

News - Education

Sunday, Aug. 19, 2012

Clemson students win dairy product contest

Three Clemson University food-science students received a first-place prize in the Dairy Research Institute's new product competition.

The students' winning product was an oat-infused vanilla milk called "tOATal Milk."

Clemson's winning team — made up of graduate students Jason Raines of Orangeburg, Sarah Stancil of Six Mile and Katie Queen of Clemson — was sponsored by the '55 Exchange, a student-run business enterprise that produces and sells Clemson ice cream. The winners, selected from 18 entrants, received $8,000.

Participants in the competition were asked to create a dairy beverage that included more than 51 percent fresh milk, dry milk or other dairy ingredients.

Click here for online version.