

Drivers (Continued):

Because drivers are so much like system extensions, most of the data that applies to one also applies to the other.

Drivers can create the same types of conflicts that system extensions do. One additional type of conflict that more often occurs with a driver is when two or more drivers try to use the same port of the Macintosh. Two drivers that both want to use the Printer port, for instance, might create a conflict.