

Beta Testing

I'm always looking for good beta testers, and all registered users are more than welcome to join our beta testing team.

Beta testers are an invaluable part of the development process. As a beta tester, you'll not only help me find bugs in my software, but also discuss new features and make suggestions that guide the development of our products.

I currently do all my testing on America Online, a commercial online service, and the Internet. America Online is the most inexpensive of the commercial services, and their email system is particularly suited for beta testing. If you're not already an America Online user, you can get their starter software and 10 hours free by calling 800-227-6364. Users (especially international users who do not have access to America Online) are welcome to beta test through the Internet. I do not use CompuServe for regular beta testing due to their current cost structure.

To join our beta testing team, just send an email message to AdamStein on America Online (or AdamStein@aol.com on the Internet) with your name and address so that I can check that you're a registered user.
