The computers that store Web documents and run software that make the documents available are called servers.

To publish documents on the Web, you need a server   that stores the HTML documents and relays information to Web browsers that make requests for your documents.   When someone points their browser to your Web document, the browser talks to your server to get that document and then display it.