Iron Helix: Iron Helix is surprisingly fast even for a CD game. The game's documentation is outstanding, the background storyline is great (if you like sci-fi). However, the game is solved much too easy. It took me about 45 minutes to solve the whole game. Christian Franz - Zuerich, Switzerland

Super Maze Wars: Great! This is totally cool - all the fun of Spectre with some strategy and some quick action in it, too. Peter A. Cohen - Melrose, MA

Pathways Into Darkness: Pathways Into Darkness is absolutely the best Macintosh game I have ever played. It's also the most intense game I have ever played. After playing it for awhile, I noticed myself leaning to the side while I dodged enemy projectiles. This game has wonderful 256 color graphics and texture-mapping, which makes for very detailed 3D graphics, and the sound effects are very realistic. It makes great use of the Macintosh interface (especially in the inventory). Pathways Into Darkness is worth every cent of the money I paid for it. Jeremy Condit - Gainesville, Florida

Space Junkie: Space Junkie is a tiny little Space Invader/Galaxian/Phoenix type game. It takes up only about 80K of space on the drive, but is wonderful (and very hard) to play. A very nice piece of coding, that puts a lot of bigger efforts to shame. David Wareing - Seacliff, South Australia

Mac GamePad. The GamePad is probably the best single piece of hardware that has been released since the mouse. It makes games that previously were unplayable very addictive (e.g. Arashi) and in other games it gives you a great advantage over players that don't have it (Super Maze Wars). Thirdly it adds a whole dimension to two-player/single-mac games like 4D Boxing. No Mac should be without it! Christian Franz - Zuerich, Switzerland
