

Exploring the Internet
Lawrence Aronovitch, Ottawa, Ontario, Canada

My office has recently been linked into Internet, and I've been fascinated to discover the many resources that are suddenly available from all over the world. I suspect that most people, if they've heard of Internet at all, think it offers no more than e-mail. Using programs like "ftp," "telnet," "gopher" and others, I've discovered there's much more.

I think this would be an excellent topic for Nautilus to cover in a future issue.

From the Nautilus Team:

Thanks for this great suggestion. We are, in fact, planning to bring you information about the Internet on a future issue of Nautilus. We'll certainly keep your comments in mind. By the way, if you missed Father Mack's information about the Internet a few issues back, you may find it helpful. See the Commentary section on the May disc, Volume 3-5.
