply sketching the shoreline.

Returning to the United States, George and Jeanne were soon married and shortly set off on an incredible odyssey through Central America. In an effort to take his mind off the death of his son, DeMohrenschildt took his new wife, a donkey and two dogs on a walking trip which began in the fall of 1960 at the Mexican border and ended in Panama. His films of the trip depict an adventurous trip - trekking through vast uninhabited deserts, bathing in cold mountain streams and playing native in quaint villages.

Many researchers believe the fact that the DeMohrenschildts arrived in Guatemala City in April 1961, just as the Bay of Pigs invaders were assembling there is evidence of further intelligence work by DeMohrenschildt. However, a careful study of his films and writings tends to show that the arrival of the couple was only coincidence.

Back in Dallas in late 1961, the DeMohrenschildts were at the center of prominent Dallasites. DeMohrenschildt's memberships included the Dallas Petroleum Club, the American Association of Petroleum Geologists, American Association of Mining Engineers and the Dallas Society of Petroleum Geologists. His business and social contacts read like a who's who of the Texas oil community. DeMohrenschildt knew Dallas oil millionaires H.L. Hunt and Clint Murchinson, John Mecom of Houston, Robert Kerr of Kerr-McGee and Jean De Menil, head of the worldwide Schlumberger Corporation. (According to former New Orleans District Attorney Jim Garrison, arms and explosives supplied by the CIA to the anti-Castro Cuban exiles were hidden away in a Schlumberger facility near that city in the summer of 1963.)

But most intriguing, was DeMohrenschildt's friendship with J. Walter Moore, a member of the CIA's Domestic Contact Service. Moore, whom DeMohrenschildt described to the Warren Commission as "a government man -either FBI or Central Intelligence," debriefed the geologist upon his return from Yugoslavia and thereafter met with the DeMohrenschildts socially on many occasions. After DeMohrenschildt first met Lee Harvey Oswald, he checked on the ex-Marine with Moore, who he said described Oswald as simply a "harmless lunatic." It is interesting to find that this CIA man knew enough about Oswald to call him a "lunatic" at a time the CIA has claimed they had no knowledge or interest in the ex-Marine.

In another incident, DeMohrenschildt wrote to friends less than two months after the assassination expressing shock and disbelief over Kennedy's death. He wrote:

"...before we began to help Marina and the child, we asked the FBI man in Dallas...about Lee and he told us that he was "completely harmless."

These letters are part of DeMohrenschildt's FBI file, indicating they Bureau was monitoring him during this time. His statements that he had checked on Oswald with the Bureau apparently caused great consternation. Dallas FBI chief L. Gordon Shanklin even ordered Agent James Woods to go to Haiti and obtained a lengthy statement from DeMohrenschildt denying that he had ever spoken about Oswald to the Bureau.

DeMohrenschildt himself may have been the object of a secret investigation in the months preceding Kennedy's death. Once DeMohrenschildt noticed small pencil marks on some of his papers and, convinced his home had been secretly entered, questioned Moore about it. Moore denied that Government people had broken into DeMohrenschildt's home.

Another close friend of DeMohrenschildt was Fort Worth attorney Max Clark, who at that time was connected with security at General Dynamics.

In later years, neither George nor Jeanne DeMohrenschildt could recall exactly who first mentioned the Oswalds to them. But in the summer of 1962, DeMohrenschildt and a Colonel Lawrence Orlov went to nearby Fort Worth on business and DeMohrenschildt decided to visit the Oswalds. He had heard through the Russian community in Dallas that the Oswalds had recently arrived in this country from Minsk and he was eager for news about the city of his youth.

DeMohrenschildt was appalled at the poorly-furnished "shack" in which the Oswalds lived, but was impressed by Oswald's command of Russian. He told the Warren Commission:

"...he spoke fluent Russian, but with a foreign accent, and made mistakes, grammatical mistakes but had remarkable fluency in Russian....Remarkable - for a fellow of his background and education...He preferred to speak Russian than English any time. He always would switch from English to Russian."

He said both his first impression of Oswald and his last were the same:

"I could never get mad at this fellow....Sometimes he was obnoxious. I don't know. I had a liking for him. I always had a liking for him. There was something charming about him, there was some - I don't know. I just liked the guy - that is all....with me he was very humble. If somebody expressed an interest in him, he blossomed, absolutely blossomed. If you asked him some questions about him, he was just out of this world. That was more or less the reason that I think he liked me very much."

The DeMohrenschildts soon embraced the Oswalds and visited them with an idea of helping the struggling couple.

It is interesting to note how the Dallas Russian community split in their reactions to the Oswalds. Most of them - being staunch anti-communists - wanted nothing to do with a man who had tried to defect to Russia. But some of the Emigré members - especially those with intelligence connections such as DeMohrenschildt - seemed quite at ease with the young would-be defector. Perhaps they too had been assured that Oswald was just a "harmless lunatic."

In October 1962, DeMohrenschildt managed to move Oswald to Dallas, where he dropped out of sight for nearly a month. His wife, Marina, was left with DeMohrenschildt's daughter and son-in-law, the Gary Taylors.

Something was going on because Oswald did not even inform his mother of the move and he told friends he had been fired from his job at Leslie Welding in Fort Worth when actually he quit.

Furthermore, during this time DeMohrenschildt was making regular trips to Houston, according to his friends Igor Voshinin and Paul Raigorodsky. Raigorodsky, a wealthy oilman and a director of the Tolstoy Foundation - an anti-communist organization of Russian exiles which was funded by the U.S. government - told the Warren Commission he asked DeMohrenschildt about his frequent Houston trips. Raigorodsky stated:

"He told me he was going to see Herman and George Brown. They are brothers."

The Brown brothers, of course, were owners of Brown and Root Construction and close friends and financial contributors to Lyndon Johnson.

Today, however, Jeanne DeMohrenschildt contends that her husband was conducting oil business in Houston with John Mecom and John De Menil. She said the only reason they didn't relocate to Houston during this time was because of her successful clothing business in Dallas.

At the time of the Cuban Missile Crisis, Oswald went to work for Jaggars-Chiles-Stovall, a Dallas printing and photographic firm which had contracts with the U.S. Army Map Service. Although clearances were required to work in some areas of the plant, testimony before the Warren Commission showed security was sloppy and apparently Oswald had access to sensitive material. It was here, it was believed, that Oswald manufactured false identification papers both for himself and in the name A.J. Hidell, using company photographic equipment.

He once asked fellow employee Dennis Ofstein if he knew what the term "microdot" meant. When Ofstein replied no, Oswald proceeded to explain that it was a special photographic process whereby a great mass of documents could be reduced to the size of a dot. He said this technique was used frequently in espionage work. All this left Ofstein wondering why Oswald would discuss such a subject. It should be noted that the word "microdot" was found written in Oswald's address book next to the entry for Jaggars-Chiles-Stovall.

Oswald and DeMohrenschildt also may have discussed spy work. He told the Warren Commission that Oswald once told him:

"...he had some contacts with the Japanese communists in Japan, and they - that got him interested to go and see what goes on in the Soviet Union" (See LEE HARVEY OSWALD).

Through the Christmas holidays of 1962-63 DeMohrenschildt continued to try and get the Dallas Russian community involved with the Oswalds, but with only marginal success.

He apparently tried to separate the Oswalds and, on at least two occasions, tried to find living quarters for Marina and her children. But Marina decided to reunite with Oswald, much to the disgust of her friends in the Russian community who had tried to help her despite their dislike for her husband.

On February 22, 1963, the DeMohrenschildts brought the Oswalds to the home of Everett Glover where Marina was introduced to Ruth Paine.

Mrs. Paine was separated from her husband Michael, an employee of Bell Helicopter, and expressed an interest in seeing Marina again for the purpose of learning the Russian language. Marina agreed and several visits between the women followed.

According to the Warren Commission, Oswald ordered the fateful Mannlicher Carcano rifle from a mail order firm under the name "A. Hidell" on March 12, 1963, and it arrived in Dallas on March 25. Just 16 days later, Oswald reportedly fired a shot at General Walker.

The Walker incident occurred on a Wednesday night. Oswald arrived back home that evening and, according to Marina's Warren Commission testimony, told her he fired at Walker and had then buried his rifle. (Recall that the rifle discovered in the Texas School Book Depository was clean and well oiled and that no gun-cleaning material was found among Oswald's possessions.)

Yet the following weekend, the rifle was observed in his home by Jeanne DeMohrenschildt during a visit. She and her husband brought a pink bunny toy to Oswald's young daughter and Marina was showing her around their new apartment when she saw a rifle in a closet.

As Mrs. DeMohrenschildt recalls the incident today, she asked Marina:

"What on earth is that?"

Marina replied:

"A rifle. Lee bought it. I don't know why when we need money for food and things."

Asked what Oswald did with the weapon, Mrs. DeMohrenschildt said Marina answered:

"He goes to the public park with little June (Oswald's daughter) and shoots leaves with it."

Mrs. DeMohrenschildt recently explained:

"Today that sounds very strange, but at the time, I was thinking of the times I had fired guns at small targets in amusement parks and I really didn't think too much of her answer. When I told George about the rifle I had seen in the closet, he immediately boomed out, "Did you take that pot shot at General Walker, Lee?" George then laughed loudly. Looking back on this incident today, Lee and Marina did not appear to be shocked or upset. They merely stood there in silence while George laughed."

However, DeMohrenschildt told the Warren Commission:

"He sort of shriveled, you see, when I asked this question....Became tense, you see, and didn't answer anything....the remark about Walker ended the conversation. There was silence after that and we changed the subject and left very soon afterwards....It was frankly a stupid joke on my part."

Marina told the Warren Commission that on another occasion, DeMohrenschildt asked Oswald, "Lee, how is it possible that you missed?" However both DeMohrenschildts denied such a question was ever asked.

This visit was to be the last meeting between the DeMohrenschildts and the Oswalds. On April 23, Marina moved in with the attentive Mrs. Paine and the next day, Oswald left Dallas by bus for New Orleans.

About a week later, the DeMohrenschildts left for a new business venture in Haiti.

It is now obvious the this venture involved more than simply oil surveying and hemp growing as detailed by DeMohrenschildt to the Warren Commission.

During May 1963, as the DeMohrenschildts were preparing to leave for Haiti, they stopped in Washington where, according to CIA records, DeMohrenschildt met with a CIA representative and the assistant director of Army Intelligence. With him was his Haitian business associate, Clemard Charles. What specifically was discussed at this meeting is not known, but at this same time, another CIA document shows that an Agency officer "requested an expedite check on George DeMohrenschildt." Researchers have noted that Charles later was involved in the sale of arms and military equipment involving a gunrunner named Edward Browder.

According to the House Select Committee on Assassinations, Browder leased a B-25 bomber under the name of a fictitious company and flew it to Haiti a year after the Kennedy assassination and later cashed a $24,000 check signed by Charles. Browder, a former Lockheed test pilot who is serving a 25-year prison sentence for "security violations," told the Committee he had been working for the CIA.

Browder, according to information gathered by author David E. Scheim, also was an associate of Jack Ruby in the 1950s when both men were arranging the sale of arms to Fidel Castro.

The DeMohrenschildts were in Haiti when they learned of Kennedy's death. Reportedly, DeMohrenschildt told friends there the FBI was behind the assassination. Whether or not he actually made such a comment, he did start to experience difficulties after Haitian President Francois "Papa Doc" Duvalier reportedly received a letter from the FBI telling of DeMohrenschildt's friendship with Oswald and labeling him as a "Polish communist and a member of an international band."

The DeMohrenschildts were called to Washington to testify to the Warren Commission in April 1964. Oddly enough, when DeMohrenschildt tried to raise the issue of the damaging FBI letter with Warren Commission Attorney Albert Jenner, Jenner quickly told him:

"I would say you have been misinformed on that."

DeMohrenschildt replied:

"Well, he did receive some kind of letter."

Jenner:

"But, nothing that would contain any such statements....It may have been a crank letter, but nothing official."

DeMohrenschildt, catching the drift of Jenner's remarks depreciating the whole subject, suddenly agreed:

"Yes, I am sure it is nothing official. I am sure it could not have been anything official."

Researchers are left with the question of how could a Warren Commission attorney, supposedly searching for the truth of the Kennedy assassination, have been so confident that the FBI letter was a "crank" and why did he obviously close off the subject rather than attempt to find out more about it?

Today, Jeanne DeMohrenschildt claims that the Warren Commission did not appear eager to hear from her and her husband and that they had to ask to testify. She told this author:

"Much of our problems with governmental authorities came from our refusal to slander Lee's name. The Warren Commission, along with the mass media, depicted Oswald as a complete loner, a total failure, both as a man and a father. This is not the impression George and I had of this man. Lee was a sincere person. Although from a modest educational background, he was quick and bright....Lee obviously loved his daughter June. We could not possibly consider him as dangerous."

During their stay in Washington, the DeMohrenschildts visited in the home of Jackie Kennedy's mother, now Mrs. Hugh D. Auchincloss, who, according an unpublished book by DeMohrenschildt, said:

"Incidentally, my daughter Jacqueline never wants to see you again because you were close to her husband's assassin."

Returning to Haiti, the DeMohrenschildt's problems there increased to the point that in 1967 they were forced to sneak away from the island aboard a German freighter, which brought them to Port Arthur, Texas. Here, according to Jeanne in a 1978 interview with this author, the DeMohrenschildts were met by an associate of former Oklahoma Senator and oilman Bob Kerr. The returning couple were extended the hospitality of Kerr's home.

By the 1970s, the DeMohrenschildts were living quietly in Dallas, although once they were questioned by two men who claimed to be from "Life" magazine. A check showed the men were phonies.

DeMohrenschildt seemed content to teach French at Bishop College, a predominately black school in south Dallas. Then in the spring of 1976, George, who suffered from chronic bronchitis, had a particularly bad attack.

Distrustful of hospitals, he was persuaded by someone - Jeanne cannot today recall who - to see a newly-arrived doctor in Dallas named Dr. Charles Mendoza. After several trips to Mendoza in the late spring and summer, DeMohrenschildt's bronchial condition improved, but he began to experience the symptoms of a severe nervous breakdown. He became paranoid, claiming that "the Jewish Mafia and the FBI" were after him.

Alarmed, Jeanne accompanied her husband to Dr. Mendoza and discovered he was giving DeMohrenschildt injections and costly drug prescriptions.

She told this author:

"When I confronted (the doctor) with this information, as well as asking him exactly what kind of medication and treatments he was giving George, he became very angry and upset. By then, I had become suspicious and started accompanying George on each of his visits to the doctor. But, this physician would not allow me to be with George during his "treatments." He said George was gravely ill and had to be alone during treatments."

Jeanne said her husband's mental continued to deteriorate during this time. She now claims:

"I have become convinced that this doctor, in some way, lies behind the nervous breakdown George suffered in his final months."

The doctor is indeed mysterious. A check with the Dallas County Medical Society showed that Dr. Mendoza first registered in April 1976, less than two months before he began treating DeMohrenschildt and at the same time the House Select Committee on Assassinations was beginning to be funded. Mendoza left Dallas in December, just a few months after DeMohrenschildt refused to continue treatments, at the insistence of his wife.

Mendoza left the society a forwarding address which proved to be non-existent. He also left behind a confused and unbalanced George DeMohrenschildt.

During the fall of 1976 while in this unbalanced mental state, DeMohrenschildt completed his unpublished manuscript entitled, "I am a Patsy! I am a Patsy!" after Oswald's famous remark to newsmen in the Dallas Police station. The night he finished the manuscript, DeMohrenschildt attempted suicide by taking an overdose of tranquilizers. Paramedics were called, but declined to take him to a hospital. They found DeMohrenschildt also had taken his dogs' digitalis, which counteracted the tranquilizers.

In this book, he depicts Oswald as a cursing, uncouth man with assassination on his mind, a totally opposite picture from his descriptions of Oswald through the years.

Shortly after his attempted suicide, Jeanne committed her husband to Dallas' Parkland Hospital where he was subjected to electro-shock therapy.

To gauge his mental condition at this time, consider that he told Parkland roommate Clifford Wilson:

"I know damn well Oswald didn't kill Kennedy - because Oswald and I were together at the time."

DeMohrenschildt told Wilson that he and Oswald were in downtown Dallas watching the Kennedy motorcade pass when shots were fired. He said, at the sound of shots, Oswald ran away and DeMohrenschildt never saw him again.

This story, which was reported in the April 26, 1977, edition of the "National Enquirer" as "Exclusive New Evidence," is patent nonsense since both George and Jeanne were at a reception at Bulgarian Embassy in Haiti the day Kennedy was killed.

But the incident serves to illustrate the abysmal lack of truthful investigation by segments of the news media as well as George DeMohrenschildt's mental condition at the time.

In early 1977, DeMohrenschildt, convinced that evil forces were still after him, fled to Europe with Dutch journalist Willems Oltmans, who later created a furor by telling the House Select Committee on Assassinations that DeMohrenschildt claimed he knew of Oswald's assassination plan in advance.

However, DeMohrenschildt grew even more fearful in Europe. In a letter found after his death, he wrote:

"...As I can see it now, the whole purpose of my meeting in Holland was to ruin me financially and completely."

In mid-March DeMohrenschildt fled to a relative's Florida home leaving behind clothing and other personal belongings. It was in the fashionable Manalapan, Florida, home of his sister-in-law that DeMohrenschildt died of a shotgun blast to the head on March 29, 1977, just three hours after a representative of the House Select Committee on Assassinations tried to contact him there.

Earlier that day, he had met author Edward J. Epstein for an interview. In a 1983 "Wall Street Journal," Epstein wrote that DeMohrenschildt told him that day that the CIA had asked him "to keep tabs on Oswald."

However, the thing which may have triggered DeMohrenschildt's fear was that Epstein showed him a document which indicated DeMohrenschildt might be sent back to Parkland for further shock treatments, according to a statement by Attorney David Bludworth, who represented the state during the investigation into DeMohrenschildt's death.

Although several aspects of DeMohrenschildt's death caused chief investigator Captain Richard Sheets of the Palm County Sheriff's Office to term the shooting "very strange," a coroner's jury quickly ruled suicide.

It is unclear if Oltmans knew of DeMohrenschildt's mental problems at the time he made his statements, but in later years, Jeanne told the newsman:

"...if George's death was engineered, it is because you focused such attention on my husband that the real conspirators decided to eliminate him just in case George actually knew something, just like so many others involved in the assassination."

One other matter involved the DeMohrenschildts with the assassination and it has proven as unfathomable as so many other aspects of the case. According to Jeanne, when the DeMohrenschildts arrived back in the United States from Haiti in early 1967, they discovered a photograph of Oswald in some Russian-English language records they had lent to Marina Oswald prior to leaving for Haiti. The records had never been returned and they were surprised to find them among their belongings, which had been left with their friend Everett Glover. Glover later placed the DeMohrenschildt's things in storage. Ruth Paine, with whom Marina lived at the time of the assassination, also had access to the DeMohrenschildt belongings.

The picture is one of the famous backyard scenes depicting Oswald with his rifle and pistol while holding a communist publication. It is one pose of at least three photos believed by most researchers to be faked (See THE EVIDENCE). On the back of the photo is one inscription in English reading "To my friend George from Lee Oswald." Beneath this is an inscription in Russian Cyrillic script which translates "Hunter of fascists Ha-ha-ha!!!"

The photo also bears the date "5/IV/63" apparently meaning April 5, 1963. The date is curious, mixing in Roman numerals as it does and written in the European style. The New Orleans-born Oswald more likely would have written "4/5/63" and, in fact, a check of dozens of other examples of dates in Oswald's mass of written material shows not one written in such a manner.

Today, Jeanne swears neither she nor her husband ever saw the photograph until discovering it upon their return in 1967.

Handwriting experts for the House Select Committee on Assassinations could not identify either Oswald, Marina or the DeMohrenschildts as authors of the inscription.

And Marina gave mixed accounts of the photo, which surfaced just at a time when many assassination researchers were first beginning to question the authenticity of the backyard photographs. The sudden appearance of yet another photo of Oswald and his weapons in the hands of close friends went far in establishing the authenticity of the backyard pictures in the public mind.

While testifying to the Committee in 1978, Marina suddenly said:

"...I remember being surprised at him (Oswald) showing pictures like that to George (DeMohrenschildt), so apparently I saw them at the apartment...something strikes my memory that - how dare he show pictures like that to a friend?"

If her statement is true, and that's a big "if" since later in her testimony Marina suddenly could not remember much else about the episode, it would mean that George DeMohrenschildt - the man with numerous intelligence connections - was aware of Oswald's possession of weapons months before the assassination.

The DeMohrenschildts denied any knowledge of the photo with the incriminating inscription and today, Jeanne is convinced that the picture was planted among their possessions.

Looking over the fascinating life of George and Jeanne DeMohrenschildt, one is struck by the idea that this sophisticated couple may be one of the biggest "Red Herrings" of the assassination.

There is now no question that DeMohrenschildt had numerous and long-standing connections with intelligence - most notably the CIA and, perhaps, private intelligence groups connected with the oil industry and defense work.

However, there can likewise be little doubt that DeMohrenschildt played no role in the actual assassination, since both he and his wife left Dallas in May 1963, and didn't return to the United States until their appearance before the Warren Commission in April 1964.

Any plot to kill Kennedy must have been finalized in the late summer and fall of 1963, a time when the DeMohrenschildts were out of the country.

Yet it is apparent that through DeMohrenschildt certain elements within oil, business and intelligence circles could have become aware of Oswald who, with his pro-communist background, must have appeared as a prime candidate for an assassination patsy.

After the assassination, DeMohrenschildt - with his connections to German, French, Polish and United States intelligence, wealthy right-wing Texas oilmen, and Caribbean business interests - provided a wonderful opportunity to draw investigators into a labyrinth of false leads.

The mental deterioration near the end of his life caused DeMohrenschildt to make untrue statements which further clouded the issue.

###

If George DeMohrenschildt had a genuine liking for President Kennedy, as he stated on several occasions, this fondness was not shared by his conservative oil and business associates. They felt threatened by the young President, who was making decisions on finances, taxation and foreign policy outside their control.

Corporate leaders traditionally had sought out politicians who would look out for their interests in Washington. So in the days of Kennedy's Camelot, these oil and business titans may have looked to a man who they knew they could deal with, if not completely trust - Vice President Lyndon B. Johnson.

Crossfire: All the Way with LBJ

In Dallas on the day Kennedy died there were those people iconoclastic enough to suggest that Vice President Johnson was behind the assassination. These were mostly long-time Texas residents who had heard vicious stories about Johnson for years and who figured the Texas politician had more to gain for Kennedy's death than just about anyone. Even today, many serious students of the assassination cannot discount the idea that Johnson, in some way, played a role in the Dallas tragedy.

Johnson's actions following the assassination do little to stop such speculation. And a close study of the corruption and violence which dogged Johnson's political career only adds to the suspicions.

Lyndon Baines Johnson was born August 27, 1908, near Johnson City, Texas, which had been named for his grandfather, one of the area's original settlers. His father, Sam Ealy Johnson who served in the Texas Legislature for 12 years, told neighbors:

"A U.S. Senator is born today."

Young Johnson graduated from Johnson City High School as president of his senior class of six people. After running away to California, he hitchhiked home and enrolled in Southwest Texas State Teachers College at San Marcos.

Here Johnson displayed his penchant for power and manipulation by becoming an assistant to the school president's personal secretary.

His maneuverings caused the school president to remark years later:

"Lyndon, I declare you hadn't been in my office a month before I could hardly tell who was president of the school - you or me."

Johnson was so distrusted at school that fellow students gave him the nickname "Bull Johnson." "Bull" was simply a sanitized version of bullshit.

After graduating at age 22, Johnson got teaching job in Houston, but it failed to hold the interest of this ambitious young man. So, in 1931, Johnson was drawn into Texas politics, campaigning strenuously for conservative Congressman Richard M. Kleberg. After Kleberg's victory, Johnson accompanied him to Washington as his secretary.

Here too Johnson was criticized for acting as if he were the Congressman rather than merely his assistant.

In 1934 Johnson was visiting in Austin when he met an attractive 21-year-old journalism student named Claudia Alta Taylor, the daughter of an affluent merchant and landowner in Karnack, Texas. As the story goes, a black "mammy" took one look at the infant Claudia and declared:

"Lawd, she's as pretty as a "

From that time on, she was known as "Lady Bird."

After a whirlwind courtship of two months, consisting mainly of daily telephone calls from Washington, Johnson returned to Texas and asked "Bird" to marry him, adding:

"If you say no, it just proves that you don't love me enough to dare to marry me. We either do it now, or we never will."

She agreed and the couple drove to San Antonio for a rushed-up wedding in St. Mark's Episcopal Church. Johnson had a friend pull strings to circumvent the normal channels for obtaining a marriage license and bring a selection of rings from a nearby Sears and Roebuck store. Lady Bird chose a $2.50 wedding band. After a brief honeymoon in Mexico, the Johnsons moved to Washington, where they rented a one-bedroom apartment and Johnson resumed his political work for Kleberg.

Watching the energetic Johnson was a close friend of the Johnson family, Congressman Sam Rayburn, already a power on Capitol Hill. In August 1935, thanks to some help from Rayburn, President Franklin Roosevelt named Johnson as Texas director of the National Youth Administration, a New Deal program for employing youth. Johnson resigned as Kleberg's secretary and flew to Texas where he told newsmen his "job was to work himself out of a job." One of the first persons Johnson hired to join the NYA was Jesse Kellam, a former San Marcos schoolmate who was then deputy state supervisor of education. Kellam later succeeded Johnson as NYA director and went on to manage the Johnson radio-TV station KTBC in Austin.

Capitalizing on his authority to award loans and jobs, Johnson created a formidable political base in south Texas. He also used his new position to ingratiate himself with President Roosevelt, who Johnson referred to as "my political daddy." By now, his career designs were set firmly in politics.

Johnson's political future contained just three plateaus - Congressman, Senator and President, although Johnson studiously avoided talking about the latter.

In early 1937, with the sudden death of Austin Congressman James P. Buchanan, Johnson saw his chance. Others also saw their chance. At the same time Johnson was looking for financial and political support to make a bid for Buchanan's seat, Austin attorney Alvin Wirtz and his client, Herman Brown, were looking for help in Washington.

It seems Brown's construction company, Brown & Root, had already begun construction of the Marshall Ford Dam in south Texas but the project had not officially been authorized by Congress but rather was started by a grant from the Department of the Interior's Bureau of Reclamation. Congressman Buchanan had pledged to get the necessary authorization during 1937, but his death left the entire $10 million project in limbo.

In fact, since the dam was being built on Texas rather than United States property, the future of the project was in serious doubt as it violated federal law to build on non-government land. Yet Brown & Root already had sunk more than $1.5 million into the dam and the firm's entire business future hinged on completing the project.

What was needed was someone in Washington who could get the laws changed and that someone was Lyndon Johnson.

By this time, distrust and suspicions were growing within the Democratic Party against the powerful Roosevelt. After introducing legislation which would increase the membership of the Supreme Court many conservative Democrats turned against him, claiming he was trying to "pack" the court with New Deal liberals. One of these opponents was Roosevelt's own vice president, the rangy Texan John Nance Garner, who tried to dissuade young Johnson from siding with the President. Johnson either didn't get the word or chose to ignore it.

Backed by Wirtz, Brown and their well-heeled business associates, the indefatigable Johnson raced through nearly 8,000 square miles of Texas hill country pledging total support of Roosevelt and his New Deal, a theme which set well with impoverished farmers and laborers.

The election, climaxed by a raging blizzard and a sudden operation to repair a ruptured appendix on Johnson, was a victory, with Johnson outpolling five opponents by 3,000 votes.

Back in Washington, the 29-year-old Johnson managed to get authorization for the Marshall Ford Dam as well as a fabulous government contract for Brown & Root to build a huge Navy base at Corpus Christi, thanks largely to his connections with Roosevelt and Rayburn.

His staunch support of Roosevelt had won Johnson special attention from the powerful President. The young Texan became friends with Roosevelt's "inner circle" - Thomas G. "Tommy the Cork" Corcoran, author of New Deal legislation; James Roosevelt, the President's son; and Grace Tully, the President's secretary.

Herman Brown and his friends were so pleased with Johnson's performance that in 1940 the young Congressman was offered a share in very lucrative oil properties with no money down. Johnson was told he could pay for his share out of yearly profits. It was tantamount to a gift. Brown was shocked when Johnson, who had been complaining of lack of money, turned the offer down, saying the offer "would kill me politically."

Since both a House and Senate seat would come from votes in Texas, where being in the oil business had never been a hindrance, Brown realized what Johnson's true political goal was - the Presidency.

Johnson biographer Robert A. Caro wrote:

"And only when...Johnson firmly refused (the) offer did Brown realize how much Johnson wanted it."

As a Congressman, Johnson continued to perform for his oil and business mentors back in Texas. In 1941, Brown & Root obtained a lucrative Navy contract to build four submarines, although, as George Brown was to later recall:

"We didn't know the stern from the aft - I mean the bow - of the boat."

But bigger favors required a bigger office, so in that same year Johnson made his bid for the Senate after a sudden stroke took senior Texas Senator Morris Sheppard.

Johnson immediately entered the race but his competition was formidable. Governor W. Lee "Pappy" O'Daniel, Texas Attorney General Gerald Mann and Martin Dies, chairman of the House Committee on Un-American Activities and others also wanted Sheppard's seat.

As in 1937, Johnson hitched his star to Roosevelt's, rushing about Texas calling for support for the President and the New Deal. Meanwhile, Brown & Root, Dallas and Houston oilmen and Democrat sources in Washington all contributed to Johnson's race.

Early in the campaign O'Daniel had told Johnson he wouldn't run, however, after sensing a rising anti-Roosevelt tide among rural Texans, he changed his mind. Backed by the country singing group, the Light Crust Doughboys, O'Daniel crisscrossed the state slowly pulling votes from the FDR-favored Johnson.

Right through Election Day, it appeared Johnson would soon be senator.

However, powerful business interests in Texas wanted O'Daniel out of the Governor's mansion and last-minute returns from rural counties - many of them of questionable authenticity - resulted in Johnson's defeat by a meager 1,311 votes out of a total of nearly 350,000.

Following his defeat in 1941, Johnson began moving conspicuously to the political right, gaining more favor with conservative Texas oil and business interests, while his relationship with President Roosevelt cooled.

During his ill-fated senate race, Johnson had promised Texans:

"If the day ever comes when my vote must be cast to send your boy to the trenches, that day Lyndon Johnson will leave his Senate seat and go with him."

Just two days after Pearl Harbor, Johnson - who had been commissioned a lieutenant commander in the Navy Reserve some months previously - was called to active duty, becoming the first Congressman to leave for military service.

In June 1942, John was a passenger in a B-26 flying over the Pacific on his way to "assess American morale" when the bomber narrowly escaped Japanese fighters. The Navy awarded Johnson the Silver Star for "his marked coolness in spite of the hazard involved."

After serving less than a year, Johnson arrived back in Washington after Roosevelt called on all congressmen serving in the armed forces to return home.

His wartime service had won Johnson at least one solid ally. After a period of cool relations due to Johnson's blatant ambitiousness, Johnson again was accepted by powerful House Speaker Sam Rayburn. Rayburn taught Johnson his political philosophy, which he often repeated:

"To get along, you have to go along."

J. Evetts Haley, a critical biographer of Johnson, wrote:

"Lyndon became Rayburn's protégé; their relationship a fusion of experience and political sagacity with youthful ardor and enthusiasm, with no appreciable enhancement of the ideals and ethics of either."

Also, in 1942, Johnson was to use his friend Roosevelt one more time.

An IRS investigation had turned up evidence that huge amounts of money had been illegally contributed to Johnson's 1941 senatorial campaign by Brown & Root. It was estimated that the construction firm underestimated more than $1 million in taxes.

Yet even as the investigation began to be productive, Johnson and Brown & Root Attorney Wirtz met with FDR. Soon orders came down from Washington ordering a halt to the probe.

IRS investigators were incensed, but it was not to be the last time that investigations involving Johnson were suddenly scotched from Washington.

Remembering the effects of ballot box stuffing during the loss in 1941 and his ability to get things done in Washington, Johnson again entered a race for the Senate in 1948.

It was a close race between Johnson, still identified with Roosevelt and the New Deal, and conservative Texas Governor Coke Stevenson, who managed defeat Johnson in the Democratic Primary. However Stevenson didn't have a clear majority, so a run-off election was called for August 28.

Due to slow communications and manual voting procedures, the election outcome was in doubt for several days.

Finally on September 2, Johnson went on radio with a "victory speech" which shocked the confident Stevenson forces. Veteran Texas newsman Clyde Wantland wrote:

"Their fears were validated the following day...when a source friendly to Stevenson reported from Jim Wells County that Precinct 13 had been recanvassed and a "correction" made favoring Johnson with 202 more votes. Johnson's radio broadcast on Thursday thus became a reality on Saturday. Precinct 13 had been corrected from Johnson 765-60 to Johnson 967-61. This gave him a lead of 87 votes, with returns now complete and semi-official."

This 87-vote edge earned Johnson the sobriquet of "Landslide Lyndon" and began one of the longest legal feuds in Texas history. Some aspects of the 1948 election were still in court at the time of the Kennedy assassination.

At the center of the controversy was the powerful South Texas political boss, George Parr, commonly called the "Duke of Duval County." Parr, who wielded considerable power through the area which included Jim Wells County, was no stranger to questionable practices. Years earlier when a suspicious taxpayer had obtained an order from the Texas Supreme Court to audit Duval - and hence Parr's - financial records, the county courthouse suddenly burned to the ground destroying all the records. Parr's power rested with his ability to control votes. On election days, armed "pistoleros" hired for the day as "deputy sheriffs" would escort Hispanic voters to the polls and hand them a poll tax receipt and a completed ballot.

Reportedly, the 87-vote "correction" in the 1948 election came after frantic phone calls between Johnson and Parr. When a State Democratic Executive Committee subcommittee accepted the "corrected" return from Box 13, Stevenson supporters rushed to see Parr.

Already present in Parr's office was Johnson's campaign manager, John B. Connally, a long-time political protégé of the Congressman. Parr, feigning surprised, assured them he knew nothing of voting irregularities and the Stevenson group moved on the Jim Wells County, where they discovered that voting records were locked in the vault of the Parr-owned Texas State Bank.

The next day, with rumors of a shoot-out in the air, Stevenson and his entourage arrived at the bank along with famed Texas Ranger Captain Frank Hamer, who escorted the group through a phalanx of armed Parr employees. Inside, Stevenson was able to look at the "corrected" voting list and found 202 new names had been added alphabetically written by the same hand in blue ink, whereas the rest of the list was in different hands and in black ink.

Although they were not allowed to remove the list, Stevenson's people memorized enough names to investigate later. Many were Mexican citizens who had died long before the election and others, such as Enriqueta Acero, were back in Mexico on election day.

Furthermore, Stevenson found that while county officials claimed 1,025 votes had been cast, only 600 ballots had been officially issued for Precinct 13.

But while Stevenson and his group were uncovering evidence of illegal activities in Jim Wells County, Johnson had obtained an injunction from Austin Judge Roy Archer preventing the county's election committee from reconvening.

In court papers, Johnson charged that Stevenson, Hamer and others were conspiring to steal his Senate seat. In his petition, Johnson claimed he came to the Austin judge - 200 miles away from Jim Wells County - because "the resident judge...cannot be reached in sufficient time." A quick check showed that Judge L. Broeter of Jim Wells County was available.

Haley noted:

"Time was of the essence. Had the action in Judge Archer's chambers been delayed more than one hour, it is highly likely that the Jim Wells Democratic Committee would have met, thrown out Box 13, and restored the electoral decision in Stevenson's favor."

The fight over the election continued three days later when the Texas Democratic Executive Committee met in Fort Worth to certify the November ballot.

Arguments were heard for hours and a tie vote over whether or not to accept their subcommittee's report which favored Johnson was broken by the late arrival of Amarillo Committeeman C.C. Gibson. Johnson was on the Democratic ballot, which was tantamount to election.

But Stevenson continued his fight, saying:

"This race is not a matter of life or death for me. If I lost by one vote in an honest count the heavens wouldn't fall in. But some half million good solid Texans voted for me as their Senator and they have been defrauded and robbed. We can do no less than appeal to the Federal Courts."

Accordingly, Stevenson approached Federal Judge T. Whitfield Davidson and argued that, through fraud and corruption, he and his supporters had been denied their civil rights - namely their votes. After hearing out Stevenson, Judge Davidson ordered a full hearing for September 21, when he heard arguments from both sides. According to one news account of the proceedings, Davidson interrupted Johnson attorney's oratory by stating:

"There has not been one word of evidence submitted to disprove this plaintiff's claim that he has been robbed of a seat in the United States Senate."

Davidson then ordered an investigator to travel to Jim Wells County and report back with evidence of the truth. The judge also suggested that Johnson and Stevenson simply face each other on the November ballot and let the voters choose, a suggestion which Stevenson accepted.

But Johnson was not to be outdone by an honest election. The issue now was in the hands of federal authorities, where his growing power could be brought into play. Bypassing the Court of Civil Appeals, Johnson went directly to Supreme Court Justice Hugo Black - a former member of the Ku Klux Klan in Alabama who had been appointed by Johnson's "political daddy" Roosevelt.

On September 29, 1948, Black issued a sweeping order ending both Judge Davidson's injunction and his investigation. This questionable order into another court's proceedings prompted Davidson to tell newsmen:

"The United States Supreme Court has altered my opinion, but it hasn't changed my mind."

Haley wrote:

"The Black order, hurriedly issued in chambers, evidently without clerical or stenographic help, since it was dated in his own hand...peremptorily denied justice to Governor Stevenson and nearly half a million Texans who had voted for him. It brazenly abridged the Constitution and the Bill of Rights...But perhaps most terrible of all, it sanctified corruption as public policy. There is nothing in American history like it."

Lyndon Johnson went on to the U.S. Senate and his meteoric rise to power.

But in a series of strange deaths and missing records - which researchers cannot help but compare with similar events following the Kennedy assassination - the shock waves of his 1948 "landslide" victory continued. The all-important voting list of Jim Wells County turned up missing, after the county election chairman - a Parr employee - took it home for safekeeping. It was later discovered that the Precinct 13 ballot boxes were empty, the contents apparently destroyed by an overly-efficient Mexican janitor.

The matter came up again in 1977, when a guilt-ridden Luis Salas, the Jim Wells election judge, admitted to Texas newsmen that he certified fictitious ballots for Johnson on orders from Parr, who committed suicide in 1975. Salas said:

"Johnson did not win that election; it was stolen for him."

But even more troubling than this example of political fraud and corruption are the deaths connected with this and other attempts to investigate criminal charges against Johnson. When newsman Bill Mason began looking into South Texas political corruption as a result of the 1948 election furor, he was fatally shot by one of the Jim Wells County deputy sheriffs, Sam Smithwick. Smithwick was convicted and imprisoned. Angered at his friends for not getting him off, Smithwick wrote a letter to Stevenson saying he was ready to tell the truth of the 1948 election. But before Stevenson could visit Smithwick, the murderer was found hanged in his prison cell.

Another man who had sided with Stevenson was Attorney Jacob "Jake" Floyd. Floyd, who also was fighting the Parr machine, was warned on September 9, 1952, that he was targeted for assassination by Parr gunmen. Floyd left home by taxi. But a short time later, his son Buddy Floyd tried to leave in the family car and was fatally shot from ambush, apparently mistaken for his father. One of the men later convicted of shooting young Floyd, San Antonio bar owner Mario "El Turko" Sapit, was carrying a deputy sheriff's card signed by George Parr when arrested.

Violence was not uncommon in the rough and tumble politics of Texas in the 1940s and 1950s.

During the election of 1948, a young Jim Wright was running for re-election to the Texas Legislature. It was thought that Wright, considered a liberal by many in his hometown of Weatherford, would face a tough fight with a perennial office seeker and conservative named Eugene Miller.

On July 7, 1948, - just days before the election - Miller was shot down in front of his home outside Weatherford. No one was ever convicted of the crime and Wright went on to Austin. Wright's career advanced to Washington, where he assumed Sam Rayburn's old office of Speaker of the House.

Although the 1941 IRS investigation of Johnson contributions had been stopped by Roosevelt, Austin District IRS Collector Frank L. Scofield - himself appointed by FDR in 1933 - had continued to keep an eye on Johnson's finances. This may have led to charges being brought against Scofield in 1953 for allegedly obtaining political contributions from his employees in violation of the Hatch Act. After resigning his office, Scofield was acquitted of all charges by a federal jury in 1954. But the damage had been done. While Scofield was out of office, his successor placed all of the IRS files relating to Johnson and Brown & Root in a quonset hut in South Austin. Within days it mysteriously caught fire, destroying all the evidence.

In the late 1940s and early 1950s, both Johnson and his protégé Connally had offices in Fort Worth. Johnson operated out of the Hotel Texas, the site of Kennedy's breakfast speech the morning of November 22, 1963.

It was here in Fort Worth that both Johnson and Connally came into contact with gamblers, who in turn, were later connected to Jack Ruby as well as anti-Kennedy Texas oilmen.

W.C. Kirkwood was known as a "gentleman gambler" because he never allowed anyone in his high-stakes poker games who was on a salary. He did not want to be the cause of someone's children going hungry. Kirkwood conducted his big-time gambling at a luxurious sprawling Spanish-style complex known as The Four Deuces - the street address was 2222 on Fort Worth's Jacksboro Highway, notorious for its taverns and prostitution. It was here, under the protective eye of off-duty policemen, that men like H.L. Hunt, Clint Murchinson and others joined Sam Rayburn and his protégé Johnson for hours of Kirkwood-provided hospitality.

Murchinson, the close friend of J. Edgar Hoover, had developed a friendship with Johnson beginning in the 1940s. It is interesting to researchers that a principal banker for Murchinson as well as a longtime friend was none other than John J. McCloy, former chairman of Chase Manhattan Bank and one of the Warren Commissioners chosen by President Lyndon Johnson.

According to Murchinson biographer Ernestine Van Buren:

"...Clint wrote Johnson frequently, passing along ideas as a coach or mentor, knowing that Lyndon could implement them with his influence, if he wished. Clint's letters covered almost every subject in politics, with free expression of personal views, outlines on proposed legislation, philosophical aspects of the responsibility of paying taxes versus tax exemption, analysis of various political personalities, the broad international picture, the McCarthy censure, inflation, communism, and, of course, oil, oil, oil."

Murchinson was well aware of Johnson's presidential ambitions. He once wrote Johnson:

"...if you can work (California's powerful Senator William) Knowland, Nixon and Hoover together, you can control the United States, and this is not too much of a job for you..."

Retired Fort Worth Policeman Paul Bewley recalled for this author that while providing security for Johnson's Hotel Texas office suite, the one man who had unquestioned access to Johnson was W.C. Kirkwood.

The point which has fascinated assassination researchers is that Kirkwood's son, Pat Kirkwood, hosted Kennedy's Secret Service guards the night before his trip to Dallas (See G MEN) -and the fact that both the Kirkwoods and Dallas nightclub owner Jack Ruby shared a common close friend in gambler Lewis J. McWillie.

Ruby and McWillie - who at one time operated his own gambling establishment in Dallas, the Top of the Hill Club - had tried to open a casino in Cuba in 1959 and had participated in gun running schemes. A March 26, 1964, FBI report stated:

"...McWillie was a member of the "so-called gambling syndicate" operating in the Dallas area (which included the Kirkwoods in Fort Worth)...As of May 1960, McWillie was pit boss at the Riviera Casino, Havana, Cuba. Report reflects that it would appear McWillie consolidated his syndicate connections through his association in Havana, Cuba, with Santos Trafficante, well-known syndicate member, for Tampa, Florida; Meyer and Jake Lansky; Dino Cellini and others who were members of or associates of "the syndicate" (See MOBSTERS)."

Yet, despite this fascinating link between Jack Ruby's friend McWillie through the Kirkwoods to oilmen and Lyndon Johnson, neither the Warren Commission nor the House Select Committee on Assassinations apparently felt the need to fully investigate these associations.

Even in 1978, when Pat Kirkwood told Committee investigators that Oswald had worked briefly for his Cellar club in San Antonio, they made no comment and quickly moved on to another area of questioning.

Secure from the IRS investigation, Johnson began to expand his power base in Washington and by 1951, he was elected Democratic Whip in the Senate.

Two years later, at only 44 years of age, Johnson became the Senate's Majority Leader.

As Majority Leader, Johnson automatically became chairman of both the Democratic Steering Committee and the Democratic Policy Committee. The Steering Committee designated which Senators would serve on which committees while the Policy Committee made decisions on the desirability, importance and priority of Senate legislation. The power and importance of Johnson's position cannot be overstated.

Johnson soon was being described as the "second most powerful man in government."

Despite a near-fatal heart attack in 1955, a recovered Johnson soon was exhibiting his seemingly boundless energy on Capitol Hill once again. In countless deals, Johnson displayed his ability to get things done for his friends.

His incessant ambition prompted biographer Caro to comment:

"The more one thus follows his life, the more apparent it becomes that alongside the thread of achievement running through it runs another thread, as dark as the other is bright, and as fraught with consequences for history: a hunger for power in its most naked form, for power not to improve the lives of others, but to manipulate and dominate them, to bend them to his will. For the more one learns...about Lyndon Johnson, the more it becomes apparent not only that this hunger was a constant throughout his life but that it was a hunger so fierce and consuming that no consideration of morality or ethics, no cost to himself - or to anyone else - could stand before it."

One example of Johnson unbridled acquisition of power is that after becoming Senate Majority Leader, he defied the traditional practice of dropping committee chairmanships. Instead, Johnson maintained his chairmanship of the Democratic Policy, Steering, Conference, Appropriations subcommittee, Armed Services Preparedness and Aeronautical and Space committees.

Johnson used his powerful position to best advantage, according to author Caro, who told the "Atlantic Monthly":

"For years, men came into Lyndon Johnson's office and handed him envelopes stuffed with cash. They didn't stop coming even when the office in which he sat was the office of the vice president of the United States. Fifty thousand dollars in hundred-dollar bills in sealed envelopes was what one lobbyist for one oil company testified he brought to Johnson's office during his term as vice president."

There is evidence that Johnson also profited from cash contributions from the mob.

Jack Halfen - a former associate of Bonnie and Clyde, Frank Costello, Vito Genovese and Carlos Marcello - was the mob's gambling coordinator in Houston. On trial for income tax evasion in 1954, Halfen revealed how Houston gambling netted almost $15 million a year with 40 percent going to Marcello, 35 percent to Halfen and 25 percent to Texas police officials and politicians.

In talks with federal officials while serving a prison term, Halfen told how Johnson had been the recipient of more than $500,000 in contributions over a 10- year period while in the Senate. He said Johnson, in turn, had help the crime syndicate by killing anti-rackets legislation, watering down bills that could not be defeated and slowing Congressional probes into organized crime.

Halfen substantiated his close ties to Johnson with photographs of himself and Johnson on a private hunting trip and a letter from Johnson to the Texas Board of Pardons written on behalf of Halfen.

According to published reports Johnson also received large-scale payoffs from Teamster President Jimmy Hoffa. A former senatorial aide, Jack Sullivan, testified that he witnessed the transfer of a suitcase full of money from a Teamster lobbyist through a Maryland senator to Johnson's chief aide Cliff Carter.

Also recall that one of Johnson's "trusted friends," Bobby Baker, had long and documented mob connections. Baker once wrote:

"A New Orleans businessman rumored to be well connected with the Mafia had once sought me out to inquire whether President Lyndon Johnson might be willing to pardon Hoffa in exchange for one million dollars."

The Johnson Administration's anti-crime record is dismal. Racket busting came to a virtual halt. During the first four years following the assassination, Justice Department organized crime section field time had dropped by 48 percent, time before grand juries by 72 percent and the number of District Court briefs filed by that section by 83 percent.

Yet another example of Johnson's willingness to circumvent the law for his career's sake came in 1960, when he decided to run for President despite continually denying this decision. At the urging of Johnson, Democratic legislators in Texas rushed through a law which superseded an old statute forbidding a candidate from seeking two offices at the same time.

Thus Texas voters witnessed the bizarre spectacle of Johnson running for vice president on Kennedy's liberal national ticket while also running for Texas Senator on the state's conservative Democratic ticket. This hypocrisy raised eyebrows all across the state. One can easily imagine Johnson's anger and hurt when the Democratic Party in 1960 handed its Presidential nomination not to this long-time standard bearer, but instead to John F. Kennedy, a relative newcomer.

Johnson lamented to friends:

"Jack was out kissing babies while I was passing bills."

Knowing how Kennedy's top supporters detested him, Johnson must have seen Kennedy's nomination as a major road block in his drive for the Presidency. He was therefore pleasantly surprised when Kennedy offered him the vice president's position on the ballot. This offer, coming as it did after a often-bitter campaign between the two men, has been the subject of much debate. It now seems clear that Kennedy never really believed that Johnson would swap his Senate power for the empty honor of being vice president. He made the offer as a conciliatory move, fully expecting Johnson to turn it down.

But Johnson saw it as an opportunity to get one step closer to the presidency and promptly accepted. Reminded by friends that the office of vice presidency carried little importance, Johnson said:

"Power is where power goes."

The Kennedy forces were shocked. How could Kennedy pick Johnson, who stood for almost everything they hated.

It has been speculated that Kennedy went ahead and accepted Johnson for several reasons - as vice president Johnson could not retain his powerful position in the Senate where he might have stalled Kennedy's programs, it was an attempt to resurrect the old Democratic coalition of big city political machines and southern traditionalists which had kept the party in power throughout the Great Depression and it seemed necessary to have Johnson's help in swinging the 1960 election in southern and western states.

The latter reasoning proved prophetic. It was only through the tireless efforts of Johnson that six crucial southern states - including Texas - were kept in the Democratic column.

In Texas this was accomplished very simply. According to Haley, both Johnson and Rayburn warned the state's oilmen that if they voted for Nixon and the Democrats won, the oilmen could kiss the oil depletion allowance good-bye. So oil money helped swing the state for Kennedy-Johnson, despite a national Democratic platform which called for repealing the allowance - mute testimony to their belief in Johnson's power and hypocrisy.

During the 1960 campaign an incident occurred which illustrates how both friend and foe was vulnerable to what had become known as "The Johnson Treatment".

As reported by J. Evetts Haley, Johnson was lent a Convair jet for his campaign by Houston oilman John Mecom, the same oilman who was a business associate of George DeMohrenschildt. To disguise the fact that a wealthy oilman was providing Johnson with a plane estimated to cost $500,000, a lease agreement with an option to buy was signed by Johnson.

After the campaign, Mecom demanded the plane's return, but Johnson pointed to the contract and forced Mecom to honor the plane's sale for a paltry $200,000 as agreed in the contract.

As vice president, Johnson was a changed man. Gone were his power and his enthusiasm. There was almost constant friction between this old-style political powerbroker and the new breed of Kennedy men. Johnson's brother, Sam Houston Johnson, wrote about the treatment of his brother as vice president:

"...they made his stay in the vice presidency the most miserable three years of his life.

He wasn't the number two man in the administration; he was the lowest man on the totem pole...I know him well enough to know he felt humiliated time and time again, that he was openly snubbed by second-echelon White House staffers who snickered at him behind his back and called him "Uncle Cornpone.""

By the fall of 1963, rumors were rife that Johnson would be dumped from the 1964 Democratic national ticket. In fact, the day of Kennedy's assassination, the "Dallas Morning News" carried the headline:

"Nixon Predicts JFK May Drop Johnson."

Consequently, Johnson made several trips abroad, most probably to escape the daily humiliations in the White House. And even as Johnson was being sworn in as vice president, investigations already were underway probing his business connections with Texas wheeler-dealer Billie Sol Estes.

It was an investigation also plagued with corpses. One murder which occurred during the probe has been attributed to the late President by Estes, the former LBJ confidant and convicted swindler.

In 1961, just months before Estes was exposed for conducting one of the greatest frauds in history, a federal Department of Agriculture official named Henry Marshall began looking into Estes' habit of acquiring federal cotton allotment payments for land which was under water or actually government-owned.

In a report little known outside Washington, Marshall may have linked Estes' shady business dealings to his good friend Vice President Johnson. What evidence Marshall had uncovered will probably never be known however. On June 3, 1961, Marshall was found dead on a remote section of his farm near Franklin, Texas. He had been shot five times in the abdomen. Nearby lay a bolt-action .22-caliber rifle. Five days later, without the benefit of an autopsy, the local Justice of the Peace ruled Marshall's death a suicide. This prompted Texas Ranger (later U.S. Marshal) Clint Peoples to declare:

"If he can kill himself with this gun, I can ride a jackass to the moon."

In March, 1962, Estes was arrested on charges of conspiracy and the interstate transportation of fraudulent chattel mortgages in connection with his sale of non-existent fertilizer tanks. Estes repeatedly told friends he was ready to come clean and confess to his misdeeds as well as name those government officials who had profited from his financial empire. However, after revealing that death threats had been made against both him and his family, Estes only claimed protection under the Fifth Amendment when called to testify before the McClellan Committee investigating the case.

According to his daughter, who wrote about her father's experiences, the swindler was helped into prison by an attorney named John Cofer, who had represented Estes at LBJ's insistence. Pam Estes wrote:

"The subsequent mishandling of the (Estes) defense by John Cofer, I now believe, was more the result of Cofer's efforts to protect Lyndon Johnson rather than incompetence."

Cofer had represented Johnson during the "Box 13" vote fraud case.

Soon rumors were circulating that Henry Marshall's death had coincided with his investigation of Estes and his powerful contacts. A belated autopsy of Marshall revealed not only gunshot wounds but that he had suffered carbon monoxide poisoning and a blow to the head.

Despite this late information and the suspicious circumstances, a Texas grand jury reported it was unable to decide with certainty if his death was suicide or homicide.

More than 22 years later, Estes, who had recently been freed from prison, appeared before another Texas grand jury and claimed that Marshall had been killed on orders of Johnson. Estes, speaking after being granted immunity from prosecution, said Johnson feared Marshall could link the vice president to Estes' illegal activities. He said he and Johnson aide, Clifton Carter, along with another man met with the vice president in Johnson's Washington home in early 1961. After Johnson was told that Marshall had refused attempts to have him transferred to Washington and away from his cotton allotments investigation, Estes quoted Johnson as saying:

"Get rid of him."

Johnson friends immediately attacked Estes' charges as "scurrilous." However, on August 13, 1985, a Texas District Judge changed the official verdict of Marshall's death from suicide to homicide based on Estes' testimony.

Also in 1962, just two days after FBI agents questioned him about Estes' business and political dealings, an accountant for Estes, George Krutilek, was found dead in his car near the town of Clint, Texas. Although a hose ran from his car's exhaust to the window, El Paso County pathologist Dr. Frederick Bornstein reported he did not die from carbon monoxide poisoning.

Another Estes business associate, Harold Eugene Orr, died under similar circumstances in early 1964. Orr, who had been arrested with Estes and given a 10-year prison sentence, was found dead in his garage before he could begin serving his sentence. He reportedly was overcome by carbon monoxide while trying to change an exhaust pipe on his car.

And yet another man connected with the Estes case succumbed to carbon monoxide. Howard Pratt, the office manager of the firm which sold Estes fertilizer, was found dead in his car during the Estes investigation.

Clearly one can see that by the time of the Kennedy assassination, dead witnesses, missing evidence and interference with official investigations were nothing new to Lyndon Johnson.

It may also be highly significant that during the years of Johnson's rise to power in Washington, one of his closest friends - in fact, a neighbor who frequently was his dinner guest - was none other than FBI director J. Edgar Hoover, who also was no stranger to the manipulation of politically-sensitive investigations (See G MEN).

After becoming President, Johnson was encouraged to retire the crusty Hoover. But Johnson - possibly aware of the damaging evidence Hoover could provide against him - declined, saying:

"I'd rather have him inside the tent pissing out, than outside pissing in."

Although it was against established security practice for the President and the vice president to be together in public, Johnson was riding only two cars behind Kennedy in the fateful Dallas motorcade (See THE MOTORCADE).

At Parkland Hospital, Johnson was informed of Kennedy's death and then urged to make a public statement by Kennedy's Assistant Press Secretary Malcolm Kilduff. As reported by author Jack Bell, Johnson told Kilduff:

"No, Mac...I think I had better get out of here and get back to the plane before you announce it (Kennedy's death). We don't know whether there is a worldwide conspiracy, whether they are after me as well as they were after President Kennedy, or whether they are after Speaker McCormack or Senator Hayden. We just don't know."

It has intrigued researchers that Johnson, who should have been in shock at the death of his President, should correctly name the two men who were in line of succession in the event of his death - House Speaker John W. McCormack and Senator Carl Hayden.

Some suspicious types view this as circumstantial evidence that Johnson had been carefully studying the chain of succession with foreknowledge of Kennedy's death.

Fuel has recently been added to this fire by the revelations of Madeline Brown, Johnson's mistress from 1949 to 1969.

An advertising executive in Dallas, Brown met frequently with Johnson over the years. Veteran Texas newsmen remembered her well, but did not report on the affair - just as the national media tacitly agreed not to reveal Kennedy's sexual intrigues in those more discreet days.

Brown has told Texas researchers that she was scheduled to meet with Johnson in Austin the night of November 22, 1963. That morning she received a telephone call from Jesse Kellam, the general manager of Johnson's Austin TV station and a close confidant of the Vice President, confirming her reservations at an Austin hotel that evening.

Brown said Kellam cautioned her about dealing with Johnson, saying he was in the worst mood Kellam had ever experienced and that Johnson had ended their conversation that morning by saying:

"After today, those goddamned Kennedys will never embarrass me again. That's no threat, that's a promise!"

She said it was only later that day that both she and Kellam realized the significance of Johnson's remark.

Whether Brown's account is accurate or not, it is certain that Johnson's hatred of the Kennedys was fierce and tangible.

It stands to reason that if there was a conspiracy involving Johnson that resulted in Kennedy's death, every effort would have been made to erase any evidence of it. Researchers and investigators would not be left with hard evidence, but instead only vague and circumstantial bits of information.

However, it has been pointed out that while evidence can be altered, destroyed and suppressed, circumstances cannot lie. It is therefore significant to look at some of the circumstances surrounding Johnson and his reactions to the assassination.

Although Johnson mentioned his fears of a "worldwide conspiracy" loudly in the hours immediately after Kennedy's death, there appears to have been no action to counter such a threat, indicating that the new chief knew there was no substance to the idea of a global plot. While the Texas border was closed for a couple of hours, there was no widespread closing of United States borders and major airplane and ship terminals were not shut down. Furthermore, while some units were placed on stepped-up status, there was no full-scale military alert put into effect, despite the commander in chief's stated fear of a "worldwide conspiracy."

And at a time when Johnson expressed such concern over a worldwide plot, he never thought to locate Ira Gearhart, the man known as the "Bagman" who carried the metal suitcase which allowed the President to call for a nuclear strike and who had become separated from the Presidential party in the confusion at Parkland Hospital.

It has seemed strange to researchers that, while Kennedy's men wanted to leave Dallas as quickly as possible, it was Johnson who demanded that the entourage remain at Love Field until he could be sworn in as President by Federal Judge Sarah T. Hughes.

Hubert Humphrey, who later became Johnson's vice president, once correctly stated:

"A vice president becomes President when there is no President. Later, when he takes the oath, he puts on the cloak of office. But that act is purely symbolic."

After arriving back in Washington, Jackie Kennedy explained to Robert Kennedy that the delay in returning was due to Johnson, who told her the Attorney General had told him to take the oath of office in Dallas. Robert Kennedy was surprised and replied that he had made no such suggestion.

Johnson compounded this lie months later in his deposition to the Warren Commission, when he again stated that it was Attorney General Kennedy who had urged him to take the oath immediately.

In another example of Johnson's dishonesty that day, the new President was waiting on board Presidential jet Air Force One when Kennedy's body reached Love Field. In his Warren Commission affidavit, Johnson said Kennedy's aide Kenneth O'Donnell specifically told him to take the Presidential plane because it had better communication equipment. However, O'Donnell denied this, telling author William Manchester:

"The President and I had no conversation regarding Air Force One. If we had known that he was going on Air Force One, we would have taken Air Force Two. One plane was just like the other."

O'Donnell later wrote that a Warren Commission attorney asked him to "change his testimony so that it would agree with the President's" - an offer O'Donnell declined.

Another incident which may have reflected a Freudian slip on Johnson's part occurred long before the assassination in the spring of 1963. On April 23, 1963, the same day Johnson was in Dallas informing the "Dallas Times Herald" that Kennedy would visit the city in the fall and make a luncheon speech, the vice president spoke to business and civic leaders in the Baker Hotel.

Comparing the President with an airline pilot, Johnson said:

"Once you pick him, and you're flying across the water in bad weather, don't go up and open the door and try to knock him in the head. He's the only pilot you have and if the plane goes down, you go with it. At least wait until next November before you shoot him down."

Did Johnson, a politician with 26 years experience at that time, really forget that the election was not until November the following year?

While others were shocked into immobility by Kennedy's death, Johnson exhibited a strange - and perhaps suspicious - ability to press forward with his work.

Johnson aide George Reedy commented that while "everything was chaotic, only the President knew what he was doing." While Kennedy's body still lay in state in the White House East Room, Johnson outlined to a flabbergasted John Kenneth Galbraith his 1964 election strategy, saying:

"I want to come down very hard on civil rights, not because Kennedy was for it, but because I am for it."

Author Jack Bell noted:

"...almost from the moment he took the Presidential oath, Johnson had been unfolding a master plan designed to win the Presidency in his own right and...to carve for himself a favorable place in history."

Three strange episodes also serve to illustrate what appears to have been signs of a guilty conscience on Johnson's part. On the night after the assassination, Johnson would not allow his aide Horace Busby to leave his bedroom until he went to sleep. Once when Busby tried to tip-toe out, Johnson called, "Buz, I'm not asleep yet." It was more than an hour later that the aide was able to slip away from his anxious boss.

In March 1965, long before his Vietnam bombing policies became the object of widespread anti-war demonstrations, Johnson was quoted as saying:

"I wake up at 5 a.m. some mornings and hear the planes coming in at National Airport and I think they are bombing me."

Another odd incident was recounted in Sam Houston Johnson's book "My Brother Lyndon." He said shortly after becoming President, Johnson called him and, in the course of the conversation, said:

"...I have been waiting for a chance to talk with you and to let you know how much I appreciate all you've done for me, Sam Houston. I wouldn't be here if it hadn't been for you."

Sam Johnson replied jokingly:

"Lyndon, I had nothing to do with Oswald."

Sam Johnson said his brother, well known for his crude and tasteless jokes, exploded:

"Goddammit, Sam!" he shouted, "What the hell kind of remark is that?" He went on like that, getting angrier and angrier, for about 20 minutes. And I kept expecting him to slam the phone down like a sledgehammer, but he went on talking at full fury. Finally, in a tired somewhat despairing voice, he said, "I'll call you some other time."

Johnson's brother, who wrote in his book how Lyndon had learned to control his temper even as a small boy, was understandably shocked at this outburst. Had he unknowingly pricked a guilty conscience with his admittedly tasteless, but innocuous, joke?

During the course of the assassination investigation, a number of incidents occurred involving Johnson which have been viewed with suspicion by researchers.

Within 72 hours of Kennedy's death - at Johnson's order - the Presidential limousine SX-100 which carried Kennedy through Dallas, was shipped to Detroit where the body was replaced and the interior completely refurbished. In any other case, this would have been destruction of evidence, since bullet marks on the windshield and blood traces could have provided essential clues as to the number and direction of shots.

Beginning the day of the assassination, telephone calls from Johnson's aides were made to Dallas Police officials urging a curtailment of the assassination investigation. Late on November 23, Dallas Police Captain Will Fritz was ordered to close down the case. According to a close friend of the captain, Fritz once confided he wanted to pursue his belief that Oswald had not acted alone, when he received a person-to-person call. He told his friend:

"But when the President of the United States called me and ordered the investigation stopped, what could I do?"

After the assassination, Governor Connally's clothing - also vital evidence - was taken from the office of Congressman Henry Gonzalez by Secret Service agents sent by Johnson aide Cliff Carter. Connally's clothing was cleaned and pressed by the time it was handed over to the Warren Commission and, hence, useless for study as evidence.

One of Johnson's actions which caused researchers of the assassination no end of problems was Executive Order 11652, which locked an immense amount of assassination evidence and documents in the National Archives away from the American public until the year 2039. It was this act, more than any other, which has caused so much speculation about a possible role by Johnson in the assassination.

It is now becoming publicly known that Johnson's mental state deteriorated significantly in the years following his predecessor's assassination. Former aide and speech writer Richard Goodwin, who helped fashion LBJ's "Great Society," has written that Johnson became obsessed with the idea that America was being taken over by his enemies - communists and "those Kennedys." Goodwin said he and Aide Bill Moyers even consulted psychiatrists about his boss's behavior. Goodwin wrote:

"In all cases, the diagnosis was the same: we were describing a textbook case of paranoid disintegration, the eruption of long-suppressed irrationalities."

Moyers has declined to comment on this and other LBJ men scoff, saying that Goodwin simply didn't understand the man. But others confirm that LBJ's mental equilibrium became questionable after the assassination. Goodwin wrote that Johnson's episodic madness helped launch the United States into "a needless tragedy of such consequences (the Vietnam War) that, even now, the prospects for a restorative return remain in doubt."

Former New Orleans District Attorney Jim Garrison, who launched an ill-fated investigation into the assassination, bluntly stated in 1968:

"Who appointed (Attorney General) Ramsey Clark, who has done his best to torpedo (my) investigation of the case? Who controls the CIA? Who controls the FBI? Who controls the Archives where this evidence is locked up for so long that it is unlikely that there is anyone in this room who will be alive when it is released? This is really your property and the property of the people of this country. Who has the arrogance and the brass to prevent the people from seeing the evidence? Who indeed? The one man who has profited most from the assassination - your friendly President, Lyndon Johnson."

But did Johnson really have enough power to initiate the assassination and force literally dozens of government officials and agents to lie and cover up that fact? - probably not. Furthermore, if Johnson played some role in an assassination plot, he would have taken great pains to distance himself from such a conspiracy. Evidence of such a role would certainly not be readily available. Therefore, today it is only possible to point out that Johnson - above everyone else - benefited most from Kennedy's death. With the assassination, Johnson achieved his lifelong goal of gaining the Presidency, his business and oil backers were rid of Kennedy's interference and his supporters who wanted an Asian war - notably Brown & Root and ranking officers at the Pentagon - were free to pursue a widening conflict.

A final point is that Johnson - always conscious of his role in history - must have feared appearing like a dunce by continuing to support the Warren Commission "lone assassin" myth.

It is significant that on more than one occasion, Johnson confided that he suspected more than one man was involved in Kennedy's death.

On New Year's Eve 1963, Madeline Brown met with Johnson for the first time since the assassination. She voiced her concern that people in Dallas were speculating that Johnson had something to do with Kennedy's death. Brown told this author that Johnson became quite upset:

"He went crazy and hit his fist. He shouted, "That's a lie! It's those fucking renegades in intelligence and American oilmen. They just couldn't wait."

If this account is true - and other statements by Brown have proven correct - it is intriguing that Johnson would exhibit this early knowledge that "oilmen and intelligence agents" were involved in the assassination at a time when he had just exchanged the public belief that the assassination was the result of a communist conspiracy for one involving a lone-nut assassin.

In an interview with Walter Cronkite in the early 1970s, he again expressed the belief that the assassination involved more than one person, then asked network executives to delete his remarks from the broadcast - which they did.

Johnson was quoted in "Atlantic Monthly" in 1973:

"I never believed that Oswald acted alone although I can accept that he pulled the trigger."

Johnson even voiced the suspicion that the CIA had a hand in the assassination, according to an FBI document released in 1977.

The document quotes Johnson's Postmaster General and close friend Marvin Watson as relaying to the Bureau:

"...that he (President Johnson) was now convinced there was a plot in connection with the assassination. Watson stated the President felt the CIA had something to do with this plot."

Yet this too was kept hidden from the public for years.

Was Johnson well aware of such a plot and only mentioned it in later years so that future historians would not classify him as dense and unaware?

While this ambitiously driven man from Texas most probably did not initiate a death plot against Kennedy, everything known about the man - from the deaths and cover-ups of Texas scandals to his continued prosecution on the unpopular Vietnam War - indicates that Johnson may have had the willingness to join in a conspiracy which would place him in the White House.

As commander in chief of the armed forces and close confidant to the powerful J. Edgar Hoover, Johnson certainly had the ability to erase or mask all evidence which might lead to the truth of the assassination.

Crossfire: Rednecks and Oilmen Summary

Although his efforts were belated and timid, President Kennedy nevertheless did more to further the cause of civil rights in the United States than any of his predecessors. This human rights activity earned him the undying hatred of racist conservatives.

One of the leaders of right-wing extremists in 1963 was Dallas-based Major General Edwin A. Walker, who was the victim of a gunman's attack in the spring of that year.

The Warren Commission confidently concluded:

"Oswald had attempted to kill Maj. Gen. Edwin A. Walker (Resigned, U.S. Army) on April 10, 1963, thereby demonstrating his disposition to take human life."

However, many facts of the Walker shooting - witnesses who saw several men in suspicious cars, early reports of a different type of ammunition and a photograph of Walker's home which was mutilated while in the hands of federal authorities - raise serious questions about Oswald's guilt.

It appears that some people, such as Miami States Rights Party member Joseph Milteer, had foreknowledge of Kennedy's assassination. Milteer was taped by a police undercover agent accurately predicting Kennedy's death more than two weeks before the assassination.

Meanwhile, Kennedy managed to anger the U.S. business community by the use of his office to compel steel manufacturers to roll back price increases and the introduction of tax-reform legislation which would have closed corporate tax loopholes and abolished or reduced the lucrative oil depletion allowance.

Former Vice President Richard Nixon - who lost to Kennedy in 1960 and went on to become this nation's only President to resign under threat of impeachment - had many strange and troubling connections with the assassination. Nixon flew out of Dallas the day Kennedy was killed, yet was strangely ambiguous when questioned by the FBI later in 1963. There is also the strange incident of an FBI document which indicates that Jack Ruby worked for Nixon in 1947. The Bureau claimed this document was a fake, raising questions about the extent of other "fake" documents in Bureau files.

It also should be noted that many persons connected to the Warren Commission were sought by Nixon to participate in the Watergate investigation.

Obviously politics played a large role in both the Kennedy assassination and Watergate investigations. Finances too may have played a role. In the summer of 1963, Kennedy order the Treasury Department to print more than $4 billion in "United States Notes," thus bypassing the powerful Federal Reserve system with undoubted angered international bankers.

It has been estimated that more than $500 million in profits were made by selling selected stocks "short" just before the Kennedy assassination, although apparently no one has attempted to determine just who made these profits and why they chose to sell short. Suspicious researchers tend to believe this market activity indicates foreknowledge of the assassination.

It may be pertinent that a member of the Texas oil community - geologist George DeMohrenschildt - was the last-known close friend to Lee Harvey Oswald. DeMohrenschildt, with his background in Russia, oil and intelligence work, adds greatly to the suspicion that Oswald was being manipulated by someone with intelligence connections in the spring and summer of 1963. However, since the DeMohrenschildts left the United States for Haiti in May 1963, it is obvious that they played no active role in an assassination conspiracy. Instead, it may be that the DeMohrenschildts were simply used to maneuver Oswald and then, over the years following Kennedy's death, offered as red herrings to draw researchers away from the real plotters.

It is significant that one of the strongest allies of the Texas oilmen who loathed Kennedy was Vice President Lyndon Johnson. Johnson's ties with Herman Brown of Brown & Root Construction and with Texas oil interests are legend.

It is also significant that Johnson's career was laced with incidents of aborted investigations of illegal activity, lies and misrepresentations and even corpses. Convicted swindler and one-time Johnson confidant Billie Sol Estes publicly stated that Johnson ordered the death of federal agriculture official Henry Marshall who was investigating illegal business deals involving Johnson and Estes.

Several people close to the assassination - notably Jack Ruby and former New Orleans District Attorney Jim Garrison - have accused Johnson of some role in an assassination conspiracy. Even his former girlfriend, Madeline Brown, is convinced that he ordered the assassination.

And there can be no question that Johnson, above all others, clearly benefited the most from Kennedy's death. Likewise, Johnson's close friend and neighbor, J. Edgar Hoover, also benefited. Both Johnson and Hoover reportedly were about to lose their life-long careers since it was rumored that the Kennedys were going to drop Johnson from the 1964 Democratic ticket and force Hoover's retirement.

Both Johnson and Hoover certainly had the power to subvert a meaningful investigation into Kennedy's death - and a wealth of evidence suggests just such subversion. Together, both Johnson and Hoover certainly had the means, the motive and the opportunity.

Did they contract with the mob to kill Kennedy? Or did the mob approach them? Or did they simply turn a blind eye to a plot already activated? The truth of their involvement may not be proven for years. However, a conspiracy involving Lyndon Johnson and his buddy Hoover as an alternative to the Warren Commission's discredited lone-assassin theory goes farther in tying together the disparate bits of assassination evidence than any theory offered to date and cannot be easily dismissed.

As President and Commander-in-Chief, history will surely hold Lyndon Johnson responsible - if not for involvement in the assassination itself, at least for failing to uncover the conspiracy during his leadership.

Crossfire: Soldiers

"...We must guard against ...the military-industrial complex."
President Dwight D. Eisenhower

For more than 200 years the military forces of the United States have accumulated a distinguished history. From the Revolution-era citizen who could become a fighting man ready to protect his community in a minute to the professional Marines who grimly stood between the warring factions in Beirut, Lebanon, the American soldier has proved his worth time and again. Even during the bitter dissension produced by U.S. policy in Southeast Asia, few people seriously questioned the ability or bravery of the individual G.I.

The beginnings of modern warfare - both military tactics and technological advances - are generally credited to the American Civil War.

American military use of technology and logistics during World War II contributed greatly to the defeat of Nazism and the Japanese militarists. However, throughout world history, it has proven extremely difficult to return to peacetime, civilian-control of government once power has been invested in the military. From the takeover of the Roman Empire by the Praetorian Guard up until today, military leaders in power have believed they know what is best for their nation and have attempted to maintain their control. This historical situation was further complicated in the United States during the last world war by a combining of military and industrial power.

Beginning in World War II, America gave birth to something quite unique in its history - a gigantic military-industrial complex.

On January 17, 1961, three days before John F. Kennedy took office as President, President Dwight Eisenhower gave his farewell address to Congress. In this talk he coined the phrase "military-industrial complex" and warned against potential abuses by such an entity. He said:

"Our military establishment today bears little relation to that known by any of my predecessors in peacetime...Until the latest of our world conflicts, the United States had no armaments industry. American makers of plowshares could, with time and as required, make swords as well. But now we can no longer risk emergency improvisation of national defense; we have been compelled to create a permanent armaments industry of vast proportions. Added to this, three and a half million men and women are directly engaged in the defense establishment. We annually spend on military security more than the net income of all United States corporations.

This conjunction of an immense military establishment and a large arms industry is new in the American experience. The total influence - economical, political, even spiritual - is felt in every city, every State House, every office of the Federal government...

In the councils of government, we must guard against the acquisition of unwarranted influence, whether sought or unsought, by the military-industrial complex. The potential for the disastrous rise of misplaced power exists and will persist.

We must never let the weight of this combination endanger our liberties or democratic processes..."

Eisenhower's warning was especially timely. The role of the military-industrial complex in American life has continued to grow under the presidencies of his predecessors. It has been reported that in 1960, the Pentagon had assets totaling $60 billion and owned more than 32 million acres of land in the United States and 2.2 million acres overseas. At that time few nations of the world had budgets as large as the Pentagon and one-third had a smaller population than the U.S. military.

Today these staggering figures have only grown.

A commander's newsletter issued by the Secretary of the Air Force in June 1986, states:

"Defense acquisition is the largest business enterprise in the world. Annual purchases by the Department of Defense (DOD) total almost $170 billion - more than the combined purchases of General Motors, EXXON, and IBM. DOD's research and development (R&D) expenditures are more than 15 times those of France, Germany or the United Kingdom, and 80 times those of Japan. Defense acquisition involves almost 15 million separate contract actions per year - or an average of 56,000 contract actions every working day. DOD makes only a small percentage of its equipment. It depends primarily on the nation's industrial companies to develop its weapons and to manufacture everything from belt buckles to aircraft carriers."

It is ironical to note that, prior to World War II, there was no real interest in armaments on the part of American industrialists. In fact, prior to the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor on December 7, 1941, most American businessmen tried to steer a neutral course in world affairs. They were content to limit their struggles to the market place. But with the advent of war, a curious change took place. A manufacturer whose products had to compete in both price and quality in the open market place discovered that, by finagling a government contract, he could sell the same product for a much higher price and with no competition. Quickly, the profit advantages of armaments - and its attendant industries - were recognized and embraced by many American companies.

Columbia University Professor Seymour Melman, writing in "The Permanent War Economy," stated:

"The main focus of American economic effort from 1939 on was, of course, war work of every kind. The government's orders for goods and services soared from $11 billion in 1939 to $117 billion by 1945. At the same time, however, there was a marked increase in civilian personal consumption, which rose 25 percent, from $137 billion in 1939 to $171 billion by 1945....Everyone saw the economy producing more guns AND butter. Economically speaking, Americans had never had it so good."

At the end of World War II it was widely feared that the United States economy would lapse back into the Great Depression of the 1930s with the coming of peace. But this was averted by the "Cold War," which kept the armaments industry booming even though no real war was declared.

Melman wrote:

"The concept of a "permanent war economy" formulated in 1944 was soon made a reality. One the Soviets exploded an atomic bomb in 1949 and the Korean War was fought (1950-53), a regular annual portion of the American national product...was spent on the military. Military industry was enlarged and mobilized to win an arms race that has no foreseeable end..."

Throughout the late 1940s and 1950s, the U.S. military was the public hero of the nation. In books and movies, whenever there was a problem, the call went out for a military solution. The constant and hysterical pro-military propoganda, so necessary during World War II, was continued until in the public mind it seemed the Pentagon could do no wrong. In 1957 "Fortune" magazine stated:

"We must obtain a reduction in the amount spent on highways, aid to the Negro community, and other non-military extravagances."

This blind faith in military power continues right up to today, fueled by multi-million-dollar public relations budgets in both the Pentagon and industry. Even names and attitudes were changed. The War Department became the Department of Defense and the "enemy" became "potential adversaries." Bombers of the Strategic Air Command carrying megatons of nuclear death also carried the motto, "Peace is Our Profession."

In every city where defense industries are located, there are many different leagues, associations and councils whose sole purpose is to present the public with the argument for ever-higher military spending.

The rise of the Military-Industrial Complex can be charted by annual military budget expenditures.

In 1950 the military budget was $13 billion; by 1961, this had risen to $47 billion; and by the end of the Vietnam War in 1975, $100 billion.

By 1986 - despite the lack of a real war or any unquestioned estimates of Soviet military spending increases - annual expenses by the Department of Defense had risen to nearly $170 billion.

Few Americans even realize how much power is wielded by the military, which - since the disaster of the Vietnam War - has tended to take a low public profile. For example, consider the Fort Worth Division of General Dynamics. Even most people in Fort Worth, Texas, consider the giant complex on the city's west side as private industry, despite the fact that only a runway separates GD from Carswell Air Force Base.

But actually the General Dynamics complex is Air Force Plant No. 4, wholly owned by the U. S. Air Force. General Dynamics merely operates the plant under a management contract - quite a cozy deal since GD gets a healthy share of the profits while the Air Force, and hence the taxpayers, assumes the capitalization and overhead costs. (Recall it was General Dynamics that was chastised in the early 1980s for gouging the Pentagon - read taxpayers - by selling the U.S. Air Force Contract Part Number 3426B84G01 - a 12-cent wrench - for $9,609.00.)

A large part of the argument for maintaining an ongoing war economy has come from men and women who lived through the shock of Pearl Harbor. Vowing never to allow the United States to be caught by an enemy unaware again - although there is now substantial evidence available showing that the Japanese attack was not wholly unexpected in certain Washington circles - these people argue that assembly and production lines must be kept operating so that America can convert to war production quickly, if needed. This argument - plus the fact that millions of American jobs are dependent on defense contracts - has been instrumental in maintaining the war economy.

Critics, on the other hand, claim the permanent war economy has actually been a drain on America's economic life - with its costly production of non-usable goods and its penchant for coastlines and inefficiency which many claim is responsible for the inflation of the 1970s.

All of this, of course, is based on the attitude that the United States is locked in a permanent "Cold War" with the Soviet Union and its communist allies (See RUSSIA).

No matter how it is viewed, it is an undeniable fact of modern life that the United States economy is based primarily on war and armaments.

It is a situation long overdue for public review. As scientist/author Carl Sagan wrote:

"By the time (President Reagan) leaves office in January 1989...the United States will have spent...roughly $10 trillion on the global confrontation with the Soviet Union. Of this sum, paid out since 1945, more than a third has been spent by the Reagan Administration, which has added more to the national debt than all previous Administrations, back to George Washington, combined....A business that spent its capital so recklessly, and with so little effect, would have been bankrupt long ago. What else could the U.S. have done with that money (not all of it, because prudent defense is, of course, necessary - but say, half of it)? For $5 trillion, we could have made major progress toward eliminating hunger, homelessness, infectious disease, illiteracy, ignorance and poverty - not just in the United States but worldwide. We could have helped make the planet agriculturally self-sufficient and removed many of the causes of violence and war. And this could have been done with enormous benefit to the American economy. For a few percent of that money, we could muster a long-term international program of manned exploration of Mars. Prodigies of human inventiveness in art, architecture, medicine, science and technology could be supported for decades with a tiny fraction of that money."

###

Even young Senator John Kennedy parroted the Pentagon line during the campaign of 1960, promising increases in military spending. However, his election to the Presidency must have been viewed with some trepidation within the Pentagon, since his most publicized action as a Naval officer was the loss of his ship (PT-109) to a Japanese destroyer.

Once in the Oval Office - and with access to other sources of information - Kennedy made a turnaround in his attitudes toward the military. Earlier Kennedy had echoed Pentagon figures showing that the Soviet Union possessed between 500 and 1,000 intercontinental ballistic missiles. According to later reports, the number was more like 50. Kennedy complained that he had been ill-informed as to the actual number of missiles and suggested that this exaggeration was part of Pentagon strategy.

This complaint has been repeated over and over through the years, most recently by former CIA director William Colby in comments about the book "The Myth of Soviet Military Supremacy," which he called, "...the greatest intelligence gap of all: the exaggeration of Soviet power in comparison with America's, which fuels the wasteful and dangerous nuclear-arms race."

Kennedy also became concerned with the $3 billion federal deficit of his time - a paltry sum compared to today's near $200 billion - and feared it would present a threat to the U.S. dollar. Accordingly, Kennedy named a Ford Motor Company executive, Robert McNamara, as his secretary of defense and changes began to take place.

On March 28, 1961, Kennedy told Congress:

"In January, while ordering certain immediately-needed changes, I instructed the Secretary of Defense to reappraise our entire defense strategy, capacity, commitments and needs in light of present and future dangers...."

Kennedy began to make sweeping changes in the way defense and intelligence operated.

Presidents Truman and Eisenhower had depended greatly on the National Security Council (NSC), one of the creations of the National Security Act of 1947. In 1963 the NSC consisted of the President, the Vice President, Secretary of State, Secretary of Defense and the director of the Office of Emergency Planning.

Theoretically, the CIA was to be controlled by the NSC. But Kennedy had another way of getting things done. Accustomed to the quick-acting, hard-hitting world of political campaigning, Kennedy neglected the NSC method. Instead, he would call upon his friends and family to get things done. While this may have been effective at the time, it left both the Pentagon and the CIA largely to their own devices - a circumstance Kennedy came to regret.

During this same time period, the foreign policy of the United States was being greatly influenced by a new vision of the role of the military in the world. This vision was codified in a May 15, 1959, document written by Army General Richard Stilwell as a member of a special Presidential committee. Innocuously entitled "Training Under the Mutual Training Program," this document offered nothing less than a plan to protect the non-communist world by having nations ruled by a military elite with training and ideology supplied by Americans.

Colonel L. Fletcher Prouty, who was Focal Point Officer between the Defense Department and the CIA during this time, described this program:

"These paramilitary ideas and methods know no ideology and no creed or code. They are the craft of those who would seek power and of those who would fight wars by technical means, and who would utilize the military organization of the state to gain that power by influencing the minds of the "elite," by engaging in social, political, economic and, almost incidentally, military activity....this course of action begins with a high-sounding resolve to improve the lot of the poor "underdeveloped" nations, using the vehicle of the Military Assistance Program to take over the army of that country....it is only reasonable to see, in this action, the ominous fact that it is the American soldier who is the teacher of this doctrine; and it is the same American soldier who becomes his own student. Since this action was begun in 1959 tens of thousands - yes, hundreds of thousands - of American military men, a whole new generation, have grown up believing that this is not only the right thing for "those foreigners" but for Americans as well."

This assistance program - intended to blend the military, police, business and political facets of a nation's life into one cohesive unit - was to culminate in Cuba at the Bay of Pigs, in Guatemala, in South Vietnam and, during the 1980s, in Nicaragua and El Salvador.

Initially Kennedy was fascinated by this concept, since by nature he was a strong believer in negotiation and limited response rather than simply taking military options. Words such as counterinsurgency, pacification and special forces began to creep into our political language.

Following the disastrous Bay of Pigs Invasion (See CUBANS), a special board of inquiry was convened to learn what went wrong. It was here that both John and Robert Kennedy began to learn what the new military doctrines of counterinsurgency, flexible response, civic action and nation building really meant. They learned how the obsession with secrecy had completely changed the way the military and intelligence operated. Everything was on a "need-to-know" basis, with fewer and fewer responsible leaders included on the "need-to-know" lists.

After the Bay of Pigs inquiry Kennedy became convinced that the CIA and the Pentagon had misled him terribly, and from that point on, he was highly skeptical of information from those sources.

Moreover, the inquiry showed the Kennedy brothers how powerful the military-industrial complex with its intelligence security force had become.

Kennedy learned from this coalition. He too learned how to concoct a "cover story" - which may account for his public support of the CIA at a time when his private comments and actions showed otherwise (See AGENTS).

The blending of the military and the political was seen clearest in Vietnam, where it was the U.S. Ambassador who was in charge, not the senior military commanders. It was a direct turnaround to the well-established tradition that once political diplomacy fails, national objectives are resolved by military means. In other words, war should be the last resort of politicians. But once war is inevitable, then it should be fought by professional soldiers with clearly-defined goals and objectives.

According to Prouty, the new doctrine swept "out beyond the DOD and the CIA to form a massive paramilitary international power under para-civilian leadership and a monstrous cloak of security...(that) changed the entire world..."

This new doctrine was well accepted by businesses which had stagnated during the late 1950s. Prouty wrote:

"Businesses that had been all but knocked out of the defense-contract arena by the end of the Eisenhower regime - some by the sudden and abrupt swing to ballistic missiles and space during the late fifties - saw new light at the end of the tunnel in the resurgence of the foot-soldier army and the ground warfare this new doctrine presaged. They could expect to go back to making World War II type munitions again and dumping them on the shores of Asia."

But what did all this mean in terms of U.S. military policy?

Prouty again:

"As late as the end of 1963, every U.S. Army combat soldier in Vietnam...was under the operational control and direction of the CIA."

After the CIA-sponsored Bay of Pigs fiasco Kennedy began to see that this nation's paramilitary and undercover operations were getting out of hand. He made an attempt to reverse this trend by issuing two National Security Action Memoranda (NSAM) in June of 1961. NSAM 55, signed personally by Kennedy, basically stated that he would hold the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff personally responsible for all activity of a military nature during peacetime, the same as during wartime. In other words, Kennedy wanted all cloak and dagger operations as well as military expeditions under the control, or at least under the scrutiny, of the chairman - and hence under his control.

NSAM 57 attempted to divide paramilitary activity between the military and the CIA. Basically, this document tried to stipulate that the CIA would be allowed only small covert operations, while any large operations must be studied and approved by the military.

It seemed a reasonable division of responsibility. However, there were men in both the CIA and the Pentagon who did not appreciate this attempt to curb their power and prerogatives.

Not only did Kennedy attempt to curtail the power of both the military and intelligence, but he even attempted to change the attitude that the United States could alter events in other nations by military means.

On November 16, 1961, Kennedy told a Seattle audience:

"We must face the fact that the United States is neither omnipotent nor omniscient - that we cannot impose our will upon the other 94 percent of mankind - that we cannot right every wrong or reverse every adversity - and that therefore there cannot be an American solution to every world problem."

With his words and actions, Kennedy became the first U.S. President since World War II to address the myth of America's infallibility. This did not set well with the military-industrial complex, which had so much to gain -including profits - by controlling the raw resources of other nations.

In the midst of Kennedy's reappraisal of U.S. military and intelligence operations came the Cuban Missile Crisis (See AGENTS). In October 1962, it was learned from satellites and U-2 flights that the Soviets were preparing offensive missile bases in Cuba, only 90 miles from U.S. borders. The military and the CIA were adamant. They prescribed nothing less than immediate bombing of the missile sites and another invasion of the island.

Kennedy chose a different approach. He personally struck a deal with Soviet Premier Khrushchev which called for the removal of the missiles in return for Kennedy's pledge not to support a new invasion of Cuba. The Soviets backed down and Kennedy's popularity rose significantly, except in offices at the Pentagon and at Langley, Virginia.

The Kennedy Administration continued its efforts to reduce military spending. On March 30, 1963, McNamara announced a reorganization program which would have closed 52 military installations in 25 states, plus 21 overseas bases, over a three-year period. This prompted an immediate response from the business community including even small cities. Merchants in Del Rio, Texas, each donated $50 to send a delegation to Washington to join in the protest.

Then on August 5, 1963, following lengthy negotiations, the United States, Great Britain and the Soviet Union signed a limited nuclear test ban treaty forbidding the atmospheric testing of nuclear weapons.

On July 26, just prior to the signing of the Treaty of Moscow, Kennedy proclaimed:

"This treaty is not the millennium. It will not resolve all conflicts or cause the communists to forego their ambitions, or eliminate the danger of war. It will not reduce our need for arms or allies or programs of assistance to others. But it is an important first step - a step toward reason - a step away from war."

As part of this "first step" toward what later would be termed "détente," Kennedy and Khrushchev agreed to the installation of a "hot line" telephone system between Washington and Moscow. It was a serious deviation from the hard "Cold War" policies of the past and military leaders -both retired and active - were not hesitant to voice their disapproval.

Major General Thomas A. Lane, after a distinguished military career which included degrees from M.I.T. and the U.S. Military Academy and service on General Douglas MacArthur's staff during World War II, retired in 1962 and wrote a column for the St. Louis "Globe-Democrat." One article compared Kennedy's "illusionary quest for peace" to appeasement politicians in pre-war Europe. In a book entitled, "The Leadership of President Kennedy," Lane even questioned Kennedy's attempt to restore civilian control over the Pentagon by writing:

"The general thrust of the Kennedy military leadership was to assert a political domination of the military leadership which is hostile to the traditions and practices of American government. If the military leader is then willing to submit the professional integrity, morale and effectiveness of his service or services to the adverse judgments of inexperienced politicians, he is not fit to hold office."

In a speech to the National Press Club on September 4, 1963, Navy Admiral George W. Anderson charged that assertion of civilian leadership would "downgrade" the military and develop an "over centralized structure which could jeopardize our national security."

Lane and Anderson were not alone in their criticism of the commander-in-chief and it appears countermeasures may have begun in non-Kennedy circles.

A month after the test ban treaty was signed, the CIA stepped up its guerrilla assaults against Cuba and assassination attempts against Castro were renewed (See AGENTS). (While the CIA admitted plotting assassination with Castro official Rolando Cubela at that time, it argued that Cubela initiated the scheme. Cubela, when interviewed by author Anthony Summers in 1978, claimed that it was the CIA that brought up the idea of assassination.)

But for all his activities to reduce the risk of war and curtail the military and intelligence establishments, Kennedy's most momentous - and perhaps fatal - decisions came when he began to re-evaluate United States policy in Southeast Asia.

Crossfire: Kennedy and Vietnam

From the time Lyndon B. Johnson took over the Presidency the afternoon that Kennedy was assassinated in Dallas, the idea was encouraged that he would simply carry on Kennedy Administration policies. In many areas this was true. It has been acknowledged that Johnson was able to push Kennedy's civil rights legislation through Congress where his predecessor may have failed. But one area of Kennedy policy was not continued - that area involving South Vietnam.

Early in his Presidency, Kennedy simply went along with the policy of Eisenhower, which was to continue sending military "advisors" and war material to South Vietnam. In fact, during 1961 and 1962, Kennedy actually increased the U. S. military presence in that war-torn nation. (This may have been due to his desire to avoid at all costs another foreign-policy disaster such as the Bay of Pigs.)

But by summer 1963, it is apparent that Kennedy had begun to re-evaluate United States involvement in Vietnam.

Vietnam's sad history has been marked by one foreign domination after another. After more than 12 centuries of domination by China, Vietnam held both a similar culture and an abiding hatred for its giant neighbor. During the 1800s, Vietnam was claimed for the French colonial empire, but lost it to Japanese control during World War II. It was the secret agreements of the Yalta Conference (See RUSSIANS) which angered France's Charles DeGaulle by ceding control of Southeast Asia to the United States. DeGaulle, to counter this agreement, immediately dispatched troops back to French Indochina at the end of World War II.

Meanwhile, in August 1945, a Vietnamese nationalist named Ho Chi Minh had seized Hanoi and proclaimed the establishment of the Democratic Republic of Vietnam (DRV). After a year of negotiations and limited guerrilla activity, Ho and the French went to war. Initially disinterested, the United States became more concerned after China fell to the communists and the Soviet Union recognized Ho's DRV.

In May 1950, one month before the Korean War began, the Truman Administration agreed to send both economic and military assistance to the French and, by summer, the first elements of the U. S. Military Assistance and Advisory Group (MAAG) arrived in Saigon.

In 1951, John Kennedy, then a representative from Boston's 11th District, visited Vietnam and later wrote:

"We have allied ourselves to the desperate effort of a French regime to hang onto the remnants of an empire...There is no broad, general support of the native Vietnam government (by) the people of that area."

Three years later Kennedy was a senator and voiced even stronger opposition to the fact that the U.S. was underwriting nearly 80 percent of the French-communist struggle. He told fellow senators:

"I am frankly of the belief that no amount of American military assistance in Indochina can conquer an enemy which is everywhere and at the same time nowhere, an "enemy of the people" which has the sympathy and covert support of the people."

Despite these expressed doubts, Kennedy did support continuing American military intervention, "...realizing full well that it may eventually require some commitment of our manpower." But on May 7, 1954, the French stronghold at Dien Bien Phu fell to Ho's forces, just as a Geneva conference on Indochina was beginning. That summer, the French and the Viet Minh signed a cease-fire agreement and the fighting stopped briefly.

Weary of war and with strained financial ability, France was unable to hold this part of their old empire. The Geneva conference called for separating Vietnam into two parts - the north to be ruled by Ho and the communists, the south to be ruled by the fledgling democratic government of Ngo Dinh Diem.

Soon the massive military and financial assistance which the United States had been sending the French was shifted to Diem, who quickly - and to the surprise of both friends and foes - consolidated his authority in South Vietnam.

Senator Kennedy told fellow members of the American Friends of Vietnam:

"This is our offspring - we cannot abandon it, we cannot ignore its needs. And if it falls victim to any of the perils that threaten its existence...then the United States, with some justification, will be held responsible; and our prestige in Asia will sink to a new low."

Diem refused to conduct an election to re-unite the two Vietnams, one of the provisions of the Geneva conference, and he began to attack communists in the south. Ho Chi Minh ordered his followers in the south to begin attacks on the new government.

By the time Kennedy became President in 1960, large-scale guerrilla warfare was being conducted against the Diem regime. But because of Castro and Cuba as well as Soviet incursions in Berlin and the Congo, Vietnam was a non-issue during the 1960 campaign. Kennedy barely noticed that three days after his election, South Vietnam President Diem was the object of an unsuccessful military coup d'etat.

In December, 1960, the communists announced the formation of a Vietnamese National Liberation Front and the internal guerrilla war got underway in earnest.

During 1961 Kennedy, though distracted by the Bay of Pigs Invasion, continued to support further U.S. military assistance to Asia, particularly after communist forces seized the city of Phuoc Vinh, only 60 miles from Saigon. On December 11, two helicopter companies arrived in South Vietnam. It was the beginning of an expanded role for U.S. advisors. By January 1962, total U.S. military personnel in Vietnam numbered 2,646. And on January 13, a memorandum from the Joint Chiefs of Staff entitled, "The Strategic Importance of the SEA Mainland" stated that if the Viet Cong (Vietnamese communists) were not soon brought under control, the chiefs saw no alternative but the introduction of U.S. combat units.

Kennedy continued to hesitate sending combat units to Vietnam. At a news conference on May 9, 1962, he said:

"...introducing American forces...also is a hazardous course, and we want to attempt to see if we can work out a peaceful solution."

According to Assistant Secretary of State Roger Hilsman, one of Kennedy's key foreign policy planners, Kennedy confided:

"The Bay of Pigs had taught me a number of things. One is not to trust Generals or the CIA, and the second is that if the American people do not want to use American troops to remove a communist regime 90 miles away from our coast, how can I ask them to use troops to remove a communist regime 9,000 miles away?"

By mid-1963 after receiving conflicting advice and intelligence regarding Vietnam from his advisors, Kennedy began to reassess his commitment there. He was especially concerned about the treatment of Buddhists under the Diem government. Thousands of Buddhists were demonstrating for freedom, and on June 11, the first Buddhist suicide by fire occurred.

Reflecting Kennedy's concern, the State Department notified Saigon:

"If Diem does not take prompt and effective steps to re-establish Buddhist confidence in him, we will have to re-examine our entire relationship with his regime."

Diem became even more unmanageable as the year drew on, staffing his government with relatives and refusing to listen to the pleas of the Buddhists. Talk began about replacing Diem with leaders more agreeable to American policy. Disgusted, Kennedy even went so far as to approve a plan to withdraw 1,000 U.S. military advisors from Vietnam by the end of the year.

The American Government, including Kennedy, left no doubt of its displeasure with Diem, thus paving the way for yet another Vietnamese coup. This occurred on November 1, 1963, just 21 days before Kennedy arrived in Dallas.

Accompanied by CIA Agent Lucien Conien, South Vietnam generals seized key installations and attacked the presidential palace. After hours of fighting Diem and his brother, Ngo Dinh Nhu, surrendered. While being taken to the generals' headquarters, both were murdered.

Kennedy, who had approved the coup, then rejected it, then okayed it again, was genuinely shocked at the murders.

Hilsman, quoted in "The Ten Thousand Day War," said:

"We instituted a lot of planning in the State Department about how to withdraw (from Vietnam) but we never dared send one of those pieces of paper to the Pentagon. We thought that somebody on (McNamara's) staff might well undercut and destroy. So this whole documentary evidence of the other option - the option of withdrawal - is still not on the public record."

Even many of Kennedy's own people were unaware of his plans to withdraw troops from Vietnam.

Washington was forced to recognize the new military government in Saigon, but for the next 20 months, there were no less than 10 changes of government as one general overthrew another.

It was time for a decision in Vietnam - to support a major American military expedition as desired by the Pentagon or to simply withdraw and take the criticism of the anti-communists.

The assassination of the Diem brothers may have strengthened Kennedy's decision to disengage from Vietnam, but no one will ever be certain. He was dead before the month was out. There is evidence that Kennedy would have curtailed, if not prevented, the Vietnam War. But since in death he cannot tell what he would have done and since his enemies are alive to tell their version, we may never know for certain.

Kennedy's friend and advisor Kenneth O'Donnell tells of a meeting between the President and General Douglas MacArthur:

"The general implored the President to avoid a U.S. military buildup in Vietnam, or any other part of the Asian mainland..."

Kennedy, forever the astute politician, also apparently was very much aware of the approaching 1964 elections.

Senator Mike Mansfield told newsmen that once, following a White House leadership meeting, Kennedy had confided to him that he agreed "on a need for a complete withdrawal from Vietnam," but he couldn't do it until after being re-elected.

Kennedy explained to O'Donnell:

"In 1965 I'll be damned everywhere as a communist appeaser. But I don't care. If I tried to pull out completely now, we would have another Joe McCarthy Red Scare on our hands."

The President also may have given a hint as to his plans in a broadcast on September 2, 1963. Speaking of Vietnam, he said:

"In the final analysis, it is their war. They have to win or lose it."

The people within the Pentagon and the CIA - who had so much to gain by widening the Vietnam War - continued to put out their conflicting and often erroneous information.

Shortly before the Diem coup, McNamara and Gen. Maxwell Taylor had returned from Saigon and told Kennedy that things were looking better in Vietnam and that the United States would be able to withdraw all military personnel by the end of 1965.

Less than one month after Kennedy's assassination, McNamara and Taylor reported to President Johnson that conditions in Vietnam were grave and that a major effort - including American combat troops and a massive clandestine program - was needed to prevent a communist victory.

But by some accounts, the swing away from withdrawal began only two days after Kennedy was slain in Dallas.

According to historian and former Canadian diplomat Peter Dale Scott, a secret National Security Action Memorandum - No. 273 - was hurriedly issued by President Lyndon Johnson during a 45-minute meeting on November 24, 1963. This memorandum essentially changed the U.S. Government's position on Vietnam.

Having pieced this document together and compared it with other documents released as the "Pentagon Papers," Scott said the memorandum departed from past government policy in at least five areas:

- For the first time, the United States objective was described as assisting the South Vietnamese "to win" rather than simply to "help" them.
- Disguised as reaffirmation of a withdrawal policy, the document quietly canceled a November 20 plan to withdraw troops.
- It authorized the planning of more covert activities for 1964 and studies for initiating a wider war against North Vietnam.
- It ordered senior government officials not to criticize U.S. Vietnam policy.
- The State Department was directed to develop a "case" which would demonstrate Hanoi's control over the Vietcong.

On hearing the optimistic assessment from McNamara and Taylor on November 20, 1963, Kennedy had also approved an Accelerated Withdrawal Program, designed to carry out the promise to end American military presence by the end of 1965.

President Johnson's pledge to carry on Kennedy's programs in light of the effects of NSAM 273 prompted Scott to conclude:

"...that NSAM 273's public reaffirmation of (a)...withdrawal "objective," coupled with 273's secret annulment of an October 5 withdrawal plan, was deliberately deceitful."

Scott added:

"...the same document which covertly changed Kennedy's withdrawal plans ordered all senior officials not to contest or criticize this change."

O'Donnell, writing in "Johnny We Hardly Knew Ye," was more to the point:

"The President's orders to reduce the American military personnel in Vietnam by one thousand before the end of 1963 was still in effect on the day he went to Texas. A few days after his death, during the morning, the order was quietly rescinded."

In analyzing the discrepancies and meanings of internal government documents during those critical days in the fall of 1963, Scott concluded:

"NSAM 273, it seems clear, was an important document in the history of the 1964 escalation's, as well as the reversal of President Kennedy's late and ill-fated program of "Vietnamization" by 1965. The systematic censorship and distortion of NSAM 273...by the Pentagon study and later by the "New York Times," raises serious questions...It also suggests that the Kennedy assassination was itself an important, perhaps crucial, event in the history of the Indochina war..."

What would have Kennedy done in Vietnam had he lived?

William J. Rust, author of "Kennedy in Vietnam," wrote:

"My guess is that he would not have crossed the covert action-advisory threshold, would not have bombed North Vietnam, and would not have committed U.S. ground troops to South Vietnam."

Writing in "The Secret Team - The CIA and Its Allies in Control of the United States and the World," Prouty stated:

"President Kennedy made a valiant attempt to effect control over (the Military-Industrial Complex) with his directives, NSAM 55 and 57, as a start. If he had more actively utilized the NSC (National Security Council) system...he might have had a chance to grasp control of some segments of this intragovernmental cybernetic machine....he was beginning to develop (a)...technique of his own, which by 1965 might have accomplished this task had he lived to perfect it."

Prouty has described the men in the military and intelligence community who were so opposed to Kennedy's ideals as "The Secret Team (ST)" which rules the United States government from the inside.

He outlines the ST thusly:

"(The Secret Team) is not just one finite team of individuals. It is a matrix that changes with the gestation of each new operation. It is a sinister device of opportunity and contrivance. What does exist is the mechanism....It is a great intragovernmental infrastructure that is fed by inputs from all sources. It can be driven by the faceless, lobbying pressure of a helicopter manufacturer, or of a giant Cam Ranh Bay general contractor. It can be accelerated by the many small pushes of hundreds of thousands of career military personnel - uniformed and civilian - who see higher rank and higher retirement pay as a goal worth seeking....It is big business, big government, big money, big pressure and headless - all operating in self-centered, utterly self-serving security and secrecy."

According to Colonel Prouty, the men controlling the military-industrial complex or "The Secret Team," realized Kennedy "...had to be removed from office before winning the inevitable mandate from the U. S. public, which was certain to be his in 1964."

Obviously, at this late date, no one wants to claim responsibility for a 10-year undeclared war which killed 58,000 Americans, caused domestic riots and demonstrations, engendered lasting hatreds between classes and age groups and, according to many, nearly wrecked the American economy.

Was Kennedy's embryonic move to disengage in Vietnam a catalyst for his assassination? Was it the straw which broke the back of the military-industrial camel?

###

As terrible as it is to contemplate the involvement of the U.S. military in the Kennedy assassination, there are many connections between the two. In fact, a military presence permeates the events of Dallas. A military intelligence officer was trapped in the Texas School Book Depository when sealed by Dallas police; an Army Intelligence officer accompanied Secret Service agents in the motorcade's pilot car; and FBI Agent Hosty, who destroyed a note from Lee Harvey Oswald after the assassination, was with a military intelligence agent in Dallas the morning of November 22, 1963. Then too, consider the strange case of Richard Case Nagell.

Crossfire: The Man Who was to Kill Oswald

On the afternoon of September 20, 1963, a man described by local papers as a 33-year-old "battle-scarred Korean War hero" walked into the State National Bank of El Paso, Texas, drew a Colt .45 from his sports coat and fired two shots into a plaster wall close to the ceiling.

When a policeman arrived, the man was sitting calmly in a car in a nearby alleyway motioning for a pedestrian to pass in front of him. "I guess you got me now, " he told the cop. "I surrender." Since the bank was regulated by the federal government, FBI agents were summoned. In the man's pants pocket they found a newsletter from the Los Angeles Chapter of the Fair Play for Cuba Committee, the group Lee Harvey Oswald reportedly joined while in New Orleans.

Under questioning the man stated:

"I would rather be arrested than commit murder and treason."

His name was Richard Case Nagell, and he told one of the strangest and most sinister stories to come out of the Kennedy assassination. His story, as pieced together from interviews and court documents and published in a national magazine article in 1981 by writer Richard Russell, delves into the complex and murky world of military intelligence, CIA and FBI.

Raised in an orphanage and foster homes, Nagell entered the Army in 1948 at age 18. During the Korean War, he was the youngest American to receive a battlefield commission to captain. Nagell won three Purple Hearts and a Bronze Star serving in Korea. He was honorably discharged in 1959 with the rank of captain.

Military papers disclosed that Nagell graduated from Army Military Intelligence School, a special leaders course, and served in the Counterintelligence Corps (CIC). According to his records, he was given a top-secret security clearance in 1950. One of his commendation certificates described Nagell as a "perennial calm and levelheaded officer of superior intelligence..."

According to courtroom testimony, in 1958 Nagell was "loaned" by military intelligence to "another intelligence agency" for assignments in the Orient as part of a spy group called Field Operations Intelligence. As a senior intelligence advisor in South Korea, Nagell admitted participating in political assassinations, kidnapping, blackmail and counterfeiting operations.

In 1957, after telling superiors he was "fed up" with committing crimes in the name of national security, Nagell was assigned to counterintelligence duties in Japan. It was here he said he first met a young Marine stationed at Atsugi - Lee Harvey Oswald (See OSWALD).

Nagell told Russell:

"We had a casual, but purposeful acquaintance in Japan. My relationship with Oswald there, and later in the United States, was strictly with an objective."

About this time Nagell married a Japanese woman and, at her urging, resigned his commission, returned to the United States and went to work for the State of California.

In 1962, amid marital problems, he left his wife and two children and journeyed to Mexico City. In Mexico, Nagell said he contacted a CIA man he had known in the Orient and signed a contract with the Agency becoming a "double agent." He was to work for the Soviet KGB, while actually serving the CIA. The Soviets informed him of a plot to kill Kennedy involving the violent anti-Castro Cuban group known as Alpha 66 (See CUBANS) and ordered Nagell to return to the United States and learn more. The KGB even provided Nagell with a photograph of one of the plotters - Lee Harvey Oswald.

Nagell told Russell:

"When he (Oswald) was in the Soviet Union, they suspected him as a spy and considered him emotionally unstable (This matches the story of Soviet defector Yuri Nosenko), prone to commit some act that could bring embarrassment to them."

Nagell would not give details about what he discovered concerning Oswald in the fall of 1962, but he did say:

"He was just being used - by a lot of people, for their own reasons."

Nagell said he became aware of at least two Kennedy assassination plots during this time, both involving Cubans whose "war names" were "Angel" and "Leopoldo" (The same names given to Sylvia Odio - See CUBANS).

According to Nagell, the CIA-backed Alpha 66 Cubans convinced Oswald they were members of Castro's intelligence service and solicited his help in assassinating Kennedy for the reason of revenge against CIA assassination plots against Castro. (If Oswald was actually an undercover agent himself, he would, of course, have gone along with these schemes to learn all he could about the plotting.)

Nagell said he actually got close enough to the plot to tape a New Orleans meeting in late August

1963. Then Nagell was ordered by the KGB to disrupt the Kennedy plot. Nagell said:

"(I was to) try to persuade Oswald that the deal was phony and if this didn't work, and if it looked like things were going to progress beyond the talking stage, to get rid of him."

Considering Oswald's background in Russia, the Soviets "were the last people that wanted Kennedy dead," according to Nagell.

Nagell said he met with Oswald in early September in New Orleans' Jackson Square and told him "Angel" and "Leopoldo" were not Castro agents, but "counter-revolutionaries known to be connected with a violence-prone faction of a CIA-financed group." Later, Nagell told Russell:

"He was informed that he was being 'used' by fascist elements in an attempt to disrupt the Cuban revolution, and probably to incite the U.S. Government to severe retaliatory measures against Cuba, etc. He denied that there had been any serious discussion to kill Kennedy. He seemed genuinely upset and visibly shaken....He stated he was a friend of the Cuban revolution."

With Oswald still maintaining his "cover," Nagell claimed to have then sent a registered letter to FBI director J. Edgar Hoover, warning of the assassination plot and naming both Oswald and the Cubans.

After sending this letter, Nagell said he again met with Oswald and told him a Soviet agent code-named "Oaxaca" wanted to meet Oswald in Mexico City.

According to Nagell:

"He (Oswald) was instructed not to go near the Cuban or U.S.S.R. embassies. Oswald agreed to do so when he was advised that he would be provided with more than sufficient funds to make the trip to and from Mexico City by plane. He was told where and how he was to pick up the money order on 9/24/63, his expected date of departure from New Orleans."

On September 17, the day Oswald picked up his Mexican tourist card in New Orleans, Nagell was already on his way to Mexico City, carrying a .45-caliber Colt pistol to use on Oswald. But Nagell began to have second thoughts about his role as a double agent. On September 20 he drove to El Paso and entered the State National Bank. According to Russell:

"He had decided he could not go through with the KGB's assignment. Doubtful about which master he was really serving, unable to kill a man and then face life abroad without his children, he chose instead to get himself placed in federal custody."

After all, he had alerted the FBI - but the Bureau, predictably, denied ever having received his letter. The matter was out of his hands.

While in jail awaiting trial for bank robbery, Nagell was visited often by both FBI and Secret Service agents, according to jailer Juan Medina. Two FBI agents visited Nagell on November 19, only three days before the assassination.

Early in 1964, Nagell was brought before U.S. District Judge Homer Thornberry in El Paso. The "El Paso Times" reported:

"Instead of asking for a plea, Fred Morton, assistant U.S. District Attorney made a motion to put Nagell in a federal institution in Springfield, Mo., for psychiatric observation. The motion was granted over Nagell's vigorous objections."

The newspaper also reported that FBI and Secret Service agents had questioned Nagell about Oswald and "subversive activities."

On March 20, 1964, Nagell tried to communicate with the Warren Commission. He wrote:

"Has the Commission been advised that I informed the Federal Bureau of Investigation in September 1963 that an attempt might be made to assassinate President Kennedy?"

Despite this letter and the attention paid to Nagell by the FBI and Secret Service, there is no mention of him in the Warren Report or its 26 volumes.

Nagell then again wrote to Hoover:

"My responsibility concerning the then prospective action of Lee H. Oswald (alias Albert Hidell, terminated with the dispatch of the registered letter from Richard Nagell to the FBI in September 1963.

Since the information disclosed in that letter was judged to be mendacious by the FBI, as is quite evident, then with whom the responsibility lies for what subsequently happened in Dallas is rather obvious..."

In March 1964, Nagell was declared competent to stand trial and, while he had no previous criminal record and the holdup was obviously faked, he was convicted of two counts of entering a bank with intent to rob and given the maximum sentence of 10 years in Leavenworth. In 1966 his conviction was overturned and a new trial ordered. Again he was found guilty and again drew a 10-year prison term. However, this was reversed in 1968 by the U.S. Court of Appeals "in view of strong evidence that defendant was insane at time of offense." Nagell finally was set free.

But he was not truly free. He claimed he was followed and hounded and that attempts were made on his life.

On May 24, 1968, Nagell was granted an American passport, which was unusual for a convicted felon. Six days later, he left the country.

Later that year, the Associated Press reported that Army Captain Richard Nagell, 38, was released to American authorities after having been held by the East Germans for four months.

Nagell later told Russell he had been nabbed by the East Germans and accused of "criminal intelligence activities." He said he later was taken to Russia, where, for the first time, he wrote down his full story concerning the Kennedy assassination.

In November 1968, Nagell returned to the United States, where he met with New Orleans District Attorney Jim Garrison. Garrison wanted him to testify at the Clay Shaw trial, but Nagell declined.

According to Nagell, he then traveled again to Europe and Mexico, where he said several attempts were made on his life.

In the late 1970s, Nagell met several times with Russell. He said he believed that Oswald was the assassin. Nagell told him:

"There's no doubt in my mind that he pulled a trigger."

Referring to "my own weird little secret," Nagell told Russell:

"Sometimes, though, I get to thinking and I can't go to sleep. Thinking of what I could have done, the mistakes that could have been handled differently. I was young. So idealistic! How could I have been like that?"

Crossfire: The TFX Scandal

In the fall of 1963 the U.S. Military was prominently in the news. A saga of influence-peddling and defense appropriation graft was being published in the nation's newspapers under the name "the TFX scandal."

The "TFX" - or Tactical Fighter Experimental - was the prototype designation for a combination fighter-bomber aircraft which went on to become the F-111, one of the most controversial aircraft of all time. The Air Force wanted a long-range, strategic bomber while the Navy wanted a short-range, effective fighter plane.

U.S. defense manufacturers, particularly General Dynamics in Texas, tried to give them both in the TFX, which with swept-in wings became a supersonic bomber and, with wings extended, became a tactical fighter.

Apparently by trying to be both types of aircraft, the TFX or F-111 was never truly either.

Criticism and controversy continued to dog the trail of the F-111, although some pilots who saw combat over Hanoi still swear by the hybrid plane. The controversy over the TFX in the fall of 1963 centered around the selection of General Dynamics as the prime contractor. It appeared that neither the Air Force nor the Navy wanted GD, but the contract went there anyway.

With Texan Lyndon Johnson as Vice President, there arose charges of political influence involved in the contract selection. These charges grew when it was learned that Navy Secretary Fred Korth (the attorney who had handled Edwin Ekdahl's divorce from Marguerite Oswald - See LEE HARVEY OSWALD) was a board member of Continental National Bank in Fort Worth, Texas, which held substantial GD stock.

On October 14, 1963, Korth, who had taken over as Navy Secretary for John Connally (who had returned to Texas to become Governor), was fired by President Kennedy. Although it was announced the firing was due to misuse of mailing privileges, it was well known that Kennedy wanted to distance his administration from the growing TFX scandal.

The investigations in the TFX contract was even beginning to threaten his Vice President. Kennedy mentioned the TFX in his breakfast speech in Fort Worth the day he was killed.

The whole issue of the TFX dropped out of sight following Kennedy's death.

Another big news item involving the military in the fall of 1963 was "Operation Big Lift," a large-scale exercise to airlift U.S. combat units to Europe in the event of an emergency.

One month before Kennedy arrived in Dallas, the 2nd Armored Division - including military units in Texas - was airlifted to West Germany in what was hailed as the largest peacetime airlift in history. The exercise was highly successful, the transfer of men and equipment being completed nine hours ahead of schedule.

On November 22, 1963, the last one third of this force was in the air over the United States returning home.

Some suspicious assassination students believe the fact that massive amounts of troops and equipment were airborne and able to reach virtually any American city the day Kennedy was killed was not entirely coincidental.

Crossfire: Military Intelligence

Several other factors have raised suspicions concerning the military's role in the assassination.

Texas military intelligence units which normally were used to augment Presidential security preparations were inexplicably told to stay home on November 22, 1963.

Colonel Fletcher Prouty has reported that the 112th Military Intelligence Group at 4th Army Headquarters at Fort Sam Houston was told to "stand down" that day rather than report for duty in Dallas, over the protests of the unit commander, Col. Maximillian Reich. While apparently some elements of the MI unit did arrive in Dallas, their activities there remain obscure. One member may have been with FBI Agent James Hosty the morning Kennedy was killed. In Warren Commission testimony, Hosty said that 45 minutes before the assassination he was in the company of an Army intelligence officer, but he added the meeting had no connection with Kennedy's visit.

Recall that it was agent Hosty's name, address, phone number and license number which were found in Lee Harvey Oswald's personal notebook (This was originally deleted from the material turned over to the Warren Commission) and it was Hosty who destroyed a message from Oswald days after the assassination apparently on orders from superiors (See G MEN).

Another Army Intelligence officer to become involved in the assassination was Special Agent James Powell. Carrying a 35-mm Minolta camera, Powell had taken several photos in Dealey Plaza at the time of the assassination. He entered the Texas School Book Depository and his presence became public knowledge when he was forced to show his identification after Dallas police sealed the building. Powell told researcher Penn Jones he "worked with the Sheriff's deputies at the rear of the Texas School Book Depository for about six or eight minutes" and that he had ordered a newsman to hang up a telephone on the building's first floor so that he (Powell) could use it.

No meaningful investigation has been made by the government to determine what intelligence agent Powell was doing in Dealey Plaza at the time of the assassination.

And the military connection becomes even more curious in light of two strange incidents which occurred in Dallas that day.

Dallas Police Lt. Jack Revill told the Warren Commission that an Army intelligence officer rode with him from Dealey Plaza to the Dallas Police Station. It was Revill, as head of the police criminal intelligence division, who submitted a list of Texas School Book Depository employees. Leading Revill's list was the name "Lee Harvey Oswald," with the address given as 605 Elsbeth in Dallas.

Oswald had lived at 602 Elsbeth in late 1962 and early 1963, but had since moved and the Elsbeth address had never been given to his employers at the Depository. Where then did Revill get the Elsbeth address?

It was later revealed that the 112th MI Group, which maintained an office in Dallas, had possessed a file on a man named "Harvey Lee Oswald," identifying him as a pro-communist who had been in Russia and had been involved in pro-Castro activities in New Orleans. This military file erroneously gave Oswald's address as 605 Elsbeth, the same mistake found on Revill's list.

Apparently military intelligence was swift in providing Dallas police with information on Oswald, the man who came to be labeled as the lone assassin of Kennedy. It is a fact that several Dallas police officers also served in various military reserve units and were therefore in close contact with military intelligence.

Information on Oswald apparently came from the 112th MIG's operations officer, Lt. Col. Robert E. Jones, who was stationed at Fort Sam Houston in San Antonio. Testifying to the House Select Committee on Assassinations, Jones said the afternoon of the assassination he received a call from his agents in Dallas advising that a man named A.J. Hidell had been arrested. (This is most interesting because, while Oswald did carry some cards identifying him as Hidell, no mention was made of this in the media that day indicating a close relationship between the M.I. agents and Dallas Police.)

Jones said he began a search of his intelligence indexes and located a file on A.J. Hidell which cross-referenced into one for Lee Harvey Oswald. He said he then contacted the FBI in both San Antonio and Dallas with his information. The files on Hidell and Oswald gave detailed information about his trip to Russia as well as pro-Castro activities in New Orleans. Jones said he had become aware of Oswald in the summer of 1963 when information had been passed along by the New Orleans Police Department regarding his arrest there. He said the 112th MIG took an interest in Oswald as a possible counterintelligence threat.

The House committee, remarking on how quickly the military found files on Oswald, stated:

"This information suggested the existence of a military intelligence file on Oswald and raised the possibility that he had intelligence associations of some kind."

The Warren Commission specifically asked to see any military files regarding Oswald but were never shown the files mentioned by Jones or any others.

In 1978, when the House Select Committee on Assassinations learned of these files and requested them from the military, they were told the files had been "destroyed routinely" in 1973.

The committee concluded:

"The committee found this "routine" destruction of the Oswald file extremely troublesome, especially when viewed in light of the Department of Defense's failure to make the file available to the Warren Commission. Despite the credibility of Jones' testimony, without access to this file, the question of Oswald's possible affiliation with military intelligence could not be fully resolved."

Even more troublesome is the military's file on A.J. Hidell. Jones stated that Hidell was an alias used by Oswald, which accounted for the fact that the two files were cross-indexed. However, nowhere in the vast documentation of Oswald's life did he ever actually use A.J. Hidell as an alias - the exceptions being when he mail-ordered the rifle allegedly used to kill Kennedy and the pistol allegedly used to kill Officer Tippit using the name Hidell and the use of the name Hidell on Fair Play for Cuba literature. This raises two possibilities. Either military intelligence had some independent knowledge of Oswald's purchase of the weapons which took place long before he arrived in New Orleans (Were they monitoring his Dallas post office box?) or someone, perhaps even Oswald himself, informed the military of his purchases. In either event it appears that the U. S. military knew more about Oswald and his weapons than has yet been made public.

But does that mean the military ordered the assassination?

After all, no assassination conspiracy could expect to escape punishment without either neutralizing or becoming allies with the military. And the military played a dominant role in the assassination investigation after Kennedy's body left Dallas. It was military personnel who flew Air Force One. It was military orderlies that handled the body at Bethesda Naval Hospital and, more importantly, it was inexperienced Navy Doctors who performed a flawed autopsy thus creating so many problems with the medical evidence (See TWO HOSPITALS).

Mercenary soldier Gerry Patrick Hemmings has claimed on Canadian television that he was actually offered money to kill Kennedy while meeting with military officers. He said he declined and left the meeting. True or not, the U.S. military certainly had the means, motives and opportunity as well as officers who looked on Kennedy as a traitor.

It is truly ironic that of all our modern Presidents, it was John F. Kennedy who received the only full military funeral in recent history.

Was this the military's way of making atonement?

Crossfire: Soldiers Summary

While the U.S. Military has attempted to keep a low profile in modern American life, there can be no question that the military-industrial complex is the preeminent force in the nation.

The manufacture and sale of armaments continues to be the largest money-making endeavor in the United States. And the immense intelligence community which has arisen to protect this industry follows military orders.

Obviously military and intelligence officers did not take kindly to Kennedy's attempts to restrain this powerful conglomeration. Kennedy angered these men by refusing to use U.S. military power to salvage the Bay of Pigs invasion. Then he added fuel to the fire by rejecting recommendations by the joint chiefs to bomb the missiles emplacements in Cuba and to refrain from signing a nuclear test ban treaty with the Russians.

Vietnam may have been the straw that broke the generals' philosophic back. Viewed from the broadest perspective, it now seems accurate to state that the opening shots of the full-scale war in Vietnam were in Dallas, Texas. Much evidence exists that Kennedy would have disengaged this nation from Southeast Asia had he lived - again in direct conflict with the wishes of the military-industrial complex.

Some generals - including Dallas Mayor Earle Cabell's brother, General Charles P. Cabell - even went so far as to brand Kennedy a "traitor". Cabell, after being fired by Kennedy as deputy director of the CIA, resumed responsibilities in the Pentagon.

The known connections between the military and the assassination - the military agents in Dealey Plaza and the Dallas Police Station, the agent who was with FBI man Hosty and the strange saga of Richard Case Nagell - are many and troubling.

Then there are the military men connected with the assassination's aftermath - Kennedy's personal physician was a Navy admiral, inexperienced Navy doctors conducted a greatly flawed autopsy on Kennedy and it was military men who transported the President's body from Dallas to Washington.

All this - along with the mysterious disappearance of military files on Lee Harvey Oswald who had many opportunities to work with military intelligence - makes many assassination researchers believe that at least some members of the U.S. military may have played a role in an assassination conspiracy.

Crossfire: Aftermath - Dallas

"If you didn't see Lee Harvey Oswald up in the School Book Depository with a rifle, you didn't witness it."

FBI agent to witness Richard Carr

The gunfire had barely died away in Dealey Plaza when an aftermath of odd and often unexplained events began in Dallas - and continued for more than two decades.

Dallas police blocking the nearby intersections - with no orders to the contrary (recall the eight-minute disruption of the Dallas Police radio motorcade channel during the time of the shooting) - released traffic which began pouring through Dealey Plaza. Spectators from blocks away, having heard the shots and sirens, ran to the scene. Some bystanders were still in shock. Others were shouting, "They shot the President!" while others sobbed out the news. Pandemonium was the order of the day.

There was no shortage of lawmen as nearly 20 Sheriffs' deputies, following Sheriff Decker's orders, ran to the railroad yards behind the Grassy Knoll. Dozens of Dallas police officers also were flooding the area. But all were receiving conflicting information - witnesses on the west end of Dealey Plaza pinpointed the picket fence on the Grassy Knoll as the source of the shots, while many people on the east end said shots came from the Texas School Book Depository.

It is significant to recall that James Tague, who was slightly wounded when a bullet or bullet fragment struck the Main Street curb near the Triple Underpass (See THE TRIPLE UNDERPASS), last spoke with Deputy Sheriff E.R. "Buddy" Walthers before having to move his car once traffic got moving. Tague said this occurred about 12:40 p.m. Yet Walthers was among the first officers to seal the Depository, indicating that the building was open for at least 10 minutes after the shooting. Actually the time may have been much longer. Dallas Police Capt. Will Fritz, who headed the Dallas investigation, told the Warren Commission he began making detailed notes after hearing of the assassination at the Trade Mart. Fritz said he arrived at the Texas School Book Depository at exactly 12:58 p.m. Asked if the Depository exits were guarded at that time, Fritz replied:

"I am not sure, but I don't - there had been some question about that, but the reason I don't think that - this may differ with someone else, but I am going to tell you what I know....After I arrived, one of the officers asked me if I would like to have the building sealed and I told him I would."

Recall that Ed Hoffman was able to drive from Stemmons Freeway to the railroad yards behind the Depository, circle the area and leave unchallenged (See THE GRASSY KNOLL). The point here is that there was absolutely no effective containment of the crime scene or of the Depository for at least 10 minutes - and perhaps as long as 28 minutes - after the shooting. This was easily enough time for a whole squad of assassins to slip away.

Officially, it has been said that within an hour of the assassination, there was a roll call at the Texas School Book Depository. Employee Lee Harvey Oswald was the only person missing and authorities immediately began a search for him. Like so much other information in this case, this story is simply untrue. To begin with, most Depository employees were outside viewing the motorcade at the time of the shooting and were prevented from returning to work by police. During the first roll call, dozens of Depository employee were missing. By the time, it was determined that Oswald was gone - about 2:30 p.m. - he was already in police custody. This was confirmed in 1981 by "Dallas Morning News" reporter Kent Biffle, who recalled that day in a lengthy article based on his notes of that day. Biffle wrote:

"...only two of us (reporters) had arrived at the ambush building (the Depository) by this point....Getting in was no problem. I just hid my press badge...and went in with the first wave of cops....Hours dragged by. The building superintendent showed up with some papers in his hand. I listened as he told detectives about Lee Oswald failing to show up at a roll call. My impression is that there was an earlier roll call that had been inconclusive because several employees were missing. This time, however, all were accounted for except Oswald. I jotted down the Oswald information....Neither the police in the building nor the superintendent knew that Oswald already was under arrest."

In the confusion following the assassination, there was ample opportunity for conspirators to escape and for vital evidence to be eliminated. One such incident occurred minutes after the shooting on the south side of Elm Street. Dallas Policeman J.W. Foster, from his vantage point on top of the Triple Underpass (See THE TRIPLE UNDERPASS), saw a bullet strike the grass on the south side of Elm near a manhole cover. He reported this to a superior officer and was told to guard the area. Photographs taken that day show both Foster and Deputy Sheriff Walthers standing over the manhole cover. Newsmen and spectators were kept at a distance and told that evidence - a bullet - was embedded in the grass inches from the manhole cover.

News cameraman Harry Cabluck photographed the scene and recalled seeing more than one gouge in the ground. He too was told that a bullet had struck there. However, Cabluck said he took the photographs hours after the assassination and never actually saw a slug.

One photograph of the slug even appeared in the November 23, 1963 edition of the "Fort Worth Star-Telegram," with the caption:

"ASSASSIN'S BULLET - One of the rifle bullets fired by the murderer of President Kennedy lies in the grass across Elm Street from the building in which the killer was hiding and from where he launched his assault."

Inches from the bullet, which is circled in the newspaper photo, is the edge of the cement manhole.

On November 24, the "Dallas Times Herald" reported:

"Dallas Police Lt. J.C. Day of the crime lab estimated the distance from the sixth floor window the slayer used, to the spot where one of the bullets was recovered, at 100 yards."

Richard Dudman wrote in the December 21, 1963, issue of the "New Republic":

"On the day the President was shot I happened to learn of a possible fifth (bullet). A group of police officers were examining the area at the side of the street where the President was hit, and a police inspector told me they had just found another bullet in the grass."

Other witnesses to the bullet marks on the south side of Elm Street were Wayne and Edna Hartman, who were in Dallas for jury duty. After hearing shots in Dealey Plaza, the couple "ran like the devil" down to the grassy middle area of the plaza.

Mrs. Hartman told this author:

"There were not many people in this area at the time, but a policeman was there. He pointed to some bushes near the railroad tracks on the north side of the street and said that's where the shots came from....Then I noticed these two parallel marks on the ground that looked like mounds made by a mole. I asked "What are these, mole hills?" and the policeman said, "Oh no, mamam, that's were the bullets struck the ground.""

On Sunday, the Hartmans again visited Dealey Plaza but found that the crush of people bringing memorials had obliterated the marks.

In the summer of 1964, the Hartmans contacted the FBI after learning that the Bureau was still seeking assassination information. Mrs. Hartman said FBI agents didn't seem too interested in what they had to say. One agent told them the marks had been made by bone fragments from Kennedy's head, an explanation which sounded "strange" to the Hartmans. Both Hartmans told the FBI that the bullet marks did not line up with the Texas School Book Depository but rather with the picket fence on the Grassy Knoll. Mrs. Hartman recently recalled:

"I don't see how what we saw down there could have come from those windows up there because they were not the right angle. So we have always felt that it came from across the street...that was the angle...across the street from where we stood...the Grassy Knoll, we've always felt it came from there....And at that time people were telling us the bullets came from over there. There was somebody over there shooting also. And they pointed across the street, which was south of the Depository."

Yet in an FBI report dated July 10, 1964, agents stated:

"(The Hartmans) said this gouged out hole was in line with the general area of the Texas School Book Depository Building. (They) said some bystander had mentioned that he believed the shots had come from the Texas School Book Depository Building."

If one or more bullet slugs were in the grass, what happened to them? What role did an extra slug play in the assassination? Was this proof that at least four shots were fired? The answers to these questions may never be known because, officially, this bullet never existed. Within minutes of the shooting, a sandy-haired man in a suit - this man was identified in Dallas Police Chief Curry's book as an FBI agent - in full view of both Walthers and Foster, walked up, reached down, cupped some object in his hand and stuck it into his left pants pocket. The bullet was gone.

Later in 1964, when reports of this bullet reached the Warren Commission, the FBI was instructed to investigate the matter. Agents reported that they had examined the manhole cover and there was no sign of a bullet striking it. There was no mention of the fact that the bullet in question landed inches away from the manhole cover. Apparently satisfied, the Warren Commission dropped the matter.

Later on the day of the assassination, the "Stemmons Freeway" sign, which according to some bystanders was struck by a bullet, disappeared. It is missing in photographs made in Dealey Plaza the next day. No explanation of this disappearance has ever been brought forth.

Other bullets were later found in Dealey Plaza. In May 1976, Hal Luster was using a metal detector to look for coins on the Grassy Knoll. Instead, he found a steel-jacketed, round-nosed .45-caliber bullet buried in about four inches of dirt behind a four-foot-high retaining wall at the west end of the pergola atop the knoll.

In 1974, Richard Lester, also using a metal detector, discovered a bullet fragment on the far south side of Dealey Plaza just east of the Triple Underpass. Two years later, Lester turned the fragment over to the FBI. It was later studied by firearm experts of the House Select Committee on Assassinations. Both studies showed the fragment was from 6.5-millimeter ammunition but, based on ballistics, it had not been fired through the Oswald rifle. Rather than view this as evidence that perhaps multiple rifles were used in the assassination, both the FBI and the Committee left the impression that this discovery had no connection with Kennedy's death.

Also, in the 1970s, a Dallas man found a 6.5 millimeter rifle slug buried in the earth just west of the Triple Underpass. This slug also was reported to the FBI, with apparently no action taken.

Yet another story of a bullet found may shed much light on how some bullet fragments were traced to the Oswald rifle. Dean Morgan of Lewisville (a suburb of Dallas) has told Texas researchers that in 1975 his father was working on air-conditioning equipment on the roof of the Dallas County Records Building located just catercornered from the Texas School Book Depository. The Record's building's west side faces onto Dealey plaza and there is a waist-high parapet along the edge of its roof. According to Morgan, his father discovered a 30.06-caliber shell casing lying under a lip of roofing tar at the base of the roof's parapet on the side facing Dealey Plaza while searching for water leaks. The shell casing is dated 1953 and marks indicate it was manufactured at the Twin Cities Arsenal. One side has been pitted by exposure to the weather, indicating it lay on the roof for a long time. The casing, which remains in Morgan's possession, has an odd crimp around its neck. Rifle experts have explained to Morgan that this is evidence that a sabot may have been used to fire different ammunition from a 30.06 rifle. A sabot is a plastic sleeve which allows a larger caliber weapon to fire a smaller caliber slug. The results of using a lighter-weight slug include increased velocity producing more accuracy and greater striking power. In addition, the smaller slug exhibits the ballistics of the weapon it was originally fired from, rather than the 30.06, as the sabot engages the 30.06's rifling. In other words, assassination conspirators could have fired 6.5-mm bullets from the Oswald rifle into water, recovered them, then reloaded them into the more accurate and powerful 30.06 with the use of a sabot - which is held in place by crimping the cartridge. By this method, bullet fragments found in the presidential limousine would have the ballistics of Oswald's rifle rather than the 30.06 from which they were actually fired.

Warren Commission Exhibit 399 - the nearly intact slug found at Parkland Hospital the afternoon of the assassination - displays all the characteristics of a slug fired into nothing more solid than water. It is just such a slug which can be reloaded and refired using a sabot, which disintegrates on firing.

But bullets were not the only evidence found later in Dealey Plaza. The day after the assassination, a college student named Billy Harper was taking pictures in the plaza when he found a piece of skull (See TWO HOSPITALS). It too was never acknowledged by the Warren Commission.

And while evidence was disappearing from Elm Street, men were seen fleeing the rear of the Texas School Book Depository. Richard Carr, a steelworker who saw a heavy-set man on the sixth-floor of the Depository minutes before the shooting (See THE CROWD), saw two men run from either inside or from behind the Texas School Book Depository minutes after the assassination. He claimed the men got in a Nash Rambler station wagon stopped facing north on the west side of Houston street by the east side of the Depository. He said the wagon left in such a hurry one of its doors was still open. He last saw the station wagon speeding north on Houston. After reaching ground level from his seventh-story vantage point on the courthouse under construction, Carr said he saw the same man he had seen earlier in the Depository window. Carr said the man was "in an extreme hurry and kept looking over his shoulder" as he walked hurriedly eastward on Commerce Street.

Carr's story was corroborated by that of James R. Worrell Jr., who told the Warren Commission that seconds after the shooting, he saw a man wearing a sport coat come out of the rear of the Depository and walk briskly south on Houston (the direction of Carr's location). Worrell can't be questioned further about what he saw, as he was killed in a motorcycle accident on November 9, 1966 at age 23. Carr, however, told researchers about his treatment at the hands of the authorities. In a taped interview, Carr said:

"The FBI came to my house - there were two of them - and they said they heard I witnessed the assassination and I said I did. They told me, "If you didn't see Lee Harvey Oswald up in the School Book Depository with a rifle, you didn't witness it." I said, "Well, the man I saw on television that they tell me is Lee Harvey Oswald was not in the window of the School Book Depository. That's not the man." And (one of the agents) said I better keep my mouth shut. He did not ask me what I saw, he told me what I saw."

Not long after this encounter with the FBI, Carr's home was raided by more than a dozen Dallas policemen and detectives armed with a search warrant. Claiming they were looking for "stolen articles," they ransacked Carr's home while holding him and his wife at gun point. Carr and his wife were taken to jail but later released. The day after the police raid, Carr received an anonymous phone call advising him to "get out of Texas." Carr finally moved to Montana to avoid harassment, but there he found dynamite in his car on one occasion and was shot at on another.

After testifying in the New Orleans Clay Shaw trial, Carr was attacked by two men in Atlanta. Although stabbed in the back and left arm, Carr managed to fatally shoot one of his assailants. Later after turning himself in, Carr was no-billed by an Atlanta grand jury.

Other witnesses also were later intimidated. Acquilla Clemons, who saw two men at the scene of the Tippit slaying, said a man with a gun came to her home and told her to keep quiet. Hoffman, who saw two men with a rifle behind the picket fence on the Grassy Knoll at the time of the assassination, was warned by an FBI agent not to tell what he saw "or you might get killed."

A relative of Depository Superintendent Roy Truly recently told researchers that Truly was fearful until his death due to intimidation by federal authorities. Truly's wife, Mildred, still refuses to discuss the assassination - even with family members.

Sandy Speaker, the supervisor of Warren Commission star witness Howard Brennan, would not discuss the assassination until recently after getting a phone call for his friend and co-worker A.J. Millican.

Speaker said he got a call from Millican early in 1964. Millican was almost in tears and told him never to talk about the assassination. Millican said he has just received an anonymous call threatening not only his life, but the lives of his wife and her sister. He said the caller told him to warn Speaker to keep his mouth shut. Today Speaker told this author:

"That call really shook me up because Millican was a former boxing champ of the Pacific fleet. He was a scrapper, a fighter. But he was obviously scared to death. And I still don't understand how they got my name because I was never interviewed by the FBI, the Secret Service, the police or anyone. They must be pretty powerful to have found out about me."

Whispered rumors, anonymous phone calls and freakish "accidents" combined to create a tangible aura of fear in Dallas in the weeks following the assassination. Some of that fear still lingers in Dallas.

Crossfire: Mysterious Secret Service Men

One of the most puzzling aspects of the post-assassination confusion involves encounters between Dealey Plaza witnesses and "Secret Service" agents. The most noted incident of this type was recounted by Dallas Policeman Joe M. Smith. Smith had run into the parking lot atop the Grassy Knoll after a woman had told him, "They're shooting the President from the bushes!" While searching through the parked cars, he encountered a man who displayed Secret Service identification (See GRASSY KNOLL). Smith told author Anthony Summers:

"The man, this character, produces credentials from his hip pocket which showed him to be Secret Service. I have seen those credentials before, and they satisfied me...So, I immediately accepted that and let him go and continued our search around the cars."

Malcolm Summers was one of the bystanders who followed police up the Grassy Knoll immediately after the shooting. He told Jack Anderson:

"I ran across Elm Street to run up there toward that knoll. And we were stopped by a man in a suit and he had an overcoat over his arm. I saw a gun under that overcoat. And his comment was, "Don't you'all come up here any further, you could get shot...or killed...""

It has subsequently been asserted by the Secret Service that none of their agents on duty that day were anywhere near Dealey Plaza either before or just after the assassination. In retrospect, Smith doubted the legitimacy of the man he encountered. In 1963 Secret Service agents, like their FBI counterparts, wore crewcuts, dark suits and narrow ties. Smith described the man thusly:

"He looked like an auto mechanic. He had on a sports shirt and sports pants. But he had dirty fingernails, it looked like, and hands that looked like auto mechanics hands. And, afterwards, it didn't ring true for the Secret Service....At the time we were so pressed for time and we were searching. And he had produced correct identification and we just overlooked the thing. I should have checked that man closer, but at the time, I didn't snap on it..."

In addition to Smith and Summers, GI Gordon Arnold (See THE GRASSY KNOLL) also encountered a man who claimed to be with the Secret Service just moments prior to the assassination. Arnold said he was walking behind the wooden picket fence on top of the Grassy Knoll when he was approached by a man who told him he was with the Secret Service and that Arnold could not stay behind the fence. Moments later, Arnold said shots came from behind the fence.

Sam Holland, who was standing with two Dallas policemen and other railroad workers on the Triple Underpass, told the Warren Commission that "a plainclothes detective or FBI agent or something like that" was helping the police guard the railroad bridge. Holland told a Commission attorney:

"...there were two city policemen and one man in plainclothes. I didn't talk to him. I talked to the city policemen."

Holland said after hearing shots and seeing a white puff of smoke come from behind the wooden picket fence, he and others ran to the Grassy Knoll.

He later said that while they found no one behind the picket fence:

"...somebody had been standing there for a long period. I guess if you could count them, about a hundred foot tracks (were) in that little spot, and also mud up on the bumper of (a) station wagon."

In later years, family friends reported that Holland too was threatened and narrowly escaped injury when the windshield of his truck was shot out while driving on Stemmons Freeway.

Constable Seymour Weitzman, who had rushed behind the wooden picket fence (See THE GRASSY KNOLL), met men he believed were Secret Service. Warren Commission lawyer Joseph Ball asked Weitzman if there were others with him behind the fence. Weitzman replied:

"Yes sir; other officers, Secret Service as well, and somebody started, there was something red in the street and I went back over the wall and somebody brought me a piece of what he thought to be a firecracker and it turned out to be, I believe, I wouldn't quote this, but I turned it over to one of the Secret Service men and I told them it should go to the lab because it looked to me like human bone. I later found out it was supposedly a portion of the President's skull."

It is not certain if this particular piece of bone was ever investigated by the proper authorities. There is no mention of it in official reports, although Commission Document 1269 is entitled "Location of Photos of a Bone Specimen." This document, however, is still classified.

Dallas Police Sgt. D. V. Harkness also encountered Secret Service men where none officially were supposed to be. Harkness told the Warren Commission that he ran to the rear of the Texas School Book Depository moments after the shooting and "there were some Secret Service agents there." Harkness told a commission lawyer:

I didn't get them identified. They told me they are Secret Service.

In later years Harkness told the "Dallas Morning News" that the men were dressed in suits and "were all armed." He told the newspaper:

(I) assumed they were with the Presidential party.

Dallas Secret Service Agent-in-Charge Forrest V. Sorrels was the only Secret Service agent to return to the scene of the assassination within an hour or so. Sorrels said he walked through a rear door of the Texas School Book Depository without showing any identification. His arrival was too late to have been one of the men encountered by Harkness.

In 1978, Sorrels, then retired, was asked by a Dallas newsman to comment on the stories of bogus Secret Service agents in Dealey Plaza. Sorrels said:

(I'm) not answering any questions about this thing. I gave all my testimony in Washington and I don't put out anything else. As far as I'm concerned, that's a closed incident.

Another odd incident involving Secret Service agents who may have been bogus occurred within an hour of the assassination in the small town of Ferris, located just south of Dallas. Two high school students - Billy V. James and Ronnie Witherspoon - witnessed a speeding car being stopped by local police on Interstate 45. The students stopped to watch because they thought "we may have been witnessing the arrest of the assassins." However, according to the students, the men in the stopped car told police they were Secret Service agents "in a hurry to get to New Orleans to investigate something in connection with the assassination." James said the men were believed and allowed to go on without being ticketed. No Secret Service agent reported leaving Dallas for New Orleans that day and the identity of the men in the car remains a mystery.

Incredibly, even the accused-assassin apparently had an encounter with one of these bogus agents.

Secret Service Inspector Thomas J. Kelley was one of several officials who interrogated Lee Harvey Oswald on the Sunday morning he was shot by Ruby. In his report of that interview, Kelley wrote:

"...he (Oswald) asked me whether I was an FBI agent and I said that I was not that I was a member of the Secret Service. He said when he was standing in front of the Textbook Building (Texas School Book Depository) and about to leave it, a young, crew-cut man rushed up to him and said he was from the Secret Service, showed a book of identification, and asked him where the phone was. Oswald said he pointed toward the pay phone in the building and that he saw the man actually go to the phone before he left."

In later years, the theory was advanced that Oswald had merely mistaken a news reporter for an agent. Kelley's report dispels this notion as he makes clear that the man produced a "book of identification."

In fact, when the Sixth Floor museum of the assassination opened in 1989, a taped tour of the exhibit was narrated by newsman Pierce Alman, who claimed to have been the reporter encountered by Oswald. However, Alman apparently had no direct knowledge of this incident since he says he was merely told he had met Oswald by Government agents months after the assassination.

Considering the number of people claiming to have encountered agents in Dealey Plaza, it would appear that Oswald most likely was correct on his identification of a Secret Service agent.

It seems incredible that the suspected killer of the President not only took the time to help someone he believed to be a Secret Service agent, but then stood around to watch him get to the telephone.

But perhaps the strangest - and most ominous - incident involving the Secret Service happened to witness Jean Hill. Jean Hill was standing beside her friend Mary Moorman on the south side of Elm Street at the moment Kennedy was killed. Moorman fell on the ground at the sound of the shooting, but Hill remained standing and watchful (See THE CROWD). After seeing both a man fire from behind the wooden picket fence and a suspicious man rapidly walking west in front of the Depository building, Hill ran across Elm Street and began to run up the Grassy Knoll. Hill told this author:

"I don't know what I would have done if I had caught them, but I knew something terrible had happened and somebody had to something."

As she ran up the Grassy Knoll, her attention was drawn to a "trail of blood in the grass just to the right of the steps." Thinking that "our guys had shot back and we got one of them," she followed the red droplets until she discovered they belonged to a Sno-cone - flavored ice packed in a cup. Someone had dropped a red-colored one that day on the Grassy Knoll. After the distraction of the Sno-cone, Hill continued her run up the Grassy Knoll, but valuable seconds had been wasted. She looked in vain for either suspicious men behind the fence or the man she saw by the Depository. She recalled:

"All I saw in that parking area were railroad workers and police."

Walking to the west of the Texas School Book Depository, Hill said she encountered two men who identified themselves as Secret Service agents. She told interviewers in Texas:

"I was looking around but I couldn't see anything, when these two guys came up behind me. One of them said, "You're coming with us." and I replied, "Oh, no I'm not. I don't know you." "I said you're coming with us," one of them said and then put this horrible grip on my shoulder. I can still feel the pain when I think about it. I tried to tell them, "I have to go back and find my friend Mary." But then the other guy put a grip on my other shoulder and they began hustling me past the front of the Depository. "Keep smiling and keep walking," one of them kept telling me. They marched me across the plaza and into a building. We entered from the south side and I think it was the Sheriff's office. They took me to a little office upstairs and they wouldn't let me out of this room. It was all such a shock. There was a lot of tension and it was like a lot of it was focused in this one area. The two men that grabbed me never showed me any identification but, after we got to this little room, some men came in who were Secret Service. They began to ask me a lot of questions. One man told me they had been watching Mary and I out of the window. He asked me, "Did you see a bullet hit at your feet?" I told him I didn't realize that one had struck near my feet. "Then, why did you jump back up on the curb?" he asked me and I told him how I had started to run at the President's car but thought better of it. Then I heard some booming sounds and it startled me and I jumped back on the curb by Mary. I guess they were up there the whole time and watched the whole thing. Then they sent those two guys to come and get me. I mean, I wasn't too hard to find that day - wearing that red raincoat."

Hill said she was kept in the room for some time before rejoining Mary Moorman in a downstairs office. There were other assassination witnesses in the office, such as Charles Brehm and others who signed Sheriff's depositions that day.

She said a Dallas newspaperman, whom the women at first believed to be a federal agent, took all of the Moorman snapshots. Later that day the photos were returned but three of the six Moorman snapshots were taken by federal authorities, who returned them only after several weeks. Two of the returned photographs had the backgrounds mutilated.

Dallas Police Chief Curry summed up the import of a man with Secret Service identification when he told author Anthony Summers:

"...certainly the suspicion would point to the man as being involved, some way or other, in the shooting, since he was in the area immediately adjacent to where the shots were - and the fact that he had a badge that purported him to be Secret Service would make it seem all the more suspicious."

The House Select Committee on Assassinations briefly looked into the matter of men with Secret Service identification but came up with no real answers. After establishing that "Except for Dallas Agent-in-Charge Sorrels, who helped police search the Texas School Book Depository, no (Secret Service) agent was in the vicinity of the stockade fence or inside the book depository on the day of the assassination," the committee wrote off most of the sightings as people mistaking plainclothes police for agents. However, the committee could not dismiss Smith's story so lightly. FBI Agent James Hosty (whose name was in Oswald's notebook and who destroyed the Oswald note - See G-MEN) told the committee that Smith may have encountered a Treasury Agent named Frank Ellsworth. When deposed by the Committee, Ellsworth denied the allegation. Despite its inability to determine who was carrying Secret Service identification on the Grassy Knoll on November 22, 1963, the Committee nevertheless concluded:

"(We) found no evidence of Secret Service complicity in the assassination."

However, if Jean Hill's account is true, either men posing as federal agents were using offices in the Dallas County Sheriff's building minutes after the assassination or genuine federal agents were monitoring the tragedy from an upper-story window.

###

Only one portion of Jean Hill's account of the assassination seems unbelievable - that of identifying the man she saw in front of the Depository as Jack Ruby. Interestingly, her story appears to have some corroboration. First, recall the story of Julia Ann Mercer, who identified a man sitting in a truck just west of the Triple Underpass about an hour prior to the assassination as Jack Ruby (See THE CROWD). Also recall that both Mercer and Marguerite Oswald (Lee's mother) said authorities showed them photographs of Jack Ruby prior to Ruby slaying Oswald. Then there is the Warren Commission testimony of Depository employee Victoria Adams, who said she and a co-worker saw a man at the intersection of Elm and Houston minutes after the assassination "questioning people as if he were a police officer." She told the Commission that the man "looked very similar" to the photos of Jack Ruby broadcast after the Oswald slaying. Her companion, Avery Davis, was never asked for her opinion.

Mal Couch, a television cameraman for WFAA-TV in Dallas, also supported the idea that Ruby was in Dealey Plaza when he told the Warren Commission that another newsman, Wes Wise (who later became Mayor of Dallas), had seen Ruby walking around the side of the Texas School Book Depository moments after the shooting. However, Couch was forced to admit his story was just "hearsay" by Commission lawyers who then declined to call Wes Wise to clarify the issue.

Jean Hill said she recognized the man who shot Oswald as being the same man she saw "walking briskly" in front of the Texas School Book Depository seconds after the assassination. The man she saw was almost running in a westward direction toward the Triple Underpass. However, after gaining the top of the Grassy Knoll, she lost sight of the man. This story may play a part in the account of one Dallas policeman who chased a man leaving the area of the Triple Underpass.

Crossfire: The Black Car Chase

On November 22, 1963, Dallas Policeman Tom G. Tilson Jr. had taken a day off. A friend and fellow policeman, J.D. Tippit, was covering Tilson's regular beat that day. Three days later Tilson was a pallbearer at Tippit's funeral. Tilson, now retired, has told Dallas newsmen of chasing a black car from the scene of the assassination that day and claims the man in the car bore a striking resemblance to Jack Ruby. Tilson and a daughter, Judy, were going downtown to pick up another daughter who had been watching the presidential motorcade. As Tilson was turning east on Commerce from Industrial just west of the Triple Underpass, he said he learned from a police radio monitor he had in his car that Kennedy had been shot. Tilson stated:

"...I saw all these people running to the scene of the shooting. By that time I had come across under Stemmons. Everybody was jumping out of their cars and pulling up on the median strip. My daughter Judy noticed the (presidential) limousine come under the Underpass. They took a right turn onto Stemmons toward Parkland Hospital. Well, the limousine just sped past (t)his car parked on the grass on the north side of Elm street near the west side of the Underpass. Here's one guy coming from the railroad tracks. He came down that grassy slope on the west side of the Triple Underpass, on the Elm Street side. He had (this) car parked there, a black car. And, he threw something in the back seat and went around the front hurriedly and got in the car and took off. I was on Commerce Street right there across from (the car), fixing to go under the Triple Underpass going into town. I saw all this and I said, "That doesn't make sense, everybody running to the scene and one person running from it. That's suspicious as hell." So, I speeded up and went through the Triple Underpass up to Houston...made a left...(came) back on Main...and caught up with him because he got caught on a light. He made a left turn and I made a left turn, going south on Industrial. I told my daughter to get a pencil and some paper and write down what I tell you. By this time, we had gotten to the toll road (formerly the Dallas-Fort Worth Turnpike, now Interstate 30) going toward Fort Worth. I got the license number and description of the car and I saw what the man looked like. He was stocky, about 5-foot-9, weighing 185 to 195 pounds and wearing a dark suit. He looked a hell of a lot more than just a pattern of Jack Ruby. If that wasn't Jack Ruby, it was someone who was his twin brother. Or pretty close. You know how Jack wore an old dark suit all the time? He always wore that old suit. He had that same old suit on. Anyway, I got the license number and all and exited off the turnpike and came back and picked up my other daughter down there at Commerce and Houston. Then I went to a phone and called in the information on the license number and what I had seen..."

Tilson's story is corroborated by his daughter, now Mrs. Judy Ladner, although photos taken west of the Triple Underpass at the time do not show the black car.

Also, Dallas Police radio logs for that day do not indicate any alert for such a car as described by Tilson. Tilson maintains that he gave the license number and man's description to the police homicide bureau, "but they never contacted me or did anything about it." Believing he had done his duty, Tilson threw away the scrap of paper with the license number on it. It was only much later that he discovered that his information had been ignored. Tilson recalled in 1978:

"Homicide was that way. If you didn't have one of their big white hats on, they didn't even want you in the office. Here they were solving this case...here they had arrested a suspect (Oswald) in one day and cleared up the murder of a President in one day...They didn't want to have to look for anybody else and they didn't even want to know about it really. They wanted to clear up the case."

Tilson was never contacted by either the Warren Commission or the House Select Committee on Assassinations.

Crossfire: Was Jack Ruby at the Scene of the Assassination?

Willis, who knew Jack Ruby by sight at the time of the assassination, still claims to have seen and photographed Ruby minutes after the shooting, standing near the front of the Texas School Book Depository. In publishing Willis's series of assassination photos, the Warren Commission cropped the face of the Ruby figure out of the picture.

Then there's the story told by a Texas hoodlum who spent time in prison. In an interview with researcher Gary Shaw, this man said he was in the office of R.D. Matthews about noon on November 22, 1963. He said Jack Ruby rushed into Matthews' bail bond office and said something like, "Let's go on over to Dealey Plaza and watch the fireworks." According to this convict, Ruby and Matthews rushed off.

Was Jack Ruby at the scene of the assassination? The Warren Commission established that Ruby was in the offices of the "Dallas Morning News" at the time of the shooting. The Commission stated that Ruby arrived at the newspaper between 11 and 11:30 a.m. (Some 30 minutes after the incident at the Triple Underpass involving Julia Ann Mercer). The Commission also determined that Ruby was with newspaper advertising employee Don Campbell until Campbell left for lunch about 12:25 p.m. 12:45 p.m. Ruby was reportedly seen by another advertising employee, John Newnam, in the same spot Campbell had left him. However, Newnam and other newspaper employees said once word came that Kennedy had been shot (probably no sooner than 12:45 p.m. and from employees who had been in Dealey Plaza returning to work), "confusion reigned" in the newspaper offices.

Employee Wanda Walker even today recalls vividly how Ruby sat quietly in the near-empty newspaper office that noontime. Walker told researchers in 1986:

"The other secretary had gone to lunch and the ad salesmen were all gone and it was just me and Ruby up there. He was waiting for his regular ad man. He did an odd thing. I knew who he was, but we had never talked. But he got up and came over and sat by the desk where I was. It was like he didn't want to be alone. He said some things but I can't tell you what they were. Then some people started coming back in and they said the President had been shot. Jack Ruby got white as a sheet. I mean he was really shaken up."

Despite Walker's certainty that Ruby remained at the newspaper office during the time of the assassination, it is possible that Ruby could have slipped away for a few minutes. No one was keeping exact times and the "Dallas Morning News" offices are only one-block from Dealey Plaza. It is conceivable that Ruby could have left the newspaper offices, been in Dealey Plaza and returned unnoticed within the space of 10 or 15 minutes.

In 1964 newsman Seth Kantor reported meeting and talking with Ruby at Parkland Hospital about 1:30 p.m. on November 22, 1963. This was supported by radio newsman Roy Stamps, also an acquaintance of Ruby's, who told this author he saw Ruby enter Parkland about 1:30 p.m. carrying some equipment for a television crew.

According to the Warren Commission, Ruby "firmly denied going to Parkland..." and "Video tapes of the scene at Parkland do not show Ruby there..." and so the Commission concluded "Kantor probably did not see Ruby at Parkland Hospital..."

The House Select Committee on Assassinations, in reviewing the evidence that Ruby was at Parkland Hospital an hour or so after the assassination, concluded:

"While the Warren Commission concluded Kantor was mistaken (about seeing Ruby at Parkland), the Committee determined he probably was not."

So, if Ruby lied and the Warren Commission was wrong about Ruby's presence at Parkland, it is certainly possible that Ruby may have made his way - no matter how briefly - to the scene of the assassination.

Back in Dealey Plaza, while Sam Holland and other railroad workers were finding evidence of men waiting behind the picket fence and Jean Hill was being taken by Secret Service agents to the Sheriff's office, Sheriff's Deputy Roger Craig thought he saw a suspect flee in a station wagon.

Crossfire: The Strange Saga of Roger Craig

In 1963 Roger Dean Craig was an ambitious young deputy sheriff who was going places. Having run away from his Wisconsin home at age 12, Craig had received a high school diploma on his own and had served honorably in the U.S. Army. By 1959 he had married and taken a job as a Sheriff's deputy in Dallas. Craig already had received four promotions within the Dallas County Sheriff's Department and in 1960 had been named Officer of the Year by the Dallas Traffic Commission. But then came November 22, 1963.

Craig's account of his experiences that day caused considerable problems for the official version of the assassination's aftermath. He later recounted that about 10:30 a.m. that morning, Sheriff Bill Decker called plainclothes men, detectives and warrant men into his office and told them that President Kennedy was coming to Dallas and that the motorcade would come down Main Street. According to Craig, Decker then advised his employees to stand out in front of the building but to take no part whatsoever in the security of the motorcade. Craig later said the crowd of deputies was hostile. "The men about me felt they were being forced to acknowledge Kennedy's presence," he said, adding the deputies voiced "bitter verbal attacks on President Kennedy." Craig said:

"They spoke very strongly against his policies concerning the Bay of Pigs incident and the Cuban Missile Crisis and they seemed to resent very much the fact that Kennedy was a Catholic."

Craig said just after the motorcade turned on Elm Street, he heard a shot and began running toward Dealey Plaza. He ran down the grassy incline between Main and Elm Street and saw a Dallas police officer run up the Grassy Knoll and go behind the picket fence near the railroad yards. Craig followed, noting "complete confusion and hysteria" behind the fence. He began to question people when he noticed a woman in her early 30s attempting to drive out of the parking lot. Craig recalled:

"I stopped her, identified myself and placed her under arrest....This parking lot was leased by Dallas Deputy Sheriff B.D. Gossett. He, in turn, rented parking space by the month to the deputies who worked in the court house, except for official vehicles. I rented one of these spaces...I paid Gossett $3 a month and was given a key to the lot. An interesting point is that...the only people having access to it were deputies with keys...How did this woman gain access and, what is more important, who was she and why did she have to leave? I turned her over to Deputy Sheriff C.L. "Lummie" Lewis and...(he) told me that he would take her to Sheriff Decker and take care of her car....I had no way of knowing that an officer with whom I had worked for four years was capable of losing a 30-year-old woman and a 3,000-pound automobile. To this day, Officer Lewis does not know who she was, where she came from or what happened to her. Strange!"

Meanwhile, Craig questioned people who were standing at the top of the Grassy Knoll, including Mr. and Mrs. Arnold Rowland (See THE CROWD). Craig said by approximately 12:40 p.m. he had turned the Rowlands over to "Lummie" Lewis and met E.R. "Buddy" Walthers back on the south side of Elm Street where "several officers and bystanders were looking at the curb on Elm Street where a nick caused by a bullet was reported to have hit." He said his attention was attracted by a shrill whistle. In his report of November 23, 1963, Craig wrote:

"...I turned around and saw a white male running down the hill from the direction of the Texas School Book Depository Building and I saw what I think was a light-colored Rambler station wagon with luggage rack on top pull over to the curb and this subject who had come running down the hill get into this car. The man driving this station wagon was a dark-complected white male. I tried to get across Elm Street to stop the car and talk with subjects, but the traffic was so heavy I could not make it. I reported this incident at once to a Secret Service officer, whose name I do not know, then I left this area and went at once to the (Depository) building and assisted in the search of the building. Later that afternoon, I heard that the city had a suspect in custody and I called and reported the information about the suspect running down the hill and getting into a car to Captain (Will) Fritz and was required to come at once to City Hall. I went to City Hall and identified the subject they had in custody as being the same person I saw running down this hill and get into the station wagon and leave the scene."

Craig later described the driver of the station wagon as a "very dark complected" man with short, dark hair wearing a white windbreaker-type short jacket. (Recall the witnesses who told of a dark man or Negro on the sixth floor of the Depository just before Kennedy's arrival.) Craig said since the two men were the only ones he saw trying to flee the scene, he believed the incident "important enough to bring to the attention of the authorities at a command post which had been set up in front of the Texas School Book Depository."

Here Craig may have had a brush with one of the bogus Secret Service men. Craig later said he approached the front of the Depository and asked for someone involved in the investigation. He said a man in a gray suit told him, "I'm with the Secret Service" and listened to Craig's report on assassination witnesses. Craig later recalled:

"He showed little interest in the persons leaving (the scene). However, he seemed extremely interested in the description of the Rambler (station wagon). This was the only part of my statement which he wrote down in his little pad he was holding."

On April 1, 1964, Craig described his confrontation with Lee Harvey Oswald at Dallas Police headquarters to the Warren Commission:

"I drove up to Fritz' office about, oh, after five - about 5:30 or something like that -and - uh - talked to Captain Fritz and told him what I had saw. And he took me in his office - I believe it was his office - it was a little office, and had the suspect sitting in a chair behind a desk - beside the desk....And Captain Fritz asked me was this the man I saw -and I said, "Yes" it was....Captain Fritz then asked him about the - uh - he said, "What about this station wagon?" And the suspect (Oswald) interrupted him and said, "That station wagon belongs to Mrs. Paine...Don't try to tie her into this. She had nothing to do with it."...Captain Fritz then told him..."All we're trying to do is find out what happened and this man saw you leave from the scene." And the suspect again interrupted Captain Fritz and said, "I told you people I did." ...Then he continued and he said, "Everybody will know who I am now.""

In later years Craig said Oswald made the last statement in a dejected and dispirited tone, almost as if "his cover had been blown." This was all explosive testimony since Oswald officially acted alone and made his way home that day by bus and by taxi. Therefore the Warren Commission stated it "could not accept important elements of Craig's testimony." It even went further suggesting that the meeting between Craig and Oswald never occurred. According to the Warren Commission Report:

"Captain Fritz stated that a deputy sheriff whom he could not identify did ask to see him that afternoon and told him a similar story to Craig's. Fritz did not bring him into his office to identify Oswald but turned him over to Lieutenant Baker for questioning. If Craig saw Oswald that afternoon, he saw him through the glass windows of the office."

The truth of whether or not Craig was in Fritz' office came in 1969 with the publication of a book by Dallas Police Chief Jesse Curry. On page 72 is a photograph captioned, "The Homicide Bureau Office under guard while Oswald was being interrogated." In the photograph, well inside the homicide office, stands Deputy Sheriff Roger Craig.

Craig also pointed out to Warren Commission attorneys that he had learned that Mrs. Ruth Paine, with whom Oswald's wife Marina was living, indeed owned a light green Nash Rambler station wagon.

His insistence on sticking with his story despite repeated attempts by authorities to have both Craig and Arnold Rowland change their testimony, began to cause problems for Craig within the Sheriff's Department. Initially, Sheriff Decker backed Craig, calling him "completely honest." But later, Craig's credibility began to slip within the department and on July 4, 1967, he was fired by Decker. Some say the cause was laxity and improprieties in his work, while others say it was due to his unyielding position on the assassination.

In recent years there seems to be growing corroboration for Craig's story. First, a photograph taken in Dealey Plaza minutes after the assassination, shows Craig in the exact locations as he described. There are even two photos of a Nash Rambler station wagon moving west on Elm. In later years, researchers discovered Warren Commission Document 5, independent corroboration of Craig's story which was not published in the Commission's 26 volumes. In this document, an FBI report dated the day after the assassination, Marvin C. Robinson reported he had just past Houston Street driving west on Elm Street in heavy traffic when saw a light-colored Nash station wagon stop in front of the Texas School Book Depository and a white man walk down the grassy incline and get into the vehicle, which drove west. This is further evidence of the deceptive lengths to which the Warren Commission went trying to suppress any evidence which failed to fit its preconceived scenario (See THE WARREN COMMISSION). In later years, Roger Craig - though vindicated in the controversy over his assassination testimony - continued to live with hard luck. His wife left him - some say due to pressure over his involvement in the assassination - and his back was injured in a car accident. He claimed to have been the object of murder attempts.

On May 15, 1975, Roger Craig, then only 39 years old, was killed by a rifle bullet. The verdict was suicide.

Crossfire: The Three Tramps

Within an hour of the assassination, Dallas Police Sergeant D.V. Harkness had an encounter with three strange fellows, whom many researchers believe may have been involved in the shooting.

Union Pacific Railroad dispatcher Lee Bowers (See THE GRASSY KNOLL) saw three men sneak into an empty railroad car in the train yards just behind the Texas School Book Depository a short time after the assassination. Bowers ordered the train stopped by radio and then summoned Dallas police. Several officers, including Harkness, roused the trio from the rail car at gun point and marched them to the Dallas County Sheriff's office. Their route took them past the Depository and across the eastern portion of Dealey Plaza. At least three news photographers took pictures of the three men as they were marched through the plaza under guard. These photographs are the only proof that this incident even occurred.

For once in the Sheriff's custody, the men officially disappeared. Although reportedly transferred later to the Dallas Police Station, they were never booked and any names, information or fingerprints that were taken have never been made public.

The House Subcommittee on Government Information and Individual Rights discovered in 1975 that Dallas Police arrest records for November 22, 1963, compiled for the Warren Commission, were missing.

These three men remain among those persons which the FBI failed to identify and who were on the scene near the time of the assassination.

But were these "tramps" actually near the assassination site at the time of the shooting? In 1981 Kent Biffle, a reporter for "The Dallas Morning News" wrote an article telling of his experiences that day. Biffle wrote:

"Everyone was pointing toward a fence that connected with the Underpass....I ran that way. Some teenagers followed. One of them darted ahead and hit the fence before I did....Puffing, I followed him. The other side of the fence revealed no gunman. There was just a maze of railroad tracks and three dazed winos. "What happened?" I asked one. "What happened?" he asked me. People were still climbing over the fence. I ran east toward the Texas School Book Depository."

Were these three "dazed winos" the same three men later apprehended?

For more than 20 years the identities of the three men has been the object of speculation among assassination researchers. Although labeled "tramps," photos show the men had recent haircuts, shined shoes and old, but unsoiled, clothing. In the photographs they hardly appear to be genuine tramps or winos.

In 1976 the three "tramps" drew national attention when comedian/social activist Dick Gregory and others claimed that two of the men were none other than Watergate conspirators E. Howard Hunt and Frank Sturgis. This allegation was quickly, though not conclusively, dismissed. (In the summer of 1985, E. Howard Hunt lost a libel court case based on a national article which claimed that CIA documents indicated Hunt was in Dallas the day of the assassination.)

After the 1980 arrest of convicted assassin Charles V. Harrelson, researchers took a fresh look at the "tramps," particularly the younger of the trio. Many researchers now believe the tallest "tramp" may indeed be sitting in a Texas jail today.

Crossfire: Role of Hitman Harrelson

Of all the people who have confessed to participating in the JFK assassination, convicted Texas hitman Charles V. Harrelson appears to have the most independent evidence to back up his claim. Aside from being twice convicted of murder for hire, Harrelson has a long history of involvement with Dallas underworld characters linked directly to Jack Ruby. This incredible connection first came to the attention of JFK researchers when Harrelson was arrested near Van Horn, Texas, Sept. 1, 1980. He had been identified as a suspect in the death of Federal Judge John Wood of San Antonio Wood, who was shot from ambush by a high-powered rifle. High on cocaine (well-known for loosening the inhibitions) and pointing a pistol to his head, Harrelson held lawmen at bay for six hours. During this time, according to the arresting officers, he not only confessed to the Judge Wood killing, but also claimed he participated in the Kennedy assassination. This statement, repeated in some Texas newspapers, sent assassination researchers searching their files for confirmation.

Researcher Gary Mack already had noticed the resemblance of Harrelson to the youngest tramp. This search led to a review of the strange story of three "tramps" arrested near Dealey Plaza.

Harrelson was 47 years old in 1985, making him 25 at the time of the assassination. This corresponds with the age of the youngest "tramp," who was thought to have been between 25 and 30 years old.

In June 1981, Harrelson was interviewed by Chuck Cook, then a reporter for the Dallas Morning News. In a telephone interview with this author, Cook recalled:

"Because of his statements during his arrest, I felt obligated to ask him about that. I asked about the Kennedy assassination and he got this sly grin on his face. Harrelson is very intelligent and has a way of not answering when it suits him."

Cook said at a later interview he again brought the subject up and that Harrelson became very serious. Cook quoted Harrelson as saying:

"Listen, if and when I get out of here and feel free to talk, I will have something that will be the biggest story you ever had."

Cook said when he asked what that story would be, Harrelson would only reply:

"November 22, 1963. You remember that!"

Intrigued with the possibilities, Cook said he later showed photographs of the three "tramps" to Harrelson's wife, Jo Ann Harrelson, who "was amazed at the similarities." Cook added:

"Then I gave the photos to one of Harrelson's attorneys and he was supposed to show them to Harrelson. But that's the last I heard of it. He didn't want to talk about it because he felt his jail cell was bugged, and rightly so."

It was later revealed that Harrelson's jail conversations were indeed being monitored.

In an interview with Dallas TV newsman Quin Mathews, Harrelson offered further comments on the Kennedy assassination.

"You said you'd killed President Kennedy?" commented Matthews.

Harrelson replied:

"At the same time I said I killed the judge, I said I had killed Kennedy, which might give you an idea as to the state of my mind at the time...It was an effort to elongate my life...Well, do you believe Lee Harvey Oswald killed President Kennedy alone, without any aid from a rogue agency of the U.S. Government or at least a portion of that agency? I believe you are very naive if you do."

Fort Worth graphics expert Jack White, who testified before the House Select Committee on Assassinations, is convinced that Harrelson is the youngest of the three "tramps."

White told this author:

"I have done various photographic comparison tests and everything matches...the hair, the nose, the ear, the profile. It's Harrelson."

But over and above the comparisons of Harrelson's photograph with that of the younger "tramp," further evidence indicates Harrelson very well may have played a role in the assassination. When arrested, Harrelson was carrying the business card of R.D. Matthews. In subsequent interviews, Harrelson admitted to being close friends of Matthews. In fact, Harrelson said he looked up to Matthews as a father. Russell Douglas Matthews, a former Dallas underworld character, is mentioned in the Warren Report as a "passing acquaintance" of Jack Ruby and obliquely connects him with a Ruby-backed jeep sale to Cuba in 1959. The House Select Committee on Assassinations indicated his relationship with Ruby was more than "passing" and described Matthews as a man "actively engaged in criminal activity since the 1940s." The Committee also documented Matthews' connections to Dallas gamblers Lewis McWillie (close friend to the Kirkwoods of Fort Worth - See G-MEN) and Benny Binion - all closely acquainted with Ruby. The Committee further developed evidence that Matthews was in contact with associates of Florida crime chieftain Santos Trafficante (See MOBSTERS). Matthews was linked by the Committee to Texas underworld characters such as Hollis de Lois Green, Jettie Bass, Nick Cascio and James Todd, all acquaintances of Harrelson's. In a strange sidelight, Matthews was best man at the wedding of a Dallas underworld character named George McGann to Beverly Oliver. Oliver, a friend to both Ruby and several of his employees, was in Dealey Plaza filming the Kennedy motorcade at the time of the assassination and became known as the "Babushka Lady" to researchers. (See THE CROWD)

The former chief counsel of the House Committee, G. Robert Blakey, in his book "The Plot to Kill the President," reiterated the Committee's findings that Kennedy was assassinated as the result of a conspiracy and that more than one gunman was involved. Then Blakey went even further, stating that evidence compiled by the committee indicated that organized crime played a major part in that conspiracy.

If organized crime in Dallas was involved - and Ruby's role would seem to justify that conclusion - then the entire spectrum of the Dallas underworld become suspect. And we come back to young Charles Harrelson.

But there is evidence that Harrelson's contacts went far beyond Dallas police characters. Indicted along with Harrelson in the plot to kill Judge Wood was the brother of reputed New Orleans Crime Boss Carlos Marcello (See MOBSTERS), another of the organized crime figures named by the House Select Committee on Assassinations as possibly involved in the Kennedy assassination conspiracy. And then came the revelation of Harrelson's involvement with criminals connected to intelligence agencies and even the military. In April 1982, Harrelson was identified by Florida law enforcement officials as being a member of a shadowy group of hired gunmen, mercenaries and drug smugglers known as "The Company." "The Company," which according to lawmen took its name from the CIA, involved more than 300 persons, many ex-police or military men. During one criminal trial involving members of the group, federal prosecutors claimed "The Company" owned more than $30 million in assets such as planes, ships and real estate. Federal drug agents said the group imported billions of dollars worth of narcotics from Central and South America as well as conducting gunrunning and mercenary operations. Florida lawmen investigating this group claimed Harrelson was a member and that Jimmy Chagra, the man who allegedly hired Harrelson to kill the judge, also once hired "The Company" for protection.

Oddly enough, the very day that Harrelson was formally charged with the Judge Wood assassination - April 16, 1982 - a Dallas news reporter and a JFK assassination researcher were scheduled to meet with Harrelson to discuss his role in the Kennedy murder. Although Harrelson had been jailed for more than a year and a half, when the formal charges were filed, all visits to him were canceled.

JFK researcher and author J. Gary Shaw claimed:

"I feel this was done at that particular time to prevent Harrelson from revealing what he knows."

During Harrelson's trial, Joe Chagra, brother of Jimmy, testified that Harrelson got the Wood contract after telling his brother that he had participated in the JFK assassination. (Researchers find it most revealing that a man reputed to be a high-ranking mobster by Government agents should hire Harrelson on this claim rather than boot him out of his office - since everyone had been told the assassination was caused by only a lone nut.)

According to researcher Jack White, a national periodical became convinced that Harrelson was one of the three "tramps" after an anthropological scientist stated comparisons between the "hit man" and photos of the young "tramp" were virtually identical. However, the story was dropped after Harrelson denied any involvement and reportedly passed a lie detector test administered by a man with Government connections.

Harrelson, now serving a life sentence after being convicted of the Wood assassination, has not been interviewed recently about his role in Dallas, so researchers are left only with his cryptic reminder:

"November 22, 1963. You remember that!"

###

The "three tramps" were not the only persons arrested on the day of the assassination. More than a dozen people were taken into custody and it will forever remain puzzling that few records were kept on any of them. It seems that once Oswald was captured, the authorities totally lost interest in anyone else -strong evidence for showing how quickly and how effectively the "lone assassin" theory was accepted.

A Catholic priest told this author of observing a young man in a three-piece suit wearing gloves being arrested and escorted from the Texas School Book Depository to the Dallas Sheriff's office. He said he overheard the arresting officers say, "Well, we got one of them." There is no record of such an arrest.

Assassination witness Phil Willis told researchers that shortly after the shooting, police escorted a man in a black leather jacket and black gloves from the Dal-Tex Building - which lies directly east of the Depository and the building several researchers believe shots may have come from. Again, there is no record of such an arrest. This man may have been Larry Florer who was arrested in the Dal-Tex Building. In a statement to authorities, Florer said he tried use the telephone in the Dal-Tex Building but found they were all busy. He was taken into custody as he tried to leave the building.

Another man arrested in the Dal-Tex Building was a Mafia-connected police character with a record of more than 30 arrests.

Crossfire: The Mafia Man in Dealey Plaza

Moments after the assassination, an elevator operator in the Dal-Tex Building - located directly across Houston Street from the Texas School Book Depository - noticed a man he did not recognize. The operator summoned Deputy Sheriff C.L. "Lummie" Lewis, who arrested the man. He identified himself as Jim Braden. Taken to the Sheriff's office for questioning, Braden said he was visiting Dallas on oil business and was staying at the Cabana Motel (a motor inn built with Teamster money) on Stemmons Expressway. He said he had entered the Dal-Tex Building to use the telephone when he was taken into custody. With no information to the contrary, authorities released Braden three hours later. It was an unfortunate decision.

What is now known is that Braden had recently legally changed his name from Eugene Hale Brading. If the authorities had obtained that name on November 22, 1963, there perhaps would have been more interest in the man. Braden/Brading was a man with a police record stretching back to 1934 for such crimes as burglary, embezzlement, mail fraud and conspiracy, including several arrests in Dallas. His story, which had been pieced together over the years by a variety of researchers and newsmen, indicates this man may have been more deeply involved in the assassination than first suspected. On parole for mail fraud and interstate transportation of stolen property, Braden had informed his parole officer that he would be in Dallas from November 21 to 25, 1963.

He said on November 21, 1963, he visited the offices of Texas oilman H.L. Hunt to meet with Hunt's son, Lamar Hunt. Interestingly, Jack Ruby also was at the Hunt offices about that same time, ostensibly to help a young woman get a job. (Both Braden and Ruby denied these visits although it has been verified by more than one office worker.) And Brading, along with ex-convict Morgan Brown, was staying at the Cabana Motel, the same motel visited by Ruby the night of November 21. Furthermore, in a book entitled "Legacy of Doubt," CBS newsmen Peter Noyes documented Braden's connections to a number of underworld figures, including Meyer Lansky (See MOBSTERS). Apparently Braden was known as a Mafia courier. Most sinister of all, Braden may have been in contact with the New Orleans Mafia-CIA man, David Ferrie, Lee Harvey Oswald's former Civil Air Patrol leader (See OSWALD). Noyes found that in the weeks immediately preceding the assassination, Braden was in and out of Room 1701 of the Pere Marquette Building in New Orleans, just down the hall from Room 1707 where Ferrie was working for an attorney of Mafia boss Carlos Marcello (See MOBSTERS).

Another fascinating connection between Braden and the assassination concerns two New York businessmen, Lawrence and Edward Meyers. Lawrence Meyers was a personal friend of Jack Ruby. On November 20-21, 1963, Meyers also was staying at the Cabana Motel in Dallas. While in Dallas, Meyers told the FBI he was with Jean West, a "rather dumb, but accommodating broad." Edward Meyers was in Dallas to attend the Pepsi-Cola bottlers convention - the same convention attended by Richard Nixon. Both brothers were visited by Jack Ruby briefly at the Cabana Motel on the night of November 21 - the same night Braden was at the same motel. While no direct connections between this group and Ferrie in New Orleans can be made at this time, it is fascinating to note that when New Orleans District Attorney Jim Garrison began looking at long-distance telephone calls for David Ferrie he discovered something - the same day Oswald left New Orleans for his reported trip to Mexico City, Ferrie called a number in Chicago which belonged to Jean Aase West, Meyer's friend.

In Warren Commission Exhibit 2350 - a listing of telephone calls made by Lawrence Meyers in November 1963 - it was found that same day he too called the Chicago number of Jean West, the woman who accompanied him to Dallas. So while not conclusively documented, there are at least possible connections between Jack Ruby and David Ferrie via Meyers/West and Braden.

Meyers also told the Warren Commission that his friend Ruby had called him the night before shooting Oswald. The next day, upon hearing the news that Ruby shot Oswald, Meyers decided not to contact Dallas Police because "in light of the apparent hectic activities then ensuing at the police station, it would be better if he did not do so."

All of this occurred in the context of Braden's visit to Dallas. The House Select Committee on Assassinations tried to sort out the truth of Braden's visit as well as his contacts, to little avail. First, Braden said he made the trip to Dallas from California and met with a Dallas parole officer at the moment of the assassination. However, the parole officer could not recall such a meeting - If Braden had not notified his parole office that he was leaving California, he would have been in violation of parole and subject to arrest. He told the Committee he walked as far as the Dal-Tex Building in an effort to find a telephone so he could call his mother and tell her about the assassination. He denied he ever was in Dealey Plaza. However, due to statements made while in custody and the fact that Braden has definitely been identified in Dealey Plaza photographs, it is now widely accepted that Braden was among the spectators gathered in Dealey Plaza minutes after the shooting. This fact alone - that a known felon with many ties to both Mafia figures, New Orleans and Jack Ruby would be hanging around Dealey Plaza just after Kennedy's death - creates deep suspicion about the immediate Dallas investigation and, even more particularly, the subsequent federal investigation.

This suspicion is heightened in light of the fact that in 1976, the National Archives revealed that at least two documents relating to the Braden arrest were missing.

Crossfire: Odd Arrests

One of the oddest arrests that day was only reported in a Dallas newspaper. The November 22, 1963, edition of the "Dallas Times Herald" reported that a policeman arrested a man wearing horn-rimmed glasses, a plaid coat and a rain coat after Depository employees pointed to him from a third-floor window. The news account said the man was taken under protest to the Sheriff's Department, while members of the crowd shouted, "I hope you die!" and "I hope you burn!" Three weeks later, the same newspaper reported that "an early suspect in the assassination of President Kennedy was still in jail - but no longer a suspect in the killing." This account said the man was arrested minutes after the assassination after police swarmed into the railroads yards where "a man was reported seen in that area carrying a rifle." The story said the still-unidentified man was being held on "city charges."

Who was this man and what, if anything, did he know about the assassination? No further mention was made of this fellow since, apparently, no interest was taken in him by federal authorities.

A man was even arrested in nearby Fort Worth after a "Mrs. Cunningham" called the Grand Prairie Police and told them that a car with license number DT-4857 had been involved in the assassination and was en route to Ranger, Texas. This car was stopped in Fort Worth and the driver - who looked a great deal like Oswald - was arrested. He was later released after Oswald's arrest. There is no indication that the FBI or Warren Commission ever attempted to locate or further identify "Mrs. Cunningham."

Another odd arrest - that of Jack Lawrence - deserves serious study. Lawrence was arrested late on the afternoon of November 22, 1963 after his actions caused suspicions among his co-workers at Downtown Lincoln-Mercury, located two blocks west of Dealey Plaza. He had obtained a job as a car salesman at the dealership just one month before the assassination with job references from New Orleans which later were discovered to be phony. Lawrence never sold a car and on the day before the assassination, he had borrowed one of the firm's car, after telling his boss he had a "heavy date." On Friday, November 22, Lawrence failed to show up for work. However, about 30 minutes after the assassination, he came hustling through the company's show room, pale and sweating with mud on his clothes. He rushed into the men's room and threw up. He told co-workers he had been ill that morning, tried to drive the car back to the dealership but had to park it due to the heavy traffic. Later, employees found the car parked behind the wooden picket fence on top of the Grassy Knoll overlooking Dealey Plaza. His activities were so suspicious that employees called police, who picked up Lawrence that evening.

Lawrence, who reportedly was an expert marksman in the Air Force, left Dallas after being released the next day. His present whereabouts are unknown.

Of course, the most prominent arrest of that day was when Dallas Police nabbed Lee Harvey Oswald less than an hour and a half after the assassination.

But such rapid police action was precipitated by yet another tragic incident - the slaying of Dallas Policeman J.D. Tippit.

Crossfire: The Shooting of J. D. Tippit

Of all the aspects of the Kennedy assassination, the shooting of Dallas Policeman Jefferson Davis Tippit has received less attention than most others.

Allegedly, Tippit was shot down while attempting to arrest Lee Harvey Oswald 45 minutes after the assassination in Oak Cliff, south of downtown Dallas. And it was the slaying of this policeman which led to the arrest of Lee Harvey Oswald and, in many ways, became a cornerstone of the case for Oswald's guilt - Warren Commission Attorney David Belin called the shooting the "Rosetta Stone" to the JFK assassination. "After all," stated the conventional wisdom of 1963-64, "Oswald killed that policeman. Why would he do that if he hadn't killed the President?" Yet today there is a growing body of evidence to suggest that Oswald did not kill Tippit -which, if true, destroys the argument above.

Little is known about Tippit or his life and personal contacts. This absence of information prompted researcher Sylvia Meagher to write:

"Tippit, the policeman and the man, is a one-dimensional and insubstantial figure - unknown and unknowable. The (Warren) Commission was not interested in Tippit's life, and apparently interested in his death only to the extent that it could be ascribed to Oswald, despite massive defects in the evidence against him."

With no real knowledge of Tippit's background or associations and with a number of problems with several aspects of the evidence, the Warren Commission nevertheless concluded that Oswald was his killer based on four primary pieces of evidence.

1. Two witnesses who saw the shooting and seven who saw a man fleeing "positively identified Lee Harvey Oswald as the man they saw fire the shots or flee from the scene."

The chief witness for the Warren Commission was Helen Markham, whose credibility, even at the time of the Commission, was strained to the breaking point. Markham claimed to have talked for some time with the dying Tippit, yet medical authorities said he was killed instantly. She said she saw Tippit's killer talk with the policeman through his patrol car's right hand window, although pictures taken at the scene show that window was shut. She was in hysterics at the time and even left her shoes on top of Tippit's car. Later, in her testimony before the Warren Commission, Markham stated six times she did not recognize anyone in the police lineup that evening, before Commission Attorney Joseph Ball prompted, "Was there a Number two man in there?" Markham responded:

"Number two is the one I picked...When I saw this man I wasn't sure, but I had cold chills just run all over me..."

Furthermore, other witnesses at the scene - William Scoggins, Ted Calloway and Emory Austin - even today claim they never saw Mrs. Markham in the minutes immediately following the shooting.

Cabdriver Scoggins also identified Oswald that day, although Scoggins admitted he did not actually witness the shooting and his view of the fleeing killer was obscured because he ducked down behind his cab as the man came by. Scoggins and cabdriver William Whaley, who allegedly drove Oswald home that day, both viewed a Dallas police lineup composed of five "young teenagers" and Oswald. Whaley told the Warren Commission:

"...you could have picked (Oswald) out without identifying him by just listening to him because he was bawling out the policemen, telling them it wasn't right to put him in line with these teenagers....He showed no respect for the policemen, he told them what he thought about them...they were trying to railroad him and he wanted his lawyer...Anybody who wasn't sure could have picked out the right one just for that..."

If his protestations weren't enough to guide the witnesses in their identification of Oswald, the suspect had conspicuous bruises and a black eye. Furthermore, Oswald stated he was asked and gave his correct name and place of employment. By Friday evening, everyone in Dallas who attended the police lineups had heard that shots were fired from the Texas School Book Depository.

On Saturday, Scoggins again identified Oswald, although in his Warren Commission testimony he admitted seeing Oswald's photograph in a morning paper prior to viewing the police lineup.

His identification of Oswald fell further into disrepute when he told the Commission that after the lineup, an FBI or Secret Service agent showed him several pictures of men, which Scoggins narrowed down to two.

Scoggins recalled:

"...I told them one of these two pictures is him (Oswald)...and then he told me the other one was Oswald."

These were the two star government witnesses. Other witnesses, including Domingo Benavides - the person closest to the killing - were never asked to view a lineup nor were they able to identify Oswald as the killer.

Several other witnesses, including Acquilla Clemons, who claimed two men were involved in the Tippit shooting but said she was threatened into silence by a man with a gun, were never questioned by federal investigators. The Warren Commission even denied her existence, claiming:

"The only woman among the witnesses to the slaying of Tippit known to the Commission is Helen Markham."

Markham reportedly initially said that Tippit's killer was short and stocky with bushy hair. This is the same description given by Clemons who in a filmed interview said the killer was "kind of a short guy...kind of heavy." Markham later denied giving this description.

Frank Wright lived near the scene of the Tippit shooting. He heard shots and ran outside. In an interview with private researchers less than a year later, Wright said he saw Tippit roll over once and lie still. He added:

"I saw a man standing in front of the car. He was looking toward the man on the ground....He had on a long coat. It ended just above his hands. I didn't see any gun. He ran around on the passenger side of the police car. He ran as fast as he could go, and he got into his car. His car was a little gray old coupe. It was about a 1950-51, maybe a Plymouth. It was a gray car, parked on the same side of the street as the police car, but beyond it from me. It was heading away from me. He got in that car and he drove away as fast as you could see...After that a whole lot of police came up. I tried to tell two or three people what I saw. They didn't pay any attention. I've seen what came out on television and in the newspaper, but I know that's not what happened."

Another witness was Warren Reynolds who chased Tippit's killer. He too failed to identify Oswald as Tippit's killer until after he was shot in the head two months later. After recovering, Reynolds identified Oswald to the Warren Commission. (A suspect was arrested in the Reynolds shooting, but released when a former Jack Ruby stripper named Betty Mooney MacDonald provided an alibi. One week after her word released the suspect, MacDonald was arrested by Dallas Police and a few hours later, was found hanged in her jail cell. Neither the FBI nor the Warren Commission investigated this strange incident.)

2. The cartridge cases found near the Tippit slaying "were fired from the revolver in the possession of Oswald at the time of his arrest, to the exclusion of all other weapons," claimed the Warren Commission.

There are many problems with this evidence. First, Dallas Police Sergeant Gerald Hill, at the time of the Tippit shooting, radioed the police dispatcher, saying:

"The shells at the scene indicate that the suspect is armed with an automatic .38 rather than a pistol."

Oswald reportedly was captured with a .38 Special revolver. There is a significant difference between an automatic, which ejects spent shells onto the ground, and a revolver which requires deliberate emptying of the weapon. These weapons also require different types of ammunition. It was the belief of other officers at the scene based on the distance from Tippit's body where the shells were found and what some perceived to be ejector scratches on the shells that an automatic weapon was used. If this were so, than Oswald's revolver cannot be blamed for Tippit's death. Then there's the problem of identification of the empty shells. Policeman J.M. Poe received two cartridge cases from witness Benavides at the scene. In an FBI report, Poe firmly stated that he marked the case with his initials, "J.M.P." before turning them over to Dallas Crime Lab personnel. However, on June 12, 1964, the FBI showed Poe the four .38 Special cases used as evidence of Oswald's guilt by the Warren Commission. The Bureau reported:

"...He (Poe) recalled marking these cases before giving them to (lab personnel), but he stated after a thorough examination of the four cartridges shown to him...he cannot locate his marks; therefore, he cannot positively identify any of these cartridges as being the same ones he received from Benavides."

Testifying to the Warren Commission, Poe vacillated, saying he couldn't swear to marking the cases. However, asked to identify the cartridges, Poe also stated:

"I want to say these two are mine, but I couldn't swear to it."

Poe's failure to find his initials on the cases, coupled with the fact that the cases were not turned over to the FBI until six days after other inventoried evidence, leaves many researchers with the suspicion that shell cases from Oswald's revolver were substituted for the ones marked by Poe.

To further confuse the issue, the Warren Commission discovered that the shell cases allegedly recovered at the scene of the shooting do not match up with the slugs which were recovered from Tippit's body. The four cases are made up of two of Winchester-Western manufacture and two of Remington-Peters, while of the bullets removed from Tippit, only one is Remington-Peters and three are from Winchester-Western.

Weakly, the Warren Commission attempted to explain this anomaly by surmising that perhaps a fifth shot had been fired but not recovered (most of the witnesses recalled no more than four shots) or that perhaps Oswald already had an expended Remington-Peters case in his pistol prior to shooting Tippit. The Commission even suggested that perhaps "...to save money...he might have loaded one make of bullet into another make of cartridge case."

This, of course, would require Oswald to own or have access to reloading equipment. It should be pointed out that when arrested, Oswald reportedly was carrying five live Winchester-Western bullets in his pocket in addition to the fully-loaded revolver, which apparently was never tested to determine if it had been fired recently. With this exception, authorities found no other ammunition or gun cleaning materials in any of Oswald's possessions.

3. The Warren Commission determined that the revolver in Oswald's possession at the time of his arrest was purchased by and belonged to him. While this segment of the evidence against Oswald may be true (Some researchers are not convinced that the weapons order signed by A.J. Hidell can conclusively be traced to Oswald), it does not prove that the gun was used to kill Tippit. For instance, even the resources of the FBI failed to prove that the slugs recovered from Tippit's body had been fired from Oswald's pistol.

FBI officials claimed that since the Oswald revolver had been rechambered to accept .38 Special ammunition, the barrel was oversize for the bullet causing inconsistent ballistic markings. Thus, "...consecutive bullets fired in the revolver by the FBI could not even be identified with each other under the microscope," stated the Commission in an appendix to its Report. This statement is most odd, for several firearms experts have told this author that similar .38 Specials do fit the rifling grooves and can be checked ballistically.

If the slugs from Tippit's body cannot be matched to Oswald's revolver, perhaps it is because they did not come from that gun. Adding fuel to this speculation is the statement of Eddie Kinsley, the ambulance attendant who drove the mortally-wounded Tippit to a hospital. In recent years, Kinsley told newsman Earl Golz of an extraneous bullet.

According to Kinsley, as he unloaded Tippit from his ambulance:

"I kicked one of the bullets out of my ambulance that went into his button...onto the parking lot of Methodist Hospital. It didn't go in the body...It fell off the ambulance still in this button."

Since Tippit reportedly was struck by all four bullets fired at him and these slugs were placed in evidence with the Warren Commission, what is the explanation for Kinsley's fifth slug? Kinsley told Golz he had never been questioned by the Warren Commission.

Recent work by Texas researchers indicate that the cases now residing in the National Archives, exhibited by the Warren Commission as the shells used in the Tippit slaying may not have been fired by Oswald's pistol. Oswald's pistol was originally a Military and Police Smith & Wesson 1905 Model .38-caliber revolver, the largest-selling quality revolver ever produced. Originally shipped to England during World War II, more than 88,000 were shipped back to the United States in the late 1950s and early 1960s. The pistol in question, serial number V510210, ended up in California, where it apparently was converted to a .38 Special Model. This involved cutting off the barrel from its original five inches to two-and-a-quarter inches. The Warren Commission said the pistol also was rechambered to accept .38 Special ammunition, although Commission testimony fails to establish this change. The .38 Special bullet is slightly smaller in diameter but has more length than .38 Standard ammunition.

Texas researcher and veteran hunter Larry Howard discovered after buying an exact duplicate of Oswald .38 revolver that .38 Special cartridges, when fired in a rechambered weapon, bulge noticeably in the center. Howard told this author:

"I have checked this with several expert gunsmiths. Since the rechambering cannot change the diameter of the cylinder, but only makes it longer to accept .38 Special ammo, the bullet bulges in the middle when fired. I've done it time after time. My wife can notice the bulge. The case looks like it's pregnant.

Studying the shells depicted in the Warren Commission volumes and also in a close-up clear photograph in the November 1983, commemorative issue of "Life" magazine, it appears to everyone that the shell cases in the National Archives (supposedly the casings found at the scene of Tippit's death) do not show any bulging at all. This indicates to me and other experts that those cases could not have been fired from the .38 Special that was supposed to belong to Oswald."

Until further testing can be done on the cartridge cases in question, this is hardly solid proof of Oswald's innocence in the Tippit shooting. But it is further proof of the wide gaps still open in the case against Oswald.

4. According to the Warren Commission, Oswald's jacket was found along the path of flight taken by Tippit's killer. The Warren Commission wrote:

"...Oswald was seen leaving his roominghouse at about 1 p.m. wearing a zipper jacket...the man who killed Tippit was wearing a light-colored jacket, that he was seen running along Jefferson Boulevard, that a jacket was found under a car in a lot adjoining Jefferson Boulevard...when he was arrested at approximately 1:50 p.m., he was in shirt sleeves. These facts warrant the finding that Lee Harvey Oswald disposed of his jacket as he fled from the scene of the Tippit killing."

But did the facts warrant such a conclusion? Not really, since almost every aspect of the jacket story has since come under question. Oswald, it is known, had only two jackets - one blue and one a lightweight gray zipper jacket. At least two witnesses at the scene of Tippit's slaying reported his killer wore a white jacket. One of these, Helen Markham, was shown Oswald's gray jacket by a Warren Commission attorney who asked, "Did you ever see this before?" Despite having been shown the jacket by the FBI prior to her testimony, Markham replied:

"No, I did not....that jacket is a darker jacket than that, I know it was."

Witness Domingo Benavides was shown a jacket by Commission Attorney David Belin, who said, "I am handing you a jacket which had been marked as 'Commission's Exhibit 163,' and ask you to state whether this bears any similarity to the jacket you saw this man with the gun wearing?" The accommodating Benavides responded:

"I would say this looks just like it..."

The problem here is that Commission's Exhibit 163 is Oswald's dark blue jacket. The gray jacket is Commission's Exhibit 162. Here is yet another example of a witness obligingly providing the answers they felt were wanted.

Another example is cabdriver William Whaley, who reportedly drove Oswald home from downtown Dallas. Whaley identified the gray jacket as the one Oswald was wearing in his cab. Yet the Warren Commission, based on testimony from Oswald's landlady, stated that Oswald put on the jacket AFTER arriving at his lodgings.

Testifying to the Warren Commission, Roberts said:

"He (Oswald) went to his room and he was in his shirt sleeves...and he got a jacket and put it on - it was kind of a zipper jacket. (She then was shown Commission's Exhibit 162, Oswald's gray jacket, and asked if she had seen it before)...Well, maybe I have, but I don't remember it. It seems like the one he put on was darker than that..."

Barbara Davis, another witness at the Tippit slaying, also could not identify Oswald's gray jacket to the Warren Commission. In fact, she stated the killer wore "a dark coat...it looked like it was maybe a wool fabric...more of a sporting jacket."

Cabdriver William Scoggins also failed to identify Oswald's jacket, saying, "I thought it was a little darker."

Despite these problems of identification, the Commission went right on asserting that the jacket belonged to Oswald.

More Commission deception occurred in its reporting of the discovery of the jacket. The Warren Report stated:

"Police Capt. W.R. Westbrook...walked through the parking lot behind the service station and found a light-colored jacket lying under the rear of one of the cars."

However, in his testimony, Westbrook was asked if he found some clothing. He replied:

"Actually, I didn't find it - it was pointed out to me by... some officer..."

According to the Dallas Police Radio log, a "white jacket" was found by "279 (Unknown)" a full 15 minutes before Westbrook arrived on the scene. The Commission made no effort to determine who really found the jacket, if a jacket was actually found or if it was a white jacket which only later was transformed into Oswald's gray jacket. Recently, the owner of the Texaco station where the jacket reportedly was found told Texas researchers that no one - neither the FBI, Dallas police nor the Warren Commission - ever questioned him or his employees about this important piece of evidence. In addition, the jacket identified by federal authorities as belonging to Oswald carried inside a laundry mark "30 030" and a dry-cleaning tag "B ." A full-scale search by the FBI in both Dallas and New Orleans failed to identify any laundry or dry cleaners using those marks. Oswald's wife, Marina, testified she could not recall her husband ever sending his jackets to a cleaning establishment, but that she did recall washing them herself. Further investigation by the FBI turned up no laundry or dry-cleaning tags on any of Oswald's other clothing. Oswald wore size "small" shirts, the jacket is a "medium" size, which adds to the suspicion that it was not his jacket.

With all this, in addition to a broken chain of evidence, the jacket cannot be considered evidence of Oswald's guilt in the killing of Officer Tippit.

Then there is a matter of time and a strange incident at Oswald's lodging. Earlene Roberts, Oswald's landlady, told the Warren Commission she was watching television coverage of the assassination about 1 p.m. when Oswald - who had been registered at the rooming house as O.H. Lee - hurried in and went to his room. She said next a Dallas police car pulled up in front of her house and honked. She explained:

"I had worked for some policemen and sometimes they come by...I just glanced out saw the number (on the car)...It wasn't the police car I knew...and I ignored it...."

She said the police car was directly in front of her home when the driver sounded the horn, like "tit-tit." She said the car then "...just eased on...and they just went around the corner that way." According to Roberts, there were two uniformed policemen in the car, most unusual since daytime patrols in that area of the city were limited to one officer - such as Tippit. She could not recall the number of the car precisely, but said she recalled that the first two numbers of a possible three-digit combination were a "1" and a "0." Tippit was driving car No. 10 that day and Tippit failed to respond to a dispatcher call at the approximate time of the police car incident.

Immediately following the police car episode, Roberts said Oswald came out of his room and left hurriedly, zipping up a jacket. She said he left her house three or four minutes after 1 p.m.

Roberts said she looked out of the window and last saw Oswald standing at a nearby bus stop.

According to the Warren Commission, a man keyed a microphone at 1:16 p.m., saying, "Hello police operator...We've had a shooting here...it's a police officer, somebody shot him." This, of course, referred to Tippit, who lay dead about a mile from Oswald's residence.

The Commission tried to establish that the Tippit shooting occurred moments after 1:15 p.m., hardly enough time to allow Oswald to run from his rooming house to the scene of the Tippit slaying at 10th and Patton. The Commission could not locate even one witness who saw Oswald walking or running between his rooming house and the scene of the Tippit slaying.

This time frame becomes stretched to the breaking point when one considers the Tippit witnesses' testimony.

Even Helen Markham, who was so confused about other matters, was certain of the time because she was on her way to catch her usual 1:12 p.m. bus for work. Asked by a Warren Commission attorney about the time she saw the Tippit shooting, Markham responded:

"I wouldn't be afraid to bet it wasn't six or seven minutes after one."

In this instance, Mrs. Markham's recollection must be correct since another Tippit shooting witness, Jack Tatum, told researchers that Mrs. Markham did not want to remain at the scene because she feared missing her bus for work.

T.F. Bowley, the man who made the call to the police dispatcher, was never called to testify to the Warren Commission. The reason may be that Bowley heard shots, saw Tippit's body lying next to his squad car and looked at his watch. It was 1:10 p.m.

Other witnesses hid at the sound of the shots, afraid the gunman would turn on them. Only after the killer fled, did they venture out. One of the first persons to reach Tippit was Benavides who told the Warren Commission he was in a truck across the street from the shooting.

After hearing only three shots, Benavides said:

"...I sat there for just a few minutes...I thought maybe he (the killer) had lived in there (the house where he last saw the gunman) and I didn't want to get out and rush right up. He might start shooting again....That is when I got out of the truck and walked over to the policeman...The policeman, I believe, was dead when he hit the ground..."

After checking on Tippit, Benavides said he tried to call on the patrol car's radio but got no answer. Another bystander, Bowley, then got in the car and was successful in raising the police dispatcher and reported the shooting. Obviously, several minutes went by between the time of the shooting and 1:16 p.m. when the police radio log recorded the citizen's alert.

This places the actual shooting closer to Bowley's time of 1:10 p.m. - a time frame which rules out the possibility that Oswald could have traveled on foot from his rooming house to the scene of the shooting.

The conversations of police regarding time sequences, orders, discovery of evidence, etc. were recorded on Dallas Police Radio recording equipment. These recordings should have provided accurate times and movement orders - in fact, they were relied on greatly by the Warren Commission and subsequent investigations.

Today there is evidence that the Dallas Police Radio recordings may have been edited. Soon after the assassination, the tapes may have been taken by federal authorities, who certainly have access to the most sophisticated audio equipment. Any police broadcasts not consistent with the lone assassin theory could have been simply edited out and an edited copy returned to Dallas Police for conveyance to the Warren Commission. Is there any evidence that this occurred? Yes. Dr. James Barger, chief acoustic scientist for the House Select Committee on Assassinations, studied the "original" police tapes and discovered a break in the 60-cycle hum background tone. He found two separate tones on the tape, which could only result from copying. Although ignored publicly, the Ramsey Panel, studying the recordings for the National Academy of Science, did suggest in an appendix of its report that "The original Dictabelt could be studied more extensively for possible evidence...of being a copy..."

Researcher Gary Mack reported that in recent years, former Dallas Police Sgt. J.C. Bowles, the radio room supervisor who prepared transcripts for the Warren Commission, stated that a few days after the assassination, federal agents "borrowed" the original police Dictabelt and at the time he was under the impression that they took them to a recording studio in Oklahoma. Like so much of the Warren Commission's evidence, now the Dallas Police radio recordings are open to question.

Another strong argument for Oswald's innocence in the Tippit slaying comes from W.H. "Butch" Burroughs, who on November 22 was manning the concession stand in the Texas Theater. Burroughs told this author that he distinctly recalls selling popcorn to Oswald about 1:15 p.m. -the exact time of the Tippit shooting.

He said he watched the man take his popcorn and sit next to a pregnant woman in the lower floor of the theater. Burroughs said about 20 minutes later police rushed into the theater and dragged the man out. He later recognized media photos of Lee Harvey Oswald as the same man who purchased popcorn.

The House Select Committee on Assassinations supported the Warren Commission's conclusion that Oswald killed Tippit, however, it obliquely indicated that all is not known about the killing.

Committee investigators studied information developed by researcher Larry Harris that Tippit may have been killed as the result of personal problems. They also talked with yet another witness who had not been interviewed by the Warren Commission. Jack Ray Tatum told Committee investigators that Tippit's killer, after shooting the officer from the sidewalk, walked around the patrol car and shot Tippit once in the head at point blank range. Correctly, the Committee wrote:

"This action, which is often encountered in gangland murders and is commonly described as a coup de grace, is more indicative of an execution than an act of defense intended to allow escape or prevent apprehension."

There is a problem with Tatum's story however. Most of the witnesses stated that four shots were fired in succession - with no interval between the shots.

Several serious students of the Tippit incident now believe that his death may have had no connection with the Kennedy assassination. And of the researchers who still believe such a connection exists, few cling to the belief that Oswald was killer. Regardless of who actually killed Officer Tippit, that event was the catalyst which set off a flurry of police activity in Oak Cliff resulting in the arrest of Lee Harvey Oswald.

Prior to his arrest, there were at least two incidents of police obviously seeking a suspect. Sometime after 1 p.m., a number of policemen stormed the Oak Cliff branch of the Dallas Public Library. Unable to locate who they were looking for, they quickly left. Oswald was a frequent visitor to that library. Then shortly before being called to the Texas Theater, the scene of Oswald's arrest, police surrounded a church near the scene of the Tippit slaying in the belief that Tippit's killer had hidden there. However, before they could conduct a search of the building, they were called to the theater.

Crossfire: Oswald Arrest

The arrest of Lee Harvey Oswald outwardly appears straightforward enough in the official reports, but there are some strange aspects when the arrest is viewed from an objective standpoint.

By 1:45 p.m. on November 22, 1963, the President of the United States had been murdered just 80 minutes earlier and only about 30 minutes before, Policeman Tippit was shot down on an Oak Cliff street. Dallas Police were swarming about like angry bees. A report came in to Police dispatchers. It seems a man had slipped into the Texas Theater without paying. Immediately, carloads of officers, including one federal agent and an assistant district attorney, converged on the theater. The report came as the result of a shoestore manager named Johnny Brewer. Brewer was listening to the radio when he learned of the Tippit murder. Hearing police sirens, he looked out the window of his store and saw a man duck into his doorway as a police car went by. Believing this to be suspicious activity, Brewer watched the man continue up the street to the Texas Theater, where he lost sight of him. Moments later, when Brewer asked the theater's ticket seller if she had sold a ticket to anyone, she replied she had not. Entering the theater, Brewer learned that the concession stand operator, W.H. "Butch" Burroughs, had heard the front doors open, but had seen no one enter the theater lobby. Between the theater's front doors and a second set of doors were stairs leading to the balcony. Burroughs was convinced that whoever entered had gone up to the balcony since no one had passed his concession stand. Brewer asked the ticket seller to call police while he and another theater employee unsuccessfully looked for the suspicious man.

The authorities arrived quickly. Several policemen went to the theater's rear exit and waited with drawn guns. Inside, police, including Sergeant Gerald Hill who had commanded the search of the sixth floor of the Texas School Book Depository, turned up the house lights and moved to the front of the theater. Officer M.N. McDonald had come in the rear door and was standing at the side of the movie screen. In an article written the day after the assassination for the Associated Press, McDonald recalled:

"I noticed about 10 to 15 people sitting in the theater and they were spread out good. A man sitting near the front, and I still don't know who it was, tipped me the man I wanted was sitting in the third row from the rear on the ground floor and not in the balcony (as reported to the police dispatcher). I went up the aisle and talked to two people sitting about in the middle. I was crouching low and holding my gun in case any trouble came. I wanted to be ready for it. I walked up the aisle and turned in Oswald's row. We were no more than a foot from each other when he suddenly stood up and raised both hands. "It's all over now," he told me. Then he hit me a pretty good one in the face with his fist. I saw him going for his gun and I grabbed him around the waist. We struggled and fell around the seats for a few seconds and I got my hand on the butt of his pistol. But he had his hand on the trigger. I was pulling the gun toward me and I heard the hammer click. The primer (which detonates the bullet) was dented and it didn't fire...I'm sure glad that shell didn't fire."

McDonald's account of Oswald's gun misfiring was confirmed to the Warren Commission by theater patron John Gibson.

Brewer, in his testimony to the Warren Commission, never mentions speaking to McDonald. In fact, he said he was standing by a rear exit when he was grabbed by a couple of policemen and asked what he was doing there. Brewer told them he was suspicious of a man in the theater. Brewer continued:

"And I and two or three other officers walked out on the stage and I pointed him out, and there were officers coming in from the front of the show...and officers going from the back...I saw this policeman approach Oswald and Oswald stood up and I heard some hollering, I don't know exactly what he said, and this man hit Patrolman McDonald...I didn't know his name (McDonald), but I had seen him quite a few times around Oak Cliff."

Was the sitting man who tipped off McDonald to Oswald's location Johnny Brewer? Apparently not, since Brewer stated he was standing and then on stage with several policemen. Brewer also never mentioned talking to McDonald, whom he said he recognized from around Oak Cliff.

Who then was the man who tipped off McDonald to Oswald's location?

Brewer also told the Commission that as Oswald struggled with police, he heard one of the officers cry:

"Kill the President, will you."

If members of the police department somehow knew that Oswald was an assassination suspect at this time, it is strong evidence that something was going on behind the scenes. The Warren Commission, while not contradicting Brewer's account, nevertheless felt compelled to add:

"It is unlikely that any of the police officers referred to Oswald as a suspect in the assassination."

Another theater patron who witnessed Oswald's arrest made a surprising statement to a Dallas newspaper in 1979 - he believed Jack Ruby was sitting in the movie watching Oswald's predicament.

George J. Applin, one of only two theater patrons questioned by the Warren Commission, told the Warren Commission he was watching the movie when the lights came on and a policeman with a rifle or shotgun began moving down his aisle. Applin said he was sitting in the downstairs middle aisle about six rows from the back when the commotion began. He moved down the aisle to ask what was going on, when a policeman (apparently McDonald) passed him moving toward the rear. Applin then witnessed Oswald's arrest.

At the close of his Warren Commission testimony, Applin said:

"But, there is one thing puzzling me...And I don't even know if it has any bearing on the case, but there was one guy sitting in the back row right where I was standing at, and I said to him, I said, "Buddy, you'd better move. There is a gun." and he says - just sat there. He was back like this. Just like this. Just watching....I don't think he could have seen the show. Just sitting there like this, just looking at me."

Applin told Commission Attorney Joseph Ball twice he didn't know the man, but in 1979, he told a news reporter he recognized the man as Jack Ruby two days later following the Oswald slaying.

Applin told "The Dallas Morning News":

"At the time the Warren Commission had me down there at the Post Office in Dallas to get my statement, I was afraid to give it. I gave everything up to the point of what I gave the police there in town....I'm a pretty nervous guy anyway because I'll tell you what: After I saw that magazine where all those people they said were connected with some of this had come up dead, it just kind of made me keep a low profile....(Jack) Ruby was sitting down, just watching them. And, when Oswald pulled the gun and snapped it at his (McDonald's) head and missed and the darn thing wouldn't fire, that's when I tapped him on the shoulder and told him he had better move because those guns were waving around. He just turned around and looked at me. Then he turned around and started watching them."

Ruby's identity only became known to Applin after his picture was broadcast following Oswald's death.

Yet more questions have been raised by recent statements of concession stand operator Burroughs. In a 1987 interview with this author, Burroughs, who is now an assistant manager at the Texas Theater, reiterated his story of someone slipping in the theater about 1:35 p.m. that day. However, Burroughs claims that it could not have been Oswald because Oswald entered the theater shortly after 1 p.m. Burroughs said Oswald entered only minutes after the feature started, which was exactly at 1 p.m. He said several minutes later, about 1:15 p.m., the man later arrested by police and identified as Oswald came to his concession stand and bought some popcorn. Burroughs said he watched the man enter the ground floor of the theater and sit down next to a pregnant woman. About 20 minutes after this, the incident of the outside doors opening and the arrival of Johnny Brewer occurred. Several minutes after the man - identified by Burroughs as Oswald - took his seat, the pregnant woman got up and went upstairs where the ladies restroom was located, said Burroughs. He said he heard the restroom door close just shortly before Dallas police began rushing into the theater.

Burroughs said:

"I don't know what happened to that woman. I don't know how she got out of the theater. I never saw her again."

The story of Oswald being in the Texas Theater at the time of the Tippit shooting is further supported by Jack Davis, who today hosts "Gospel Music Spotlight" on a Dallas Christian radio station. Davis told this author that on the day of the assassination, he went to the Texas Theater to see the war movies. The 18-year-old Davis found a seat in the right rear section of the theater and recalled seeing the opening credits of the first film, which was only minutes past the 1 p.m. starting time for the feature movie. He said he was somewhat startled by a man who squeezed past him and sat down in the seat next to him. He found it odd that this man would choose the seat adjacent to him in a 900-seat theater with less than 20 patrons in it. Davis said the man didn't say a word but quickly got up and moved across the aisle and took a seat next to another person. Then shortly, the man got up and walked into the theater's lobby. A few minutes later, Davis, whose attention had returned to the movie, vaguely remembered seeing the same man enter the center section of the theater from the far side. About 20 minutes or so after this incident, according to Davis, the house lights came on and when he walked to the lobby to ask why, he saw policemen running in the front door. He recalled:

I was looking for the manager, but I never got to say anything because the policeman all came rushing past me. I did not see what went on in the theater, but I heard some scuffling going on. A few minutes later the police brought out this same man who had sat down next to me. He was shouting, "I protest this police brutality!" Later, of course, I learned that this was Lee Harvey Oswald.

The police manhandled Oswald through the theater's lobby and out to the street where a crowd had gathered. The crowd outside the theater was agitated to hear at least one policeman yell at Oswald, "Kill the President, will you?" Soon crowd members were shouting, "Kill the S.O.B.!"

If Oswald was already in the theater at the time of the Tippit slaying as claimed by Burroughs and Davis, then who slipped in about 1:35 p.m.? Since it can be established that someone was impersonating Oswald in Dallas prior to the assassination (See WAS OSWALD REALLY OSWALD), it can be suggested that someone besides Oswald lured police to the Texas Theater. But, if this were the case, what happened to the man who slipped in without buying a ticket?

Initial police reports stated the suspect was in the theater's balcony, this information perhaps coming from Burroughs belief that the man who sneaked in went upstairs.

The Dallas Police homicide report on Tippit of that day stated:

"Suspect was later arrested in the balcony of the Texas Theater at 231 W. Jefferson."

Was someone else arrested in the Texas Theater? Not according to the official record, however there is now evidence that perhaps another man was taken from the rear of the theater.

Bernard J. Haire owned Bernies Hobby House located two doors east of the Texas Theater on W. Jefferson. On November 22, 1963, Haire, who was unaware of the assassination, saw the street in front of his business fill up with police cars. He went outside and saw a crowd gathered at the Texas Theater but could not see what was happening. Haire was captured in at least one photograph taken at the time Oswald was brought from the theater by police. Walking through his store, Haire went into the alley, which he said was also filled with police cars. Walking toward the theater, Haire was opposite the rear door when police brought a young, white man out. He said the man was dressed in a pullover shirt and slacks and appeared to be flushed as if having been in a struggle. Although Haire was unable to see if the man was handcuffed, he was certainly under the impression that the man was under arrest. Haire watched police put the man in a police car and drive off. For nearly 25 years Haire believed he had witnessed the arrest of Lee Harvey Oswald. He was shocked to discover that Oswald had been handcuffed and brought out the front door of the theater. Today he commented:

"I don't know who I saw arrested."

Neither does anyone else, but it is eloquent testimony that apparently someone other than Oswald led police to the Texas Theater.

###

The arrested Oswald was taken from the Texas Theater shortly before 2 p.m. and driven downtown to police headquarters. He was quickly taken to the third floor office of Captain Will Fritz, the crusty chief of the Homicide Bureau, and placed in a seat in the hallway.

Dallas Detective Gus Rose was already busy interviewing assassination witnesses. He soon took charge of Oswald. Rose recalled:

"I took the man to an interrogation office. I removed his handcuffs. I asked him to identify himself. He refused. In his pockets I found two pieces of identification. One card was for Lee Harvey Oswald, the other was for Alek Hidell. "Which are you?" He said, "You're the cop. You figure it out." He told me a lot of lies. Captain Fritz called me out at sometime near 2:20 p.m. He said that the employees of the Texas School Book Depository were accounted for - except one. He told me to get some men together and get out to this address in Irving. I asked what the man's name was. He said, "Lee Harvey Oswald." I was stunned. "Captain," I said, "I think this is Oswald, right in there.""

With a suspect in custody, the entire complexion of the assassination investigation changed. Despite what was heralded as overwhelming proof of Oswald's guilt in both killings, it was not until late Friday,

November 22, 1963, that he was charged with the murder of Officer Tippit. And it was well after midnight before he was reportedly charged with the murder of President Kennedy. Dallas Police and federal authorities quickly lost interest in any information, evidence or detained suspects which did not fit in with the presumed activities of Lee Harvey Oswald. There was never even an indictment issued in the Tippit slaying, since the presumed killer -Oswald - was dead. Yet many items of interest continued to crop up in the aftermath of the assassination.

There were reports of a man seen with a rifle near Cobb Stadium, located on the Stemmons Freeway route from downtown to the Trade Mart. Nothing came of this report. At Red Bird Airport, a private field located just south of Dallas, it was reported that federal officials seized a plane with its engine running the afternoon of the assassination and placed it in a closed hanger under tight security. Two days prior to the assassination, the airport's manager, Wayne January, said three men talked to him about renting an airplane on November 22 to fly to Mexico. He said one of the men remained sitting in a car and closely resembled Lee Harvey Oswald. None of these stories regarding possible escape plans were properly investigated.

But if unfollowed leads remained in Dallas, there was no official doubts in Washington as to Oswald's guilt. Less than two hours after the assassination - at a time when Dallas Police were not even certain of the identity of the man they had in custody (Recall Detective Rose's story of an uncooperative Oswald with two separate sets of identification) - FBI director Hoover called Robert Kennedy. In a Bureau document released to the public in 1977, Hoover wrote:

"I called the attorney general at his home and told him I thought we had the man who killed the President down in Dallas..."

Hoover went on to describe Oswald as an ex-Marine who had defected to Russia, a pro-communist and a "mean-minded individual...in the category of a nut."

This incident raises the troubling question of how Hoover could have had all this information on Oswald at a time when the Dallas authorities were not even certain of their prisoner's identity.

On November 24, less than two hours after Oswald was killed in Dallas, Hoover telephoned the Johnson White House, saying:

"The thing I am most concerned about...is having something issued so we can convince the public that Oswald is the real assassin."

In 1976 a Senate Select Committee report stated:

"Almost immediately after the assassination, director Hoover, the Justice Department and the White House "exerted pressure" on senior Bureau officials to complete their investigation and issue a factual report supporting the conclusion that Oswald was the lone assassin."

Over the assassination weekend, information on - and evidence against - Oswald continued to pile up. The news media was on around-the-clock alert. No bit of information was too insignificant to broadcast or publish.

The "Dallas Morning News" of November 23, 1963, carried a story stating:

"(District Attorney Henry) Wade said preliminary reports indicated more than one person was involved in the shooting which brought death to the President and left Governor John Connally wounded..."This is the most dastardly act I've ever heard about," Wade said. "Everyone who participated in this crime - anyone who helped plan it or furnished a weapon, knowing the purposes for which it was intended - is guilty of murder under Texas law. They should all go to the electric chair.""

But Wade's initial claim of evidence of a conspiracy quickly faded as official statements began to center more and more on Oswald. Years later, Wade recalled why:

"Cliff Carter, President Johnson's aide, called me three times from the White House that Friday night. He said that President Johnson felt any word of a conspiracy - some plot by foreign nations - to kill President Kennedy would shake our nation to its foundation. President Johnson was worried about some conspiracy on the part of the Russians. Oswald had all sorts of connections and affections toward Castro's Cuba. It might be possible to prove a conspiracy with Cuba. But it would be very hard to prove a conspiracy with Russia. Washington's word to me was that it would hurt foreign relations if I alleged a conspiracy - whether I could prove it or not. I would just charge Oswald with plain murder and go for the death penalty. So, I went down to the police department at City Hall to see Captain Fritz - to make sure the Dallas Police didn't involve any foreign country in the assassination."

With an ever-growing pile of evidence of conspiracy in the assassination, the federal government began to assert itself.

Dallas Police Chief Curry told the Warren Commission:

"The FBI actually had no jurisdiction over it (the murder of Kennedy), the Secret Service actually had no jurisdiction over it. But, in an effort to cooperate with these agencies we went all out to do whatever they wanted us to do...We kept getting calls from the FBI. They wanted this evidence up in Washington...there was some discussion, (Capt.) Fritz told me, he says, "Well, I need the evidence here, I need to get some people to try to identify the gun, to try to identify this pistol and these things, and if it's in Washington, how can I do it?" But, we finally...about midnight of Friday night, we agreed to let the FBI have all the evidence..."

However, Curry said, to the best of his knowledge, no one from the Dallas Police accompanied this evidence to FBI headquarters in Washington. This, of course, caused a serious break in the "chain of evidence."

Curry added:

"We got several calls insisting we send this (evidence to Washington), and nobody would tell me exactly who it was that was insisting, "just say I got a call from Washington, and they wanted this evidence up there," insinuated it was someone in high authority that was requesting this, and we finally agreed..."

Disjointed and incomplete as Curry's statements are, there now is no doubt that Washington authorities were putting extreme pressure on Dallas Police as early as Friday night.

In a 34-page report on police activities that weekend sent to Curry by his assistance chief and two deputy police chiefs, it states:

"At approximately 12:01 a.m. (other reports state an earlier time), Saturday, November 23, 1963, pertinent physical evidence in the case involving Oswald and the slaying of President Kennedy was turned over to Mr. Vince Drain of the Federal Bureau of Investigation to be delivered in person to the FBI Laboratory in Washington, D.C. for processing."

Persistent rumors among Dallas Policemen have it that some of this pressure came in the form of a personal call to Capt. Fritz from none other than President Lyndon Johnson. However, Fritz would never confirm this.

Public awareness of the federal takeover of the Dallas evidence did not come until November 27, 1963, when "The Dallas Morning News" reported:

"The White House approved the decision that the FBI take charge of all evidence which officers assembled in their investigation of the murder of President Kennedy..."

The assassination was now a federal Government matter.

The next major shock came about 11:20 a.m. Sunday, November 24, 1963, when the prime suspect was fatally shot while in the basement of Dallas Police headquarters (See JACK RUBY).

Five days later, Lyndon Johnson moved to block any further investigation of the curious events in Dallas by appointing a "blue ribbon" commission to probe the entire affair (See THE WARREN COMMISSION). It was the beginning of total federal control over the evidence and witnesses in the assassination case.

As with any good investigation dealing with criminal violence, much of the work in the first hours after the assassination centered around the medical evidence - evidence which should have clearly shown how many bullets struck Kennedy and from which direction they came. Therefore, on the day of the assassination, attention was centered on two hospitals - Parkland Memorial Hospital in Dallas and Bethesda Naval Hospital near Washington, D.C.

Crossfire: Dallas Aftermath Summary

Following the assassination there was total confusion and panic in Dealey Plaza. The Texas School Book Depository was not sealed by police for at least 10 minutes, perhaps as much as 20 minutes - enough time for an entire squad of assassins to have escaped. Security was non-existent on the Grassy Knoll. Policemen, Sheriff's deputies, spectators and assassination witnesses mingled in a confused mass behind the wooden picket fence. Despite this chaos, some unidentified man managed to give Dallas police a general description of the assassin - "...a slender white male about 30, 5-feet-10-inches, (weight) 165, carrying what looked to be a 30-30 or some type of Winchester" - which was broadcast over the police radio at 12:43 p.m.

Even as evidence was being gathered by police, other evidence may have been disappearing -such as the bullet taken by an FBI man from the grass on the south side of Elm Street and the "Stemmons Freeway" sign.

Despite later reports by federal authorities that Oswald left the scene by bus and taxi, several people - Deputy Sheriff Roger Craig, Richard Carr and Marvin Robinson - saw someone matching Oswald's description get into a Nash Rambler station wagon near the Depository minutes after the assassination.

Some people in and around Dealey Plaza even believed they saw Jack Ruby near the scene of the assassination, although the Warren Commission concluded he was two blocks away at the "Dallas Morning News" at the time. These included Julia Mercer, Phil Willis, Jean Hill and Dallas Policeman Tom Tilson.

Many strange people were in the vicinity of the assassination. Some - such as the "three tramps" and Mafia character Jim Braden - were even taken into police custody.

However, with the capture of Lee Harvey Oswald, official interest in those arrests ended. Arrest records for that day are missing from the National Archives.

Dallas Police activity intensified following the shooting of Patrolman J.D. Tippit. Although never charged with Tippit's slaying, Oswald has always been considered guilty of this crime. But an objective look at the evidence of Oswald's guilt in Tippit's death shows many deficiencies. The best witnesses to the Tippit shooting were not called to testify before the Warren Commission and many of the witnesses were unable to positively identify Oswald as the killer. The manner in which Dallas Police lineups were conducted was unfair and weighted toward identifying Oswald as the guilty party. There is still considerable question over the ammunition used as evidence in the Tippit shooting. Recent studies of the spent cartridges found at the scene increases the evidence of Oswald's innocence. With the absence of Policeman J.M. Poe's initials from the cartridges and without the customary bulge of .38 Special ammunition fired from a modified pistol such as carried by Oswald, it seems unlikely that the shell cases in the National Archives came from Oswald's revolver. Many of the witnesses could not identify Oswald's gray jacket as the one seen on Tippit's killer. Furthermore, since Oswald was seen near his rooming house six or seven minutes after 1 p.m. and, by the best accounts, Tippit was killed around 1:10 p.m., it would have been impossible for Oswald to have reached the crime scene on foot in that span of time. Furthermore, the concession stand operator at the Texas Theater and theater patron Jack Davis contend that Oswald was in the theater at the time Tippit was killed. Even the Dallas Police recordings of dispatcher orders, responses and times has been called into question, since the original police Dictabelt shows evidence of copying and the police sergeant in charge of the Dispatch Room recalled that federal agents took the original Dictabelt a few days after the assassination.

Even the arrest of Oswald is full of questions. For example, why would an assassin sneak into a theater without paying thereby drawing attention to himself when he had enough money on him to buy a ticket? Did Oswald, in fact, enter without paying since Johnny Brewer last saw him in front of the theater but did not actually see him enter? Could someone other than Oswald have led authorities to the Texas Theater? Why didn't police rush Oswald once he was pointed out to them, rather than slowly work their way to him? Was Oswald being given an opportunity to flee? Was Oswald supposed to have been killed resisting arrest? Was Jack Ruby sitting in the Texas Theater crowd as claimed by George Applin? If so, was Ruby the man who "tipped" Sgt. McDonald to Oswald's location? Why did police reports state that the suspect was arrested in the theater's balcony and who was the man taken from the rear of the theater seen by nearby businessman Bernard Haire? These questions have not been addressed by the federal assassination investigations, leaving suspicious researchers to devise their own theories as to the role of Oswald, Tippit and Ruby in the events of that day.

The key to the JFK assassination may be in the aftermath of the crime - the unfollowed leads, the presence of Secret Service agents (real or bogus) in Dealey Plaza where none should have been, the intimidation of witnesses, the destruction and suppression of vital evidence. Furthermore, in light of the long-standing involvement of the FBI in Oswald's life (See G MEN), it is highly significant that director J. Edgar Hoover telephoned Attorney General Robert Kennedy less than two hours after the assassination to give him a run-down on Oswald - this at a time when Dallas Police were not even certain of the identity of the man they had in custody.

Crossfire: Two Hospitals

"(Kennedy's autopsy was) the kind of examination that would not be tolerated in a routine murder case...in most major cities of America."

Pathologist Dr. Cyril H. Wecht

As the echo of shots died away in Dealey Plaza, Dallas Police Chief Jesse Curry, riding in the lead car of Kennedy's motorcade, radioed his police dispatcher:

"Looks like the President has been hit. Have Parkland stand by."

The motorcade sped up, reaching speeds of nearly 80 miles per hour during the four mile race along Stemmons Freeway to the hospital.

Parkland Memorial Hospital remains the major public hospital in Dallas County today. Almost every victim of violence - from wrecks to gunshot wounds - is brought to Parkland. Its emergency room is constantly staffed with doctors and interns well experienced in trauma situations. President Kennedy could not have asked for more experienced and competent medical attention. Yet following his autopsy that evening at the National Naval Medical Center at Bethesda, Maryland, numerous and continuing discrepancies in the medical evidence arose. These discrepancies have provided a source of controversy which continues even today.

If one assumes there was some sort of conspiracy involved in the assassination, the questions over the medical evidence provide a good starting point for determining the scope of such a conspiracy. But before examining the tangled morass of medical evidence, there is a small question of the Presidential limousine's arrival at Parkland. Secret Service Driver William Greer testified to the Warren Commission that he did not know the way to Parkland and so followed Sheriff Decker and Police Chief Curry in the lead car. Greer's story is buttressed by the testimony of two other Secret Service officials, Forrest Sorrels and Winston Lawson (See G MEN). However, in his testimony, Chief Curry is strangely vague, saying only that the limousine went to the hospital under "siren escort."

What's the problem? During the time of the House Select Committee on Assassinations, a film taken by Dallasite Jack Daniel was seen widely for the first time. Taken just as the motorcade exited from the west end of the Triple Underpass and entered Stemmons Freeway, this film clearly shows that both the Presidential limousine and the Secret Service backup car had passed Curry's lead car and were leading the race to the hospital.

How could Washington-based Agent Greer know how to find Parkland and, more importantly, why did he state in his Commission testimony, "I never passed it (Curry's car)...I was led to the hospital by the police car who was preceding me?"

Either these highly-trained agents panicked and forgot what actually happened or they lied about it. Since the Daniel film can't lie, the question remains, how did Greer know how to reach Parkland?

Upon arrival at Parkland at 12:43 p.m., Governor Connally regained consciousness long enough to attempt to rise, but fell back into the car in great pain. Connally was lifted onto a stretcher and wheeled into the hospital.

Secret Service Agent Clint Hill removed his suit coat and placed it over the President's gory head wound to prevent photographs. However, several persons saw Kennedy's body, including Fort Worth newsman Roy Stamps. Stamps told researchers:

"I rushed up and saw Kennedy lying in the car on his side. His foot was hanging over the side of the car. The back of his head was gone."

As other vehicles in the Presidential motorcade began arriving at the Parkland emergency entrance and Connally was placed in Trauma Room 2, Secret Service Agents Greer, Kellerman and Lawson pulled the fatally-wounded President away from Mrs. Kennedy, placed him on a stretcher and pushed it into Trauma Room 1. There Kennedy was attended to by no less than 12 of Parkland's doctors - including four surgeons, the chief neurologist, an oral surgeon and a heart specialist.

Dr. Charles J. Carrico, a resident surgeon, was the first doctor to examine Kennedy. He noted the President was ashen in color, his breathing lacked coordination, there were no voluntary movements and his eyes were open with pupils dilated showing no reaction to light. However, a few chest sounds thought to be heart beats were heard and immediately, resuscitation efforts were begun. Carrico inserted a cuffed endotracheal tube in a small puncture wound just below Kennedy's Adam's apple. The tube was connected to a respirator. Other doctors began arriving and treating the President; fluids and stimulants were injected and oxygen administered. Cardiac massage was begun - to no avail. President Kennedy was pronounced dead at 1 p.m. (C.S.T.) by Dr. Kemp Clark, Parkland's director of neurological surgery.

While one set of Parkland doctors worked on Kennedy, another worked feverishly to save Connally. A large sucking chest wound caused the greatest concern for Connally. A bullet had shattered the governor's fifth rib on his right side, sending bits of bone and metal tearing through his chest, collapsing one lung. Also his right wrist had been broken, the bullet entering from the top and exiting from the bottom of his wrist. Doctors also discovered a wound in Connally's left thigh. This wound was cleaned and sutured shut, although, according to the Warren Report, "a small metal fragment remained in the Governor's leg."

Vice President Lyndon Johnson also had entered Parkland, but was kept secluded in a room near the area where efforts were being made to revive his predecessor. About 1:20 p.m., Presidential aide Kenneth O'Donnell informed Johnson that Kennedy was dead. According to the Warren Report, O'Donnell advised Johnson to return to Washington as soon as possible. However, Mrs. Kennedy refused to leave without her husband's body and Johnson refused to leave without Mrs. Kennedy. It was finally decided to leave immediately and to return on Air Force One because the Presidential plane had better communication equipment.

The decision created one of the assassination's most enduring problems - with the President's autopsy performed at Bethesda, two sets of doctors viewed the body at different times and their descriptions of wounds differed so widely that controversy remains to this day. The death of the President was legally a Texas homicide and by law, the body could not be removed until after an autopsy or a coroner's ruling, which also would have involved further medical investigation. Totally against prevailing law and despite the protestations of Texas officials, a coffin was ordered from a Dallas funeral home and Kennedy's body was whisked away from Parkland Hospital. (This illegal action did prevent a situation like the one which arose after the assassination of Robert F. Kennedy in Los Angeles. There, the younger Kennedy was autopsied by Los Angeles County Coroner Dr. Thomas T. Noguchi, who testified in court that the shots which killed Robert Kennedy traveled from back to front and that the fatal shot was fired from no more than three inches from behind RFK's right ear. This testimony, of course, is totally at variance from the official story that RFK was killed by Sirhan Sirhan, who was standing five or six feet IN FRONT of the Senator.)

After Kennedy's body left Parkland and while Dallas doctors worked feverishly on Connally in a second floor operating room, another incident occurred in the hospital which was to have long-reaching effects on the official theory of the assassination - A hospital worker discovered an intact bullet in a hallway. During the feverish activity in the Emergency Room, the hospital's senior engineer, Darrel C. Tomlinson, was asked to manually operate an elevator which connected the ground floor emergency room to the second floor operating theaters. Despite efforts by Warren Commission Attorney Arlen Specter to confuse the issue during testimony, Tomlinson was remarkably clear on what happened that day. Tomlinson stated that one hospital stretcher containing two rolled-up bloody sheets, some surgical instruments and some sterile packs was sitting against a wall near the elevator. No effort apparently was made by the Commission to determine where this stretcher came from. Some researchers believe it may have held Kennedy's body while in the emergency room. But this is doubtful since Kennedy's body remained on his stretcher until the Dallas casket arrived about 1:40 p.m. At this time, his body was placed in the casket and the stretcher was stripped of sheets and rolled across the hall to Trauma Room 2, according to Nurse Diana Bowron. Since Tomlinson claimed to have discovered a bullet at this same time and two nurses reported placing Kennedy's empty stretcher in Trauma Room 2, it is virtually impossible to believe that the hallway stretcher carried the President.

Today it seems more likely that this stretcher was used in the treatment of two-year-old Ronald Fuller, who entered the Parkland emergency room at 12:54 p.m. with a bad cut on the chin. The child's mother, Mrs. Ross Fuller, years later told the "Dallas Morning News" what happened:

"I was watching the President's parade on television when they announced he had been shot. I knocked over the bottle of soda pop I was drinking and it broke into pieces. My little boy Ronnie fell on it and started bleeding badly. My husband and I ran to the car and headed for Parkland with the baby. When we reached Harry Hines Boulevard, traffic was at a standstill. I told my husband I couldn't just sit in the car like that (and that) I was going to take the baby in on foot. Then I jumped out of the car. (While running)...a man came up and asked if he could help. He saw the blood and he thought we'd been shot the same way the President had."

Mrs. Fuller finally reached the Parkland emergency room and handed her son to medical personnel.

Then she fainted. She recalled:

"When I came to, they told me Ronnie was all right. They were sewing him up. Then they told me the President was dead. It happened in the cubicle right next to us. The doctor said I was living a part of history."

The Fuller child was briefly placed on a stretcher and his cut was treated with sutures and gauze packs, which could have been left behind on the cart. Considering both the condition - bloody sheets, instruments, sterile packs - and the location of Fuller's stretcher - the child originally was placed on a stretcher in the same hallway leading to Trauma Rooms 1 and 2 - it is most likely this stretcher on which the bullet was found.

Tomlinson said a second stretcher was on the elevator - perhaps the one which carried Connally to the second floor operating room - and that he pulled it out and placed it near the first stretcher. Specter designated the stretcher pulled off the elevator as stretcher A and the stretcher already in the hall near the elevator as stretcher B. After making a few trips in the elevator, Tomlinson said someone - a doctor or an intern - moved one of the stretchers away from the wall so he could enter a men's restroom. Tomlinson told Specter as he pushed the stretcher back up against the wall to clear the hallway:

"I bumped the wall and a spent cartridge or bullet rolled out that apparently had been lodged under the edge of the mat."

"And that was from which stretcher?" asked Specter.

"I believe that it was B," replied Tomlinson.

Later in his testimony, Specter tried to shake Tomlinson's recollections.

Specter asked:

"And at the time we started our discussion, it was your recollection at that point that the bullet came off of stretcher A, was it not?"

"B," quickly responded Tomlinson.

Finally, after Specter continued to confuse the matter by telling Tomlinson that he had identified stretcher A during a Secret Service interview, the hospital worker said:

"...I really don't remember. I'm not accustomed to being questioned by the Secret Service and the FBI and by you and they are writing down everything, I mean....I'm going to tell you all I can, and I'm not going to tell you something I can't lay down and sleep at night with either."

From Tomlinson's testimony, it appears more than likely that the stretcher holding the bullet did not belong to Connally. However, the Warren Commission stated definitively:

"A nearly whole bullet was found on Governor Connally's stretcher at Parkland Hospital after the assassination."

It was this bullet - Commission Exhibit 399 - which became the foundation of the single bullet theory of the assassination. It has also become known as the "Magic Bullet."

Tomlinson turned the bullet over to Parkland's chief of security, O.P. Wright, who gave it to Secret Service Agent Richard Johnson.

Interestingly, Wright was the father-in-law of Dallas Police Sgt. Patrick T. Dean, the officer blamed by the Warren Commission for allowing Jack Ruby into the police department basement just prior to the slaying of Oswald. Dean's mother-in-law, Mrs. O.P. Wright, was director of nursing at Parkland and on duty when Kennedy was being treated.

Neither Wright nor Agent Johnson were interviewed by the Warren Commission - perhaps because, in later interviews with researchers, neither man could positively identify CE 399 as the bullet found that day. In fact, during a 1966 interview with author Josiah Thompson, Wright - a professional security officer - picked a pointed-tipped bullet shape as more nearly like the bullet discovered at Parkland. He rejected round-nosed bullet shapes similar to CE 399. Tomlinson, likewise, selected a pointed shape as resembling the bullet he found. The whole bullet matter becomes even more clouded when the possibility of substitution and planting comes into consideration.

The hallway in which both stretchers A and B were left unattended was a public corridor. Although the Warren Commission apparently never considered that CE 399 may have been planted on one of the stretchers or later substituted for the found bullet, these possibilities find favor in the minds of most assassination researchers. This possibility that the bullet was planted is especially strong since the evidence indicates that the stretcher containing the bullet belonged to neither Kennedy nor Connally.

Adding to this suspicion is the presence of Jack Ruby at Parkland Hospital while Kennedy's body was still there.

Crossfire: Jack Ruby at Parkland

Veteran newsman Seth Kantor told the Warren Commission that he encountered Jack Ruby at Parkland Hospital about the time Kennedy's death was publicly announced at 1:30 p.m. Kantor said he and Ruby even shared a brief conversation. Kantor recognized Ruby, having worked in Dallas for some time. He said he spoke to Ruby about 1:30 p.m. and recalled that Ruby asked him if he should close his club out of respect for the slain President. When asked about his presence at Parkland, Ruby denied ever being there and the Commission chose to believe him. The Commission concluded that Kantor must have been mistaken. Ignored by the Commission were FBI interviews with a Dallas woman whose experiences on the day of the assassination fully supported Kantor's account of his Parkland meeting with Ruby.

Mrs. Wilma Tice was home when she heard the news of the Dealey Plaza shooting. Curious, she drove to Parkland Hospital arriving about 1:30 p.m. and joined the throng of bystanders awaiting word on the President's condition. Some months later, she told the FBI she stood beside a heavily-built man in a dark suit who was hitting his hat against his leg. She was only three or four feet from the man when another man approached him and said, "How are you going there, Jack?" She said the two men had a brief conversation during which the man named Jack offered to donate a kidney to John Connally.

Two days later Mrs. Tice was astounded to see the man called Jack on television identified as Jack Ruby, the slayer of Oswald. However, she assumed that the authorities knew about his presence at Parkland and did not notify anyone until late in the spring of 1964.

Mrs. Tice had telephoned Ruby's sister, Mrs. Eva Grant, to express her condolences over Ruby's death sentence when she mentioned her encounter at Parkland and learned that Ruby had denied being there. It was at this point that Mrs. Tice contacted the FBI and told her story. On April 21, 1964, she received a call from a man claiming to be a newspaper reporter. He asked about her Parkland encounter and then advised her not to talk about the incident. On July 19, Mrs. Tice received a letter asking her to testify for the Warren Commission. The next day she received an anonymous call from a man who warned her:

"It would pay you to keep your mouth shut."

On July 22, Mrs. Tice called police because someone tried to break into her home while her husband was away. This incident was followed by other phone calls, but she had a 14-year-old niece answer the phone and the caller would hang up.

The account of Ruby at Parkland has been further supported in recent years by a former radio newsman. Roy Stamps said he had met Ruby on about 45 occasions prior to November 22, 1963. Stamps told Texas researchers that he was in the hall of Parkland holding open a telephone line to his radio station when he noticed Ruby enter the hospital. He said Ruby was carrying some television equipment and trailing behind a TV crew.

In 1979, The House Select Committee on Assassinations, reversed the Warren Commission's decision that Kantor was mistaken about his Parkland meeting with Ruby, stating:

"While the Warren Commission concluded that Kantor was mistaken, the Committee determined he probably was not."

With the presence of Ruby in Parkland, the possibility that CE 399 - the "Magic Bullet" -was planted appears even more likely. Of course, virtually anyone could have planted the bullet, since the stretcher in question lay unattended in the public hallway for some time. But even if the bullet were not planted - and there is some evidence to suggest that the bullet may have worked its way out of Kennedy's back wound - there is also the possibility that CE 399 was substituted for the bullet found on the stretcher. Recall that neither of the men who initially handled the bullet could identify it later. Of course, if bullets were switched, it could only have been done while in the hands of federal authorities - a most ominous suspicion.

Crossfire: Bethesda Naval Hospital - The Autopsy

After Kennedy's body was returned to Air Force One at Dallas' Love Field, Lyndon B. Johnson was sworn in as 36th President of the United States by Federal Judge Sarah T. Hughes.

On the plane flight back to Washington, it seems the original destination for Kennedy's body was to have been Walter Reed Army Hospital - long the major military medical facility for Washington. Examining U.S. Army Signal Corps transcripts of radio messages from Air Force One that day, researchers have found several references indicating that military officers were going to send the body to the Army hospital. Agent Roy Kellerman radioed Secret Service headquarters saying:

"Arriving Andrews (AFB) 6:05. The body will go to Walter Reed. Have an ambulance from Walter Reed to take the body there."

Later, Gen. Chester Clifton, senior military aide, radioed:

"This is Gen. Clifton. We do not want a helicopter to go to Bethesda Medical Center. We do want an ambulance and a ground return from Andrews to Walter Reed, and we want the regular post-mortem that has to be done by law under guard performed at Walter Reed. Is that clear?"

Even the official history of the 1001st Air Base Wing, which included Air Force One, reported:

"...the body of the slain President was removed to Walter Reed General Hospital..."

So why the sudden change to Bethesda?

Kennedy's personal physician, Dr. George G. Burkley, wrote in his report of that day:

"During the course of the flight (back to Washington), determination of the immediate action on arrival in Washington was made to assure complete compliance with Mrs. Kennedy's wishes. I spoke to her while kneeling on the floor so I would be at the level of her face rather than leaning forward, and expressed complete desire of all of us and especially of myself to comply with her wishes, stating that it was necessary that the President be taken to a hospital prior to going to the White House. She questioned why and I stated it must be determined, if possible, the type of bullet used and compare this with future material found. I stated frankly that I had no preference, that it could be any hospital, but that I did feel that, if possible, it should be a military hospital for security measures. The question was answered by her stating that she wanted the President taken to Bethesda Naval Hospital."

Oddly, having just received Mrs. Kennedy's wishes, Dr. Burkley then adds:

"Arrangements were made on the ground for departure to Walter Reed Army Hospital or Bethesda Naval Hospital, as the case may be."

Why such confusion over military hospitals? Was Mrs. Kennedy's natural desire to take her husband, a former Naval officer, to the naval hospital an unexpected hitch in a plan for an autopsy at Walter Reed? It certainly appears that Bethesda was not prepared for this most important autopsy. The three military physicians who performed Kennedy's autopsy were clinical pathologists with little experience in gunshot wounds. Neither Navy Commander James J. Humes nor Navy Commander J. Thornton Boswell had practical, first-hand experience with bullet wounds. Army Lt. Col. Pierre Finck did have some such experience, but he later said he was hampered in his autopsy procedures by officials in the room. The military autopsy doctors apparently were surrounded by both military and civilian superiors who directed much of the autopsy - some of this direction going against normal autopsy procedures.

During the Clay Shaw trial in New Orleans (See THE GARRISON INVESTIGATION), Dr. Finck was asked under oath if Dr. Humes had been in charge of the President's autopsy. He replied:

"Well, I heard Dr. Humes stating that - he said, "Who's in charge here?" And I heard an Army general, I don't remember his name, stating, "I am." You must understand that in those circumstances, there were law enforcement officers, military people with various ranks, and you have to coordinate the operation according to directions."

An unnamed Army general in charge? Directions to the doctors? Finck continued to describe the scene:

"The autopsy room was quite crowded. It is a small autopsy room, and when you are called in circumstances like that to look at the wound of the President of the United States who is dead, you don't look around too much to ask people for their names and take notes on who they are and how many there are. I did not do so. The room was crowded with military and civilian personnel and federal agents, Secret Service agents, FBI agents, for part of the autopsy, but I cannot give you a precise breakdown as regards the attendance of the people in that autopsy room at Bethesda Naval Hospital."

New Orleans Executive Assistant District Attorney Alvin Oser then pressed Finck on why, as an autopsy pathologist, he had not tracked the bullet wound through Kennedy's body to determine its exact path. After dodging the question for a time, Dr. Finck finally was ordered by the court to answer Oser's question. Dr. Finck stated:

"As I recall I was told not to, but I don't remember by whom."

"Could it have been one of the admirals or one of the generals in the room?" asked Oser.

"I don't recall," said Dr. Finck.

Finck, the only member of the autopsy team who was a member of the American Academy of Forensic Sciences, asked to examine Kennedy's clothing - a normal and acknowledged autopsy procedure. His request was denied.

Further, the autopsy doctors were ordered not to talk about what they had seen in the autopsy room. Finck again:

"...when you are a lieutenant colonel in the Army you just follow orders, and at the end of the autopsy, we were specifically told - as I recall it, it was by Admiral (Edward C.) Kenney, the surgeon general of the Navy -...not to discuss the case."

In 1977 Dr. Humes appeared before a medical panel gathered by the House Select Committee on Assassinations. Because of long-standing questions concerning the possibility that Kennedy suffered from Addison's disease (which can be detected by studying the adrenal glands), Humes was asked about the glands by Committee Medical Panel member Dr. Charles Petty "...because normally we examine adrenals in the general course (of an) autopsy, as we undertake it." Humes replied:

"...Since I don't think it bore directly on the death of the President, I'd prefer not to discuss it with you, doctor....I'd only comment for you that I have strong personal reasons and certain other obligations that suggest to me that it might not be preferable."

Certain other obligations? To whom?

But for all the puzzles and the directions of superiors, Humes had come to some definite conclusions by the end of the autopsy. - One bullet entered the rear of Kennedy's head and exited from the top of his skull. - Another bullet entered the President's back and apparently worked its way out during cardiac massage at Parkland.

The autopsy, which began at 8:15 p.m. the evening of the assassination, was concerned with only two of Kennedy's wounds. Humes studied the head wound and found about 40 pieces of bullet metal, indicating a bullet had fragmented while passing through the skull area. He concluded that a high-velocity rifle bullet had entered the rear of the skull, fragmented and then exited through the top of the skull. Death was attributed to the head wound. Not so easily explained was a wound in the President's back. The Dallas doctors never saw this wound because they said they never examined Kennedy's back. However, the autopsy doctors studied this wound carefully and wrote clear records of it. On the autopsy face sheet diagram marked by Dr. Humes, it depicts a wound in Kennedy's back between the shoulder blades. In Kennedy's death certificate, it states:

"...a second wound occurred in the posterior back at about the level of the third thoracic vertebra."

The third thoracic vertebra is located almost midway between the shoulder blades.

Two FBI agents, Francis X. O'Neill Jr. and James W. Sibert, were ordered to attend the autopsy and make a report. Their report, which was kept classified by the Warren Commission for several years, stated:

"During the latter stages of this autopsy, Dr. Humes located an opening which appeared to be a bullet hole which was below the shoulders and two inches to the right of the middle line of the spinal column."

This description on the wound's location was supported by the testimony of Secret Service agents and bullet holes in Kennedy's clothing. Yet it presented a real problem to the Warren Commission. If the President's wound was between the shoulder blades, this was lower than the position of the neck wound making for an upward trajectory - totally inconsistent with the idea of shots from 60 feet above and behind the President.

The solution to this dilemma was simple - the Commission reported:

"A bullet had entered the base of the back of (Kennedy's) neck slightly to the right of the spine. It traveled downward and exited from the front of the neck, causing a nick in the left lower portion of the knot in the President's necktie."

The Commission simply reported the back wound as located 5-1/2 inches higher than determined by the evidence.

Later, when questioned about the location of the wound as marked on the autopsy face sheet, Dr. Boswell stated the drawing was a "diagram error." And Humes was quoted as saying the back wound was higher than the throat wound, although he had marked it well below the neck wound.

The issue of the autopsy diagram was resolved in 1975 when researcher Harold Weisberg obtained the original autopsy face sheet by means of a Freedom of Information suit. Researchers discovered that the original sheet - depicting a wound in the low back - had been marked "verified" by Kennedy's personal physician, Dr. George Burkley. This verification of the autopsy sheet had been eliminated in copies of the document presented by the Warren Commission to the public. Curiously, Dr. Burkley was never called to testify to the Commission, although he was the only medical authority who rode in the motorcade, viewed Kennedy's body at Parkland Hospital and was present at the autopsy.

In 1982, Burkley reportedly told author Henry Hurt that he believed Kennedy's death was the result of a conspiracy. However, Burkley declined to elaborate further.

The Sibert-O'Neill FBI report further stated:

"This opening (the back wound) was probed by Dr. Humes with the finger, at which time it was determined that the trajectory of the missile entering at this point had entered at a downward position of 45 to 60 degrees. Further probing determined that the distance traveled by this missile was a short distance inasmuch as the end of the opening could be felt with the finger. Inasmuch as no complete bullet of any size could be located in the brain area and likewise no bullet could be located in the back or any other area of the body as determined by total body X-rays and inspection revealing there was no point of exit, the individuals performing the autopsy were at a loss to explain why they could find no bullets."

Commander J. Thornton Boswell, Humes' assistant, told author Josiah Thompson that all three doctors probed the back wound with their fingers but could not penetrate past an inch or so. According to Boswell, a thin metal probe also was used but no bullet track could be located.

After failing to find any bullet, Agents Sibert and O'Neill called the FBI Laboratory and were informed of the bullet which had been found on a stretcher at Parkland Hospital. This information was relayed to Humes and the autopsy doctors. This led the doctors to a conclusion expressed in the FBI report of Sibert and O'Neill:

"...since external cardiac massage had been performed at Parkland Hospital, it was entirely possible that through such movement the bullet had worked its way back out of the point of entry and fallen on the stretcher."

At the end of the autopsy, the military doctors concluded, as recorded in the Sibert-O'Neill report:

"... that the one bullet had entered the President's back and had worked its way out of the body during external cardiac massage and that a second high-velocity bullet had entered the rear of the skull and had fragmented prior to exit through the top of the skull."

But if the back wound caused problems, it was nothing compared to the problems which arose after Humes learned that the autopsy doctors had completely missed one of the President's wounds. On the day after the autopsy - with the President's body already prepared for burial and lying in state at the White House - Humes contacted the medical officials in Dallas. He was shocked to learn that they had observed a bullet wound in Kennedy's throat. The autopsy doctors had noticed an opening in the throat but had assumed it had been made at Parkland to facilitate a tracheal tube. Here is one of the most suspicious of the differences recorded in Kennedy's wounds. Dr. Perry at Parkland described the throat wound as a small hole about 3 to 5 millimeters - or about 1/5 of an inch - in diameter which had the appearance of an entrance wound. Perry said he made a surgical incision laterally across this hole to facilitate a tracheotomy, but did not obliterate the bullet wound. But by the time the autopsy doctors examined Kennedy's throat, this wound had elongated to almost three inches - such a gash that they didn't realize it obliterated a wound from the assassination.

Furthermore, all of the Dallas doctors said Kennedy had a large blasted hole in the right rear portion of his head - not at all like the gaping wound in the right top portion of his skull as reported by the autopsy doctors.

These differences in the descriptions of the throat and head wounds suggests only three explanations:

1. The Dallas medical personnel lied about what they saw.
2. The autopsy doctors lied about what they saw.
3. No one lied - thus indicating the wounds were altered between the time they were seen in Dallas and the autopsy.

The latter explanation is buttressed by the Sibert-O'Neill FBI report of the Bethesda autopsy which states:

"The President's body was removed from the casket...and placed on the autopsy table, at which time the complete body was wrapped in a sheet and the head area contained an additional wrapping which was saturated with blood...it was also apparent that a tracheotomy had been performed, as well as surgery of the head area, namely, in the top of the skull."

Surgery in the top of the skull? No such surgery was ever mentioned by the Parkland medical staff. This oddity became one of the focal points of an investigation by researcher and author David Lifton, who reached some startling and well-publicized conclusions.

Crossfire: David Lifton Investigation

David Lifton, a former NASA computer engineer who researched the assassination for more than 15 years, was the first person to interview both medical personnel in Dallas and at Bethesda Naval Medical Center. What he discovered shocked him.

In his best-selling book, "Best Evidence," Lifton reported that not only were there discrepancies in the descriptions of Kennedy's wounds, but there were discrepancies in how the body was transported. It has been well documented how Kennedy's body was wrapped in a sheet in Dallas and placed in an expensive bronze ceremonial casket for shipment to Washington. Yet Lifton found Bethesda technicians who said they removed Kennedy's body from a black zippered body bag which was inside a cheap, gray military-style shipping casket, similar to those used to transport bodies back from Vietnam.

Paul K. O'Connor, who was studying to be a medical technician, was working in Bethesda's laboratory when Kennedy's body arrived. He said the body arrived in a "shipping casket...kind of slate-type gray and a kind of light pinkish color on the edges."

Asked by Lifton the condition of the body when the casket was opened, O'Connor replied:

"He was in a body bag."

O'Connor's recollection was confirmed by others, including Captain John Stover, Bethesda's commanding officer.

Just as startling was an interview with Bethesda X-ray technician Jerrold F. Custer. Custer said he had already made X-ray photographs of Kennedy's body, had gone to an upper floor to process them and was returning to the morgue area of the hospital when he encountered a bloodstained Jacqueline Kennedy, surrounded by newsmen and Secret Service agents, entering Bethesda. Outside in an ambulance, was the bronze Dallas casket supposedly containing the President's body.

Based on this and much more information gleaned from official reports and witnesses, Lifton concluded that the assassination was the result of a plot "involving the Executive Branch of the Government."

His hypothesis is this:

"Since Lifton disbelieved that the doctors at both Parkland and Bethesda lied about their observations, the alternative belief was that Kennedy's body was altered. Lifton discovered a brief period during the swearing-in ceremonies for Lyndon Johnson aboard Air Force One when everyone gathered forward, leaving Kennedy's body unattended. It was during this time, that his body was taken from the bronze Dallas casket, placed in a military body bag and stowed elsewhere in the plane (Autopsy photos showed several scratches on Kennedy's back which could be explained by the hasty handling of his body). At Andrews Air Force Base, Kennedy's body was taken off the right side of Air Force One and placed in a helicopter, which immediately took off while the news media and officials concentrated on Mrs. Kennedy and the Dallas casket, which were unloaded from the left side of the plane. Either at Walter Reed or Bethesda, someone altered the President's wounds to conform to the shots-from-behind thesis and then the body was wrapped in a sheet and placed on the Bethesda autopsy table ready for Dr. Humes and the others."

Lifton's theory - incredible as it may seem - is supported by all of the available evidence. Further, attempts to discredit either Lifton or his sources have proven fruitless. There is no question that long-standing and serious questions have arisen over the medical evidence. Lifton's theory that Kennedy's body was altered while in the hands of federal officials goes a long way in explaining the puzzles and inconsistencies of the medical evidence.

Crossfire: The Autopsy Report

Upon learning of the throat wound the day after the autopsy, Humes was forced to revise his autopsy report. The autopsy doctors determined that the back wound was 4 to 7-millimeters in diameter and the Dallas doctors said the throat wound was 3 to 5-millimeters in diameter. Since the back wound was larger, this would normally suggest that the neck wound was one of entrance and the back wound one of exit - assuming both holes represented the path of a single bullet. However, Humes saw it another way. Testifying to the House Select Committee on Assassinations, Humes said upon learning of the throat wound:

"...lights went on, and we said, ah, we have some place for our missile to have gone."

After revising his autopsy report, Humes walked to his fireplace and burned autopsy material - alternatively described as original notes, a first draft or other written notes. This highly-questionable practice preceded his final autopsy report which stated definitively:

"One missile entered the back of the President and exited in the front of the neck."

Considering that the wound in Kennedy's throat was too small to have been caused by a rifle slug and that FBI experts could not find any traces of metal on Kennedy's shirt or tie and that the Dallas doctors noted bruises on Kennedy's neck, it has been theorized that the neck wound may have been caused by bone fragments blasted downward at the time of the fatal head shot.

Author Josiah Thompson wrote:

"If we suppose that a bullet (or more likely a bone) fragment was driven downward on a slight left-to-right trajectory through the mid brain, we have a hypothesis that accords with all the known facts surrounding the throat wound."

But Humes was not bothered by such theories. He now had a revised idea of how Kennedy died:

- One bullet entered Kennedy's back and exited from his throat.
- Another bullet struck the back of his head and exited from the top of the skull.

Even Kennedy's personal physician, Dr. Burkley, had problems accepting these findings which may explain his belief in a conspiracy as revealed to author Henry Hurt.

Adding to this confusion is the possibility of yet another bullet being recovered from Kennedy's body during the autopsy. In the "New York Times" of November 27, 1963, Dallas Dr. Kemp Clark stated one bullet struck him at the necktie knot "ranged downward in his chest and did not exit." This statement was supported by Dr. Robert Shaw, who told "New York Herald-Tribune" reporter Martin Steadman on November 27 that a bullet entered the front of Kennedy's throat "coursed downward into his lung (and) was removed in the Bethesda Naval Hospital where the autopsy was performed." The idea of a bullet being removed during autopsy gains additional strength in light of two government documents now available.

One is a letter of receipt signed by FBI Agents Sibert and O'Neill, who monitored the autopsy. The two-line letter, dated November 22, 1963, states:

"We hereby acknowledge receipt of a missile removed by Commander James J. Humes, MC, USN on this date."

The other is another letter of receipt, but this time from the Protective Research Section of the Treasury Department, dated November 26, 1963. Among the items it listed as received from Kennedy's personal physician, Dr. Burkley, is "One receipt from FBI for a missile removed during examination of the body."

FBI agents normally would know the difference between bullet fragments and an intact slug. It is curious that both documents refer to a "missile" rather than fragments or pieces of bullet. All of this suggests yet another bullet was discovered, but kept secret since another bullet would have destroyed the lone-assassin theory, which already was being strained to the limit.

Further evidence that more than two bullets struck President Kennedy came in 1968 when then Attorney General Ramsey Clark gathered a panel of physicians headed by Dr. Russell Fisher, a Maryland medical examiner, to study the JFK autopsy photographs and x-rays. In addition to noting that the rear head wound had changed both size and shape from its description by the autopsy doctors, the Clark Panel found at the base of Kennedy's skull "...a large metallic (bullet) fragment which...is round and measures 6.5 mm in diameter." This could be construed as strong evidence against Lee Harvey Oswald, since he reportedly used a 6.5-mm rifle. However, recall that the official version states that one bullet - the "Magic Bullet" - traversed the President's neck, penetrated Connally and was found intact at Parkland Hospital.

Since officially no large fragments had been noted by the autopsy doctors and no such fragments could have come from the whole bullet found at Parkland, it seems probable that either more than two shots struck Kennedy in the head area or that the autopsy materials viewed by the Clark Panel were somehow faked. Furthermore, yet another bullet base, about 6.5 mm in diameter, was said to be found in the front seat of the Presidential limousine. All this goes far to prove that more than two bullets struck Kennedy.

A Navy officer who might have been able to clarify some of the questions about the President's autopsy is unavailable. He died under strange circumstances.

Crossfire: the Death of William Pitzer

Lt. Commander William Bruce Pitzer reportedly filmed the Kennedy autopsy "in detail" yet no official mention has ever been made of what happened to this evidence.

The House Select Committee on Assassinations drew up a list of the people present at the autopsy and Pitzer's name was absent. Furthermore Commander Boswell, one of the autopsy doctors, told researchers that Pitzer was not present. However, Dennis David, a Bethesda medical corpsman who as Chief of the Day for the Medical School attended the autopsy and was a friend of Pitzer's, has claimed that Pitzer not only was there but filmed the procedure.

Whatever Pitzer's role was on November 22, 1963, may never be known. On October 29, 1966, Pitzer was found fatally shot in his Bethesda Naval Hospital office. Naval authorities told Pitzer's family his death was a suicide. An autopsy was quickly conducted at Bethesda but the Government has steadfastly refused to release either an autopsy report on Pitzer or reports on any investigation into his death, if there was such, to either his family or Maryland authorities. Both David and Pitzer's family told researcher Harrison Livingstone that they disbelieved the official account of Pitzer's death.

David stated:

"...(He) was shot with a .45-caliber pistol...I have always believed he was murdered."

Pitzer's wife said he was very fearful following his experience at the JFK autopsy, but generally was to happy with life to commit suicide. She also said wrote notes for even the smallest matters and she can't believe that he would commit suicide without leaving some message.

She also voiced a concern over the condition of Pitzer's body. Reportedly, the right-handed Pitzer shot himself, yet his left hand was so mangled that his wedding ring could be recovered and returned to her.

So there the matter rests, just another strange death. Some researchers believe Pitzer was killed because of what he could prove regarding the mishandling of the Kennedy autopsy and as a warning to others at the Naval facility.

Crossfire: Wound Descriptions

Over the years as attempts have been made to clarify and substantiate the medical evidence, the wounds seem to take on a life of their own.

The head wound, as seen by the Dallas doctors, consisted of a large blasted out area in the right rear of the skull. Both medical and non-medical persons in Dallas were consistent in their description of this wound.

Secret Service Agent Clint Hill told the Warren Commission:

"The right rear portion of his head was missing."

Dr. Charles J. Carrico noted a large hole:

"...in the posterior skull, the occipital region. There was an absence of the calvarium or skull in this area..."

Dr. Malcolm Perry:

"I noted a large avulsive wound of the right parietal occipital area, (The occipital is the large bone on the back of a human skull) in which both scalp and portions of skull were absent..."

Dr. William Kemp Clark:

"I then examined the wound in the back of the President's head. This was a large, gaping wound in the right posterior part, with cerebral and cerebellar tissue being damaged and exposed. (The cerebellum controls muscle coordination and is located at the low rear portion of the head behind the occipital bone.)"

Dr. Robert McClelland:

"...I noted that the right posterior portion of the skull had been extremely blasted."

Yet the autopsy doctors saw a head wound which stretched from the upper side of the rear to the right front of Kennedy's head. The autopsy doctors said a small entrance wound was located in the back of the skull at about the hairline, while the House Select Committee on Assassinations' medical panel placed the entrance wound four inches higher, near the top of the head.

Neither the Warren Commission nor the House Committee spoke of a hole blasted out of the right rear portion of the President's head. The House Committee even produced a drawing reportedly made from an autopsy photograph which depicts the rear of Kennedy's head. It is entirely intact except for what appears to be a small hole - the entrance wound - near the top.

Humes had problems with this drawing, stating he had never seen the small hole before. He suggested it might be dried blood. But he was certain that he had seen no entrance wound in that location.

Robert Groden, a researcher and photographic consultant to the House Select Committee on Assassinations, had a simple explanation for the mystery surrounding the autopsy photographs - after careful study, he decided several, if not all, were forgeries.

After discovering evidence of retouching, Groden wrote:

"The vital autopsy photos of the back of the President's head were altered immediately after the autopsy in order to cover up the fact that the President received two bullets in the head, one from the rear and one from the front, and this second shot blew out the back of his head, as Jackie Kennedy testified to the Warren Commission."

Contemporary autopsy drawings and reports placed the location of the back wound in the middle of the back, between the shoulder blades - this description is corroborated by the bullet holes in Kennedy's clothing - yet the Warren Commission placed the back wound on the right shoulder near the base of the neck.

X-rays and other autopsy materials such as photographs, tissue samples and blood smears - including Kennedy's brain which was removed and preserved - could have provided definitive proof of the location of the wounds.

However, much of this material is missing from the National Archives.

(The House Select Committee on Assassinations hinted that the brain may have been taken by Robert Kennedy to prevent future public display, however, this has not been proven and Kennedy is not alive to comment.)

It also should be noted that the Warren Commission - the group officially charged with finding the truth of Kennedy's assassination - apparently never was allowed to view for themselves the President's autopsy photographs and X-rays.

Commission Attorney Arlen Specter, in an October 10, 1966, interview in "U.S. News & World Report" stated:

"The complete set of pictures taken at the autopsy was not made available to me or to the Commission. I was shown one picture of the back of a body which was represented to be the back of the President, although it was not authenticated. It showed a hole in the position identified in the autopsy report. To the best of my knowledge, the Commission did not see any photographs or X-rays....The photographs and X-rays would, in the thinking of the Commission, not have been crucial, because they would have served only to corroborate what the autopsy surgeons had testified to under oath as opposed to adding any new facts for the Commission."

But they are critical - if not in truthfully understanding Kennedy's wounds, then in understanding the manipulations surrounding the medical evidence.

As Groden later wrote:

"The key to understanding who killed Kennedy lies with the autopsy photographs. These photographs may tell us more about the assassination than all of the official investigations. Perhaps the single most important question in the investigation was never asked: Why were the autopsy photographs and X-rays never officially shown to the numerous doctors and nurses in Dallas who treated President Kennedy? Had this question been pursued, the true nature of the conspiracy would then have been exposed, because the crucial pictures allegedly of the back of the President's head are forged! That forgery is one of the keys to the conspiracy. Who would have had that kind of access to the evidence in order to alter it? Who had the capability to alter it?"

Crossfire: Two Hospitals Summary

The medical evidence in the JFK assassination, which should be the basis for truthful determination of how many bullets struck Kennedy and from which direction, is hopelessly flawed. Some of it is still missing and other material has come under serious question as to its authenticity. Kennedy was given the autopsy of a Skid Row bum, with military and civilian authorities directing the three inexperienced and intimidated military doctors. His certificate of death is marked "Not Certified," making it simply a death notice.

The late Dr. Milton Helpert, who as chief medical examiner for New York City supervised 60,000 autopsies, once described Kennedy's autopsy thusly:

"It's like sending a seven-year-old boy who has taken three lessons on the violin over to the New York Philharmonic and expecting him to perform a Tchaikovsky symphony. He knows how to hold the violin and bow, but he has a long way to go before he can make music."

Dr. Cyril H. Wecht, an experienced coroner and former president of the American Academy of Forensic Medicine, was more blunt:

"(Kennedy's autopsy was) extremely superficial and sloppy, inept, incomplete, incompetent in many respects, not only on the part of the pathologists who did this horribly inadequate medical-legal autopsy but on the part of many other people. This is the kind of examination that would not be tolerated in a routine murder case by a good crew of homicide detectives in most major cities of America."

For whatever reasons - some innocent bumbling and some not so innocent - the medical evidence in the JFK assassination will forever be considered tainted, incomplete and inconclusive. And the question remains - who had the power to misdirect and confuse the official medical examination of the assassinated President?

Crossfire: Jack Ruby

"I know there is a terrible conspiracy going on in the world right now.
...The world has the right to hear the truth."

Jack Ruby

On the day before Kennedy's assassination business appeared normal in the Dallas District Attorney's office. There was a continuing parade of defendants, lawyers and police officers as the office staff went about preparing cases. One officer, Dallas Police Lt. W.F. Dyson, later told the Warren Commission that it was here that he and other officers encountered a short, stocky nightclub owner who was going out of his way to make their acquaintance. Dyson overheard this man - Jack Ruby - tell the officers:

"You probably don't know me, but you will."

The following Sunday the entire world knew Jack Ruby - the man who killed Lee Harvey Oswald.

Next to Oswald himself, Ruby became the man most closely associated with the assassination. The November 24, 1963, murder of Oswald in the basement of the Dallas Police Station for many people was the starting point for continued suspicions about the whole assassination. Many people could accept the idea of a "lone-nut assassin," but balked at the idea of two such characters. Ruby's shooting of Oswald, thus silencing the one man whom authorities blamed for Kennedy's death, began a rumble of discontent and suspicion which persists today. Therefore any serious probe of Kennedy's death must also include an in-depth look at the life and death of Jack Ruby, one of history's most unlikely candidates for fame.

In the months following the assassination, the American public was told - first by news media accounts and then by the Warren Commission - that Ruby was a small-time Dallas nightclub operator with no significant ties to organized crime or to Dallas authorities. It was said that his killing of Oswald was simply the spontaneous act of a man hoping to right the wrong of the President's death. Today there is evidence that Ruby, a fixture on the Dallas scene in 1963, was more closely connected with organized crime figures than earlier believed and that he, in fact, stalked Oswald throughout the assassination weekend.

It also is now known that Ruby tried to tell what he knew about the plot to kill Kennedy but was shrugged off by both Government investigators and the news media.

To a radio news reporter, Ruby said:

"I know there is a terrible conspiracy going on in the world right now...I'm speaking the truth....The world has the right to hear the truth..."

Shortly after Ruby was granted a new trial, he was filmed by a Texas television station stating:

"...everything pertaining to what's happened has never come to the surface. The world will never know the true facts of what occurred -my motive, in other words. I am the only person in the background to know the truth pertaining to everything relating to my circumstances."

Asked by the interviewer if this truth would ever come out, Ruby replied:

"No. Because unfortunately these people, who have so much gain and have such an ulterior motive to put me in the position I'm in, will never let the true facts come aboveboard to the world."

"Are these people in high positions?" responded the interviewer.

Ruby answered, "Yes."

In letters smuggled out of the Dallas County Jail, Ruby even named Lyndon Johnson as the person behind the assassination.

Ruby's mob connections stretched back over the years to his childhood in Chicago and were much more extensive than admitted by the Warren Commission. In 1964, one of Ruby's childhood friends told the FBI that as youths, he and Ruby had delivered sealed envelopes for Chicago gangster Al Capone (See MOBSTERS). Ruby's family history indicates an environment almost guaranteed to produce a troubled, if not criminally-bent, youngster. His father, Joseph Rubenstein, came from a family of carpenters in Poland but never was able to make a successful career with that skill. Instead he joined the Czarist Russian Army in 1893 and moved away from his small village near Warsaw. While in the Army, Rubenstein married Fannie Turek Rutkowski, the daughter of a doctor's assistant. The wedding was arranged by a Jewish "shadchen," a marriage broker in the Eastern European tradition. After serving in China, Korea and Siberia, Rubenstein reportedly "walked away" from military life and made his way to the United States in 1903 via England and Canada. Within a year or so, he was joined by his wife and three children.

Jack Ruby was born Jacob Rubenstein in 1911, the fifth of eight siblings. His exact birthdate appears to be in controversy. Various documents show different birthdates, although Ruby himself used March 25, 1911, most frequently. Despite several moves, the family always remained in what was described by one brother as a "ghetto," complete with noisy streets filled with pushcarts and peddlers. The elder Rubenstein was a violent man known for drunkenness, brawling and associating with women of the street. He beat both his wife and his children and was frequently arrested on assault charges. A coarse man, he objected to his children obtaining any sort of higher education. Fannie Rubenstein, while desiring a better life for her children, nevertheless was herself a burden to the family. Illiterate and unpredictable due to mental problems, she would berate her husband for his lack of money and nag the children to improve themselves. The Rubenstein household constantly shook with violent and noisy fights. When Ruby was 10 years old, his parents separated and he, along with his three brothers and four sisters, was placed in various foster homes by the Jewish Home Finding Society. During this time, young Rubenstein was learning more on the streets of Chicago than in the schoolroom. Like young Oswald, Ruby was caught by truant officers after skipping school. Unlike Oswald, who found diversion in the local library and zoo, Ruby gravitated toward street gangs and amusement parks.

A 1922 psychiatric evaluation by the Illinois State Public Welfare Department's Institute for Juvenile Research to which Ruby had been referred by the Jewish Social Service Bureau characterized young Ruby as a boy with an "adequate" IQ but with "attention unstained," "quick and careless" reactions and an "egocentric" personality. This description of young Rubenstein of Chicago could have applied equally 40 years later to Jack Ruby in Dallas.

On the streets, young Ruby was nicknamed "Sparky." According to his sister, Eva Grant, the name came from Ruby's swaggering walk which reminded some people of the wobbling gait of Sunday comic strip character Barney Google's horse, "Sparkplug." Others believed "Sparky" was a tag reflecting Ruby's volatile temperament.

Ruby quickly found that holding a job was not for him. Years later, he recalled:

"I tried to be an errand boy for a mail-order house but I couldn't be regimented. I couldn't get up in the morning."

So young street-wise Sparky got along selling novelties from a pushcart, after obtaining a vendor's license thanks to his brother Hyman's political pull in Chicago's 24th Ward. The license was soon revoked after nearby businessmen complained. Undaunted, Sparky scalped sporting event tickets, peddled carnations in dance halls and chocolates in burlesque shows and even offered "hot" music sheets in violation of copyright laws. One close friend described Ruby's promotion schemes as "shady" but "legitimate."

Also on the street, Ruby gained a reputation with his fists, although the accounts of his aggressiveness differed with those who knew him. Barney Rasofsky, who gained fame in the 1930s as World Welterweight Boxing Champion Barney Ross, in 1964 told the FBI that he and Ruby along with other young toughs were paid $1 per trip to deliver sealed envelopes for gangster Al Capone. If this information was passed along to the Warren Commission, it was never reported.

Rasofsky also said Ruby was never a troublemaker, although he always was ready to defend himself against any attack. Others too recalled Ruby as one to avoid a fight if possible. These recollections clash markedly with others who recalled Ruby as a street brawler, eager to take up any challenge, even to the extent of aiding someone else in trouble.

Ruby also was militantly proud of his Jewish ancestry. Although not particularly devout, he had nevertheless received some instruction in Orthodox Judaism. In addition to fights with other street gangs because of racial and ethnic differences, Ruby reportedly joined with Jewish toughs in fights with the Pro-Nazi German-American Bund during the late 1930s.

In 1933, Ruby, along with several Chicago friends, went to Los Angeles and then San Francisco seeking employment. In 1936, he was still in San Francisco living for a brief time with his sister, Eva, and her husband. Interestingly enough, Mafia boss Johnny Roselli - who later was a key player in the CIA-Mafia plots against Castro - told the Kefauver Crime Committee in 1951 that he too moved to Los Angeles in 1933 to oversee gambling operations at Santa Anita.

Despite some evidence to the contrary, Ruby later told authorities he returned to Chicago in 1937 - the same year his mother was committed to Elgin State Hospital with mental disorders. For more than 20 years, Fannie Rubenstein had frequented doctors and clinics reporting that a fishbone was lodged in her throat despite continuing reassurances that nothing organic could be detected. After a short parole, she was readmitted to the mental hospital in early 1938. She was released as "improved" in August and subsequently was reconciled with both her family and Joseph Rubenstein since alien registration forms submitted in 1940 indicated they both were living at a daughter's home. Mrs. Rubenstein died of complications from a heart ailment in 1944. Her husband remained with his children in Chicago, dying in 1958 at age 87. At the time of his mother's death, Sparky had become Private Jack Rubenstein of the United States Air Force. But not before being involved in yet another episode filled with links back to the mob.

Having returned to Chicago about 1937, Ruby began working for the Scrap Iron and Junk Handlers Union according to Social Security Administration records. Chicago attorney Leon R. Cooke, a close friend to Ruby, had founded the union and was financial secretary. When gangsters connected to the Chicago underworld began taking control of the union and its funds, Ruby went along. Union President John Martin, who earlier had been indicted along with a major Chicago mobster for withholding tax information, named young Rubenstein union secretary. However, according to a statement Ruby made to police at the time, he was little more than a bagman for union thugs. On December 8, 1939, Martin fatally shot Cooke in the union's offices after an argument over missing funds. Martin fled and Ruby was arrested. The incident was splashed all over the Chicago newspapers at the time. Although Cooke was shot in the back, Martin claimed self defense and never served time for the murder. While Ruby claimed such close friendship for the slain Cooke that he eventually took the name Leon as his own middle name, he nevertheless stayed on with the corrupt union after Cooke's brutal murder. Following the bad publicity over Cooke's murder, the union was reorganized as the Waste Material Handlers Union, Local 20467, American Federation of Labor. Martin was replaced and the reorganized union was dominated by its secretary-treasurer, Paul J. Dorfman, a man with long-standing connections to Chicago racketeers.

In his book "The Enemy Within," Robert Kennedy mentioned Dorfman while telling how Teamster President Jimmy Hoffa expanded his influence nationwide:

"For him (Hoffa), the key to the entire Midwest was Chicago. He needed a powerful ally there - and he found his man in Paul Dorfman. Dorfman, our (the McClellan Committee - See MOBSTERS) testimony showed, was a big operator - a major figure in the Chicago underworld who also knew his way around in certain labor and political circles....Dorfman took over as head of the Chicago Waste Handlers Union in 1939 after its founder and secretary-treasurer was murdered....Hoffa made a trade with Dorfman. In return for an introduction to the Chicago underworld, the Committee found, Hoffa turned over to him and his family the gigantic Central Conference of Teamsters Welfare Fund insurance."

Several months after Dorfman took over, Ruby suddenly left the union. In 1964, Ruby told the Warren Commission:

"I was with the union back in Chicago and I left the union when I found out a notorious organization had moved in there....I have never been a criminal...I am not a gangster...I had a very rough start in life, but anything I have done, I at least tried to do it in good taste."

Young Rubenstein went back to hustling - this time manufacturing and selling gambling punchboards. His punchboard "company" had no fixed address, but operated out of inexpensive hotels.

It was during this time claimed Chicago attorney Luis Kutner, who both represented mob figures and worked for the Kefauver Committee, that Ruby became connected with Sam Giancana and his crowd (See MOBSTERS).

By mid-1943, he found a more permanent home - the U.S. Air Force. At the beginning of World War II, Rubenstein had been granted a draft deferment for reasons not entirely clear. One version is that he feigned a hearing disability by wearing a hearing aid, while another is that he was granted an "economic hardship" deferment because he was the only Rubenstein child remaining at home. Whatever the reason, it was insufficient in 1943 when he was reclassified 1-A and, despite an appeal to his local board, inducted into the Air Force on May 21. Ruby received "excellent" character and efficiency ratings while in the Air Force which may have been due more to his evasion of official scrutiny than meritorious service. On one occasion, Ruby beat a sergeant with his fists after being called a "Jew bastard."

While in the military, Ruby could always be found in dice or card games around the barracks and apparently even continued his sales schemes. One person told the Warren Commission that Ruby received chocolates and punchboards from Chicago which he peddled around the base for extra money. Upon his discharge from the Air Force in February 1946, Ruby returned to Chicago where he entered an unsuccessful sales business with his three brothers, Hyman, Sam and Earl. As in their childhood, the three Rubenstein brothers constantly argued with each other - this time over how to run the business. One of the few things they agreed on was the need to obtain a more "American" name. After Hyman left the business, Sam, Earl and Jack all shortened their name from Rubenstein to Ruby. Their stormy partnership lasted only one year and by 1947, Jack Ruby had left Chicago for Texas. It was shortly after Jack arrived in Dallas that his name change was made official by a decree from the 68th Judicial District Court of Dallas on December 30, 1947.

Although the official story of Ruby's move is that he went to help his sister operate a nightclub, several different sources - some within the mob - have claimed that Ruby was part of a plan to bring Dallas rackets under the control of the Chicago underworld.

Shortly after the JFK assassination, Dallas businessman Giles Miller added support for this idea by telling the FBI that in 1959 Ruby had told him he wanted to go back to California in 1947 but "was directed" to go to Dallas.

But even more evidence of Ruby's move as part of a mob offensive into Texas came from former Dallas County Sheriff Steve Guthrie. During the late 1930s and early 1940s, Dallas gambling operations were virtually wide open under the control of homegrown bosses like Benny "Cowboy" Binion and Herbert Noble. However, by the late 1940s a bloody feud between these two top gamblers had resulted in Noble's bombing death and Binion's departure for the quieter environs of Las Vegas. It was then that the Chicago mob made its bid for a takeover in Dallas. In late 1946, an emissary from the Chicago Syndicate named Paul Roland Jones made contact with Dallas lawmen in an effort to open the city for the mob. Jones held meetings with Sheriff Guthrie and an obscure Dallas Police lieutenant named George Butler, but later was indicted for attempted bribery when Guthrie and Butler blew the whistle.

In their "Third Interim Report," the Kefauver Senate Committee stated:

"Some indication of how modern crime syndicates operate and how they open new territory is apparent from...the extraordinary testimony of Lt. George Butler of the Police Department of Dallas, Texas. Lieutenant Butler was approached by a member of the Chicago mob by the name of Paul Jones....Jones stated that he was an advance agent of the Chicago crime syndicate and was prepared to offer the District Attorney and the Sheriff $1,000 a week each or 12-and-a-half percent cut on the profit if the syndicate were permitted to operate in Dallas under "complete protection." Jones also stated that syndicate operations were conducted by local people who "front" for the Chicago mob."

At this time the two top Chicago mob leaders were Sam Giancana (the coordinator of Mafia-CIA assassination plots - See MOBSTERS and AGENTS) and Tony Accardo.

Was Ruby one of the "fronts" mentioned by his friend Jones? Sheriff Guthrie told the Warren Commission that Ruby was himself involved in the bribery plan of Jones and that both Jones and his Chicago associates "frequently mentioned that Ruby would operate a 'fabulous' restaurant as a front for gambling activities." The Commission went on to state, however, that since Ruby was not mentioned in Jones' bribery scheme, the Commission "found it difficult to accept (Guthrie's) report." The Commission also ignored a story by Chicago newsman Mort Newman who reported that Butler told him that "Jack Ruby came to Dallas from...Chicago in the late 1940s and was involved in an attempt to bribe Sheriff Steve Guthrie."

The Warren Commission also ignored testimony which showed that Jones met Ruby through two mutual friends, Paul "Needle Nose" Labriola and Jim Weinberg - both well-known associates of Giancana. In fact, to arrive at their conclusion that Ruby was not mob connected, they had to ignore an FBI interview with Jones in which he stated that when he first met Ruby, both Weinberg and Labriola told him Ruby was "all right" as far as the Syndicate was concerned. Weinberg and Labriola were later found garroted and stuffed in a car trunk in a double gangland slaying.

When interviewed for the Warren Commission in 1964, Jones said he believed Butler was serious about accepting mob payoffs, changing his position only after learning that the Texas Rangers were aware of the deal. It was Butler - then assigned to the Juvenile Division - who was in charge of the fatal transfer of Lee Harvey Oswald on November 24, 1963. Butler apparently was also close to right-wing causes in Dallas. According to Penn Jones, former editor of the "Midlothian Mirror" and an early assassination researcher, Butler approached him in 1961 about publishing right-wing literature. Jones told this author:

"He (Butler) offered me the job of printing a regional newspaper under the auspices of the Ku Klux Klan. He told me that half of the Dallas Police were members of the KKK."

Butler also was known to have provided personal police security for right-wing Dallas oil billionaire H.L. Hunt. Butler's veracity comes into further question when one considers Commission Exhibit 2249, which includes the statements of two Dallas policemen who claim that shortly after Ruby killed Oswald, Butler approached them with the "important" information that young Oswald was actually the illegitimate son of Jack Ruby! Whether or not Ruby participated in the 1947 bribe attempt, it is certain that his relationship with Jones continued. On October 24, 1947, Jones was arrested and charged with smuggling opium into the United States from Mexico. In Chicago, both Ruby and his brother Hymie were questioned by Bureau of Narcotics agents investigating the case. And over the next two years, while Jones appealed his narcotics conviction, he frequented Dallas' Singapore Club which by then was operated by Jack Ruby.

The Warren Commission and subsequent assassination investigations have attempted to portray Jack Ruby as a rambunctious, self-ingratiating nightclub owner simply striving for success in a rather shabby business - almost a Damon Runyan racetrack character.

It may also be significant that Ruby was much better connected socially in Dallas than has been publicly stated by federal investigations. As a man-about-town, Ruby was well known not only to police and law enforcement officials, but also to the city and county officials and businessmen who frequented his clubs and attended area gambling parties. One significant contact may be found in an account by Madeline Brown, former mistress to Lyndon Johnson. She claimed to have first met Jack Ruby through Johnson attorney Jerome Ragsdale of Dallas.

She told this author:

"One day in the early 1950s, I was coming out of Nieman-Marcus in downtown Dallas when I encountered Jerome Ragsdale and another man talking on the sidewalk. They seemed to be good friends and Jerome introduced me to the man, who was Jack Ruby. Ruby told me he owned a club downtown and invited me to visit. He also gave me a card. Of course, later I saw Ruby frequently. A bunch of us would see him around town. Lots of people in town knew him, especially people in the downtown area like H.L. Hunt, Henry Wade, Earle Cabell, they all knew him. But after the assassination weekend, everyone was scared to say they knew him."

Furthermore the record shows Ruby a much more important criminal than previously believed.

Crossfire: Jack Ruby Ganster

From the pre-war union murder of Leon Cooke to the 1963 killing of Lee Harvey Oswald in Dallas Jack Ruby's life was one of close association with gangsters and close calls with the law.

Consider these Ruby associates:

BARNEY BAKER - Described by Robert Kennedy as one of Jimmy Hoffa's "roving organizer and ambassador of violence," Baker had moved from criminal activities involving mobsters Jake Lansky and Bugsy Siegel to Teamster organizer for the Central States Conference under Hoffa. According to the Warren Commission, Baker received at least two calls from Ruby in a three-week period preceding the assassination and Baker called Ruby on November 7, 1963. Three of Baker's phone numbers were found in Ruby's notebooks.

JOSEPH CAMPISI - An associate of Dallas Mafia member Joseph Civello, Campisi operated several businesses in Dallas, including a restaurant notorious as a gangster hangout, and has been linked closely to the New Orleans Marcello family. Both Ruby's sister, Eva Grant, and his business partner, George Senator, described Campisi as one of Ruby's closest friends. And, though trying to distance himself from Ruby, Campisi himself told the FBI in December 1963, that he had been in contact with Ruby the night before the assassination and had visited Ruby in jail on November 30, 1963.

FRANK CARACCI - Described by "Life" magazine as a "Marcello mobster," Caracci was arrested by Houston police in 1969 with three members of the Marcello group who later attended the Dallas wedding of Joseph Campisi's son. One of these men was Frank "Tickie" Saia, a prominent Louisiana gambling and political figure who was close friends to Senator Russell Long. In the months preceding the Kennedy assassination, Ruby met with Caracci at least once and was in telephone contact on several occasions.

FRANK CHAVEZ - Another Teamster thug with arrests for obstruction of justice and attempted murder, Chavez told associates he had met with Ruby and other Teamster officials in the fall of 1961, including Richard Kavner who was described by author Dan Moldea as "another key member of the Hoffa circle." A Justice Department memorandum also linked Ruby and Chavez to mobster Tony Provenzano.

JOSEPH CIVELLO - The Dallas Mafia chief who was one of those arrested at the 1957 Apalachin, New York, mob meeting (See MOBSTERS), Civello admitted to the FBI after the assassination that he had known Ruby "for about 10 years." Like Campisi, Civello tried to downplay his close connections with Ruby and someone within the Warren Commission helped this effort by deleting an entire page covering Civello in Commission Exhibit 1536 and by blanking out several paragraphs within the document.

MICKEY COHEN - A news reporter claimed that Ruby was acquainted with famed mobster Cohen through his girlfriend Candy Barr, a close friend of Ruby's who was jailed on a narcotics charge in the early 1960s.

AL GRUBER - A former roommate of Ruby's from Chicago, Gruber told the FBI he had no mob connections. Yet in 1970, a two-page FBI report which had been suppressed for years, showed Gruber had been arrested six times using two aliases in three states. Gruber too was associated with top Teamster officials as well as thugs working for Mickey Cohen. Gruber reportedly had not seen his old friend Ruby for 10 years when he showed up in Dallas in mid-November, 1963, for an extended visit. Ruby called Gruber in Los Angeles three hours after the assassination.

RUSSELL D. MATTHEWS - An underworld character with a lengthy arrest record, Matthews has been linked to Campisi and Florida mob Chief Santos Trafficante. He also was described as a father figure by convicted hitman Charles V. Harrelson (See AFTERMATH). Several people told the Warren Commission that Ruby and Matthews were friends and on October 3, 1963, a call was placed from Ruby's Carousel Club to Matthew's former wife in Louisiana.

MURRAY "DUSTY" MILLER - A former secretary-treasurer of the Teamsters International who was associated with several underworld figures, Miller received a person-to-person call from Ruby on November 8, 1963, according to the Warren Commission.

LENNY PATRICK - According to his sister, Ruby also placed calls to Patrick in late 1963. Identified in a 1965 U.S. Senate report as a high-ranking associate of the Chicago Mafia, Patrick reportedly was close to Chicago mob Chieftain Sam Giancana.

NOFIO J. PECORA - Described by various crime investigations as an ex-convict with several arrests, Pecora has been identified as one of Carlos Marcello's most trusted aides. As late as October 30, 1963, a call was logged between the Dallas phone of Ruby and a New Orleans phone listed to Pecora.

JOHNNY ROSELLI - A former associate of Al Capone, Roselli was one of the Mafia chiefs involved in the CIA-Mafia assassination plots against Castro. His mutilated body was found in an oil drum in Florida's Biscayne Bay in 1976 just as Roselli was scheduled to testify before the House Select Committee on Assassinations. According to Columnist Jack Anderson, Roselli knew Ruby and described him as "one of our boys." According to reports from federal sources in Florida, Roselli and Ruby twice met secretly in Miami motel rooms during the two months preceding the assassination. These meetings were monitored by the FBI, which was keeping Roselli under surveillance. However, no mention of these meetings were made to the Warren Commission.

IRWIN S. WIENER - A close associate of both Hoffa and other Teamster officials, Wiener has been connected to mob bosses Trafficante and Giancana. On October 26, 1963, Wiener received a 12-minute, person-to-person call from Ruby's Carousel Club. He later gave contradictory accounts of the content of this call.

LEWIS McWILLIE - A notorious Dallas gambler, McWillie worked for several gambling houses there during the 1940s, including Benny Benion's Top of the Hill Club and W.C. Kirkwood's Four Deuces Club in nearby Fort Worth. McWillie then joined such famed gangsters as Santos Trafficante, Meyer and Jake Lansky, Dino Cellini and others in gambling operations in Havana, Cuba, before being thrown out by Castro (See CUBANS). One of Ruby's closest friends, McWillie was sent guns by Ruby while still in Cuba and, in fact, was sent a .38 Smith and Wesson by Ruby as late as May 10, 1963. Ruby told the Warren Commission, "I called him frequently... I idolized McWillie." The Kirkwoods, who conducted high-stakes poker games involving wealthy Texans such as H.L. Hunt, Clint Murchinson and Amon Carter Sr., also played host to Texas politicians Sam Rayburn, Lyndon Johnson and John Connally. Kirkwood's son, Pat, served alcoholic drinks to President's Kennedy's Secret Service guards well into the morning hours of November 22, 1963 (See G MEN). Kirkwood told the House Select Committee on Assassination that "Chilly" McWillie was a close family friend. Warren Commission staffers saw several conspiratorial leads in McWillie and recommended that he be called to testify about Ruby's Cuban and mob connections. It was a recommendation which the Commission ignored.

Despite these revealing associations, the Warren Commission Report stated:

"...the Commission believes that the evidence does not establish a significant link between Ruby and organized crime. "

But Jack Ruby's connection to crime was not limited to simply his friends and associates. The record shows his involvement in a number of criminal activities including gambling, narcotics, prostitution and gunrunning. In an interview with FBI agents on December 6, 1963, a small-time bookie named William Abadie told how he had worked briefly for Ruby writing gambling "tickets" as well as serving as a "slot machine and juke box mechanic." According to this FBI report, only partially reported by the Warren Commission in Document 86 (The FBI first page containing the information about Ruby's gambling activities was inexplicably missing from the Commission document.), Abadie stated:

"...it was obvious (to me) that to operate gambling in the manner that he (Ruby) did, that he must have racketeering connections with other individuals in the City of Dallas, as well as Fort Worth, Texas...(This) applied also to police connections with the two cities."

In fact, Abadie told agents that he had observed policemen coming and going while acting as a bookie in a Ruby establishment.

Another gambler, Jack Hardee who was also interviewed by the FBI in December 1963, said when he tried to set up a numbers game in Dallas in 1962, he was told it would be necessary to obtain the approval of Jack Ruby since any "fix" with local authorities had to come through Ruby.

Harry Hall, yet another gambler who had participated in a scheme to bilk wealthy Texans including Dallas oil billionaire H.L. Hunt in the early 1950s, went on to become a credible informant for the Treasury Department and the FBI. He told the Secret Service that he once made a trip with Ruby through Oklahoma and Louisiana. Hall said Ruby had "good connections in gambling circles" there. Hall, like Ruby, was from the same general Chicago neighborhood and had close connections with Teamster racketeers. He also was connected with mobster Johnny Rosselli (See MOBSTERS), Eugene Hale Brading (See AFTERMATH - DALLAS) and the La Costa Country Club (See REDNECKS AND OILMEN). According to Hall, he once won a large amount of money from H.L. Hunt after being introduced to the oilman by his friend Ruby.

According to Ester Ann Mash, a former employee who dated Ruby during the spring of 1963, Ruby was no stranger at the homes of some prominent Dallasites. She told this author:

"Several times he took me to big nice homes where there were important people in town, including District Attorney Henry Wade. I think he only took me so he didn't have to go alone. Once we got there, I never saw Jack. He would be off gambling."

There is simply no question of Ruby's connections to gambling and to gamblers, both local and national.

In 1959 a Dallas gambler named Harry Siedband was arrested in Oklahoma City. On Siedband was a list of the top professional gamblers in the Dallas-Fort Worth area - Jack Ruby's name was on the list.

Not so clear is Ruby's connection to drugs. As mentioned earlier, both Ruby and his brother Hyman were questioned extensively by police following the arrest of one of Paul Jones' lieutenants on charges of smuggling hard narcotics. In a later case, a drug offender named James Breen traveled to Dallas where he made contact with "a large narcotics setup operating between Mexico, Texas and the East," according to Breen's female companion Eileen Curry. Curry told the FBI that Breen's contact with this drug ring was Jack Ruby. After Ruby killed Oswald, Curry again was contacted by the FBI. She repeated her earlier contentions that Ruby and Breen had been mixed up in a narcotics smuggling ring.

There is even the very strange arrest of Ruby in northern New Mexico near the Colorado border in the late 1950s. A local lawmen caught Ruby in a remote area driving an overdue rent car. Nothing much came of the arrest but Dallas sources saw this episode as evidence of a possible drug-smuggling trip by Ruby.

There is also an abundance of evidence that Ruby was involved in other criminal activities, such as prostitution, pornography and bribery. And the fact that Ruby was a pivotal contact man for criminal activity in Dallas seems affirmed by his lack of prosecution by Dallas authorities. Ruby's Dallas rap sheet showed he was arrested nine times in 16 years - his charges ranged from operating his club after legal hours to using a gun to slug an off-duty Dallas policeman in a fight outside the Carousel Club - yet the toughest conviction shown in his criminal record was a $35 fine for ignoring a traffic summons.

###

Jack Ruby's criminal activity reached a peak in 1959 when he became even more closely connected to the mob and the Feds through their common interest in Cuba.

Crossfire: Jack Ruby - Gun Runner and Agent

The year 1959 was a busy time for Jack Ruby. He made at least two trips to Cuba, which had just been taken over by Fidel Castro (See CUBANS); he began making contact with gunrunners who had been arming Castro but were beginning to turn against the bearded leader and he began serving as an informant for the FBI.

Just prior to Castro's takeover, American mobsters had help supply the revolutionary with arms for his fight with Batista. While the dictator Batista was friends with the mob, the gangsters were playing both sides of the fence, believing that if they helped Castro, they would be allowed to remain in Cuba should he succeed in his revolution. The smuggling of arms to Castro was overseen by Norman "Roughhouse" Rothman, a burly associate of Miami mob boss Santos Trafficante who managed Trafficante's Sans Souci Casino in Havana. Reportedly, Rothman at the same time was splitting Havana slot machine revenues with Batista's brother-in-law.

After the assassination, the sister of a Cuban gun runner gave information indicating that Ruby was part of the Rothman operation. Mrs. Mary Thompson said she and her daughter traveled to the Florida Keys during June 1958, where her brother introduced them to a man named "Jack." The women were told that Jack owned a nightclub in Dallas and was a member of "the syndicate" who was running some guns to Cuba. The women's story which was reported to the FBI after the assassination was later corroborated by Bureau informant Blaney Mack Johnson who stated that in the early 1950s, Ruby had an interest in a notorious night club and gambling house in Hallandale, Florida, along with Meyer and Jake Lansky and other prominent mobsters. Johnson said Ruby was active in arranging illegal flights of weapons to Castro forces and named Edward Browder as one of the pilots operating for Ruby. Browder, a flamboyant Miami arms dealer, was a central figure in Rothman's gun-running operation, according to federal court documents. Another soldier of fortune operating with Browder during this time was Frank Sturgis, who would much later be caught burglarizing the Watergate building along with men connected to the Nixon White House. Although the FBI file on Browder reportedly contains more than 1,000 pages, the Bureau only gave three small, innocuous reports to the Warren Commission.

And while there are reports that documents confirming Ruby's gunrunning activities surfaced in both the State Department and Army Intelligence files during the 1963-64 assassination investigations, these documents are said to be missing today.

Jack Ruby, like many other Americans who helped Castro seize power, lived to regret his actions. After Castro closed the mob's casinos and imprisoned gangsters, including Santos Trafficante, he quickly became persona non grata. While awaiting a new trial shortly before his death, Ruby told his lawyers and a doctor that he feared people would find out about his Cuban activities and think him unpatriotic. He is quoted as saying:

"They're going to find out about my trips to Cuba...and the guns and everything."

In another incident recorded in a letter smuggled out of the Dallas County Jail, Ruby wrote:

"They have found a means and ways to frame me, by deception, etc. and they have succeeded in same. My lawyers...were in on it. Now this is how they did it. They had a guard with me constantly...and he started to work on me with the Bible routine, and on his person unbeknownst to me he had one of these wireless speakers, which is very small and he kept it in his trousers pocket...I was very low and crying, and the guard knew I was at my lowest...I came to where he was sitting and I fell to the floor and broke down and said that I had sent guns to Cuba..."

In an effort to repair this slip of the tongue, Ruby hastened to add that he had never really sent guns to Cuba but only had relayed a message from his friend Lewis McWillie to a Dallas gun store owner that McWillie wanted four pistols for personal protection.

However, this same lament was echoed to one of Ruby's employees not long after his murder conviction in 1964. According to Wally Weston, the Carousel Club's emcee who visited his former employer in the Dallas County Jail, Ruby said:

"...Wally, you know what's going to happen now? They're going to find out about my trips to Cuba and my trips to New Orleans and the guns and everything."

In mid-1959, the Rothman gunrunning operation was rocked when its chief was arrested in connection with an $8.5-million Canadian bank burglary. Federal authorities linked the bank job with a large theft of arms from an Ohio national guard armory through a $6,000 airplane rental agreement by Rothman. Authorities agreed it appeared to all be part of a massive gunrunning operation to Cuba.

And it was during this time that Ruby's travels to Cuba increased significantly, thanks to Ruby's mob idol, Lewis J. McWillie. McWillie - potentially a key central character in this swirl of gun runners, drug smugglers, mob hitmen, CIA-Mafia assassination plots and Texas gamblers - has received scant attention from the two major government assassination investigations. Yet, according to Elaine Mynier, who dated McWillie during his days in Dallas, the gambler and Ruby were close friends. In a December 5, 1963, FBI interview, she said McWillie was:

"...a big-time gambler, who has always been in the big money and operated top gambling establishments in the United States and Cuba. He always had a torpedo (a bodyguard) living with him for protection."

Mynier went on to say that Jack Ruby was:

"...a small-time character who would do anything for McWillie, who was in the habit of being surrounded by people he could use."

In his Warren Commission testimony, Ruby made no secret of his closeness to McWillie. He said:

"I called him frequently...I idolized McWillie. He is a pretty nice boy and I happened to be idolizing him....I always thought a lot of him...I have a great fondness for him...."

Despite Ruby's accolades, Commission members declined to follow through on a staff recommendation to call McWillie to testify about his relationship with Ruby and Mafia figures. The Warren Report mentions McWillie only briefly regarding Ruby's 1959 visit to Cuba and concluded:

"The Commission has found no evidence that McWillie has engaged in any activities since leaving Cuba that are related to pro- or anti-Castro political movements or that he was involved in Ruby's abortive jeep transaction."

As can be seen, there was no mention of McWillie's alleged mob ties or to McWillie's FBI record, No. 4404064, which gives a list of aliases and characterizes him as a gangland killer.

While the Warren Commission took Ruby and McWillie's word that the 1959 trips to Cuba were "purely social," the House Select Committee on Assassinations did not. After listing a number of visits to Cuba based on visas, airline tickets and even a post card, Chief Counsel Blakey wrote:

"...we established beyond reasonable doubt that Ruby lied repeatedly and willfully to the FBI and the Warren Commission about the number of trips he made to Cuba and their duration....It was clear, for example, that the trips were not social jaunts; their purpose, we were persuaded, was to courier something, probably money, into or out of Cuba...the evidence indicated strongly that an association (with Trafficante) existed and that Ruby's trip was related to Trafficante's detention and release. We came to believe that Ruby's trips to Cuba were, in fact, organized-crime activities."

Lewis J. McWillie was born May 4, 1908, in Kansas City, Missouri. From 1940 until 1958, he lived in Dallas where he managed several gambling operations, including Benny Binion's legendary Top of the Hill Terrace and the Four Deuces in nearby Fort Worth owned by gentleman gambler W.C. Kirkwood. Recall it was his son, Pat Kirkwood, who hosted Kennedy's Secret Service agents the night before the assassination. (See G MEN). In the summer of 1958, McWillie relocated to Havana, Cuba, where he worked for Norman Rothman as a pitboss in Trafficante's Sans Souci casino. It was during this time that Ruby was encountered in the Florida Keys involved in gunrunning schemes run by Rothman.

By September 1958, McWillie was manager of the Tropicana Hotel's luxurious casino, then styled as "the largest nightclub in the world." It was here that McWillie became a close associate of some of the mob's most powerful leaders. According to a March 26, 1964, FBI memo prepared for the Warren Commission:

"...it would appear McWillie solidified his Syndicate connections through his association in Havana with Santos Trafficante, well-known Syndicate member, for Tampa, Florida; Meyer and Jake Lansky; Dino Cellini and others who were members of or associates of "the Syndicate."

Yet over the years, McWillie maintained that he only knew these men "casually," but did admit an acquaintanceship with Dallas crime figures, R.D. Matthews and Joseph Civello.

It is interesting to note that both McWillie - Ruby's "idol" - and Matthews - hitman Charles Harrelson's idol (See AFTERMATH) - were connected to Dallas gambling operations during the 1950s; both went to work gambling in Havana, Cuba, in 1958-59; and in later years, both were employed at Benny Binion's Horseshoe Club in Las Vegas.

When Castro closed the Tropicana, McWillie became pit boss at the Capri Hotel's casino, another Trafficante property. The Capri was then run by Charlie "The Blade" Tourine, whose mistress later confirmed that she was assisting Frank Sturgis in an attempt to poison Castro (See AGENTS).

McWillie finally left Cuba in January 1961. According to Ruby and others, he was one of the last American mobsters to leave the island.

It is interesting to note that during the first half of 1961 McWillie was in Miami, the site of the CIA-Mafia assassination meetings involving Trafficante, Giancana and Roselli (See AGENTS and MOBSTERS).

Since that time, McWillie has worked at a number of Nevada gambling casinos including the Cal-Neva Lodge, the Riverside Club, Thunderbird Club, Carousel Club (La Vegas), the Horseshoe Club (run by former Dallas gambler Benny Binion) and the Holiday Inn Casino.

In early 1959, McWillie's boss Trafficante was arrested and jailed in the Trescornia Camp outside Havana. Within days of this incident, Jack Ruby contacted convicted Texas gunrunner Robert Ray McKeown. In the 1950s, McKeown owned a manufacturing plant in Santiago, Cuba, but was forced to leave the island in 1957 after failing to pay kickbacks to Batista. In 1958, he received a 2-year suspended sentence and five years on probation when convicted by U.S. authorities of conspiring to smuggle arms to Castro. His gunrunning activities brought McKeown into close contact with two notable Cubans - Fidel Castro. McKeown was photographed with the bearded leader during a visit to Houston in April 1959. He was also close to Carlos Prio Socarras, former President of Cuba who quickly turned against Castro and became a leader of the anti-Castro Cubans in the United States. It was due to this closeness to Cuban leaders that McKeown was contacted by telephone by a man who identified himself as "Jack Rubenstein of Dallas." The caller said he had obtained McKeown's phone number through a member of Houston County Sheriff's Office and had thought his name was "Davis." "Davis" was the same name that Ruby mentioned to his attorneys when asked if he knew of anyone that could damage their legal plea of momentary insanity for Ruby. Indeed, a gunrunner named Tommy E. Davis not only was active in Texas at that time but during Ruby's trial showed up in Dallas and told Ruby's attorneys that he and Ruby had met several times to discuss the possibility of running arms to Cuba. However, Davis denied that anything came of this planning. Tommy Davis was linked to both U.S. Intelligence and crime circles (See AGENTS).

McKeown told the House Select Committee on Assassinations that Rubenstein - after Oswald was killed McKeown realized it was actually Jack Ruby - told him he represented Las Vegas interests that were seeking the release of three prisoners in Cuba. The caller offered $5,000 each for help in obtaining release of the prisoners. McKeown told the caller he would accept the offer if money were forthcoming. The man on the phone said he was thinking about it.

About three weeks later, McKeown said he was visited by a man at his business near Houston. The visitor was Ruby and this time Ruby said he had access to a large number of jeeps in Shreveport, Louisiana, which he was going to sell in Cuba. He offered McKeown $25,000 for a letter of introduction to Castro. Again, McKeown asked for money up front. He later claimed that Ruby "never returned nor did he ever see him again."

Of equal interest is McKeown's claim in later years that just weeks before the assassination, he was contacted by yet another man who wanted to buy weapons, particularly high-powered rifles with scopes. McKeown said this man identified himself as "Lee Oswald." In this story, which has been corroborated by a McKeown friend, Sam Neill, "Lee Oswald" and a man named Hernandez showed up at McKeown's home in late September or early October 1963, saying they were involved in planning a revolution in El Salvadore.

Oswald, described as a "smart aleck" dressed only in shirtsleeves, then offered McKeown $10,000 for four .300 Savage automatic rifles each with a telescopic sight. McKeown said he refused to sell arms to "Oswald." Both McKeown and his friend Neill independently recognized Oswald on November, 22, 1963, as the man who had visited a few weeks earlier. However, both men decided to keep quiet about the Oswald visit, saying later they were "scared" to tell the FBI in 1964 what they knew. Indeed, a January, 28, 1964, FBI document pertaining to McKeown's interview states:

To his knowledge, he has never seen or met Lee Harvey Oswald.

Although the House Committee pointed to inconsistencies in McKeown's various accounts of his contact with both Ruby and Oswald, on the whole - especially with the Neill corroboration - his story seems plausible to many researchers. But there may be much more to it in light of the statements of a former poker partner of Ruby named James E. Beard. Beard told the "Dallas Morning News" in 1978 that he was an automobile dealer in Houston and knew that Ruby had been involved in arms deals near McKeown's home in Kemah, located southeast of Houston on Galveston Bay. Interviewed by the FBI in 1976, Beard said he "personally saw many boxes of new guns, including automatic rifles and handguns" stored in a two-story house near the channel at Kemah. He said these arms were loaded onto what appeared to be a 50-foot military surplus boat nearby. The FBI reported:

"He (Beard) stated each time that the boat left with guns and ammunition, Jack Ruby was on board..."

Beard said Ruby would show up in Kemah usually on weekends and play poker to kill time until the boat was loaded. He told the FBI that he saw this operation take place at least twice while he was there. Beard said after the assassination, he contacted the FBI. In a newspaper article, he said he waited until 1966 and "nothing had come out (regarding Ruby's gunrunning), so I called them (FBI) just to find out why...I was curious. However, they didn't see fit to even mention it to me again, so I never heard of anything they ever opened up on it."

He said suddenly in 1976, an FBI agent showed up to talk to him. In his report, the agent wrote: "...there had been so much speculation as to possible foreign connections and he (Beard) thought it better not to mention his knowledge of Jack Ruby in Kemah."

This FBI report made no mention of Beard's attempt to tell the Bureau what he knew in 1966.

Yet another incident occurred in 1961 which indicates that Ruby's gunrunning activities may not have ceased in 1959. Nancy Perrin Rich worked for Ruby and became involved in Cuban gunrunning activities while married to Robert Perrin in Dallas. In interviews with both the FBI and Warren Commission, she related how her mob-related husband met in 1961 with a group of anti-Castro Cubans. The meeting, which took place in a Dallas apartment, was presided over by a U.S. Army lieutenant colonel. During this meeting, her husband was offered $10,000 to bring a boatload of Cuban refugees to Miami. The couple demanded a cash retainer.

A few nights later, the Perrins met again with the Cubans, who apparently were expecting money. This time the Cubans mentioned taking stolen arms to Cuba and promised that more money was on the way. Rich told the Warren Commission:

"I had the shock of my life....A knock comes on the door and who walks in but my little friend Jack Ruby....and everybody looks like...here comes the Savior."

Rich claimed to have detected a bulge in Ruby's jacket which disappeared quickly. That plus the fact that the Cubans' plans became more definite with Ruby's arrival led her to conclude that Ruby was the "bag man" bringing funds to the Cubans. She said she and her husband finally bowed out of the deal because they "smelled an element that I did not want to have any part of." Less than a year after the meeting with the Cubans, Ruby and the military officer, Perrin was found dead of arsenic poisoning. His death was ruled a suicide.

While McKeown claimed to have had no further contact with Jack Ruby and the Warren Commission proclaimed Ruby's jeep deal "abortive," something worked right, for shortly after a Ruby visit to Cuba in the summer of 1959, three Castro prisoners - Loran Hall (See CUBANS), Henry Saavedra and Santos Trafficante were released from prison and ordered out of Cuba. It may have all been due to Jack Ruby.

According to Elaine Mynier, a mutual friend to both Ruby and McWillie, she was asked by Ruby to deliver a message to McWillie in Cuba not long after Castro took over. She told the FBI:

"(It was)...a short-written message in code consisting of letters and numbers and including the word "arriving."

On November 26, 1963, long before any in-depth investigation was done on Ruby's background, a British journalist, John Wilson, informed the American Embassy in London that he was in held in the Trescornia Camp outside Havana with Trafficante in the summer of 1959. Wilson said there he "met an American gangster called Santos" and that "Santos was visited several times by an American gangster type named Ruby." Wilson claimed the man named Ruby would come to the prison with people bringing food to Trafficante.

Although Wilson is now dead, there is considerable corroboration to his story. In 1978, author Anthony Summers talked with the prison superintendent, who confirmed that the "English journalist" indeed was held in the same area as Trafficante. He also confirmed that Trafficante received special meals from one of the Havana hotels.

According to Ruby's travel documents, he stayed at the Capri Hotel where Trafficante held a major interest. This story is also corroborated by Gerry Hemming, a CIA agent who in 1959 was serving with Castro's forces. Hemming has said he saw Ruby in a meeting with Castro leader Captain William Morgan during this time and the talk centered around efforts to release Trafficante from prison.

There also is an intriguing mention of this matter in a confidential House Assassinations Committee briefing memorandum which stated:

"Lewis J. McWillie, a close friend with Ruby and a man with many contacts among organized crime figures, indicates that in 1959 Jack Ruby traveled to Cuba and visited Santos Trafficante in jail."

Although during testimony before the House Select Committee on Assassinations, Trafficante plainly stated, "I never remember meeting Jack Ruby," the committee concluded there was considerable evidence that such a meeting did take place. Sources within the Dallas underworld claim Ruby was the middle man who, acting on orders of McWillie, bought Trafficante's freedom from Cuba with the sale of black-market jeeps to Castro. While this has not yet been officially confirmed, it is certainly significant that there appears to have been much closer contact between Jack Ruby, Oswald's slayer, and Santos Trafficante, the mob boss who predicted that Kennedy would be "hit" (See MOBSTERS). The fact that Ruby idolized the stylish, gray-haired McWillie and would do "anything" for his mentor is especially intriguing in light of the close association between McWillie and Trafficante. At least two Dallas underworld sources have claimed that McWillie was "made," or sponsored, into the Mafia by none other than Trafficante, the man involved in the CIA-Mafia assassination plots and closely allied with the anti-Castro Cubans.

And during those active days in 1959, Ruby made another astonishing contact - the Federal Bureau of Investigation. The Warren Commission was quietly notified in early 1964 that Jack Ruby had been contacted by the Bureau in 1959 as an informant but asked that the Commission keep this explosive fact a secret. The contents of this February 27, 1964, memo from director Hoover to Warren Commission General Counsel J. Lee Rankin was not made public until 1975. The memo, belatedly discovered through "a search of all files in the Dallas (FBI) office wherein references to Jack Ruby appeared," stated:

"For your information, Ruby was contacted by an Agent of the Dallas Office on March 11, 1959, in view of his position as a night club operator who might have knowledge of the criminal element in Dallas. He was advised of the Bureau's jurisdiction in criminal matters, and he expressed a willingness to furnish information along these lines. He was subsequently contacted on eight occasions between March 11, 1959, and October 2, 1959, but he furnished no information whatever and further contacts with him were discontinued. Ruby was never paid any money, and he was never at any time an informant of this Bureau."

The Commission not only failed to see the significance of the nine meetings between the FBI and Ruby during the very time he was trying to free mob boss Trafficante, but also did not bother to question the FBI agent who had met with Ruby. But many law enforcement officers, both state and federal, have privately stated that both the frequency and duration of these Ruby contacts suggests there was more to the relationship than Hoover was admitting. In addition, researchers' suspicions were aroused after learning that Ruby's contacts - reportedly innocuous - with the FBI had been kept hidden for more than a decade after the assassination.

The House Select Committee on Assassinations did interview FBI Agent Charles W. Flynn, the agent who met with Ruby. According to Flynn, Ruby initiated the contacts on March 11, 1959, rather than the Bureau as stated in the Hoover memo. Flynn said Ruby told him he wanted to give information on a confidential basis and so Flynn opened a "Potential Criminal Informant," or PCI file on Ruby. Flynn said he closed the file on November 6, 1959, because Ruby had not been particularly helpful. The House Committee staff also found this connection between Ruby and the FBI at the time Ruby was making trips to Cuba intriguing. The Committee's chief counsel later wrote:

"Ruby could, of course, have contacted the FBI with no ulterior motive, and it could have been wholly unrelated to his Cuban activities...We (the Committee staff) believed, however, that Ruby's behavior was consistent with the pattern of seasoned offenders, who often cultivate a relationship with a law enforcement agency during a period when they are engaging in a criminal activity in the hope that, if they are caught, they can use the relationship to secure immunity from prosecution."

The House Committee also expressed interest in a post office box which Ruby used 12 times coinciding with the times he met with FBI Agent Flynn. Researchers have been equally intrigued by Ruby's purchase of miniature electronic bugging equipment during this same period, suggesting that Ruby's involvement with the Bureau was not as innocent as reported.

On April 27, 1959, shortly after his first contact with Agent Flynn and the day before their next scheduled meeting, Ruby rented safety deposit box 448 at Merchants State Bank in Dallas, where he maintained a small business checking account. Sometime before he rented the bank box, Ruby bought more than $500 worth of tape-recording equipment. The saleswoman, contacted by Secret Service agents shortly after the assassination weekend, recalled that Ruby bought "a wristwatch which held a microphone for the equipment, and also an instrument to bug a telephone...(and a) tie clip and attaché case." An FBI agent also interviewed the saleswoman, but filed a meager two-paragraph report, omitting the descriptions of the electronic bugging equipment.

From the time Ruby acquired the safety deposit box through the fall of 1959, researchers have discerned a pattern - both before and after making a trip to Cuba, Ruby would enter this deposit box and then contact the FBI.

Flynn denied to the House Committee that he and Ruby discussed the Cuban visits, but in later years Flynn reportedly admitted to news reporters that Ruby may have mentioned one trip to Cuba.

And apparently Ruby was making no secret of his Cuban sojourns at the time. He sent a post card from Havana to a girlfriend in Dallas and he was overheard telling one of his employees not to say where he was going "unless it were to the police or some other official agency."

It also should be noted that three days after Ruby shot Oswald, authorities in New Orleans received a tip that Jack Ruby had bought some paintings while in that city in the summer of 1959. While this information seemed hardly germane to the assassination, its source points to the involvement of U.S. Intelligence. For this bit of art news came from William George Gaudet, the CIA operative who accompanied Oswald to Mexico (See AGENTS). So apparently the CIA was tracking Ruby's movements in 1959 and after the assassination, Ruby was fearful that his activities in New Orleans - which obviously involved Cuba - would be found out.

The House Select Committee on Assassinations determined that Ruby may have made as many as six trips to Cuba, but most significantly, this issue was clouded and passed off by both the FBI and the Warren Commission.

When Warren Commission Attorneys Leon Hubert and Burt Griffin - both assigned to the Ruby aspect of the investigation - requested further probing of Ruby's Cuban connections, they were rebuffed by both the CIA and other Commission staff members.

In later years, Warren Commission staffer Howard P. Willens - the liaison man with the Department of Justice - explained the Commission's reluctance to probe deeper by telling newsman Seth Kantor:

"...these Cuban pursuits represented some kind of bottomless pit and our overall investigation had to be wrapped up (See THE WARREN COMMISSION)."

Considered together, the activities of Jack Ruby involving Cuba, Trafficante, McWillie and the FBI represent a whole new dimension of the assassination - one which has yet to be fully explored. But these connections, especially in light of the current theory of mob involvement in the assassination, certainly elevates Ruby far above the simple, emotional night club owner pictured by the Warren Commission.

The House Committee's Chief Counsel Robert Blakey, commenting on Ruby's connections with both mobsters and Cuba, wrote:

"Our conclusion about Ruby in Cuba did not necessarily mean organized crime had a hand in the events in Dallas in 1963, but it did shift the balance in the careful process of weighing the evidence."

###

As the day of Kennedy's assassination approached, Jack Ruby continued to be in contact with a variety of mob figures both by telephone and in person. One of the most intriguing incidents involved Johnny Roselli, the gangster involved with Santos Trafficante and Sam Giancana in the CIA-Mafia assassination plots. It has now become known that beginning in the summer of 1963 and continuing into November, the FBI had Roselli under surveillance. Researchers were surprised in later years that the Bureau had monitored two separate meetings between Roselli and Jack Ruby which occurred within two months of Kennedy's death. Roselli, who later began to speak openly to columnist Jack Anderson, admitted to knowing Ruby, calling him "one of our boys."

What these meetings were about and why they were not reported to the Warren Commission is not known but to most researchers it provides yet another clear example of suppression of evidence on the part of the FBI.

One of the most intriguing stories to come out of the assassination case involved a woman who claimed to have worked for Ruby and who is on record as accurately predicting Kennedy's death.

Crossfire: The Woman Who Foresaw the Assassination

On November 20, 1963, two days before the assassination, Louisiana State Police Lieutenant Francis Fruge journeyed to Eunice, La., to pick up a woman who had received minor abrasions when she was thrown from a car. The woman appeared to be under the influence of some drug. She later was driven to the State Hospital in Jackson, La. On the way she told Fruge that she had been traveling with two men "who were Italians or resembled Italians" from Florida to Dallas. When Fruge asked her what she planned to do in Dallas, the woman replied:

"...number one, pick up some money, pick up (my) baby and...kill Kennedy."

