There are two major issues with publishing color images to the Internet. On your end, you need to convert your images to contain a fewer number of colors.

The second happens at the other end when your image is displayed in a browser somewhere on the Internet. Internet browsers can process only a limited range of colors.

Reducing the color information increases the speed and eases file handling, but it means that your image may lose even more detail when displayed using a browser.